dismiss the U.S. Trustee's appeal on the grounds of constitutional mootness.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the U.S. Trustee respectfully requests that this Court deny the Debtors' Motion.

Respectfully submitted,

STATUTES AND RULES

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

In 2005, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (Apr. 20, 2005) ("BAPCPA") in order to remedy various abuses of the bankruptcy system. One of the specific abuses at which BAPCPA was directed was the practice by bankrupt companies of paying their top executives large bonuses through key employee retention programs. These programs, which are commonly known as KERPs, would ostensibly reward those executives for remaining at their jobs during the bankruptcy. In practice, these bonuses effectively would come at the expense of trade vendors, employees, and other creditors who were being paid less than the full amount of their claims through the bankruptcy process. See Statement of Senator Edward Kennedy on the Bankruptcy Bill (March 1, 2005) (noting "glaring abuses of the bankruptcy system by the executives of giant companies . . . who lined their own pockets, but left thousands of employees and retirees out in the cold") (quoted in In re Dana Corp., 358 B.R. 567, 575 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006)).

BAPCPA sought to curb the proliferation of KERPs by adding section 503(c)(1) to the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 503(c)(1). That section provides, in relevant part, that "there shall neither be allowed, nor paid . . . a transfer made to, or an obligation incurred for the benefit of, an insider . . . for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business" unless the debtor can satisfy a stringent test designed to demonstrate the necessity and reasonableness of such payments. 11 U.S.C. § 503(c)(1). In addition, even if this test is met, BAPCPA imposes a monetary limit on the amount that can be paid to an insider under a KERP. 11 U.S.C. § 503(c)(1)(C).

In this case, Nellson Neutraceutical, Inc. and its affiliates (collectively, "Nellson" or the "Debtors"), sought to do precisely what section 503(c)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code is designed to prohibit. On the eve of its bankruptcy, Nellson adopted a KERP that obligated Nellson to pay its senior managers retention bonuses for the stated purpose of encouraging those managers to remain employed by Nellson. After the Debtors' chief executive officer was informed that the new bankruptcy laws limit the availability of KERPs, the Debtors developed and filed the "management incentive plan,"or MIP, to "replace" the KERP.

The bankruptcy court nevertheless approved a modified version of the MIP on the grounds that it was not adopted for the "primary purpose" of retention, and that section 503(c)(1) was therefore inapplicable. The bankruptcy court's conclusion was erroneous for at least two reasons. First, by holding that section 503(c)(1) is inapplicable to payments that have retention as one purpose, but not as their "primary purpose," the bankruptcy court failed to apply the plain terms of the Bankruptcy Code, which contains no such limitation. Second, even if the bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 503(c)(1) were correct, the court erred by approving the MIP because the uncontradicted evidence in the record below demonstrates that retention was the primary, if not the exclusive, purpose of the MIP.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This appeal is taken from a final order entered by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Delaware. This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

Did the bankruptcy court err when it approved Nellson's motion to implement the MIP, on the grounds that the MIP was not subject to the limitations set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 503(c)(1)?

STATEMENT OF STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

The bankruptcy court's interpretation of Section 503(c)(1) is a legal question that this court reviews de novo. See, e.g., In re Sharon Steel Corp., 871 F.2d 1217, 1222-23 (3d Cir. 1989); In re Hechinger Inv. Co. of Del., Inc., 276 B.R. 43, 45 (D. Del. 2002). The bankruptcy court's factual findings regarding the purpose of the MIP are reviewed for clear error, In re Sterten, 546 F.3d 278, 282 (3d Cir. 2008), while its ultimate conclusions drawn from those facts are subject to plenary review. Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1222-23.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On January 28, 2006, the Debtors filed voluntary petitions for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 1101 et seq. On April 28, 2006, the Debtors filed their Motion for Entry of an Order Authorizing and Approving Payments Under Management Incentive Plan (the "MIP Motion"). In the MIP Motion, the Debtors sought authority to implement and make payments under the MIP. The United States Trustee[1] and the official committee of the Debtors' unsecured creditors (the "Committee")[2] objected to the MIP Motion on grounds that it was a thinly-veiled attempt to pay insiders in contravention of Section 503(c)(1). Following an evidentiary hearing, the bankruptcy court granted the MIP Motion by order dated July 18, 2006. The United States Trustee and the Committee timely filed notices of appeal from that order.[3] On October 9, 2008, this Court denied the Debtors' motion to dismiss the appeal as moot.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. On the eve of its bankruptcy, Nellson adopts a KERP for the stated purpose of retaining senior management.

Nellson, a manufacturer of weight loss, sports training, wellness and medical products, filed a petition for reorganization relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code along with six of its affiliates on January 28, 2006. Bankr. Ct. Dkt. 1. Approximately one month earlier, and in anticipation of its bankruptcy, Nellson adopted a Key Employee Retention Plan (the "KERP"). The KERP provided for the payment of a "Retention Bonus" to nine "insiders" who were members of Nellson's senior management. The proposed bonus payments aggregated $710,000 and required that the beneficiaries remained employed by the Nellson for the first half of the 2006 calendar year. Joint Trial Exhibits 21 and 38.

The KERP recited that Nellson was "currently pursuing a restructuring of its debt and equity structure" and that the participants in the KERP were "critical to the successful accomplishment of the Restructuring or any alternative thereto that preserves the going concern value of the Business." The terms of the KERP recited that it was "both necessary and appropriate to induce the Participants to remain in the service of Nellson and to devote his or her full time, attention, energy and effort to the Business." KERP at 1. The KERP provided for participants to have vested "Retention Bonuses" by June 20, 2006 at the latest, so long as the participant "has remained regularly employed by Nellson." The Retention Bonuses would also vest earlier if a participant were terminated for any reason other than "for cause," or if there were "constructive termination" or the occurrence of a "capital event" including the confirmation of a plan of reorganization under chapter 11. KERP, at 2-4.

[3] The Committee subsequently stipulated to dismissal of its appeal.

It is undisputed that the pre-bankruptcy KERP was a retention plan. As Nellson's counsel conceded, the KERP "was done to basically tell the employees that there was going to be a mechanism to retain them so that they didn't quit during the restructuring." 7/13/06 Tr., at 197:11-16.

II. Following the commencement of the bankruptcy cases, Nellson replaces the KERP with the MIP, which contains similar terms and is designed to serve the same purposes.

Nellson adopted the MIP after the bankruptcy cases were filed. Joint Trial Exhibit 20, at 1. The MIP provided for payments related to two separate time periods: the first half of the 2006 calendar year (ending on July 2, 2006), and the second half of the year. Under the terms of the MIP, nine "insiders"[4] who were members of Nellson's senior management were to receive semi-annual bonus payments of respectively $680,000 and $715,000. For each time period, top-level management personnel would be entitled to payment if Nellson reached 50%[5] of the "earnings before income, taxes, depreciation and amortization" ("EBITDA") budgeted for that period. The amount of each MIP payment would increase as higher EBITDA thresholds were reached. For the first half-year, the maximum payments and the timing of those payments under the MIP were roughly the same as the timing and amounts identified in the KERP. Joint Trial Exhibit 20 (Exhibit A); Joint Trial Exhibits 21 and 38 (Exhibit A).

[4] Eight of the nine members of senior management participating in the MIP were also participants in the KERP. The MIP substituted one senior executive for another. Compare Joint Trial Exhibit 20 with Joint Trial Exhibit 38 (Exhibit A to each document lists the participants).

[5] When filed, the MIP provided for compensation based on Nellson attaining an initial threshold of 50% of budgeted EBITDA; after the United States. Trustee and the Committee objected to the MIP, Nellson revised that threshold to 75% of budgeted EBITDA.

The MIP provided for the waiver of rights under the KERP, but with such waiver being void if the beneficiary "does not receive any Plan Payment to which he or she is entitled under the Plan on or before the completion of such Plan . . . ." Joint Trial Exhibit 20, at 6-7.

As with the KERP, the beneficiaries' rights under the MIP were expressly linked to their willingness to remain employed by Nellson during the bankruptcy. Management participants in the MIP would be entitled to incentive payments if they remained employed by Nellson, provided that the 50% EBITDA threshold was met for each half-year period. Assuming the EBITDA threshold was attained, they would also be entitled to the payments even if (i) they were terminated other than for cause during the first half year or (ii) there were a "Capital Event" such as confirmation of a Chapter 11 plan of reorganization, a sale of Nellson's business as a going concern, or certain changes in control of Nellson. MIP, at 2-5.

Nellson's CEO, Jeffrey Dias, acknowledged that participants in the MIP were selected in order to "make sure" that essential employees would "stay in place." 7/10/06 Tr., at 13:24-14:7. As Mr. Dias explained, "It's been my experience that, you know, the race horses are skittish. I mean, the folks who are really the best in a leadership situation are the ones who are most likely to be concerned about their future. They're the most marketable people. They have the most alternatives available to them for employment." Id. at 17:17–18:1. Mr. Dias then further expressed concern that potential participants in the MIP might leave if the MIP were not approved, id. at 22:21-23, and he speculated as to the impact on Nellson were that to happen, id. at 23:23–24:10.

Mr. Dias described the MIP as "a very moderate cost of insurance." Id. at 24:25. Mr. Dias further conceded that the MIP was intended to "replace" the KERP, and that it was adopted because he had been advised that KERPs were no longer permissible under the Bankruptcy Code. Id. at 47:10-24.

After Mr. Dias prepared the list of MIP participants and the amounts of incentive payments for which they would be eligible under the MIP,[6] he submitted the information to William Creelman, the engagement manager for Nellson's financial advisors, and asked that he link the payments to the performance of the company. 7/10/06 Tr., at 104:17-20. The financial advisors then developed a payment structure tied to Nellson's achievement of budgeted EBITDA at the half-year and full-year marks. The initial performance thresholds for incentive payments were well below budgeted EBITDA. As noted above, the first threshold for incentive payments was actual EBITDA performance at 50% of the budgeted EBITDA for the applicable time period. Creelman acknowledged that, if Nellson achieved only 50% of budgeted EBITDA, "it wouldn't be a good thing for the company." 7/10/06 Tr., at 100-101. One of the approving board members, William Lenihan, testified he was aware, at the time Nellson filed the MIP Motion, that Nellson's actual EBITDA performance for the first quarter was somewhere between 110 to 113% of the budgeted EBITDA for that time period. 7/13/06 Tr., at 72:23 – 73:3.

Until objections were filed in court, Nellson's financial advisors did no independent investigation into market incentive compensation levels. Mr. Creelman was unaware of the ordinary course incentive plan[7], which had substantially higher EBITDA thresholds for the payment of incentive bonuses when compared to the MIP (the lowest threshold for a MIP incentive payment being 50% of budgeted EBITDA, as opposed to being 93% of budgeted EBITDA under the "ordinary course" plan). 7/10/06 Tr., at 103:4-9. Mr. Creelman was also unaware that 60% of Nellson's business was tied up in long term contracts that did not expire in 2006. Id. at 105:23-106:2.

[6] In addition to the fact that eight of the nine members of senior management participating in the MIP were KERP participants, the projected payments under the MIP to those eight senior managers were nearly identical to the projected payments to those individuals under the KERP. Compare Joint Trial Exhibit 20 (Exh. A) with Joint Trial Exhibit 21 (Exh. A).

III. The bankruptcy court approves the MIP based on its holding that the compensation limitations set by section 503(c)(1) were not triggered.

Both the United States Trustee and the Creditors' Committee objected to the Nellson's motion for authority to implement the MIP on the grounds that the MIP violated section 503(c)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code.[8] Because it was undisputed that Nellson could not meet the test for

[7] At the time the MIP was created, Nellson already had a post-petition incentive compensation plan for Nellson's management. This "ordinary course" incentive plan was separate from, and in addition to, the MIP. See Joint Trial Exhibit 9.

[8] Section 503(c)(1) provides:

> Notwithstanding subsection (b) [allowing the payment of administrative expenses in certain circumstances], there shall neither be allowed, nor paid –
> (1) a transfer made to, or an obligation incurred for the benefit of, an insider of the debtor for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business, absent a finding by the court based upon evidence in the record that –
> (A) the transfer or obligation is essential to retention of the person because the individual has a bona fide job offer from another business at the same or greater rate of compensation;
> (B) the services provided by the person are essential to the survival of the business; and approval of an employee retention plan under Section 503(c)(1), the sole questions before the bankruptcy court was whether that section was triggered, and whether the MIP was an "obligation incurred . . . for the purpose of inducing [a] person to remain with the debtor's business" within the meaning of the statute. The bankruptcy court concluded that the MIP was not such a retention plan, and approved Nellson's motion.

The bankruptcy court reasoned that Section 503(c)(1) does not require Nellson to prove the complete absence of any "retention purpose." Conversely, the court reasoned that Section 503(c)(1) does not require the objecting party to prove that retention was the "sole" purpose:

> I think reading the purpose as meaning the sole purpose would lead to an absurd result. And I think reading the purpose as a purpose would lead to an absurd result . . . Any kind of incentive plan or salary has, as part of it, the idea of keeping the employees receiving that payment in your employment.

7/13/06 Tr., at 271:24 – 272:5. The court stated:

> So, I read Section 503(c) as only being applicable to payments to insiders that are for the primary purpose of inducing the payee to remain with the debtor. Whether a payment is for the primary

> (i) the amount of the transfer made to, or obligation incurred for the benefit of, the person is not greater than an amount equal to 10 times the amount of the mean transfer or obligation of a similar kind given to nonmanagement employees for any purpose during the calendar year in which the transfer is made or the obligation is incurred; or
> (ii) if no such similar transfers were made to, or obligations were incurred for the benefit of, such nonmanagement employees during such calendar year, the amount of the transfer or obligation is not greater than an amount equal to 25 percent of the amount of any similar transfer or obligation made to or incurred for the benefit of such insider for any purpose during the calendar year before the year in which such transfer is made or obligation is incurred[.]

> purpose of inducing retention is a question of fact to be determined on a case-by-case basis, with the debtor bearing the burden of proof.

Id. at 272:21 – 273:1. Applying that standard to the MIP, the bankruptcy court stated:

> In this case, there are two factors of the program as proposed that I find troubling in making the MIP as proposed, primarily for the purpose of retention. And I believe, however, both – the debtor has offered to change both.
> First, I was trouble – I am troubled by proposing a budget — budgeted EBITDA target as low as 50 percent. I think it's important to focus on operational results. That's the – that's what you're trying to incentivize management to achieve.
> But if you set operational results at such a low level, that even if they were to achieve it, it doesn't take particularly extraordinary effort to achieve it, you're really not rewarding people for doing a good job. You're rewarding people for staying around.
> Similarly, I'm troubled by the capital events section of the program. Again, to me, those change of control type provisions really smack of the retention program as opposed to an incentive program.

Id. at 273:6-23. The court determined that two changes should therefore be made: the Capital Events should be removed as a triggering event for payment and the EBITDA threshold should be increased to 75%:

> With those changes, I will approve the MIP. And I find that with those changes, the MIP would not be primarily for the purpose of inducing retention.

Id. at 274:3-5. The bankruptcy court then approved the MIP by order entered on July 18, 2006, based on the amount of compensation being "within the realm of a sound exercise of the debtors' business judgment." Id. at 275:4-7.

On July 27, 2006, the United States Trustee timely filed her notice of appeal from the bankruptcy court's order. Bankr. Ct. Dkt. 512. After the appeal was docketed, Nellson sought to dismiss the United States Trustee's appeal as moot. District Court Dkt. 5. On October 9, 2008, this Court denied Nellson's motion to dismiss, and then denied Nellson's motion for reconsideration of that order on December 4, 2008. District Ct. Dkt. 20, 26.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Section 503(c)(1) restricts the payment of retention bonuses to senior management of chapter 11 debtors. Prior to enactment of the BAPCPA in 2005, such bonuses were subject to review under a "sound business purpose" test. Congressional concern with the use of retention bonuses to enrich senior management at the expense of labor, trade vendors and other constituencies in bankruptcy cases led Congress to curtail the availability and size of such bonuses.

The bankruptcy court erred in concluding that Section 503(c)(1) only restricts those obligations or transfers to insiders that have a "primary" purpose of retention. Statutory interpretation begins (and, in the absence of ambiguity, ends) with an examination of the text's plain meaning. The plain meaning of the statutory phrase "for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business" does not require a judicial inquiry into whether Nellson has one or more purposes in proposing a payment to an employee, or whether there is a leading purpose among several purposes proposed to be served by the transfer. Rather, per the statutory language, if the proposed obligation or transfer clearly serves any retentive purpose, it is subject to Section 503(c)(1).

Even if the language of Section 503(c)(1) is ambiguous, basic canons of statutory construction dictate that this Court reject the bankruptcy court's interpolation of the word "primary" into Section 503(c)(1). First, interpolation of words into a statute is justified only where the language is equivocal or where literal interpretation of the language leads to absurd results. Neither of these circumstances is present here; to the contrary, interpolation of the word "primary" as a modifier of "purpose" in Section 503(c)(1) frustrates the remedial purpose of the statute. Second, Section 503(c)(1) is part of remedial legislation designed to curb a host of abuses that harm the interests of "stakeholders." The systemic harm addressed by Section 503(c)(1) is excessive compensation of management in return for continued employment during the bankruptcy cases. Section 503(c)(1) must be read broadly to effect its remedial purpose. Third, the text of the BAPCPA indicates that, when Congress wanted to use the word "primary" or "primarily" as a modifier, it did so. Accordingly, the omission of the word "primary" from Section 503(c)(1) is intended to be purposeful. In this case, it is undisputed that retention was at least a partial purpose of the MIP. Accordingly, under the correct statutory standard, the MIP violates Section 503(c)(1).

The bankruptcy court also erred in concluding that the MIP was not designed to induce senior managers to remain with the debtor's business. The testimony of Nellson's own witnesses conclusively demonstrates that the purpose of the MIP was, at all times, the same as that of the KERP which it replaced: to reward Nellson's senior managers for remaining employed. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court erred when it found that Nellson had met its burden of demonstrating that retention was not the "primary purpose" of the MIP.

ARGUMENT

I. Section 503(c)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code applies to the MIP because it is undisputed that retention was at least one of the purposes of the MIP, and Section 503(c)(1) is not limited to programs that have retention as their sole or "primary" purpose.

BAPCPA amended the Bankruptcy Code to, inter alia, add 11 U.S.C. § 503(c), which restricts the allowance and payment of administrative expenses to a debtor's officers, managers and consultants. The addition of 11 U.S.C. § 503(c) to the Code was spurred by public concern that excessive compensation (particularly bonus compensation) was being paid to management of chapter 11 debtors-in-possession.

Prior to enactment of the BAPCPA, retention payments were frequently made in chapter 11 cases by means of KERPs. Before 11 U.S.C. § 503(c) was enacted, no specific provisions of the Bankruptcy Code addressed compensation to a debtor's management. Debtors-in-possession typically requested approval of employment compensation under 11 U.S.C. §§ 363(b) and 365, and their requests for approval of management compensation proposals, including KERPs, were evaluated by bankruptcy courts under the "sound business purpose" test, which was essentially a "business judgment" rule. See, e.g., The Dai-Ichi Kangyo Bank, Ltd. v. Montgomery Ward Holding Corp. (In re Montgomery Ward Holding Corp.), 242 B.R. 147, 153 (D. Del. 1999) (citing Committee of Equity Sec. Holders v. Lionel Corp. (In re Lionel Corp.), 722 F.2d 1063, 1071 (2d Cir. 1983); In re EaglePicher Holdings, Inc., No. 05-12601, 2005 WL 4030132 at *6 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio Aug. 26, 2005).

Through the enactment of the BAPCPA, Congress responded to concerns that it was inappropriate for corporate executives to be paid excessive amounts for continued service during the bankruptcy case while labor, pensioners, trade vendors and other stakeholders shouldered the "pain" associated with the bankruptcy process. See In re Nellson Neutraceutical, Inc., 369 B.R. 787, 801 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007) ("Although there is little in the way of legislative history, it is widely acknowledged that [11 U.S.C. § 503(c)] was a response to perceived abuses of the bankruptcy system by 'the executives of giant companies . . . who lined their own pockets, but left thousands of employees and retirees out in the cold.'") (quoting statement of Senator Edward Kennedy, as cited in In re Dana Corp., 358 B.R. 567, 575 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006)). Section 503(c)(1) significantly alters pre-BAPCPA, management compensation practices by curtailing retention payments. This appeal centers on the meaning of Section 503(c)(1), and "[i]t is axiomatic that statutory interpretation begins with the language of the statute itself." Government of Virgin Islands v. Knight, 989 F.2d 619, 633 (3d Cir. 1993). A statutory language analysis must precede any resort to legislative history or case law as "[t]here is, of course, no more persuasive evidence of the purpose of a statute than the words by which the legislature undertook to give expression to its wishes." United States v. American Trucking Ass'ns, Inc., 310 U.S. 534, 543 (1930). The statutory language is the best indicia of Congress' intent as "much less thought is spent on the future implications of committee reports and explanations on the floor than in choosing the words of a statute." Paskel v. Heckler, 768 F.2d 540, 543-44 (3d Cir. 1985).

The plain meaning of the statutory phrase "for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business" unambiguously prohibits payments to insiders where the payment clearly serves a retentive purpose. Section 503(c)(1)'s text does not require that bankruptcy courts hierarchically order the bankrupt corporation's reasons for making proposed payments to insiders to discern the main or "primary" purpose. Rather, the statutory language directs the bankruptcy court to determine whether the proposed payment is being made to keep the employee in place. If the proposed payment has a retentive purpose, it may not be allowed or paid unless Nellson can demonstrate that it meets the conditions in Section 503(c)(1), something that Nellson did not attempt to do. See In re Dana Corp., 351 B.R. 96, 102 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006) (rejecting debtors' request to pay bonuses to insiders upon debtors' emergence from chapter 11 and, in doing so, employing "a familiar fowl analogy" – "if it walks like a duck (KERP) and quacks like a duck (KERP), it's a duck (KERP).").

"Words may be interpolated in a statute . . . 'only when the statutory language is equivocal or where literal interpretation leads to an absurdity' so gross as to shock general moral or common sense." See Hatfried, Inc. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 162 F.2d 628, 631 (3d Cir. 1947) (internal citation omitted). Neither of these conditions is satisfied here. There is nothing equivocal about the express language of Section 503(c)(1). To the contrary, interpolation of the word "primary" as a modifier of the word "purpose" in Section 503(c)(1) leads to equivocation: bankruptcy courts will be forced to divine from the record whether retention was the primary, secondary, or tertiary purpose of the proposed payments in determining whether Section 503(c)(1) applies.

Further, the BAPCPA was enacted, in part, to remedy the abusive effects of retention pay upon the bankruptcy system. A remedial statute should be broadly construed to effectuate the remedial purpose. See Idahoan Fresh v. Advantage Produce, Inc., 157 F.3d 197, 202 (3d Cir. 1998); In re Waters, 384 B.R. 432, 441 (Bankr. N.D. W. Va. 2008) ("In construing the new provisions [of a new statute], courts should endeavor to give the statute a construction that defeats 'evasions employed to continue the mischief sought to be remedied by the statute.'") (internal citation omitted). Interpolation of the word "primary" as a modifier of "purpose" in Section 503(c)(1) limits the Section's applicability and, by extension, hampers the effort to protect innocent creditors and equity security holders from management's enrichment and/or entrenchment efforts via "pay to stay" strategies.

Finally, the text of the BAPCPA demonstrates that, when Congress wanted to use the words "primary" or "primarily" as modifiers, it expressly did so. For example, "health care business" is defined as a public or private entity . . . that is primarily engaged in offering to the general public [certain] facilities and services . . . ." BAPCPA § 1101(a)(2) (bracketed text and emphasis added). The term "small business debtor" in the BAPCPA excludes "a person whose primary activity is the business of owning or operating real property or activities incident thereto." Id. § 432(a) (emphasis added). Similarly, in amending certain disclosure obligations respecting open end credit plans, Congress provided in the BAPCPA that the disclosure obligations did not apply to "any charge card account, the primary purpose of which is to require payment of charges in full each month." Id. § 1301(a) (emphasis added). Accordingly, in light of the appearance of the word "primary" in other sections of the BAPCPA, the absence of the word "primary" from Section 503(c)(1) should not be construed as an accident. See Russello v. United States, 464 U.S. 16, 23 (1983) ("[W]here Congress includes particular language in one section of a statute but omits it in another section of the same Act, it is generally presumed that Congress acts purposefully in the disparate inclusion or exclusion.").

II. Even if the bankruptcy court correctly applied a "primary purpose" test, its conclusion that retention was not the primary purpose of the MIP is not supported by the evidence and was erroneous.

The bankruptcy court erred in applying Section 503(c)(1) to the basic facts as evidenced in the record. The bankruptcy court's conclusion that the MIP did not have the "primary purpose" of inducing Nellson's insiders to remain with the business is an "ultimate fact," (e.g., "the driver was negligent") as opposed to a "historical" or "inferred" fact (e.g., "the sky was blue on Sunday, January 28"). See Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1222-23. In this Circuit, this Court conducts a plenary review of ultimate facts. See id. The evidentiary record below does not contain a sufficient factual basis for the bankruptcy court to conclude that the MIP's purpose (primary or otherwise) was not retention.

The Third Circuit distinguishes among three types of facts - basic facts, inferred factual conclusions, and ultimate facts.[9] Here, the bankruptcy court concluded, after considering the basic or historical facts, that the "primary purpose" of the MIP was not retention. The evidentiary record considered by the bankruptcy court, however, does not support the bankruptcy court's conclusion regarding the "primary purpose." With few exceptions, the MIP was identical to a management retention plan devised by Nellson on the eve of bankruptcy – essentially, Nellson took that retention plan and re-labeled it. The basic facts were conceded by Nellson's own CEO: He testified that the MIP was designed to replace the KERP and that half of the purpose of the MIP was "to keep people focused or to not lose people."

[9] Basic facts are the historical and narrative events elicited from evidence, and inferred factual conclusions are drawn from basic facts. See Universal Minerals, Inc. v. C.A. Hughes & Co., 669 F.2d 98, 102 (3d Cir. 1981). Findings of these two types of facts are subject to the clearly erroneous standard. See id. Ultimate facts are expressed in the language of a standard of law. See id. (quoting Smith v. Harris, 644 F.2d 985, 990 n. 1 (3d Cir. 1981)). An ultimate fact is the final resulting effect which is reached by processes of logical reasoning from evidentiary facts. See Hickey v. The Ritz-Carlton Restaurant & Hotel Co. of Atlantic City, 96 F.2d 748, 750 (3d Cir. 1938). When reviewing an ultimate fact, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals applies a mixed standard of review, accepting the trial courts' finding of historical or narrative facts unless they are clearly erroneous, but exercising a plenary review of the trails court's choice and interpretation of legal precepts and its application of those precepts to the historical facts. See Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1223.

In light of the testimony regarding Nellson's motivation for enacting the MIP, the bankruptcy court erred when it concluded, as an ultimate fact, that employee retention was not the "primary purpose" of the MIP. Rather, the only logical conclusion that may be drawn from the evidence below is that the predominant (if not the exclusive) purpose of the MIP was to encourage senior management to remain employed by Nellson, just like the KERP that it supplanted. Accordingly, even if the "primary purpose" test employed by the bankruptcy court was the correct standard under section 503(c)(1), the bankruptcy court erred by concluding that Nellson satisfied that test.

ARGUMENT

Section 503(c) of the Bankruptcy Code imposes significant limitations on "insider" payment obligations that a debtor incurs "for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business." 11 U.S.C. § 503(c)(1). In an effort to escape the plain meaning of this section, the Debtors urge this Court to rewrite the statute by substituting the term "primary purpose" for "purpose." Nothing in the language or purpose of Section 503(c)(1) supports such an interpolation. Furthermore, although the Debtors argue that their management incentive plan ("MIP") is a true incentive plan and not a prohibited retention plan ("KERP"), this is a distinction without a difference, since the Debtors' own testimony and the undisputed factual findings below conclusively demonstrate that one purpose of the MIP was retention. As a result, regardless of whether it also served to incentivize the Debtors' management, the MIP is subject to Section 503(c)(1), and the bankruptcy court erred by holding that such section was inapplicable.

I. CONSISTENT WITH ITS REMEDIAL PURPOSE, SECTION 503(c)(1) MUST BE APPLIED AS DRAFTED: TO LIMIT THE PAYMENT OF BONUSES TO SENIOR CORPORATE EXECUTIVES FOR A RETENTIVE PURPOSE.

Bankruptcy Code Section 503(c)(1) conditions and restricts the bankruptcy court's ability to allow bonuses to corporate insiders.[1] Section 503(c)(1) was the product of Congress' reasoned determination that the practice of bankrupt corporations awarding bonuses to senior executives must be sharply constrained. Accordingly, the statute prohibits payments to this limited group when such payments are "for the purpose of inducing such person to remain with the debtor's business" absent evidence that (i) the payment is essential to retention because the insider has a bona fide job offer paying as much or more than his current position, (ii) the services provided by the insider are essential to the survival of the business, and (iii) the payments are capped at a prescribed figure (ten times the mean bonus amount paid to non-management employees during the relevant calendar year, or twenty-five percent of the amount paid to the insider during the prior calendar year if no bonuses were paid to non-management employees during the relevant calendar year). See 11 U.S.C. § 503(c)(1). Thus, while the statute does not prohibit bonuses used to encourage senior executives to remain with a bankrupt debtor, the statute substantially curtails allowance of such bonuses.

[1] Insiders of a corporate debtor include directors, officers and other persons in control of the debtor. 11 U.S.C. § 101(31)(B). The Debtors do not dispute that the executives benefitted by the MIP are insiders.

The Debtors argue that courts must interpolate the word "primary" into Section 503(c)(1) so as to avoid absurd results. However, the Debtors cannot point to any reason why a failure to adopt their proposed interpolation would lead to absurdity under the facts of this case. Instead, the Debtors speculate that enforcement of the plain terms of the statute may lead to absurdity in other cases, and suggest that unless their revision of Section 503(c)(1) is adopted, courts will disapprove normal salary, health insurance benefits, and pension contributions for senior executives. Appellees' Br., at 8.

In addition to being irrelevant to the facts of this appeal, which deals with a challenge to a bonus program and not to employee salaries and benefits paid in the ordinary course, the Debtors' attempt to draw an analogy between the MIP and the payment of ordinary wages and benefits overlooks a fundamental difference between those types of obligations. Under normal circumstances, an employee who terminates his employment does not forfeit his right to accrued but unpaid salary or benefits. As a result, a debtor's payment of its normal payroll obligations is not for the "purpose" of retention because employees are generally entitled to be paid for their past work without regard to whether they have promised to continue working in the future. By contrast, bonuses under KERP and similar programs, including the MIP in this case, are payable by definition only to persons who are still employees at some specified date in the future. As a result, even if is assumed that the payment of salary obligations has some retentive effect, such payment lacks the retentive hallmarks of a KERP.

Alternatively, the Debtors suggest that this Court should create an exception to Section 503(c)(1) for payments that are "for the purpose of incentivizing such person to create value for the debtor and the estate." Appellees' Br., at 1. Again, nothing in the text of the statute supports the result the Debtors seek. Section 503(c)(1) fails to use such labels as "retention bonuses" and "incentive compensation" (or any other labels).

The court's responsibility under section 503(c)(1) is not to select one of a series of "labels" as the primary purpose of a payment. Rather, the Court must simply determine whether the proposed payments were for the purpose of inducing the senior executives to remain with the Debtors. The statute does not call for conjectures as to which of several purposes is "primary." If the evidentiary record demonstrates that the compensation being sought for insiders is for the purpose of inducing retention, then the inquiry as to whether Section 503(c)(1) applies should stop at that point, and the limitations established by Congress should be applied. The statute applies to a narrow group of employees, and its broad remedial purpose needs to be given effect.

As detailed in the United States Trustee's opening brief, standard canons of statutory construction dictate this result. Appellant's Br., at 15-16. The Debtors' construction of Section 503(c)(1) does not square with the statutory text or its remedial purpose. When Congress considered it important that a matter be "primary," Congress knew how to craft such language. Indeed, the inclusion of particular language in one section of an enactment, combined with the absence of that language in another section of the same act, is evidence that the legislature intended a disparate result. Russello v. United States, 464 U.S. 16, 23 (1983). Here, Congress used the term "primary" or "primarily" in at least three other parts of the relevant act. See Appellant's Br., at 16.

Accordingly, this Court should reject Debtors' suggestion that the adjective "primary" must be interpolated into the statute.

II. EVEN IF A "PRIMARY PURPOSE" STANDARD APPLIES, THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S DECISION WAS ERRONEOUS BECAUSE THE UNCONTRADICTED TESTIMONY BELOW DEMONSTRATES THAT RETENTION WAS THE PRIMARY PURPOSE OF THE MIP.

Even if section 503(c)(1) does contain a "primary purpose" requirement, the extensive evidentiary record demonstrates that such a standard was satisfied in this case. As discussed in the United States Trustee's opening brief, the Debtors' own CEO admitted at trial that the MIP was designed to replace the pre-petition KERP, which the Debtors abandoned due to concerns that it did not comply with Section 503(c)(1). 7/13/06 Tr., at 197:11-16, 7/10/06 Tr., at 13:24-14:7. In addition, the admitted purpose of the MIP, like the KERP it replaced, was to dissuade employees from leaving. Id. at 17:17–21; 22:21-23. The Debtors' own brief, while arguing that the MIP had additional purposes, does not rebut this testimony. Appellees' Br., at 18 (stating that purpose of MIP was "not merely to retain employees").

In arguing that the MIP should not be subject to Section 503(c)(1), the Debtors also place considerable emphasis on the fact that the MIP targets for a subsequent period were not met, and also argue that the compensation paid to their executives under the MIP was objectively reasonable. Appellant's Br., at 15-17. Neither of these facts has any bearing on the Section 503(c)(1) analysis. There is a fundamental difference between the MIP payments for the first incentive period, which are the subject of this appeal, and the MIP payments for the second period, which were never paid. In particular, when the Debtors sought approval of the MIP, the quarter to which it pertained was already in progress, and the Debtors were aware that their actual financial performance was already above the initial threshold for payments under the MIP. 7/13/06 Tr., at 72:23 – 73:3. As a result, the fact that the Debtors subsequently missed their targets for a future reporting period does not alter the essentially guaranteed nature of the MIP payments from the first period which are at issue in this appeal.

Moreover, the applicability of Section 503(c)(1) does not hinge on whether the payments proposed are commercially reasonable, or whether the executives of the debtor are deserving of such bonuses. Unlike prior law, which authorized the payment of retention bonuses according to the debtor's business judgment, section 503(c)(1) operates as a categorical prohibition on retention payments unless the stringent requirements of the section were met – which they were not in this case. As a result, even if this Court were to accept as true the Debtors' self-serving claim that their insiders were being paid "less than reasonable market compensation" absent the MIP, Appellees' Br. at 11, that fact cannot override the plain terms of Section 503(c)(1).

CONCLUSION

The lower court erred by interpolating the word "primary" before "purpose" in section 503(c)(1). Such a judicial interpolation has no sound basis in the statute. Moreover, such an interpolation was unnecessary under the facts of this case, given the MIP's clear, stated purpose of inducing senior corporate executives to remain with the Debtors during the bankruptcy case. The United States Trustee therefore respectfully requests that this Court reverse the lower court's order.

CASES

STATUTES AND RULES

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Montana had jurisdiction over the Chapter 11 reorganization case of appellant Northern Routes Transportation, Inc. under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a). That court denied appellant's motion seeking authority to pay pre-petition debts by Order dated April 5, 2005. Appellant filed a timely notice of appeal on April 14, 2005. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED ON APPEAL

1. Whether the Bankruptcy Court erred in refusing to grant the appellant Northern Routes Transportation, Inc. permission to pay in full selected pre-petition debts, where binding Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals precedent holds that such payments are contrary to the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code.

2. Whether, if the District Court were to decide that binding precedent does not prohibit payment of certain "critical" or "necessary" pre-petition claims, the development of criteria to establish what claims meet those descriptions should be left to the Bankruptcy Court.

STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

On appeal, a bankruptcy court's conclusions of law are reviewed de novo and its factual findings are reviewed for clear error. In re Summers, 332 F.3d 1240, 1242 (9th Cir.2003). Because the issues presented in this appeal are legal, the standard of review is de novo.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND STATEMENT OF FACTS

Appellant Northern Routes Transportation, Inc. ("Northern Routes") filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of the United States Bankruptcy Code on February 22, 2005. Contemporaneous with that filing, Northern Routes filed motions seeking authority to pay in full certain of its pre-petition debts. On March 3, 2005, the United States Trustee and Northern Routes stipulated that they would submit to the Bankruptcy Court the issues of (1) whether that court had the legal authority to authorize the payment of pre-petition debts; and (2) if it did have that authority, the general criteria under which such payments would be appropriate.

After the parties briefed the issues, the Bankruptcy Court denied the motions by Order dated April 5, 2005. The court ruled that under the Ninth Circuit decision of In re B & W Enterprises, Inc., 713 F.2d 534 (9th Cir.1983), no legal authority existed for a bankruptcy court to approve payment in full of selected pre-petition claims. Because of this conclusion the Bankruptcy Court did not reach the issue of the circumstances under which such payments might be appropriate.

Northern Routes filed a timely notice of appeal on April 14, 2005.

ARGUMENT

A. The Bankruptcy Court appropriately followed Ninth Circuit precedent in concluding that payment in full of certain creditors immediately following a Chapter 11 filing violates the priority scheme established under the Bankruptcy Code.

In its Order of April 5, 2005, the Bankruptcy Court for the District of Montana denied Northern Routes' motions seeking authority to pay in full the claims of certain select prepetition unsecured creditors. In reaching this decision, the Bankruptcy Court reaffirmed "that the bright line rule articulated by this Court in In re Timberhouse Post and Beam, Ltd., 196 B.R. 547, 15 Mont. B.R. 317 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1996), is the prevailing law in the District of Montana." This conclusion was based upon "the bright line rule set forth in B & W Enterprises, [713 F.2d 534 (9th Cir. 1983); and citing other cases], that a pre-petition unsecured claim cannot be elevated to an administrative expense since the scheme of the 1978 Bankruptcy Code does not allow this Court to change the classification of claims set by Congress in the Code." Order of April 5, 2005, at 2.

This Court's consideration of the issues presented by this appeal can start and end with the Ninth Circuit's decision in In re B & W Enterprises, Inc., 713 F.2d 534 (9th Cir. 1983). In

B & W, the Ninth Circuit clearly held that bankruptcy courts do not have the authority, equitable or otherwise, to elevate unsecured creditors' claims in priority over the claims of other unsecured creditors. 713 F.2d at 538. The appellants in B & W were unsecured creditors whose pre-petition claims were paid in exchange for their agreement to continue to provide services or goods to the Chapter 11 debtors. The debtors and the creditors agreed that this continuation of goods and services was "necessary and essential to the operation of the debtor's business following the petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 11." 713 F.2d at 534. After the cases were converted to Chapter 7, the Chapter 7 trustee sought to recover those payments. The appellants sought to retain the payments based on equitable rules known as the "Six Months Rule" and the "Necessity of Payment Rule."

The Court of Appeals discussed the Six Months Rule and the Necessity of Payment Rule separately. "The Six Months Rule," the court noted, "stems from the historical practice of initiating railroad receiverships with an order appointing a receiver who was granted court authorization to pay certain pre-petition debts for labor, equipment, supplies or improvements from post-petition operating receipts." 713 F.2d at 536. This equitable rule was given statutory recognition by Congress in the Bankruptcy Act, and was later retained under the Bankruptcy Code in 1978. See 11 U.S.C. § 1171(b). As noted in B & W, however, in structuring the Code "Congress placed the provision involved here, § 1171(b), which incorporates the equity receivership rules, in subchapter IV of title 11. This subchapter deals exclusively with railroad reorganizations." Id. The court concluded:

> The intent of Congress could hardly be more clear. It has deliberately limited the applicability of the Six Months Rule to the area of railroad reorganizations, the focus of concern to which it traditionally has been limited. Accordingly, we find under the Bankruptcy Code, the Six Months Rule is applicable only in cases concerning railroads.

713 F.2d at 537.

The Ninth Circuit noted that the historical development of the Necessity of Payment Rule paralleled that of the Six Months Rule, and affirmed that this rule "was created for and has been applied only to railroad cases." Id. The Necessity of Payment Rule was historically invoked as justification for the payment of pre-petition debts paid under duress to assure continued supplies or services essential to the continued operation of a railroad. Recognizing that, unlike the Six Months Rule, Congress specifically did not choose to codify the Necessity of Payment Rule, the Ninth Circuit wrote:

> However, unlike the Six Months Rule, it is not clear that the Necessity of Payment Rule has been retained in the Bankruptcy Act of 1978, 11 U.S.C. § 101 et seq. We need not reach the question whether the Necessity of Payment Rule has survived the 1978 Act, however, for, if it has, we would decline to apply it beyond the context of railroad reorganizations.

Id. (emphasis added).

Finally, the Ninth Circuit considered whether any of the Bankruptcy Court's general equitable powers granted by the Bankruptcy Code would allow such court to "overrule the priority scheme" contained in the Code and therefore apply rules similar to the Six Months Rule and the Necessity of Payment Rule "when appropriate." Noting that what the debtor sought was the "elevation" of some pre-petition unsecured creditors over others pre-petition creditors of the same class, the Court concluded: "This is not a power given the courts by the 1978 Act." Id. While 11 U.S.C. § 510(c) specifically allows Bankruptcy Courts to subordinate certain claims to others of the same class under certain circumstances, nothing in the Code allows a Court to "elevate" one or more pre-petition claims over all others of the same class:

> Section 507 establishes the priorities of creditors intended by Congress; and section 1123 requires that a chapter 11 plan must "provide the same treatment for each claim or interest of a particular class." 11 U.S.C. § 1123. _*There is no indication that Congress intended the courts to fashion their own rules of super-priorities within any given priority class.*

Id. (emphasis added).

Northern Routes attempts to distinguish B & W. It points out that in B & W, the debtors paid pre-petition creditors without bankruptcy court approval and while the cases were pending in Chapter 11. After the cases were converted to Chapter 7, the Chapter 7 trustee sought to recover the amounts paid from the creditors. While the debtors in B & W clearly should have sought court permission before paying the creditors, nothing whatsoever in the B & W analysis indicates that the Court would have reached a different result if such permission had been sought. The Court could presumably have held that the payments were avoidable as unauthorized post-petition transfers under § 549(a) of the Bankruptcy Code without considering the Six Months Rule or the Necessity of Payment Rule; it nevertheless fully considered those rules and refused to apply them or any other equitable doctrine to approve payments that ran afoul of the priority scheme established by the Bankruptcy Code.

Furthermore, the B & W analysis is not dependent in any way upon that case having been converted. To the contrary, the Ninth Circuit clearly viewed its decision as being consistent with 11 U.S.C. § 507, which establishes payment priorities for all chapters of the Bankruptcy Code, and 11 U.S.C. § 1123, which requires that a Chapter 11 plan provide the same treatment for each member of every class of claims or interest. Id.

Northern Routes finally claims that its case differs from B & W because the payments it wished to make "are necessary for the continued viability of the business enterprise." As was noted above, this precise assertion was made in B & W, 713 F.2d at 534, and the Ninth Circuit did not find this to be a sufficient justification to depart from the statutory priority scheme.

In conclusion, it is sufficient to dispose of this appeal to recognize that the Ninth Circuit has spoken very clearly in this area. This case is not legally distinguishable from B & W. While other courts in other Circuits may have chosen to deviate from our precedent, Judge Kirscher has reiterated his Court's decision in In re Timberhouse Post and Beam, Ltd., 196 B.R. 547 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1996), to adopt "the bright line rule set forth in B & W Enterprises" and other cases "that a prepetition unsecured claim cannot be elevated to an administrative expense since the scheme of the 1978 Bankruptcy Code does not allow this Court to change the classification of claims set by Congress in the Code." See the Bankruptcy Court's Order, dated April 5, 2005, at pp. 2-3. For the same reasons now being argued before this Court, Northern Routes strongly urged the Bankruptcy Court to abandon its bright line rule. In the end, however, Judge Kirscher held:

> After reviewing the applicable law, the Court declines to abandon its prior ruling in Timberhouse. Section 507 of Title 11 specifically sets forth the manner in which prepetition claims are to be paid, including the claims of Debtor's drivers and employees, which appear to have third tier priority under § 507(a)(3). The Court's ruling furthers one of the long-standing principals of the Bankruptcy Code – equality of treatment of unsecured creditors."

Order of April 5, 2005, at 3 (emphasis added).

This Court should affirm the Bankruptcy Court's Order denying of the motions to pay pre-petition creditors

B. If this Court were to determine that certain payments of pre-petition claims are permissible notwithstanding Circuit Court precedent, the case should be remanded to the Bankruptcy Court for the development of criteria to be used in determining what claims might appropriately be paid.

Because the Bankruptcy Court concluded that its "bright line test" prohibiting payments of pre-petition claims of "critical" or "necessary" vendors was still required under B & W, that court did not reach the issue of what criteria would be applied in determining what claims could be paid under another test. In its brief, Northern Routes asks this Court to adopt criteria to be applied. While this Court could presumably develop such criteria, the United States Trustee believes that, as a matter of judicial prudence, the initial development of such standards should be left to the Bankruptcy Court. That court routinely deals with issues related to the needs of insolvent businesses, and is best situated to develop an appropriate test or tests. Therefore, if this Court determines that it is not bound by B & W and adopts an alternative test, the United States Trustee requests that the case be remanded to the Bankruptcy Court for the development of appropriate criteria to be used in applying the test adopted by this Court.

CONCLUSION

Based upon the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that this Court affirm the April 5, 2005, decision of the Bankruptcy Court, denying Northern Routes' motions to pay certain pre-petition creditors.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York had jurisdiction over the Northwest Airlines Corporation chapter 11 bankruptcy cases under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a) and (b) and 1334(a). On February 29, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an order ("Order") approving a final fee award of $5,455,645 to Lazard Frères & Co. ("Lazard"), financial advisors to the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors ("Committee"). [P-15; ECF 8103 and P-16, ECF 8105].[1] The Order denied Lazard's request to for a 60% "success" or "completion" fee of $3,250,000, because Lazard had failed not only to secure pre-approval of the fee but also to meet its burden of demonstrating that enhancement was warranted under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Id. Lazard and the Committee appealed the Order by notice of appeal filed under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002 on March 10, 2008. [P-17; ECF Doc. No. 8123]. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's ultimate award of fees is reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re Babcock & Wilcox Company, 526 F.3d 824 (5th Cir. 2008). Under this standard, an appellate court "accept[s] [the Bankruptcy Court's] factual findings unless clearly erroneous but review[s] its conclusions of law de novo." Bank Brussels Lambert v. Coan (In re AroChem Corp.), 176 F.3d 610, 620 (2d Cir. 1999) (citing In re McLean Industries, 30 F.3d 385, 387 (2d Cir. 1994)).

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

Where compensation is not pre-approved under 11 U.S.C. § 328(a), a bankruptcy court may award estate professionals "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services" under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). In determining "reasonable" compensation, a bankruptcy court may consider a non-exclusive list of five "relevant factors" pertaining to the "nature, the extent and the value" of the services rendered, including "the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners" in non-bankruptcy cases. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E).[2] A professional bears the burden of proving that its fees are both necessary and "reasonable." If it fails to do so, the bankruptcy court may "award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). Bankruptcy courts may enhance fees calculated under the lodestar method, which incorporates many of the factors prescribed under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3), only if a professional adduces evidence of "truly exceptional results." Lazard failed to meet its burden of proving that its work merited a 60% bonus. Given Lazard's failure to meet its burden of proof, did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion in declining to enhance its fees?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statutory Framework

The Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 101 et seq., regulates the retention, compensation and payment of bankruptcy professionals, such as attorneys, accountants and financial advisors, in chapter 11 and 7 cases. It grants significant discretion to bankruptcy courts in calculating reasonable professional fees in order to protect estate assets and to promote the integrity of the bankruptcy system. The United States Trustee has standing to object to bankruptcy professional fee applications in chapter 11 and 7 cases. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A); 11 U.S.C. §§ 307 and 330(a)(2).

Section 1102(a) authorizes the United States Trustee to appoint one or more unsecured creditors' committees. A creditors' committee may hire bankruptcy professionals to assist it in fulfilling its responsibilities "with the court's approval . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 1103. These professionals, as well as those employed by the debtor, are entitled to first priority payment under 11 U.S.C. §§ 503(a) and 507(a)(1) ahead of general unsecured creditors.

[2] The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub.L. 109-8, 119 Stat 23 (2005) ("BAPCPA"), became effective on October 17, 2005. This appeal involves 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) in its pre-amendment form.

The Bankruptcy Code provides two mechanisms for compensating committee professionals. Section 328(a), which is inapplicable here, authorizes a committee to employ professionals "on any reasonable terms and conditions of employment, including on a retainer, on an hourly basis, or on a contingent fee basis . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 328(a). Section 328(a) permits a bankruptcy court subsequently to award different compensation only if the pre-approved "terms and conditions of employment prove to have been improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated at the time of the fixing of such terms and conditions . . . ."

Section 330(a) authorizes a bankruptcy court to pay committee professionals "reasonable" compensation for their "actual and necessary services." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). The court may authorize reimbursement of the professionals' "actual" expenses if they are "necessary." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(B). Section 330's requirements regarding reasonable compensation and reimbursement of necessary expenses are particularly important in the context of a creditors' committee, because its professionals' fees are paid by the bankruptcy estate, not the committee members. 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(3).

Bankruptcy professionals bear the burden of demonstrating their entitlement to fees and expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). If a professional fails to meet his burden of proof under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), the bankruptcy court, with or without an objection from a party in interest, may award compensation "less than the amount of compensation that is requested . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). Moreover, section 330(a)(4) prohibits the bankruptcy court from awarding compensation for "unnecessary duplication of services . . . or . . . services that were not . . . reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate . . . or . . . necessary to the administration of the estate . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4). Section 331 authorizes bankruptcy professionals to seek interim compensation on the same basis as under section 330(a).

United States Trustees are officials of the Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589 (specifying the powers and duties of United States Trustees).[3] Congress has expressly authorized United States Trustees to comment upon and object to fee applications filed by bankruptcy professionals. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A); 11 U.S.C. §§ 307 and 330(a)(2). The United States Trustees have issued guidelines regarding bankruptcy professional fee applications in chapter 11 and 7 cases. 28 C.F.R. Pt. 58, App. A (1996).

B. Procedural and Factual History

1. The Chapter 11 Cases

On September 14, 2005, Northwest Airlines Corporation and twelve of its direct and indirect subsidiaries ("Northwest" or "Debtors") filed petitions under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 1101, et seq. The Bankruptcy Court entered an order directing the joint administration of the cases on September 14, 2005. [ECF Doc. No. 5.] At the time of the filing, Northwest operated the world's fourth largest airline (as measured by revenue passenger miles). [AJDRA ¶ 1, p. 3, ¶ 7; ECF Doc. No. 35][4]

2. Lazard's Retention Application and Orders

On September 30, 2005, the United States Trustee appointed the Committee pursuant to Section 1102(a) of the Bankruptcy Code.[5] [ECF Doc. No. 444]. After negotiating with Lazard for several weeks over the terms of its employment, the Committee filed an application ("Application") to retain Lazard as one of its two financial advisors on November 8, 2005. [ECF Doc. No. 948]. Order at 5. Under the Application, which memorialized the parties' agreement, the Committee proposed to retain Lazard on specified, pre-approved terms under 11 U.S.C. § 328(a). Id. Specifically, Lazard agreed to accept a flat "Monthly Advisory Fee" of $275,000 plus expenses, and the Committee and Lazard agreed to defer consideration of Larzard's "entitlement, if any, to an additional 'success' or 'completion' fee to the latter part of the Debtors' Chapter 11 case . . . ." Id. The Application, at ¶ 18(c), provided:

> (c) Other Fees. It is agreed that all matters relating to Lazard Frères' entitlement, if any, to an additional "success" or "completion" fee shall be deferred until the latter part of the Company's chapter 11 case, and that Lazard Frères shall be required to comply with the applicable notice procedures required by the Court and the Office of the U.S. Trustee.

Id. (emphasis added).

On November 29, 2005, the bankruptcy court entered an interim order authorizing the Committee to retain Lazard as a financial advisor, retroactive through October 6, 2005 (the "Interim Retention Order"). [AJDRA ¶10; ECF Doc. 1272]. The Interim Retention Order affirmed Lazard's agreement with the Committee insofar as it did not pre-approve a completion or success fee. It authorized Lazard to be compensated only to the extent of its Monthly Advisory Fee and expenses, subject to challenge under 11 U.S.C. § 328(a). Id. at 2-3. The Interim Retention Order preserved the United States Trustee's right to object to any interim or final fee applications filed by Lazard on any grounds, including, without limitation, the reasonableness standard of 11 U.S.C. § 330, the bankruptcy rules, or any local rules or orders of the court. The Interim Retention Order also required Lazard to maintain contemporaneous time records for services rendered in half-hour increments. Id.[6]

[5] The United States Trustee reprints the principal, pre-BAPCPA statutes it relies upon, 11 U.S.C. §§ 328, 330(a), 503, 507 and 1102 and 1103, in an addendum attached to this brief.

On July 20, 2006, the bankruptcy court entered a final order (the "Final Retention Order") employing Lazard as a financial advisor to the Committee. [P-1; ECF Doc. No. 3112]. The Final Retention Order incorporated the provisions of the Interim Retention Order. Id.

Neither the Application nor the Interim Retention Order nor the Final Retention Order defined goals for Lazard, such as a recapitalization, a percentage repayment for creditors or other "success," which, if met, would entitle it to a bonus. Id. Accordingly, nothing negotiated by the parties and approved by the bankruptcy court bound the court under 11 U.S.C. § 328(a) in determining whether Lazard was entitled to any future fee enhancement. Id.

On July 30, 2007, Lazard filed a final application for allowance of compensation and for reimbursement of expenses in the Debtors' cases for the period from October 6, 2005 through May 31,

[6] The Interim Retention Order provided:

> ORDERED that to the extent accrued during this interim retention, Lazard Frères shall receive (a) its Monthly Advisory Fees as set forth in the Engagement Letter, and (b) reimbursement of Lazard Frères' expenses, which in each case shall not hereafter be subject to challenge except under the standard of review set forth in section 328(a) of the Bankruptcy Code; and it is further
> ORDERED that, notwithstanding anything to the contrary set forth above, the Office of the United States Trustee retains the right to object to any interim or final fee application filed by Lazard Frères (including any request for the reimbursement of expenses) on any grounds provided for under the Bankruptcy Code (including, without limitation, the reasonableness standard provided for in section 330 thereof), the Bankruptcy Rules, or any Local Rules or Orders of this Court;
> ORDERED that, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Bankruptcy Code, the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedures, the Local Rules of this Court, any orders of this Court or any guidelines regarding submission and approval of fee applications, Lazard Frères and its professionals shall only be required to maintain contemporaneous time records for services rendered in half-hour increments . . . .

2007 (the "Final Fee Application"). The Final Fee Application sought bankruptcy court approval of Lazard's total Monthly Advisory Fees for the twenty month period from October 6, 2005 through May 31, 2007 of $5,455,645.00, reimbursement of expenses for the same period in the amount of $167,915.12 and a completion fee (the "Completion Fee Request") in the amount of $3,250,000.00 for a total compensation request of $8,873,560.12. [P-2 at 1; ECF Doc. No. 7431]. During the course of the Debtors' case, Lazard received interim payments of fees and reimbursement of expenses totaling $4,298,208.95, leaving the net amount of compensation requested in the Final Fee Application of $4,575,351.17 (which amount included Lazard's Completion Fee Request of $3,250,000).[7]

The United States Trustee filed an objection to both FTI's and Lazard's completion fees on September 4, 2007 on the same grounds. In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 637; citing ECF Doc. No. 7558. The United States Trustee argued that fee enhancements were not warranted in these bankruptcy cases. The United States Trustee noted that bankruptcy courts only award fee enhancements in rare circumstances in which the professionals prove that their results were exceptional and their standard hourly rates did not fairly compensate them for the services rendered. Id. The United States Trustee argued that Lazard, like FTI, failed to justify its entitlement to a completion fee and failed to provide any evidence that its blended hourly rate of $876 per hour did not fairly compensate Lazard for the services it rendered. Id.

The Association of Flight Attendants – CWA, AFL-CIO (the "AFA") filed an objection to Lazard's Completion Fee on September 4, 2007. In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 637-38, citing ECF Doc. No. 7566. The AFA argued that Lazard had not provided any evidence establishing its entitlement to a fee enhancement. Furthermore, the AFA argued that most of the cost savings in the bankruptcy cases came from labor concessions in which Lazard had little, or no involvement. Id. at 638.

[7] According to its Final Fee Application, during the period from October 6, 2007 through May 31, 2007, Lazard rendered 6,227.2 hours of services in connection with the Debtors' cases. [P-2, Ex. B; ECF 7431]

Carval Investors LLC ("CarVal") filed an objection to FTI's and Lazard's requests for completion fees on September 4, 2007. In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 638, citing ECF Doc. No. 7567. CarVal argued that Lazard's retention pursuant to section 328(a) required the bankruptcy court to find that the monthly compensation agreement was improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated at the time Lazard's retention was approved before any success or completion fee could be granted. Id. CarVal argued that because no parameters for computing the success or completion fee were included in its retention application, Lazard failed to meet its burden of proof under section 328(a) and its request should therefore be denied. Id.

On November 2, 2007, with respect to the unopposed portion of Lazard's compensation – the pre-approved fixed monthly compensation of $275,000 per month – the bankruptcy court entered an order awarding Lazard total Monthly Advisory Fees of $5,455,645.00 and reimbursement of expenses of $167,915.12 for the period October 6, 2005 through May 31, 2007 on a final basis for a total of $5,623,560.12. [P-9 at 2; ECF Doc. No. 7749].[8]

3. The Hearing on Lazard's Request for a Completion Fee

On November 19, 2007, the Bankruptcy Court conducted a hearing to consider the requests for awards of completion fees from both Lazard and FTI. [P-10; ECF Doc. No. 7857].[9]
At the hearing, Lazard introduced as its sole witness, David S. Kurtz, the co-head of Lazard's restructuring group. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 13:2-20; ECF Doc. No. 7857]. Mr. Kurtz testified that, in general, Lazard is compensated on an "individual assignment basis." [P-10, (Kurtz) at 14:12-14; ECF Doc. No. 7857].

