I understand, but I cannot back date a medical eval write up. The eval was conducted on the 1st, but written on the 6th. I'll take the hit on that. You did as is required of you to have him evaluated on the 1st and did receive a verbal report by myself on the 1st. It is my fault the report was not written until the 6th. I hope that covers you. If challenged I can explain to whomever. You can alternatively use the original copy with the crossed out mistake. I would recommend that course of action. It was appropriately crossed out with a single line, initialed and dated. That is medically and legally acceptable. Again, I can explain if questioned.

Dr. Russell

Ok Sir, don't kill me, but you dated the eval for the 6th instead of the 1st of April. I am so sorry. Thanks.

He Sir, I thought about something and wanted to run it by you. The defense side may try to pick apart your eval because you lined out one and circled another answer on the eval. It is a well written eval of course but I have experience testifying and this is something that they will put a lot of weight into to try to question "what you really meant." You do not have to change it but these are tactics defense attorneys use especially when they are struggling to present a good case. Thanks.