[8] Based upon Lazard's total Monthly Advisory Fee award of $5,455,645.00 and the reported 6,227.2 hours of services rendered during the period October 6, 2005 through May 31, 2007, Lazard's average hourly rate for the services it rendered was $876.00 per hour. In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 637. If Lazard's Completion Fee were added to its total Monthly Advisory Fee, its average hourly rate for the services rendered would be $1,398.00 per hour (($5,455,645 + $3,250,000 = $8,705,645) ÷ 6,227.2 hours = $1,398.00).

[9] The Bankruptcy Court had previously ruled on the non-success/completion fee portions of both FTI's and Lazard's Final Fee Applications. See In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 634 and n. 1.

Lazard typically undertakes an engagement in the restructuring world (as opposed to non-restructuring assignments) on the basis of a fixed monthly fee with a completion fee at the end of the assignment. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 14:16-22; ECF Doc. No. 7857]. Mr. Kurtz testified that Lazard never seeks compensation on an hourly basis for any of its services. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 14:23-25; ECF Doc. No. 7857].

Mr. Kurtz chronicled the circumstances surrounding the retention of Lazard and FTI as financial advisors for the Committee. On October 6, 2005, Lazard and FTI negotiated an increase in the combined monthly compensation proposed by the Committee from $500,000 per month to $550,000 per month (providing Lazard with its monthly compensation of $275,000 per month). [P-10, (Kurtz) at 26:2-27:1; ECF Doc. No. 7857]. Lazard continued its discussions with the Committee regarding a completion fee after October 6, 2005, until Lazard finally accepted the Committee's reluctance to agree to a completion fee without knowing the outcome of the bankruptcy cases. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 28:2-29:25; ECF Doc. No. 7857].

After testifying regarding the circumstances surrounding Lazard's retention by the Committee, as well as the services rendered by Lazard in the bankruptcy case, Mr. Kurtz testified as to the circumstances surrounding Lazard's request for a completion fee. Mr. Kurtz testified that approximately fourteen months after the commencement of the bankruptcy case, he broached the subject of a completion fee with the chairman of the Committee during late November or early December 2006. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 30:12-31:3; ECF Doc. No. 7857] Lazard arrived at its request for a $4 million completion fee with the Committee by preparing a report [P-19; ECF Doc. No. 8154] analyzing the monthly compensation and success fees earned by financial advisors to creditors committees in other large complex cases of similar size and magnitude to the Debtors' cases. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 31:12-33:20; ECF Doc. No. 7857]. During this period in late November to early December 2006, the Committee, once again, declined to agree on a success fee at that time. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 34:3-5; ECF Doc. No. 7857].

After the Debtors' plan of reorganization was confirmed in May 2007, the Committee considered and accepted Lazard's proposal of a completion fee of $4 million. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 34:6-35:15; ECF Doc. No. 7857] Subsequent to the Committee's acceptance of Lazard's proposal of a $4 million completion fee, Lazard engaged in several negotiations with the Debtors over Lazard's request for a completion fee. Ultimately, Lazard and the Debtors agreed upon Lazard's request for a completion fee in the amount of $3,250,000. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 35:16-36-16; ECF Doc. No. 7857].

In addition to Mr. Kurtz's testimony, the record was supplemented both during the hearing and afterwards with documentary evidence, including deposition transcripts, and charts regarding various analysis of fees. Following the hearing, post-trial memoranda of law were submitted by various parties, including Lazard. [P-11; ECF Doc. No. 7913; P-12; ECF Doc. No. 7915; P-13; ECF Doc. No. 7919; P-14; ECF Doc. No. 7920].

4. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision

On February 29, 2008, the bankruptcy court denied Lazard's request for a completion fee. See In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 652. In reaching this decision, the court determined that it had not pre-approved Lazard's fee enhancement request under 11 U.S.C. § 328(a). In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 639. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court determined that Lazard's request for a success fee failed to meet the standards set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 330.

In reaching this determination, the bankruptcy court noted that the Lazard Retention Application provided that Lazard would be retained under sections 328(a) and 1103(a) and that there would not be a challenge to its Monthly Advisory Fees and requests for reimbursement of expenses, except under the standard of review under 328(a).[10] In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 640. However, the court further noted that although the terms of the underlying letter engaging Lazard were incorporated into the Lazard

[10] The Court observed that the United States Trustee retained the right to object to any fee application filed by Lazard on any grounds provided by the Bankruptcy Code, "including without limitation, the reasonableness standard provided for in Section 330." See In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 636.

Retention Order, those terms provided only that Lazard was entitled to seek a "success" or "completion" fee at some later date. Id. The bankruptcy court explicitly rejected Lazard's argument that its compensation agreement was pre-approved by the Court and that payment of a completion fee, reviewable only under the standards of 328(a), was ever contemplated by the Lazard Retention Order. Id. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court considered Lazard's Completion Fee Request under the standards set forth in section 330(a)(3) of the Bankruptcy Code. Id. at 641.

In connection with this review, the bankruptcy court noted that Lazard had tried to evade the evidentiary standards outlined in section 330 by instead attempting to substitute a "market" theory approach. The court was not persuaded by this approach. Id. at 643-44. The bankruptcy court observed that Section 330(a)(3) provided specific criteria for the court to consider in reviewing a fee request, including factors such as the time spent on the services, the rates charged, and whether the services were appropriate to the nature of the issue or task addressed. Id. at 644-645. In order to apply these factors, the bankruptcy court stated that courts had adopted what has been identified as the "lodestar analysis." Id. at 645. Relying on the Supreme Court's decision in Pennsylvania v. Delaware Valley Citizens' Council for Clean Air, 478 U.S. 546, 566 (1986), Judge Morris found that the Supreme Court had found that the typical lodestar analysis implemented most, if not all, of the factors set forth in section 330(a)(3). In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 645. The loadstar amount, Judge Morris found, reflected the novelty and complexity of the matter, the quality of the representation and the results achieved, and she concluded that enhancements to that lodestar amount were proper only in rare and exceptional cases supported by specific evidence and detailed findings. Id. at 645, citing Blum v. Stenson, 465 U.S. 886, 898-901 (1984).

In this case, in considering all the evidence presented under Section 330(a)(3), the bankruptcy court rejected Lazard's request for a success or completion fee. The court found it unclear whether she could find, with reasonable certainty, the success being claimed by both Lazard and FTI was solely attributable to either professional. In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 651. It appeared to the bankruptcy court that Lazard performed the analysis and tasks appropriate for its engagement as financial advisors to the Committee. The bankruptcy court stated that the fact that the reorganization was successful was precisely the result contemplated by Congress when it enacted chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Therefore, the bankruptcy court found that Lazard's application for a success or completion fee did not meet the standards outlined under Section 330(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. Id.

In denying the Completion Fee Request, the bankruptcy court fully considered Lazard's argument that its Completion Fee Request should be granted because the payment of a completion fee to a financial advisor was the customary practice in large chapter 11 cases. The bankruptcy court reviewed each bankruptcy case and retention application relied on by both Lazard and FTI as support for their respective positions that a market based approach should be applied to the facts herein. The bankruptcy court concluded that the retention agreements in the cases relied upon by both Lazard and FTI were distinguishable from the agreement set forth in the Lazard Retention Application. In the cases relied upon, where a success, transactional or restructuring fee was awarded, the terms specifying when such fees would be awarded were specifically set forth in the respective retention agreements. In the instant case, the bankruptcy court noted that the Lazard Final Retention Order did not reference or incorporate by reference any objective guidelines to determine whether they were entitled to a success or completion fee, much less how much the fee should be. Id. at 648. The bankruptcy court found Lazard's market-driven approach unpersuasive absent compliance with the standards set forth in section 330(a). Id.

On February 29, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an Order Denying Allowances of Completion Fee Requests of Lazard Frères & Co., LLC. [P-16; ECF Doc. No. 8105]. Lazard timely filed its Notice of Appeal on March 10, 2008. [P-17; ECF Doc. No. 8123].

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying Lazard's request for a success or completion fee of $3,250,000. The bankruptcy court properly determined that the appropriate standard of review for these additional fees was 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). Under the standards set forth in section 330(a)(3), a court considering whether to award fees to a professional retained in the case is required to consider a number of factors including such factors as the time spent on the services, whether the services were reasonable and beneficial, the rates charged for the services, and whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity of the task addressed. In reaching the determination that these factors under section 330(a)(3) must be considered, the Bankruptcy Court correctly rejected Lazard's argument that the sole factor to be considered was "a market" theory – that is, whether Lazard's fees were consistent with the fees charged in the marketplace.

The court also correctly held that Lazard did not adduce evidence of "truly exceptional results" required for lodestar enhancement. The bankruptcy court's decision was amply supported by the evidence of record and should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion In Denying Lazard's Request For A Completion Or Success Fee.

A. The bankruptcy court properly reviewed Lazard's fee enhancement request for "reasonableness" under 11 U.S.C. § 330.

As the bankruptcy court properly concluded, the standard of review to be applied to the Completion Fee Request was section 330(a)(3) of the Bankruptcy Code. Lazard does not assert here, as it did below, that its Completion Fee Request was pre-approved as part of the Final Retention Order or that its Completion Fee Request should be considered under section 328(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. See Lazard's Brief ("Br.") at 11. Rather, Lazard instead argues that the court below erred in failing to rely on Section 330(a)(3)(E) to the exclusion of the other factors set forth in Section 330(a)(3). See Br. at 12. This argument fails.

1. Section 330(a)(3) is the Proper Standard of Review

Section 328(a) authorizes a committee to obtain prior court approval of a professional's compensation plan, such as through a contingent fee arrangement. Pre-approval eliminates any uncertainty as to the professional's compensation arising from the bankruptcy court's post-facto review under section 330(a)(1). Daniels v. Barron (In re Barron), 325 F.3d 690, 692 -93 (5th Cir. 2003). Section 328(a) permits a bankruptcy court subsequently to award different compensation if "developments, which made the approved plan improvident, had been incapable of anticipation at the time the award was granted . . . ." Id. at 693.

The Committee and Lazard could have protected themselves by obtaining prior bankruptcy court approval of Lazard's completion fee under section 328(a). They chose not to do so, however. Id. As an initial matter, as Lazard and the Committee concede, the bankruptcy court properly reviewed Lazard's entitlement to fee enhancement under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3).[11] See In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 644.

2. Bankruptcy courts have substantial discretion in awarding fees under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a).

Section 330(a) grants a bankruptcy court broad discretion to pay committee professionals what the court determines to be a "reasonable" fee for "actual" services that are "necessary." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539; In re Busy Beaver Building Centers, Inc., 19 F.3d 833, 840 (3rd Cir. 1994). In determining "reasonable" compensation, a bankruptcy court may consider a non-exclusive list of five "relevant factors" pertaining to the "nature, the extent and the value" of the services rendered, "including — (A) the time spent on such services; (B) the rates charged for such services; (C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the services were rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title; (D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time . . . ; and (E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). In re Teraforce Tech. Corp., 347 B.R. 838, 846 – 847 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006).

[11] Abandoning a position it adopted previously [P-6, ECF Doc. No. 7586], in its appellate brief Lazard concedes that "[t]he Bankruptcy Court concluded, and Lazard does not dispute, that the proper standard for determining the reasonableness of a professional's completion fee, not otherwise approved under section 328 of the Bankruptcy Code, is that provided for in section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code." Br. at 11. Note omitted.

Section 330(a)(2) expressly authorizes bankruptcy courts, in the exercise of their discretion, to "award compensation that is less than the amount requested . . . ." Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539. Moreover, section 330(a)(4) prohibits the bankruptcy court from awarding compensation for "unnecessary duplication of services . . . or . . . services that were not . . . reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate . . . or . . . necessary to the administration of the estate . . . ." Section 331 authorizes bankruptcy professionals to seek interim compensation on the same basis as under section 330(a). See Teraforce Tech. Corp., 347 B.R. at 846-47.

Bankruptcy courts use the "lodestar" method, which was adopted from non-bankruptcy, fee-shifting cases, to calculate "reasonable" fees under section 330(a). See Matter of First Colonial Corp. of Am., 544 F.2d 1291 (5th Cir.1977), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 904 (1977), citing Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir.1974) (interpreting the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. A. 2000e-5(k)). "A court computes the lodestar by multiplying the number of hours [a professional] would reasonably spend for the same type of work by the prevailing hourly rate in the community . . . A court then may adjust the lodestar up or down based on the factors contained in § 330 and its consideration of the twelve factors listed in Johnson . . . ."[12] Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539-40.

[12] Cahill summarized the Johnson factors in a footnote as "(1) the time and labor required; (2) the novelty and difficulty of the questions; (3) the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly; (4) the preclusion of other employment by the attorney due to acceptance of the case; (5) the customary fee; (6) whether the fee is fixed or contingent; (7) time limitations imposed by the client or the circumstances; (8) the amount involved and the results obtained; (9) the experience, reputation and ability of the attorneys; (10) the "undesirability" of the case; (11) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client; and (12) awards in similar cases . . . ." Id., citing Johnson, 488 F.2d at 719. "The lodestar analysis takes into account each of the factors specifically mentioned in § 330(a)(3) plus additional relevant [Johnson] factors . . . ." Commercial

Over the last fifteen years, the United States Supreme Court, in interpreting various fee-shifting statutes,[13] has limited a Federal court's ability to enhance attorneys' fees beyond the lodestar. The Court has held that the lodestar is presumed to be the reasonable fee,[14] and that "[a]n upward adjustment may be justified in the rare case where the applicant offers specific evidence to show that the quality of service rendered was superior to that one should reasonably expect in light of the hourly rates charged and that the success was exceptional . . . ." Delaware I, 478 U.S. at 565. Accordingly, enhancements to the "lodestar" amount are proper only in rare and exceptional cases supported by specific evidence and detailed findings. In re Brous, 370 B.R. 563, 569 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007) (citing Connolly v. Harris Trust Co. Of Cal. (In re MiniScribe), 309 F.3d 1234, 1243 (10th Cir. 2002)).

The applicant – here Lazard – bears the burden of proving both "the reasonableness and necessity of fees requested in the fee application . . . ." Cont'l Ill. Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago v. Charles N. Wooten, Ltd. (Matter of Evangeline Ref. Co.), 890 F.2d 1312, 1326 (5th Cir.1989). "This burden is not to be taken lightly, especially given that every dollar expended on legal fees results in a dollar less that is available for distribution to the creditors or use by debtor." In re Pettibone Corp., 74 B.R. 293, 299-300 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1987). The applicant bears the specific burden "of proving the prevailing 'community rate' . . . ." In re El Paso Ref., Inc., 257 B.R. 809, 833 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2000).

3. Lazard's Argument that Primacy Be Given to § 330(a)(3)(E) to the Exclusion of all Other Factors Must Be Rejected

Rather than considering all the nonexclusive factors of section 330(a)(3), Lazard misapplies section 330(a)(3) by giving primacy to subsection (E). By its statutory terms, subsection (E) is only one of a non-exhaustive set of five factors warranting judicial consideration in determining reasonable compensation in a particular case. In re Commercial Fin. Servs., Inc., 427 F.3d at 811-12 (holding that "[b]ased on the statutory language alone, under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3), a bankruptcy court is directed to consider at least five factors, among which four either explicitly or implicitly direct a bankruptcy court to examine the amount of time spent on a project . . . ."). Section 330 prescribes that courts may award only "reasonable compensation" and that courts "shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors . . . ." (Emphasis added) 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). Lazard's interpretation would eliminate the bankruptcy court's discretion to determine reasonableness based upon the factors listed in subsection (a)(3), among others. See Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539.

The language of section 330 makes it clear that a court is expected to take into account all relevant factors. The word "factors" is in the plural. There is nothing in the statutory language that even suggests that one factor be given primacy to the exclusion of other factors. See Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 534 (2004) (interpreting 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) and stating that "[i]t is well established that 'when the statute's language is plain, the sole function of the courts - at least where the disposition required by the text is not absurd - is to enforce it according to its terms. . .'") (internal citations omitted). At most, therefore, market or customary rates charged by similarly situated professionals is only one of several factors that a court considers in reviewing a request for fees under section 330(a)(3). Had Congress intended to restrict the bankruptcy court's analysis of comparability to one factor it could have done so. But clearly, it did not. Cf. Miller Buckfire & Co., LLC v. Citation Corp. (In re Citation Corp.), 493 F.3d 1313, 1320 (11th Cir. Ala. 2007) ("Four of the five required statutory factors [of 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)] either explicitly or implicitly direct a bankruptcy court to examine the amount of time spent on either the project as a whole or to examine the time spent on individual units of the professional's work."); In re Collida, 270 B.R. 209, 214 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2001) (finding that the court must consider all the factors set forth in section 330).

Having acknowledged the applicability of section 330 to the determination of the reasonableness of its Completion Fee Request, Lazard may not now selectively apply only one factor under section 330 in an effort to achieve the same result as if its entire request for compensation (including the Completion Fee) were pre-approved under section 328. By urging the Court to award it the same compensation that has been awarded to financial advisors in other comparable bankruptcy cases, Lazard ignores the circumstances under which it was retained. At the time of its retention, with the exception of two cases (out of eight bankruptcy cases) – those being the Delta Airlines[15] and Calpine[16] bankruptcy cases – the compensation of the financial advisors that Lazard currently relies upon to justify its Completion Fee had already been determined. See [P-19; ECF Doc. No. 8154]. Accordingly, Lazard was in a position to roughly calculate what success or completion fee it would likely seek and shelter it from challenge other than on an "improvident" basis pursuant to section 328. Alternatively, Lazard could have sought to guarantee a completion fee under section 328, without fixing the amount of the Completion Fee.[17]

However, as Lazard conceded at the hearing, the Committee had made it clear that it was not prepared to retain Lazard on any basis that guaranteed a completion fee to Lazard. [P-10, (Kurtz) 28:9-20; ECF Doc. No. 7857]. Therefore, as the bankruptcy court stated, Lazard, a sophisticated party who touted its experience in other chapter 11 actions, knew or should have known when it bargained as part of its

[15] On September 14, 2005, Delta Airlines filed a chapter 11 case in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York under the case number 05-17923.

[16] On December 20, 2005, Calpine Corporation filed a chapter 11 case in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York under the case number 05-60200.

[17] While it is not clear whether Lazard's Completion Fee could have properly availed itself of the pre-approved standard under section 328 if Lazard's Retention Application did not specify the amount of the Completion Fee or some basis for determining the amount of such Completion Fee, in the current case Lazard knowingly did not provide for a Completion Fee under section 328.

retention for the right to make a request for a success or completion fee, that the "right to deny" a request is the companion to the "right to make" the same request. In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 652.

Lazard's admitted goal, to achieve the same result whether a financial advisor's compensation is pre-approved under section 328 or entirely subject to section 330,[18] opens the door to circumstances that run counter to the intended purpose of ensuring the reasonableness of compensation authorized pursuant to section 330. Lazard's application of the market-driven approach invites potential abuses that would remain resistant to Court oversight. As applied in the instant case, a market-driven approach that almost exclusively focuses on fees earned in other allegedly comparable cases, decouples the professional's responsibility from the very case for which the professional has been retained. Under Lazard's approach, the very same arguments for a completion fee could, and presumably would, be advanced even if the results in a particular case were unexpectedly unsuccessful, and the bankruptcy court would be powerless to exercise its discretion to ensure the reasonableness of the compensation awarded to financial advisors.

As the bankruptcy court explicitly found, in every case cited by Lazard to support its request for its Completion Fee, the financial advisor or investment banker had managed to include specific terms establishing an entitlement to a completion fee in their respective retention orders. Id. at 646-51.[19]

[18] See Br. at 18 ("the market for such [completion] fees is the same regardless of whether they are pre-approved under section 328 or subject to a reasonableness review under section 330.")

[19] Judge Morris analyzed each case and each retention application advanced by FTI and Lazard in support of their market-driven approach to justifying their requests for a success or completion fee, and Judge Morris distinguished each retention application for the respective financial advisors from the retention applications for FTI and Lazard in the instant case. In *In re Mirant Corp.*354 B.R. 113 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) and In re NorthWestern Corp. 344 B.R. 40 (D. Del. 2006) Judge Morris noted that all of the financial advisors in those cases had been retained pursuant to section 328 with the terms of their monthly compensation as well as the terms of their "success fees" or "restructuring fee" fully disclosed in their respective retention applications. Similarly, the retention applications for each financial advisor referred to by either FTI or Lazard as professionals retained pursuant to section 328 in In re Adept Bus. Solutions, Inc. No. 02-11289 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y,), In re Delta Airlines, No. 05-17923 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.), In re UAL Corp. No. 01-48191 (Bankr. N.D. Ill.), as well as the instant case (In re Northwest Airlines Corp.), all contained full disclosures of the terms under which the financial advisor was entitled to a success, completion, transaction, or restructuring fee and the manner in which the fee would be calculated. The only exception was the financial advisor in Howard & Zukin Capital v. High River Ltd. P'ship, 369 B.R. 111 (S.D.N.Y. 2007), wherein, although the entitlement to the transaction fee was guaranteed, the

In contrast, as even Lazard conceded at the hearing before the bankruptcy court, [P-10, (Kurtz) 58: 23-25 and 59: 1-3; ECF Doc. No. 7857], the Retention Application specifically contemplated the possibility that Lazard might not be entitled to any completion fee at all. Yet, Lazard continues to ignore the fact that its request can be denied and has proceeded solely as if the only question is whether the fees it is seeking are comparable to the fees customarily charged by financial advisors in other cases. Clearly, Section 330(a)(3) contemplates that all factors will be considered by the court, not just one. Cf. In reWilliams, 384 B.R. 191, 194-95 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio, 2007) (in a review of fees under 330(a)(4)(B) which incorporates section 330, court noted that by statute it must consider the factors under 330(a)(3) and listed those factors); Harris v. Dublin (In re U-Can Rent, Inc.), 262 B.R. 147, 151 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 2001) ("Section 330(a)(3) lists five nonexclusive factors the court must consider in determining the amount of compensation that may be awarded to a trustee.")

4. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Distinguished Lazard's Reliance upon Howard in Support of Lazard's Request for a Completion Fee.

The bankruptcy court properly concluded that Lazard's reliance upon Howard, see Howard, 369 B.R. at 114-15 (citing to In re Ames Dept. Stores, Inc., 76 F.3.d 66, 71 (2d Cir. 1996)), was misplaced as the facts in Howard were distinguishable from those of the instant case. In Howard, the Bankruptcy Court awarded a financial advisor approximately $4 million in fees related to financial restructuring services rendered to XO Communications ("XO"). The financial advisor appealed claiming that the bankruptcy court's calculation of its fees based solely on secured debt was an error. Unlike in the instant case, in Howard, the financial advisor's retention order, referencing the terms of an engagement letter, provided from the very beginning of the case that there would be a transaction fee awarded to the financial advisor if a plan of reorganization was confirmed.

Specifically, the day after filing its Chapter 11 petition, XO filed a proposed plan of reorganization that addressed two different outcomes. Under Plan A, which involved the influx of new capital from certain investors, the retention order (which incorporated the terms of a modified engagement letter entered into between XO and the financial advisor) provided that the financial advisor would receive a transaction fee of $20 million. Under Plan B, which involved the implementation of a stand-alone restructuring without raising any additional capital, the retention order provided that the reasonableness of the transaction fee for the financial advisor would be considered at a subsequent hearing. Howard, 369 B.R. at 113. Therefore, as the bankruptcy court herein correctly found, see In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 648, in Howard, unlike this case, the retention order clearly contemplated that there would be a transaction fee awarded to the financial advisor. The only issue would be the amount of the fee if Plan B was confirmed.

Moreover, while it is true that in Howard the Court found that both the parties and the Court agreed that the Second Circuit had established a "market-driven" approach to fees awarded to professionals, Howard, 369 B.R. at 114-15, the Court also made it clear that market factors were only one of the factors to be considered by a court reviewing a request for fees. Not only did the Court set forth all the factors to be considered when reviewing a request for fees under Section 330(a)(3), see Howard, 369 B.R. at 115, n.3, but it specifically rejected the financial advisor's argument that the Bankruptcy Court erred by (i) looking at the unsuccessful outcome of the restructuring, taking creditor recoveries into account, and by (ii) considering whether the services were reasonable and beneficial when rendered. Id. at 119-20. The Court specifically found that the Bankruptcy Court had not abused its discretion when considering all this information – all factors to be considered under Section 330(a)(3). Id. at 120.

While Lazard would no doubt admit that the market-driven approach in Ames, as applied to attorneys billing by the hour, is not inconsistent with the lodestar approach, Lazard rejects the lodestar approach for those financial advisors who do not typically bill on an hourly basis. As noted above, that conclusion is inconsistent with the Tenth and Eleventh Circuits that hold that where the compensation of financial advisors is reviewable under section 330 (as opposed to section 328), the lodestar or adjusted lodestar approach is applicable. See Miller Buckfire & Co., LLC v. Citation Corp., 493 F.3d 1313, 1318 (11th Cir. 2007); Houlihan Lokey Howard & Zukin Cap. v. Unsecured Liquidating Trust, 427 F.3d 804, 811 (10th Cir. 2005). In the Second Circuit, Howard is not inconsistent with the adjusted lodestar approach, which considers various fee rates, the comparison of compensation of comparable professionals, and the results obtained in determining reasonableness under section 330.

Lazard ignores the most obvious and perhaps the most significant difference between its compensation arrangement and those it cites in Howard and other supposedly comparable bankruptcy cases. In each example cited by Lazard, the financial advisor's entitlement to a completion fee was essentially "guaranteed" (i.e., where the terms of the professional's entitlement to the fee were fully disclosed, and where, with the exception of the Howard case, the basis for calculating the fee was also fully disclosed at the time of retention). In the instant case, however, where Lazard's entitlement to a completion fee was not guaranteed at the time of Lazard's retention by the Committee. See In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 646-51. The lack of a guaranteed completion fee would seem to mandate the application of the lodestar or adjusted lodestar approach. In the instant case, just as in Howard, where the examples of cases displaying the compensation arrangements of various financial advisors are determined to be not relevant to the case at hand, the bankruptcy court may properly ignore such examples. See Howard, 369 B.R. at 117 ("Without evidence that the cited restructuring cases possess these similarities to the instant case, the Bankruptcy Court was well within its discretion in declining to rely on them . . . .").

5. Lazard failed to adduce evidence of "truly exceptional results," meriting an upward adjustment of the lodestar.

Here, after considering all the evidence presented, the bankruptcy court, having previously concluded that Lazard's failure to provide terms for the determination of the Completion Fee mandated the application of the lodestar (or adjusted lodestar) approach, correctly denied the request for a success or completion fee under Section 330. In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. 643-45. This decision was amply supported by the evidence of record.

Beginning with the presumption that the lodestar constitutes reasonable compensation, the fee applicant bears the burden of proving that an upward adjustment is necessary in a particular case. See Blum, 465 U.S. at 697-98. To be entitled to an upward adjustment from the lodestar, the fee applicant is required to provide specific evidence of superior service and exceptional success. See Delaware I, 478 U.S. at 565; Blum, 465 U.S. 899; Brous, 370 B.R. at 569.

Lazard's market-driven approach to its Completion Fee Request makes no attempt to prove either superior service or exceptional success. Lazard's reliance upon the compensation earned by other financial advisors in what it regarded as comparable cases to justify its Completion Fee Request does not take into consideration the existence of superior service or exceptional success. In fact, even if the instant case were acknowledged to be an abject failure by all parties, Lazard's application of its market-driven approach would justify a Completion Fee Request.

There was nothing superior about the services Lazard rendered. In particular, as the bankruptcy court found, Lazard performed the type of analysis and tasks appropriate for an engagement of the kind for which it was retained. See In re Northwest Airlines, 382 B.R. at 651. In fact, even Lazard conceded at the hearing that it had not performed any extraordinary services for the estate. [P-10, (Kurtz) at 58: 23-25 and 59: 1-3; ECF Doc. No. 7857]. While a plan of reorganization was confirmed in this case, as the bankruptcy court appropriately observed, a successful reorganization of the Debtors was precisely the result contemplated by Congress when it enacted chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, and this fact would not justify an award of a success or completion fee. Moreover, the bankruptcy court's observation, regarding the apprehension that it felt if it were to award large bonuses or completion fees to multiple professionals claiming responsibility for the same successes, was justified. Indeed, as stated above, care must be taken by the court before awarding any fees to professionals, "given that every dollar expended on legal fees results in a dollar less that is available for distribution to the creditors or use by debtor." In re Pettibone Corp., 74 B.R. 293, 299 - 300 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1987).

The bankruptcy court's caution is amply supported by In re Molten Metal Technology, Inc., 345 B.R. 26 (Bankr. D.Mass. 2006). In Molten Metal, the bankruptcy court acknowledged that the fee applicant performed at a high level of skill. The bankruptcy court also acknowledged the exceptional results achieved in the cases, which began as an administratively insolvent case with a $20 million deficit, but ultimately resulted in a 5% distribution to unsecured creditors. Nevertheless, the bankruptcy court did not find the "rare and limited circumstances in which an upward adjustment is warranted" where the responsibility for the exceptional outcome was attributable to "the team and not just one player." Molten Metal, 345 B.R. at 29. In the instant case where no exceptional results have been alleged, and where Lazard cannot claim to be solely responsible for the "success" of the case, no fee enhancement is appropriate.

In sum, Lazard's interpretation and application of the market-driven approach to financial advisors' compensation is inconsistent with the statutory language and intent of the applicable statutes and, therefore, should not be adopted. Accepting Lazard's approach would mean that a financial advisor may seek to be retained by proposing a monthly compensation arrangement as the sole source of its compensation even while possessing all of the information necessary to calculate the completion fee it intends to seek at some point later in the case. There would appear to be nothing to stop such a financial advisor from requesting a completion fee only after the firm has successfully insinuated itself into the case, making it uneconomic for it to be replaced. If Lazard's approach is adopted, a financial advisor will suffer no detriment by hiding the amount of its intended completion fee because the same analysis on which the fee request will be based later in the case is the same analysis that would have been employed if the firm had proposed its completion at the time of its retention. Such a lack of transparency cannot be conducive to the efficient administration of a bankruptcy case and may quite likely result in a greater cost to the creditors of the estate. Accordingly, the Court should reject a market based approach as the sole factor in considering a request for fees by a professional in a bankruptcy proceeding.

CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the Court affirm the Bankruptcy Court's Decision and grant such other and further relief as may be just and proper.

STATUTORY ADDENDUM

11 U.S.C. § 328(a). Limitation on Compensation of Professional Persons

(a) The trustee, or a committee appointed under section 1102 of this title, with the court's approval, may employ or authorize the employment of a professional person under section 327 0r 1103 of this title, as the case may be, on any reasonable terms and conditions of employment, including on a retainer, on an hourly basis, or on a contingent fee basis. Notwithstanding such terms and conditions, the court may allow compensation different from the compensation provided under such terms and conditions after the conclusion of such employment, if such terms and conditions prove to have been improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated at the time of the fixing of such terms and conditions.

11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Compensation of officers

(a)(1) After notice to the parties in interest and the United States Trustee and a hearing, and subject to sections 326, 328, and 329, the court may award to a trustee, an examiner, a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103--

(A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney and by any paraprofessional person employed by any such person; and

(B) reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses.

(2) The court may, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States Trustee, the United States Trustee for the District or Region, the trustee for the estate, or any other party in interest, award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested.

(3) In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded, the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including--

(A) the time spent on such services;

(B) the rates charged for such services;

(C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title;

(D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the problem, issue, or task addressed; and

(E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title.

(4)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the court shall not allow compensation for--

(I) unnecessary duplication of services; or

(ii) services that were not--

(I) reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate; or
(II) necessary to the administration of the case.

(B) In a chapter 12 or chapter 13 case in which the debtor is an individual, the court may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section.

(5) The court shall reduce the amount of compensation awarded under this section by the amount of any interim compensation awarded under section 331, and, if the amount of such interim compensation exceeds the amount of compensation awarded under this section, may order the return of the excess to the estate.

(6) Any compensation awarded for the preparation of a fee application shall be based on the level and skill reasonably required to prepare the application.

11 U.S.C. § 503. Allowance of administrative expenses

(a) An entity may timely file a request for payment of an administrative expense, or may tardily file such request if permitted by the court for cause.

(b) After notice and a hearing, there shall be allowed administrative expenses, other than claims allowed under section 502(f) of this title, including--

(2) compensation and reimbursement awarded under section 330(a) of this title;

11 U.S.C. § 507(a). Priorities

(a) The following expenses and claims have priority in the following order:

(1) First, administrative expenses allowed under section 503(b) of this title, and any fees and charges assessed against the estate under chapter 123 of title 28.

1102. Creditors’ and equity security holders' committees

(a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (3), as soon as practicable after the order for relief under chapter 11 of this title, the United States trustee shall appoint a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims and may appoint additional committees of creditors or of equity security holders as the United States trustee deems appropriate.

Section 1103. Powers and duties of committees

(a) At a scheduled meeting of a committee appointed under section 1102 of this title, at which a majority of the members of such committee are present, and with the court's approval, such committee may select and authorize the employment by such committee of one or more attorneys, accountants, or other agents, to represent or perform services for such committee.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES
AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING AFFIRMANCE

Pursuant to Rule 29 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, the United States submits this brief as amicus curiae supporting affirmance of the district court's order.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the starting point in computing a debtor's "projected disposable income" is the debtor's "disposable income," as defined in section 1325(b)(2), multiplied by the number of months in the chapter 13 plan, with the amount subject to adjustment if it fails to predict a debtor's actual ability to fund a plan.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of the federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88, reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6049. The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. 307. See In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000).

This case involves a dispute over the interpretation of "projected disposable income," 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B), as it affects the confirmation of a plan under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. The United States Trustee is authorized, among other things, to "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in chapter 13 cases, monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such chapter 13 plans in connection with a plan confirmation hearing under section of the Code. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

In 2007, more than 310,000 persons filed bankruptcy petitions under chapter 13.[1] In chapter 13 cases, with so-called above-median debtors,[2] the question of statutory interpretation presented in this case has occurred frequently and is continuing to occur. In fact, there are already scores of bankruptcy court decisions that have faced this statutory issue.

This is only the third case in which the meaning of "projected disposable income" has been presented to a court of appeals.[3] We have filed an amicus brief in both previous cases, In re Kagenveama, ___ F.3d ___, 2008 WL 2278681 (9th Cir. June 5, 2008), and In re Lanning, No. 08-3009 (10th Cir.). The Lanning case is awaiting decision.

[3] Three bankruptcy appellate panels have decided the proper interpretation of the term, and all have adopted the interpretation presented by the United States in this brief. In re Pak, 378 B.R. 257 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007); In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007); and In re Lanning, 380 B.R. 17 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007), appeal pending, No. 08-3009 (10th Cir.).

In this brief, the United States respectfully offers this Court its views on the correct interpretation of section 1325(b). See 28 U.S.C. 517 (authorizing Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States").

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory Background.

In 2005, Congress passed and the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (BAPCPA).

One of the innovations of the BAPCPA was means-testing. In section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code, which addresses dismissal of abusive chapter 7 petitions, Congress established special rules for debtors whose current monthly income, reduced by certain permitted expenses, exceeded a threshold for abuse under a specified formula. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2). This amendment changed the way these expenses were computed; some were no longer the debtor's actual expenses but instead were standard expenses under the National Standards and Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the debtor's area of residence. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii).

Congress also applied means-testing to chapter 13 cases, in which the debtor seeks not to liquidate his debts, as in chapter 7, but rather to establish a plan for repaying all or part of those debts. Before the BAPCPA amendments were enacted, section 1325, governing confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, required such a plan to provide that all of the debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period would be used to repay debts. Disposable income was calculated from the debtor's actual income and expenses set forth on Schedules I and J, which the debtor was required to file.

But the BAPCPA amended section 1325 to change the definition of "disposable income." The new section 1325(b)(2) defines "disposable income" to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2).[4] This definition incorporates two changes: first, it defines "disposable income" based on an average of past monthly income figures; and second, for debtors with higher income levels, it requires the use of the same standard expenses mandated for certain debtors under section 707(b)(2). Specifically, section 1325(b)(3) now directs that reasonable expenses be determined "in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2)" for those chapter 13 debtors whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is greater than the median family income for a family of the corresponding size. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Chapter 13 debtors in this class are typically referred to as "above-median" debtors. To be clear, an above-median debtor is not one whose income places him in the top half of all debtors; it is one whose income places him in the top half of families of his size in his state of residence.

Under current bankruptcy rules, such a debtor must file Official Form 22C,[5] which sets forth the debtor's income and expenses in accordance with standard numbers issued by the IRS. Because a debtor must also file the traditional Schedules I and J setting forth actual income and expenses, it often becomes apparent that there is a significant difference between the above-median debtor's disposable income under Schedules I and J and his disposable income under Form 22C. In some cases, the use of Form 22C captures a temporary increase in the debtor's disposable income that does not continue into the plan period, while in other cases the use of Form 22C results in a lower amount of disposable income. In these and other cases, it may become clear that the historical circumstances that produced a particular income figure will change prospectively.

For the convenience of the Court, we have attached in an addendum to this brief the pre-BAPCPA text of section 1325, the current text of section 1325, and a redlined version showing the changes to section 1325 made by the BAPCPA.

[5] The form was previously known as "B22C." We will use the current form name "22C" throughout.

B. Facts.

1. The debtor, Pamela Page Nowlin, a single woman with no children, filed for bankruptcy under chapter 13 on September 14, 2006. RE 1-39. Along with her petition, the debtor filed a Schedule I (Current Income), Schedule J (Current Expenditures), and Form 22C. Schedule I showed current monthly wages of $7,145.86. RE 21. After payroll deductions that included a monthly 401(k) contributions totaling $1,062.51 and monthly 401(k) loan repayments totaling $1,134.79, Schedule I reported net monthly income of $3,035.64. RE 21. After $2,840.00 in household expenses, Schedule J showed a monthly surplus of $195.64. RE 22.

The debtor's Form 22C indicated a current monthly income of $7,420.53, or $89,046.36 annually. ER 50-51. Because her current monthly income exceeded the median family income for a single-person household in Texas, the debtor qualified as an "above-median" debtor for purposes of 11 U.S.C. 1325. While the debtor's Form 22C disclosed monthly disposable income of $28.67, ER 54, the debtor later stipulated at a hearing that the correct amount was $38.67. RE 96.

The debtor filed a chapter 13 plan with her petition that called for 60 payments of $195.00 per month. RE 40, 96. This figure appears to have been based on the monthly surplus resulting from subtracting Schedule J monthly expenses from Schedule I net monthly income. RE 96. Over the 60-month life of this plan, unsecured creditors would receive only $980.45, or about 3% of the amount they are owed. RE 135 ¶ 5.

At the hearing to consider confirmation, the debtor testified that the $1,134.79 monthly 401(k) loan payments would end within the first two years of her proposed five-year repayment plan. RE 136 ¶ 6. David Peake, the Chapter 13 Trustee, objected to confirmation, arguing that once the 401(k) loan is paid off, the debtor will have an additional $1,134.79 per month in disposable income that should be made available to make increased payments to unsecured creditors under the plan. RE 113. The debtor countered that the post-petition change in expenses caused by the cessation of 401(k) loan payments should not be considered part of her "projected disposable income" pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). RE 103.

2. The bankruptcy court denied confirmation of the debtor's plan, holding that the term "projected disposable income" under 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B) must include the income dedicated to the 401(k) loan repayment that will become available once the debtor has finished paying off the loan. RE 141-42. The bankruptcy court's decision resulted in an increase in the debtor's disposable income by $947.30 during months 25 through 60 of the plan, which would in turn significantly increase the required payments to unsecured creditors. RE 142.

The bankruptcy court expressly rejected an interpretation of "projected disposable income" that would simply "multiply [the debtor's] disposable income as of the petition date by the length of the Plan," without accounting for significant future changes in financial status that the debtor knew at the time of petition would take place before the plan had ended. RE 138. The bankruptcy court held, instead, that "projected disposable income" must "account for events which will definitely occur during the term of the Plan that would alter either the income or expense side of the disposable income calculation." RE 138-39.

The district court affirmed. "When an allowed deduction for [the debtor's] current consumption no longer exists," the court stated, "the amount that had been applied to that expense shifts to pay the people she owes." In re Nowlin, 2007 WL 4623043, at *1 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 28, 2007). The district court held that "[d]ebtors must use projected disposable income that includes expected changes to the allowed expenses during the term of the plan." Id.

The BAPCPA amendments to section 1325 have created important interpretive questions about the proper way to understand "projected disposable income." As the case law reflects, there are different ways that courts have interpreted and applied that statutory language in light of the amendments. The interpretation offered here by the debtor should be rejected, because it fails to take into account all the language in the statute.

The debtor interprets the term "projected disposable income" to require use of the historical "disposable income" figure throughout the chapter 13 plan period, regardless of the debtor's actual income and expenses during that period. In this case, the debtor's historical "disposable income" was artificially low, because her expenses included repayment of a loan that would be paid off completely less than half way into the five-year chapter 13 plan. The debtor's interpretation does not account for the usual meaning of "projected" income or for the statutory phrases "to be received" and "will be applied to make payments" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Mechanically extending into the future an historical monthly income calculation, which may bear no relationship to actual income that the debtor will receive in the future, would either attribute to the debtor future income that does not exist, as in the case of a debtor with a short-term pre-petition increase in income, or, when the debtor has a financial change for the better after filing the petition, as in this case, permit the debtor to avoid using income that does exist to repay creditors.

Like the bankruptcy court and the district court below, the bankruptcy appellate panels of the First, Ninth, and Tenth circuits have rejected the construction of "projected disposable income" that the debtor advances here. Although the Ninth Circuit's recent decision in In re Kagenveama adopts the interpretation urged here by the debtor, that decision fails to take into account some of the language of the statute and should not be followed.

As the lower court decisions here and the bankruptcy appellate panel decisions show, the proper meaning of "disposable income" requires the historical income figure to be projected as an initial matter, subject to adjustment to account for any significant increases or decreases in the debtor's income that are likely in particular cases. Such adjustments may be necessary in individual cases to ensure that the income attributed to a debtor in his chapter 13 plan is actually income that is "projected" and "to be received" and that "will be applied to make payments" to unsecured creditors. While a simple multiplication of the initial disposable income number by the relevant number of months is a presumptive starting point, the proper interpretation allows adjustments to be made in appropriate cases. This interpretation is also consistent with the overall goals of chapter 13.

ARGUMENT

THE DEBTOR'S HISTORICAL "DISPOSABLE INCOME" IS THE STARTING POINT IN DETERMINING "PROJECTED DISPOSABLE INCOME" UNDER SECTION 1325, BUT COURTS MAY TAKE INTO ACCOUNT SIGNIFICANT CHANGES IN THE DEBTOR'S FINANCIAL CONDITION IF NECESSARY TO REFLECT THE DEBTOR'S ABILITY TO FUND A PLAN.

Congress's amendments to section 1325 three years ago have caused serious interpretive problems. Courts have taken three different approaches to analyzing what "projected disposable income" means in confirming a chapter 13 plan. We will discuss each of the three approaches and explain why the debtor's approach here is mistaken and why our interpretation is most consistent with the statutory language and the policies of the Bankruptcy Code. In doing so, we will explain the error in the Ninth Circuit's decision in In re Kagenveama, ___ F.3d ___, 2008 WL 2278681 (9th Cir. June 5, 2008), which entirely ignores critical language of section 1325.

A. The Courts Have Offered Three Different Interpretations Of Section 1325.

1. The BAPCPA amendments in 2005 to section 1325 created a significant change in the law. Before these amendments were enacted, section 1325(b)(1) provided that if the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objected to the confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, the court was not permitted to approve the plan unless it provided that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the three-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B) (2000 ed.). The term "disposable income" was defined as income received by the debtor that was "not reasonably necessary to be expended" for "maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent" or for necessary business expenses if the debtor was engaged in a business. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A) (2000 ed.). Under that former law, a debtor's projected disposable income was calculated simply by subtracting the debtor's expenses on Schedule J from the debtor's income on Schedule I, two forms that a chapter 13 debtor was required to file.

In contrast, under the BAPCPA amendments, section 1325(b)(1) now provides that:

> (b)(1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan – * * * (B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). And now, "disposable income" is defined expressly to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). "Current monthly income" is defined as the "average monthly income from all sources" that the debtor received during the six-month period ending the last calendar month before the debtor filed the chapter 13 petition. 11 U.S.C. 101(10A). It is, in other words, an historical figure representing the monthly average of the period shortly before the petition was filed. An above-median debtor – one whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is above the annual median income in the state of a family of comparable size – calculates these figures on Form 22C.

2. The minority position taken in a number of bankruptcy court decisions is that section 1325 requires "projected disposable income" to be computed by taking the historical "disposable income" figure, as defined in section 1325(b)(2), and simply multiplying it by the number of months in the debtor's chapter 13 plan. In the first decision out of the courts of appeals, the Ninth Circuit has adopted that interpretation. In re Kagenveama, supra.

Their underlying rationale is that "disposable income" was defined for the first time in the 2005 amendments and is used nowhere else than in the phrase "projected disposable income" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Thus, the argument goes, "projected disposable income," while still undefined in the Code, must mean nothing more than "disposable income" that is projected out through the plan period – in other words, that is multiplied by the number of months in the plan. See In re Kagenveama, ___ F.3d at ___, 2008 WL 2278681, at *3 ("To get from the statutorily defined 'disposable income' to 'projected disposable income,' 'one simply takes the calculation . . . and does the math.'") (quoting In re Alexander, 344 B.R. 742, 749 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2006)).

Some courts have found this strict mathematical approach to be difficult to rationalize in cases in which the debtor's income or expenses changed significantly from the pre-petition period on which the historical disposable income figure is based. A handful of those courts have determined projected disposable income based on the income and expense figures used in Schedules I and J. See, e.g., In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Riggs, 359 B.R. 649, 652-53 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2007).

But most of the courts that have been dissatisfied with limiting the term "projected disposable income" to a mere computational requirement have not simply invoked Schedules I and J. Rather, while starting with the historical disposable income figure, they have read "projected disposable income" as permitting the use of credible evidence of significant changes in income and expenses that are likely over the life of the debtor's chapter 13 plan. See, e.g., In re Lanning, 380 B.R. 17 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007), appeal pending, No. 08-3009 (10th Cir.); In re Pak, 378 B.R. 257 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007); In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007); In re Jass, 340 B.R. 411, 418-19 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006). These courts have noted that this reading of "projected disposable income" aligns with a debtor's actual financial situation over the life of the debtor's chapter 13 repayment plan.

B. The Debtor's Mechanical Approach To Section 1325(b) And The Ninth Circuit's Decision In Kagenveama Are Flawed.

The debtor in this case argues in favor of the strict mathematical approach. She contends that section 1325 and Form 22C require a "mechanical calculation" for determining what must be paid to unsecured creditors. Debtor Br. 20. She recognizes that the Code fails to define "projected disposable income," Debtor Br. 4, but argues that it is no more than a multiple of historical "disposable income." See Debtor Br. 7-8. The Ninth Circuit has taken the same approach in In re Kagenveama, supra. This mechanical approach to section 1325 is flawed.

To begin with, a mechanical interpretation fails to consider the term "projected" in its proper context. See Hibbs v. Winn, 542 U.S. 88, 101 (2004) (statutory words must be construed in context). The use of the term "projected" in the economic and financial context of this statute suggests a forecast or estimate of an expected future financial reality. See The Random House Dict. of the English Lang. 1546 (2d ed. 1987) (defining to "project" as, inter alia, "to set forth or calculate (some future thing); They projected the building costs for the next five years."); Webster's Third New Int'l Dict. 1813 (1993) (defining "projected" as, inter alia, "planned for future execution: contrived, proposed," as "[projected] outlays for new plant and equipment"). While the calculation of "projected" financial data may well begin with historical data, it does not necessarily (or even usually) end there, nor does it entail a rigid and inviolable assumption, made by the debtor, that projected income will be identical with past income even when the available facts demonstrate otherwise. The debtor's and the Ninth Circuit's mechanical test ignores this context of the statutory language.

Even more important, while both the debtor, Debtor Br. 6-14, and the Ninth Circuit, In re Kagenveama, ___ F.3d at ___, 2008 WL 2278681, at *3, assert that they are merely applying the plain meaning of section 1325(b)(1)(B), that is simply not correct. Their interpretation fails to take into account other language in the same statutory provision. First, although section 1325(b)(1)(B) explicitly refers to the income "to be received by the debtor" (emphasis added), the mechanical test fails to address cases in which the historical income required to be used may have no relationship to the actual income "to be received." A fairly typical case is In re Lanning, 380 B.R. 17 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007), appeal pending, No. 08-3009 (10th Cir.), in which the debtor received a buyout from her employer during the six-month period preceding her filing under chapter 13. As a result of the buyout and the accompanying loss of her job, the debtor had an artificially high "current monthly income" and an artificially low actual income during the period covered by her chapter 13 plan. Under the mechanical test, the projection (i.e., multiplication) of her artificially high pre-petition income over the plan period would have resulted in fictitious "deemed" income that would never have been "received by the debtor" within the meaning of section 1325(b)(1)(B). See 380 B.R. at 21. Neither the debtor in this case nor the Ninth Circuit in Kagenveama makes any effort to address this language in the same statutory provision, despite their purported reliance on "plain meaning." Cf. In re Kagenveama, ___ F.3d at ___, 2008 WL 2278681, at *8 (Bea, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (because statute speaks of income "to be received," "even if a debtor's projected disposable income is zero at the time he seeks plan confirmation, he must commit to pay such disposable income as he receives it – should he receive it – during the applicable commitment period").

The mechanical test also fails to take into account another statutory phrase in section 1325(b)(1)(B), as well: "will be applied to make payments." For reasons similar to those we discussed in connection with the "to be received" requirement, fictitious income cannot "be applied to make payments." Both the debtor here and the Ninth Circuit base their understanding of "projected disposable income" strictly on the historical "current monthly income" figure, minus expenses. In cases like Lanning, projecting forward this deemed or hypothetical income does not permit it to be applied to make payments, for the simple reason that it does not exist. Under the mechanical test, either the debtor is charged with income that does not exist and cannot be "applied to make payments" under the plan, or the plan must be rejected, in which case the debtor is denied recourse to chapter 13 simply because of the receipt of a buyout and the loss of a job at about the time the petition was filed. Neither the debtor here nor the Ninth Circuit even attempts to explain the phrase "be applied to make payments" in the same statutory provision.[6] It is no answer to say that the chapter 13 plan may be amended under section 1329 to take into account changed financial circumstances. See In re Kagenveama, ___ F.3d at ___, 2008 WL 2278681, at *5, *7. In a case like Lanning, the mechanical test would likely preclude confirmation of any chapter 13 plan in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(a)(6)

[6] The Ninth Circuit mentions the phrase in passing when it holds that there is no applicable commitment period when there is no projected disposable income to pay out during it. In re Kagenveama, ___ F.3d at ___, 2008 WL 2278681, at *6 ("When read together, only 'projected disposable income' has to be paid out over the 'applicable commitment period.' When there is no 'projected disposable income,' there is no 'applicable commitment period."). For her part, the debtor here cites this language only to show that the 2005 BAPCPA amendment added the phrase "to unsecured creditors." Debtor Br. 17.

(court shall confirm a plan only if "the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan").

Although the present case has a different fact pattern from that in Lanning, any interpretation of section 1325(b)(1)(B) must take into account all of the language in the provision. If the interpretation cannot account for two phrases in the statute, which create serious interpretive issues in other fact situations, the interpretation must be incorrect. It is well established that courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect." Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (citing United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1992)). The debtor's interpretation would require the Court to ignore this statutory maxim.

C. To Give Content To All Parts Of The Statute, Section 1325 Must Be Read To Require That The Historical Figure Be Used As A Starting Point, Subject To Adjustment Based On Significant Changes In The Debtor's Financial Condition.

The correct interpretation of section 1325 uses historical "current monthly income" as the starting point for determining "projected disposable income," but also takes into account significant changes in the debtor's income or expenses that affect the debtor's ability to fund a plan.

1. In our view, the assessment of "projected disposable income" in the current version of the statute must, as a general matter, be based on the newly defined

"disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2), which in turn is based on an historical calculation of "current monthly income," computed as the average of the six month before the petition was filed. But there are circumstances in which the debtor's financial condition is projected to change significantly from that pre-petition period and, in such circumstances, it will not be appropriate to use the historical calculation. As the bankruptcy court expressed the point: Section 1325(b) "requires the Debtor to account for any events which will definitely occur during the term of the Plan that would alter either the income or the expense side of the disposable income calculation." App. 138-39.

Our interpretation not only is faithful to the new definition of "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2) as an historical number but also treats "projected" disposable income as a future-oriented concept, as required by the language of section 1325(b)(1). See In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 264-65; In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. at 307-08. This interpretation requires the use of the historical income figure called for in the definition of "disposable income" as a starting point, and it calls for a presumption that the historical figure should be carried forward throughout the term of the plan, absent evidence to the contrary. But in order to take into account the future-orientation of the remaining language of the statute, and to ensure that projected disposable income is, in fact, a projection, it allows that presumption to be rebutted whenever the debtor is likely to experience (or actually has experienced) either a significant increase or a significant decrease in net income after the filing of the chapter 13 plan.

The reason for having a starting presumption that the historical disposable income figure should be applied mathematically to derive the projected disposable income is that, while "projected disposable income" is certainly not the same as "disposable income," it is appropriate in construing the former phrase to give effect to the definition of the latter. Section 1325(b)(2) provides a definition "[f]or purposes of this subsection." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). The only time that "disposable income" is used in "this subsection," section 1325(b), other than in the definition itself, is in the term "projected disposable income." Thus, we accept that a court should begin by applying the historical "disposable income" figure as a starting point and by presumptively carrying that figure forward over the plan period.[7] debtor's future ability to fund a plan must present documentation similar to that required by section 707(b)(2)(B)(ii) in support of their claim." In re Lanning, 380 B.R. at 25. See also In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 267 ("It makes no sense to interpret 'projected disposable income,' governing debtors' future payments under their chapter 13 plans, as cast in stone by their pre-bankruptcy history, without any opportunity for the trustee, creditors or the debtor to offer rebutting evidence as to changed income circumstances before the effective date of the plan.").

At the same time, however, this initial presumption that the historical current monthly income will be used must necessarily be rebuttable. "[P]arties contending that a debtor's Form B22C disposable income figure does not accurately project the [7] Congress may well have expected that the historical figure, computed generally with standard rather than actual expenses, would result in a higher disposable-income total for "above-median" debtors and a greater amount designated for repayment to creditors under the debtor's chapter 13 plan. But the fact that this is often not the case does not authorize a court to ignore Form 22C altogether in determining projected disposable income and base it instead on Schedules I and J in the ordinary case. Such decisions cannot find support in the statutory language. See, e.g., In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Riggs, 359 B.R. 649, 652-53 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2007).

Thus, contrary to the debtor's argument here, Debtor Br. 7, application of the historical income figure to the plan period is not the end of the matter in all cases. There are situations in which a debtor has had, or is likely to have, significant changes in income after the period in which the historical "current monthly income" is computed, and in order to give full effect to the statutory text those changes must be taken into account in "project[ing]" the debtor's future disposable income.

There are two types of case that section 1325 must be able to address. First, a debtor may have either a significant increase in income at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition or a predictable increase later. For example, a debtor may be unemployed during the six-month period in which "current monthly income" is calculated but may accept a high-paying job at about the time he files his petition. See In re Pak, supra (debtor was unemployed for three years but found a job paying over $100,000 two months before filing his petition). Such a debtor would have an artificially low "disposable income" but might well be able to fund a chapter 13 plan that would repay most or all of his unsecured debt.

Second, conversely, a debtor may suffer a significant loss of income – for example, by losing a job – at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition, as in Lanning. Such a debtor would have a relatively high "current monthly income," based on an average of the six months preceding the month in which the petition was filed. Yet if that historical income were simply extended forward for purposes of the chapter 13 plan, it would not reflect the actual income available to the debtor during that future period. See, e.g., In re Lanning, 380 B.R. at 25 ("Where it is shown that Form B22C disposable income fails accurately to predict a debtor's actual ability to fund a plan, that figure may be subject to modification."). To put it in statutory terms, the future disposable income thus computed would not be the debtor's "projected" disposable income (because it would demonstrably not be based on a reliable estimate of future income) nor would it be the disposable income actually "received" by the debtor during the applicable commitment period. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). Moreover, because the income amount determined by the mechanical test is merely deemed or hypothetical and not actually received, the income could not be "applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." Id. In such a case, therefore, the court must take into account the significant loss of income in order to apply section 1325(b) faithfully.[8]

2. The debtor argues that allowing any adjustment of the historical disposable income figure is at odds with the plain meaning of section 1325 and with congressional intent. Debtor Br. 11-12. That argument is unpersuasive.

We have already explained why the adjustment of the historical figure in some cases is actually compelled by the statutory language and why the statutory text does not support the debtor's notion of a standardized formula that is unrelated to any actual income to be received. Adjustment of the historical figure is sometimes necessary to ensure that the income is "to be received" and "applied to make payments." In the debtor's mechanical view of section 1325(b)(1)(B), those two critical phrases in the statute become surplusage.

3. The debtor raises two other objections to taking into account changes in a debtor's financial condition. Both of these objections mistakenly assume the only alternative to the mechanical test is to project forward the net income figure from

[8] We recognize that some of these concerns with the statutory text do not arise in the same manner in our first example, when the debtor finds himself with a significant increase in income at about the time he files his petition. With an increase in income, the lower historical figure would actually be received by the debtor and could be applied to pay unsecured creditors. But it would still not be an accurate "project[ion]" of the debtor's disposable income to be "received" during the plan period; thus, the debtor's proposed interpretation is irreconcilable with the statutory text in these circumstances also. In any event, section 1325(b) should be interpreted in one uniform way for all above-median debtors, and the rebuttable presumption approach should be applied across the board.

Schedules I and J.

First, the debtor argues, Debtor Br. 17-18, that unless the mechanical test is used, the new requirement of section 1325(b)(1)(B) that all of the debtor's projected disposable income be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors will have the "absurd result" of making no funds available to pay secured creditors. This argument is meritless. No matter what the definition is of projected disposable income or which test is used, the plan must apply all of the projected disposable income to make payments to unsecured creditors. The addition of the phrase "unsecured creditors" has no bearing on the issue presented here. Under either interpretation, priority and secured creditors are paid first, after which the plan must provide for payment to unsecured creditors from whatever disposable income is projected.[9]

Second, the debtor argues, Br. 18-19, that "projecting the difference between schedules I and J does not take into account types of income which Congress has excluded in measuring a debtor's ability to pay," such as Social Security income. Debtor Br. 18. But the argument is completely misdirected. It is not our position that the courts should simply project forward the monthly net income on Schedules I and [9] The debtor appears to assume, incorrectly, that "the difference between schedules I and J," Debtor Br. 17, is always going to be greater than historical "current monthly income." In fact, in Lanning, which we have discussed in the text, the debtor's "current monthly income" on Form 22C was $5,344, while the monthly net income on Schedules I and J was about $149. In re Lanning, 380 B.R. at 19-20.

J. Nor is that what the bankruptcy court held in this case. To the contrary, the bankruptcy court merely required consideration of known changes in income or expenses: "[T]his Court holds that 'projected disposable income,' as it is used in § 1325(b), requires the Debtor to account for any events which will definitely occur during the term of the Plan that would alter either the income or expense side of the disposable income calculation." RE 143-44. It is not even the position of the Chapter 13 Trustee to rely entirely on Schedules I and J. See Ch. Trustee Br. 12 ("disposable income under Form B22C serves as a baseline for calculating projected disposable income subject to adjustment, both upward and downward, based upon known future circumstances"); id. at 14 ("CMI provides the court with a baseline from which it may make equitable deviations."). No one in this case "[r]el[ies] simply on the difference between schedules I and J." Debtor Br. 19.

4. We would be the first to admit that the language of section 1325 is not a model of clarity. But our interpretation gives effect to all the statutory language far more faithfully than the mechanical test advocated by the debtor and adopted by the Ninth Circuit in Kagenveama. Almost as important, it better furthers the overall goal of chapter 13.

Chapter 13 focuses on having debtors devote future income to paying their creditors. Indeed, BAPCPA placed additional emphasis on this goal of paying future income to creditors when it added language to section 707(b) permitting a court, with the debtor's consent, to convert an abusive chapter 7 case to chapter 13, as an alternative to dismissal. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). While the mechanical test does require future income to be used to pay creditors, that future income is measured exclusively by reference to historical income, and in some cases, like this one, it bears little relation to the actual income available to the debtor. In contrast, our interpretation permits a court to consider the actual income that can "be applied to make payments" under the plan in those cases in which a different amount of actual income is available to a debtor because of changed circumstances. The use of actual income in such cases is an important measure of fairness, both to creditors in cases like this one, in which the debtor's actual future income is greater than her historical income, and to debtors in cases like In re Lanning, in which a temporary pre-petition payment to the debtor was not reflective of the debtor's continuing income or ability to fund a chapter 13 plan.

5. In short, the Court should consider all of the language of section 1325(b)(1)(B), and not just the phrase "projected disposable income." For the reasons we have given, the language of that section, read as a whole, does not support a purely mechanical test that is never subject to adjustment in light of significant changes in income or expenses after the filing of the petition.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the district court should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,[10]

ADDENDUM – STATUTES

Current Version

⇒§ 1325. Confirmation of plan

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the court shall confirm a plan if--

(1) the plan complies with the provisions of this chapter and with the other applicable provisions of this title;

(2) any fee, charge, or amount required under chapter 123 of title 28, or by the plan, to be paid before confirmation, has been paid;

(3) the plan has been proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law;

(4) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of each allowed unsecured claim is not less than the amount that would be paid on such claim if the estate of the debtor were liquidated under chapter 7 of this title on such date;

(5) with respect to each allowed secured claim provided for by the plan--

(A) the holder of such claim has accepted the plan;

(B)(i) the plan provides that--

(I) the holder of such claim retain the lien securing such claim until the earlier of--

(aa) the payment of the underlying debt determined under nonbankruptcy law; or

(bb) discharge under section 1328; and

(II) if the case under this chapter is dismissed or converted without completion of the plan, such lien shall also be retained by such holder to the extent recognized by applicable nonbankruptcy law;

(ii) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the allowed amount of such claim; and

(iii) if--

(I) property to be distributed pursuant to this subsection is in the form of periodic payments, such payments shall be in equal monthly amounts; and

(II) the holder of the claim is secured by personal property, the amount of such payments shall not be less than an amount sufficient to provide to the holder of such claim adequate protection during the period of the plan; or

(C) the debtor surrenders the property securing such claim to such holder;

(6) the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan;

(7) the action of the debtor in filing the petition was in good faith;

(8) the debtor has paid all amounts that are required to be paid under a domestic support obligation and that first become payable after the date of the filing of the petition if the debtor is required by a judicial or administrative order, or by statute, to pay such domestic support obligation; and

(9) the debtor has filed all applicable Federal, State, and local tax returns as required by section 1308.

For purposes of paragraph (5), section 506 shall not apply to a claim described in that paragraph if the creditor has a purchase money security interest securing the debt that is the subject of the claim, the debt was incurred within the 910-day preceding the date of the filing of the petition, and the collateral for that debt consists of a motor vehicle (as defined in section 30102 of title 49) acquired for the personal use of the debtor, or if collateral for that debt consists of any other thing of value, if the debt was incurred during the 1-year period preceding that filing;

(b)(1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan--

(A) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or

(B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "disposable income" means current monthly income received by the debtor (other than child support payments, foster care payments, or disability payments for a dependent child made in accordance with applicable nonbankruptcy law to the extent reasonably necessary to be expended for such child) less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended--

(A)(i) for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent of the debtor, or for a domestic support obligation, that first becomes payable after the date the petition is filed; and

(ii) for charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3) [FN1] to a qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as defined in section 548(d)(4)) in an amount not to exceed 15 percent of gross income of the debtor for the year in which the contributions are made; and

(B) if the debtor is engaged in business, for the payment of expenditures necessary for the continuation, preservation, and operation of such business.

(3) Amounts reasonably necessary to be expended under paragraph (2), other than subparagraph (A)(ii) of paragraph (2), shall be determined in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2), if the debtor has current monthly income, when multiplied by 12, greater than--

(A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(C) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(4) For purposes of this subsection, the "applicable commitment period"--

(A) subject to subparagraph (B), shall be--

(i) 3 years; or

(ii) not less than 5 years, if the current monthly income of the debtor and the debtor's spouse combined, when multiplied by 12, is not less than--

(I) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(II) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(III) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4; and

(B) may be less than 3 or 5 years, whichever is applicable under subparagraph (A), but only if the plan provides for payment in full of all allowed unsecured claims over a shorter period.

(c) After confirmation of a plan, the court may order any entity from whom the debtor receives income to pay all or any part of such income to the trustee.

Former Version

§ 1325. Confirmation of plan

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the court shall confirm a plan if—

(1) The plan complies with the provisions of this chapter and with the other applicable provisions of this title;

(2) any fee, charge, or amount required under chapter 123 of title 28, or by the plan, to be paid before confirmation, has been paid;

(3) the plan has been proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law;

(4) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of each allowed unsecured claim is not less than the amount that would be paid on such claim if the estate of the debtor were liquidated under chapter 7 of this title on such date;

(5) with respect to each allowed secured claim provided for by the plan—

(A) the holder of such claim has accepted the plan;

(B)

(i) the plan provides that the holder of such claim retain the lien securing such claim; and

(ii) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the allowed amount of such claim; or

(C) the debtor surrenders the property securing such claim to such holder; and

(6) the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan.

(b)

(1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan—

(A) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or

(B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the three-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments under the plan.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, "disposable income" means income which is received by the debtor and which is not reasonably necessary to be expended—

(A) for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent of the debtor, including charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548 (d)(3)) to a qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as that term is defined in section 548 (d)(4)) in an amount not to exceed 15 percent of the gross income of the debtor for the year in which the contributions are made; and

(B) if the debtor is engaged in business, for the payment of expenditures necessary for the continuation, preservation, and operation of such business.

(c) After confirmation of a plan, the court may order any entity from whom the debtor receives income to pay all or any part of such income to the trustee.

§ 1325. Confirmation of plan

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the court shall confirm a plan if (*)—

(1) the plan complies with the provisions of this chapter and with the other applicable provisions of this title;

(2) any fee, charge, or amount required under chapter 123 of title 28, or by the plan, to be paid before confirmation, has been paid;

(3) the plan has been proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law;

(4) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of each allowed unsecured claim is not less than the amount that would be paid on such claim if the estate of the debtor were liquidated under chapter 7 of this title on such date;

(5) with respect to each allowed secured claim provided for by the plan—

(A) the holder of such claim has accepted the plan;

(B) ~~(i) the plan provides that the holder of such claim retain the lien securing such claim; and~~

(i) the plan provides that—

(I) the holder of such claim retain the lien securing such claim until the earlier of—

(bb) discharge under section 1328; and

(II) if the case under this chapter is dismissed or converted without completion of the plan, such lien shall also be retained by such holder to the extent recognized by applicable nonbankruptcy law;

(ii) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the allowed amount of such claim; and

(iii) if—

(I) property to be distributed pursuant to this subsection is in the form of periodic payments, such payments shall be in equal monthly amounts; and

(II) the holder of the claim is secured by personal property, the amount of such payments shall not be less than an amount sufficient to provide to the holder of such claim adequate protection during the period of the plan; or

(C) the debtor surrenders the property securing such claim to such holder; ~~and~~

(6) the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan~~.~~;

(7) the action of the debtor in filing the petition was in good faith;

(8) the debtor has paid all amounts that are required to be paid under a domestic support obligation, and that first become payable after the date of the filing of the petition if the debtor is required by a judicial or administrative order, or by statute, to pay such domestic support obligation; and

(9) the debtor has filed all applicable Federal, State, and local tax returns as required by section 1308. For purposes of paragraph (5), section 506 shall not apply to a claim described in that paragraph if the creditor has a purchase money security interest securing the debt that is the subject of the claim, the debt was incurred within the 910-day () preceding the date of the filing of the petition, and the collateral for that debt consists of a motor vehicle (as defined in section 30102 of title 49) acquired for the personal use of the debtor, or if collateral for that debt consists of any other thing of value, if the debt was incurred during the 1-year period preceding that filing.

(b) (1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan—

(A) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or

(B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the ~~three-year~~ applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "disposable income" means current monthly income ~~which is~~ received by the debtor (other than child support payments, foster care payments, or disability payments for a dependent child made in accordance with applicable nonbankruptcy law to the extent reasonably necessary to be expended for such child) less amounts ~~and which is not~~ reasonably necessary to be expended—

(B) if the debtor is engaged in business, for the payment of expenditures necessary for the continuation, preservation, and operation of such business.

(3) Amounts reasonably necessary to be expended under paragraph (2) shall be determined in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2), if the debtor has current monthly income, when multiplied by 12, greater than—

(A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(C) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(4) For purposes of this subsection, the "applicable commitment period"—

(A) subject to subparagraph (B), shall be—

(i) 3 years; or

(ii) not less than 5 years, if the current monthly income of the debtor and the debtor's spouse combined, when multiplied by 12, is not less than—

(I) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(II) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(III) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4; and

(B) may be less than 3 or 5 years, whichever is applicable under subparagraph (A), but only if the plan provides for payment in full of all allowed unsecured claims over a shorter period.

(c) After confirmation of a plan, the court may order any entity from whom the debtor receives income to pay all or any part of such income to the trustee.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

In the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, Congress enacted a series of provisions designed to "strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 17 (2005) ("House Report"). Among those provisions are the measures challenged here, which preclude attorneys from urging their clients to take on additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy, see 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), and require certain disclosures in attorney advertisements, id. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2). As we established in our opening brief, the district court erred in striking down section 526(a)(4) on its face, and plaintiffs' arguments on cross-appeal are equally without merit.

Section 526(a)(4) prohibits an attorney from advising a debtor "to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." As plaintiffs do not dispute, Congress enacted this provision in recognition of the fact that debtors frequently "load up" with new debt on the eve of bankruptcy in an effort to game the bankruptcy system. Plaintiffs do not suggest that an attorney's encouragement to amass new debt for such a purpose is protected by the First Amendment. Instead, they contend that the statute should be struck down because, in their view, section 526(a)(4) must be read expansively to encompass not only advice to engage in abusive conduct, but also advice to incur "any debts where a bankruptcy filing is considered, regardless of whether the intended course of action is fraudulent or perfectly legal." Br. 7 (emphasis added).

That interpretation is neither required by the statutory text nor consistent with Congress's purposes in the 2005 Act. Congress did not prohibit all attorney advice regarding new debt prior to bankruptcy; it prohibited attorneys from encouraging their clients to run up additional debt "in contemplation of" filing a bankruptcy petition. That choice of words is significant: as our opening brief explains (at 23-29), the phrase "in contemplation of" bankruptcy has a well-recognized connotation of abusive purpose. See, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (explaining that the phrase "contemplation of bankruptcy" typically connotes "action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding"). Congress's placement of this provision in the context of other measures that are plainly addressed to abusive conduct by bankruptcy attorneys further underscores the error of plaintiffs' interpretation. Plaintiffs cannot properly insist that the Court adopt the broadest possible reading of the statute in order to sustain their facial challenge.

On cross-appeal, plaintiffs renew their claims that the advertising disclosure requirements in section 528 violate the First Amendment, and that the "debt relief agency" provisions as a whole are unconstitutionally vague on their face. The district court correctly rejected both contentions.

As plaintiffs do not dispute, Congress enacted section 528 in response to evidence of aggressive lawyer advertisements that promised to wipe out debts, halt foreclosures, and prevent repossessions, yet failed to mention that any such relief would require a petition for bankruptcy. The disclosures provided in section 528 are narrowly drawn to address the problem identified by Congress, and they burden no more speech than necessary to advance the government's substantial interest in preventing consumers from being misled into filing for bankruptcy relief inadvertently or without adequate consideration of the consequences. Plaintiff McBride's suggestion that section 528 compels him to make false or misleading statements is itself demonstrably false.

Plaintiffs' "vagueness" claim is yet farther afield. Congress did not violate the Constitution by enacting a regulation of bankruptcy professionals that uses terms intimately familiar to such professionals. Plaintiffs' various efforts to conjure ambiguities in the statutory language do not provide a proper basis for invalidating a federal statute on its face.

Finally, pressing an argument that plaintiffs themselves elected not to renew (and have thus waived) on appeal, amicus urges the Court to hold that bankruptcy attorneys are categorically exempt from the professional conduct regulations in the 2005 Act. That interpretation disregards Congress's explicit purpose in the Act to adopt "professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." House Report at 17 (emphasis added). It also founders on the plain text of the statute, which makes the "debt relief agency" provisions applicable to "any person" who provides paid “legal representation” to consumer debtors — a category that unmistakably includes bankruptcy attorneys.

ARGUMENT

I. SECTION 526(a)(4) CONSTITUTIONALLY PROHIBITS BANKRUPTCY ATTORNEYS FROM ENCOURAGING THEIR CLIENTS TO ABUSE THE BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM.

A. Section 526(a)(4) Should Not Be Construed More Broadly Than Necessary To Achieve Congress’s Purposes.

Congress enacted section 526(a)(4) to address a specific and recurring type of abuse under the Bankruptcy Code. As discussed at length in our opening brief (at 14-21), Congress has long been aware that debtors can abuse the protections of the Bankruptcy Code by “loading up” with new debt in anticipation of filing a bankruptcy petition. See House Report at 15 (expressing concern over the continued ability of debtors to “knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief”); S. Rep. No. 98-65, at 9 (1983) (noting special problem posed by “‘loading up’ in contemplation of bankruptcy”); Report of the Commission of the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, pt. I, at 11 (July 1973) (concluding that “the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge”).

In hearings preceding the 2005 Act, Congress heard evidence that "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" had been "consistently identified" by the U.S. Trustee Program as a source of abusive bankruptcy filings. See House Report at 5 (citation omitted). Other witnesses, including bankruptcy judges, informed Congress that these problems were likely to be exacerbated by the new "means testing" provisions in the 2005 legislation, which create an incentive for unethical attorneys to encourage their clients to run up additional debt on the eve of bankruptcy in order to obtain a full discharge of their debts under chapter 7. See Gov. Br. at 18-20. It was to address such abusive practices that Congress enacted section 526(a)(4).

None of this is controverted. Plaintiffs do not argue that Congress intended section 526(a)(4) to sweep more broadly, let alone that Congress actually sought to thwart, in the district court's words, "lawful actions in contemplation of bankruptcy that benefit the debtor and creditors." 350 B.R. at 916. Nor do plaintiffs deny that Congress can properly restrict attorneys from encouraging their clients to abuse the Bankruptcy Code: plaintiffs do not suggest that attorneys enjoy a categorical First Amendment privilege to advise their clients to subvert the bankruptcy process.

Instead, plaintiffs' contention is that, irrespective of Congress's intent, section 526(a)(4) must be read expansively to encompass not only advice to engage in abusive conduct, but also advice to incur "any debts where a bankruptcy filing is considered, regardless of whether the intended course of action is fraudulent or perfectly legal." Br. 7 (emphasis added).

This gets matters exactly backwards. Plaintiffs are not entitled to insist upon the broadest possible interpretation of section 526(a)(4) in order to secure its invalidation. It is a "cardinal principle" of statutory interpretation that "where an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, the Court will construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such construction is plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Fla. Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988); see, e.g., Apache Survival Coalition v. United States, 21 F.3d 895, 903 (9th Cir. 1994). It does not matter for these purposes that plaintiffs assert a First Amendment overbreadth claim. Indeed, "[f]acial overbreadth has not been invoked when a limiting construction has been or could be placed on the challenged statute." United States v. Esparza-Ponce, 193 F.3d 1133, 1137 (9th Cir. 1999) (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 613 (1973)).

B. Plaintiff’s Sweeping Interpretation Of Section 526(a)(4) Is Neither Required By The Text Of The Statute Nor Consistent With Congress’s Purposes.

Plaintiffs’ interpretation of section 526(a)(4) is plainly not compelled by the terms of the statute. Section 526(a)(4) does not prohibit all attorney advice regarding debt incurred prior to bankruptcy, as plaintiffs repeatedly assert. Rather, Congress provided that attorneys may not encourage their clients to run up new debt “in contemplation of * * * filing a case under this title.” 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) (emphasis added).

That choice of phrase is significant. As we explained in our opening brief, the phrase “in contemplation of” bankruptcy carries a recognized connotation of abusive purpose. See Black’s Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (explaining that the phrase “contemplation of bankruptcy” typically connotes “action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding”); Gov. Br. 23-26. Indeed, Congress has previously employed the same phrase in the same sense in discussing abuses of the bankruptcy laws. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 98-65, at 9 (describing the phenomenon of “‘loading up’ in contemplation of bankruptcy,” in which “the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent” (emphasis added)); Report of the Commission of the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, Part I, at 11 (observing that “the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge" (emphasis added)).[1]

This interpretation is reinforced by the statutory context in which Congress placed the provision. Section 526(a)(4) is one of four subsections of section 526(a). The other three subsections indisputably provide rules of professional conduct designed to protect debtors from abusive practices by bankruptcy attorneys and other debt relief agencies. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(1) (debt relief agencies must perform all promised services); id. § 526(a)(2) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from advising debtors to make false or misleading statements to obtain bankruptcy relief); id. § 526(a)(3) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from misrepresenting to debtors the services to be provided or the costs or benefits of filing for bankruptcy relief). Plaintiffs urge that these sister provisions should be disregarded because the literal language of section 526(a)(4) "is not so limited to malfeasance." Br. 10. But it is a "fundamental canon that the words of a statute must be read in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme." Paul Revere Ins. Group v. United States, 500 F.3d 957, 962 (9th Cir. 2007) (quoting Wilderness Soc'y v. U.S. Fish & Wildlife Serv., 353 F.3d 1051, 1060 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc)). Given Congress's singular focus in section 526(a) on abusive conduct by bankruptcy attorneys, it is apparent that Congress did not enact, as the fourth item in this list, a sweeping prohibition on lawful and ethical attorney advice.

[1] The federal courts themselves have commonly described pre-petition debts amassed for improper purposes as debts incurred "in contemplation of" bankruptcy. See, e.g., United States v. Fox, 95 U.S. 670, 672 (1877) ("To legislate for the prevention of frauds * * * when committed in contemplation of bankruptcy, would seem to be within the competency of Congress."); In re Mercer, 246 F.3d 391, 421 n.43 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (describing "loading up" as the practice of "incurring card debt in contemplation of bankruptcy"); In re Charles, 334 B.R. 207, 222 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2005) ("It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case.").

Plaintiffs urge that these cases involved statutes dealing with fraud. Br. 6-7. But as plaintiffs themselves acknowledge, incurring debt with the intent that it be discharged in bankruptcy is fraudulent. Br. 8; see also, e.g., Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act §§ 4-5 (1984). It was hardly unreasonable for Congress to expect that, in this context, courts would construe a statute targeting actions taken by debtors "in contemplation of" bankruptcy as directed to abusive practices.

Moreover, plaintiffs make no attempt to reconcile their reading of section 526(a)(4) with the other textual indicia of Congress's intent discussed in our opening brief. We explained, for example, that plaintiffs' unbounded interpretation of the phrase "in contemplation of" would render the second half of section 526(a)(4) superfluous: if, as plaintiffs insist, the "in contemplation of" language embraces any debt incurred for any purpose, it would have been unnecessary for Congress separately to forbid attorneys from advising debtors to incur debt to pay the attorney’s own legal fees. See Gov. Br. 25-26. Similarly, we explained that the principal remedy for a violation of section 526(a)(4) is a suit against the attorney for the debtor’s “actual damages,” 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(2), a term that presupposes that the debtor has been injured by the attorney’s advice. Gov. Br. 27-28. Plaintiffs offer no response to these arguments, which underscore that Congress did not prohibit ordinary ethical attorney advice.

Plaintiffs’ expansive interpretation of section 526(a)(4) should therefore be rejected as inconsistent with the text and structure of the 2005 Act. At a minimum, it is clear that plaintiffs’ reading is not the only plausible construction of the statute. Under principles of constitutional avoidance, no more is required to reject plaintiffs’ arguments. “[A]s between two possible interpretations of a statute, by one of which it would be unconstitutional and by the other valid, [a court’s] plain duty is to adopt that which will save the Act.” Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 190 (1991) (quoting Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142, 148 (1927)).

C. Section 526(a)(4) Provides A Bankruptcy-Specific Rule Of Professional Conduct That Constitutionally Precludes Attorneys From Encouraging Debtors To Abuse The Bankruptcy Code.

Understood as a narrow prohibition against advising debtors to run up additional debt in order to subvert the bankruptcy process, there is little doubt that section 526(a)(4) satisfies the First Amendment.

Plaintiffs do not contend that they enjoy a First Amendment right to encourage their clients to file abusive bankruptcy petitions, or to load up on new debt prior to bankruptcy with the intent that the debt be discharged. As the Supreme Court stressed in Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991), attorneys are not merely agents of their clients but are also officers of the courts, and for that reason may be "subject to ethical restrictions on speech to which an ordinary citizen would not be." Id. at 1071. The Court in Gentile quoted with approval Justice Stewart's dispositive concurrence in In re Sawyer, 360 U.S. 622 (1959), in which he rejected the notion "that a lawyer can invoke the constitutional right of free speech to immunize himself from even-handed discipline for proven unethical conduct," because "[a] lawyer belongs to a profession with inherited standards of propriety and honor, which experience has shown necessary in a calling dedicated to the accomplishment of justice. * * * Obedience to ethical precepts may require abstention from what in other circumstances might be constitutionally protected speech." Id. at 646-47 (Stewart, J., concurring in judgment); see Gentile, 501 U.S. at 1071. See also Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 460 (1978) (sustaining a restriction on attorney solicitation because the government “bears a special responsibility for maintaining standards among members of the licensed professions”); Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 792 (1975) (the government’s interest “in regulating lawyers is especially great since lawyers are essential to the primary governmental function of administering justice, and have historically been ‘officers of the courts’”).

Plaintiffs do not dispute that, under the principles discussed in Gentile, Congress can lawfully regulate the professional conduct of bankruptcy attorneys, including by imposing sanctions for unethical advice. Rather, plaintiffs insist that section 526(a)(4) is not a regulation of professional conduct at all, and that Gentile is thus inapplicable. Br. 10-11. That contention is difficult to fathom. Congress expressly described the “debt relief agency” provisions of the 2005 Act as “professionalism standards for attorneys.” See House Report at 17 (debt relief agency provisions “strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases”). Section 526(a)(4) simply provides a bankruptcy-specific rule of conduct akin to Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.2(d), which states that an attorney may not “counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent.” Accord Oregon R. Prof. Conduct 1.2(c). Restrictions of this kind do not violate the First Amendment. Indeed, Rule 1.2(d) has been applied to precisely the conduct that section 526(a)(4) addresses. See Attorney Grievance Comm'n of Maryland v. Culver, 381 Md. 241, 275-76 (2004) (attorney violated Rule 1.2(d) by advising a client to obtain credit card loans with the intent that the debt be discharged in bankruptcy).

Plaintiffs argue that Congress could not have intended section 526(a)(4) as an ethical rule because the relevant conduct is already prohibited by state bar rules. Br. 8. This contention encapsulates the error of plaintiffs' argument. The fact that state bar rules already prohibit attorney advice to abuse the Bankruptcy Code is pertinent only because it underscores that Congress broke no new constitutional ground in adopting a federal rule to the same effect. Congress undoubtedly has the power to provide uniform rules of conduct for attorneys in the federal bankruptcy courts, irrespective of state law. Cf. U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 4. Moreover, section 526 supplies a new federal cause of action for aggrieved debtors to recover their "actual damages" from unethical attorney advice. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(c). The First Amendment does not bar Congress from regulating legal practice in the federal courts in this manner, any more than it prohibits states from authorizing malpractice claims against attorneys based on the content of their advice.

Plaintiffs further urge that the principles discussed in Gentile are inapplicable because that case involved public statements by an attorney in advance of a criminal trial, rather than "private, confidential speech between attorney and client." Br. 11. That distinction, however, cuts against plaintiffs here. Whatever protections may apply to public speech by attorneys on matters of public interest, it is when lawyers serve "as trusted agents of their clients, and as assistants to the court in search of a just solution to disputes," Cohen v. Hurley, 366 U.S. 117, 124 (1961), that the government's interest in preventing unethical attorney conduct reaches its zenith. See Gentile, 501 U.S. at 1071; Ohralik, 436 U.S. at 460.[2]

Nor is there any merit to plaintiff's characterization of section 526(a)(4) as an impermissible "content-based restriction on protected speech." Br. 11. Ethical rules governing attorneys and other professionals are typically content-based. Model Rule 1.2(d), which precludes attorneys from advising clients to engage in fraud, is no less a content-based restriction on speech, but

[2] Plaintiffs mistakenly rely on Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618 (1995), in urging that advice from lawyers to clients is entitled to maximum protection. Br. 5. The Court in that case stressed that, although "[t]here are circumstances in which we will accord speech by attorneys * * * the strongest protection our Constitution has to offer," the "standards and conduct of state-licensed lawyers have traditionally been subject to extensive regulation." 515 U.S. at 634, 635. Accordingly, the Court rejected a First Amendment challenge to a bar rule restricting direct-mail solicitations by lawyers. Id. at 635.

plaintiffs do not suggest that rule is unconstitutional. The district court therefore erred in striking down section 526(a)(4) on its face as "content based." 350 B.R. at 915 n.5.

Indeed, the district court's facial invalidation of section 526(a)(4) was improper on any ground: as we noted in our opening brief, the statute is undoubtedly constitutional in many of its applications, even on the district court's own broad reading. See Gov. Br. 32-34. Plaintiffs do not deny the inadequacy of the district court's analysis on this score. In particular, plaintiffs do not attempt to defend the district court's invalidation of section 526(a)(4) in its entirety, without discussing (or even mentioning) the portion of the statute that precludes attorneys from advising clients to incur yet more debt in order to pay the attorney's own fees. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4); Gov. Br. 33-34.[3] [3] In addition, as we explained in our opening brief, plaintiff McBride lacks standing to challenge section 526(a)(4), and the district court erred in enjoining the statute as applied to him. See Gov. Br. 34-35. McBride asserts that he has standing because he "meets the statutory definition of debt relief agency." Br. 16. But that fact alone is not sufficient. Section 526(a)(4) applies only to debt relief agencies who advise clients "in contemplation of * * * filing a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4); see also ibid. ("preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title"). In the complaint, however, McBride alleges that he does not "represent clients in bankruptcy matters nor does he file petitions for relief under the Bankruptcy Code." ER50 (compl. ¶ 12). He therefore lacks standing to challenge section 526(a)(4).

II. THE ADVERTISING DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS OF SECTION 528 ARE NARROWLY TAILORED TO ADDRESS A PROBLEM SPECIFICALLY DOCUMENTED BY CONGRESS.

On cross-appeal, plaintiff McBride renews his challenge to 11 U.S.C. § 528, which requires bankruptcy attorneys and other "debt relief agencies" to disclose in their advertisements the fact that they assist clients in filing for bankruptcy. McBride contends that this requirement "compels [him] to make an untrue and misleading statement in advertisements," and thus violates his First Amendment rights. Br. 17.

The district court rightly dismissed this claim. See 350 B.R. 919-21. Section 528 provides a narrowly tailored disclosure requirement that is designed to protect consumer debtors by preventing a particular type of deception documented by Congress. McBride's "compelled speech" claim should accordingly be rejected.

A. Congress Enacted Section 528 In Response To Misleading Attorney Advertisements That Promised Debt Relief But Failed To Explain That A Bankruptcy Petition Was Required.

In bankruptcy reform hearings preceding the 2005 legislation, Congress heard evidence of "increasingly aggressive lawyer advertising" that offered to make consumers' debts "disappear," yet failed even to "mention bankruptcy." See Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2003, Hearing on H.R. 975 Before House Judiciary Comm., 108th Cong. 55 (2003). One retailer testified that some of his customers, who have been misled by such lawyer advertisements, "do not even understand that they have filed for bankruptcy." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1999 (Part II), Hearing on H.R. 833 Before House Judiciary Comm., 106th Cong. 123 (1999). Indeed, as Congress was aware, the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") had issued a consumer alert in 1997 warning that many debt-relief advertisements offering to "wipe out" consumer debts, or to "stop credit harassment, foreclosures, [and] repossessions," regularly failed to disclose that such "relief may be spelled b-a-n-k-r-u-p-t-c-y." See Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998 (Part III), Hearing on H.R. 3150 Before House Judiciary Comm., 105th Cong. 90, 90-92 (1998) ("FTC Alert"). The result was that consumers were unwittingly being lured into filing for bankruptcy without an adequate appreciation of the consequences. Id. at 92. The FTC Alert remains in effect today.[4]

To address these problems, Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 528, which requires debt relief agencies to "clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement * * * directed to the general public" that the advertised services "are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title." Id. § 528(a)(3). In particular, in any advertisement offering "bankruptcy assistance" services, including any advertisement purporting to offer relief from “credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt,” a debt relief agency must:

> (A) disclose clearly and conspicuously in such advertisement that the assistance may involve bankruptcy relief under this title; and
> (B) include the following statement: “We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.” or a substantially similar statement.

Id. § 528(b)(2); see also id. § 528(a)(3)-(4); id. § 101(4A) (definition of “bankruptcy assistance”).

As the district court recognized, this limited disclosure requirement is well within Congress’s authority to enact, regardless whether it is analyzed under the general principles applicable to commercial speech regulations, see Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618 (1995); Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Serv. Comm’n, 447 U.S. 557 (1980), or under the more lenient standards applicable to mandatory disclosures of factual and other uncontroversial information in advertisements, see Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 650-52 (1985) (upholding state rule requiring attorney advertisements to disclose that “clients might be liable for significant litigation costs even if their lawsuits were unsuccessful”). See 350 B.R. at 920 (concluding that section 528 “passes constitutional muster” under either the Zauderer or the Central Hudson test).

Section 528 requires bankruptcy attorneys to identify themselves truthfully as "debt relief agencies" under the Bankruptcy Code, and to disclose that their advertised services do in fact relate to bankruptcy. As in Zauderer, plaintiffs' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal," 471 U.S. at 651, and there is little doubt that the disclosure requirement is reasonably related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors. Nor does section 528 "burden substantially more speech than necessary" to further the government's legitimate interests. United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418, 430 (1993). Indeed, as the district court noted, the statute restricts no speech at all. 350 B.R. at 921; see Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651 (emphasizing that "disclosure requirements trench much more narrowly on an advertiser's interests than do flat prohibitions on speech").

Moreover, the disclosure requirement in section 528 is directed precisely to the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services make clear that their services may in fact involve filing for bankruptcy. This targeted requirement advances the government's substantial interest in preventing the problem identified by the FTC Alert: deceptive advertisements that promise to "wipe out" debts or prevent foreclosures, but fail to disclose that such "relief may be spelled b-a-n-k-r-u-p-t-c-y." See FTC Alert, 105th Cong. at 92. As the FTC Alert explains, such advertisements have the potential to mislead consumers into filing for bankruptcy without adequately considering the implications. See ibid. (warning that "bankruptcy stays on your credit report for 10 years, and can hinder your ability to get credit, a job, insurance, or even a place to live"). It is well within Congress's authority to require reasonable disclosures in attorney advertisements to prevent such deception. See generally Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 384 (1977) (states may require attorney advertisements to include a "warning or disclaimer * * * so as to assure that the consumer is not misled").

B. Section 528 Does Not Compel McBride To Make False Or Misleading Statements In Advertisements.

McBride contends, however, that the disclosures required by section 528 are "flatly false" as applied to him. Br. 18. Asserting that he does not actually "help people file for bankruptcy relief," Br. 18, McBride argues that section 528 violates his First Amendment rights by requiring him to state: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." 11 U.S.C. § 528(b)(2)(B).

This contention fails in multiple respects. First, McBride's insistence that he does not help clients file for bankruptcy is difficult to reconcile with the declaration that he filed in district court, in which McBride states that he does "advise some clients and potential clients that they should file bankruptcy" and that "I find it necessary to sometimes advise clients to incur new debt prior to a planned bankruptcy." ER-17 (¶¶ 4, 6).[5] Congress did not violate the First Amendment by requiring attorneys who advertise bankruptcy services of this kind to state that they "help people file for bankruptcy relief." Indeed, the distinction that McBride now attempts to draw — between helping clients with "excessive debt obligations" on the one hand and "help[ing] people file for bankruptcy relief" on the other, see Br. 18 — is precisely the sort of circumlocution that Congress determined to be deceptive to consumer debtors. See § 528(b)(2) (referring to advertisements for assistance with "excessive debt").

In any event, the disclosures in section 528 apply only to the extent that an attorney actually advertises "bankruptcy assistance services" to the public, and need only be included in "such advertisement[s]." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3)-(4); id. § 528(b)(2). McBride thus has no obligation to state that he "helps people file for bankruptcy relief" except to the extent that he affirmatively advertises his bankruptcy services to the general public.

[5] At the same time, plaintiffs' complaint alleges that McBride "does not represent clients in bankruptcy matters nor does he file petitions for relief under the Bankruptcy Code." ER50.

Moreover, as the district court recognized, section 528 permits attorneys to use their own "substantially similar" disclosure in lieu of the particular statement provided in the statute. 350 B.R. at 920; see 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4); id. § 528(b)(2)(B). To the extent McBride advertises bankruptcy assistance services, therefore, he is free to modify the required statement to reflect his actual practices, so long as he makes clear that his services "are with respect to bankruptcy relief" under the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3). Nor does section 528 prevent McBride from providing additional explanation or details regarding the services he offers. The statute merely requires attorneys "to insert a two-line admonition into certain advertisements," 350 B.R. at 921, in order to ensure that debtors are not misled into filing for bankruptcy. Nothing about this requirement offends the First Amendment. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650 (disclosure requirements do not "prevent attorneys from conveying information to the public," but "only require them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present").

III. THE DISTRICT COURT CORRECTLY REJECTED PLAINTIFFS' CONTENTION THAT THE "DEBT RELIEF AGENCY" PROVISIONS OF THE 2005 ACT ARE UNCONSTITUTIONALLY VAGUE ON THEIR FACE.

Plaintiffs' cross-appeal also challenges the district court's dismissal of their claim that the "debt relief agency" provisions of the 2005 Act, 11 U.S.C. §§ 526-528, are unconstitutionally vague. The debt relief agency provisions apply to "any person who provides bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). An "assisted person," in turn, is "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $164,250."[6] Id. § 101(3). Plaintiffs urge that the Bankruptcy Code does not define terms such as "value," "nonexempt property," and "primarily consumer debts" with sufficient precision, and that consequently the entire statutory scheme is unconstitutionally vague on its face. Br. 25.

The district court was plainly correct to reject this contention.[7] See 350 B.R. at 921-22. A statute violates the Constitution if it is so vague that "it fails to provide people of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to understand what conduct it prohibits." Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 732

[7] The district court did not hold, as plaintiffs contend, that plaintiffs lack standing to assert a facial vagueness claim: the court rejected that claim on the merits. See 350 B.R. at 922. Rather, the court referred to standing and ripeness only to underscore the point that plaintiffs cannot invalidate a federal statute on its face merely by speculating about circumstances in which disagreement about the meaning of statutory terms might arise. See, e.g., id. at 921 (rejecting plaintiffs' speculative arguments as "an abstract challenge that is not ripe for review and does not demonstrate facial unconstitutionality"); ibid. ("Again, this needs an as applied challenge . . . ."); id. at 922 ("In a facial challenge, plaintiffs fail to show [that] the lack of absolute precision in the definitions encourages arbitrary enforcement.").

(2000). The "debt relief agency" provisions of the 2005 Act easily exceed that constitutional threshold. Terms such as "value," "nonexempt," and "primarily consumer debts" are accessible to any person of ordinary intelligence and, in any event, reflect concepts with which bankruptcy practitioners and other "debt relief agencies" will be intimately familiar. An entire provision of the Bankruptcy Code is devoted to defining "exempt" property, see 11 U.S.C. § 522, and the same provision expressly defines "value" for purposes of appraising such property, see id. § 522(a)(2). In this and countless other regards, attorneys such as plaintiffs must be conversant in the language of debts, asset value, and exemptions simply to assist their clients in filing bankruptcy petitions. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 521(a)(1)(B) (debtor's debt and asset schedules); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D) (duty of bankruptcy attorney to investigate veracity of debtor's debt and asset schedules). If that were not enough, the federal reporters are thick with judicial decisions elaborating the meaning of these concepts.

Indeed, while plaintiffs assert that "attorneys cannot know if their client is an assisted person because of the vagueness of the Bankruptcy Code," Br. 26, the declarations that plaintiffs filed in district court demonstrate their own facility with the statutory terms. See ER-13 (Olsen declaration) ("I routinely advise clients and potential clients that have less than $150,000 in nonexempt assets."); ER-17 (McBride, same); ER-19 (Swartz, same).

Against this background, plaintiffs cannot seriously contend that the 2005 Act is so vague that a reasonable person cannot understand what conduct it addresses. Congress used terms of common understanding in the field to define the obligations of bankruptcy professionals; it was not required to achieve scientific exactitude. "[P]erfect clarity and precise guidance have never been required even of regulations that restrict expressive activity." Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 794 (1989). "Condemned to the use of words, we can never expect mathematical certainty from our language." Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 110 (1972). See Gospel Missions of America v. City of Los Angeles, 419 F.3d 1042, 1047-48 (9th Cir. 2005); California Teachers Ass'n v. State Bd. of Education, 271 F.3d 1141, 1151-54 (9th Cir. 2001).

Nor are plaintiffs entitled to invalidate a federal statute on its face by speculating about circumstances in which the statutory terms might be ambiguous. See Br. 26-31. As the Supreme Court has explained, "[t]here is little doubt that imagination can conjure hypothetical cases in which the meaning of these terms will be in nice question." American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 412 (1950). But "speculation about possible vagueness in hypothetical situations not before the Court will not support a facial attack on a statute when it is surely valid 'in the vast majority of its intended applications.'" Hill, 530 U.S. at 733 (quoting United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 23 (1960)). Plaintiffs are free to bring as-applied challenges if and when the circumstances they imagine actually arise. See 350 B.R. at 921-22.

IV. CONGRESS ENACTED THE "DEBT RELIEF AGENCY" PROVISIONS OF THE 2005 ACT TO REGULATE ATTORNEYS AS WELL AS OTHER BANKRUPTCY PROFESSIONALS.

Finally, plaintiffs urged in the district court that, as a statutory matter, the "debt relief agency" provisions of the 2005 Act do not apply to bankruptcy attorneys. The district court expressly rejected that contention, see 350 B.R. at 911-12, and plaintiffs have not renewed it on appeal. Indeed, they have taken the opposite view.[8] Nonetheless, amicus now urges the Court to hold that bankruptcy attorneys are exempt from all of the professional conduct regulations established by the 2005 Act. See Brief of Nat'l Ass'n of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys ("NACBA Br.") at 3-10.

This Court ordinarily "do[es] not consider on appeal an issue raised only by an amicus." Swan v. Peterson, 6 F.3d 1373, 1383 (9th Cir. 1993). That principle has particular force here: plaintiffs themselves have waived the issue, and amicus has filed its own facial challenge to the 2005 Act in which its arguments can be addressed in the ordinary course of litigation. See No. 3:06-cv-00729-CFD (D. Conn.).

[8] See Br. 16 (urging that plaintiff McBride, an attorney, "meets the statutory definition of a debt relief agency and is, therefore, subject to the restrictions of Section 526(a)(4).").

In any event, the argument advanced by amicus reflects a fundamental misunderstanding of the language and purpose of the statutory scheme. Congress defined the term "debt relief agency" to include "any person" who, for a fee, "provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance," in turn, includes "providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing * * * with respect to a case or proceeding under this title," including in particular "appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another" or "providing legal representation." Id. § 101(4A) (emphasis added). By its plain terms, therefore, the statute encompasses "any person" who "counsel[s]," "appear[s] in a case or proceeding on behalf of," or provides "legal representation" to a consumer debtor in exchange for a fee — a category that unmistakably includes bankruptcy attorneys.

Congress chose this definition for a reason. As we explained in our opening brief (at 18-21), Congress was concerned not merely with abuses by debtors, but also with abuses committed by — and at the encouragement of — debtors' professional representatives in the bankruptcy system. For example, the House Report accompanying the 2005 Act cited a study that "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals." House Report at 5 (2005) (quoting Darling & Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: the Civil Enforcement Initiative, 21 Am. Bankr. Inst. J. 12 (Sept. 2002)). Similarly, in adopting the advertising disclosure requirements in 11 U.S.C. § 528, Congress heard evidence of "increasingly aggressive lawyer advertising" that offered to make consumers' debts "disappear," but failed to explain that such relief would require a petition for bankruptcy. See 108th Cong. 55 (2003). As part of "a comprehensive package of reform measures," therefore, Congress enacted the debt relief agency provisions of the 2005 Act to "strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." House Report at 2, 17 (emphasis added).

Amicus makes no attempt to reconcile its arguments with this declaration of congressional intent, and its efforts to derive a contrary purpose from the text of the statute fail at every turn.

Amicus urges, for example, that the definition of "debt relief agency" does not expressly refer to lawyers or attorneys. NACBA Br. 4-5. The definition does, however, use the term "bankruptcy assistance," which in turn explicitly includes "legal representation." 11 U.S.C. § 101(4A). Congress was not required to state, in addition, that a statute regulating persons who provide "legal representation" encompasses the very persons who provide such representation. See Heintz v. Jenkins, 514 U.S. 291, 294-95, 298 (1995) (lawyers who engage in debt collection are "debt collectors" under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, even though the statute does not specifically refer to lawyers or the practice of law); Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 787-88 (1975) (noting the "heavy presumption against implicit exemptions," and accordingly refusing to construe the Sherman Act to exempt lawyers).

Amicus speculates that Congress intended the phrase "providing legal representation" to refer only to the unauthorized practice of law. NACBA Br. 6. That contention disregards not only the statutory text, which contains no such limitation, but also Congress's explicit intent in the 2005 Act, which was to provide rules of professional conduct "for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." House Report at 17 (emphasis added).[9] [9] The opinion on which amicus relies, In re Attorneys and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005), is hardly authority to the contrary. That opinion was issued sua sponte by the bankruptcy judge, unconnected to any pending case or proceeding, and without allowing the government any opportunity to submit briefing or argument. The government appealed to the district court, which held that the bankruptcy judge's opinion was unappealable precisely because it was not an actual order in a pending case. See In re Attorneys and Debt Relief Agencies, 353 B.R. 318, 322-23 (S.D. Ga. 2006).

Amicus further contends that interpreting the 2005 Act to encompass lawyers would impermissibly invade the authority of state governments to regulate the bar. NACBA Br. 8-9. This assertion is baseless. It cannot seriously be disputed that Congress may provide rules for the conduct of attorneys practicing in the federal courts, including in the federal bankruptcy courts. See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1927; Fed. R. Civ. P. 11; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011; cf. Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32 (1991). Indeed, federal law commonly supplies rules of professional conduct for attorneys in regulatory areas that, like bankruptcy, reflect uniquely federal concerns. See, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 7245, 17 C.F.R. Part 205 (Securities and Exchange Commission); 31 U.S.C. § 330, 31 C.F.R. Part 10 (Internal Revenue Service); 35 U.S.C. § 2(b)(2)(D), 37 C.F.R. Part 10 (Patent and Trademark Office).

Amicus's reliance on the preemption savings clause in section 526(d) is misplaced for similar reasons. NACBA Br. 7-8. Section 526(d) provides that nothing in the 2005 Act shall "be deemed to limit or curtail the authority * * * of a State * * * to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A). The provisions that plaintiffs challenge create substantive rules of conduct for debt relief agencies in the federal bankruptcy system; the Act does not purport to regulate state bar admission or other “qualifications for the practice of law.” In fact, section 526(d) expressly distinguishes between restrictions on conduct and qualifications for legal practice, preempting state rules of conduct “to the extent” they are inconsistent with the federal debt relief agency requirements, see 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(1), while leaving undisturbed state bar admission requirements, see id. § 526(d)(2)(A). The preemption savings clause merely ensures that nothing in the 2005 Act will limit the ability of the states to decide who may become members of their respective bars.

Finally, amicus wrongly suggests that, notwithstanding the plain text of the statute, this Court may exclude attorneys from the scope of the 2005 Act under the rubric of constitutional avoidance. NACBA Br. 10. As an initial matter, amicus’s interpretation would “avoid” far more than plaintiffs’ constitutional arguments: its reading would exempt bankruptcy attorneys not merely from section 526(a)(4) and from the advertising disclosure requirements in section 528, but also from the many other professional conduct regulations in the 2005 Act whose constitutionality is not in dispute. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(1) (requirement to perform all promised services); id. § 527 (requirement to provide written notice of debtors’ rights and obligations in bankruptcy); id. § 528(a)(1)-(2) (requirement to prepare a written contract with clear notice of applicable fees). Congress enacted these measures precisely to prevent the "abuse of debtors by their own lawyers," In re Irons, 379 B.R. 680, 687 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2007), and amicus does not suggest that these provisions by themselves present any constitutional difficulty.

More fundamentally, the avoidance canon permits — indeed, requires — a court to adopt any permissible construction of a statute that avoids a serious constitutional question, but it does not permit a court to disregard an unambiguous expression of congressional intent. Congress enacted the debt relief agency provisions to establish "professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." House Report at 17 (emphasis added). Amicus cannot invoke the doctrine of avoidance to frustrate that purpose.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should reverse the judgment of the district court with respect to the constitutionality of 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), and in all other respects affirm.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR APPELLANTS/CROSS-APPELLEES

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

Appellants/cross-appellees the Attorney General, et al., respectfully submit this brief pursuant to the Court's June 1, 2010 order, which directs the parties to file simultaneous supplemental briefs "addressing the significance, if any, of the Supreme Court's decision in Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v.

United States, --- U.S. ---, 130 S. Ct. 1324 (2010), on the issues raised in this appeal."

The Supreme Court in Milavetz rejected First Amendment challenges to 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) and 11 U.S.C. § 528 identical to those pressed by plaintiffs here. The Court's decision requires reversal of the district court's invalidation of Section 526(a)(4), forecloses plaintiffs' principal arguments on appeal, and underscores the lack of merit in their few remaining contentions.

ARGUMENT

A. Milavetz Requires Reversal of the District Court's Invalidation of Section 526(a)(4).

The district court's conclusion that 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) violates the First Amendment is foreclosed under Milavetz. The district court struck down Section 526(a)(4) because it believed that the statute "is not sufficiently narrow to achieve the legitimate interest of preventing abuse in the bankruptcy system." Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906, 916 (D. Or. 2006). Like the Eighth Circuit in Milavetz, the district court believed that the statute could "ensnare[] advice regarding lawful actions in contemplation of bankruptcy that benefit the debtor and creditors," such as advice to use a secured loan to buy a reliable car. Ibid.; see Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz P.A. v. United States, 541 F.3d 785, 793 (8th Cir. 2008), rev'd, 130 S. Ct. 1324 (2010) (concluding that Section 526(a)(4) prohibits attorneys “from providing this beneficial advice — even if the advice could help the assisted person avoid filing for bankruptcy altogether.”).

The Supreme Court squarely rejected that view in Milavetz. Section 526(a)(4), the Court explained, does not broadly prohibit attorney advice, but “prohibits a debt relief agency only from advising an assisted person to incur more debt when the impelling reason for the advice is the anticipation of bankruptcy.” 130 S. Ct. at 1337. Such prohibited advice, the Court observed, “will generally consist of advice to ‘load up’ on debt with the expectation of obtaining its discharge — i.e., conduct that is abusive per se.” Id. at 1336; see also id. at 1338 n.6 (explaining that, under the interpretation adopted by the Court, “advice to refinance a mortgage or purchase a reliable car prior to filing because doing so will reduce the debtor’s interest rates or improve his ability to repay is not prohibited, as the promise of enhanced financial prospects, rather than the anticipated filing, is the impelling cause”). “[T]he language of the statute, together with other evidence of its purpose, makes this narrow reading of § 526(a)(4) not merely a plausible interpretation but the more natural one.” Id. at 1339.

The Court accordingly reversed the Eighth Circuit’s invalidation of Section 526(a)(4) under the First Amendment. Ibid. Following Milavetz, the Second Circuit has rejected an identical challenge to Section 526(a)(4). See Adams v. Zelotes, __ F.3d ___, 2010 WL 1960188, at *2 (2d Cir. May 18, 2010) (concluding that Milavetz "directly foreclosed" the plaintiff's First Amendment challenge).

The same result should obtain here. The district court identified no constitutional infirmity in Section 526(a)(4) apart from the issues resolved by the Supreme Court in Milavetz. Indeed, the case upon which the district court relied for its constitutional analysis, see 350 B.R. at 916 (quoting Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 24 (N.D. Tex. 2006)), was itself reversed on appeal, see Hersh v. United States, 553 F.3d 743 (5th Cir. 2008), and the Supreme Court denied review of that decision in light of Milavetz, see 130 S. Ct. 1878 (2010).

B. Milavetz Forecloses Plaintiffs' Challenge to the Advertising Disclosure Requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 528.

In their cross-appeal, plaintiffs contend that the advertising disclosure requirements in 11 U.S.C. § 528 compel speech from plaintiff McBride in violation of the First Amendment. Pl. Br. 16-19. This claim too is foreclosed under Milavetz, which rejected an identical challenge by a Minnesota law firm. See 130 S. Ct. at 1339-41. The Supreme Court held that, contrary to plaintiffs' arguments here (Pl. Br. 17 & n.2), the validity of Section 528's disclosure requirements is not governed by the Central Hudson test for commercial speech restrictions, but rather by the "less exacting scrutiny" of Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626 (1985). See Milavetz, 130 S. Ct. at 1339-40.

Under that standard, the Supreme Court explained, Section 528 satisfies the requirements of the First Amendment because the required disclosures are factually correct and are "reasonably related" to the government's legitimate "interest in preventing deception of consumers." Ibid. (quoting Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651). The required disclosures, the Court reasoned, "are intended to combat the problem of inherently misleading commercial advertisements — specifically, the promise of debt relief without any reference to the possibility of filing for bankruptcy, which has inherent costs." Id. at 1340. The disclosures "entail only an accurate statement identifying the advertiser's legal status and the character of the assistance provided, and they do not prevent debt relief agencies like Milavetz from conveying any additional information." Ibid. In addition, the Court stressed, Section 528 gives a debt relief agency the "flexibility to tailor the disclosures to its individual circumstances," provided it does so in a manner "substantially similar" to the statutory examples. Id. at 1341. Milavetz accordingly leaves no room for plaintiff McBride's claim that Section 528 violates the Constitution.[2]

C. Milavetz Underscores the Absence of Merit in Plaintiffs' Vagueness Argument.

Plaintiffs additionally argue that the "debt relief agency" provisions as a whole, 11 U.S.C. §§ 526-528, are unconstitutionally vague. See Pl. Br. 19-31. While there was no identical claim before the Court in Milavetz, the Supreme Court's opinion nonetheless underscores the lack of merit in plaintiffs' vagueness arguments. In urging that Section 526(a)(4) violated the First Amendment, for example, the plaintiffs in Milavetz argued that the provision would be unconstitutionally vague if the Court endorsed the government's view that the statute is limited to "abusive" conduct. See 130 S. Ct. at 1338. The Supreme Court rejected that contention, explaining that any such vagueness argument was "fatally undermined" by the fact that the term "abuse" appears elsewhere in the Bankruptcy Code and draws constitutionally sufficient meaning from those contexts. See ibid. (emphasizing that "[a]ttorneys and other professionals who

that consequently the required disclosures are invalid as to him. As we explained in our response/reply brief (at 21-23), this contention is without merit. Section 528 applies only to the extent that an attorney actually advertises "bankruptcy assistance services" to the public, and need only be included in "such advertisment[s]." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3)-(4); id. § 528(b)(2). McBride thus has no obligation to state that he "helps people file for bankruptcy relief" except to the extent that he advertises such services to the public. Moreover, as the Supreme Court stressed in Milavetz, the statute affords McBride the "flexibility to tailor the disclosures to [his] individual circumstances." 130 S. Ct. at 1341.

give debtors bankruptcy advice must know of these provisions and their consequences”).

As we explain in our response/reply brief (at 23-27), plaintiffs’ vagueness challenge here fails for the same reasons. The statutory terms that plaintiffs challenge as impermissibly vague – such as “value,” “nonexempt,” and “primarily consumer debts,” see Pl. Br. 25 — are not only comprehensible to any person “of ordinary intelligence,” Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 732 (2000), but also reflect concepts with which bankruptcy professionals must already be familiar from other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 522 (defining “exempt” property); id. § 522(a)(2) (defining “value” for purposes of appraising exempt property). Plaintiffs’ own declarations additionally make clear that they have no difficulty understanding the statutory terms. See Gov’t Response/Reply Br. at 25-26.

D. Milavetz Establishes That Attorneys May Be “Debt Relief Agencies.”

Finally, as discussed in our response/reply brief (at 27-33), amicus National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys contends that the statutory term “debt relief agency” does not encompass licensed attorneys. The Supreme Court in Milavetz expressly rejected that argument: “[W]e hold that attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies within the meaning of the BAPCPA." 130 S. Ct. at 1333; see generally id. at 1331-33.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should reverse the judgment of the district court with respect to the constitutionality of 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) and in all other respects affirm.

INTRODUCTION

Countrywide Home Loans Inc. has not demonstrated that it is entitled to the extraordinary relief of a stay pending appeal. Accordingly, Countrywide should comply with the bankruptcy court's reasonable order that it file a four-page worksheet with each of its proofs of claim. There is substantial evidence in the record to support the bankruptcy court's finding that Countrywide's system for servicing mortgage loans, including the loan of debtor Marlynn O'Neal, "is reckless."[1] The bankruptcy court's remedial order is a modest and warranted exercise of its discretion to regulate the adjudication of cases before it. Countrywide is not likely to prevail on appeal.

Countrywide will not face any, much less irreparable, harm if it complies with the bankruptcy court's remedial order during the appeal. Countrywide admits that its purported harm – $9,000 per year in compliance costs – is monetary. In contrast, trustees, the courts, and other Countrywide home mortgage customers face continuing harm by bearing the burden of identifying, and fighting against, Countrywide's persistent presentation of inaccurate information. The balance of harms weighs against Countrywide.

Countrywide has had ample opportunity to make its case: the liability and remedy phases of the trial below; a motion to withdraw the reference, and reconsideration thereof; and a stay application before the bankruptcy court. Although Countrywide has a right to a full review on the merits by this Court, further delay harms the public interest. Countrywide's lack of coordination and inattention to debtors' rights – problems which the bankruptcy court's order is designed to resolve – continues. On July 24, 2009, the bankruptcy court of this district sanctioned Countrywide in an unrelated case for filing a baseless motion for relief from stay. In re Barber, No. 03-40045 (N.D. Ohio filed July 24, 2009) (Woods, J.).[2] On September 3, 2009, after the stay below had expired, Countrywide filed, and then withdrew, a proof of claim that did not comply with the bankruptcy court's remedial order. The United States Trustee therefore respectfully asks this Court to deny Countrywide's motion for a stay pending appeal.

FACTS

The problems underlying this case began approximately four years ago when Countrywide failed to record correctly the short-sale of debtor Marlynn O'Neal's property at 327 Ira Avenue, Akron, Ohio that satisfied her mortgage obligation in full.

Ms. O'Neal executed a mortgage on the Ira Avenue property in favor of Ameriquest Mortgage Company in the amount of $69,300 on or about May 8, 2004.[3] McDermott v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re O'Neal), No. 08-5031 at 3 (Bankr. E.D. Ohio filed May 1, 2009) ("Liability Mem. Op.") (Attached as Exhibit 2). Countrywide was the loan servicer. Id. In April 2005, Ms. O'Neal allowed a third party, Mr. Jacob Wilhite of Faith Financial Group of Ohio, LLC to negotiate on her behalf with Countrywide when she fell behind on her mortgage payments and faced foreclosure. Id. at 4. Mr. Wilhite negotiated a $13,000 short sale with Countrywide that fully satisfied Ms. O'Neal's mortgage obligation. Id. at 4-5. Countrywide paid $5,700 to Wells Fargo and kept the balance. Id. at 8. In October 2005, Countrywide acknowledged receipt of the pay-off amount, which satisfied the claims against Ms. O'Neal, but failed to code her account as closed. Id. at 9 (reciting Countrywide's explanations for the oversight). From April 2006 until December 2006, Ms. O'Neal telephoned Countrywide at least six times to correct her account information to show payment in full so that Countrywide would stop sending her demands for payment. Id. at 10-12. That correction was never made. Id. at 13. At the liability trial, Mr. Smith, a Countrywide representative, admitted that Countrywide personnel had recognized their error, which was memorialized in Countrywide's computer system. Hr'g Tr. at 75 (4/24/09).

On April 11, 2007, Ms. O'Neal filed a voluntary petition under the individual debt adjustment provisions of chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 1301, et seq., in the Northern District of Ohio. In re O'Neal, No. 07-51027 (N.D. Ohio filed Apr. 11, 2007). Ms. O'Neal disclosed the sale of the Ira Avenue property in her bankruptcy "Statement of Financial Affairs" filed in the bankruptcy case. [Dkt #1, p. 34].

On May 1, 2007, Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. filed a Proof of Claim, No. 4-1, on behalf of Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. in which it asserted that Ms. O'Neal was indebted in the amount of $88,859.06 by reason of a note and mortgage on the Ira Avenue property. (Attached as Exhibit 3). On May 1, 2007, Countrywide Home Loans Inc. also filed an objection to confirmation of Ms. O'Neal's chapter 13 repayment plan on the grounds that she had not made provision for re-payment of the mortgage that they claimed she still owed. [Dkt #16]. The objection contained no supporting documentation. On the same day, Ms. O'Neal filed a response with documentation demonstrating that her house had been sold and that Countrywide had accepted a $13,000 short sale in satisfaction of the loan. [Dkt #17]. On May 2, 2007, Ms. O'Neal objected to Countrywide's Proof of Claim. [Dkt #19]. Instead of immediately correcting its obvious error, Countrywide waited until the bankruptcy court sustained Ms. O'Neal's objection to Countrywide's Proof of Claim on June 6, 2007. [Dkt #27]. Only then, the day before the scheduled hearing, did Countrywide "voluntarily" withdraw its objection to confirmation of Ms. O'Neal's chapter 13 plan, prompting the bankruptcy court to cancel the hearing. [Dkt. #28]. Cf. Appellant Mot. at 3 (Countrywide's representation of its actions).

On February 28, 2008, the United States Trustee filed an adversary proceeding against Countrywide for "engaging in bad faith conduct that abused the judicial process" in the Marlynn O'Neal bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. § 105(a), the court's inherent powers, and Local Bankruptcy Rule 2090-2(c).[4] Compl. of United States Trustee, McDermott v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re O'Neal), No. 08-5031 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio filed Feb. 28, 2008). After briefing on Countrywide's motion to dismiss, which the bankruptcy court denied, and its motion to withdraw the reference of the adversary proceeding under 28 U.S.C. § 157(d), which the district court denied,[5] the bankruptcy court held a trial on liability only on April 24, 2009. On May 1, 2009, the bankruptcy court found that "[a] reasonable investigation [by Countrywide] of Countrywide's records would have shown that Countrywide had no factual basis for asserting a claim in Ms. O'Neal's bankruptcy case or objecting to confirmation of her chapter 13 plan." Liability Mem. Op. at 22. The court further concluded that the Countrywide system was "designed to allow each actor in the process to act with indifference to the truth, and to rely solely on the limited information made available at each step." Id. at 21. The bankruptcy court concluded that Countrywide's conduct "was not reasonable, was reckless and is sanctionable pursuant to §105 and Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011." Id. at 22.

After the bankruptcy court heard argument on possible corrective action, it issued its remedial order on July 31 that required Countrywide (1) within 75 days to file a four-page worksheet with every proof of claim pending before its judge only; and (2) immediately begin filing the worksheet with new proofs of claim. McDermott v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re O'Neal), No. 08-5031, at 10 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio filed July 31, 2009) [Dkt #98] ("Remedy Mem. Op.") (attached as Exhibit 4). The worksheet requires Countrywide to list in one place evidence required of it by law in order to substantiate a proof of claim, such as information about the initial lender, current note-holder, payment history, and arrearage (pre-and post-petition). Id. at Ex. A, ("worksheet") (attached as Exhibit 5). Failure to attach the worksheet will result in an attorney fee sanction of at least $300. Id. at 10. The bankruptcy court's intent was to craft a narrowly tailored remedy "likely to prevent the same type of error and abuse of process that took place in this case from taking place in other bankruptcy cases." Id. at 9.

On August 10, 2009, Countrywide appealed the bankruptcy court's order and moved for a stay pending appeal. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8005. The bankruptcy court held a hearing to consider the motion for stay pending appeal on August 25, 2009. Countrywide did not present any evidence to show the harm it would face if the stay were not granted. McDermott v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re O'Neal), No. 08-5031, at 2 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio filed Sept. 4, 2009) [Dkt #114] ("Stay Mem. Op.") (attached as Exhibit 6). The bankruptcy court found that Countrywide had not demonstrated that it met the requirements for a stay pending appeal. It denied Countrywide's stay motion on September 4, 2009, a day after Countrywide filed an emergency motion for a stay in this Court.

ARGUMENT

In this district, a bankruptcy court's denial of a stay pending appeal is reviewed for abuse of discretion. City of Akron v. Akron Thermal, LP (In re Akron Thermal), No. 5:09 MC 10, 2009 WL 414669, at *7 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 19, 2009). The abuse of discretion standard in the context of a stay challenge "encompasses a de novo review of the law and a clearly erroneous review of the facts with respect to the underlying issues." Id. (citations omitted).

In order for Countrywide to sustain its burden of proof to obtain a stay pending appeal, it must show that: (1) it has made "a strong showing of likelihood of success on the merits;" (2) that it will be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) a stay will not substantially injure the other parties interested in the proceeding; and (4) the public interest lies with granting the stay. Nken v. Holder, 129 S. Ct. 1749, 1761 (2009). A stay is not a matter of right, and "the party requesting a stay bears the burden of showing that the circumstances justify an exercise of that discretion." Id. at 1760-61. Finally, the success on the merits which must be demonstrated is inversely proportional to the harm: the less damaging the harm, the stronger the legal arguments must be. Nevertheless, even if the harm element weighs heavily in favor of the movant, "he is still required to show, at a minimum, 'serious questions going to the merits.'" Am. Civil Liberties Union v. Nat'l Sec. Agency/Central Sec. Service, 467 F.3d 590, 591 (6th Cir. 2006) (edits and citations omitted) (Mem. Op.). Countrywide fails to meet the standard for granting a stay pending appeal.

A. Countrywide is Unlikely to Succeed on the Merits

1. The bankruptcy court had the power to issue its remedial order.

The bankruptcy court's remedial order falls squarely within its authority to take action to ensure the proper implementation of the Bankruptcy Code and Rules. Stay Mem. Op. at 3. In particular, Section 105(a) of title 11 gives a bankruptcy court two powers: (1) to "issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out provisions of this title;" and (2) "sua sponte tak[e] any action or mak[e] any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process." 11 U.S.C. § 105(a). This broad language allows a bankruptcy court "to do whatever is necessary to aid its jurisdiction, anything arising in or relating to a bankruptcy case." Allard v. Weitzman (In re DeLorean Motor Co.), 991 F.2d 1236, 1242 (6th Cir. 1993) (citing 2 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 105.02 at 105-03 (15th ed. 1987)).

The underlying purpose of section 105 is to give bankruptcy courts the necessary tools to prevent abuse of the Bankruptcy Code itself. Bessette v. Avco Fin. Serv., Inc., 230 F.3d 439, 444-45 (1st Cir. 2000); In re Sanchez, 372 B.R. 289, 311-12 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2007). In this particular case, the bankruptcy court found that Countrywide's system was "reckless" and caused submission of deficient and incomplete proofs of claim. Liability Mem. Op. at 21-23. Its mandated worksheet does no more than create a structure to make sure Countrywide files claims that comply with 11 U.S.C. § 501 (filing of proofs of claim), 11 U.S.C. § 502 (allowance of claims), and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 3001 (required information for a proof of claim). See Stay Mem. Op. at 5. Such an action is in complete harmony with the Code and serves to "preserve the judicial integrity" of a federal court. In re Foreclosure Cases, No. 1:07-cv-2282, 2007 WL 3232430, at *2 (N.D. Ohio Oct. 31, 2007); see 11 U.S.C. § 105(d) (allowing bankruptcy courts to take action at status hearings to "ensure the case is handled expeditiously and economically").

2. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by finding that there was sufficient evidence to justify remedial action.

The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error when it found Countrywide's handling of the O'Neal case warranted remedial action. Liability Mem Op. at 23; Remedy Mem. Op. at 8. Countrywide admits it filed a proof of claim and objection to confirmation in error. Appellant Emergency Motion for Stay Pending Appeal at 3. Given Countrywide's records, it was not clear error to find that Ms. O'Neal called Countrywide at least six times to correct her account information but that Countrywide continued to send her bills for a mortgage that she no longer had. Liability Mem. Op. at 10-13 (citing United States Trustee Exhibits 17, 23-27, 29). Nor did the bankruptcy commit an error of law when it rejected Countrywide's explanation that its actions in the O'Neal case should be excused because of a computer error. Appellant Mot. at 1. Computer mistakes are not an acceptable excuse for objecting to a debtor's plan or filing a proof of claim without legal basis. In re Wingard, 382 B.R. 892, 902 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2008) (quoting In re McCormick, 203 B.R. 521, 524 (Bankr. D. N.H. 1996) (describing computer programming error defense as a "non-starter")).

The bankruptcy court also did not abuse its discretion when it did not accept Countrywide's representations that it had acted to correct its systematic problems. Liability Mem. Op. at 21. Countrywide only offered one witness whose involvement in filing Proofs of Claim had ended a year before the hearing. Remedy Mem. Op. at 6. Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it concluded that Countrywide's assertion that "it had addressed the problems with inaccurate information . . . was simply that – an assertion without support of current credible evidence." Id.

Given the catalogue of Countrywide's missteps, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it determined that Ms. O'Neal's case was not an isolated incident but rather an example of systemic abuse. Liability Mem. Op. at 21. Ms. O'Neal's lengthy, yet unsuccessful, efforts to correct her account could reasonably allow the bankruptcy court to conclude that "under Countrywide's standard operating procedures, no Countrywide employee is expected to review the documents or the file to determine whether the documents being made available are sufficient or accurate." Liability Mem. Op. at 14. It was not an abuse of discretion for the bankruptcy court to find, given the facts of Ms. O'Neal's case, that such lack of oversight would result in more than isolated problems.

Case law supports the bankruptcy court's finding of systematic abuse. Other courts have noted Countrywide's systematic problems. See, e.g. In re Parsley, 384 B.R. 138 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008) (44 page opinion outlining misrepresentations by Countrywide and its local counsel); In re Selected Cases in Which Chapter 13 Trustee Seeks Relief Against Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 396 B.R. 138 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2008) (describing settlement agreement concerning 293 cases where Countrywide allegedly failed to properly post mortgage payments under chapter 13 plans).

Nor has Countrywide's track record improved during the pendency of this matter. In fact, a week before the bankruptcy court issued its remedial order, another judge in the Northern District sanctioned Countrywide and its counsel $3000 for filing a baseless motion for relief from stay. In re Barber, No. 03-40045, at 9-10 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio filed July 24, 2009) (Woods, J.)

(Exhibit 1). The relief ordered by the bankruptcy court in the O'Neal case is a modest step towards curbing Countrywide's systematic misconduct.

3. Countrywide's subject matter jurisdiction argument should not be revisited.

This Court does not need to consider Countrywide's argument that the bankruptcy court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to enter remedial action. This same argument was raised before, and rejected by, the district court when it considered Countrywide's motion to remove the reference from the bankruptcy court. Fokkena v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re O'Neal), No. 5:08-MC-0043 at 3-4 (N.D. Ohio filed Aug. 20, 2008) (Gwin, J.) (holding that the United States trustee's motion for sanctions did not present an issue of criminal contempt before the bankruptcy court, which had jurisdiction over the issue). It is therefore the law of this case the remedial action requested in this case is not criminal and that the bankruptcy court has the authority to order Countrywide to take action to ensure that other debtors would be spared Ms. O'Neal's ordeal. Stay Mem. Op. at 6 (stating it is "established for the purposes of this adversary proceeding that this Court has subject matter jurisdiction"); See Rouse v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 300 F.3d 711, 715 (6th Cir. 2002) (stating general rule that "findings made at one point in the litigation become the law of the case for subsequent stages of that same litigation"). As such, the district court's holding should not be "lightly disturbed." Gillig v. Advanced Cardiovascular Systems, Inc., 67 F.3d 586, 590 (6th Cir. 1995). A court has a duty to correct any erroneous decision made earlier in the litigation, meaning that any review of a previous decision of a colleague-court must be done under an abuse of discretion standard. Id.

There is no reason for this Court to revisit Countrywide's standing and jurisdiction arguments. Like the district court in this case, other courts have rejected them. For example, careful review of the language of 11 U.S.C. § 307 and the legislative history that led to the creation of the United States Trustees Program demonstrates that Congress intended to give United States Trustees a broad role to "ensure honesty and fairness in the administration of bankruptcy cases and to prevent and ferret out fraud." Walton v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re Sanchez), No. 08-23337-CIV, 2009 WL 1905035, at *2 (S.D. Fla. June 9, 2009). As no statute or case law expressly prohibits a United States Trustee from initiating an adversary proceeding, and such an ability is in keeping with the Program's broader watchdog role, standing is not an issue. Id. at *4.

Furthermore, a bankruptcy court has an interest in protecting the integrity of the judicial system against improper conduct, including creditor abuse, providing a basis for jurisdiction to order remedial action. In re Taylor, 407 B.R. 618, 636 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2009) (citing cases). Specifically, an adversary proceeding against a lender relating to an improper Proof of Claim or motion for relief from the automatic stay resulting from improperly servicing a mortgage loan falls under a bankruptcy court's "arising under" jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1334(b) and 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2). Rodriguez v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re Rodriguez), 396 B.R. 436, 448-49 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008) (denying Countrywide's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction against Debtor's claims that Countrywide improperly applied payments under the terms of the chapter 13 plan). Accordingly, this Court has no reason to re-consider Countrywide's jurisdictional arguments.

4. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding that Countrywide was on notice that sanctions under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011 were a possibility.

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by finding that Countrywide was on notice that Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011 was a potential basis for ordering remedial relief in this case. Stay Mem. Op. at 5. It is beyond dispute a bankruptcy court has the power to take corrective action under Rule 9011 for filing inaccurate claims; the issue is whether Countrywide received sufficient notice that sanctions were an option. Appellant Mot. at 12. Notice is a fact question. It is undisputed that Countrywide filed an inaccurate proof of claim and meritless objection to confirmation, precisely the conduct that Rule 9011 addresses. The United States Trustee included Local Rule 2090-2(c) in its complaint, which prohibits "unprofessional practices or conduct." Compl. at ¶ 7. This district court, when denying Countrywide's motion to withdraw the reference, concluded that the bankruptcy court had authority to mandate corrective action in part because of Rule 9011. Stay Mem. Op. at 5 (discussing the Fokkena v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., No. 5:08-MC-0043 at 3-4). The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding that Countrywide should have been aware that "Rule 9011 was in full play." Id.

B. Countrywide Will Not Suffer Irreparable Harm if the Stay is Not Granted

Countrywide alleges that it will be irreparably harmed if it is required to accurately explain and document its proofs of claim. Appellant Mot. at 16. Countrywide, however, provides no compelling evidence that it will suffer any harm from the worksheet requirement instituted by the bankruptcy court. Countrywide must show that the harm it alleges if the stay is not granted will be: (1) substantial; (2) likely to occur; and (3) supported by adequate proof. Ohio ex rel. Celebrezze, 812 F.2d 288, 290 (6th Cir. 1987) (citation omitted).

At the hearing before the bankruptcy court on the stay, Countrywide's counsel introduced no evidence to support its motion for a stay pending appeal. Stay Mem. Op. at 2; Hr'g Tr. at 2 (Aug. 25, 2009). Instead he argued that Countrywide's harm "arises by virtue of the, I would submit, unauthorized threat of sanction arising from the compulsion to utilize a form that I would submit is not authorized by statute or rule. And it further arises from the entry of the Sanctions Order [sic] without an appropriate statutory foundation." Hr'g Tr. at 17:15-21 (Aug. 25, 2009). The worksheet does not require any information that is not also required by the Code. Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not err in rejecting Countrywide's argument that the worksheet is "rule-making in disguise." Stay Mem. Op. at 6. Having to fill out a form, even if the requirement were unjustified, which this one is not, is not irreparable harm. The bankruptcy court correctly determined that Countrywide did not meet its burden on this element to demonstrate its entitlement to a stay pending appeal.

At the stay hearing, Countrywide did not present any evidence to support its contention that its costs would increase due to the need to complete the worksheet. The bankruptcy court reasonably concluded that Countrywide's harm argument was "bare allegation." Stay Mem. Op. at 7. To bolster its harm argument, Countrywide submitted a Declaration from Kelly May, Vice President, Bankruptcy, Bank of America with its motion to this Court.[6] Michigan Coalition of Radioactive Material Users, Inc. v. Griepentrog, 945 F.2d 150, 154 (6th Cir. 1991) (stating that party moving for a stay pending appeal must provide specific facts and affidavits in support of assertions that the factors warranting a stay exist). Ms. Kelly declared that it would cost Countrywide $75 per loan to file the required worksheets, resulting in a cost of $21,600 to bring existing cases into compliance and an annual cost of $9,000 going forward. Appellant Mot., Ex. D at 2. (Countrywide claims additional costs related to property valuation). It is black-letter law that financial loss alone cannot constitute irreparable harm. Celebrezze, 812 F.2d at 290 ("economic loss does not constitute irreparable harm, in and of itself") (citing Wisconsin Gas Co. v. F.E.R.C., 758 F.2d 669, 674 (D.C. Cir. 1985)).

Even if economic loss could constitute irreparable harm, these amounts at issue here are trivial. According to its Mid-Year 2009 Investor Handbook, BAC Home Loans Servicing (f.k.a. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc.) funded more than $195 billion in first mortgage loan products in the first half of 2009.[7] By comparison, the Eastern District of Louisiana, reviewing a bankruptcy decision in another case involving Wells Fargo's abusive mortgage practices, held that the $238,000 cost to conduct audits of all open proofs of claim did not constitute irreparable harm. In re Stewart, No. 08-3225, 2009 WL 1649731 at *4 (E.D. La. June 10, 2009). Countrywide cannot credibly claim irreparable harm from costs that are a fraction of that amount.

Compliance with the bankruptcy court's order will not cause Countrywide competitive harm. In fact, the remedy that the bankruptcy court chose to impose on Countrywide is modest compared to the action of other bankruptcy courts faced with similar creditor abuse by Countrywide's competitors. For example, Wells Fargo has been ordered to conduct internal audits and amend proofs of claim. In re Stewart, No. 08-3225, 2009 WL 2448054, *12 (E.D. La. Aug. 7, 2009) (affirming bankruptcy court order requiring creditor to conduct an audit and amend proofs of claim); see also Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Jones, 391 B.R. 577 (E.D. La. 2008) (affirming power of bankruptcy court to order audits if elements for an injunction are met); In re McKain, No. 08-10411, at 9 (Bankr. E.D. La filed May 1, 2009) (order instituting accounting procedures). The bankruptcy court did not err in ordering its modest and tailored remedial action.

C. Issuing the Stay Would Injure Other Parties in Interest and the Public Interest

______Countrywide suggests that the United States Trustee will not be harmed if a stay is granted. The United States Trustee is not appearing in this case in his personal capacity but as a Justice Department officer representing the United States, which acts as the "watchdog" of the public interest. Morganstern v. Revco D.S. Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990) (explaining that United States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law). The United States Trustee serves the public interest, which will benefit by requiring Countrywide to comply with the bankruptcy court's order to provide precise information in proofs of claim without further delay.

The bankruptcy court found that "The bankruptcy system, and each player in it, is served by putting an end to Countrywide's abuse of the claims process in bankruptcy and having accurate and easy to understand information sooner rather than later." Stay Mem. Op. at 10 (citing cases). The bankruptcy court's worksheet achieves this objective. Nor is Countrywide capable of monitoring itself to ensure compliance. The abatement of the bankruptcy court's remedial order ended on August 31, 2009, activating the requirement that Countrywide submit the court's worksheet with its proofs of claim. Not 48 hours later, Countrywide's local counsel submitted a proof of claim without the requisite information. In re Phillips, No. 09-53318 (N.D. Ohio filed Sept. 3, 2009) [Dkt #25] (withdrawing proof of claim). The filing was only withdrawn after the United States Trustee brought the problem to the attention of Countrywide's counsel. This incident indicates that Countrywide's system is still broken. Accurate record-keeping and filings are not optional. Remedy Mem. Op. at 6-7. The public interest will be served by insisting that Countrywide take a step towards reform by implementing the bankruptcy court's remedial order.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons given above, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that Countrywide's Motion for Stay be denied.

Respectfully submitted,

SECOND ORDER REGARDING SHOW CAUSE APPEARANCE

The is the second order by this Court concerning Order to Appear and Show Cause ("Show Cause Order") (Doc. # 58), which the Court issued on April 23, 2009. The Show Cause Order directed one or more representatives of (i) Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. and Countrywide Home Loans Servicing, L.P. (collectively, "Countrywide"), and (ii) Carlisle, McNellie, Rini, Kramer & Ulrich, Co., L.P.A. ("Carlisle Firm") (Countrywide and the Carlisle Firm collectively, the "Show Cause Parties") to appear for a Show Cause Hearing ("Show Cause Hearing") on May 21, 2009, and show cause why they should not be sanctioned for (1) violating the Order Authorizing Compromise and/or (2) taking other unauthorized actions in the instant bankruptcy case. The Court held the Show Cause Hearing on May 21, 2009, at which the Show Cause Parties were represented by counsel.

Subsequent to the Show Cause Hearing, this Court issued Order Regarding Show Cause Appearance ("First Order") (Doc. # 60) on May 27, 2009. The First Order set forth the facts concerning the chapter 7 case filed by Diane Elaine Barber ("Debtor") and the adversary proceeding (Adv. Proc. 03-04162) against Countrywide concerning various causes of action relating to Countrywide's mortgage and Debtor's residence, which are incorporated herein by reference. The adversary proceeding resulted in a settlement that, among other things, required Debtor to deed her residence to Countrywide. Although Debtor took the required action and deeded the property to Countrywide, Countrywide, through the Carlisle Firm, filed Motion for Relief from Stay and Abandonment ("Motion for Relief") (Doc. # 50).

The First Order also directed the Show Cause Parties to "provide the Court with detailed, written confirmation of their proposed and/or implemented procedural changes" that were made or were being made in response to the Court's concerns regarding the Show Cause Parties' actions in filing the Motion for Relief. The Court requested such information to determine whether sanctions are warranted.

On June 19, 2009, the Show Cause Parties filed Response to May 27, 2009 Order Regarding Show Cause Appearance ("Response") (Doc. # 62), which contained the responses of Countrywide and the Carlisle Firm. The Carlisle Firm set forth its standard practice and stated that it had instituted an additional requirement for an attorney to review all cases associated with a particular bankruptcy case prior to filing a motion for relief from stay. The Carlisle Firm attributed its error in filing the Motion for Relief in this case to "human error" when the attorney handling the case "missed" the existence of the adversary proceeding that would have rendered the Motion for Relief moot and without substantive basis. (Resp. at 2.) Countrywide described its internal procedures when an adversary proceeding is filed, which require Countrywide's Case Management Group to inform its Bankruptcy Department about (i) the resolution of adversary proceedings, and (ii) any additional actions that may be required. Countrywide also attributed the fact that it transferred Debtor's loan back to its Bankruptcy Department and "neglected to service the loan in a manner consistent with the settlement" to "human error." (Id. at 3.)

I. LAW

Federal courts, including bankruptcy courts, have both statutory and inherent authority to impose sanctions upon parties for abuse of the litigation process. Maloof v. Level Propane Gasses, Inc., 316 Fed. Appx. 373, 376 (6th Cir. 2008). "Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011, which is modeled upon Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11, authorizes a bankruptcy judge to impose sanctions upon an attorney who has filed a motion that was not grounded in fact or warranted by existing law or a good faith argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law."[1] Ibid. 11

> (b) Representations to the court. By presenting to the court (whether by signing, filing, submitting, or later advocating) a

U.S.C. § 105(a) also grants bankruptcy courts broad authority to enforce the U.S. Bankruptcy Code.[2] In re Cabrera-Mejia, 402 B.R.

335, 345-46 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2008). "In addition, all federal courts, including bankruptcy courts, have inherent powers to enforce their orders and judgments." Id. at 346.

Both Rule 9011 and 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) impose an affirmative duty upon attorneys appearing before a bankruptcy court.

> Attorneys and the parties they represent have a duty not to file, or cause to be filed, groundless or meritless claims. To this end, attorneys and their clients have an affirmative duty to conduct a minimal factual investigation into their allegations, in order to assure themselves and the court that a factual basis for their claims exists. By signing a motion, an attorney affirmatively represents to the court: (1) that the attorney has, in fact, conducted such an investigation, and (2) that a factual basis for the motion exists. When evidence contrary to his client's contentions is raised, an attorney may not simply rely on his client's word; rather, the attorney must independently assure himself that his client's claim is based on fact.

Bankruptcy courts also "have the inherent power to impose sanctions on a scope broader than that of Bankruptcy Rule 9011, including monetary sanctions." In re Zinni, 261 B.R. at 203. Whereas statutory powers to grant sanctions reach "only certain individuals or conduct, the inherent power extends to a full range of litigation abuses." Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 46 (1991). The bankruptcy "court may sanction a party that causes to be filed, through its attorney, a motion that such party knew or should have known to be baseless or wholly unsupported by fact." In re Thompson, 2003 Bankr. LEXIS 2197 at *6. A "court has inherent authority to sanction an attorney or his client when such party has acted wantonly or in bad faith." Ibid.

II. ANALYSIS

Although this Court is cognizant that humans make errors, the instant circumstances are troubling because "human error" is the asserted cause for error by both Countrywide and its counsel. Further, there is nothing in the Response to suggest that, absent the Court's action in setting the Motion for Relief for hearing, either Countrywide or the Carlisle Firm would have found their mistake and withdrawn the motion. The Motion for Relief was filed on April 2, 2009, and it was withdrawn on April 10, 2009. Although the Motion for Relief was withdrawn eight days after it was filed, the withdrawal occurred only after this Court issued Notice of Hearing on April 3, 2009 (Doc. # 52), which set the Motion for Relief for hearing on April 16, 2009.

It appears that neither Countrywide nor the Carlisle Firm conducted even a minimal factual investigation before filing the Motion for Relief. In light of the fact that Countrywide owned the property that was the subject of the Motion for Relief, the loan should have been cancelled. Countrywide had actual knowledge that it had no basis whatsoever to seek relief from stay since the property was already deeded in its name.

The instant chapter 7 case, which was filed on January 6, 2003, was more than six years old when the Carlisle Firm filed the Motion for Relief. Debtor received a discharge on May 8, 2003 - six years ago. The age of this case and the long-ago discharge were readily apparent from the face of the PACER docket of Debtor's bankruptcy case.

In response to the Show Cause Order, the Carlisle Firm represents that it has imposed an additional requirement for its attorneys to take - i.e., a review of all associated cases - before filing motions for relief from stay. This Court believes that review of all associated cases should be part of the standard review process; however, a review of the main case docket, alone, in the instant case would have alerted the Carlisle Firm that this case was exceedingly old. The age of this case and the date of discharge constituted "red flags" that should have given Countrywide and the Carlisle Firm pause before seeking relief from stay. Why would Countrywide require relief from stay in a chapter 7 case in which a discharge had been entered six years ago? The Carlisle Firm apparently made no inquiry at all to determine if relief from stay was appropriate.

Given that even cursory review by either of the Show Cause Parties would have prevented filing the groundless Motion for Relief, the claimed "human error" appears to rise to the level of systemic failure. Under the circumstances, there was nothing reasonable about the behavior of either Show Cause Party, and there was no possible proper purpose for filing the Motion for Relief. Further, the Court finds that both Countrywide and the Carlisle Firm acted wantonly and in bad faith. "Wanton acts include those that are reckless . . . . A reckless act includes one that is committed with disregard for the truth, especially when reasons to doubt the information's veracity are obvious." In re Thompson, 2003 Bankr. LEXIS 2197 at *8.

Both Show Cause Parties failed in their affirmative duty to the Court and to the process of justice. As such, this Court may impose sanctions "sufficient to deter repetition of such conduct or comparable conduct by others similarly situated." FED. R. BANKR. P.

9011 (West 2008). Other bankruptcy courts have imposed sanctions in response to similarly baseless filings: In re Thompson, 2003 Bankr. LEXIS 2197 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. April 8, 2003) (creditor and counsel jointly and severally liable for expenses, fees, and sanctions totaling $3,075.00 for single motion for relief); In re Cabrera-Mejia, 402 B.R. 335 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2008) (sanctions of $21,000.00 for 21 motions for relief); and In re Haque, 395 B.R. 799 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2008) (sanctions of $95,130.45 for 45 affidavits prepared by counsel and signed by creditor with no review).

This is not the first time Countrywide has appeared before a bankruptcy court for a baseless motion for relief from stay. In In re Parsley, 384 B.R. 138 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008), Judge Jeff Bohm issued a forty-four page opinion outlining misrepresentations by Countrywide and its counsel (not the Carlisle Firm) regarding a motion for relief. In the Parsley case, Judge Bohm declined to assess sanctions, in the "hope that [Countrywide] would reevaluate its policies and procedures in order to improve upon the accuracy of payment histories and to ensure that its actions do not undermine the integrity of the bankruptcy system." Id. at 184. The bankruptcy court further stated that it "trust[ed] that . . . Countrywide will mend their broken practices." Ibid. Countrywide's current conduct demonstrates that it has not heeded Judge Bohm's warning.

In light of all of the above, this Court finds that monetary sanctions against Countrywide and the Carlisle Firm are appropriate. This Court hereby imposes a sanction in the amount of Three Thousand Dollars ($3,000.00) as an appropriate and least severe sanction to deter further such acts by Countrywide and the Carlisle Firm. Countrywide and the Carlisle Firm are jointly and severally liable for this sanction, which is payable to the Clerk of Court within ten (10) days after entry of this Order.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

This proceeding is before the Court on the complaint of the United States Trustee alleging that Countrywide Home Loans[1] engaged in conduct that abused the judicial process.

[1] Bank of America recently acquired Countrywide Financial. On April 28, 2009, I heard on national news that Bank of America Corp. planned to retire the "Countrywide" name. According to the news report, the "Countrywide" operations will be combined with the bank's mortgage operations and will be

The United States Trustee requests that this Court enter an order pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) and Local Bankruptcy Rule 2090-2 imposing monetary sanctions against Countrywide and enjoining Countrywide from engaging in bad faith and abusive practices in connection with its preparation, verification, filing and prosecution of pleadings and proofs of claim in bankruptcy cases.

The Court held a trial in this proceeding on April 24, 2009. Appearing at the trial were Dean Wyman and Paul Randel, counsel for the United States Trustee, and Thomas Connop, Robert Folland and Jeremy Campana, counsel for Countrywide. During the trial the parties presented evidence in the form of exhibits and testimony from John Smith, Ted McClatchey, Jacob Wilhite, Donald Gaines, Ryan Kay, Jerry Edmunds, and Robert Whittington.

In addition, prior to the trial, counsel filed a list of facts which they agree are not in dispute [docket # 68] (the "Stipulations"). At the conclusion of trial, counsel agreed to the admission of Countrywide Exhibits A-Q, T, W-AA, and CC-AAA, and UST Exhibits 1-30. The Court admitted UST Exhibit 31 over the objection of Countrywide's counsel.

JURISDICTION

This proceeding arises in a case referred to this Court by General Order No. 84 entered in this district on July 16, 1984. It is determined to be a core proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b)(2)(A), (B) and (O) over which this Court has jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1334.

known by the name "Bank of America Home Loans."

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. On or about May 8, 2004, Marlynn R. O'Neal executed a mortgage (the "Mortgage") in favor of Ameriquest Mortgage Company in the amount of $69,300.00. The Mortgage was filed with the Summit County Fiscal Officer on or about May 18, 2004, under recording number 55049953. The real estate subject to this mortgage is located at 327 Ira Avenue, Akron, Ohio and is referred to herein as the "Property". See Stipulations.

2. On or about May 8, 2004, Marlynn R. O'Neal executed a "Fixed Rate Note" (the "Note") in favor of Ameriquest Mortgage Company in the amount of $69,300.00. See Stipulations.

3. Under a "Pooling and Servicing Agreement" dated as of September 1, 2004, between Park Place Securities, Inc., Depositor; Countrywide Home Loans Servicing LP, Master Servicer; and Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., Trustee, Countrywide Home Loans Servicing, LP agreed to service loans in accordance with the terms of the respective mortgage loans. Article III, Section 3.01, p. 72. See Stipulations.

4. Countrywide Home Loans and/or Countrywide Home Loans Servicing, LP serviced Ms. O'Neal's loan evidenced by the Note and Mortgage. See Stipulations.

5. On or about April 7, 2005, a "Complaint for Money, Foreclosure, and Other Equitable Relief" was filed in the Court of Common Pleas of Summit County, Ohio (the "Foreclosure Action"). The plaintiff in the Foreclosure Action was "Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. For The Benefit of the Certificateholders of Asset-Backed Pass-Through Certificates, Series 2004-MCW1 c/o Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. 6400 Legacy Drive Plano Tx. 75024." The defendants were Marlynn R. O'Neal aka Marilynn Renee O'Neal and "Unknown Spouse, if Any, of Marlynn R. O'Neal aka Marilynn Renee O'Neal." The plaintiff was represented by the law firm of Maguire & Schneider, L.L.P. ("M&S") through attorneys Jerry L. Kaltenbach and Manbir S. Sandhu. See Stipulations.

6. In the Foreclosure Action, the plaintiff sought to foreclose upon the Property. See Stipulations.

7. In response to an unsolicited mailing from Faith Financial Group of Ohio, LLC ("Faith Financial") promising help to homeowners facing foreclosure, Ms. O'Neal contacted Jacob Wilhite ("Mr. Wilhite"), one of the owners of Faith Financial. Faith Financial had obtained Ms. O'Neal's address from the files of the state court in which the Foreclosure Action was filed.

8. Mr. Wilhite follows the real estate investing system taught in seminars given by Louis Brown of Georgia. Mr. Wilhite established Faith Financial to implement the techniques he learned after attending one of those seminars.

9. Under the guise of helping her, Mr. Wilhite talked Ms. O'Neal into giving him authority to contact Countrywide on her behalf. See Countrywide Exhibit DD. Mr. Wilhite testified that from the outset his goal was to get Countrywide to accept a short sale and then sell the property to a third party for more.

10. At some point, Mr. Wilhite offered the Property for sale at a meeting of the Akron Canton Real Estate Investment Association. Mr. Edmonds, Jr. approached Mr. Wilhite and said he had a buyer for the Property.

11. On July 13, 2005, Mr. Wilhite, on his own behalf, tendered a proposal to Countrywide, offering to purchase the Property from Marlynn O'Neal for an aggregate purchase price of $5,000.00, subject to satisfaction of the Mortgage. See Countrywide Exhibit WW.

12. On or about August 17, 2005, Countrywide countered Mr. Wilhite's short payoff offer requesting a minimum payoff amount of $13,000.00. See Countrywide Exhibit YY.

13. Mr. Wilhite tendered a Standard Real Estate Purchase and Sale Agreement to Countrywide, representing he was the Buyer for the Property and Marlynn O'Neal was the Seller, for a total purchase price of $13,000.00.

14. On September 13, 2005, Countrywide approved the short payoff offer submitted by Mr. Wilhite to satisfy Marlynn O'Neal's loan for $13,000.00. See Countrywide Exhibit YY pg. 11. Mr. Smith testified that in some circumstances, Countrywide, as a servicer, does not have authority to accept short sales. However, in this case, he testified Countrywide had "delegated authority" from its investor, Wells Fargo,[2] to negotiate and accept a short sale.

15. Mr. Wilhite represented to Countrywide that the closing of this short payoff sale would occur on or about October 13, 2005.

16. In the meantime, Mr. Wilhite caused the Debtor to sign additional documents.

[2] Mr. Smith continually referred to Wells Fargo as its "investor." The Court believes the relationship between Wells Fargo and Countrywide is described better as a customer relationship: Countrywide provided services to its customer Wells Fargo and Wells Fargo acted as trustee for the ultimate holders of the mortgagee's rights under the Mortgage and Note.

Debtor, as "Beneficiary", and Faith Financial as "Trustee of the 327 Ira Ave Residential Land Trust" signed a "Land Trust Agreement"prepared by Mr. Wilhite. See Stipulations. In addition, the Debtor executed and delivered to Faith Financial an "Assignment of Beneficial Interest in Land Trust", prepared by Mr. Wilhite, conveying all her "rights, powers, privileges, and beneficial interest" under the Land Trust Agreement to Faith Financial. See Stipulations. The Debtor also executed a "Standard Warranty Deed" purporting to transfer the Property to the "327 Ira Ave Residential Land Trust, Faith Financial Group of Ohio LLC as Trustee." The Standard Warranty Deed recited it was supported by consideration in "the sum of Ten Dollars ($10.00) and other valuable consideration." The Court doubts, based on Mr. Wilhite's testimony, that that any consideration was actually tendered to the Debtor by either "327 Ira Ave Residential Land Trust," Faith Financial, or Mr. Wilhite.

17. The purported conveyance of the Property by the Debtor to "327 Ira Ave Residential Land Trust" was not disclosed to Countrywide by Marlynn O'Neal, Faith Financial, or Mr. Wilhite. This deed was recorded on or about September 19, 2005, with the Summit County Fiscal Officer under recording number 55235443.

18. On September 19, 2005, Mr. Wilhite, as "Agent of Faith Financial Group of Ohio, LLC as Trustee" caused to be filed with the Summit County Fiscal Officer, under recording number 95157756, a "Statement of Reason for Exemption from Real Property Conveyance Fee" regarding the transaction referenced in the September 14, 2005 Standard Warranty Deed. See Stipulations. According to the "Statement of Reason for Exemption from Real Property Conveyance Fee," the purported conveyance of the Property to "Faith Financial as Trustee" was represented to be "exempt from the fees required by division (F)(3) section 319.54 of the Revised Code of Ohio, for the reason checked below." The reason checked by Mr. Wilhite was because the transfer was: "to a trustee of a trust, when the grantor of the trust has reserved an unlimited power to revoke the trust." Other than its filing in the public records, the "Statement of Reason for Exemption from Real Property Conveyance Fee" was not disclosed to Countrywide by Marlynn O'Neal, Faith Financial, or Mr. Wilhite.

19. On or about October 11, 2005, Marlynn R. O'Neal executed a "Warranty Deed" in which deed the grantor is listed as the "327 Ira Avenue Land Trust, Faith Financial Group of Ohio, LLC, Trustee" and the grantee is identified as "Donald Gaines." The real estate subject to this deed is located at 327 Ira Avenue, Akron, Ohio. The deed was recorded with the Summit County Fiscal Officer on or about February 6, 2006 under recording number 52285575. Mr. Gaines paid $70,000.00 for the transfer of this real estate. See Stipulations.

20. The fact Donald Gaines was the purchaser of the Property was not disclosed to Countrywide prior to closing by Marlynn O'Neal, Faith Financial, or Mr. Wilhite.

21. On or about October 11, 2005, Bankers Title & Escrow Agency, Inc. ("Bankers Title"), as Settlement Agent, received $70,006.19 in deposits for the conveyance of the Property to Donald Gaines. Jared Pauley was the agent from Bankers Title responsible for this transaction. Bankers Title distributed the proceeds from the sale as set forth on Countrywide Exhibit JJ.

22. Based on Mr. Wilhite's remark that "If Ms. O'Neal was in foreclosure and she was losing the property anyways, why would she want any money from it?" the Court believes that Ms. O'Neal did not receive any of the proceeds from the sale.

23. In contrast, Faith Financial received $15,000. Countrywide Exhibit II. Easy Home Construction, a company owned by Mr. Edmonds, received $33,333.01. Countrywide Exhibit NN. Easy Home Construction did not perform $33,000 worth of work on the Property. Bankers Title received $5,037.50. Countrywide Exhibits MM and OO.

24. Countrywide received $13,000 from the sale of the Property. See Countrywide Exhibit JJ. Bankers Title did not request a lien release from Countrywide. At the conclusion of its "claims process," Countrywide paid $5,700 of these proceeds to Wells Fargo and retained the balance for fees that it claimed under the Servicing Agreement.

25. Countrywide's files contain two copies, sent to it by facsimile, of what purport to be HUD-1 Statements showing a contract sale price for the Property of $13,000 and not listing any of the settlement amounts disbursed by Bankers Title. The last page of these documents bear the signatures of Marlynn O'Neal and Donald Gaines. Based on the testimony of Donald Gaines, the Court doubts whether the first two pages, as they appear in Countrywide's files, were attached to the third page at the time it was signed. See Countrywide Exhibits UU and VV.

26. Presumably the original HUD-1 Statements would be contained in Bankers Title's closing file. However, the closing file at Bankers Title pertaining to this matter is missing. Mr. Kay testified that the records of Bankers Title reflect the existence of a closing file, but a notation in the records shows possession of the file was given to

"Madelyn O'Neal for copies."

27. On or about October 28, 2005, Kevin Kilker at Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. acknowledged receipt of the payoff amount in the amount of $13,000.00, and sent a closing note to Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. personnel. The workout status on Countrywide Home Loans, Inc.'s records was also changed to closed. UST Exhibit 15, "CHL-ONEAL 001186." Mr. Kilker further instructed Deanna to "issue a reconveyance on this short sale" and he instructed Kristin to "update the borrower's credit report." UST Exhibit 16, "CHL-ONEAL 001482." Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. did not cause any notation to be made on the Note showing that it had been paid in full. UST Exhibit 2.

28. On January 18, 2006, a "Notice of Dismissal" was filed in the Foreclosure Action. M&S through attorney Manbir S. Sandhu filed this notice. See Stipulations.

29. Following Countrywide's acceptance of the short sale funds, Ms. O'Neal's loan account was not properly coded to indicate within Countrywide's records that the loan was inactive. Countrywide continued to send statements to Ms. O'Neal, to cause forced placed insurance to be in place, purportedly had the lawn mowed, and purportedly did drive by inspections of the property even after accepting the short sale.

30. Mr. Smith testified that "Lock Out Code 3" was assigned to Ms. O'Neal's loan account signifying a property has been foreclosed upon or conveyed to a third party. However, the account remained active on Countrywide's system because the "claims process" between Countrywide and Wells Fargo had not been completed.

31. Ms. O'Neal contacted Countrywide many times following its acceptance of the short sale to inquire why she was continuing to get bills from Countrywide. Countrywide's AS 400 system reflects these inquiries. See, e.g., UST Exhibit 17.

32. In response to the inquiry from Ms. O'Neal on April 24, 2006, Samuel Cooper of Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. sent an e-mail to Pedro Elizalde and Kristin Bradley of Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. in which he stated:

"Hello, H/O [homeowner] called in wanted to know why she is still getting bills for mort payments. Loan notes showed we recvd funds for approved SPO but loan is still opened on the books. Can one of you look into this?"

UST Exhibit 18, "CHL-ONEAL 001622"

33. On April 24, 2006, Kristin Bradley of Countywide Home Loans, Inc. sent an e-mail to Kevin Kilker, with a copy to Samuel Cooper and Pedro Elizalde under the caption in part: "Loan . . . SPO Sale Loan still open" in which she stated:

"This shortsale was completed back in October 05 but the homeowner is still receiving bills for mortgage payments. Do you know if there is a way to fix this? Please let me know as soon as possible.

UST Exhibit 19, "CHL-ONEAL 001623"

34. On April 24, 2006, Kevin Kilker of Countywide Home Loans, Inc. sent an e-mail to Sarah Galvan of Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. under the caption: "Fw Loan . . . . SPO Sale Loan still open," in which he stated:

"Sarah. Do you know how to prevent this?

UST Exhibit 26, "CHL-ONEAL 001283."

40. On December 6, 2006, Ms. O'Neal had a telephone conversation with Porshi Jones at Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. The notes of this call state:

"States this loan was paid off 10/14/2005. Sending the proof of bank wire and the loa. Sent lotus note to S. Galvan to get a status update."

41. On December 11, 2006, Kristin Bradley sent an e-mail to Sarah Galvan, with copies to Jomo Kenyatta, Peter Otero and Porshi Jones under the caption "Re . . . Short Sale, O'Neal, P. Otero" in which she stated:

I updated everything to reflect as a shortsale, I'm just waiting for investor reimbursement for supplemental fees. Hopefully it will be fully closed out by the end of the year.

42. On December 11, 2006, Ms. O'Neal had a telephone conversation with Porshi Jones at Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. The notes of this call state:

"Called Mrs advised the short sale was completed in 10/2005. Advised waiting for investor information before the loan could be closed. It should be closed out by the end of the year. Advised will submit credit correction from October 2005-to 12/2006. Attempted to submit credit correction, System shows not reported. will no change status."

UST Exhibit 29, "CHL-ONEAL001288."

43. On February 8, 2007, Wendy Scharf of Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. noted in the

Countrywide system that she had "reviewed loan, suppl funds still pending." UST Exhibit 30, "CHL-ONEAL 001299."

44. Notwithstanding these repeated inquiries, Countrywide did not properly correct its records to show that Countrywide had accepted $13,000 in full satisfaction of Ms. O'Neal's loan.

45. Ultimately, the claim process concluded resulting in over $7,000 in fees being attributed to Countrywide and less than $6,000 of the $13,000 payment being attributed to Wells Fargo.

46. On or about April 10, 2007, Marlynn R. O'Neal filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code with the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Ohio. She was represented by Robert M. Whittington, Jr. Under the fee agreement between Mr. Whittington and the Debtor, the Debtor promised to pay $2,000 through her plan for basic bankruptcy services.

47. Along with the petition, Ms. O'Neal also filed schedules and a statement of financial affairs. Ms. O'Neal did not identify owning any real estate in "Schedule A" because at the time she filed her bankruptcy case, she did not hold record title to the Property. In her "Statement of Financial Affairs, Ms. O'Neal identified a transfer on September 15, 2005 of real estate located at 327 Ira Avenue, Akron, Ohio to the "Faith Financial Trust dba 327 Ira Ave. Residential Land Trust." Statement of Financial Affairs, response to question number 10(a). Ms. O'Neal did not list any other transfers in her "Statement of Financial Affairs."

48. Ms. O'Neal appropriately did not schedule Countrywide Home Loans Inc.,

Ameriquest Mortgage Company or Wells Fargo Bank as creditors.

49. Although not listed as a creditor, Countrywide somehow became aware of the Debtor's bankruptcy case. Notwithstanding the acceptance of a short sale and the alleged designation of Ms. O'Neal's loan account as "Lockout Code 3," and the numerous entries in the loan history kept by Countrywide revealing that Ms. O'Neal's loan account was only open because the "claims process" was incomplete, a "bankruptcy technician" at Countrywide referred Ms. O'Neal loan account to M&S for the purpose of representing Countrywide in Ms. O'Neal's bankruptcy case.

50. Although all of the details of the arrangement were not provided to the Court, generally Countrywide and M& S had an arrangement whereby emails would be sent to M&S identifying new matters. Instructions for the scope of the representation with respect to the matter would be contained in the email and documents deemed by Countrywide to be relevant to the representation would be made available on a business partner web site. The documents made available by Countrywide are automatically uploaded to the website upon initiation of the referral. Apparently under Countrywide's standard operating procedures, no Countrywide employee is expected to review the documents or the file to determine whether the documents being made available are sufficient or accurate.[3] The attorneys to whom the matters

[3] Mr. Smith testified that the placement of Lock Out Code 3 on Ms. O'Neal's loan account should have resulted in the bankruptcy technician reviewing the file and escalating it to management for further review. In this case, however, as seems consistent with Countrywide's inability to correctly follow its internal operating procedures with respect to Ms. O'Neal's loan account, the bankruptcy technician purportedly did not review the file or escalate it to management. Instead, the are referred don't have access to any other documents through the website.

51. In this case, Ms. O'Neal's loan account was referred to M&S by email instructing M&S to file a proof of claim and objection to confirmation on behalf of Countrywide, as servicer. The Mortgage and Note were made available to M&S on the business partner web site. The loan history, including the notes captured by Countrywide's AS 400 system, were not.

52. On May 1, 2007, a Proof of Claim was filed in Ms. O'Neal's bankruptcy case on behalf of Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. by Ted P. McClatchey, Esq., then an associate with the law firm of M&S. At the time he filed the Proof of Claim Mr. McClatchey had not reviewed the foreclosure file in his law firm. He only reviewed those documents made available on the business partner web site.

53. The Proof of Claim form indicates that the name and address where notices should be sent is:

Wells Fargo Bank, N.A.
c/o Countrywide Home Loans, Inc.
7105 Corporate Drive, PTX B-209
Plano, TX 75024

The "Proof of Claim" states that the amount of $88,859.06 was due at the time the case was filed and that the amount of $88,859.06 represented a secured claim. The collateral purportedly securing the claim was described as the Property and the "Proof of Claim" states that there was a pre-petition arrearage in the amount of $19,474.30. The Proof of Claim further stated in paragraph 6 that "The amount of all payments on bankruptcy technician referred the matter directly to an attorney.

this claim has been credited and deducted for the purpose of making this proof of claim." UST Exhibit 8-1.

54. Exhibit A to the "Proof of Claim" consists of a "Proof of Claim Calculation." This attachment alleges that the principal balance owed was in the amount of $69,111.76 and that there were 28 payments in the amount of $696.55 each, for an arrearage of $19,503.40. This exhibit alleges that the total amount due is $88,859.06. UST Exhibit 8-2.

55. A copy of the Note was attached to the Proof of Claim.

56. A copy of the Mortgage was also attached to the Proof of Claim.

57. No assignment or other evidence of transfer of the Note and Mortgage from Ameriquest Mortgage Company was attached to the Proof of Claim.

58. Ted P. McClatchey also filed an "Objection To Confirmation of Chapter 13 Plan" (the "Objection to Confirmation") on behalf of Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. UST Exhibit 9. The Objection to Confirmation asserts that the Debtor's plan fails to properly provide for its secured claim.

59. The debtor, through her attorney Robert M. Whittington, Jr. filed a response to the Objection to Confirmation and an "Objection To Allowance of Claim" (the "Claim Objection"). UST Exhibit 10 and 11, respectively. The debtor stated that she conveyed the Property on September 14, 2005 and that Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. "accepted a short-sale payment of $13,000.00 in satisfaction of its interest" in the Property and that Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. was paid out of escrow from the sale.

60. On June 6, 2007, the Court entered an "Order Sustaining Objection to Allowance of Claim." Doc. 27. On June 6, 2007, Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. withdrew the Objection to Confirmation. Doc. 28

61. On June 18, 2007, the Court confirmed debtor's plan. Doc. 30

62. In March 2008, Ms. O'Neal passed away.

63. It was not until July 25, 2008 that an assignment was filed with the Summit County recorder's office showing an assignment from "Ameriquest Mortgage Company" to "Wells Fargo Bank N.A. For The Benefit of Certificate Holders of Asset-Backed." The recording number for this document is 55560031. This assignment is dated June 30, 2008. The mortgage that is the subject of this assignment is the mortgage in favor of Ameriquest Mortgage Company executed by the debtor on or about May 8, 2004. This assignment includes the provision that the mortgage is assigned:

> Together with the Note or Notes therein described or referred to, the money due or to become due thereon with interest, and all rights accrued or to accrue under said Mortgage.

UST Exhibit 31.

DISCUSSION

The findings of fact in this case plainly give rise to many additional questions and issues, only some of which are germane to the dispute pending before this Court. The dispute before the Court centers around the acts of Countrywide that ultimately resulted in the filing of a proof of claim and objection to confirmation in Ms. O'Neal's bankruptcy case that had no basis in fact.

The UST argues that Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. was reckless and acted in bad faith in this case. He points to (1) the filing of a Proof of Claim and Objection To Confirmation of Plan when Countrywide knew that it had accepted a short-sale payoff from Ms. O'Neal in October, 2005; (2) the filing of the Proof of Claim and Objection To Confirmation even though Ms. O'Neal had telephoned Countrywide Home Loan, Inc. repeatedly in 2006 to complain of ongoing receipt of statements showing a growing delinquency after that short sale closing; (3) the filing of the "Proof of Claim and Objection To Confirmation of Plan on behalf of Wells Fargo, N.A. when there had been no assignment of mortgage filed with the Summit County Fiscal Officer of the Mortgage from Ameriquest Mortgage Company to Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. Trustee Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., under that certain Servicing Agreement relating to Park Place Securities, Inc., 2004-MCW1 Asset Back Pass Through Certificates, Series 2004-MCW1 prior to the filing of the Proof of Claim and Objection To Confirmation were filed by Countrywide Home Loans, Inc.; (4) the incorrect statement made by Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. in the Proof of Claim when it stated that all credits had been deducted from the amount it said was owed; and (5) the filing of the satisfaction of Ms. O'Neal's mortgage on or about July 25, 2008 when Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. had accepted the short- sale payoff in October, 2005. Countrywide denies that these acts are evidence of reckless, intentional or bad faith behavior. In addition, Countrywide denies a systemic problem. Countrywide suggests that at most is was negligent and that its errors are off set by Ms. O'Neal's involvement with Faith Financial.

It is undisputed that the Court has inherent authority to sanction a party. Red Carpet Studios Division of Source Advantage v. Sater, 465 F. 3d 642, 645 (6th Cir. 2006), reh'g denied January 17, 2007; In re Workman, 392 B.R. 189, 194 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2007)(Court has inherent authority to sanction party).

> Federal courts, including bankruptcy courts, have inherent and statutory authority to impose sanctions upon parties for their abuse of the litigation process. See Rathbun v. Warren City Schools (In re Ruben), 825 F.2d 977, 982-84 (6th Cir.1987). In particular, 28 U.S.C. § 1927 provides that "[a]ny attorney or other person admitted to conduct cases in any court of the United States or any Territory thereof who so multiplies the proceedings in any case unreasonably and vexatiously may be required by the court to satisfy personally the excess costs, expenses, and attorneys' fees reasonably incurred because of such conduct." Likewise, Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011, which is modeled upon Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11, authorizes a bankruptcy judge to impose sanctions upon an attorney who has filed a motion that was not grounded in fact or warranted by existing law or a good faith argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law.[fn omitted] See Fed. R. Bankr.P. 9011(b)-(c). The test for imposing such sanctions is "whether the individual's conduct was reasonable under the circumstances." In re Downs, 103 F.3d at 481; see also Ruben, 825 F.2d at 984 ("[T]he standard for section 1927 determinations in this circuit is an objective one, entirely different from determinations under the bad faith rule.... There must be some conduct on the part of the subject attorney that trial judges, applying the collective wisdom of their experience on the bench, could agree falls short of the obligations owed by a member of the bar to the court and which, as a result, causes additional expense to the opposing party."). In applying this test, the bankruptcy court should not rely on the benefit of hindsight, but rather should assess the party's conduct by what was reasonable to believe at the time the motion was submitted. In re Downs, 103 F.3d at 481 (quoting McGhee v. Sanilac County, 934 F.2d 89, 93 (6th Cir.1991)).

Maloof v. Level Propane Gasses, Inc. (In re Level Propane Gasses, Inc.), 2008 WL 2952779 (6th Cir. July 30 2008); see also Followell v. Mills, 2009 WL 723132 (6th Cir. March 18, 2009) (finding bad faith is not a prerequisite to an award of sanction under either Rule 9011 or § 1927 and reckless conduct to be sufficient to support such an award). Rule 9011(c) provides the Court with the ability to sanction the party responsible for the Rule 9011(b) violation. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9011(c) ("If after notice and a reasonable opportunity to respond, the court determines that subdivision (b) has been violated, the court may ... impose an appropriate sanction upon the attorneys, law firms, or parties that have violated subdivision (b) or are responsible for the violation.")

> [C]ourts have utilized their inherent authority to prevent and sanction abuses of judicial power. See In re Courtesy Inns, Ltd., 40 F.3d at 1090 (bankruptcy court had inherent authority to sanction debtor's president for bad faith filing of bankruptcy petition); Engel v. Bresset (In re Engel), 246 B.R. 784, 789-90 (Bankr.M.D.Pa.2000)(§ 105 authorizes bankruptcy court to exercise its inherent powers to sanction attorney's bad faith filing of inaccurate schedules); First Fed. Sav. and Loan Ass'n of Largo v. Froid (In re Froid), 106 B.R. 293, 296 (Bankr.M.D.Fla.1989) (power to correct abusive practices acknowledged but no sanctions entered against creditor who filed and prosecuted discharge complaint); Mortgage Mart, Inc. v. Rechnitzer (In re Chisum), 68 B.R. 471, 473 (9th Cir. BAP 1986) (recognizing power of bankruptcy court to impose sanctions on parties and counsel who willfully abuse the judicial process, but not finding sanctions appropriate against debtor and his attorney for their repeated bankruptcy filings).

Kerney v. Capital One Financial Corp. (In re Sims), 278 B.R. 457, 481 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2002) (finding a complaint alleging a creditor "knowingly and willingly" and "systematic[ally]" filed claims in excess of the amounts to which it was entitled in chapter 13 proceedings nationwide withstands motion to dismiss); see also In re Kilgore, 253 B.R. 179 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2000) (Court imposed sanctions under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 and 11 U.S.C. § 105 upon mortgagee which Court noted was sophisticated creditor. The basis for the sanctions was inaccurate representations by creditor in support of motion for relief from stay); In re Fagan, 376 B.R. 81 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007)(Court imposed sanctions even though creditor withdrew motion for relief from stay).

The test for imposing such sanctions is "whether the individual's conduct was reasonable under the circumstances," or was reckless. See In re Downs, 103 F.3d at 481; Ruben, 825 F.2d at 984; and Followell v. Mills, 2009 WL 723132. A party is reckless when it "knows, or has reason to know . . . of facts which create a high degree of risk of . . . harm to another, and deliberately proceeds to act, or fail to act, in conscious disregard of, or indifference to, that risk." Exxon Shipping Company v. Baker, 128 S. Ct. 2605, 2622, 171 L. Ed. 2d 570, 76 U.S. 4603 (2008)(quoting with approval from 2 Restatement (Second) Torts, Section 550, Comment a, pp. 587-588). Countrywide's system is reckless. It appears to me designed to allow each actor in the process to act with indifference to the truth, and to rely solely on the limited information made available at each step. It is no defense that the actors in the process made mistakes, the system allows those mistakes to be hidden from the view of the next actor in the chain; thereby encouraging this type of error, or at a minimum, delaying the discovery of these errors. The errors in this case were plentiful, from the failure to properly account for the receipt of short sale funds to the failure to correctly identify the holder of the Note and Mortgage. They evidence Countrywide's disregard for diligence and accuracy. The cumulative impact of each of the errors in this case rises to the level of sanctionable conduct in this case.

Regular players in the system, like Countrywide, regardless of the name under which they do business, should be able to (and should be required to) maintain accurate records and provide their counsel with information capable of being relied upon. See 253 B.R. at 190-191 (The broad language of § 105, granting bankruptcy courts the power to prevent abuse of the judicial process, encompasses the court's authority to sanction a creditor for its misconduct in providing its attorney with incorrect information.). In the context of matters relating to the automatic stay, the bankruptcy court in the District of South Carolina sanctioned a creditor for failure to maintain and provide accurate information to counsel. Id.

> The court must expect that parties, especially sophisticated creditors, base such motions on a proper factual basis and at least accurately represent the > state of their own records. More and more frequently, in these days of national lenders and frequent assignments of notes and mortgages, this Court is confronted with creditors who file relief from stay motions asserting that debtors are in arrears when in fact, after a reasonable inquiry, it appears that they are current in their payments. Such a lack of diligence by the creditors is not only a problem for the Court and the debtors, who can not only least afford the additional costs in attorney's fees but whose reorganization in some cases is dependent upon the retention of the collateral which is the subject of such motions, but is also even a problem for the creditors' attorneys that file these motions. To effectively be able to prosecute these motions and represent the truth of the matter alleged, these attorneys must be able to rely upon their clients and the information provided to them.

> In re Asbill, C/A No. 98-05819-W (Bankr.D.S.C.02/01/1999); aff'd C/A No. 3:99-0773-19 (D.S.C.02/23/2000).

With respect to Countrywide's argument that its errors are somehow off set by the actions of Ms. O'Neal in this case, the Court is entirely unpersuaded. There is no evidence in the record to support that Ms. O'Neal was other than a victim of a predator whose business operations are enabled by and depend upon a mortgage servicing industry that is unconcerned with the accuracy of records and information. Mr. Wilhite's testimony that the effect of his actions were of no consequence because Ms. O'Neal "was in foreclosure and she was going to lose the house anyways" underscores this point.

A reasonable investigation of Countrywide's records would have shown that Countrywide had no factual basis for asserting a claim in Ms. O'Neal's bankruptcy case or objecting to confirmation of her chapter 13 plan. Countrywide's conduct was not reasonable, was reckless and is sanctionable pursuant to § 105 and Rule 9011.

Having determined that Rule 9011 and § 105 have been violated, the next question for the Court is what are the appropriate sanctions for Countrywide's violations. Monetary sanctions may be appropriate, but the Court will also consider sanctions sufficient to deter repetition of this conduct or comparable conduct by others, including how Countrywide can modify its internal practices to ensure the accuracy of its filings in future bankruptcy cases. Therefore, a trial with respect to the issue of sanctions shall be held on May 11, 2009 at 9:30 a.m. in the Bankruptcy Courtroom, Second Floor, U.S. Courthouse and Federal Building, 2 South Main Street, Akron, Ohio.

In addition, a telphonic pre-trial conference shall be held on May 5, 2009 at 10:30 a.m.

1. BORROWER'S PROMISE TO PAY

In return for a loan that I have received, I promise to pay U.S. $ 69,300.00 (this amount is called "principal"), plus interest, to the order of the Lender. The Lender is Ameriquest Mortgage Company .

I understand that the Lender may transfer this Note. The Lender or anyone who takes this Note by transfer and who is entitled to receive payments under this Note is called the "Note Holder."

2. INTEREST

Interest will be charged on unpaid principal until the full amount of principal has been paid. I will pay interest at a yearly rate of 9.990 %.

The interest rate required by this Section 2 is the rate I will pay before and after any default described in Section 6(B) of this Note.

3. PAYMENTS

(A) Time and Place of Payments

I will pay principal and interest by making payments every month.
I will make my monthly payments on the first day of each month beginning on July 1, 2004.

I will make these payments every month until I have paid all of the principal and interest and any other charges described below that I may owe under this Note. My monthly payments will be applied to interest before principal. If, on June 1, 2034, I still owe amounts under this Note, I will pay those amounts in full on that date, which is called the "Maturity Date."

I will make my monthly payments at: 505 City Parkway West, Suite 100, Orange, CA 92868 or at a different place if required by the Note Holder.

(B) Amount of Monthly Payments

My monthly payments will be in the amount of U.S. $607.65.

4. BORROWER'S RIGHT TO PREPAY

I may repay this Note at any time as provided for in this paragraph. If within the first 3.00 year(s), I prepay in any 12 month period an amount exceeding 20% of the original principal balance under this Note, I will pay a prepayment charge to Note Holder equal to one percent (1%) of the original principal amount of the mortgage.

5. LOAN CHARGES

If a law, which applies to this loan and which sets maximum loan charges, is finally interpreted so that the interest or other loan charges collected or to be collected in connection with this loan exceed the permitted limits, then; (i) any such loan charged shall be reduced by the amount necessary to reduce the charge to the permitted limit; and (ii) any sums already collected from me which exceeded permitted limits will be refunded to me. The Note Holder may choose to make this refund by reducing the principal I owe under this Note or by making a direct payment to me. If a refund reduces principal, the reduction will be treated as a partial prepayment.

6. BORROWER'S FAILURE TO PAY AS REQUIRED

(A) Late Charges for Overdue Payments

If the Note Holder has not received the full amount of any monthly payment by the end of fifteen calendar days after the date it is due, I will pay a late charge to the Note Holder. The amount of the charge will be 5.000 % of my overdue payment of principal and interest. I will pay this late charge promptly but only once on each late payment.

(B) Default

If I do not pay the full amount of each monthly payment on the date it is due, I will be in default.

(C) Notice of Default

If I am in default, the Note Holder may send me a written notice telling me that if I do not pay the overdue amount by a certain date, the Note Holder may require me to pay immediately the full amount of principal which has not been paid and all the interest that I owe on that amount. That date must be at least 30 days after the date on which the notice is delivered or mailed me.

(D) No Waiver by Note Holder

Even if, at a time when I am in default, the Note Holder does not require me to pay immediately in full as described above, the Note Holder will still have the right to do so if I am in default at a later time.

(E) Payment of Note Holder's Costs and Expenses

If the Note Holder has required me to pay immediately in full as described above, the Note Holder will have the right to be paid back by me for all its costs and expenses in enforcing this Note to the extent not prohibited by applicable law. Those expenses include, for example, reasonable attorney's fees.

7. GIVING OF NOTICES

Unless applicable law requires a different method, any notice that must be given to me under this Note will be given by delivering it or by mailing it by first class mail to me at the Property Address above or at a different address if I give the Note Holder a notice of my different address.

Any notice that must be given to the Note Holder under this Note will be given by mailing it by first class mail to the Note Holder at the address stated in Section 3(A) above or at a different address if I am given a notice of that different address.

8. OBLIGATIONS OF PERSONS UNDER THIS NOTE

If more than one person signs this Note, each person is fully and personally obligated to keep all of the promises made in this Note, including the promise to pay the full amount owed. Any person who is a guarantor, surety or endorser of this Note is also obligated to do these things. Any person who takes over these obligations, including the obligations of a guarantor, surety, or endorser of this Note, is also obligated to keep all of the promises made in this Note. The Note Holder may enforce its rights under this Note against each person individually or against all of us together. This means that any one of us may be required to pay all of the amounts owed under this Note.

9. WAIVERS

I and any other person who has obligations under this Note waive the rights of presentment and notice of dishonor. "Presentment" means the right to require the Note Holder to demand payment of amounts due. "Notice of Dishonor" means the right to require the Note Holder to give notice to other persons that amounts due have not been paid.

10. UNIFORM SECURED NOTE

This Note is a uniform instrument with limited variations in some jurisdictions. In addition to the protections given to the Note Holder under this Note, a Mortgage, Deed of Trust, or Security Deed (the "Security Instrument"), dated the same date as this Note, protects the Note Holder from possible losses which might result if I do not keep promises that I make in this Note. That Security Instrument describes how and under what conditions I may be required to make immediate payment in full of all amounts I owe under this Note. Some of those conditions are described as follows:

Transfer of the Property or a Beneficial Interest in Borrower. If all or any part of the Property or any interest in it is sold or transferred (or if a beneficial interest in Borrower is sold or transferred and Borrower is not a natural person) without Lender's prior written consent, Lender may at its option, require immediate payment in full of all sums secured by this Security Instrument. However, this option shall not be exercised by Lender if prohibited by federal law as of the date of this Security Instrument.

If the Lender exercises this option, Lender shall give Borrower notice of acceleration. The notice shall provide a period of not less than 30 days from the date the notice is delivered or mailed within which Borrower must pay all sums secured by this Security Instrument. If Borrower fails to pay these sums prior to the expiration of this period, Lender may invoke any remedies permitted by this Security Instrument without further notice or demand on Borrower.

MORTGAGE

DEFINITIONS

Words used in multiple sections of this document are defined below and other words are defined in Sections 3, 11, 13, 18, 20 and 21. Certain rules regarding the usage of words used in this document are also provided in Section 16.

(A) "Security Instrument" means this document, which is dated May 8, 2004 , together with all Riders to this document.
(B) "Borrower" is Marlynn R. O'Neal

Borrower is the mortgagor under this Security Instrument.
(C) "Lender" is Ameriquest Mortgage Company

Lender is a Corporation organized and existing under the laws of Delaware

Lender's address is 1100 Town and Country Road, Suite 200 Orange, CA 92868

Lender is the mortgagee under this Security Instrument.
(D) "Note" means the promissory note signed by Borrower and dated May 8, 2004. The Note states that Borrower owes Lender sixty-nine thousand three hundred and 00/100 Dollars (U.S. $ 69,300.00) plus interest. Borrower has promised to pay this debt in regular Periodic Payments and to pay the debt in full not later than June 1, 2034.
(E) "Property" means the property that is described below under the heading "Transfer of Rights in the Property."
(F) "Loan" means the debt evidenced by the Note, plus interest, any prepayment charges and late charges due under the Note, and all sums due under this Security Instrument, plus interest.
(G) "Riders" means all Riders to this Security Instrument that are executed by Borrower. The following Riders are to be executed by Borrower [check box as applicable]:

☐ Adjustable Rate Rider ☐ Balloon Rider
☐ VA Rider
☐ Condominium Rider
☐ Planned Unit Development Rider
☐ Biweekly Payment Rider
☐ Second Home Rider
☐ 1-4 Family Rider
☐ Other(s) [specify]

(H) "Applicable Law" means all controlling applicable federal, state and local statutes, regulations, ordinances and administrative rules and orders (that have the effect of law) as well as all applicable final, non-appealable judicial opinions.
(I) "Community Association Dues, Fees, and Assessments" means all dues, fees, assessments and other charges that are imposed on Borrower or the Property by a condominium association, homeowners association or similar organization.
(J) "Electronic Funds Transfer" means any transfer of funds, other than a transaction originated by check, draft, or similar paper instrument, which is initiated through an electronic terminal, telephonic instrument, computer, or magnetic tape so as to order, instruct, or authorize a financial institution to debit or credit an account. Such term includes, but is not limited to, point-of-sale transfers, automated teller machine transactions, transfers initiated by telephone, wire transfers, and automated clearinghouse transfers.
(K) "Escrow Items" means those items that are described in Section 3.
(L) "Miscellaneous Proceeds" means any compensation, settlement, award of damages, or proceeds paid by any third party (other than insurance proceeds paid under the coverages described in Section 5) for: (i) damage to, or destruction of, the Property; (ii) condemnation or other taking of all or any part of the Property; (iii) conveyance in lieu of condemnation; or (iv) misrepresentations of, or omissions as to, the value and/or condition of the Property.
(M) "Mortgage Insurance" means insurance protecting Lender against the nonpayment of, or default on, the Loan.
(N) "Periodic Payment" means the regularly scheduled amount due for (i) principal and interest under the Note, plus (ii) any amounts under Section 3 of this Security Instrument.

Initials: M.O

(O) "RESPA" means the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (12 U.S.C. Section 2601 et seq.) and its implementing regulation, Regulation X (24 C.F.R. Part 3500), as they might be amended from time to time, or any additional or successor legislation or regulation that governs the same subject matter. As used in this Security Instrument, "RESPA" refers to all requirements and restrictions that are imposed in regard to a "federally related mortgage loan" even if the Loan does not qualify as a "federally related mortgage loan" under RESPA.
(P) "Successor in Interest of Borrower" means any party that has taken title to the Property, whether or not that party has assumed Borrower's obligations under the Note and/or this Security Instrument.

TRANSFER OF RIGHTS IN THE PROPERTY

This Security Instrument secures to Lender: (i) the repayment of the Loan, and all renewals, extensions and modifications of the Note; and (ii) the performance of Borrower's covenants and agreements under this Security Instrument and the Note. For this purpose, Borrower does hereby mortgage, grant and convey to Lender the following described property located in the County of SUMMIT :
[Type of Recording Jurisdiction] [Name of Recording Jurisdiction]
Legal Description Attached Hereto and Made a Part Hereof.

TOGETHER WITH all the improvements now or hereafter erected on the property, and all easements, appurtenances, and fixtures now or hereafter a part of the property. All replacements and additions shall also be covered by this Security Instrument. All of the foregoing is referred to in this Security Instrument as the "Property."

Initials: M.D

BORROWER COVENANTS that Borrower is lawfully seised of the estate hereby conveyed and has the right to mortgage, grant and convey the Property and that the Property is unencumbered, except for encumbrances of record. Borrower warrants and will defend generally the title to the Property against all claims and demands, subject to any encumbrances of record.

THIS SECURITY INSTRUMENT combines uniform covenants for national use and non-uniform covenants with limited variations by jurisdiction to constitute a uniform security instrument covering real property.

UNIFORM COVENANTS. Borrower and Lender covenant and agree as follows:

1. Payment of Principal, Interest, Escrow Items, Prepayment Charges, and Late Charges. Borrower shall pay when due the principal of, and interest on, the debt evidenced by the Note and any prepayment charges and late charges due under the Note. Borrower shall also pay funds for Escrow Items pursuant to Section 3. Payments due under the Note and this Security Instrument shall be made in U.S. currency. However, if any check or other instrument received by Lender as payment under the Note or this Security Instrument is returned to Lender unpaid, Lender may require that any or all subsequent payments due under the Note and this Security Instrument be made in one or more of the following forms, as selected by Lender: (a) cash; (b) money order; (c) certified check, bank check, treasurer's check or cashier's check, provided any such check is drawn upon an institution whose deposits are insured by a federal agency, instrumentality, or entity; or (d) Electronic Funds Transfer.

Payments are deemed received by Lender when received at the location designated in the Note or at such other location as may be designated by Lender in accordance with the notice provisions in Section 15. Lender may return any payment or partial payment if the payment or partial payments are insufficient to bring the Loan current. Lender may accept any payment or partial payment insufficient to bring the Loan current, without waiver of any rights hereunder or prejudice to its rights to refuse such payment or partial payments in the future, but Lender is not obligated to apply such payments at the time such payments are accepted. If each Periodic Payment is applied as of its scheduled due date, then Lender need not pay interest on unapplied funds. Lender may hold such unapplied funds until Borrower makes payment to bring the Loan current. If Borrower does not do so within a reasonable period of time, Lender shall either apply such funds or return them to Borrower. If not applied earlier, such funds will be applied to the outstanding principal balance under the Note immediately prior to foreclosure. No offset or claim which Borrower might have now or in the future against Lender shall relieve Borrower from making payments due under the Note and this Security Instrument or performing the covenants and agreements secured by this Security Instrument.

2. Application of Payments or Proceeds. Except as otherwise described in this Section 2, all payments accepted and applied by Lender shall be applied in the following order of priority: (a) interest due under the Note; (b) principal due under the Note; (c) amounts due under Section 3. Such payments shall be applied to each Periodic Payment in the order in which it became due. Any remaining amounts shall be applied first to late charges, second to any other amounts due under this Security Instrument, and then to reduce the principal balance of the Note.

If Lender receives a payment from Borrower for a delinquent Periodic Payment which includes a sufficient amount to pay any late charge due, the payment may be applied to the delinquent payment and the late charge. If more than one Periodic Payment is outstanding, Lender may apply any payment received from Borrower to the repayment of the Periodic Payments if, and to the extent that, each payment can be paid in full. To the extent that any excess exists after the payment is applied to the full payment of one or more Periodic Payments, such excess may be applied to any late charges due. Voluntary prepayments shall be applied first to any prepayment charges and then as described in the Note.

Any application of payments, insurance proceeds, or Miscellaneous Proceeds to principal due under the Note shall not extend or postpone the due date, or change the amount, of the Periodic Payments.

3. Funds for Escrow Items. Borrower shall pay to Lender on the day Periodic Payments are due under the Note, until the Note is paid in full, a sum (the "Funds") to provide for payment of amounts due for: (a) taxes and assessments and other items which can attain priority over this Security Instrument as a lien or encumbrance on the Property; (b) leasehold payments or ground rents on the Property, if any; (c) premiums for any and all insurance required by Lender under Section 5; and (d) Mortgage Insurance premiums, if any, or any sums payable by Borrower to Lender in lieu of the payment of Mortgage Insurance premiums in accordance with the provisions of Section 10. These items are called "Escrow Items." At origination or at any time during the term of the Loan, Lender may require that Community Association Dues, Fees, and Assessments, if any, be escrowed by Borrower, and such dues, fees and assessments shall be an Escrow Item. Borrower shall promptly furnish to Lender all notices of amounts to be paid under this Section. Borrower shall pay Lender the Funds for Escrow Items unless Lender waives Borrower's obligation to pay the Funds for any or all Escrow Items. Lender may waive Borrower's obligation to pay to Lender Funds for any or all Escrow Items at any time. Any such waiver may only be in writing. In the event of such waiver, Borrower shall pay directly, when and where payable, the amounts due for any Escrow Items for which payment of Funds has been waived by Lender and, if Lender requires, shall furnish to Lender receipts evidencing such payment within such time period as Lender may require. Borrower's obligation to make such payments and to provide receipts shall for all purposes be deemed to be a covenant and agreement contained in this Security Instrument, as the phrase "covenant and agreement" is used in Section 9. If Borrower is obligated to pay Escrow Items directly, pursuant to a waiver, and Borrower fails to pay the amount due for an Escrow Item, Lender may exercise its rights under Section 9 and pay such amount and Borrower shall then be obligated under Section 9 to repay to Lender any such amount. Lender may revoke the waiver as to any or all Escrow Items at any time by a notice given in accordance with Section 15 and, upon such revocation, Borrower shall pay to Lender all Funds, and in such amounts, that are then required under this Section 3.

Lender may, at any time, collect and hold Funds in an amount (a) sufficient to permit Lender to apply the Funds at the time specified under RESPA, and (b) not to exceed the maximum amount a lender can require under RESPA. Lender shall estimate the amount of Funds due on the basis of current data and reasonable estimates of expenditures of future Escrow Items or otherwise in accordance with Applicable Law.

The Funds shall be held in an institution whose deposits are insured by a federal agency, instrumentality, or entity (including Lender, if Lender is an institution whose deposits are so insured) or in any Federal Home Loan Bank. Lender shall apply the Funds to pay the Escrow Items no later than the time specified under RESPA. Lender shall not charge Borrower for holding and applying the Funds, annually analyzing the escrow account, or verifying the Escrow Items, unless Lender pays Borrower interest on the Funds and Applicable Law permits Lender to make such a charge. Unless an agreement is made in writing or Applicable Law requires interest to be paid on the Funds, Lender shall not be required to pay Borrower any interest or earnings on the Funds. Borrower and Lender can agree in writing, however, that interest shall be paid on the Funds. Lender shall give to Borrower, without charge, an annual accounting of the Funds as required by RESPA.

If there is a surplus of Funds held in escrow, as defined under RESPA, Lender shall account to Borrower for the excess funds in accordance with RESPA. If there is a shortage of Funds held in escrow, as defined under RESPA, Lender shall notify Borrower as required by RESPA, and Borrower shall pay to Lender the amount necessary to make up the shortage in accordance with RESPA, but in no more than 12 monthly payments. If there is a deficiency of Funds held in escrow, as defined under RESPA, Lender shall notify Borrower as required by RESPA, and Borrower shall pay to Lender the amount necessary to make up the deficiency in accordance with RESPA, but in no more than 12 monthly payments.

Upon payment in full of all sums secured by this Security Instrument, Lender shall promptly refund to Borrower any Funds held by Lender.

4. Charges; Liens. Borrower shall pay all taxes, assessments, charges, fines, and impositions attributable to the Property which can attain priority over this Security Instrument, leasehold payments or ground rents on the Property, if any, and Community Association Dues, Fees, and Assessments, if any. To the extent that these items are Escrow Items, Borrower shall pay them in the manner provided in Section 3.

Borrower shall promptly discharge any lien which has priority over this Security Instrument unless Borrower: (a) agrees in writing to the payment of the obligation secured by the lien in a manner acceptable to Lender, but only so long as Borrower is performing such agreement; (b) contests the lien in good faith by, or defends against enforcement of the lien in, legal proceedings which in Lender's opinion operate to prevent the enforcement of the lien while those proceedings are pending, but only until such proceedings are concluded; or (c) secures from the holder of the lien an agreement satisfactory to Lender subordinating the lien to this Security Instrument. If Lender determines that any part of the Property is subject to a lien which can attain priority over this Security Instrument, Lender may give Borrower a notice identifying the lien. Within 10 days of the date on which that notice is given, Borrower shall satisfy the lien or take one or more of the actions set forth above in this Section 4.

Lender may require Borrower to pay a one-time charge for a real estate tax verification and/or reporting service used by Lender in connection with this Loan.

5. Property Insurance. Borrower shall keep the improvements now existing or hereafter erected on the Property insured against loss by fire, hazards included within the term "extended coverage," and any other hazards including, but not limited to, earthquakes and floods, for which Lender requires insurance. This insurance shall be maintained in the amounts (including deductible levels) and for the periods that Lender requires. What Lender requires pursuant to the preceding sentences can change during the term of the Loan. The insurance carrier providing the insurance shall be chosen by Borrower subject to Lender's right to disapprove Borrower's choice, which right shall not be exercised unreasonably. Lender may require Borrower to pay, in connection with this Loan, either: (a) a one-time charge for flood zone determination, certification and tracking services; or (b) a one-time charge for flood zone determination and certification services and subsequent charges each time remappings or similar changes occur which reasonably might affect such determination or certification. Borrower shall also be responsible for the payment of any fees imposed by the Federal Emergency Management Agency in connection with the review of any flood zone determination resulting from an objection by Borrower.

If Borrower fails to maintain any of the coverages described above, Lender may obtain insurance coverage, at Lender's option and Borrower's expense. Lender is under no obligation to purchase any particular type or amount of coverage. Therefore, such coverage shall cover Lender, but might or might not protect Borrower, Borrower's equity in the Property, or the contents of the Property, against any risk, hazard or liability and might provide greater or lesser coverage than was previously in effect. Borrower acknowledges that the cost of the insurance coverage so obtained might significantly exceed the cost of insurance that Borrower could have obtained. Any amounts disbursed by Lender under this Section 5 shall become additional debt of Borrower secured by this Security Instrument. These amounts shall bear interest at the Note rate from the date of disbursement and shall be payable, with such interest, upon notice from Lender to Borrower requesting payment.

All insurance policies required by Lender and renewals of such policies shall be subject to Lender's right to disapprove such policies, shall include a standard mortgage clause, and shall name Lender as mortgagee and/or as an additional loss payee. Lender shall have the right to hold the policies and renewal certificates. If Lender requires, Borrower shall promptly give to Lender all receipts of paid premiums and renewal notices. If Borrower obtains any form of insurance coverage, not otherwise required by Lender, for damage to, or destruction of, the Property, such policy shall include a standard mortgage clause and shall name Lender as mortgagee and/or as an additional loss payee.

In the event of loss, Borrower shall give prompt notice to the insurance carrier and Lender. Lender may make proof of loss if not made promptly by Borrower. Unless Lender and Borrower otherwise agree in writing, any insurance proceeds, whether or not the underlying insurance was required by Lender, shall be applied to restoration or repair of the Property, if the restoration or repair is economically feasible and Lender's security is not lessened. During such repair and restoration period, Lender shall have the right to hold such insurance proceeds until Lender has had an opportunity to inspect such Property to ensure the work has been completed to Lender's satisfaction, provided that such inspection shall be undertaken promptly. Lender may disburse proceeds for the repairs and restoration in a single payment or in a series of progress payments as the work is completed. Unless an agreement is made in writing or Applicable Law requires interest to be paid on such insurance proceeds, Lender shall not be required to pay Borrower any interest or earnings on such proceeds. Fees for public adjusters, or other third parties, retained by Borrower shall not be paid out of the insurance proceeds and shall be the sole obligation of Borrower. If the restoration or repair is not economically feasible or Lender's security would be lessened, the insurance proceeds shall be applied to the sums secured by this Security Instrument, whether or not then due, with the excess, if any, paid to Borrower. Such insurance proceeds shall be applied in the order provided for in Section 2.

If Borrower abandons the Property, Lender may file, negotiate and settle any available insurance claim and related matters. If Borrower does not respond within 30 days to a notice from Lender that the insurance carrier has offered to settle a claim, then Lender may negotiate and settle the claim. The 30-day period will begin when the notice is given. In either event, or if Lender acquires the Property under Section 22 or otherwise, Borrower hereby assigns to Lender (a) Borrower's rights to any insurance proceeds in an amount not to exceed the amounts unpaid under the Note or this Security Instrument, and (b) any other of Borrower's rights (other than the right to any refund of unearned premiums paid by Borrower) under all insurance policies covering the Property, insofar as such rights are applicable to the coverage of the Property. Lender may use the insurance proceeds either to repair or restore the Property or to pay amounts unpaid under the Note or this Security Instrument, whether or not then due.

6. Occupancy. Borrower shall occupy, establish, and use the Property as Borrower's principal residence within 60 days after the execution of this Security Instrument and shall continue to occupy the Property as Borrower's principal residence for at least one year after the date of occupancy, unless Lender otherwise agrees in writing, which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld, or unless extenuating circumstances exist which are beyond Borrower's control.

7. Preservation, Maintenance and Protection of the Property; Inspections. Borrower shall not destroy, damage or impair the Property, allow the Property to deteriorate or commit waste on the Property. Whether or not Borrower is residing in the Property, Borrower shall maintain the Property in order to prevent the Property from deteriorating or decreasing in value due to its condition. Unless it is determined pursuant to Section 5 that repair or restoration is not economically feasible, Borrower shall promptly repair the Property if damaged to avoid further deterioration or damage. If insurance or condemnation proceeds are paid in connection with damage to, or the taking of, the Property, Borrower shall be responsible for repairing or restoring the Property only if Lender has released proceeds for such purposes. Lender may disburse proceeds for the repairs and restoration in a single payment or in a series of progress payments as the work is completed. If the insurance or condemnation proceeds are not sufficient to repair or restore the Property, Borrower is not relieved of Borrower's obligation for the completion of such repair or restoration.

Lender or its agent may make reasonable entries upon and inspections of the Property. If it has reasonable cause, Lender may inspect the interior of the improvements on the Property. Lender shall give Borrower notice at the time of or prior to such an interior inspection specifying such reasonable cause.

8. Borrower's Loan Application. Borrower shall be in default if, during the Loan application process, Borrower or any persons or entities acting at the direction of Borrower or with Borrower's knowledge or consent gave materially false, misleading, or inaccurate information or statements to Lender (or failed to provide Lender with material information) in connection with the Loan. Material representations include, but are not limited to, representations concerning Borrower's occupancy of the Property as Borrower's principal residence.

9. Protection of Lender's Interest in the Property and Rights Under this Security Instrument. If (a) Borrower fails to perform the covenants and agreements contained in this Security Instrument, (b) there is a legal proceeding that might significantly affect Lender's interest in the Property and/or rights under this Security Instrument (such as a proceeding in bankruptcy, probate, for condemnation or forfeiture, for enforcement of a lien which may attain priority over this Security Instrument or to enforce laws or regulations), or (c) Borrower has abandoned the Property, then Lender may do and pay for whatever is reasonable or appropriate to protect Lender's interest in the Property and rights under this Security Instrument, including protecting and/or assessing the value of the Property, and securing and/or repairing the Property. Lender's actions can include, but are not limited to: (a) paying any sums secured by a lien which has priority over this Security Instrument; (b) appearing in court; and (c) paying reasonable attorneys' fees to protect its interest in the Property and/or rights under this Security Instrument, including its secured position in a bankruptcy proceeding. Securing the Property includes, but is not limited to, entering the Property to make repairs, change locks, replace or board up doors and windows, drain water from pipes, eliminate building or other code violations or dangerous conditions, and have utilities turned on or off. Although Lender may take action under this Section 9, Lender does not have to do so and is not under any duty or obligation to do so. It is agreed that Lender incurs no liability for not taking any or all actions authorized under this Section 9.

Any amounts disbursed by Lender under this Section 9 shall become additional debt of Borrower secured by this Security Instrument. These amounts shall bear interest at the Note rate from the date of disbursement and shall be payable, with such interest, upon notice from Lender to Borrower requesting payment.

If this Security Instrument is on a leasehold, Borrower shall comply with all the provisions of the lease. If Borrower acquires fee title to the Property, the leasehold and the fee title shall not merge unless Lender agrees to the merger in writing.

10. Mortgage Insurance. If Lender required Mortgage Insurance as a condition of making the Loan, Borrower shall pay the premiums required to maintain the Mortgage Insurance in effect. If, for any reason, the Mortgage Insurance coverage required by Lender ceases to be available from the mortgage insurer that previously provided such insurance and Borrower was required to make separately designated payments toward the premiums for Mortgage Insurance, Borrower shall pay the premiums required to obtain coverage substantially equivalent to the Mortgage Insurance previously in effect, at a cost substantially equivalent to the cost to Borrower of the Mortgage Insurance previously in effect, from an alternate mortgage insurer selected by Lender. If substantially equivalent Mortgage Insurance coverage is not available, Borrower shall continue to pay to Lender the amount of the separately designated payments that were due when the insurance coverage ceased to be in effect. Lender will accept, use and retain these payments as a non-refundable loss reserve in lieu of Mortgage Insurance. Such loss reserve shall be non-refundable, notwithstanding the fact that the Loan is ultimately paid in full, and Lender shall not be required to pay Borrower any interest or earnings on such loss reserve. Lender can no longer require loss reserve payments if Mortgage Insurance coverage (in the amount and for the period that Lender requires) provided by an insurer selected by Lender again becomes available, is obtained, and Lender requires separately designated payments toward the premiums for Mortgage Insurance. If Lender required Mortgage Insurance as a condition of making the Loan and Borrower was required to make separately designated payments toward the premiums for Mortgage Insurance, Borrower shall pay the premiums required to maintain Mortgage Insurance in effect, or to provide a non-refundable loss reserve, until Lender's requirement for Mortgage Insurance ends in accordance with any written agreement between Borrower and Lender providing for such termination or until termination is required by Applicable Law. Nothing in this Section 10 affects Borrower's obligation to pay interest at the rate provided in the Note.

Mortgage Insurance reimburses Lender (or any entity that purchases the Note) for certain losses it may incur if Borrower does not repay the Loan as agreed. Borrower is not a party to the Mortgage Insurance.

Mortgage insurers evaluate their total risk on all such insurance in force from time to time, and may enter into agreements with other parties that share or modify their risk, or reduce losses. These agreements are on terms and conditions that are satisfactory to the mortgage insurer and the other party (or parties) to these agreements. These agreements may require the mortgage insurer to make payments using any source of funds that the mortgage insurer may have available (which may include funds obtained from Mortgage Insurance premiums).

As a result of these agreements, Lender, any purchaser of the Note, another insurer, any reinsurer, any other entity, or any affiliate of any of the foregoing, may receive (directly or indirectly) amounts that derive from (or might be characterized as) a portion of Borrower's payments for Mortgage Insurance, in exchange for sharing or modifying the mortgage insurer's risk, or reducing losses. If such agreement provides that an affiliate of Lender takes a share of the insurer's risk in exchange for a share of the premiums paid to the insurer, the arrangement is often termed "captive reinsurance." Further:

(a) Any such agreements will not affect the amounts that Borrower has agreed to pay for Mortgage Insurance, or any other terms of the Loan. Such agreements will not increase the amount Borrower will owe for Mortgage Insurance, and they will not entitle Borrower to any refund.

Initials: M.D.

(b) Any such agreements will not affect the rights Borrower has - if any - with respect to the Mortgage Insurance under the Homeowners Protection Act of 1998 or any other law. These rights may include the right to receive certain disclosures, to request and obtain cancellation of the Mortgage Insurance, to have the Mortgage Insurance terminated automatically, and/or to receive a refund of any Mortgage Insurance premiums that were unearned at the time of such cancellation or termination.

11. Assignment of Miscellaneous Proceeds; Forfeiture. All Miscellaneous Proceeds are hereby assigned to and shall be paid to Lender.

If the Property is damaged, such Miscellaneous Proceeds shall be applied to restoration or repair of the Property, if the restoration or repair is economically feasible and Lender's security is not lessened. During such repair and restoration period, Lender shall have the right to hold such Miscellaneous Proceeds until Lender has had an opportunity to inspect such Property to ensure the work has been completed to Lender's satisfaction, provided that such inspection shall be undertaken promptly. Lender may pay for the repairs and restoration in a single disbursement or in a series of progress payments as the work is completed. Unless an agreement is made in writing or Applicable Law requires interest to be paid on such Miscellaneous Proceeds, Lender shall not be required to pay Borrower any interest or earnings on such Miscellaneous Proceeds. If the restoration or repair is not economically feasible or Lender's security would be lessened, the Miscellaneous Proceeds shall be applied to the sums secured by this Security Instrument, whether or not then due, with the excess, if any, paid to Borrower. Such Miscellaneous Proceeds shall be applied in the order provided for in Section 2.

In the event of a total taking, destruction, or loss in value of the Property, the Miscellaneous Proceeds shall be applied to the sums secured by this Security Instrument, whether or not then due, with the excess, if any, paid to Borrower.

In the event of a partial taking, destruction, or loss in value of the Property in which the fair market value of the Property immediately before the partial taking, destruction, or loss in value is equal to or greater than the amount of the sums secured by this Security Instrument immediately before the partial taking, destruction, or loss in value, unless Borrower and Lender otherwise agree in writing, the sums secured by this Security Instrument shall be reduced by the amount of the Miscellaneous Proceeds multiplied by the following fraction: (a) the total amount of the sums secured immediately before the partial taking, destruction, or loss in value divided by (b) the fair market value of the Property immediately before the partial taking, destruction, or loss in value. Any balance shall be paid to Borrower.

In the event of a partial taking, destruction, or loss in value of the Property in which the fair market value of the Property immediately before the partial taking, destruction, or loss in value is less than the amount of the sums secured immediately before the partial taking, destruction, or loss in value, unless Borrower and Lender otherwise agree in writing, the Miscellaneous Proceeds shall be applied to the sums secured by this Security Instrument whether or not the sums are then due.

If the Property is abandoned by Borrower, or if, after notice by Lender to Borrower that the Opposing Party (as defined in the next sentence) offers to make an award to settle a claim for damages, Borrower fails to respond to Lender within 30 days after the date the notice is given, Lender is authorized to collect and apply the Miscellaneous Proceeds either to restoration or repair of the Property or to the sums secured by this Security Instrument, whether or not then due. "Opposing Party" means the third party that owes Borrower Miscellaneous Proceeds or the party against whom Borrower has a right of action in regard to Miscellaneous Proceeds.

Borrower shall be in default if any action or proceeding, whether civil or criminal, is begun that, in Lender's judgment, could result in forfeiture of the Property or other material impairment of Lender's interest in the Property or rights under this Security Instrument. Borrower can cure such a default and, if acceleration has occurred, reinstate as provided in Section 19, by causing the action or proceeding to be dismissed with a ruling that, in Lender's judgment, precludes forfeiture of the Property or other material impairment of Lender's interest in the Property or rights under this Security Instrument. The proceeds of any award or claim for damages that are attributable to the impairment of Lender's interest in the Property are hereby assigned and shall be paid to Lender.

Initials: M.O.

All Miscellaneous Proceeds that are not applied to restoration or repair of the Property shall be applied in the order provided for in Section 2.

12. Borrower Not Released; Forbearance By Lender Not a Waiver. Extension of the time for payment or modification of amortization of the sums secured by this Security Instrument granted by Lender to Borrower or any Successor in Interest of Borrower shall not operate to release the liability of Borrower or any Successors in Interest of Borrower. Lender shall not be required to commence proceedings against any Successor in Interest of Borrower or to refuse to extend time for payment or otherwise modify amortization of the sums secured by this Security Instrument by reason of any demand made by the original Borrower or any Successors in Interest of Borrower. Any forbearance by Lender in exercising any right or remedy including, without limitation, Lender's acceptance of payments from third persons, entities or Successors in Interest of Borrower or in amounts less than the amount then due, shall not be a waiver of or preclude the exercise of any right or remedy.

13. Joint and Several Liability; Co-signers; Successors and Assigns Bound. Borrower covenants and agrees that Borrower's obligations and liability shall be joint and several. However, any Borrower who co-signs this Security Instrument but does not execute the Note (a "co-signer"): (a) is co-signing this Security Instrument only to mortgage, grant and convey the co-signer's interest in the Property under the terms of this Security Instrument; (b) is not personally obligated to pay the sums secured by this Security Instrument; and (c) agrees that Lender and any other Borrower can agree to extend, modify, forbear or make any accommodations with regard to the terms of this Security Instrument or the Note without the co-signer's consent.

Subject to the provisions of Section 18, any Successor in Interest of Borrower who assumes Borrower's obligations under this Security Instrument in writing, and is approved by Lender, shall obtain all of Borrower's rights and benefits under this Security Instrument. Borrower shall not be released from Borrower's obligations and liability under this Security Instrument unless Lender agrees to such release in writing. The covenants and agreements of this Security Instrument shall bind (except as provided in Section 20) and benefit the successors and assigns of Lender.

14. Loan Charges. Lender may charge Borrower fees for services performed in connection with Borrower's default, for the purpose of protecting Lender's interest in the Property and rights under this Security Instrument, including, but not limited to, attorneys' fees, property inspection and valuation fees. In regard to any other fees, the absence of express authority in this Security Instrument to charge a specific fee to Borrower shall not be construed as a prohibition on the charging of such fee. Lender may not charge fees that are expressly prohibited by this Security Instrument or by Applicable Law.

If the Loan is subject to a law which sets maximum loan charges, and that law is finally interpreted so that the interest or other loan charges collected or to be collected in connection with the Loan exceed the permitted limits, then: (a) any such loan charge shall be reduced by the amount necessary to reduce the charge to the permitted limit; and (b) any sums already collected from Borrower which exceeded permitted limits will be refunded to Borrower. Lender may choose to make this refund by reducing the principal owed under the Note or by making a direct payment to Borrower. If a refund reduces principal, the reduction will be treated as a partial prepayment without any prepayment charge (whether or not a prepayment charge is provided for under the Note). Borrower's acceptance of any such refund made by direct payment to Borrower will constitute a waiver of any right of action Borrower might have arising out of such overcharge.

15. Notices. All notices given by Borrower or Lender in connection with this Security Instrument must be in writing. Any notice to Borrower in connection with this Security Instrument shall be deemed to have been given to Borrower when mailed by first class mail or when actually delivered to Borrower's notice address if sent by other means. Notice to any one Borrower shall constitute notice to all Borrowers unless Applicable Law expressly requires otherwise. The notice address shall be the Property Address unless Borrower has designated a substitute notice address by notice to Lender. Borrower shall promptly notify Lender of Borrower's change of address. If Lender specifies a procedure for reporting Borrower's change of address, then Borrower shall only report a change of address through that specified procedure. There may be only one designated notice address under this Security Instrument at any one time. Any notice to Lender shall be given by delivering it or by mailing it by first class mail to Lender's address stated herein unless Lender has designated another address by notice to Borrower. Any notice in connection with this Security Instrument shall not be deemed to have been given to Lender until actually received by Lender. If any notice required by this Security Instrument is also required under Applicable Law, the Applicable Law requirement will satisfy the corresponding requirement under this Security Instrument.

16. Governing Law; Severability; Rules of Construction. This Security Instrument shall be governed by federal law and the law of the jurisdiction in which the Property is located. All rights and obligations contained in this Security Instrument are subject to any requirements and limitations of Applicable Law. Applicable Law might explicitly or implicitly allow the parties to agree by contract or it might be silent, but such silence shall not be construed as a prohibition against agreement by contract. In the event that any provision or clause of this Security Instrument or the Note conflicts with Applicable Law, such conflict shall not affect other provisions of this Security Instrument or the Note which can be given effect without the conflicting provision.

As used in this Security Instrument: (a) words of the masculine gender shall mean and include corresponding neuter words or words of the feminine gender; (b) words in the singular shall mean and include the plural and vice versa; and (c) the word "may" gives sole discretion without any obligation to take any action.

17. Borrower's Copy. Borrower shall be given one copy of the Note and of this Security Instrument.

18. Transfer of the Property or a Beneficial Interest in Borrower. As used in this Section 18, "Interest in the Property" means any legal or beneficial interest in the Property, including, but not limited to, those beneficial interests transferred in a bond for deed, contract for deed, installment sales contract or escrow agreement, the intent of which is the transfer of title by Borrower at a future date to a purchaser.

If all or any part of the Property or any Interest in the Property is sold or transferred (or if Borrower is not a natural person and a beneficial interest in Borrower is sold or transferred) without Lender's prior written consent, Lender may require immediate payment in full of all sums secured by this Security Instrument. However, this option shall not be exercised by Lender if such exercise is prohibited by Applicable Law.

If Lender exercises this option, Lender shall give Borrower notice of acceleration. The notice shall provide a period of not less than 30 days from the date the notice is given in accordance with Section 15 within which Borrower must pay all sums secured by this Security Instrument. If Borrower fails to pay these sums prior to the expiration of this period, Lender may invoke any remedies permitted by this Security Instrument without further notice or demand on Borrower.

19. Borrower's Right to Reinstate After Acceleration. If Borrower meets certain conditions, Borrower shall have the right to have enforcement of this Security Instrument discontinued at any time prior to the earliest of: (a) five days before sale of the Property pursuant to any power of sale contained in this Security Instrument; (b) such other period as Applicable Law might specify for the termination of Borrower's right to reinstate; or (c) entry of a judgment enforcing this Security Instrument. Those conditions are that Borrower: (a) pays Lender all sums which then would be due under this Security Instrument and the Note as if no acceleration had occurred; (b) cures any default of any other covenants or agreements; (c) pays all expenses incurred in enforcing this Security Instrument, including, but not limited to, reasonable attorneys' fees, property inspection and valuation fees, and other fees incurred for the purpose of protecting Lender's interest in the Property and rights under this Security Instrument; and (d) takes such action as Lender may reasonably require to assure that Lender's interest in the Property and rights under this Security Instrument, and Borrower's obligation to pay the sums secured by this Security Instrument, shall continue unchanged. Lender may require that Borrower pay such reinstatement sums and expenses in one or more of the following forms, as selected by Lender: (a) cash; (b) money order; (c) certified check, bank check, treasurer's check or cashier's check, provided any such check is drawn upon an institution whose deposits are insured by a federal agency, instrumentality or entity; or (d) Electronic Funds Transfer. Upon reinstatement by Borrower, this Security Instrument and obligations secured hereby shall remain fully effective as if no acceleration had occurred. However, this right to reinstate shall not apply in the case of acceleration under Section 18.

20. Sale of Note; Change of Loan Servicer; Notice of Grievance. The Note or a partial interest in the Note (together with this Security Instrument) can be sold one or more times without prior notice to Borrower. A sale might result in a change in the entity (known as the "Loan Servicer") that collects Periodic Payments due under the Note and this Security Instrument and performs other mortgage loan servicing obligations under the Note, this Security Instrument, and Applicable Law. There also might be one or more changes of the Loan Servicer unrelated to a sale of the Note. If there is a change of the Loan Servicer, Borrower will be given written notice of the change which will state the name and address of the new Loan Servicer, the address to which payments should be made and any other information RESPA requires in connection with a notice of transfer of servicing. If the Note is sold and thereafter the Loan is serviced by a Loan Servicer other than the purchaser of the Note, the mortgage loan servicing obligations to Borrower will remain with the Loan Servicer or be transferred to a successor Loan Servicer and are not assumed by the Note purchaser unless otherwise provided by the Note purchaser.

Neither Borrower nor Lender may commence, join, or be joined to any judicial action (as either an individual litigant or the member of a class) that arises from the other party's actions pursuant to this Security Instrument or that alleges that the other party has breached any provision of, or any duty owed by reason of, this Security Instrument, until such Borrower or Lender has notified the other party (with such notice given in compliance with the requirements of Section 15) of such alleged breach and afforded the other party hereto a reasonable period after the giving of such notice to take corrective action. If Applicable Law provides a time period which must elapse before certain action can be taken, that time period will be deemed to be reasonable for purposes of this paragraph. The notice of acceleration and opportunity to cure given to Borrower pursuant to Section 22 and the notice of acceleration given to Borrower pursuant to Section 18 shall be deemed to satisfy the notice and opportunity to take corrective action provisions of this Section 20.

21. Hazardous Substances. As used in this Section 21: (a) "Hazardous Substances" are those substances defined as toxic or hazardous substances, pollutants, or wastes by Environmental Law and the following substances: gasoline, kerosene, other flammable or toxic petroleum products, toxic pesticides and herbicides, volatile solvents, materials containing asbestos or formaldehyde, and radioactive materials; (b) "Environmental Law" means federal laws and laws of the jurisdiction where the Property is located that relate to health, safety or environmental protection; (c) "Environmental Cleanup" includes any response action, remedial action, or removal action, as defined in Environmental Law; and (d) an "Environmental Condition" means a condition that can cause, contribute to, or otherwise trigger an Environmental Cleanup.

Borrower shall not cause or permit the presence, use, disposal, storage, or release of any Hazardous Substances, or threaten to release any Hazardous Substances, on or in the Property. Borrower shall not do, nor allow anyone else to do, anything affecting the Property (a) that is in violation of any Environmental Law, (b) which creates an Environmental Condition, or (c) which, due to the presence, use, or release of a Hazardous Substance, creates a condition that adversely affects the value of the Property. The preceding two sentences shall not apply to the presence, use, or storage on the Property of small quantities of Hazardous Substances that are generally recognized to be appropriate to normal residential uses and to maintenance of the Property (including, but not limited to, hazardous substances in consumer products).

Borrower shall promptly give Lender written notice of (a) any investigation, claim, demand, lawsuit or other action by any governmental or regulatory agency or private party involving the Property and any Hazardous Substance or Environmental Law of which Borrower has actual knowledge, (b) any Environmental Condition, including but not limited to, any spilling, leaking, discharge, release or threat of release of any Hazardous Substance, and (c) any condition caused by the presence, use or release of a Hazardous Substance which adversely affects the value of the Property. If Borrower learns, or is notified by any governmental or regulatory authority, or any private party, that any removal or other remediation of any Hazardous Substance affecting the Property is necessary, Borrower shall promptly take all necessary remedial actions in accordance with Environmental Law. Nothing herein shall create any obligation on Lender for an Environmental Cleanup.

NON UNIFORM COVENANTS. Borrower and Lender further covenant and agree as follows:

22. Acceleration; Remedies. Lender shall give notice to Borrower prior to acceleration following Borrower's breach of any covenant or agreement in this Security Instrument (but not prior to acceleration under Section 18 unless Applicable Law provides otherwise). The notice shall specify: (a) the default; (b) the action required to cure the default; (c) a date, not less than 30 days from the date the notice is given to Borrower, by which the default must be cured; and (d) that failure to cure the default on or before the date specified in the notice may result in acceleration of the sums secured by this Security Instrument, foreclosure by judicial proceeding and sale of the Property. The notice shall further inform Borrower of the right to reinstate after acceleration and the right to assert in the foreclosure proceeding the non-existence of a default or any other defense of Borrower to acceleration and foreclosure. If the default is not cured on or before the date specified in the notice, Lender at its option may require immediate payment in full of all sums secured by this Security Instrument without further demand and may foreclose this Security Instrument by judicial proceeding. Lender shall be entitled to collect all expenses incurred in pursuing the remedies provided in this Section 22, including, but not limited to, costs of title evidence.

23. Release. Upon payment of all sums secured by this Security Instrument, Lender shall discharge this Security Instrument. Borrower shall pay any recordation costs. Lender may charge Borrower a fee for releasing this Security Instrument, but only if the fee is paid to a third party for services rendered and the charging of the fee is permitted under Applicable Law.

24. Certain Other Advances. In addition to any other sum secured hereby, this Security Instrument shall also secure the unpaid principal balance of, plus accrued interest on, any amount of money loaned, advanced or paid by Lender to or for the account and benefit of Borrower, after this Security Instrument is delivered to and filed with the Recorder's Office, SUMMIT
County, Ohio, for recording. Lender may make such advances in order to pay any real estate taxes and assessments, insurance premiums plus all other costs and expenses incurred in connection with the operation, protection or preservation of the Property, including to cure Borrower's defaults by making any such payments which Borrower should have paid as provided in this Security Instrument, it being intended by this Section 24 to acknowledge, affirm and comply with the provision of Section 5301.233 of the Revised Code of Ohio.

In a prior Memorandum Opinion[1] entered on the docket of this adversary proceeding on May

[1] All capitalized terms (unless otherwise defined herein) shall have the meaning ascribed to them in the prior Memorandum Opinion.

1, 2009, this Court found that certain conduct of Countrywide Home Loans, Inc.[2] ("Countrywide") was not reasonable, was reckless and is sanctionable pursuant to § 105 and Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011. On May 11, 2009, the Court held a trial with respect to the issue of sanctions. Although monetary sanctions may have been appropriate, the UST did not ask for them. Therefore, the focus is on sanctions "sufficient to deter repetition of such conduct or comparable conduct by others similarly situated," including how Countrywide can modify and improve internal practices to ensure the accuracy of filings in future bankruptcy cases. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c)(2).

Such improvement is necessary not just in light of what happened in Ms. O'Neal's bankruptcy case, but because of the sloppy participation of Countrywide in many chapter 13 cases across the country. As the Court noted during the trial, the problems created by the mortgage servicing industry have been pervasive in many of the cases on this Court's docket and have been the subject of respected empirical studies. The UST cited to the "Mortgage Study"[3] and specifically

[2] On May 8, 2009, the parties to this litigation filed the following stipulation:

> Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. is a wholly owned subsidiary of Countrywide Financial Corporation. Countrywide Financial Corporation is a wholly owned subsidiary of Bank of America Corporation. On April 27, 2009, Countrywide Home Loans Servicing, LP, a subsidiary of Bank of America, N.A., changed its name to BAC Home Loans Servicing, L.P. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., has transferred the servicing rights to loans it previously serviced or it has contracted with BAC Home Loans Servicing, LP to subservice those loans on its behalf.

The United States Trustee ("UST") asks the Court to impose sanctions upon Countrywide and its successors and/or assigns. The defendant presented no evidence to support any other result.

[3] The Mortgage Study, led primarily by Tara Twomey and Katherine Porter, is a multistate study designed to facilitate research on the intersection of mortgage to the field data analyzed most recently by one of the most deservedly respected scholars working to shed light on bankruptcy practices across the country. In the article cited by the UST, that scholar notes

> [M]ortgage companies frequently do not comply with bankruptcy law. A majority of mortgage claims are missing one or more of the required pieces of documentation for a bankruptcy claim. Furthermore, fees and charges on claims often are poorly identified, making it impossible to verify if such fees are legally permissible or accurate. In nearly all cases [studied], debtors and mortgage companies disagree on the amount of the outstanding mortgage debt.

Porter, supra note 2, at 121; see also, Hank E. Hildebrand, III, The Sad State of Mortgage Service Providers, 22 SEP Am. Bankr. Inst. J. 10 (September 2003) ("mortgage servicers are having a very difficult time dealing with chapter 13"); Deb Miller Testimony before the United States Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on administrative oversight, available at http://judiciary.senate.gov/hearings/testimony.cfm (May 6, 2008) (there are "systemic problems in the mortgage servicing industry").

Despite these known problems, most claims in bankruptcy do not draw an objection. Porter, supra note 2, at 168 (the vast majority of all claims (96%) pass undisturbed through the bankruptcy system without objection). Although the consumer debtors' bar should make it a routine part of their representation to scrutinize mortgage claims, the reality is that the typical consumer bankruptcy practitioner deals with extensive information gathering and documentation requirements for very modest compensation; against that busy backdrop few practitioners undertake a careful review of every mortgage claim. Id. Those that do often find themselves dealing with initial information from the mortgage claimant that sometimes appears designed to be deliberately impenetrable.[4] The cryptic presentation of the information by mortgage holders or those charged with servicing the mortgage holders' contract with the mortgagor can have the effect of visiting upon the mortgagor significant cost in getting the most basic information about the mortgage status as perceived by the mortgagee. This may or may not be part of an actual design to discourage mortgagors from asserting their rights. Whether that is an intended consequence of the mortgagee's agent's behavior, it is often the effect of that behavior. In addition, such behavior places significant unwarranted burdens on the limited resources of this Court.

The UST asked the Court to grant injunctive relief requiring (1) that Countrywide's filings be verified by a responsible person and (2) that an auditor be appointed to review the verification process and audit every proof of claim filed by Countrywide in open and pending chapter 13 cases in the Northern District of Ohio at the time of the entry of the order in this adversary proceeding. In addition, the UST requested that Countrywide be required to provide information about its Bankruptcy Ombudsman on all notices transmitted to debtors with respect to the status or payment terms of their residential loan or mortgage and to publish information about its Bankruptcy Ombudsman on its Web site.

Countrywide argued that the relief sought by the UST is unsupported by the record before the Court and beyond the scope of the Court's authority to grant. In addition, Countrywide claimed that its voluntarily implemented measures to improve the accuracy of the information in its filings are sufficient.

[4] The Court bases this conclusion on nearly 15 years of handling chapter 13 dockets. I am taking this judicial notice based upon my experiences with the more than 12,700 chapter 13 cases on my docket since Sept. 19, 1994.

The evidence presented by the UST on the issue of sanctions consisted solely of the opinions of three other courts addressing problems with mortgage servicers and the testimony of John Smith, the representative of Countrywide who testified during the liability phase of trial.[5] The opinions cited by the UST provide minimal assistance to this Court in determining the appropriate sanctions in this case. Two of the opinions address the propriety of monetary sanctions against Countrywide pursuant to § 362(h) and Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011. See Exhibits 35 and 36. The third addresses misconduct by a law firm. See Exhibit 37.

John Smith testified that Countrywide has made voluntary changes to its practices to improve its handling of loans in bankruptcy. He testified that Countrywide created a "Bankruptcy Ombudsman" office in late 2008 to resolve issues that cannot be resolved by Countrywide's bankruptcy loans/loss mitigation department (the "Bankruptcy Department").[6] Countrywide's

[5] The conduct of the plaintiff in this adversary proceeding puzzles the Court. Immediately upon the filing of this litigation in February 2008, an article addressing the activity of the U.S. Trustee program in filing this and two other adversary proceedings in bankruptcy courts in Atlanta and Miami, respectively, appeared in the Wall Street Journal. The Court assumes that article was the result of some form of press release. Initially counsel from the Executive Office of the UST program appeared to be coordinating plaintiff's activities in these three cases.

At the mutual request of the parties, pretrials scheduled in this matter were adjourned several times while the parties purportedly engaged in extensive discovery. In light of such purportedly extensive discovery and "central office" involvement, the Court simply cannot understand the completely truncated case presented by the plaintiff at the remedial phase of this litigation.

[6] According to Mr. Smith's testimony, the Bankruptcy Department consists of approximately 12 individuals nationally.

Bankruptcy Ombudsman office operates separate and apart from the Bankruptcy Department and Mr. Smith's personal knowledge of the Bankruptcy Ombudsman's offices' current practices and procedures was limited. In addition, Mr. Smith testified that he oversaw the creation of "validation teams" whose role was to review proofs of claim after they are prepared but before they are filed. The "validation teams" consist of approximately 40 individuals nationally. Although Mr. Smith helped establish the initial protocols for the "validation teams" and supervised the "validation teams" after their creation, his personal knowledge of their practices and procedures does not extend past mid 2008 when the supervision of the "validation teams" was transferred to someone else in Countrywide's operation.

Mr. Smith also testified that Countrywide has adopted some but not all of the "best practices" suggested by the National Association of Chapter Thirteen Trustees' Mortgage Liaison Committee. These voluntary acts should not be minimized but they are not enough and they have happened far too slowly. For instance, one of the recent improvements touted by Countrywide is the development of a system that purportedly allows Countrywide to accurately apply and track payments in bankruptcy cases. This development is long overdue. For at least the past decade, the inability of mortgage servicers to maintain accurate accounting of payments in bankruptcy situations has been noted as problematic and subjected mortgage servicers to liability. In re Ronemus, 201 B.R. 458 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1996) (finding the servicer's records wholly incredible); see also In re Maxwell, 281 B.R. 101 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2002). Countrywide's actions are perhaps not so "voluntary," but instead are the result of firm warnings from bankruptcy courts throughout the country. In fact, though perhaps Countrywide sees such action as voluntary, this Court wonders why record keeping necessary to the filing of accurate pleadings in bankruptcy cases should ever have been viewed as optional. Countrywide is reactive rather than proactive with respect to improving its handling of loans in bankruptcy.

I am not the first judge to address Countrywide's systemic problems. In a lengthy opinion from the Southern District of Texas, the bankruptcy court recites facts that bear a strikingly familiar pattern: lack of communication and carelessness leading to errors and unreliable information. In re Parsley, 384 B.R. 138 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008). That bankruptcy judge asks "What kind of culture condones blockading personnel from communicating with outside counsel? What kind of culture discourages the checking of outside counsel's work? What kind of culture promotes payment histories that are so confusing to the vast majority of persons...[?]" Id. at 184. Despite the detailed picture painted by the bankruptcy court, that court did not affirmatively sanction Countrywide; rather, it admonished Countrywide to improve its procedures. "This Court would hope that this entity would reevaluate its policies and procedures in order to improve upon the accuracy of payment histories and to ensure that its actions do not undermine the integrity of the bankruptcy system." Id.

One problem with relying on the mortgage servicing industry to voluntarily improve its practices is the industry's incentive to increase costs. Its interests are not aligned with the borrower, nor even in some circumstances with its investor.[7]

> Mortgage servicers do not have a customer relationship with homeowners; they work for the investors who own the mortgage-backed securities. Borrowers cannot shop for a loan based on the quality of the servicing, and they have virtually no ability to > change servicers if they are dissatisfied with the servicers' conduct. The only exit strategy for a dissatisfied borrower is refinancing the mortgage, and even then, the homeowner may find the new loan assigned to the prior servicer. Because their customers are the trustees who hire them to collect on behalf of investors, servicers have few reputational or financial constraints pushing them to work to satisfy homeowners with their performance.

[7] Indeed, as noted in the prior Memorandum Opinion in this case, an apparent driving force in Countrywide's failure to document the satisfaction of Ms. O'Neal's note and to release the mortgage was Countrywide's internal pursuit of its own fees that amounted to 56 % of the short-sale proceeds.

> In fact, servicers have a financial incentive to impose additional fees on consumers. Mortgage servicers earn revenue in three major ways. First, they receive a fixed fee for each loan. Typical arrangements pay servicers between 0.25% and 0.50% of the note principal for each loan. Second, servicers earn "float" income from interest accrued between when consumers pay and when those funds are remitted to investors. Third, servicers often are permitted to retain all, or part, of any default fees, such as late charges, that consumers pay. In this way, a borrower's default can boost a servicer's profits. A significant fraction of servicers' total revenue comes from retained-fee income. Because of this structure, servicers' incentives upon default may not align with investors' incentives. Servicers have incentives to make it difficult for consumers to cure defaults.

Porter, supra note 2, at 126-27.

In this case, as set forth more fully in the prior Memorandum Opinion, it is apparent that Countrywide's system for filing proofs of claim was designed to allow each actor in the process to act with indifference to the truth, and to rely solely on the limited information made available at each step. Sanctions are necessary to deter repetition of such conduct or comparable conduct. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c)(2). "When a court metes out a sanction, it must exercise such power with restraint and discretion. Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 44, 111 S.Ct. 2123, 2132-33, 115 L.Ed.2d 27 (1991). The sanction levied must thus be commensurate with the egregiousness of the conduct." Mapother & Mapother, P.S.C. v. Cooper (In re Downs), 103 F.3d 472, 478 (6th Cir. 1996). In this case, in order for a sanction to be sufficient it must address not only Countrywide's conduct, but also the lack of resources of debtors' counsel to challenge the claims in many appropriate instances.

I am unconvinced, based on the evidence before me, that Countrywide's voluntarily implemented "improvements" have sufficiently altered the nature of Countrywide's business model to prevent the same type of error and abuse of process from taking place in other bankruptcy cases. Nor am I persuaded, based on the evidence presented, that the specific sanctions sought by the UST are appropriately granted in this case. The UST failed to show that the cost of putting an auditor in place would be offset by the resulting benefits. The UST failed to show that providing an individual debtor with information about how to reach Countrywide's Bankruptcy Ombudsman would deter Countrywide's future conduct. In essence, the UST's suggested sanctions ignore the judicial setting in which mortgagee's rights are asserted in bankruptcy. What is needed are solutions that invigorate the procedures contemplated by the Bankruptcy Code and Rules, and that nourish the roots of the bankruptcy system, rather than simply propping up the tree. Focus and communication must improve as early as possible in the bankruptcy process. One of the systemic solutions suggested by Professor Porter is to standardize the form of itemization for mortgage claims by requiring claimants to provide as an attachment to the proof of claim details for each claim such as the type of loan, its interest rate and payment adjustment dates.[8] I find this type of solution to be narrowly tailored and likely to prevent the same type of error and abuse of process that took place in this case from taking place in other bankruptcy cases.

Therefore, beginning immediately, Countrywide and its successors and assigns are ordered to complete the attached worksheet (the "Worksheet") for each new proof of claim filed by Countrywide, its successors or assigns before this Court. A copy of the completed Worksheet shall be attached to the proof of claim at the time of filing. In addition, within 75 days from the date of this Order, Countrywide, its successors and assigns are ordered to complete the Worksheet for all previously filed proofs of claim in cases currently pending on this Court's docket and file a copy of the completed Worksheet as a supplement to the previously filed proof of claim. If Countrywide, its successors and assigns fail to use and properly complete the Worksheet in support of their claims, the Court will award monetary sanctions against Countrywide, its successors and/or assigns including, but not limited to, a minimum of $300 for attorney's fees incurred by the debtor or trustee in contesting the claims of Countrywide, its successors and/or assigns, as well as any other compensatory damages that the debtor might prove.

[8] The Bankruptcy Rules Committee is studying this approach as it considers amending Fed. R. Bankr. P. 3001. At its June 1 and 2, 2009 meeting, the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure adopted the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy Rules and approved publishing for public comment proposed amendments to Rule 3001 prescribing in greater detail the supporting information required to accompany certain proofs of claim. The proposed amendments are expected to be published in August 2009 and will be posted online at www.uscourts.gov/rules.

Counsel who seek sanctions against Countrywide, its successors and/or assigns as the result of the failure to use and properly complete the Worksheet should file a motion with the Court and serve the motion on Countrywide, its successors and/or assigns, the Debtor, the Trustee and Dean Wyman of the UST's office for Region 9.

In prior Memorandum Opinions[1] entered on the docket of this adversary proceeding on May 1, 2009 and July 31, 2009, this Court found that the United States Trustee had carried its burden of proof with respect to the liability of Countrywide for its conduct and awarded sanctions against

[1] All capitalized terms (unless otherwise defined herein) shall have the meaning ascribed to them in the prior Memorandum Opinions.

Countrywide. Countrywide filed a notice of appeal to the District Court and a motion to stay the sanctions pending the appeal (the "Stay Motion"). [Docket # 103]. The Court scheduled a hearing on the Stay Motion for August 25, 2009 and abated the sanctions until August 31, 2009. The United States Trustee filed a Memorandum in Opposition to Motion to Stay Pending Appeal. [Docket # 100].

Under Bankruptcy Rule 8005, in order for Countrywide to obtain a stay pending appeal, Countrywide must prove that (1) it has made a "strong showing of likelihood of success on the merits;" (2) it will be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) a stay will not substantially injure the other parties interested in the proceeding; and (4) the public interest lies with granting the stay. See Mich. Coalition of Radioactive Material Users, Inc. v. Griepentrog, 945 F.2d 150, 153 (6th Cir. 1991) (holding the factors are interrelated considerations that must be balanced together); Rossi, McCreery and Assoc., Inc. v. Abbo (In re Abbo), 191 B.R. 680 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1996) (applying the factors set forth in Griepentrog to a motion for stay pursuant to Bankruptcy Rule 8005). "The movant must address each factor, regardless of its relative strength, providing specific facts and affidavits supporting its assertions that these factors exist." Griepentrog, 945 F.2d at 154.

At the hearing on the Stay Motion, counsel did not present any evidence to the Court. Therefore, the Court heard oral argument from counsel for Countrywide and counsel for the United States Trustee and took the Stay Motion under advisement. For the reasons set forth below in the Court's analysis of each factor, the Stay Motion is denied.

Likelihood of Success on the Merits

The first factor to be considered is whether Countrywide has shown the likelihood of success on the merits on appeal. Countrywide is required to demonstrate "more than the mere 'possibility' of success on the merits." Griepentrog, 945 F.2d at 153-54 (citing Mason County Medical Ass'n v. Knebel, 563 F.2d 256 (6th Cir. 1997)). The movant must show "serious questions going to the merits." American Civil Liberties Union v. National Sec. Agency/Central Sec. Service, 467 F.3d 590, 591 (6th Cir. 2006). The strength required is inversely proportional to the amount of harm Countrywide must show will befall it if a stay is not granted.

Bankruptcy Courts have the inherent power to sanction vexatious conduct before the court. In re Rainbow Magazine, Inc., 77 F.3d 278, 284 (9th Cir. 1996) cited by Judge Gwin in his order denying Countrywide's motion to withdraw the reference in this adversary proceeding [docket # 38]. Judge Gwin further wrote, "Bolstering the conclusion that bankruptcy courts have sanction authority, Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011 specifically authorizes such sanctions. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011. (fn omitted) Additionally, Rule 9011 'is only one of a number of statutes and rules that enable a court to impose sanctions upon counsel and others.'" Opinion and Order, docket # 38, p. 3-4 (citations omitted).

> Section 105 grants bankruptcy courts broad powers "to implement the provisions of Title 11 and to prevent an abuse of the bankruptcy process." In re Volpert, 110 F.3d 494, 500 (7th Cir.1997); see also In re Weiss, 111 F.3d at 1159; Burd v. Walters (In re Walters), 868 F.2d 665 (4th Cir.1989); GE Capital Mortgage v. Asbill, C/A No. 3:99-0773-19 (D.S.C.2/23/2000) ("It is clear from the very terms of this statute that Congress gave the Bankruptcy Court broad inherent discretionary powers to ensure that the motions made and issues raised before it are managed efficiently and justly"). The broad language of § 105, granting bankruptcy courts the power to prevent abuse of the judicial process must encompass the court's authority to sanction a creditor for its misconduct in providing its attorney with incorrect information on which to base a motion.

In re Kilgore, 253 B.R. 179 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2000).

Section 105 provides that the Court may > issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process. No provision of this title providing for the raising of an issue by a party in interest shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action or making any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process.

Countrywide raises the following issues in support of its argument that it has presented a serious question as to the merits: 1) the relief, akin to a mandatory injunction, granted under § 105 is unsupported by the facts; 2) Rule 9011 was not available as a basis for the imposition of sanctions; 3) there is no basis for the entry of injunctive relief; 4) the Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to enter the relief.

After this Court found that Countrywide's manner of dealing with outside counsel deprived such counsel of appropriate information to prepare accurate proofs of claim and file them as directed by Countrywide, the defendant was afforded a full opportunity to address what, if any, remedy might be appropriate. Countrywide responded to that opportunity by calling a single witness whose personal involvement in Countrywide's processing of proofs of claim to be filed in bankruptcy courts around the country had ended almost a year prior to that hearing. Countrywide's assertion that it had addressed the problems with inaccurate information that had been amply demonstrated in the liability phase of the trial was simply that–an assertion without support of current credible evidence.

Notwithstanding the paucity of proof adduced by Countrywide at the remedial phase of the trial, this Court found that the request of the UST for the appointment of an auditor to review all claims filed by Countrywide in this Court might not be the most efficient route to ensuring the accuracy of claims filed by Countrywide. Instead, this Court focused on a tool by which Countrywide could communicate clearly with outside counsel and, in turn, with other parties in bankruptcy cases, i.e., debtors, their counsel, the chapter 13 trustee, holders of other claims secured by the same collateral, and Countrywide's own customers, to name a few. What is to be communicated? The basic data that would allow the person preparing a proof of claim to be filed on behalf of Countrywide's customer(s) to provide accurate information. This narrowly tailored remedy requires nothing more of Countrywide than to show that it has done the work necessary to file accurate proofs of claim. It is totally in keeping with the duty of any party seeking to participate in distributions to be made by trustees in bankruptcy cases and, most particularly, by chapter 13 trustees who rely on the information in proofs of claim to initiate the flow of funds to creditors in chapter 13 cases.

Countrywide's argument that it was not on notice that Rule 9011 might be a basis for relief ordered in this case is completely disingenuous. Since Judge Gwin ruled on Countrywide's motion to withdraw the reference, making specific reference to Rule 9011, Countrywide has been on notice that Rule 9011 was a factor in this case. When the UST established beyond any doubt that Countrywide filed a proof of claim in the bankruptcy case of Marlynn O'Neal that totally ignored the history of the acceptance by Countrywide of a short sale payoff of her note and thus the satisfaction of her mortgage, Rule 9011 was in full play.

Countrywide's argument that nothing supports relief that "is in the nature of injunctive relief" is again nothing more than an empty argument. What has been ordered is a remedy for Countrywide's violation of Rule 9011 and 11 U.S.C. § 105 that is tailored to promote accurate transmission of information critical to the efficient and fair administration of bankruptcy cases on this Court's docket, particularly chapter 13 cases where the filing of inaccurate proofs of claim by a party claiming a large secured claim shifts the cost of dealing with such inaccuracies to the chapter 13 trustee, debtors and their counsel, and sometimes to other creditors. The sanction ordered is not rulemaking in disguise, nor does it improperly limit or prohibit Countrywide's use of the Official Proof of Claim Form. To the contrary, the sanction requires Countrywide to fill the Official Proof of Claim Form with the accurate and complete information which the worksheet should help it gather.

Finally, Countrywide's argument that the Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction was raised before the district court in the motion to withdraw the reference. The argument was rejected by the district court. It is therefore, established for the purpose of this adversary proceeding that this Court has subject matter jurisdiction.

For the above reasons, the Court finds that Countrywide has not shown a "strong likelihood of success on the merits." This factor does not weigh in favor of granting Countrywide's request for a stay pending appeal.

Irreparable Injury Absent A Stay

The Sixth Circuit has set forth the following test to evaluate the second factor:

> In evaluating the harm that will occur depending upon whether or not the stay is granted, we generally look to three factors: (1) the substantiality of the injury alleged; (2) the likelihood of its occurrence; and (3) the adequacy of the proof provided. Ohio ex rel. Celebrezze, 812 F.2d at 290 (citing Cuomo, 772 F.2d at 977). In evaluating the degree of injury, it is important to remember that
>> [t]he key word in this consideration is irreparable. Mere injuries, however substantial, in terms of money, time and energy necessarily expended in the absence of a stay, are not enough. The possibility that adequate compensatory or other corrective relief will be available at a later date, in the ordinary course of litigation, weighs > heavily against a claim of irreparable harm.

> Sampson v. Murray, 415 U.S. 61, 90, 94 S.Ct. 937, 953, 39 L.Ed.2d 166 (1974) (quoting Virginia Petroleum Jobbers Ass'n v. Federal Power Comm'n, 259 F.2d 921, 925 (D.C.Cir.1958)). In addition, the harm alleged must be both certain and immediate, rather than speculative or theoretical. See Wisconsin Gas Co. v. Federal Energy Regul. Comm'n, 758 F.2d 669, 674 (D.C.Cir.1985). In order to substantiate a claim that irreparable injury is likely to occur, a movant must provide some evidence that the harm has occurred in the past and is likely to occur again. Id.

Griepentrog, 945 F.2d at 154.

In this case, Countrywide alleges in its Stay Motion that if the Court's order is not stayed, Countrywide will incur a greater cost in servicing loans. Countrywide proceeds simply with argument, having offered no proof at either the remedial phase of the trial or at the hearing on the its Stay Motion in support of this bare allegation. Countrywide suggests that the sanction will place it at a competitive disadvantage relative to other mortgage servicers and cites to Basicomputer Corp. v. Scott, 973 F.2d 507 (6th Cir. 1992), in support of its suggestion that a competitive disadvantage, assuming it exists, can constitute irreparable harm. In Basicomputer, a case involving the breach of a non-compete clause in an employment contract, the Sixth Circuit did find that damages flowing from competitive losses and losses of customer goodwill are difficult to calculate and "often amount to irreparable injury because the damages flowing from such losses are difficult to compute." Id. at 512. It also found, however, that there were facts in the record sufficient to support such a finding. Id. ("[T]he record contains ample evidence to support the court's findings ... These facts are sufficient to support a finding that Basic would suffer competitive injury and loss of goodwill.").

Once again in this case, Countrywide has presented no evidence in support of its notion that it will suffer competitive loss if a stay is not issued. Indeed, all that is being required of Countrywide is to demonstrate that it has attended to the details necessary to present accurate proofs of claim to this Court. In addition, John Smith testified in the remedial phase of this proceeding that Countrywide already has "validation teams" in place whose purpose is to review proofs of claims before they are filed. Countrywide has presented no evidence in support of why it would be such a burden for the validation teams to provide the information required by the Bankruptcy Code and Rules in the plain English format of the Worksheet. (If in fact it is because Countrywide does not currently gather all of this information prior to filing a proof of claim, then perhaps its claimed "competitive disadvantage" is really just requiring Countrywide to play on the same level as the other players.) There is no proof that Countrywide will suffer irreparable harm if a stay is not granted. See In re Stewart, 2009 WL 1649731 (E.D. La. 2009) (The district court denied a motion for stay pending appeal of the bankruptcy court's order requiring Wells Fargo to conduct an audit of all proofs of claim filed and to amend and supplement the filed proofs of claim where necessary to comply with the principles espoused by the bankruptcy court in that case. In part, the district court's decision was based on a finding that Wells Fargo failed to prove irreparable injury as a matter of law, given its continuing obligation to file accurate proofs of claim and to correct inaccurate proofs of claim under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 and 11 U.S.C. § 105.). Irreparable harm cannot be assumed, it must be proven. Therefore, this factor does not weigh in favor of granting Countrywide's Stay Motion.

No Substantial Injury To The Other Parties Interested In The Proceeding

The third factor requires Countrywide to show that other interested parties will not suffer substantial injury if a stay is granted. Bankruptcy cases adjust the rights of all creditors. If a claimant asserts inaccurate amounts due to it, and particularly in amounts greater than what is actually owed, the limited resources of the chapter 13 trustee and sometimes the Court must be expended in sorting out the ensuing confusion. Distributions to other claimants are suspended, and sometimes the viability of a particular chapter 13 case is destroyed because of the resulting time and cost factors.

The district court in In re Stewart, noted > the interests of other debtors in the Eastern District of Louisiana are certainly at issue, and these interests are relevant whether as parties or generally as the public. Without resolving the unique issues present in this motion, the Court proceeds under the most conservative application of "parties" and addresses the interests of the debtors under the fourth factor. Putting aside the interests of other debtors, the Court finds that the harm accruing to the other named party in this case, Dorothy Stewart, is minimal if a stay is not granted. However, given that the movant's injury necessarily resulting from the injunction is unclear, the Court does not find this factor to be particularly helpful in assessing whether or not a stay should be granted in this case.

In re Stewart, 2009 WL 1649731 at *5. While it is true that the harm to Ms. O'Neal in this particular case would be minimal, as the court found in Stewart, the other potentially affected debtors' interests lay in accurate and evidentiary based proofs of claim. If the stay is granted, debtors may make decisions in their individual cases based on inaccurate proofs of claim. In Akron, the chapter 13 trustee pays proofs of claim as filed; thus, inaccurate proofs of claim affect the debtor, the creditors and all other participants. On my docket to date this year there have been approximately 800 chapter 13 cases filed. Obviously Countrywide has not asserted a claim in each of those cases, but the UST has adduced sufficient evidence to show that Countrywide's practices can dilute the efficient and fair administration of those cases.

Where Does The Public Interest Lay?

Finally, the Court must consider the fourth factor - whether granting a stay would serve the public interest. Griepentrog, 954 F.2d at 155. The potential for public consequences as the result of granting a stay is of particular import. See, e.g., Weinberger v. Romero-Barcelo, 465 U.S. 305, 312 (1982).

Countrywide suggests that the public interest is better served by a stay because it views the Court's sanction as rulemaking. However, as addressed above, the Court's sanctions are not rulemaking in disguise. The sanction applies only to Countrywide and were meted out in light of the evidence presented at the hearings in this matter which led the Court to the conclusion that Countrywide has abused the judicial process by continuing to file proofs of claim in cases on this Court's docket without regard to the accuracy of their content. The Worksheet required by the Court's order requires similar information to that required by Official Form No. 10, but asks that the information be presented in an accessible, easy to understand format that will encourage the preparer of the Worksheet to have and seek to include only accurate information.

The public interest is served by allowing the sanction to become effective immediately. The bankruptcy system, and each player in it, is served by putting an end to Countrywide's abuse of the claims process in bankruptcy and having accurate and easy to understand information sooner rather than later. In re Harris, 2007 WL 1306483, *4 ("The public interest - especially preventing abuse of the bankruptcy process - favors a quick decision of the dispute."); In re Stewart, 2009 WL 1649731, *5 (the district court found judicial efficiency to be a significant public interest and in light of the expenditure of judicial resources required to get to a proper proof of claim, the district court found the public interest weighs against granting the request for a stay). Having found that the public interest is better served by stopping abusive practices sooner rather than later, the Court finds this factor weighs against granting Countrywide's request for a stay pending appeal.

CONCLUSION

Considering all four factors together, the Court finds Countrywide's Motion for Stay Pending Appeal not to be well taken and it is denied.

On Appeal from An Order of the United States Bankruptcy Court Entered June 2, 2009

BRIEF OF APPELLEE
UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

OPENING STATEMENT

This is an appeal from an order entered by the bankruptcy court on June 2, 2009, which affects the distribution of proceeds from the sale of the debtors' assets. The underlying sale order is final and is not at issue in this appeal. By the June 2 order that is the subject of this appeal, the bankruptcy court denied the request of the Committee of Unsecured Creditors to place some of the sale proceeds into a trust for the sole benefit of general unsecured creditors, to the detriment of other creditors whose claims would otherwise be entitled to a higher priority. The bankruptcy court instead held that those funds, like any other assets of the bankruptcy estate, should be distributed according to the terms of the debtors' eventual chapter 11 plan and in compliance with the distribution rules established by the Bankruptcy Code. The bankruptcy court's ruling was not an abuse of discretion, and should be affirmed.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This matter came before the bankruptcy court on debtors' motion to sell assets out of the ordinary course of business pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(b)(1). Because section 363(b)(1) does not specify the grounds upon which a sale should be approved, the applicable standard of review is whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in declining to approve certain terms of sale. See Morris v. Zabu Holding Co. (In re Morris), 385 B.R. 823, 828 (E.D. Va. 2008) (bankruptcy court's decision to lift the automatic stay under § 362 is reviewed for abuse of discretion because statute does not define "cause") citing Robbins v. Robbins (In re Robbins), 964 F.2d 342, 345 (4th Cir. 1992). Cf. Committee of Equity Security Holders v. Lionel Corp. (In re Lionel Corp.), 722 F.2d 1063, 1068 (2d Cir. 1983)(under analogous sale provision of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, appellate review was limited to abuse of discretion).

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

On February 4, 2009, On-Site Sourcing, Inc., DocuForce, Inc. and On-Site LA, Inc. (“debtors” or “On-Site”) filed voluntary petitions under the reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. On-Site was reportedly one of the world’s largest independent litigation support providers, offering combined resources of forensics, electronic processing and online document review services. In 2007, the company began experiencing dramatic revenue declines due to changes in the paper and electronic discovery markets. In an effort to preserve its going-concern value, On-Site entered into an agreement to sell substantially all its assets to a competitor, Integreon Discovery Solutions (DC), Inc., subject to higher and better offers.

The bankruptcy cases were filed to facilitate that sale. Shortly before the bankruptcy filings, Integreon had purchased all of debtors’ secured debt totaling approximately $36 million so in addition to being a competitor and the stalking horse bidder, Integreon was also debtors’ secured creditor/lender. On February 5, the day after the bankruptcies were filed, debtors filed a motion to establish bid procedures to sell substantially all of their property to Integreon which had made a credit bid of $28.8 million, or to the highest bidder.

On February 19, 2009, the United States Trustee appointed a Committee of Unsecured Creditors pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1).

On February 23, 2009, the court approved debtors’ motion to establish bid procedures. Following the marketing period, debtors filed a notice on March 25, 2009, that Integreon was the only and, therefore, successful bidder of their assets.

During this process, the Committee of Unsecured Creditors along with debtors and Integreon negotiated changes to the original asset purchase agreement which resulted in Integreon agreeing to a number of concessions. See Term Sheet attached as Exhibit A to the Notice of Material Changes to Terms of Asset Purchase Agreement, filed April 9, 2009. (R. Ex J). Among other things, Integreon agreed to forgive all debtors' outstanding indebtedness above and beyond the purchase price; it agreed to fund budgeted expenses as well as pay additional cash sums; and it agreed to relinquish or exclude certain assets from the sale. Part of these concessions flowed to the debtors' estates and part of them went to a separate trust to pay "creditors holding allowed general unsecured claims after the payment of any unpaid Committee professional fees and expenses." ("Collateral Carve-Out"). (R. Ex. J). The specific assets to be carved-out or contributed to the unsecured creditors trust were (1) an undivided one-half interest in debtors' tax refunds; (2) a lump sum payment of $132,500; and (3) payment of $225,000 toward the professional fees of the committee less any amount previously contributed.

The last paragraph of the Term Sheet states as follows:

> Integreon and the Committee recognize that the creation of such a separate trust remains subject to approval by the Bankruptcy Court. If the Court does not approve the establishment of such a trust, it is understood and agreed that Integreon will not be expected or required to provide any further consideration for the sale and the sale shall go forward with all of the assets provided for herein being received by the On-Site Estate including, without limitation, the Collateral Carve-Out.

Emphasis Added. (R. Ex. J).

The United States Trustee filed an objection to the Notice of Material Changes because the Collateral Carve-Out appeared to allow unsecured creditors to receive a distribution without assuring that administrative and priority claims would first be paid in full. According to the debtors' bankruptcy schedules, their prepetition debt totaled approximately $37 million in secured debt, $421,000 in priority debt, and over $6.6 million in general debt.[1]

On April 22, 2009, the bankruptcy court conducted a hearing on debtors' motion to approve the sale. At that hearing, the United States Trustee's counsel amplified his concerns that in a chapter 11 case, pre-petition unsecured creditors should be paid pursuant to a plan or, if the case was going to be converted, according to the chapter 7 statutory distribution scheme. The proposed trust by-passed these statutory mechanisms and effectively allowed unsecured creditors to be paid ahead of administrative and priority creditors.

The court approved the sale but declined to approve the trust finding that it was a sub rosa chapter 11 plan. (R. Ex. M 64:25-72:2). The court directed the debtors to hold the assets that would have gone into the trust in a segregated account pending further order of the court. In so ruling, the court did not foreclose the possibility that a plan might be proposed that would provide for the creation of a trust. (R. Ex. M 71:18-72:2, 74:5-19) Likewise, the court did not foreclose the possibility that another vehicle might be proposed for the court to consider. (R. Ex. M 74:13-19).

The sale hearing was continued to April 28, 2009, for the presentation of the sale order. At that point, because of some confusion, the court clarified its earlier ruling that it was not approving the carve-out and again suggested that the payment to unsecured creditors would have to await future developments:

> THE COURT: . . . What I thought I was saying and what I intended to say is that the carve-out is not approved. I think Mr. Frankel's comments were right on point on that.
> You're circumventing the usual processes of the chapter, of Chapter 11, to the > detriment of other creditors, other classes of creditors, administrative, secured, whatever they may be, and the timing within which those claims are created.

> At the same time, and, therefore, you revert back to what you had agreed to, which was in the time [sic] sheet.
> Now, as an accommodation and because I didn't think that there would be need to invade this, at least to any significant expense, what I envisioned was that the normal process of Chapter 11 would be followed and whatever agreements or negotiations resolved is what they will resolve.
> It may well be that you can have a strict distribution in accordance with what the distribution would be in Chapter 7. There may be some other reasons to modify. I don't know those. I'm not privy to everything that's going on.
> But I envisioned the Chapter 11 process to progress. There is an absolute priority rule. And unless that can be modified, that's going to control the disposition of the thing.

(R. Ex. N 12:11- 13:21).

By order entered April 30, 2009, the court approved the sale with the Committee's express support even as the order also indicated that "[b]y separate order, the Court has found and determined that the Collateral Carve-Out circumvents the ordinary Chapter 11 distribution process and violates the absolute priority rule. The Committee does not consent to the Court's denial of the Collateral Carve-Out." (R. Ex. P ¶ L). Paragraph 20 of the sale order provides that Integreon would pay to the debtors all the funds that would have gone into the unsecured creditors trust to be held in a separate bank account pending further order of the court. (R. Ex. P ¶ 20).

On June 2, 2009, the court entered a separate order denying the Collateral Carve-Out. (R. Ex. Q). The Committee filed a timely appeal on June 12, 2009.[2]

[2] As of this date, the chapter 11 debtors have not filed a disclosure statement and plan. The United States Trustee has filed a motion to convert the case to chapter 7 which is set for hearing September 22, 2009. In his motion, the United States Trustee suggested in the alternative that the court set a deadline for debtors to file a plan.

ARGUMENT

I. IN APPROVING A SALE OF SUBSTANTIALLY ALL OF DEBTORS' ASSETS, THE COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN DENYING THE PROVISIONS THAT WOULD HAVE FUNNELED PART OF THE SALE PROCEEDS INTO A TRUST FOR THE SOLE BENEFIT OF UNSECURED CREDITORS AND TO THE DETRIMENT OF HIGHER PRIORITY CREDITORS

Section 363(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that "[t]he trustee,[3] after notice and a hearing, may use, sell, or lease, other than in the ordinary course of business, property of the estate . . . ." In the seminal case of Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. Lionel Corp. (In re Lionel Corp.), 722 F.2d 1063 (2d Cir. 1983), the Second Circuit observed that although § 363(b) appears to provide courts with "virtually unfettered discretion" to authorize sales, courts do not have carte blanche.

> Several reasons lead us to this conclusion: the statute requires notice and a hearing, and these procedural safeguards would be meaningless absent a further requirement that reasons be given for whatever determination is made; similarly, appellate review would effectively be precluded by an irreversible order; and finally, such construction of § 363(b) swallows up Chapter 11's safeguards. In fact, the legislative history surrounding the enactment of Chapter 11 makes evident Congress' concern with rights of equity interests as well as those of creditors.

Id. at 1069 (footnote omitted).

The Lionel Court concluded that "[t]he history surrounding the enactment in 1978 of current Chapter 11 and the logic underlying it buttress our conclusion that there must be some articulated business justification, other than appeasement of major creditors, for using, selling or leasing property out of the ordinary course of business before the bankruptcy judge may order such disposition under section 363(b)." Id. at 1071. In reaching this decision, a court should consider "all salient factors pertaining to the proceeding" including factors such as "the likelihood that a plan of reorganization will be proposed and confirmed in the near future, [and] the effect of the proposed disposition on future plans of reorganization." Id.

Thus, when a significant transaction arises in a case which requires court approval prior to the submission of a plan, courts may properly consider whether the transaction is a sub rosa plan of reorganization "or an attempt to circumvent the chapter 11 requirements for confirmation." In re Chrysler, LLC, 405 B.R. 84, 95-96 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2009) (citing Motorola v. Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Iridium Operating LLC), 478 F.3d 452, 466 (2d Cir. 2007)(citing Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. v. Braniff Airways, Inc. (In re Braniff Airways, Inc.) 700 F.2d 935, 940 (5th Cir. 1983).

In this instance, whether the sale of debtors' assets to Integreon was appropriate is not contested. Rather, the question is whether it was appropriate for the court, in the context of considering that sale, to deny one of the proposed changes to the underlying sale agreement that would have allowed some of the sale proceeds to be channeled into a trust that would only benefit general unsecured creditors. Considering the record, and the court's reasoning, the bankruptcy court's decision was entirely appropriate and should be affirmed.

A. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Err In Denying The Carve-Out Because To Have Done So Would Have Been Tantamount To Approving A Sub Rosa Plan

The Bankruptcy Code provides a structure whereby claims have a certain order of priority in distribution.

> U.S. bankruptcy law imposes a hierarchy on claims referred to as the "absolute priority rule." Under this rule, unless the senior > creditors agree otherwise, priority claims are required to be satisfied in full before junior claims are entitled to any distribution from the debtor's estate. Secured claims have the highest priority under the absolute priority rule, inasmuch as no portion of the value of a secured creditor's collateral may be distributed to any other claimant unless the lien on such property is discharged or "adequately protected." Creditors whose claims arose postpetition (known as "administrative claimants"), certain prepetition claims and certain prepetition taxes are all "priority claims." General unsecured prepetition claims are junior to such priority claims and senior only to subordinated unsecured prepetition debt (to the extent provided in the instruments governing such subordinated debt) and the interests of equity holders. Section 507 of the Bankruptcy Code establishes the relative priorities of the priority claims against the debtor's estate.

James E. Millstein & Shari Siegel, Strategic Investments and Acquisitions in the Chapter 11 Context, 754 PLI/CORP 353, 368 (1991). This priority scheme applies regardless of whether the case is in chapter 11 or chapter 7. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 507 (describing Code priorities), 726 (explaining distribution scheme in chapter 7), and 1129(a)(9) (detailing required treatment of administrative and priority claims under chapter 11 plan). See Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Reynolds & Reynolds Co. (In re JKJ Chevrolet, Inc.), 26 F.3d 481, 484 (4th Cir. 1994) (Bankruptcy Code's policy is equitable distribution among creditors of the same class and in accordance with the priorities set forth in §§ 507, 726).

As the court points out in its memorandum opinion, the unsecured creditors trust effectively predetermined the yet-to-be drafted plan of reorganization because it would have permitted unsecured creditors to be paid even though claims of a higher order of priority were not being paid in full. Counsel for the Committee candidly admitted that this provision was designed to trump the distribution scheme under the Bankruptcy Code.

THE COURT: The trust gets the money and where does the money go from the trust?

MR. GOLD: The trust - - it goes into the trust and it will be distributed pro rata.

THE COURT: Pro rata to whom?

MR. GOLD: To general unsecured creditors with allowed claims.

THE COURT: What about priority creditors or administrative claimants?

MR. GOLD: They will be satisfied from the estate.

THE COURT: What if there is not enough money?

MR. GOLD: That's the whole point.

THE COURT: It is, isn't it.

MR. GOLD: That's the point.

(R. Ex. M 55:1-15).

Although the Committee apparently believes that the bankruptcy court should have closed its eyes to the ramifications of these proposed terms, it would have been error for the court to have done so. In re Lionel Corp., 722 F.2d at 1071 (reversing lower courts' approval of a sale for failing to consider factors); In re Continental Air Lines, Inc. 780 F.2d at 1227-8 (reversing lower courts' approval of leases for failing to consider sub rosa plan arguments); see also United States v. AWECO, Inc. (In re AWECO, Inc.), 725 F.2d 293, 299 (5th Cir. 1984) (reversing approval of settlement with junior claimant that may have prevented a senior claimant from being paid in full due to insufficient factual record). Here, the bankruptcy court examined the terms and acted properly in declining to approve them - at least not in the format presented and without the disclosures and processes that attend confirmation of a plan.

B. There Was No Business Justification for The Carve-Out

The bankruptcy court was also correct in finding that there was no good business reason for the debtors to include the Carve-Out. The business justification for a transaction goes to what is in the best interest of the estate and will aid the reorganization. In re Lionel Corp. 733 F.2d at 1071. The Committee counters that the Carve-Out must have been supported by good business reasons because the sale itself was approved. But this falls short of explaining why it was necessary to the sale and to the estate, to have a Carve-Out funding an unsecured creditors trust while other creditors of a higher priority would not be paid in full first. The Committee's own argument that "waiting until the confirmation of plan . . . was not an option . . . given the expedited sale process" suggests that the Carve-Out was nothing more what it appeared to be - a device that would distribute funds to unsecured creditors in lieu of a plan. Appellant's Brief at 23.

The Committee also seeks to justify the Carve-Out in terms of being a form of settlement between the Committee and Integreon. Even assuming, arguendo, this was the case, the parties did not file a motion to approve the settlement as required by Rule 9019 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. Moreover, the fact remains that if there was a quid pro quo, neither the sale nor the Committee's support for the sale was made contingent on the bankruptcy court's approval of the Carve-Out. In fact, just the opposite occurred: the parties made contingency plans and specifically agreed that the assets would go to the estates if the Carve-Out was not approved. (R. Ex. J). Denial of the Carve-Out did not affect the sale price, alter Integreon's obligations, or change the Committee's continuing support for the sale.

C. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion

Relying on Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee v. Stern (In re SPM Manufacturing Corp.), 984 F.2d 1305 (1sth Cir. 1993) and In re World Health Alternatives, Inc., 344 B.R. 291 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006), the Committee argues the court should not have considered the absolute priority rule in the context of a section 363 sale, because that provision only applies to the confirmation of a chapter 11 plan. As demonstrated above, however, whether a section 363 transaction amounts to a sub rosa plan of reorganization is an appropriate consideration in chapter 11. SPM would not have had occasion to consider whether there was a sub rosa plan since it was a chapter 7 case, and it does not appear that World Health ever considered the absolute priority issue in that context.

Once a court finds that certain terms of a section 363 sale constitute a sub rosa plan, it is not an abuse of the court's discretion to excise the offending terms. In re Continental Air Lines, Inc. 780 F.2d at 1228. In making this determination it is implicit that the court would have to consider what some of the chapter 11 requirements were including, for example, the chapter 11 distribution scheme and the absolute priority rule. Thus, although the absolute priority rule may not apply to a section 363 sale in the strictest sense of the word, it is nevertheless an appropriate consideration which influences the "appropriate protective measures" that a court may need to adopt. Id.

It also bears repeating that the bankruptcy court did not preclude the creation of a trust if it was brought forward in the form of a proposed plan of reorganization. In a somewhat similar circumstance, the Fourth Circuit rejected the proposed creation of an emergency treatment fund as part of the Dalkon Shield litigation in the A.H. Robins bankruptcy case, because it was not part of a plan:

> The Bankruptcy Code does not permit a distribution to unsecured creditors in a Chapter 11 proceeding except under and pursuant to a plan of reorganization that has been properly presented and approved. 11 U.S.C. § 1121 provides for the filing of a plan of reorganization. Sections 1122-1129 set forth the required contents of a plan, the classification of claims, the requirements of disclosure of the contents of the plan, the method for accepting the plan, any modification thereof, the hearing required on confirmation of the plan and the requirements for confirmation. The clear language of these statutes, as well as the Bankruptcy Rules applicable thereto, does not authorize the payment in part of in full, or the advance of monies to or for the benefit of unsecured claimants prior to the approval of the plan of reorganization. The creation of the Emergency Treatment Program has no authority to support it in the Bankruptcy Code and violates the clear policy of Chapter 11 reorganizations by allowing piecemeal, pre-confirmation payments to certain unsecured creditors.

Official Committee of Equity Security Holders v. Mabey, 832 F.2d 299, 302 (4th Cir. 1987).

Accordingly, it was entirely appropriate for the bankruptcy court to consider possible confirmation-related issues when it was asked to approve a significant transaction - the sale of substantially all the debtors' assets - prior to a plan being proposed. "Undertaking reorganization piecemeal pursuant to § 363(b) should not deny creditors the protection they would receive if the proposals were first raised in the reorganization plan." In re Continental Air Lines, Inc., 780 F.2d at 1227-8.

II. THE COMMITTEE'S ARGUMENT THAT A SECURED CREDITOR MAY "GIFT" PROPERTY TO JUNIOR CREDITORS IS INAPPOSITE BECAUSE THE SALE PROCEEDS WERE PROPERTY OF THE ESTATE.

The gravamen of the Committee's argument on appeal is that a secured creditor can "gift" part of its collateral to whomever it wants and that, in this case, the bankruptcy court should have approved the "gift" that would have gone into a trust to be established solely for the benefit of unsecured creditors. The Committee cites Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee v. Stern (In re SPM Manufacturing Corp.), 984 F.2d 1305 (1sth Cir. 1993) and In re World Health Alternatives, Inc., 344 B.R. 291 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006) for the proposition that the absolute priority rule does not prevent secured creditors from gifting their own property as they see fit.

The United States Trustee contends that these cases are inapplicable because this court does not need to decide the "gift" issue in order to resolve this appeal. That stems from the fact that whatever assets the secured creditor, Integreon, might arguably have "gifted" to the unsecured creditors' trust, those assets are property of the bankruptcy estates. With the purported donor gone and the sale transaction now complete, the issue of whether the "gift" should have been allowed has not been preserved.[4] The only question that remains is one of distribution: whether the Carve-Out funds should remain with the estates to be distributed under the Bankruptcy Code, or whether they should be distributed to an unsecured creditors trust in derogation of the Code's priorities. That issue should be decided by determining whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in excising the Carve-Out terms from the proposed sale.

In any event, SPM and World Health can be distinguished.[5] They are also not binding on this court . In SPM, the Bank was owed $9 million and held a perfected first lien on most of the debtor's assets. While the case was pending under chapter 11, the Bank and the Committee of Unsecured Creditors executed an agreement to cooperate in various matters and to share the proceeds they received either in a reorganization or liquidation of the debtor. The first $3 million of proceeds would be shared 90% to the Bank and 10% to the Committee. The second $3 million would be shared 80% to the Bank and 20% to the Committee. The debtor's assets eventually sold for $5 million, the Bank was granted relief from the automatic stay, and the case was converted to chapter 7. The Bank and the Committee then filed a joint motion to require the delivery of the sale proceeds to the Bank. The motion indicated that after it received the proceeds, the Bank would distribute funds to the Committee's counsel in accordance with the sharing agreement. The bankruptcy court approved the distribution to the Bank but rejected the motion to the extent it requested approval for the Bank to share the proceeds. Instead, the Bank was ordered to deliver the proceeds to the chapter 7 trustee. The First Circuit reversed the lower courts based on one crucial fact: "Any sharing between the [Bank] and the general unsecured creditors was to occur after distribution of the estate property, having no effect whatever on the bankruptcy distributions to other creditors." 984 F.2d at 1312 (emphasis in original). Because the agreement did not become operative until after there was a proper distribution of estate assets, the Circuit did not find that the distribution came at the expense of priority creditors.

[4] The Term Sheet expressly provided that "Integreon and the Committee recognize that the creation of such a separate trust remains subject to approval by the Bankruptcy Court. If the Court does not approve the establishment of such a trust, it is understood and agreed . . . the sale shall go forward with all of the assets provided for herein being received by the On-Site Estate including, without limitation, the Collateral Carve-Out." (R. Ex. J).

[5] As addressed earlier, neither court had occasion to consider whether there was a sub rosa plan.

Unlike SPM, this case did not involve a sale to a third party; it involved a sale of estate property to the secured lender. Whatever Integreon might arguably have contributed to the unsecured creditors trust, it was bargaining with assets that were property of the estates. The bankruptcy court was correct in asserting its jurisdiction over that property and in considering the absolute priority rule as well as other plan confirmation issues since any future distribution - whether in chapter 11 pursuant to a plan or in chapter 7 - will come from the bankruptcy estates. Integreon is no longer in the picture, having consummated the sale and released its liens. Since the assets have been released or conveyed to the estates, free and clear of any liens, the rights of other creditors, such as administrative and priority creditors, would be adversely affected by any order that would require debtors to distribute those assets other than pursuant to the Bankruptcy Code's scheme of distribution.

World Health is more analogous to the facts presented here as it involved a quick sale of substantially all the debtor's assets. There, the Committee actually filed an objection to the bid procedures and DIP financing motion, while it reserved its right to object to the sale motion. At the sale hearing, the Committee advised the court that it was withdrawing its objection due to a settlement with the Bank. The sale was approved, and debtor subsequently filed a motion to approve the settlement pursuant to Rule 9019 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. Under the settlement the Bank would pay $1,625,000 to the Committee's counsel for distribution to allowed general unsecured claims after payment of professional fees and/or investigation and prosecution of estate causes of action against parties other than the Bank. The settlement specifically preserved the Committee's right to challenge the Bank's position until the court entered a final nonappealable order and in the event the court did not approve the settlement, the Committee had an additional five days to proceed. While there are a number of differences, one critical fact that distinguishes World Health was that "non-approval would enable [the Bank] to keep the $1,625,000." 344 B.R. at 300. Here, the assets did not revert back to Integreon but flowed into the estates. Another difference is that World Health involved the approval of a settlement motion.

Fundamentally, carve-outs pose troubling issues - not so much for the concept - but because the imprimatur of the bankruptcy court is sought to bless transactions that are otherwise portrayed as not involving property of the estate and serve to redistribute property in accord with a private agreement, instead of pursuant to the Bankruptcy Code.[6] Although it is often stated that the property at stake "belongs" to the secured creditor, such conclusions bear closer scrutiny. Section 541 provides for the creation of a bankruptcy estate upon the filing of a bankruptcy petition. Property included in the estate is defined very broadly and includes property that is subject to a security interest. United States v. Whiting Pools, Inc., 462 U.S. 198, 203-04, 103 S.Ct. 2309, 2313, 76 L.Ed.2d 515 (1983) ("Although Congress might have safeguarded the interests of secured creditors outright by excluding from the estate any property subject to a secured interest, it chose instead to include such property in the estate and to provide secured creditors with 'adequate protection' for their interests."). See Motorola, Inc. v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (In re Iridium Operating LLC), 478 F.3d 452, 461 (2d 2007) (declining to apply SPM to a proposed carve-out because until the settlement was approved, the property on which lender held its liens was still property of the estate).

Similarly, in this case, the assets that were to have been "gifted" to the unsecured creditors trust constituted property of the estate as they represented either property or proceeds of the debtors' property, albeit subject to Integreon's secured claim. 11 U.S.C. § 541 (a)(6) (property includes "proceeds, product, offspring, rents, or profits of or from property of the estate . . ."). Integreon was bargaining with estate property vis-a-vis its own lien and whatever

[6] Carve-outs also raise a host of other questions such as who will administer the funds in the carve-out. Ironically, parties usually seek to distribute the asserted "non-estate" property within the framework of the Bankruptcy Code such as asking the chapter 7 trustee to distribute the property and limiting distributions to only "allowed" claims. In SPM, for example, the Court of Appeals noted that the parties had asked the court to order the chapter 7 trustee to oversee the distribution of the proceeds to general unsecured creditors. 984 F.2d at 1319. In World Health the bankruptcy court points out that the case was being converted to chapter 7 which would terminate the existence of the Committee of Unsecured Creditors and it was not prepared to decide the myriad other practical issues that had been posed. 344 B.R. at 303.

it conceded or contributed was also estate property. The bankruptcy court properly concluded as much.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the bankruptcy court should be affirmed.

INTRODUCTION

The United States Trustee's opening brief establishes that the bankruptcy court erred when it ruled that 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) permits debtors to deduct retirement loan repayments, and that the debtors therefore passed section 707(b)(2)'s means test. The debtors have proffered a variety of arguments to support the bankruptcy court's ruling. In the end, however, they critically fail to explain how money a debtor borrows from his own retirement account can ever be a "debt" – much less a secured debt owed to a secured creditor – within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Code. The unavoidable fact is that section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) only allows a deduction under the means test for payments on account of "debts" that are "secured," calculated with reference to amounts due to "secured" creditors. The debtors' retirement plan loan repayments do not qualify under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) for at least three reasons.

First, retirement loans are not "debts" under 11 U.S.C. § 101(12) of the Bankruptcy Code because no debtor-creditor relationship exists between the debtors and their retirement plan administrator. Second, retirement loans are not "secured" obligations under 11 U.S.C. § 506 of the Bankruptcy Code because the debtors' interest in their retirement accounts was never property of their bankruptcy estate. Third, allowing debtors to claim retirement loan repayments under the means test would contravene the public policy objectives of bankruptcy reform legislation – to require debtors to repay their debts when they can.

Without the deduction for retirement plan loan repayments, the parties agree that the statutory presumption of abuse arises in this case. The debtors can only rebut this presumption by establishing "special circumstances" as defined in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B). Before the bankruptcy court ruled on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, the parties stipulated that the court would first decide only the legal issue of whether retirement plan loan repayments are allowable expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii). If necessary, the parties agreed that "special circumstances" would be addressed at a later evidentiary hearing. Notwithstanding this stipulation, however, the bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss without hearing any evidence, and found that the debtors' continued retirement loan repayments constituted "special circumstances."

As the United States Trustee established in the opening brief, the bankruptcy court erred by holding these debtors established special circumstances to rebut their failure to pass the means test because (a) the bankruptcy court did not hold an evidentiary hearing on this issue in violation of Bankruptcy Rule 9014(d), (b) these debtors never argued loan repayments constituted a special circumstance, and (c) these retirement plan loan repayments do not constitute special circumstances.

The debtors contend that retirement plan loan repayments are per se special circumstances if those payments bring the debtors monthly disposable income under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) under the presumption threshold. That argument must be wrong. Congress included in Section 707(b)(2)(A) the deductions to income to which debtors are always allowed. Allowing retirement plan loan repayments as per se special circumstances is equivalent to reading into Section 707(b)(2)(A) that retirement plan loan repayments are always allowable deductions, something Congress did not do. Second, the Bankruptcy Code provides examples of "special circumstances," and the principle of ejusdem generis provides that when general words follow specific words, the general must be of a similar nature to the specific words. Here, loan repayments are not similar to a serious medical condition or a call to duty in the armed forces.

Finally, the court's order discharging the debtor should be vacated pending a final hearing on the issue of special circumstances, so that the bankruptcy court can determine (i) whether the case should be dismissed and no discharge entered or (ii) whether the debtors can establish "special circumstances" to rebut the presumption of abuse and receive their discharge.

II. Section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) does not permit debtors to deduct retirement account loan repayments.

A. Debtors have not established the money they borrowed from their own retirement accounts qualifies as a "debt" under the Bankruptcy Code.

In his opening brief, the United States Trustee established that a debtor's retirement loan is not a "debt" under the Bankruptcy Code – a conclusion the Second Circuit has reached, and which the Sixth Circuit has followed. App. Brief at 17-19. In response, the debtors ask this Court to split with the Second and Sixth Circuits by ruling their retirement loans are debts under the Code. They do so under a misplaced theory that the plans have recourse against the debtors' property. The debtors reach this erroneous conclusion by misreading two cases, Johnson v. Home State Bank, 501 U.S. 78 (1991) and In re Lindsey, 995 F.2d 626 (5th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 1053 (1994).

These cases, however, are irrelevant. Both cases dealt with traditional debtor-creditor transactions in which third parties had claims against estate property that the debtors owned. In Johnson, that property was the debtor's farm, which the debtor was using and sought to retain through a chapter 13 repayment plan. Johnson, 501 U.S. at 80. In Lindsey, the debtor-partnership had control of farming property. Lindsey, 995 F.2d at 626. In both cases, the courts concluded that the lenders' contractual right to foreclose on the debtors' property was sufficient to qualify the obligation as a debt under the Bankruptcy Code, even though the debtors were not personally liable. Johnson, 501 U.S. at 84-85; Lindsey, 995 F.2d at 628.

In stark contrast, it is the retirement plan administrator, not the debtors, who have control of the funds in their retirement accounts. Further, unlike the property in Johnson and Lindsey, the debtors' retirement accounts are not property of the debtors' bankruptcy estate under section 541 of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 541 (defining property of the estate). Those cases do not rebut the point established in the United States Trustee's opening brief that the retirement plan is not a debt because the retirement plan cannot assert any right of payment against the debtors' bankruptcy estate.

Two additional factors differentiate Johnson and Lindsey from this case. First, Johnson and Lindsey were the product of traditional two party relationships involving a borrower and a lender. In contrast, unlike the banks in Johnson and Lindsey, the debtors in this case borrowed their own money. Cf. In re Fulton, 211 B.R. 247, 263 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1997) (noting, "by way of instruction," that "if the [retirement plan] administrator were to allow loans in excess of an employee's contributions, such loans would more properly be considered as 'debts.'").

Second, a retirement loan is distinct from the type of non-recourse loan at issue in Lindsey for three additional reasons. First, individuals can only "borrow" amounts that they previously contributed to their retirement account and cannot borrow new or additional money. See In re Devine, 1998 WL 386380 at * 9 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1998) (finding that an analogy between a mortgage and a retirement loan transaction was "strained," in part because a retirement plan, "no matter how it might be structured, gave the debtor a 'loan' of his own money."). Second, the bank in Lindsey presumably received some additional consideration, such as a higher interest rate or business goodwill, in exchange for relinquishing its powerful remedy of pursuing the individual partners' personal assets. Lindsey, 995 F.2d at 626-27 (noting that, "as with any non-recourse obligation, the note limited possible remedies," and that the debtor-partnership would not be personally liable for repayment). The debtors in this case provided no such additional consideration when they borrowed from their retirement accounts. Finally, if an individual fails to repay a retirement loan, such failure merely changes the nature of the withdrawal from a loan into a taxable distribution. It does not transform the withdrawal into a debt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Code.

B. No valid right of setoff exists to transform debtors' retirement loans into a "secured debt" under 11 U.S.C. § 506(a).

In his opening brief, the United States Trustee also demonstrated that the debtors' interest in their retirement accounts is not property of their bankruptcy estate under section 541. Accordingly, the United States Trustee argued that the debtors' interest cannot be a secured claim under section 506(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 506(a) limits a secured claim to the extent of a creditor's interest in the bankruptcy estate's interest in the property.

Debtors concede this point, but note that section 506(a) also provides that an allowed claim "that is subject to setoff under section 553 of [the Bankruptcy Code]" is also a secured claim "to the extent of the amount subject to setoff." Section 553 of the Bankruptcy Code[1]does not create an independent right to setoff, rather it > recognizes and preserves rights of setoff in bankruptcy cases if four conditions exist: (i) the creditor holds a "claim against the debtor that arose before the commencement of the case, (ii) the creditor owes a "debt" to the debtor that also arose before the commencement of the case, (iii) the claim and debt are "mutual," and (iv) the claim and debt are each valid and enforceable.

4 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 506.03[1][b] at 506-16 (15th ed. Rev. 2005).

Unfortunately for the debtors, no valid right of setoff exists under section 553(a). As the United States Trustee has already established, no creditor holds a claim against the debtors. In addition, even assuming for the sake of argument that the debtors' obligation to repay their retirement loans is a "debt" and the retirement plan's obligation to repay the funds in the debtors' retirement accounts is a "claim," the claim and the debt are not "mutual."

In order to satisfy the mutuality requirement, the debt and claim must be owed by each entity in the same rights or capacities. "Thus, for example, where the debt of an entity arises from a fiduciary duty, or is in the nature of a trust, there is no mutuality." In re County of Orange, 183 B.R. 609, 619 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1995); see Dakin v. Bayly, 290 U.S. 143, 146 (1933) (funds held in trust for a particular purpose may not be setoff against creditor's claims); Fore Improvement Corp. v. Selig, 278 F.2d 143, 145 (2d Cir. 1960); Cohen v Savings Building & Loan Co., 896 F.2d 54, 57-58 (3d Cir. 1990); In re Bob Richards Chrysler – Plymouth Corp., 473 F.2d 262, 265 (9th Cir. 1973).

This rule has been described in the following terms:

> If A in his individual capacity owes $100 to B in B's individual capacity, and B likewise owes $50 to A, the obligations are 'mutual.' On the other hand, if A in his individual capacity owes $100 to B, but B owes $50 to A in A's capacity as trustee of a trust, or as a fiduciary or agent for some other party, the obligations are not mutual because they are not acting in the same 'capacity.'

5 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 553.03[3][c] at 553-34 (15th ed. Rev. 2005). In this case, the debtors "owe" the plan administrator on account of the money the debtors borrowed from their retirement accounts. However, the retirement plan's obligation to receive the loan repayments and to remit funds in their retirement accounts are fiduciary obligations.

Because no setoff rights exist and because the debtors' bankruptcy estate does not have any interest in the debtors' retirement accounts, no secured debt exists under section 506(a) of the Bankruptcy Code.

III. The Bankruptcy Court Abused its Discretion by Holding that the Debtors' Retirement Plan Loan Repayments Constituted "Special Circumstances" Sufficient to Rebut the Presumption of Abuse Under § 707(b)(2).

Where the claim of special circumstances is contested, a court may only find that a debtor has demonstrated special circumstances to rebut the presumption of abuse after considering evidence. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014. Section 707(b)(2)(B) of the Bankruptcy Code has strict requirements about what a debtor must establish before the court may find special circumstances to rebut the presumption:

> (ii) In order to establish special circumstances, the debtor shall be required to itemize each additional expense or adjustment of income and to provide –
> > (I) documentation for such expense or adjustment to income; and > > (II) a detailed explanation of the special circumstances that make such expenses or adjustment to income necessary and reasonable.
> (iii) The debtor shall attest under oath to the accuracy of any information provided to demonstrate that additional expenses or adjustments to income are required.

No evidentiary hearing, however, was held in this case. Instead, the parties agreed that the bankruptcy court would decide on the briefs the legal issue regarding the propriety of deducting retirement plan loan repayments from the Means Test Form, and that if a hearing was needed on special circumstances, it would be held at a later date after the United States

Trustee conducted discovery on the issue (R. 26). By ruling without an evidentiary hearing, the bankruptcy court erred in finding special circumstances as an alternative ground for denying the motion to dismiss.

Appellees essentially argue that the court did not err because retirement plan loan contributions represent special circumstances per se. According to their brief, a bankruptcy court does not need to hold an evidentiary hearing because these payments may automatically be deducted from the disposable income determined under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) in determining whether the presumption of abuse was rebutted under section 707(b)(2)(B). That argument, however, would effectively rewrite the statute. Congress specifically listed in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) those items which may always be deducted. Adopting appellees' argument that a court can simply deduct the retirement plan loan repayments in determining whether special circumstances exist would essentially add to the statute an additional category of expenses that can always be deducted in the means test. Congress knew how to specify which expense categories are always deductible from current monthly income and it did so in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii). Courts may not add additional categories of allowable expenses to that list and retirement loan repayments are not on the list.

Moreover, Congress provided that the statutory presumption of abuse could only be rebutted by "special circumstances such as a serious medical condition or a call or order to active duty in the Armed Forces." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B)(I) (emphasis added). "Under the doctrine of 'ejusdem generis,' where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of persons or things, the general words will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated." First Am. Title

Ins. Co. v. First Trust Nat'l Ass'n (In Re Biloxi Casino Belle Inc.), 368 F.3d 491, 500 n. 8 (5th Cir. 2004). Therefore, only circumstances that are similar in nature to a “serious medical condition” or “a call or order to active duty in the Armed Forces” are sufficient to rebut the statutory presumption of abuse. In re Hanks, 2007 WL 60812 (Bankr. D. Utah 2007).

Retirement plan loan repayments are not similar in nature to a “serious medical condition” or “a call or order to active duty in the Armed Forces,” and therefore their existence does not constitute a special circumstance sufficient to rebut the presumption of abuse. See In re Johns, 342 B.R. 626, 629 (Bankr. E.D. Okla. 2006) (rejecting debtors' argument that their need to repay 401(k) loans and continue to make 401(k) contributions qualified as “special circumstances,” noting specifically that “the circumstances in the present case do not rise to the same level as a serious medical condition or a call to active duty.”). Therefore, the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in finding that the debtors established special circumstances to rebut the presumption of abuse.

The United States Trustee does recognize that the debtors did allege special circumstances based on future health care costs for their son. The debtors have provided no documentation to the United States Trustee on that issue. Moreover, the bankruptcy court has never heard testimony or considered other evidence on that issue. Therefore, the court should remand this case so that the debtors may attempt to demonstrate that they can establish special circumstances pursuant to section 707(b)(2)(B).

IV. The Court Should Order the Bankruptcy Court to Vacate the Order Granting Discharge.

The bankruptcy court entered two separate orders on November 2, 2006. The first order denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. The second order granted the debtors a discharge. Both orders were final and appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). Further, debtors do not dispute that the discharge order was entered erroneously. Appellee's Brief at 27. Nevertheless, debtors assert without citation to any case that the United States Trustee is barred from appealing the erroneously entered discharge order because he did not first seek relief under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(a) ("Rule 60(a)").

This gets the law entirely backwards. Under 28 U.S.C. § 158, this Court has jurisdiction to hear appeals from any final judgment, order or decree. Cf. David G. Knibb Federal Court of Appeals Manual, 28 (4th ed. 2000) ("Courts of appeals have jurisdiction over appeals 'from all final decisions of the district courts,' unless direct review by the Supreme Court is required."). Neither 28 U.S.C. § 158 nor Rule 60(a)2 says that rule 60 is a prerequisite to filing a notice of appeal.

By its plain language, Rule 60(a) relief is discretionary because the Rule provides that you "may" seek it – not that you are ever required to seek it. The United States Trustee has not been able to uncover a single court to ever hold that litigating a rule 60(a) motion is a prerequisite to filing a notice of appeal. To the contrary, commentators and courts presume that appeals can be filed without litigating Rule 60(a) motions. Knibb, Federal Court of Appeals Manual 452-454 (recognizing that Rule 60(a) motions and appeals are not mutually exclusive and that Rule 60(a) motions may be filed while an appeal is pending); United States v. 1,431.80 Acres of Land, 466 F.2d 820, 822 (8th Cir. 1972) (per curiam) (district court's retention of jurisdiction for future ministerial orders does not affect finality of original order); Rice v. Sunrise Express, Inc., 209 F.3d 1008, 1014 (7th Cir. 2000) (recognizing that a Rule 60(a) motion can be filed when a case is on appeal with leave from the appellate court).

Given the debtors' frank acknowledgment that the discharge order was not properly entered, this Court should vacate that order.

V. CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order denying the motion to dismiss the case entered below and remand this case with instructions to the bankruptcy court to correctly apply the statutory provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) and to vacate its Order Granting Discharge.

OF THE NINTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

a. Under the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 101-1300 and 28 U.S.C. 157(b), debtor, Danny Padilla filed a voluntary petition for Chapter 7 liquidation in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Central District of California. The debtor appealed the bankruptcy court's dismissal of his petition for bad faith under 11 U.S.C. 707(a). The Ninth Circuit's Bankruptcy Appellate Panel ("the panel" or "bankruptcy panel") properly asserted jurisdiction over this dismissal order under 28 U.S.C. 158(c), which authorizes appeals to bankruptcy appellate panels from bankruptcy courts' final orders.

b. This Court has jurisdiction over the appeal by the U.S. Trustee under 28 U.S.C. 158(d), which authorizes appeals to the federal courts of appeals from bankruptcy appellate panels' "final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees." As explained fully in Part I, infra, the panel's order is appealable under the four factor balancing approach this Court employs for determining whether orders are final for purposes of 28 U.S.C. 158(d). Walthall v. United States, 131 F.3d 1289, 1292 (9th Cir.1997), In Re Vylene Enterprises, Inc., 968 F.2d 887, 894 (9th Cir. 1992) (citations omitted). The bankruptcy panel's reversal of the bankruptcy court's dismissal of the petition "effectively determines the outcome of the case," and "resolves and seriously affects substantive rights and finally determines the discrete issue." See In Re Frontier Properties, 979 F.2d 1358, 1363 (9th Cir. 1992).

c. The bankruptcy panel entered its order on October 24 1997. The United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal on December 22, 1998 under Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1) and 6(b).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

(1) Whether, under 28 U.S.C. 158(d), the court of appeals has jurisdiction over the appeal of the panel's order remanding the case and reinstating the petition when, as here, the underlying bankruptcy court order is final; the order conclusively determines the legal issue in the case; and an immediate appeal could obviate subsequent judicial proceedings.

(2) Whether a petition based on a credit card bust-out -- whereby a debtor intentionally accumulates large consumer debt beyond his ability to repay in anticipation of later seeking a discharge in bankruptcy -- constitutes bad faith under 11 U.S.C. 707(a) and hence is subject to dismissal under that subsection.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The issue of jurisdiction and the scope of a dismissal of a bankruptcy petition for cause or bad faith under 11 U.S.C. 707(a) are legal questions, subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT

1. The Nature of the Case. In this bankruptcy proceeding, the U.S. Trustee moved for a dismissal of the debtor's petition for bad faith under section 707(a) since the petition was based on a credit card bust-out. A credit card bust-out occurs when debtors intentionally accumulate large consumer debt far beyond their ability to repay with the obvious intent to later seek a bankruptcy discharge. The bankruptcy court agreed with the U.S. Trustee that petitions based on credit card bust-outs constitute bad faith under the Code and thus dismissed the petition. The Ninth Circuit bankruptcy panel reversed and remanded, re-instituting the petition. While, the panel did not disagree that the debtor committed a credit card bust-out, the bankruptcy panel held that credit card bust-outs did not warrant dismissal of the petition under section 707(a).

The U.S. Trustee appeals this ruling.

2. Statutory Scheme of Relevant Provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. Under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code of 1978, 11 U.S.C. 101 et seq., a debtor can receive a discharge of all his/her debts. Several provisions of the Code set forth exceptions to the general rule of discharge. Section 727 permits an individual creditor or the U.S. Trustee to move to deny a debtor a discharge in its entirety if, among other things, the debtor is not an individual, the debtor has concealed financials documents, made false claims, or the debtor's activities indicate an intent to defraud a particular creditor or evade certain debts. 11 U.S.C. 727. For example, section 727(a)(2) provides that an individual's debts may not be discharged if, inter alia, > the debtor, with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor or an officer of the estate * * *, has transferred, removed, destroyed, mutilated, or concealed * * * property of the debtor, within one year before the date of * * * the petition; or * * * property of the estate, after the date of the filing of the petition.

Ibid. Similarly, section 523(a)(2) permits an individual creditor to challenge the dischargeability of particular debts for money, property, services etc., if obtained by

> (A) false pretenses, a false representation, or actual fraud, other than a statement respecting the debtor's * * * financial condition;
> (B) use of a statement in writing — (i) that is materially false; (ii) respecting the debtor's * * * financial condition; (iii) on which the creditor * * * reasonably relied and (iv) that the debtor cause to be made or published with intent to deceive; or
> (C) for purposes of subparagraph (A) * * * , consumer debts owed to a single creditor and aggregating more than $1,000 for "luxury goods or services" incurred * * * within 60 days before the order for relief under this title * * * are presumed to be nondischargeable.

11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2).

The Code also provides for dismissal of the entire petition in bankruptcy by the court or on motion of the U.S. Trustee in certain other circumstances. Under section 707(a) of the Code, a court may dismiss the petition by the debtor if there are grounds for a "for cause" dismissal including:

> (1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors; (2) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of Title 28; and (3) [the] failure of the debtor * * * to file within fifteen days * * * the information required by > paragraph (1) of section 521, but only on a motion of the United States trustee.

11 U.S.C. 707(a). The legislative history of section 707(a) explains that the list of grounds supporting a for cause dismissal is "illustrative," not "exhaustive." S. Rep. No. 95-989 at 94 (July 14, 1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5880. Subsection 707(b) likewise provides for dismissal of the petition sua sponte or on motion of the United States Trustee "if * * * the granting such relief would be a substantial abuse of the provisions of this chapter." 11 U.S.C. 707(b). Subsection 707(b) provides that there is a presumption in favor of granting bankruptcy relief in favor of the debtor. Ibid. Congress added subsection 707(b) to section 707 in the 1984 consumer credit amendments to the Bankruptcy Code. As the Senate Report to this subsection emphasized, one ground supporting a dismissal for substantial abuse is if the debtor has the ability to pay his debts. S. Rep. No. 98-65 at 54 (1983).

As explained above, the United States Trustee is authorized to move for dismissal of the petition under section 707. The United States Trustee -- not to be confused with the private individual who is appointed as bankruptcy trustee for a particular case -- is an Executive Branch official who is responsible for "protecting the public interest and ensuring that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to the law." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 109 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6070; see 28 U.S.C. 586; 11 U.S.C. 307; H.R. Rep. No. 99-764 at 27 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5227, 5240 (U.S. Trustee has "standing to raise, appear, and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under Title 11, U.S. Code -- except that the U.S. Trustee may not file a plan in a chapter 11 case"). See, infra, text at 17-18 (explaining U.S. Trustee's special role as enforcer of the Code).

3. Factual Background and Proceedings Below. On April 19 1996, Danny Padilla filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy under Chapter 7 (ER 1).[1] A few months later, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the petition under section 707(a) on the ground that the debtor's pre-petition activities constituted bad faith and thus a ground for dismissal under that subsection (id. at 40-43). Specifically, the U.S. Trustee argued that the debtor incurred large consumer debt of approximately $100,000 in the ten month period preceding the petition in anticipation of filing the bankruptcy petition (ibid.). Given that his income was in the mid $20,000 range and that his income exceeded his regular monthly expenses by only $120, the U.S. Trustee argued that the debtor incurred this debt as a "credit card bust-out" -- i.e., the debtor had no ability to repay the debt and incurred the debt with the intent to later seek a bankruptcy discharge (ibid.). The debtor's statement of financial affairs (a required attachment to a bankruptcy petition) showed that the debtor had incurred this debt in the ten month period preceding his filing of the Chapter 7 petition (ER 65). The statement also showed that the debtor incurred gambling losses of about $50,000 to $80,000 between December 1994 to September 1995 (id. at 27, Statement of Financial Affairs at 5). The schedules submitted with the petition revealed that the debtor sold items such as diamond rings, a Rolex watch, a television, VCR etc., to friends, tenants, and family members to finance the gambling (id. at 27-28, 65). In keeping with this lavish life style, the record showed that debtor took a trip to the Phillipines the year before filing and transferred $3,000 to his friends in the three month period preceding filing (id. at 25, 29, 65, Statement of Financial Affairs at 3, 7) .

[1] ER refers to the Excerpts of Record filed with this brief.

In view of the above facts, the U.S. Trustee urged dismissal of the petition based on bad faith under 11 U.S.C. 707(a) (ibid.). The bankruptcy court agreed, and dismissed the petition under section 707(a). Thereafter, the debtor appealed to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit ("the bankruptcy panel" or "the panel") (ER 56). The bankruptcy panel reversed, and remanded with instructions that the petition be re-instated (ER 59-67).

4. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision. In dismissing the petition, the bankruptcy court held that the debtor's credit card-bust out scheme constituted bad faith for purposes of section 707(a). The bankruptcy court ruled another policy factor favored dismissal (ER 50-51, Bankruptcy Court Transcript at 7-8). While the largest unsecured creditor -- the debtor owed American Express $50,000 -- did not seek an exception from discharge for the debt under sections 523 or 727, the bankruptcy court concluded that the U.S. Trustee has a separate interest in insuring that the Bankruptcy Code is not used by debtors for credit-card bust-out schemes (ibid.).[2]

5. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel's Decision. In reversing the final order of dismissal by the bankruptcy court, the bankruptcy panel agreed that the facts showed that the debtor had indeed engaged in a credit card bust-out scheme (ER 65). The panel also held, in agreement with bankruptcy court, that section 707(a) authorized dismissals for lack of good faith and that the U.S. Trustee could bring such dismissal motion as part of his "duty to prevent abuses in filing of petitions for relief under the Code" (ER 67). In this regard, the bankruptcy panel acknowledged

[2] The bankruptcy court observed that "ultimately the public * * * has to pay the price of all of this discharged debt. * * * It's the people that have to pay the increased interest rates because of people discharging their debts * * *." Ibid.

the substantial case authority holding that the list of grounds for dismissal under section 707(a) is illustrative, not exhaustive (id. at 62).

However, the bankruptcy panel disagreed that a credit card bust-out constituted bad faith for purposes of a section 707(a) dismissal (ER 65-66). Permitting dismissals of petitions for credit card bust-outs, in the view of the bankruptcy panel, did not comport with the purpose of the Bankruptcy Code (ibid.). The bankruptcy panel reasoned that the debtor did not lie or mislead the bankruptcy court (ibid.). Given these circumstances, incurring large debt in anticipation of filing for bankruptcy -- a credit card bust-out -- did not embody bad faith within the meaning of section 707(a) (ibid.). Rather, credit card bust-out schemes, in the bankruptcy panel's view, should only be subject to objections by creditors to dischargeability of individual debts -- on a debt-by-debt basis -- through section 523, or alternatively to objections to discharge altogether for reasons like fraud or concealment under section 727 of the Code (id. at 66). In the absence of these circumstances, the panel concluded that the Code could properly be used to give debtors 'a fresh start' and discharge all debts of a credit card bust-out scheme.

STATUTES INVOLVED

The relevant portions of the Bankruptcy Code are set out in the statutory addendum to this brief.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

Section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes dismissal of petitions in bankruptcy "for cause." In other words, debtors are not entitled to bankruptcy relief when their filing constitutes an improper use of the Code or overreaching. The question this case presents is whether petitions based on credit card bust-out schemes -- debtors who accumulate vast consumer debt beyond their ability to repay and with the intent to seek a bankruptcy discharge -- constitute such an improper use, falling within section 707(a)'s dismissals "for cause." To state the issue is to answer it. The bankruptcy appellate panel in holding to the contrary committed clear error.

As a threshold matter, however, the panel's order reversing the bankruptcy court's dismissal of the petition and reinstating it, is appealable under 28 U.S.C. 158(d). This Court's precedent makes clear that final orders of the bankruptcy courts which present dispositive, legal issues are appealable. This Court applies a four factor balancing test determining appealability in the bankruptcy context. Under this test, a bankruptcy panel's order remanding the case is appealable if an immediate appeal could avoid piecemeal litigation, enhance judicial economy, and not disturb the bankruptcy's court's premier role in developing facts. Here, this is clearly the case. The bankruptcy panel's disagreement with the bankruptcy court -- its holding that credit card bust-outs as a blanket matter do not constitute bad faith for purposes of dismissal under section 707(a) -- does not depend on any further factual development. Equally important, the issue is a discrete, legal issue. Should this Court hold that credit card bust-outs are subject to dismissal under section 707(a), additional, more time-consuming judicial proceedings will be avoided.

With respect to the merits, many courts have held that a section 707(a) dismissal is justified when there is bad faith, an improper use of the Code, or, quite simply, overreaching. It should be obvious that debtors who commit credit card bust-outs are not using the Code in good faith and are not the "honest but unfortunate" debtor that the Code is aimed at assisting with a fresh start. The panel's suggestion that a debtor must lie or mislead a court in order for there to be bad faith unduly narrows, indeed distorts, what a bad faith dismissal "for cause" should be. In any event, the U.S. Trustee's conclusion that debtors who engage in credit card bust-out schemes are not entitled to use the Bankruptcy Code is consistent with the purposes of bankruptcy relief. Congress entrusted the U.S. Trustee to administer and enforce the Code, as well as prevent this kind of overreaching. The panel's reasoning that only an individual creditor can object to dischargeability of particular debts on a debt-by-debt basis under sections 523, or that objections can only be made to deny discharge altogether for reasons of like outright fraud under section 727 of the Code misses the mark; this reasoning does not protect the larger public interest from broader misuse of the Code beyond outright fraud. Dismissing an entire bankruptcy petition, as the U.S. Trustee urged in this case, does. Section 707(a) in fact authorizes the U.S. Trustee to protect against system-wide bankruptcy misuse, such as credit-card bust-out schemes -- neither section 523 or 727 authorize denial of discharge altogether where, as here, there is no showing actual fraudulent intent. Congress assigned the U.S. Trustee the unique role of policing use of the Code; here, the policing is well within the bounds of the statute, and the panel's holding unjustifiably eviscerates it.

ARGUMENT

I. THIS COURT HAS JURISDICTION OVER THE APPEAL UNDER 28 U.S.C. 158(d).

Section 158(d) of Title 28 vests jurisdiction in the federal courts of appeals over appeals from bankruptcy appellate panels for "all final decisions, judgments, orders and decrees." 28 U.S.C. 158(d). This Court balances the following four factors in determining whether orders, including remands as in this case, are final for purposes of section 158(d):

> (1) the need to avoid piecemeal litigation; (2) judicial efficiency (3) the systemic interest in preserving the bankruptcy court's role as the finder of fact; and (4) whether delaying review would cause either party irreparable harm.

See. e.g., Walthall v. United States, 131 F.3d 1289, 1292 (9th Cir.1997); In Re Vylene Enterprises Inc., 968 F.2d 887, 895-96 (9th Cir. 1992). This balancing approach reflects this Court's recognition that there are certain proceedings in bankruptcy that are so conclusive and distinctive to the outcome that they should be appealable as of right. See ibid. These factors also seek to preserve the primacy of the bankruptcy court as the finder of fact.

This Court has thus held that bankruptcy appellate orders reversing and remanding final orders of the bankruptcy courts are appealable when they present legal issues and when the remand orders do not require further factual findings on a central issue. See, e.g., In Re Kelly, 841 F.2d 908, 911 (9th Cir. 1988). Indeed, even where the bankruptcy panel's order does remand for further factual development on a central issue, the Court has held that the Court has jurisdiction under section 158(d) if the central issue is legal in nature and its disposition could (1) obviate the need for further judicial proceedings by disposing of the entire case or (2) materially aid the bankruptcy court in reaching its disposition on remand. Walthall v. United States, 131 F.3d at 1292.

Applying the above principles to the present case, this Court plainly has jurisdiction over the bankruptcy panel's remand based on its holding that a credit card bust-out could not as a matter of law constitute bad faith for purposes of a section 707(a) dismissal. First, the remand order squarely presents a purely legal issue. In other words, the appeal here does not implicate the bankruptcy court's role as finder of fact since the remand was not based on further factual development -- in fact both the bankruptcy court and panel agreed that the debtor had engaged in a credit card bust-out scheme. Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, under the four-factor balancing test of Vylene Enterprises, judicial efficiency will be enhanced by immediate appeal. An immediate decision reversing the decision below will end the litigation now and permanently; piecemeal litigation would be avoided. In contrast, if reversal were to come later -- after the remand to the bankruptcy court, after proceedings in that court on bankruptcy and discharge, after another final decision in the bankruptcy court, and after yet another decision of the bankruptcy panel -- judicial resources would be wasted. Accordingly, under Vylene Enterprises' balancing approach, this Court has jurisdiction in this case.

This Court's ruling in the Kelly case is instructive. There, the Court held that the bankruptcy panel's remand on the proper test for "substantial abuse" under a section 707(b) dismissal was appealable under 28 U.S.C. 158(d), for the issue was "clearly one of law." In Re Kelly, 841 F.2d at 911. A fortiorari, the bankruptcy panel's remand here interpreting the scope of a section 707(a) dismissal on bad faith to exclude credit card bust-outs must also be appealable under 28 U.S.C. 158(d). Indeed, even if the remand required further factual development -- which it does not -- it is appealable, as this Court has ruled, for it obviates the need for further judicial proceedings. See Walthall v. United States, 131 F.3d at 1292.

II. PETITIONS BASED ON CREDIT CARD BUST-OUTS SCHEMES ARE PROPERLY SUBJECT TO DISMISSAL UNDER 11 U.S.C. 707(a) SINCE SUCH SCHEMES ARE AN IMPROPER USE OF BANKRUPTCY AND CONSTITUTE BAD FAITH .

A. Bad Faith Is A Ground For A Dismissal 'For Cause' Under Section 707(a).

Section 707(a) of title 11 of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a court may dismiss a bankruptcy petition, > only after notice and a hearing and only for cause, including --

> (1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;
> and (2) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter

> 123 of Title 28; and (3) the failure of the debtor * * * to file within fifteen days * * * the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521, but only on a motion of the United States trustee.

11 U.S.C. 707(a). As the text makes clear, a case may be dismissed on any ground constituting "for cause" and the statute sets out a few specific examples such as unreasonable delay or nonpayment of required fees. The legislative history of section 707(a), too, emphasizes that the list of grounds supporting a for cause dismissal is "illustrative," not "exhaustive." S. Rep. No. 95-989 at 94 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5880.

Many courts, including the Supreme Court, have ruled that a prerequisite to bankruptcy relief is good faith. Thus, the Supreme Court has declared that bankruptcy is of course equitable and for "the honest but unfortunate debtor." Brown v. Felsen, 442 U.S. 127, 128 (1979) (citation omitted) (emphasis added). Consistent with this reasoning, the Fifth Circuit has also observed that the Bankruptcy Code of 1978 is "endowed with requirements of good faith in the construction of many of its provisions" and that "[e]very bankruptcy statute since 1898 has incorporated literally, or by judicial interpretation, a standard of good faith for the commencement, prosecution, and confirmation of bankruptcy proceedings." In Re Little Creek Development Co., 779 F.2d 1068, 1071-72 (5th Cir. 1986).

Indeed, in Little Creek, the Fifth Circuit held that good faith is an inherent condition to the operation of the automatic stay provisions of the Code. Ibid. Accordingly, the court of appeals held that bad faith constituted an implied ground for lifting the stay under the "for cause" language of 11 U.S.C. 362(d), the subsection that provides relief from the automatic stay. That provision authorizes a court to grant relief from a stay -- like section 707(a) -- "for cause." 11 U.S.C. 362(d)(1). Based on similar reasoning, the Sixth Circuit held that given the bedrock principle that the Bankruptcy Code requires good faith before receiving its relief, the absence of good faith in filing embodies a "for cause" ground for dismissal within the meaning of section 707(a). In Re Zick, 931 F.2d 1124, 1126-29 (6th Cir. 1991). In so doing, the Sixth Circuit explained that "including" is not limiting language, and that it is appropriate to incorporate the Bankruptcy Code's good faith requirement into the parameters of section 707(a). Ibid.

These holdings reflect the broader concerns that underlie Congress' enactment of section 707. Subsection 707(b), for instance, authorizes dismissal of petitions based on substantial abuse, such as when debtors have the clear ability to repay their debts. See, e.g., In Re Kelly 841 F.2d 908, 914-15 (9th Cir. 1988); In Re Huckfeldt, 39 F.3d 829, 831 (8th Cir. 1994). Subsection 707(a), as discussed above, protects the public from misuse of the Bankruptcy Code by authorizing outright dismissals of bankruptcy cases in circumstances that supply a "for cause" ground for dismissal. The fundamental thrust of section 707 is to protect the public interest by preventing any kind of misuse of the Code.

For all these reasons, the lack of good faith is a "for cause" ground for dismissal under section 707(a). Neither the bankruptcy court nor the bankruptcy panel erred in so holding (ER 50-51,67). To be sure, the Eighth Circuit has ruled that it prefers dismissals based on this kind of improper use of the Code or misconduct to be called "for cause" rather than "bad faith." In Re Huchfeldt 39 F.3d at 832. But, the terminology is interchangeable for purposes of section 707(a). In Huckfeldt, the court of appeals held that a debtor's motive for filing a petition --evasion of debts imposed by a divorce decree and an attempt to "unload" all the debts incurred in a 12 year marriage to his spouse -- supported a "for cause" dismissal. Id. at 830, 832-33. This motive constitutes bad faith. But whatever the label, section 707(a) protects against improper use of bankruptcy relief.

B. Debtors Who Accumulate Large Debt With The Intent To Seek A Later Bankruptcy Discharge -- A Credit Card Bust-Out -- Are Not Entitled To Bankruptcy Relief And Hence Their Petitions Are Subject To Dismissal Under Section 707(a).

A credit card bust-out is just such an improper use of bankruptcy relief and should be dismissed for bad faith by operation of section 707(a)'s authorization for dismissal "for cause." As the Sixth Circuit in Zick ruled, there are a variety of circumstances that manifest bad faith -- an improper use of the Bankruptcy Code -- such as, concealed assets, excessive and continued lavish lifestyle, and an intent to avoid one single large creditor. In Re Zick, 931 F.2d at 1128. Bad faith is "conduct akin to fraud, misconduct, or gross negligence." Ibid.. Quite simply, any circumstances that reveal "the unfairness of the debtor's use of Chapter 7 under the facts" fall within the scope of a bad faith dismissal under section 707(a). Ibid. Consequently, an intent to evade the debts incurred in a marriage by operation of a divorce decree as in Huckfeldt, or an intent to evade a judgment of a court awarding damages for breach of contract as in Zick, are improper uses of the Code justifying a section 707(a) dismissal. Moreover, as the Sixth Circuit ruled in Zick, an examination of the pre-petition activities of the debtor may also indicate bad faith. In Re Zick, 931 F.2d at 1125-26, 1129. In Zick, the debtor left a company, signed a non-competition agreement, solicited his former company's customers, a court awarded damages against him for these activities, and then immediately thereafter, filed a petition in bankruptcy. Ibid.

Here, it is clear that a credit card bust-out scheme is exactly the kind of improper use of the Code -- or bad faith -- that section 707(a) is aimed at preventing. It can hardly be appropriate to incur large amounts of consumer debt beyond any intent to pay -- indeed with the obvious intent to avoid repaying by filing for bankruptcy. It would distort the purposes of bankruptcy relief beyond recognition to allow people to incur large debt in anticipation of filing a bankruptcy petition and obtaining a discharge. A credit card bust-out embodies the species of misconduct that the courts of appeals in Zick, and Huckfeldt have held reveal bad faith or 'for cause', and warrant dismissal of the petition.

Both the bankruptcy court and panel found that the debtor engaged in a credit card bust-out (ER 50, 65). The debtor's petition and required attachments undisputedly show a credit card bust-out. In fact, as the panel found, the debtor incurred some of these debts to subsidize his gambling (ER 27-28, 65). Debtor prior to filing engaged in a lavish lifestyle, purchasing and selling expensive items (ER 25, 29, 65). Equally important, the debtor incurred debt of almost $100,000 in the ten month period preceding his filing when his monthly income exceeded his expenses by only $120 (ER 42, 65). Based on these facts, both the bankruptcy court and panel found the debtor engaged in a credit card bust-out.

And based on these findings and this record, there should certainly be no question that the debtor is not entitled to seek haven in a bankruptcy discharge. This kind of conduct is an improper use of the Code; it is "akin to fraud, misconduct or gross negligence" under the Sixth Circuit's reasoning. The debtor's use of the Code, in short, reveals "unfairness, see, Zick, 931 F.2d at 1128. The bankruptcy panel committed serious legal error in holding the credit card bust-outs do not constitute bad faith for purposes of dismissal under section 707(a). Neither logic nor common sense supports the panel's conclusion. Moreover, as we showed above, this conclusion betrays a misunderstanding of the purposes of bankruptcy relief.

In the panel's view, since the debtor did not lie and mislead the court, there was no bad faith (ER 65). But, there is no requirement that a debtor must lie to a court in order for there to be bad faith or the type of misconduct that is a "for cause" ground for a section 707(a) dismissal. And, while the panel did declare that there was no intent to abuse the bankruptcy process, this is simply wrong (ER 65). Use of the bankruptcy process to accumulate debt with the obvious intent to subsequently file for bankruptcy to eliminate it is a paradigmatic misuse of bankruptcy.

It is well-established that the U.S. Trustee administers the Bankruptcy Code and, in that capacity, has important and independent role in insuring the laws of the Code are properly enforced. See, e.g., In Re Columbia Gas Sys. Inc., 33 F.3d 294, 296-97 (3d Cir. 1994); In Re Clark, 927 F.2d 793, 795-96 (4th Cir. 1991); In Re Revco D.S. Inc., 898 F.2d 498, 499-500 (6th Cir. 1990). Thus, the Sixth and Fourth Circuits have ruled that "[t]he trustee serves the role of 'protecting the public interest and ensuring that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law.' " In Re Clark, 927 F.2d at 795; In Re Revco, 898 F.2d at 500 (further citation omitted). In fact, the Fourth Circuit acknowledged this role of the U.S. Trustee in a suit where the U.S. Trustee sought to enforce dismissal of the petition by virtue of very same section at issue in this case, section 707, albeit a different subsection. In Re Clark, 927 F.2d at 793. There, the U.S. Trustee sought dismissal based on substantial abuse under subsection (b).[3] Ibid.

Congress established the office of the U.S. Trustee in enacting the Bankruptcy Code of 1978 "to aid in the administration of bankruptcy" and to serve as enforcer of the Code, representing the larger public interest. H. Rep. No. 95-595 at 404, reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, [3] While the U.S. Trustee did not assert below that a credit card bust-out constitutes a substantial abuse for purposes of subsection 707(b), a credit card bust-out falls within the parameters of subsection (b) as well as (a).

5963, 6360, 6049, 6070-71 (1977). Congress likened the role of the U.S. Trustee to that of a prosecutor, explaining > the prosecutor is not an assistant to the court, but has an independent executive duty to pursue. Likewise, the United States trustee will be responsible for certain administrative, or executive duties, * * * That he [the trustee] will frequently appear in the same bankruptcy court does not detract from his independent obligation to execute and enforce the bankruptcy laws.

Id. at 6072. Congress declared in no uncertain terms, that the U.S. Trustee acts as watchdog preventing "fraud, dishonesty and overreaching in the bankruptcy area." Id. at 6049.

Here, the U.S. Trustee determined that using the Code for credit card bust-outs schemes constitutes the kind of overreaching that warrants dismissal under section 707(a). This determination, as we showed, supra at 13-17, is in keeping with the purposes of bankruptcy relief; it is supported by the language of section 707(a) and substantial case authority. The bankruptcy court agreed, and exercised appropriate discretion in dismissing the case.

It bears emphasis that the Trustee's conclusion on credit card bust-out schemes is true whether a bust-out is called 'bad faith' or "for cause" within the meaning of section 707(a). Either way, debtors who engage in this practice are not entitled to bankruptcy relief.

It is no answer to declare as the bankruptcy appellate panel reasoned, that creditors may challenge, in an adversarial context, the dischargeability of particular debts under, e.g., section 523(a)(2), or that individual creditors or the U.S. Trustee may oppose discharge altogether under section 727(a)(2) for reasons like outright fraud and concealment. These remedies, see text supra at 3-4, apply where it can be shown that a debtor’s fraudulent intent warrants denial of discharge, or when other grounds not relevant here exist, such as when the debtor is not an individual, or has disobeyed a court order. 11 U.S.C. 727(a)(1), (6)(A). The availability of these remedies does not, however, negate the U.S. Trustee’s right to seek dismissal “for cause” under section 707(a) where, as here, a debtor’s pre-petition conduct evidences bad faith which may not rise to the level of fraudulent intent contemplated by Code sections 523(a)(2) and 727(a)(2). Stated simply, section 707(a) allows the U.S. Trustee and the bankruptcy court to protect against systemic abuses of the bankruptcy process -- such as credit card bust-out schemes. In this case, where there was no showing of actual fraudulent intent by the debtor, section 707(a) provides the only remedy against abuse of the system.

The Trustee's determination that the debtors who seek a bankruptcy discharge for credit card bust-outs are not entitled to a discharge is consistent with the Trustee's role in administering the Bankruptcy Code and preventing overreaching. Congress contemplated that the U.S. Trustee and bankruptcy courts would examine any impact on the larger public interest. Accordingly, dismissing petitions based on an indisputable credit card bust-out under section 707(a) comports with the public interest and with the Bankruptcy Code scheme.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the bankruptcy appellant panel's decision should be reversed and the debtor's petition in bankruptcy should be dismissed pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 707(a).

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES BANKRUPTCY PANEL OF THE NINTH CIRCUIT

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

This appeal presents the straightforward question of whether debtors who accumulate excessive debt far beyond their means to repay, and in obvious anticipation of filing for bankruptcy, are entitled to seek and obtain a bankruptcy protection. The answer to this question has to be no, and section 707(a) protects precisely against this type of misuse of the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. 707(a). The debtor in his response does little to address this important question. Instead, he relies on other inapposite provisions of the Code that address concerns — for example the prevention of actual fraud or concealment of assets — different than those of section 707(a). Section 707(a), in contrast, is aimed at a broader goal, namely protecting the public interest by preventing systemic misuse or unfair use of the Code. The debtor in essence ignores section 707, and its authorization for dismissals of bankruptcy petitions "for cause." We file this reply to clarify any misapprehensions raised by the debtor's brief and to address two threshold jurisdictional questions.

I. THE ORDER OF THE BANKRUPTCY PANEL REVERSING THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S DISMISSAL OF THE CASE FOR BAD FAITH IS APPEALABLE.

In our opening brief, we demonstrated that the bankruptcy appellate panel's ("bankruptcy panel") order here is final under 28 U.S.C. 158(d). In determining finality under 28 U.S.C. 158(d), this Court has established specialized rules for bankruptcy proceedings, recognizing that "'certain proceedings in a bankruptcy case are so distinct and conclusive either to the rights of individual parties or the ultimate outcome."' In Re Rega Properties, 894 F.2d 1136, 1138 (9th Cir. 1990) (citations omitted). Accordingly, this Court has undertaken a "pragmatic approach," ibid., and has developed a four-part test.[1/] Furthermore, as explained in our main brief at 11-12, this Court has held that bankruptcy appellate orders reversing and remanding final orders of the bankruptcy courts are appealable when they present legal issues and when the remand orders do not require further factual findings on a central issue. This order falls squarely within these parameters; the bankruptcy panel's

[1/] The four-part test consists of:

> (1) the need to avoid piecemeal litigation; (2) judicial efficiency; (3) the systemic interest in preserving the bankruptcy court's role as the finder of fact; and (4) whether delaying review would cause either party irreparable harm.

See. e.g., Walthall v. United States, 131 F.3d 1289, 1292 (9th Cir.1997); In Re Vylene Enterprises Inc., 968 F.2d 887, 895-96 (9th Cir. 1992).

holding that credit card bust-out schemes do not fall within section 707(a)'s dismissal for cause provision satisfies the four-part test because it presents a purely legal issue, the resolution of which could dispose of the entire case and avoid further time-consuming judicial proceedings. 11 U.S.C. 707(a).

Debtor largely ignores this Court's pragmatic, four-part test, and cites general propositions of law with little analysis. Deb. Br. 7-10. Moreover, debtor is wrong in implying that if there is the potential for further proceedings, the order is not final. Deb. Br. 10. This Court's four-part test contradicts this erroneous proposition. Indeed, this proposition flies in the face of this Court's holding in In Re Kelly, 841 F.2d 908, 911 (9th Cir. 1988), that the bankruptcy panel's remand, establishing the test for dismissals for "substantial abuse" under subsection 707(b), is appealable. Debtor's reliance on In Re Rega Properties and In Re Lievsay is thus misplaced. Deb. Br. 7-10. Those cases do not set forth a broad rule of law declaring that whenever there are possible further proceedings in bankruptcy which could affect the outcome, an order is not final. In Re Lievsay, 118 F.3d 661 (9th Cir. 1997); In Re Rega Properties, 894 F.2d 1136 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 898 (1990). In fact, Rega Properties emphasized the specialized set of rules for determining bankruptcy finality and directed most of its discussion to situations where the bankruptcy court denies motions to dismiss. In Re Rega Properties, 894 F.2d at 1138. Further, Rega did not address any discrete legal issue that would satisfy this Court's four-part test for section 158(d) appealability. Ibid. Similarly, Lievsay involved an appeal where, unlike here, the underlying bankruptcy court's order was not final. Here, the bankruptcy court granted the dismissal motion, and the bankruptcy panel reversed. In Re Lievsay, 118 F.3d at 661. In any event, none of these cases purported to modify this Court's basic four-part test set forth in In Re

Debtor is equally wide of the mark in suggesting that the panel's decision amounts to a disagreement over facts and not an appealable legal issue. Deb. Br. 9. The bankruptcy court and the bankruptcy panel agreed that: the debtor incurred the excessive debt to subsidize his gambling, the debtor prior to filing engaged in a lavish lifestyle, purchasing and selling expensive items, and the debtor incurred debt of almost $100,000 in the ten month period preceding his filing when his monthly income exceeded his expenses by only $120 (ER 27-29, 42, 50, 65).[3] Debtor's statement of financial affairs and attached schedules, in any event, speak for themselves (ER 25-29). Where the lower courts parted company is on whether this set of facts — called a credit card bust-out — constitute a "for cause" or bad faith ground for dismissal within the meaning of section 707(a). Stated differently, there are no further findings of fact on the central issue of whether the bankruptcy filing warrants a section 707(a) dismissal "for cause."

Nonetheless, even if further factual development follows a remand, this Court has made it clear that remands are final under section 158(d) if the legal issue could cut off further proceedings or materially aid the bankruptcy court in its resolution of the issues. See Opening Br. 11. And, a holding by this Court that filings based on credit card bust-out schemes are properly subject to a section 707(a) dismissal would certainly cut off further proceedings.

[2] Nor does this Court's decision in In Re Universal Life Church, Inc., 128 F.3d 1294, 1300 (9th Cir. 1997) dictate the conclusion that the remand order in this case is not appealable as debtor suggests. Deb. Br. 8. The Court lacked jurisdiction over the order there because the district court, acting as an appellate court, did not rule on the issue on appeal. Id. at 1330.

[3] "ER" refers to the Excerpts of Record filed with our opening brief.

II. THIS APPEAL IS NOT MOOT.

In this case, the U.S. Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from the bankruptcy panel's order reversing the bankruptcy court's dismissal and remanding the case to the bankruptcy court for reinstatement of the petition (ER 59-67). Despite this notice, the bankruptcy court implemented the remand and entered a discharge for debtor on February 3, 1998 (ER 75). By virtue of this discharge, debtor argues that this appeal is now moot. Deb. Br. 12. This appeal, however, is not moot. Simply put, this Court has jurisdiction to reverse the reinstatement order of the bankruptcy panel and set aside the discharge, because debtor's right to receive the discharge is already before this Court by virtue of the government's notice of appeal, and hence the bankruptcy court lacked jurisdiction to enter any discharge.

The remand and reinstatement order is clearly an appealable final order under 28 U.S.C. 158(d), see Opening Br.10-12 and text above. As such, the bankruptcy court below lacked jurisdiction to implement any remand and issue a discharge, for it is well-settled that "an appeal to the circuit court deprives a district court of jurisdiction as to any matters involved in the appeal." Thomas, Head and Greisen Employees Trust v. Buster, 95 F.3d 1449, 1490 n.19 (9th Cir. 1996) (citations omitted), cert. denied, 117 S. Ct. 1247 (1997). A timely notice of appeal deprives a district court or the relevant lower court of jurisdiction to enter subsequent orders. As the Supreme Court elucidated, > the filing of a notice of appeal is an event of jurisdictional significance — it confers jurisdiction on the court of appeals and divests the district court of its control over those aspects of the case involved in the appeal.

Griggs v. Provident Consumer Discount Co., 459 U.S. 56, 58 (1982).

Equally important, this Court has made it clear that it has appellate jurisdiction to: (1) determine the jurisdiction of a district court to enter an order after the filing of a notice of appeal, even when there is no separate notice of appeal filed as to that subsequent order and (2) if the district court lacked jurisdiction, to rule on the merits of a subsequent order and to set aside such an order. Thomas, Head and Greisen Employees Trust v. Buster, 95 F.3d at 1460 n.19. No notice of appeal for the subsequent order is required in these circumstances because the district court has been divested of jurisdiction as a result of the filing of the earlier notice of appeal. See, e.g., Griggs v. Provident Consumer Bank, 459 U.S. at 58. A notice of appeal filed in these circumstances is unnecessary because the district court simply did not have jurisdiction to enter the subsequent order -- the case is now in the court of appeals. These principles of course apply equally to bankruptcy courts sitting as a trial court.

This Court has before it on appeal the reversal of the bankruptcy court's order dismissing the Chapter 7 petition for bad faith under section 707(a) and remanding the case for reinstatement of the petition. At issue, then, is debtor's right to file the bankruptcy petition in the first place and his right to receive a discharge. As such, the bankruptcy court had no jurisdiction to proceed with the remand and enter a discharge — because the remand and ability to receive a discharge are already on appeal. In other words, this Court on appeal is ruling on debtor's right to receive a discharge: a dismissal of the petition for bad faith under section 707(a) forecloses the discharge and an affirmance of the bankruptcy panel's rejection of a section 707(a) dismissal permits the discharge to proceed. In fact, a discharge here, barring a dismissal for bad faith, would be a foregone conclusion since none of the creditors objected and debtor otherwise would qualify for a discharge. See In Re Lelon C. Dietz, 914 F.2d 161, 164 (9th Cir. 1990).

Accordingly, this Court has the power to grant complete relief to the U.S. Trustee by dismissing the petition for bad faith under section 707(a) and setting aside the discharge. See Thomas, Head and Greisen Employees Trust v. Buster, 95 F.3d at 1460 n.19. The appeal is therefore not moot. For these reasons, debtor's assertions — that without the filing of another notice of appeal from the discharge unlawfully entered by the bankruptcy court or without the filing of a stay in the courts below, this Court cannot enter relief by revoking the discharge — are without merit.[4/] Deb. Br. 12.

Indeed, even if the bankruptcy court had the jurisdiction to enter the discharge — which it did not — the appeal is not moot in this case, because the order of discharge in these particular circumstances is a ministerial act: the discharge was automatic once debtor's petition was reinstated. It is well-settled that the payment of money or post-judgment orders implementing a money judgment does not moot an appeal. The payment of money can be undone and the post-judgment orders rescinded. So too here — if this Court reverses and orders dismissal of the petition under section 707(a), the ministerial act of discharge in this case can easily be undone by the bankruptcy court. The order of discharge therefore does not moot this appeal. The bankruptcy court, on remand from this Court, would simply need to aside the ministerial acts of closure and the discharge.

[4/] A stay of the bankruptcy proceedings, however, may be necessary in some Chapter 11 reorganization proceedings. This Court has ruled that a stay is warranted in certain Chapter 11 reorganization proceedings even when there is a pending appeal, because the interest in the orderly administration of the bankruptcy estate pursuant to a reorganization plan is paramount. See In Re Roberts Farms, Inc., 652 F.2d 793, 796 (9th Cir. 1981). See also In Re Dorwin Cook, 730 F.2d 1324, 1326 (9th Cir. 1984) (appeals moot when appeals were from interlocutory orders pursuant to the Chapter 11, and no notice of appeal filed from confirmation Chapter 11 plan before debtor voluntarily converted Chapter 11filing to Chapter 7). The present case however is a Chapter 7 case and these considerations ought not to apply.

III. SECTION 707(a) PROTECTS AGAINST SYSTEMIC MISUSE OF THE BANKRUPTCY PROCESS AND DISCHARGE, INCLUDING CREDIT CARD BUST-OUTS.

The language of section 707, its legislative history and purpose, and section 707 jurisprudence all show that dismissals under this section are warranted whenever access to the bankruptcy process or discharge results in an improper use of the Code or shows overreaching. See Opening Br. 15-20. The purpose of both subsections 707(a) and (b) are to protect the public from unfair use of the bankruptcy system, and to prevent filings that cumulatively would result in systemic misuse of bankruptcy. Ibid. Further, the U.S. Trustee in conjunction with the bankruptcy courts are uniquely situated to help prevent such misuse by employing the section 707(a) dismissal mechanism. See id. at 17-19. Credit card bust-out schemes are certainly just such an unfair use of the Code, and fall squarely within section 707(a)'s provision for dismissals "for cause" or for bad faith. See id. at 15-20.

Debtor nonetheless disregards or misunderstands the specialized and unique nature of the section 707 dismissal mechanism; he mistakenly relies on sections 523(a)(2) and 727(a)(2), equating them with the section 707(a) mechanism. 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2), 727(a)(2). These two other provisions, however, function differently or have different objectives from those of section 707(a). Section 523(a)(2) permits individual creditors to object to particular debts, debt-by-debt, on grounds of fraud or false financial documents. 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2). Section 707(a) in contrast authorizes a bar to access to the bankruptcy process and a blanket bar to discharge of all debts. Section 727(a)(2) bars discharge by motion of the U.S. Trustee or individual creditors when the debtor has committed actual fraud, or the debtor has disobeyed a court order, or on other grounds not relevant here. See Opening Br. 19. Neither of these sections protect against system-wide misuse of the bankruptcy process that do not involve actual fraud, as does section 707.

For these reasons, debtor's assertions that there must be actual fraud, concealment of assets, or misrepresentations in his financial schedules do not withstand analysis. See Deb. Br. 15-16. These assertions write section 707 out of the Code altogether. Nothing in section 707 requires that bad faith or "for cause" dismissals be based only on a showing of actual fraud or lying. Nor does the case law on section 707(a) require proof of actual fraud. See cases & text in Opening Br. 13-16.

Finally, debtor is simply wrong in declaring that a section 707(a) dismissal deprives him of due process protections available under sections 523 and 727. Deb. Br. 17. In a section 707(a) proceeding, the debtor has notice of the U.S. Trustee's motion to dismiss or the court's own motion, there is a hearing, and the debtor has an opportunity to respond and conduct full discovery. The U.S. Trustee carries the burden of establishing that dismissal is warranted under section 707. This process is similar to the process by which a creditor may object to the dischargeability of particular debts or to discharge altogether.[5/]

[5/] Moreover, the notion that a debtor may exempt certain income under state law by virtue of 11 U.S.C. 522(b)(1), (2) after filing the petition has no bearing on whether particular facts — like gambling debts paid off prior to filing the petition — may manifest, together with other facts, a credit card bust-out. See Deb. Br. 18.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons and for those stated in our opening brief, the bankruptcy appellant panel's decision should be reversed, the debtor's petition in bankruptcy should be dismissed pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 707(a), and the bankruptcy court's discharge should be set aside.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over the debtor's bankruptcy case under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b), and 1334(a). The bankruptcy court denied confirmation of the debtor's chapter 13 plan by order entered December 27, 2006. Appellant's Appendix Excerpts of the Record (hereinafter "ER") 236. On May 10, 2007, the bankruptcy court dismissed the debtor's bankruptcy case. ER 253. The debtor timely filed a notice of appeal of the dismissal order on May 17, 2007. ER 254-255. Under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (b)(1), and the Amended Order Continuing the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit, this Court has jurisdiction of the appeal of the dismissal order.

STATEMENT OF ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court erred in holding that the debtor's projected disposable income under section 1325(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code is not determined by simply multiplying the debtor's disposable income, as defined in section 1325(b)(2), by the number of months in the chapter 13 plan, with no other adjustments.[1]

STATEMENT OF CASE

On October 31, 2005, John Pak filed for bankruptcy protection under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. ER 1-3. On April 14, 2006, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss Mr. Pak's case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3), asserting it would be an abuse of chapter 7 to grant Mr. Pak a discharge without attempting to repay his debt. Appendix to Principal Brief of Appellee-Claimant eCast Settlement Corporation, Tab 2, pp. 7-17. On May 18, 2006, the bankruptcy court granted the United States Trustee's section 707(b)(3) motion. Appendix to Principal Brief of Appellee-Claimant eCast Settlement Corporation, Tab 3, pp. 18-32. On May 31, 2006, the bankruptcy court granted Mr. Pak's request to convert his bankruptcy case to a case under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code.

On August 29, 2006, two of Mr. Pak's creditors, American Express Centurion Bank and eCAST Settlement Corporation, filed a joint objection to confirmation of Mr. Pak's proposed chapter 13 plan under 11 U.S.C. § 1324(a). ER 138-145. On August 30, 2006, the chapter 13 trustee filed an objection to confirmation of Mr. Pak's proposed chapter 13 plan under section 1324(a). ER 124-135. The Trustee asserted that the bankruptcy court could not confirm Mr. Pak's proposed chapter 13 plan because it did not propose to pay unsecured creditors all of Mr. Pak's "projected disposable income" over the plan term, as required by 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1). ER 125.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory Background

In 2005, Congress passed and the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005) (BAPCPA).

One of the innovations of the BAPCPA was means-testing. In section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code, which addresses dismissal of abusive chapter 7 petitions, Congress established special rules for debtors whose current monthly income, reduced by certain permitted expenses, exceeded a threshold for abuse under a specified formula. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). This amendment changed the way these expenses were computed; some were no longer the debtor's actual and reasonable expenses but instead were standard expenses under the National Standards and Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the debtor's area of residence. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii).

Congress also applied means-testing to chapter 13 cases, like this one. Before the BAPCPA amendments were enacted, section 1325, governing confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, required such a plan to provide that all of the debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period would be used to repay debts. Disposable income was calculated from the debtor's actual income and expenses set forth on Schedules I and J. But the BAPCPA amended section 1325 to change the definition of "disposable income."

The new section 1325(b)(2) defines "disposable income" to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor . . . less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for the maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2).[2] This definition incorporates two changes: first, it defines "disposable income" based on an average of past monthly income and expense figures; and second, for debtors with income above the state median, it specifies that "amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" are to be calculated using the same standard expenses mandated for certain chapter 7 debtors under section 707(b)(2). Specifically, section 1325(b)(3) now directs that reasonable expenses be determined "in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2)" for those chapter 13 debtors whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is greater than the median family income for a family of the corresponding size. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3). Chapter 13 debtors in this class are typically referred to as "above-median" debtors. Debtors, such as Mr. Pak, whose annualized current monthly income is below median, are not limited to the standard expenses in section 707(b)(2) in determining amounts reasonably necessary to be expended.

Under current bankruptcy rules, individual debtors with primarily consumer debts must file Official Form 22[3], which sets forth the debtor's income and expenses in accordance with standard numbers issued by the

[2] "Current monthly income" means the "average monthly income from all sources" that the debtor received during the six-month period ending the last calendar month before the debtor filed his bankruptcy petition. 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A).

[3] In a chapter 7 context, the form is known as Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means-Test Calculation (Form 22A); in a chapter 13 context, the form is known as Statement of Current Monthly Income and Calculation of Commitment Period and Disposable Income (Form 22C).

IRS. Because a debtor must also file the traditional Schedules I and J setting forth actual income and expenses, it often becomes apparent that there is a significant difference between the debtor's disposable income under Schedules I and J and his disposable income under Form 22. In some cases, like the present case, it is clear that the historical circumstances that produced a particular income figure will change prospectively because the debtor acquired a higher paying job immediately prior to filing bankruptcy.

B. Factual Background

The debtor, John Pak, filed a chapter 7 petition on October 31, 2005.[4] For approximately four of the six months prior to his bankruptcy filing, Mr. Pak was unemployed. In August 2005, two months before his bankruptcy filing, Mr. Pak obtained new employment as a software engineer earning $8,666.67 per month, or $104,004.04 annually.

Mr. Pak's schedules of income and expenses (Schedules I and J), filed with his bankruptcy petition, reflected his income earned from his new job, indicated that his net monthly take home pay was $5,530.20, that his monthly expenses were $3,718.00, and that he had net monthly income of $1,812.20. ER 20-21. Mr. Pak also filed with his bankruptcy petition Form 22A. Form 22A directs debtors to calculate their "current monthly income" by averaging their gross income received during the six months prior to the month of the bankruptcy filing. Since Mr. Pak had been unemployed for most of this period, his "current monthly income," $2,666.67 ($32,000.04 annually), was much lower than his income as of the date of his bankruptcy filing.

[4] Because this case was commenced after October 16, 2005, it is subject to the amendments to the Bankruptcy Code made by the BAPCPA.

Because Mr. Pak's own bankruptcy schedules reflected actual monthly disposable income of $1,812.20, the United States Trustee moved under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) to dismiss his case because granting Mr. Pak relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code when he had the ability to repay a substantial portion of his $172,931.24 in scheduled unsecured debt would have been an abuse of the provisions of chapter 7. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(1); (b)(3)(B). In a published decision, the bankruptcy court granted the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss with a 14-day stay to allow Mr. Pak an opportunity to request conversion to chapter 13. See In re Pak, 343 B.R. 239 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006). On May 26, 2006, Mr. Pak requested conversion to chapter 13, and the bankruptcy court granted that request on May 31, 2006. ER 56-64.

Proceeding in chapter 13, Mr. Pak filed amended Schedules I and J, which showed a total combined monthly income of $5,411.69, and total monthly expenses of $4,421.99, for monthly net income of $989.70. ER 78-83. Mr. Pak also filed a Statement of Current Monthly Income and Calculation of Commitment Period and Disposable Income (Form 22C), showing his "current monthly income" to be $2,888.89 ($34,666.68 annually). ER 91-96.

Mr. Pak's amended chapter 13 plan (the Plan) proposed to pay $300 per month for thirty-five months and $322.20 for one month. The Plan estimated that unsecured creditors would receive 1.6 percent of their claims. ER 113-114. Mr. Pak asserted that these payments constituted more than his "projected disposable income" which he calculated by multiplying his "disposable income," the average of his earnings during the six months preceding the bankruptcy filing, by the number of months of the Plan. ER

The chapter 13 trustee (the "Trustee"), American Express Centurion Bank, eCAST Settlement Corporation, and United States Trustee objected to confirmation of the Plan under section 1324(a). The objecting parties argued that the Bankruptcy Code required the bankruptcy court to consider a debtor's actual and anticipated future income when determining "projected disposable income" under section 1325(b)(1)(B). ER 124-60.

By order entered December 27, 2006, the bankruptcy court denied Plan confirmation. ER 236. The court held that, "[i]n determining whether a plan provides all of the debtor's 'projected disposable income,' a court should attempt to predict what the debtor's disposable income during the term of the plan will be, using the definition of 'current monthly income' set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A)." In re Pak, 357 B.R. 549, 552 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006).

Mr. Pak timely appealed the order denying confirmation of debtor's Plan, but the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel dismissed the appeal because the order denying confirmation is an interlocutory order. ER 239-248.

At a subsequent hearing before the bankruptcy court, Mr. Pak waived his right to amend the Plan and the court dismissed the case. ER 253. Mr. Pak timely appealed the dismissal order on May 17, 2007.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The BAPCPA amendments to section 1325 have created important interpretive questions about the proper way to understand "projected disposable income." As the case law reflects, there are three ways to interpret and apply that statutory language in light of the amendments. The interpretation adopted by the bankruptcy court should be affirmed because it takes into account all the language in the statute.

The debtor interpreted the term "projected disposable income" to require use of the historical "disposable income" figure throughout the chapter 13 plan period, regardless of the debtor's actual income and expenses during that period. In this case, the debtor's historical "disposable income" was far lower than his actual disposable income, with the result that his chapter 13 plan called for the application of payments far below his actual disposable income. However, debtor's interpretation does not account for the usual meaning of "projected" income or for the statutory phrases "to be received" and "will be applied to make payments" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Blindly extending into the future an historical monthly income calculation, which bears no relationship to actual income that the debtor will receive in the future, makes it impossible for the plan to apply available future income to make payments to unsecured creditors in accordance with the statute.

In contrast with this interpretation, the best interpretation of section 1325(b), as adopted by the bankruptcy court, is one that gives meaning to "disposable income" by requiring its use in determining the "disposable income" that is to be projected as an initial matter, subject to adjustment to account for any significant increases or decreases in the debtor's income that are likely in particular cases. Such adjustments may be necessary in individual cases to ensure that the income attributed to a debtor in his chapter 13 plan is actually income that is "projected" and "to be received" and that "will be applied to make payments" to unsecured creditors. While a simple multiplication of the initial disposable income number by the relevant number of months is a presumptive starting point, this approach allows adjustments to be made. This interpretation is also consistent with the overall goals of chapter 13.[5]

ARGUMENT

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT CORRECTLY HELD THAT A DEBTOR'S "PROJECTED DISPOSABLE INCOME" UNDER SECTION 1325(b) IS PRESUMED TO BE BASED ON A DEBTOR'S "CURRENT MONTHLY INCOME" WHICH CAN BE REBUTTED BY EVIDENCE OF SUBSTANTIAL CHANGE IN POST-PETITION FINANCIAL SITUATION

1. Section 1325(b): Before and After BAPCPA

The BAPCPA amendments in 2005 to section 1325 created a significant change in the law. Before these amendments were enacted, section 1325(b)(1) provided that if the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objected to the confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, the court was not permitted to approve the plan unless it provided that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the three-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1) (2000 ed.). The term "disposable income" was defined as income received by the debtor that was "not reasonably necessary to be expended" for "maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent" or for necessary business expenses if the debtor was engaged in a business. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2) (2000 ed.). As the bankruptcy court below recognized, pre-BAPCPA, courts routinely projected or estimated a debtor's disposable income during the plan confirmation process by taking into account anticipated changes in their financial circumstances during the term of the plan. Pak, 357 B.R. at 553.

[5] A third interpretation, while agreeing that "projected disposable income" is forward-looking, calculates "projected disposable income" by using the debtor's actual income at the moment of filing as captured on debtor's Schedule I. Under this approach, the court must take into account the debtor's actual income as reported on Schedule I. See In re Fuller, 346 B.R. 472, 485 (Bankr. S.D. Ill. 2006); In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 722 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006). In our view, there is no statutory basis for requiring the court to take into account the debtor's Schedules I and J in every case, and this interpretation gives too little effect to Congress's definition of "disposable income."

In contrast, under the BAPCPA amendments, section 1325(b)(1) now requires that a chapter 13 plan "provide that all of the debtor's projected disposable income . . .be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1).

"Projected disposable income" is not defined under the Bankruptcy Code; however, section 1325(b)(2) defines "disposable income" as "current monthly income received by the debtor . . . less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2). "Current monthly income" is defined as the "average monthly income from all sources" that the debtor received during the six-month period ending the last calendar month before the debtor filed the chapter 13 petition. 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A).

In this case, filed by a debtor whose annualized current monthly income is below the state median income, the Bankruptcy Code calculates disposable income by subtracting "reasonably necessary" expenses from his current monthly income. The debtor's own schedules I and J reflect disposable income of $989.70, based on total monthly income of $5,411.69 and monthly expenses of $4,421.99. In contrast, the debtor's Form 22C reflected much lower current monthly income of $2,888.89, and no disposable income, because he was unemployed during most of the six-month period prior to his bankruptcy filing.

2. The Debtor's Interpretation Fails To Give Content To Three Statutory Phrases

Mr. Pak urges this Court to adopt a strict, mechanical approach where "projected disposable income" is simply monthly "disposable income" (based on prepetition "current monthly income") multiplied (projected out) by the number of months of the proposed plan.[6]

Mr. Pak adopts a contextually invalid interpretation of the term "projected" and wholly fails to account for two other important phrases in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Statutory words must be construed in context. Hibbs v. Winn, 542 U.S. 88, 101 (2004).

First, the debtor asserts that to "project" disposable income means to use the income data for the six months prior to filing, i.e. "current monthly income," and apply that amount over the applicable commitment period. In the economic and financial context – which is plainly the relevant context for purposes of this statute – the calculation of "projected" financial data may well begin with historical data, but it does not necessarily (or even usually) end there, and it certainly does not entail a rigid and inviolable assumption that projected income will necessarily be identical to past income even when the available facts demonstrate otherwise. To the contrary, in context the term "projected" must be understood to refer to a forecast or estimate of an expected future financial reality. See The

Random House Dict. Of the English Lang. 1546 (2d ed. 1987) (defining to "project" as, inter alia, "to set forth or calculate (some future thing); They projected the building costs for the next five years."); Webster's Third New Int'l Dict. 1813 (1993) (defining "projected" as, inter alia, "planned for future execution: contrived, proposed," as "[projected] outlays for new plant and equipment").

Second, section 1325(b)(1)(B) states that the court may not approve a plan unless it provides that all the debtor's projected disposable income "to be received" during the plan period is applied to make payments to unsecured creditors. To the extent historical income bears no relationship with actual income "to be received" by the debtor, the debtor's interpretation is inconsistent with the statutory language.

Third, the debtor's interpretation also ignores the statutory phrase "will be applied to make payments." If projected disposable income is based on an historical figure, minus expenses, there will be some cases in which income in the plan is only deemed, or hypothetical, and not actually received. A fairly typical case would be one in which a debtor lost a job or obtained a job with lesser pay at about the time he filed a chapter 13 petition. In such a case, the debtor's current monthly income, an average of the past six months' income, would reflect the income from the previous job, and the debtor's disposable income (the current monthly income less expenses) would not reflect the loss of that job. Projecting that figure forward would require the debtor to apply a hypothetical income that was not actually "received" in the future "to make payments" under the plan.

These are more than mere policy objections to the debtor's interpretation. They are critical textual flaws. It is well established that courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect." Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (citing United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1992)). The debtor's interpretation fails to heed this statutory maxim.

3. The Bankruptcy Court's Interpretation Draws Substantial Support From The Better-Reasoned Case Law.

This Court should adopt the bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 1325(b) that not only gives meaning to the new definition of "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2) as an historical number but also treats "projected" disposable income as a future-oriented concept, as required by the language of section 1325(b)(1).

More specifically, this Court should allow that presumption to be rebutted whenever the debtor is likely to experience (or actually has experienced) either a significant increase or decrease in income after the filing of the chapter 13. Most courts that have addressed this issue have adopted this approach.[7]

However, the definition of "current monthly income," as defined in 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A), excludes certain income, such as Social Security payments, which is included in Schedule I. Without abandoning the statutory definition of "disposable income," the bankruptcy court held that [7] Bankruptcy courts that have adopted this "presumption" interpretation include In re Meek, 2007 WL 1830817 (Bankr.D.Idaho June 27, 2007); In re Lanning, 2007 WL 1451999 (Bankr.D.Kan. May 15, 2007); In re Mullen, 2007 WL 1452234 (Bankr. D. Or. May 14, 2007); In re Zimmerman, 2007 WL 295452 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Jan. 29, 2007); In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007); In re Casey, 356 B.R. 519 (Bankr. E.D. Wash. 2006); In re Foster, 2006 WL 2621080 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 2006); In re Risher, 344 B.R. 833 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 2006); In re Grady, 343 B.R. 747 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2006); In re Jass, 340 B.R. 411 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006).

"a court should attempt to predict what the debtor's disposable income during the term of the plan will be, using the definition of 'current monthly income' set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A)." Pak, 357 B.R. at 552.

The only appellate decision on this issue has reached the same conclusion. In In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2007), the bankruptcy court faced very similar facts to those presented in this case. During the six-month period prior to her filing, the debtor had been employed, but she had procured a higher paying job just prior to her bankruptcy filing. Id. at 306. As a result, she was a below-median debtor whose "current monthly income," as indicated on Form 22C, was almost $4,000 lower than her actual monthly income as identified in Schedule I. Id. at 306-07.

The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel in Kibbe concluded that Form 22C must be the starting point for any determination of 'projected disposable income', but if the parties establish that "current monthly income" set forth on Form 22C is not an accurate reflection of debtor's current financial condition, the debtor's "anticipated actual income," subject to the income exclusions in the definition of "current monthly income," is the "projected disposable income." Kibbe, 361 B.R. at 314 (emphasis in original). The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel reasoned that "[a]ttaching the word 'projected' to a historical calculation assumes, without justification, that a debtor's circumstances will not change after the date of the case commencement or during the plan commitment period." Id., at 312. In a footnote, the BAP ". . .reject[ed] the view espoused in Barr and its adherents that the term 'projected' is a synonym for 'multiplied.' Congress was not hesistant in using the term 'multiplied' when the context so demanded. See, e.g. §§

727(a)(2)(A)(I), and 1325(b)(3) and (4). The word 'multiplied' is quite different from the word 'projected.' The former requires only mathematical acumen; the latter, mathematic acumen adjusted by deliberation and discretion." Id., at 312 fn 9.

4. The Bankruptcy Court's Approach Comports With BAPCPA's Goals And Treats Debtors and Creditors Fairly.

Unlike chapter 7, which allows a debtor to discharge his obligations, chapter 13 focuses on having debtors devote future income to pay their creditors. Indeed, BAPCPA placed additional emphasis on this goal when it added language to section 707(b) permitting a court, with a debtor's consent, to convert an abusive chapter 7 case to chapter 13, as an alternative to dismissal. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1). The interpretation of the bankruptcy court permits a court to consider the actual income that can "be applied to make payments" under the plan in cases in which a different amount of actual income is available to a debtor because of changed circumstances. This is an important measure of fairness, both to the debtor in cases in which the debtor's prospective income is below his historical income, and to creditors in cases in which the debtor will earn significant additional income that is not reflected in the historical calculation.[8]

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, we respectfully ask this Court to affirm the order of

BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

A. The district court had subject matter jurisdiction of this case by virtue of 28 U.S.C. 158(a)(1).

B. The district court's judgment, entered November 22, 1995, in favor of the appellee is a final judgment that this Court has jurisdiction to review pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1291.

C. On January 22, 1996, the appellant filed a timely notice of appeal. See Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Whether under the Bankruptcy Code's section governing the trustee's employment of professional persons, 11 U.S.C. 327, the bankruptcy court may authorize the trustee to retain his own firm in a capacity other than "attorney or accountant," here as real estate broker.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Nature of the Case and Course of Proceedings Below.

This case involves a bankruptcy trustee's attempt to select as a real estate broker to market the bankrupt's land, a firm of which the trustee is an officer. Over the objection of the United States Trustee,[1] the bankruptcy court approved the appointment, and the district court, Hon. Shira A. Scheindlin, affirmed the decision. The United States Trustee then filed the present appeal.[2]

---

[1] The United States Trustee, unlike the private individual who is appointed as trustee for a particular case, is an Executive Branch official who is responsible for "protecting the public interest and ensuring that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to the law." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 109 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6070. See 28 U.S.C. 586; 11 U.S.C. 307.

[2] The United States Trustee has standing to pursue this appeal, under 11 U.S.C. 307. United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 141 (3d Cir. 1994); In re Clark, 927 F.2d 793, 796 (4th Cir. 1991); In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d (continued...)

B. Statutory Scheme.

Under the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 327(a), "[e]xcept as otherwise provided [in Section 327], the trustee, with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys, accountants, appraisers, auctioneers, or other professional persons, that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee * * *." Section 327 goes on to establish four exceptions to the qualifications in subsection 327(a). One of these, 327(d), provides that "[t]he court may authorize the trustee to act as attorney or accountant for the estate if such authorization is in the best interest of the estate."

C. Statement of Facts.

Palm Coast: Mantanza Shores Limited Partnership (Palm Coast) was formed for the purpose of buying, developing, and selling an undeveloped parcel of real estate in Florida. JA 7.[3] Subsequently, Palm Coast filed for bankruptcy relief under the provisions of Chapter 11, and a trustee, Marvin J. Bloom (Bloom) was appointed. Ibid. Bloom, an officer of Keen Realty Consultants, Inc. (Keen), sought to retain the firm as real estate broker to the estate. Ibid. Bloom requested the bankruptcy court's permission to appoint Keen. Ibid. The court granted the request. Ibid.

D. Bankruptcy Court's Decision And Order.

The bankruptcy court determined that the language of 327(d) was only permissive, not prohibitive, and that the statute did not bar the appointment of Keen. JA 7. The court's order concluded that (1) Keen "represents no interest adverse to the Debtor, or to the estate, in the manner in which it is to be retained," (2) "its employment is necessary and would be in the best interests of the Trustee, and the estate," and (3) "the matter is one justifying the retention of a real estate consultant." JA 12.

E. District Court's Decision.

On appeal taken by the United States Trustee, the district court affirmed. JA 10-11. It held that "the plain meaning of the statute * * * simply allows the trustee to retain his or her firm as an attorney or accountant to the Debtor," and contains "no express statutory limitation on the trustee's ability to hire his or her own firm to serve in any other capacity, including that of real estate broker." Id. at 10. The court observed that "[i]f Congress intended to prevent trustees from retaining their own firms in a non-lawyer or non-accountant capacity, the legislature could have so provided." Ibid.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Section 327 of the Bankruptcy Code, "Employment of professional persons," empowering the trustee to obtain various professional services for the estate, does not permit him to appoint his own firm as a realtor. In fact, subsection 327(a)'s broad conflict of interest provisions -- requiring appointment of a "disinterested" party with no "adverse" "interest" -- bar a trustee's appointment of his firm in any professional capacity. By virtue of the trustee's position as an "insider," i.e., a person in control of the debtor partnership, the firm in which he serves as an officer but which he seeks to hire, is an "interested" party. Moreover, a trustee's employment of his own firm violates the most basic principles of law governing the conduct of fiduciaries, the requirement of undivided loyalty.

Thus, for a trustee's self-dealing to be valid, assuming the bankruptcy court's approval, the appointment must fall within one of the four subsequent exceptions to the standards of subsection 327(a). The only exception relied on by Bloom is subsection 327(d). But this highly specific exception to broad standards states only that the trustee may employ him or herself within two professional capacities -- "attorney or accountant." It is well established that such an exception may not be expanded beyond its terms.

Finally, even if the subsection is analyzed as a grant of power, not as an exception to a prohibition, the result is the same. Congress's specificity and the absence of any conflicting legislative history compel the conclusion that the Code grants to the trustee no self-dealing power as to any other professional services.

ARGUMENT

UNDER 11 U.S.C. 327, THE BANKRUPTCY COURT MAY AUTHORIZE THE TRUSTEE TO RETAIN HIS OWN FIRM ONLY IN THE CAPACITY OF "ATTORNEY OR ACCOUNTANT," NOT OF REAL ESTATE BROKER.

Neither the language nor the statutory scheme of Section 327 supports the district court's decision permitting the trustee to appoint his own firm as a realtor. Section 327 of the Bankruptcy Code deals with a trustee's "Employment of professional persons." See generally, Gindin, Professionals In Bankruptcy Proceedings: Appointment, Right To Compensation And Conflicts Of Interest, 21 Seton Hall L. Rev. 895 (1991). The Code, 327(a), authorizes the trustee to employ professionals, with court approval, but imposes a broad conflict of interest limitation -- that the appointed professional "not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate," and be a "disinterested person[]". See In re Prince, 40 F.3d 356, 360-61 (11th Cir. 1994). Subsection (a) states that the terms under which it both empowers and limits the trustee apply "[e]xcept as otherwise provided in this section" (emphasis supplied).

This language makes clear that each of Section 327's next four subsections, ((b) through (e)), including subsection (d) at issue here, establishes an exception to subsection 327(a)'s conflict of interest standards.[4] If a prospective appointee fails to meet either of Subsection 327(a)'s "interest adverse" or "disinterested person[]" standards, and fails to qualify under one of the four exceptions, he or she may not be appointed. In re Leisure Dynamics, 32 B.R. 753 (Bankr. D. Minn.), order aff'd, 33. B.R. 121 (D. C. Minn. 1983); In re Roberts, 46 B.R. 815, 822 (Bankr. D. Utah 1985), aff'd in part, rev'd in part and remanded on other grounds, 75 B.R. 402 (D. Utah 1987).

A. Subsection 327(a) Bars Approval Of Keen's Appointment.

Subsection 327(a)'s standards make per se invalid a trustee's appointment of him or herself, or of his or her firm,[5] to serve in any professional capacity.[6] An examination of how these standards apply to Bloom's selection of Keen demonstrates this point. First, Bloom's appointment of his own firm is the

[4] The fifth, subsection (f), prohibits the trustee from employing a person who has served as "an examiner in the case."

[5] The trustee's appointment of a firm of which he or she is an officer is equivalent to a self-appointment. See In re Butler Indus., Inc., 114 B.R. 695, 698 (C.D. Cal. 1990), appeal dismissed, 8 F.3d 25 (9th Cir. 1993); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(b).

[6] For this reason, Section 327 goes on, in subsection 327(d), explicitly to permit the trustee, with the bankruptcy court's approval, to appoint him or herself as attorney or accountant for the estate.

appointment of an "interested," and therefore disqualified person. Under the Bankruptcy Code "an insider" is not a "disinterested person[]." 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(A). In cases where, as here, "the debtor is a partnership," a person "in control of the debtor" is an "insider." 11 U.S.C. 101(31)(C)(v). A trustee, such as Bloom, is therefore an "insider" because he is such a person "in control" (see 11 U.S.C. 1107 (trustee and debtor in possession stand in same shoes)).

Moreover, Bloom's affiliation with the real estate firm, Keen, causes Keen to fail the disinterestedness requirement. Bloom's insider status is imputed to the real estate firm in which he serves as an officer. See In re Michigan Interstate Ry. Co., 32 B.R. 327, 330 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1983) ("'insider' characteristics of one lawyer associated with the firm, whether he or she be an associate, a special partner, or a capital partner, are sufficient to strip the firm of its claim to disinterestedness"); In re Paolino, 80 B.R. 341, 345 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1987) ("[w]hen one member of a firm is disqualified for interest, all members of that firm must be similarly disqualified").[7]

[7] Bloom's employment of his firm may trigger the second of subsection 327(a)'s two standards, that of "adverse" "interest." See also 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E) defining a "disinterested person" as one who "does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate * * * by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor * * * or for any other reason." Any (continued...)

B. Bloom's Employment Of Keen Violates His Fiduciary Obligations.

The explicit constraints of Section 327(a) are not the only ones operative upon the trustee. As with any trustee, a bankruptcy trustee owes a fiduciary duty, one of undivided loyalty to the trust's beneficiaries, here to the debtor's estate and its creditors. This duty prohibits "self-dealing" and requires the trustee to avoid any conflict of interest between his personal interests and those of the trust. See Woods v. City National Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268 (1940); Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees, § 541 at 155 (2d ed. 1993). Further, the trustee may not place him or herself in a position that would give the appearance of impropriety. Knapp v. Seligson (In re Ira Haupt & Co.), 361 F.2d 164, 168 (2d Cir. 1966); In re Gem Tire & Serv. Co., 117 B.R. 874, 877 (Bankr. S. D. Tex. 1990).

Here, in an apparent effort to mitigate the conflict of interest problem resulting from his service as both trustee and as an officer of the firm that he seeks to employ, Bloom allowed Palm's creditors to negotiate a percentage fee agreement with Keen, rather than doing so himself.[8] But significantly, "[w]ith firm that a trustee owns or directs would have an interest adverse to that of the estate in that the trustee monitors fees to keep them low, while he maintains an interest in seeing that his firm is well compensated for time and resources expended.

[8] The percentage arrangement would give Keen an incentive to maximize the sale price of Palm's land.

respect to the percentage of commissions sought for Keen's services, the Trustee, on behalf of Keen, negotiated the amount with counsel to [creditor] ITT and counsel to certain limited partners" (emphasis supplied). Reply To U.S. Trustee's Objection To The Retention Of Keen Realty Consultants, Inc. As Real Estate Broker, 4 n.2, ADD 2.[9] One of the creditors testified in support of Keen's appointment, "[w]e recognize we had to give the trustee and the realty company an incentive" and "have done that on the best terms available" (emphasis supplied). JA 27. Once the commission agreement was negotiated, Bloom "switched hats" and signed the contract as trustee. Id. at 20 .

For all Bloom's efforts, he nevertheless violated the equitable principle that a fiduciary may serve only one master. Woods, 312 U.S. at 269. Once a trustee's personal interests are implicated, his independence and disinterestedness are compromised. It is "generally, if not always, humanly impossible for the same person to act fairly in two capacities and on behalf of two interests in the same transaction." Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees, § 543 at 227. Because of that reality, the standards governing disinterestedness have been strictly construed and applied. See Meredith v. Thralls, 144 F.2d 473, 474-75 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 323 U.S. 758 (1944); Pierson & Gaylen v. Creel & Atwood (In Re Consolidated Bancshares, Inc.), 785 F.2d 1249, 1256 n.6 (5th Cir. 1986).[10] In this case, Bloom's retention of Keen conflicts with his duty of undivided loyalty to the estate.

C. Subsection 327(d) Does Not Permit The Disputed Appointment, Either As An Exception To Section 327(a)'s Bar And To General Fiduciary Standards, Or As An Independent Grant Of Power.

We have established that "[e]xcept as otherwise provided," within the rest of Section 327, subsection 327(a)'s requirements as well as general fiduciary standards, would clearly preclude the appointment of Keen.[11] But the appointment does not fall within any of the stated exceptions. Subsection (d), the only one that Bloom has invoked, permits the trustee to employ him or herself, again with court approval, within only two professional capacities -- "attorney[s] or accountant[s]."[12] See S. Rep. No. 95-989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 38 (1978), reprinted in, 1978

[10] In fact, the prohibition against self-dealing has been so strictly enforced that a reorganization trustee was surcharged $40,000 in profits that he permitted his employees to earn. Mosser v. Darrow, 341 U.S. 267, 271-75 (1951).

[11] Even under the old bankruptcy law, that did not specifically address this issue, this Court expressed serious concerns about a trustee's self-dealing. Knapp v. Seligson (In re Ira Haupt & Co.), 361 F.2d at 168-69 (appointment as attorney). See also, SEC v. Kenneth Bove & Co., 451 F. Supp. 355, 358-59 (S.D.N.Y. 1978).

[12] This section permits but does not compel the court to authorize the retention of the trustee as "attorney or accountant." The court's discretion is limited by consideration of "the best interest" of the estate. See In re Gem Tire & Serv. Co., 117 B.R. at 878.

U.S.C.C.A.N 5787, 5824; Kelbon, Herman, and Bell, Conflicts, The Appointment Of "Professionals," And Fiduciary Duties Of Major Parties In Chapter 11, 8 Bankr. Dev. J. 349, 398-400 (1991).

As a highly specific exception to otherwise broad conflict of interest prohibitions, subsection 327(d) should not be expanded beyond its terms. See Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd. v. FDIC, 536 F.2d 509, 513 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 978 (1976) ("normal rule of construction is that where words of exception are used, they are to be strictly construed to limit the exception"). In the case of legal and accounting services, Congress made a judgment not to establish a flat prohibition on trustee-self dealing, but to rely instead on the sound discretion of the bankruptcy court to permit this practice only when it served the best interests of the estate.[13]

[13] "The purpose of permitting the trustee to serve as his own counsel [or accountant] is to reduce costs." S. Rep. No. 95-989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 39 (1978), reprinted in, 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5825.

Congress, however, made no such judgment as to the trustee serving as a realtor. All but one of the relevant prior lower court decisions support this conclusion. See Assistant United States Trustee v. John Galt, Ltd., 130 B.R. 464, 465-66 (S.D. W. Va. 1989); In re Blue, 146 B.R. 856, 858 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. 1992); In re Alexander, 129 B.R. 183 (Bankr. D. Minn. 1991); In re Continental Nut Co., 44 B.R. 48, 49 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1984). The one decision supporting the district court's holding, In re Wilkinson Distributing Co., 106 B.R. 658, 660 (Bankr. D. Haw. 1989), did so without explanation.

Here, it is undisputed that Keen was retained as a realtor, not as an "attorney or accountant." Therefore, subsection 327(d)'s specifically limited exception does not apply. Thus, any discussion of the merits of this appointment in terms of the best interests of the estate and its creditors, a discussion that would be appropriate as to the appointment of the trustee as an attorney or accountant, is simply irrelevant here.

Even if subsection 327(d) were viewed as a further grant of power to the trustee, not as an exception to a prohibition, there is no merit to the point that the subsection does not "express[ly]" limit a trustee's power to hire his or her own real estate firm. Congress's specificity in authorizing this type of arrangement as to legal and accounting services, and the absence of clearly contrary evidence of legislative intent, easily support the conclusion that Congress has granted no such permission as to other professional services. See National R.R. Passenger Corp. v. National Ass'n of R.R. Passengers, 414 U.S. 453, 457 (1974); American Land Title Ass'n v. Clarke, 968 F.2d 150, 155 (2d Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2959 (1993). Congress did not have to go on and make this any more explicit.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the district court should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted,

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

REPLY BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

I. THE STANDARDS OF SUBSECTION 327(a), AS WELL AS GENERAL FIDUCIARY STANDARDS, PRECLUDE A BANKRUPTCY COURT FROM APPROVING A TRUSTEE'S SELF-EMPLOYMENT AS A PROFESSIONAL.

A. Language And Structure.

In claiming that the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 327, authorizes his self-dealing, the trustee, Bloom, ignores both the provision's language and structure. Whatever may be said as to the provision's application in other contexts, for example the issue of whether it allows post facto authorization of a trustee's otherwise valid retention of professionals[1], there is nothing "'indeterminate'" (applees. br. 17) here.

Subsection (a), establishing the standards for a trustee's appointment of professionals, applies "[e]xcept as otherwise provided in this section" (emphasis supplied). Subsection (d) goes on to authorize a trustee, with the bankruptcy court's approval, to appoint himself as attorney or accountant for the estate. For such an appointment, just as any other involving the trustee's appointment of a professional,[2] the bankruptcy court must make an individualized determination as to whether the appointment is in the best interest of the estate.

But the clear import of the first word of section 327, "[e]xcept," (emphasis supplied) is that without subsection (d)'s specific authorization, the standards of subsection (a) would preclude the bankruptcy court from approving any such self-dealing appointments of professionals.[3] If subsection(a) permit ted these appointments, subsection (d) would be redundant, contrary to normal rules of statutory construction.[4] See Bailey v. United States, 116 S. Ct. 501, 506-07 (1995); Field v. Mans, 116 S. Ct. 437, 442-43 n.7 (1995).

[3] Contrary to Bloom's assertion (applees. br. 19 n.4), in In re Equitable Ctr., 24 F.3d 245, 1994 WL 171162 (9th Cir. May 5, 1994) (unpublished opinion), the Ninth Circuit, has not "declined to create a per se rule regarding §327(d) * * *."

B. The Standards Of Subsection 327(a).

There is ample support for Congress' conclusion that a specific exception, such as subsection (d), would be necessary

Rather, the court stated that "we need not decide this legal issue" (1994 WL 171162 at *3) because the parties, including the United States Trustee, had stipulated to the employment. The stipulation by the United States Trustee was a mistake, made only eight months after the Program was first certified in the region that included the Western District of Washington.

Significantly, the court rejects Bloom's contention (applees. br. 18-19) that "[a] more thorough analysis of all of the cases cited by the U.S. Trustee in support of a per se bar with regard to §327(d) do not in fact establish a per se rule at all." Rather, citing In re Continental Nut Co., 44 B.R. 48, 49 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1984), In re Alexander, 129 B.R. 183, 185 (Bankr. D. Minn. 1991), and In re Galt, 130 B.R. 464, 465-66 (Bankr. S.D. W. Va. 1989) (discussed by Bloom, applees. br. 20-23), the court states that "some courts have held that a trustee may not employ itself in any professional capacity other than 'as attorney or accountant for the estate'" (emphasis supplied). 1994 WL 171162 at *2.

[4] Thus, In re Harold & Williams Dev. Co., 977 F.2d 906, 909-10 (4th Cir. 1992) (quoted in applees. br. 16-17), emphasizing that the courts "must take care not to fashion absolute prohibitions beyond those legislatively mandated without some measure of assurance that the purposes of the Bankruptcy Code always will be served thereby," is irrelevant here. Unlike the present case, section 327 does not provide textual and structural guidance as to whether the same professional could be employed in a dual capacity as attorney and accountant.

for any self-employment by a trustee to be valid. As explained in our principal brief, subsection 327(a)'s conflict of interest standards (at 7-8), as well as generally applicable standards of fiduciary conduct (at 8-10), would preclude a bankruptcy court from approving a trustee's self-employment as a professional, here as a real estate broker.

In response, Bloom first totally ignores the problem self-employment poses as to a trustee's fiduciary duty of undivided loyalty to the debtor's estate and its creditors, a duty that prohibits "self-dealing" and requires the trustee to avoid any conflict of interest, real or apparent, between his personal interests and those of the trust. In particular, Bloom declines to justify how, as we discussed in our principal brief (at 9), he "wore two hats," the estate's and Keen's, in negotiating the _percentage rate_ of the commission to be paid.

For the same reason, Bloom's discussion of subsection 327(a)'s "interest adverse to the estate" standard is unpersuasive. His lengthy exposition of the affidavit filed by Keen's president (applees. br. 8) and the letter agreement between Bloom and Keen does not respond to the inherent conflict that inevitably is involved in determining a professional's rate of compensation.

As for the requirement that the professional appointed by the trustee be "disinterested," _i.e_., not an "insider." 11 U.S.C. 101(14), Bloom acknowledges that "the present situation is identical to that where a trustee retains as his attorneys, a law firm in which he or she is a member" (emphasis supplied) (applees. br. 12). This is the very circumstance for which Congress found it necessary to enact a specific exception to subsection 327(a)'s standards. Bloom further acknowledges that "[i]ndeed [he] is in control of this partnership debtor's estate," yet never explains his reason for asserting (applees. br. 10-12) that only prepetition control falls within the definition of an "insider" as a "person in control of the [d]ebtor" (emphasis supplied). 11 U.S.C. 101(31)(C)(v). Indeed, given the broad anti-conflict of interest objective of section 327(a), there was ample reason for Congress to have concluded that self-employment by a trustee does fail the requirement that the appointed professional be "disinterested."[5]

II. NO EXCEPTION TO SUBSECTION 327(a) AND GENERAL FIDUCIARY STANDARDS SUPPORTS BLOOM'S SELF-EMPLOYMENT.

Since section 327 has no exception for a trustee's self-employment as a real estate broker, like that for self-employment as an attorney or accountant, the anti-conflict of interest constraints of subsection 327(a), as well as general fiduciary standards, apply here with full force. Consequently, without regard to Keen's particular merits as a realtor (applees br. 17-18), the bankruptcy court was not empowered to approve Bloom's appointment of his own firm.

[5] In re Begun, 162 B.R. 168 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1993) is cited by Bloom as providing "persuasive guidance for the instant case" (applees. br. 13), but provides none. In Begun, the trustee did not seek to hire himself or his firm as a broker; nor did the objecting party urge that the firm be disqualified under section 327(a). Rather, the case turned on the brokerage firm's failure to disclose ownership interests held by a partner in the trustee's law firm, and by a relative of another member of the firm.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, as well as those stated in our principal brief, the decision of the district court should be reversed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

This supplemental brief is filed after argument pursuant to this Court's order of August 9, 1996. The brief addresses this Court's appellate jurisdiction over this case.

More specifically, the issue is: Whether there is appellate jurisdiction, under 28 U.S.C. 158(d)[1] or the collateral order doctrine (Cohen v. Beneficial Indust. Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541 (1949))[2] over an appeal by the United States Trustee from the judgment of a district court, rendered prior to the end of the bankruptcy case, construing the Code (11 U.S.C. 327(a) and (d)) to permit the trustee in bankruptcy to employ himself as real estate broker for the estate, and approving such employment.

THIS COURT HAS APPELLATE JURISDICTION TO REVIEW THE DISTRICT COURT'S JUDGMENT IN THE PRESENT CASE.

A. Introduction.

In pursuing this appeal, the United States Trustee is carrying out the vital function established by Congress, to

[1] This section provides:

> The courts of appeals shall have jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees entered under subsections (a) and (b)of this section.

28 U.S.C. 158(a) in part provides:

> The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals
> (1) from final judgments, orders, and decrees.

[2] Under the doctrine of Cohen, "a court of appeals may review an interlocutory order that (1) conclusively determines a disputed question, (2) resolves an important issue completely separable from the merits of the action, and (3) is effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment." In re Johns-Manville Corp., 824 F.2d 176, 180 (1987).

police the integrity of the bankruptcy system.[3] See United States Trustee v. Revco D.S., Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 499 (6th Cir. 1990), In re Plaza de Diego Shopping Ctr., Inc., 911 F.2d 820, 825-26 (1st Cir. 1990). The United States Trustee is seeking to ensure that the appointment of a professional, here a real estate broker, under 11 U.S.C. 327, is consistent with that section's stringent conflict of interest standards. The question is more fundamental than even whether under particularized circumstances a professional whose appointment is desired is disinterested or has an interest adverse to the estate, and is therefore rendered ineligible to serve. The question is whether a bankruptcy trustee ever may appoint himself to serve as a professional in a capacity other than attorney or accountant.

The United States Trustee's efforts to avoid an unlawful appointment would be totally frustrated if appellate review of the statutory issue underlying the appointment were to be delayed to the end of the case, when final fees are awarded. Because the issue has been finally decided by the courts below, and because the district court's ruling irreparably harms the United States

[3] Other participants in the bankruptcy proceeding may challenge appointments believed to violate the terms of section 327. But, as a practical matter, the experience of the United States Trustee has been that such challenges most often are brought by the United States Trustee.

Trustee's interest in preventing an unlawful appointment, this Court has jurisdiction to adjudicate this case.

B. Appellate Jurisdiction In The Special Context Of Bankruptcy.

Fortunately, the approach to issues of appellate jurisdiction developed in the special context of bankruptcy supports a finding of jurisdiction here. As this Court has observed, "[t]he finality requirement is less rigidly applied in bankruptcy than in ordinary civil litigation, and 'orders in bankruptcy cases may be immediately appealed if they finally dispose of discrete disputes within the larger case.'" In re Johns-Manville Corp., 920 F.2d 121, 126 (2d Cir. 1990) (emphasis in original) (quoting In re Saco Local Dev. Corp., 711 F.2d 441, 444 (1st Cir. 1983)). See also Bowers v. Connecticut Nat'l Bank, 847 F.2d 1019, 1022 (2d Cir. 1988).

Bankruptcy cases have unique characteristics in that they "frequently involve protracted proceedings with many parties participating," and "reviewing discrete portions of the action only after a plan of reorganization is approved" would "waste time and resources." In re Amatex Corp., 755 F.2d 1034, 1039 (3d Cir. 1985). Thus, "courts have permitted appellate review of orders that in other contexts might be considered interlocutory." Ibid. See also In re Dow Corning Corp., 86 F.3d 482, 488 (6th Cir. 1996); In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1306 (3d Cir. 1991) (quoting F/S Airlease II, Inc. v. Simon, 844 F.2d 99, 103

(3d Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 852 (1988); In re Greene County Hospital, 835 F.2d 589, 594 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 820 (1988); Saco, 711 F.2d at 444-45.

C. Appellate Review Of Appointment Decisions.

The courts of appeals have taken differing approaches as to the question of whether orders involving the employment of professionals under 11 U.S.C. 327 are appealable as final under 28 U.S.C. 158(d). The Third Circuit has broadly held that during the pendency of a bankruptcy proceeding there is appellate jurisdiction to review a district court's determination under section 327's conflict of interest standards. In BH & P, the district court affirmed the decision of the bankruptcy court that neither the trustee nor the law firm that the trustee had appointed qualified as a disinterested party.

On appeal by the trustee and the law firm challenging their removal and disqualification, the Third Circuit held "that the district court's order removing [the trustee and law firm] due to an actual conflict of interest was final." 949 F.2d at 1307. The court used a flexible approach in which it considered "the impact of the matter on the assets of the bankruptcy estate, the preclusive effect of a decision on the merits, and whether the interests of judicial economy will be furthered" (quoting Airlease, 844 F.2d at 104). Id. at 1306. The court stressed that "the issues centering upon the bankruptcy court's disqualification and removal of [the trustee and the law firm] could well affect the assets in the three on-going Chapter 7 proceedings." Id. at 1307. Further, the court noted that "[r]esolution of the issues raised on appeal will eliminate the need for further consideration of conflict of interest issues," and will curtail "[f]urther delay attendant to the conflict of interest dispute * * *."[4] Ibid. See also United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138 (3d Cir. 1994) (reviewing merits of order permitting employment of accounting firm that was statutorily disqualified).

The decision involving circumstances most closely resembling those in the present case is Michel v. Federated Department Stores, Inc. (In re Federated Dep't Stores, Inc.), 44 F.3d 1310, (6th Cir. 1995). There, the Sixth Circuit found that "[t]he validity of the retention order [,involving the statutory requirement that the professional be disinterested,] should have been decided before granting compensation from the bankruptcy estate." Id. at 1317. The court further held "that a valid appointment under § 327(a) is a condition precedent to the decision to grant or deny compensation." Id. at 1320. See also In re Middleton Arms Ltd. Partnership, 119 B.R. 131, 132-34 (M. D. Tenn.), aff'd, 934 F.2d 723 (6th Cir. 1991).

[4] Prior to BH & P, in Airlease the Third Circuit held "that orders of both the bankruptcy court and the district court granting nunc pro tunc approval of [a professional's appointment] as a broker were final." 844 F.2d at 104.

Other courts of appeals, however, have found a lack of appellate jurisdiction to review district court decisions involving the trustee's employment of professionals. The principal reason for reaching this result was the courts' view that whatever the problem with the employment, it could be effectively remedied without immediate resort to an appeal. A closer review of these decisions reveals that none involved a fundamental issue of statutory power such as that raised by the present case. The decisions finding appointment orders to be interlocutory do not involve cases in which the Bankruptcy Code flatly prohibits the employment. The issue posed here is whether the trustee lacks the power to employ a whole category of professionals, that is, self-employment in capacities other than those of attorney or accountant.

In In re Westwood Shake & Shingle, Inc., 971 F.2d 387 (9th Cir. 1992), involving an appeal by a firm suing the debtor, the court held that it lacked appellate jurisdiction to review an order approving the appointment, under section 327(e), of a law firm as special counsel to represent the trustee in a state case in which the bankrupt firm was the defendant. The plaintiff firm in the state case claimed that the law firm had a conflict of interest in that it represented two other parties whose interests in connection with the bankruptcy proceeding were adverse to those of the trustee. The district court, in the course of sustaining the appointment, had noted that "if settlement negotiations were initiated in the state court proceeding, the conflict would be 'overwhelming,' and the parties would be required to obtain separate counsel." 971 F.2d at 388-89. Significantly, the court of appeals stressed that "[t]he bankruptcy court retains the power to remove * * * [the] special counsel * * * should conflict problems arise and [his] representation of the trustee fails to conform to the disinterestedness standards of 11 U.S.C. 327(a)." Id. at 390.

In In re Firstmark Corp., 46 F.3d 653 (7th Cir. 1995), creditors challenged the appointment of law firms respectively representing the debtors and the official creditors committee. In holding that it lacked jurisdiction, the court "decline[d] to adopt" the "flexible approach" of the Third Circuit to determine the issue of finality in bankruptcy appeals. Id. at 659. The court emphasized that the parties had not demonstrated the existence of harm -- that there was "no reason why the appeal cannot wait until the case has ended" (id. at 658), since if it ultimately were determined that the firms should have been disqualified, "the [objecting creditors] simply seeks return of all fees paid to the law firms for work on the bankruptcy case." Id. at 660.

In In re Delta Servs. Indus., 782 F.2d 1267 (5th Cir. 1986), the court relied on two non-bankruptcy Supreme Court decisions[5] to hold that there was no appellate jurisdiction to review an order denying a motion to disqualify counsel for the interim trustee on grounds of the failure to meet the standards of section 327(a). The court stated that "[w]e can discern no basis for granting greater appealability to orders denying motions to disqualify counsel in bankruptcy cases than to those in the ordinary civil case."[6] 782 F.2d at 1272. But see In re W.F. Development Corp., 905 F.2d 883 (5th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 499 U.S. 921 (1991) (reviewing without mention of any jurisdictional problem the disqualification of attorney for debtor and limited partners).

D. Appellate Jurisdiction Here.

While we disagree with the inflexible approach taken by the courts of appeals that have found a lack of appellate jurisdiction in the above cases, and endorse that of the Third and Sixth Circuits, the present case is unique in the issue it presents. This case does not involve a discretionary act of appointment based on an alleged conflict of interest that may or may not materialize. Rather this Court confronts a question of law regarding statutory construction that will not change over time. In drafting sections 327 and 101(14), Congress concluded that the harm occurs at the moment of appointment and, for that reason, has forbade outright the employment of certain professionals. See Federated Department Stores, 44 F.3d at 1318-19. Thus, this case differs significantly from others in which the courts of appeals have treated employment orders as interlocutory.

5 (1981) (orders denying motions to disqualify counsel in a civil case not finally appealable decisions under 28 U.S.C. 1291, and not within 'collateral order' exception of Cohen); Richardson-Merrell, Inc. v. Koller, 472 U.S. 424, 440 (1985) ("orders disqualifying counsel in civil cases * * * not collateral orders subject to appeal as 'final judgments' within meaning of 28 U.S.C. §1291").

[6] Also, in Spears v. United States Trustee, 26 F.3d 1023 (10th Cir. 1994), involving an appeal by the trustee for the debtor, the court found there was no appellate jurisdiction to review the bankruptcy court's discretionary decision denying retroactive employment of counsel and granting prospective employment. But see In re Jarvis, 53 F.3d 416 (1st Cir. 1995) (reaching merits of denial of retroactive employment of broker).

Considerations of finality do not demand that this Court allow to stand until the end of the proceeding the Trustee's self-appointment to serve in a professional capacity that, as we have argued, the Code per se does not permit. This is so whether one considers finality under 28 U.S.C. 158(d) or applies the collateral order doctrine of Cohen.

With regard to jurisdiction under section 158(d), this case meets the standards of finality articulated by the Third Circuit. The issue before this Court does have an "impact on the assets of the bankruptcy estate." Airlease, 844 F.2d at 104. Here, the sole asset of the estate is a tract of land to be marketed by the trustee's own real estate firm. The qualifications and projected efforts of the real estate broker selected to market the property are critical to the likelihood of success in obtaining the best possible price. Moreover, the terms of the commission to be paid to the firm -- a commission that the case trustee negotiated on behalf of his firm -- also directly affect the net proceeds that will be available to distribute to the creditors. Any selection by a trustee of the real estate firm of which he is an officer would raise serious doubts as to whether the selection has been based on the relative merits of the competing firms, both in terms of the services they will provide and the cost of those services. Finally, resolution of the fundamental issue of statutory power raised in this appeal "will eliminate the need for further consideration of conflict of interest issues, freeing the bankruptcy court to adjudicate the more substantive issues relating to the estate[] in question" and "curtail[]" "[f]urther delay attendant to the conflict of interest dispute * * *." BH & P, 949 F.2d at 1307.

Even if the bankruptcy issue in this case were to be deemed interlocutory, there still would be appellate jurisdiction under the doctrine in Cohen. It is clear that the district court's order "conclusively determines a disputed question" and "resolves an important issue separable from the merits of the action."[7] In re Johns-Manville Corp., 824 F.2d 176, 180 (2d Cir. 1987)[8].

The critical question is whether the order "is effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment." As discussed above, the selection by the trustee of his own firm places in question the relative merits of that firm in terms of its capacity to maximize the return from the sale of the estate. Thus, the rendering of brokerage services by the trustee (through Keen) is contrary to the terms of section 327 and could not effectively be remedied simply by an eventual disgorgement of Keen's commission.[9] Keen will remain statutorily ineligible to serve as a professional in this case from the first day of appointment until the conclusion of its services. The bankruptcy

[7] The court in Delta Services found, under the Cohen standards, that the issue regarding the appointment of counsel was not separate from the merits of the action because an inquiry into the alleged conflict of interest would have "entangle[d]" the court "in the merits of Delta's liquidation." 782 F.2d at 1272-73. Whatever the validity of this holding, this is not the case here. Only the legality of the appointment, per se, is at issue.

[8] In this case, this Court found to be interlocutory a discretionary decision by the bankruptcy court to refuse to order the appointment of an additional creditors' committee. Johns-Manville did not present a question of law involving statutory construction.

[9] We further note, assuming the district court's order to be not otherwise reviewable at this time, the possibility of this Court's permitting the Trustee to obtain certification of the issue by the district court. 28 U.S.C. 1292(b). See Connecticut Nat'l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249 (1992); Spears v. United States Trustee, 26 F.3d 1023, 1025 (10th Cir. 1994); In re Continental Investment Corp., 637 F.2d at 7.

court acted beyond the scope of the statute in permitting the trustee to retain his brokerage firm. To treat this order as interlocutory would effectively nullify the strict provisions that Congress has incorporated in section 327.

In sum, this case presents a basic and discrete issue of statutory interpretation, the resolution of which will directly affect the marketing of the estate, and consequently the ultimate return to the creditors. There is appellate jurisdiction to review that issue without regard to whether jurisdiction exists as to other bankruptcy issues involving the appointment of professionals.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, as well as those stated in our principal and reply briefs, the decision of the district court should be reversed.

STATUTES

RULES

I. PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

This is an appeal from a final order of the Bankruptcy Court, entered November 22, 2006 (the "Employment Order"). [RA, Exhibit 7, at 20.][1] The Employment Order granted the Debtors' Motion Pursuant to Sections 327(a) and 328(a) of the Bankruptcy Code and Bankruptcy Rule 2014(a) Authorizing the Employment and Retention of Cadwalader Wickersham & Taft ("Cadwalader") as Attorneys for the Debtors (the "Employment Application"). [RA, Exhibit 20, at 232.] The Employment Order approved the employment of Cadwalader, as "transition counsel" for chapter 11 debtors Portrait Corporation of America, Inc. ("PCA") and eight related entities (collectively, the "Debtors"), over the objection of the United States Trustee for Region 2 (the "United States Trustee").

II. SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This Court should reverse the Employment Order for three reasons. First, the Bankruptcy Court expressly and correctly held that Cadwalader represented many interests adverse to the Debtors' bankruptcy estate and was not disinterested, disqualifying factors under 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a). Second, the Bankruptcy Court created an unauthorized exception to the mandatory disinterestedness provisions of Section 327(a) by finding that the facts and circumstances of the case warranted approving Cadwalader's employment. Third, there is no provision in the Bankruptcy Code for "transition counsel," but if there were, the requirements of Section 327(a) that counsel not hold adverse interests and be disinterested would still apply. The United States Trustee respectfully submits this brief in support of reversal of the Employment

Order.[2]

III. JURISDICTION

The Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction over the Employment Application under 28 U.S.C. Sections 157(b)(2)(A) and 1334. The Employment Order is a final order under 28 U.S.C. Section 158(a)(1). See, e.g., In re Pegasus Agency, Inc., 101 F.3d 882, 885 (2d Cir. 1996) (a bankruptcy court order is final if it "completely resolve[s] all of the issues pertaining to a discrete claim, including issues as to the proper relief"). See also In re Kurtzman, 220 B.R. 538, 540 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) (orders approving retention are final, appealable orders within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. Section 158(a)(1)). On November 30, 2006, the United States Trustee filed a timely Notice of Appeal. [RA, Exhibit 1, at 1.] This Court, therefore, has jurisdiction to hear the appeal under 28 U.S.C. Section 158(a)(1).

IV. STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

Whether the Bankruptcy Court erred in authorizing Cadwalader's retention, when the Court held that, as a matter of law, Cadwalader represented many adverse interests to the estate and was not disinterested, disqualifying factors under 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a).

[2] The United States Trustee "may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this title but may not file a plan pursuant to section 1121(c) of this title." 11 U.S.C. Section 307. Under Section 307, the United States Trustee has standing to appeal an order entered under 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a). United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 141 (3d Cir. 1994).

V. STANDARD OF REVIEW

"[R]etention . . . orders involve[ ] interpretations of law and '[t]his court applies a plenary review of the bankruptcy court's conclusion[s] of law, using a de novo standard.'" In re Federated Department Stores, Inc., 44 F.3d 1310, 1315 (6th Cir. 1995) (quoting In re Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc., 999 F.2d 969, 972 (6th Cir. 1993)). An appellate court "accept[s] [the Bankruptcy Court's] factual findings unless clearly erroneous but review[s] its conclusions of law de novo." Bank Brussels Lambert v. Coan (In re AroChem Corp.), 176 F.3d 610, 620 (2d Cir. 1999) (citing In re McLean Industries, 30 F.3d 385, 387 (2d Cir. 1994). See also In re Globo Comunicacoes e Participacoes S.A., 317 B.R. 235, 245 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (findings of fact are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard, conclusions of law are reviewed under the de novo standard and mixed questions of fact and law are subject to de novo review) (citing In re Enron Corp., 306 B.R. 33, 37 (S.D.N.Y. 2004)). Once a bankruptcy court finds that a professional does not meet the requirements of 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a), it is an error of law to approve the employment of that professional. See In re Mercury, 280 B.R. 35, 55 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2002), (under Section 327(a), the Bankruptcy Court does not have the authority to approve the retention of a professional who has a conflict of interest), aff'd, 122 Fed. App. 528 (2d Cir. 2004) and In re Harold and Williams Development Co., 977 F.2d 906, 909 (4th Cir. 1992) (the Bankruptcy Court may only approve professionals who meet the requirements of Section 327(a)).

VI. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statutory Framework

Attorneys retained as bankruptcy counsel for debtors in chapter 11 cases must comply with 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a) which provides, in part, that:

> (a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, the trustee,[3] with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys, . . . or other professional persons, that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate[4] and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title.

11 U.S.C. Section 327(a) (emphasis added). The term "disinterested person" is defined in 11 U.S.C. Section 101(14) as a person that

> (B) is not and was not, within 2 years before the date of the filing of the petition, a director, officer, or employee of the debtor; and does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or any class of creditors or equity security holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor, or for any other reason.

11 U.S.C. Section 101(14) (2005) (emphasis added). The term adverse interest is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code. The Second Circuit, however, has defined the term as:

> (1) to possess or assert any economic interest that would tend to lessen the value of the bankruptcy estate or that would create either an actual or potential dispute in which the estate is a rival claimant; or (2) to possess a predisposition under circumstances that render such a bias against the estate.

B. Procedural and Factual History

1. The Chapter 11 Cases

On August 31, 2006, Cadwalader filed chapter 11 petitions on behalf the Debtors. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 266-267, ¶ 1, & Exhibit 22, at 296, ECF Doc. No. 1.) The Bankruptcy Court entered an order directing the joint administration of the cases on September 1, 2006. [RA, Exhibit 22, at 299, ECF Doc. No. 23.] The Debtors operate portrait studios through a licensing agreement with Wal-Mart in 2,500 stores in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Germany, and the United Kingdom. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 268, ¶¶ 2-4.] The Debtors filed the cases because a downturn in business made it difficult to service their significant secured and unsecured debt. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 270, ¶¶ 6-8.]

On the petition date, the Debtors’ debts totaled approximately $283 million. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 270-272.] This amount included $11 million owed to Wells Fargo Foothill (“Wells Fargo”) under a secured credit facility, $50 million in secured bonds, $165 million in senior unsecured bonds, owned by Goldman Sachs, Whippoorwill Associates ("Whippoorwill") and others (the "Senior Notes"), $30 million in subordinated unsecured bonds owned by Goldman Sachs and others, and $22 million in trade debt purchased by Whippoorwill from AgfaPhoto USA. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 270-272, ¶¶ 9-14.] Other trade claims totaled $5 to $6 million. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 272, ¶ 15.] After the petition date, the Court approved a debtor-in-possession loan to the Debtors from Wells Fargo, which provided the Debtors with a $45 million revolving line of credit, to be used to, among other things, satisfy Wells Fargo's pre-petition claim (the "Roll Up") and fund working capital needs. [RA, Exhibit 22, at 308, ECF Doc. No. 88.]

The Debtors claimed that, on the petition date, they had an "agreement in principle" with an ad hoc committee of holders of the Senior Notes (the "Ad Hoc Committee"), on the terms of a chapter 11 plan of reorganization (the "Pre-Negotiated Plan"). [RA, Exhibit 21, at 273, ¶ 16.] Wal-Mart, however, was not a party to the Pre-Negotiated Plan, even though the Debtors admitted that

> The Debtors' business is completely dependent upon their relationship with Wal-Mart inasmuch as all of the Portrait Studios in North America are located in Wal-Mart stores and currently operate under the Wal-Mart tradename. The Debtors' operations within Wal-Mart Stores represent a substantial percentage of the Debtors' historical annual consolidated revenue. The Debtors' business simply cannot be reorganized – much less survive – without the support of Wal-Mart.

[RA, Exhibit 21, at 283, ¶ 49.] On the petition date, the Debtors claimed to have a separate "agreement in principle" with Wal-Mart [RA, Exhibit 21, at 284, ¶ 51], but as of October 26, 2006, the Debtors and Wal-Mart had not come to any agreement on the Debtors' future as a Wal-Mart licensee, and the creditors were contemplating renegotiating the Pre-Negotiated Plan due to a decrease in the value of the Debtors during the bankruptcy case. [RA, Exhibit 14, at 100, lines

3-5; 101, lines 12-25; & 102, lines 1-5.]

2. The Employment Application

On August 31, 2006, Cadwalader filed the Employment Application and the Affidavit of John H. Bae ("Bae") (the "Bae Affidavit"). [RA, Exhibit 20, at 232.] Bae is a member of Cadwalader. [RA, Exhibit 20, at 246, ¶ 2.] The Bae Affidavit disclosed that Cadwalader had current and on-going attorney-client relationships with nine parties with significant connections to the Debtors' bankruptcy cases in matters unrelated to the cases. These parties included (1) Wells Fargo (the Debtors' pre-petition and DIP lender), (2) Wal-Mart (licensor upon which the Debtors' business depends), (3) Whippoorwill (bond and trade claim holder and member of the creditors' committee), (4) and (5) GS Mezzanine Partners II, L.P. and GS Mezzanine Partners II Offshore, L.P. (bondholders and Goldman Sachs-related entities), (6) AIG Global Investment Corp ("AIG") (bondholder and member of the creditors' committee), (7) Travelers Indemnity Company, (8) The Prudential Company of America; and (9) the Bank of New York. [RA, Exhibit 20, at 250, ¶¶ 14-15 & 255, Annex I.]

On September 17, Cadwalader filed a Supplemental Affidavit of John H. Bae (the "Supplemental Bae Affidavit"). [RA, Exhibit 19, at 223.] Among other things, the Supplemental Bae Affidavit disclosed the following:

1. Attorneys in Cadwalader's Capital Markets Department and Global Finance Department represent Goldman Sachs & Company and several of its affiliates in a number of areas, including performing services relating to loan originations, purchasing and selling loans securitizations, swaps and other related matters.

2. Attorneys in Cadwalader's Capital Markets Department represent Wells Fargo and several of its affiliates relating to residential mortgage securitizations.

3. Attorneys in Cadwalader's Washington, D.C. office represent Wal-Mart in a discreet, confidential matter.

[RA, Exhibit 19, at 225, ¶¶ 5-7.]

Bae averred that even though Cadwalader had significant attorney-client relationships with every major constituency in the case, the relationships did not create adverse interests at that time. [RA, Exhibit 19, at 225, ¶¶ 8-10 & 226, ¶ 11.] If adverse interests arose, Bae maintained that the Debtor would hire "conflicts counsel."[5] [RA, Exhibit 19, at 226, ¶ 12.]

On September 12, 2006, the United States Trustee filed an objection to the Employment Application (the "Objection"). [RA, Exhibit 18, at 208.] The United States Trustee argued that Cadwalader had connections with every major constituency in the Debtors' case, including Wal-Mart, on which the Debtors' business depended, Wells Fargo, the pre-petition and DIP lender, and Goldman Sachs, bondholder, and Whippoorwill and AIG, bondholders and members of the creditors' committee. The United States Trustee also argued that Cadwalader was not disinterested, under Section 327(a), because it would not sue any of the nine clients who were significant parties-in-interest in the Debtors' cases. Moreover, Cadwalader's representation of those parties gave rise to the perception of a disincentive to act zealously for the Debtors. In [5] Conflicts counsel is a type of retention that has arisen in the Bankruptcy Courts for the Southern District of New York and the District of Delaware in light of increasing numbers of mega- and bega- cases and the proliferation of national and international law firms. In cases where bankruptcy counsel have attorney-client relationships with peripheral creditors or parties-in-interest in a case, the Bankruptcy Court will approve conflicts counsel to handle all matters related to those clients. See In re Enron, 2003 WL 223455, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. February 3, 2003) (conflicts counsel represented creditors' committee with respect to all matters in which committee counsel had conflict of interest). Conflicts counsel appropriately handle discrete issues. See id. at *9 (conflicts counsel handled matters related to structured finance transactions).

sum, this perception, coupled with Cadwalader's inability to sue virtually all of the major players in the case, raised issues with respect to the current and future conduct of the case, including the conduct of the negotiations with Wal-Mart. [RA, Exhibit 18, at 214-217.]

At the hearing on the Employment Application on September 22, 2006, Bae admitted that Cadwalader would not sue its clients, arguing that the inability to sue was irrelevant because the bankruptcy case was consensual and there were no litigation issues with any of the creditors.[6] [RA, Exhibit 16, at 167, lines 14-25; 168, lines 1-25; & 170, lines 1-6.] With respect to Wal-Mart, Bae argued, the Debtors' principals were handling negotiations, and the Debtors would hire conflicts counsel to "paper" any resolution of the Wal-Mart licensing agreement. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 168, lines 7-15.]

At the September 22, 2006 hearing, the United States Trustee argued that Cadwalader had conflicting duties of loyalty arising from the inability to sue its own clients. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 159, line 25; & 160, lines 1-14.] The inability to sue was tantamount to an acknowledgment that Cadwalader represented interests adverse to the estate. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 157, lines 15-19.] Hence, Cadwalader could not be retained under section 327(a). [RA, Exhibit 16, at 160, lines 15-25, & 161, lines 1-4.] After hearing argument from the parties, the Bankruptcy Court took the matter under advisement. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 190, lines 13-14.]

3. The Bankruptcy Court's Bench Decision

On October 19, 2006, the Bankruptcy Court issued an oral ruling from the bench approving Cadwalader's retention under 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a). [RA, Exhibit 15, at 127-

[6] Bae specifically stated that "frankly, if the debtor [had] come to us and said 'we want to sue Wal-Mart,' we could not have taken that case and we would not have taken that case, but it's not about that." [RA, Exhibit 16, at 167, lines 20-23.]

133.] The Bankruptcy Court approved the retention despite his finding that Cadwalader had "material client relationships with almost all the principal constituents in this chapter 11 case . . . ." [RA, Exhibit 15, at 128, lines 1-15.] Specifically, the Court stated that:

> I cannot imagine any Court authorizing the retention of a law firm for the debtor with so many client relationships, and important client relationships which, without question, do constitute, quote, "an interest adverse to the estate," and render Cadwalader not a, quote, "disinterested person." I might point out that an adverse interest, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Code, is not a situation where there is actual raging conflict. An adverse interest, within the meaning of Section 327(a) is any interest where the parties in a negotiation, no matter how friendly, would sit on the other side of the table from each other.

[RA, Exhibit 15, at 129, at 3-13.] The Bankruptcy Court further found that Cadwalader's relationship with Wal-Mart was prejudicial to the Debtors:

> In the Wal-Mart situation, Wal-Mart, I am told, Wal-Mart, either directly or with the assistance of counsel, is negotiating directly with the president of Portrait Corporation of America, apparently without counsel. Extremely prejudicial. And we're told that in order to document any agreement that may result, conflicts counsel would be retained. Well, it would certainly be unusual, and that is really a big understatement. . . . In effect, this debtor has no outside counsel or independent counsel to advise it.

[RA, Exhibit 15, at 129, line 25; and 130, lines 1-6 & 12-13.] Ultimately, however, the Bankruptcy Court approved what it called an "unapprovable" retention, reasoning that denial would result in delay and cost, the plan was negotiated pre-petition, there were no present controversies between the creditors, and no creditors opposed the Employment Application. [RA, Exhibit 15, at 132, lines 14-25; & 133, lines 1-21.]

On October 20, 2006, a day after the oral ruling, the Bankruptcy Court initiated a conference call with Cadwalader and the United States Trustee and expressed concerns regarding previously undisclosed controversies in the Debtors' case. [RA, Exhibit 11, at 63, ¶ 5.] The Court informed Cadwalader and the United States Trustee that it was not inclined to sign any retention order for Cadwalader until the matters were resolved. [RA, Exhibit 11, at 63, ¶ 5.]

4. Cadwalader's Withdrawal and Retention as "Transition Counsel"

At a hearing on October 26, 2006, Bae informed the Court of Cadwalader's decision to withdraw as counsel for the Debtors because "Cadwalader took very seriously Your Honor's comments and concerns regarding conflicts that the Court has -- that the United States Trustee's Office has identified, and that Your Honor has remarked on." [RA, Exhibit 14, at 111, lines 11-15.] Cadwalader expressed its desire to stay on as "transition counsel" until the Debtors selected a new firm if an appropriate order could be worked out with the United States Trustee. [RA, Exhibit 14, at 111, lines 18-25; & 112, lines 1-6.] Bae admitted that he had "never prepared such an order in [his] career." [RA, Exhibit 14, at 112, lines 8-9.] The Bankruptcy Court stated that "it may be that such an order will be appropriate." [RA, Exhibit 14, at 112, lines 10-11.]

The United States Trustee and Cadwalader could not come to an agreement on a form of order. On October 31, 2006, Cadwalader settled a proposed employment order (the "Proposed Order") on the parties-in-interest to the case. [RA, Exhibit 13, at 78.] The Creditors' Committee and the United States Trustee filed objections to the Proposed Order.[7] [RA, Exhibit 11, at 61; & Exhibit 12, at 70.]

5. The Employment Order

[7] On November 16, 2006, the Bankruptcy Court approved the employment of Kasowitz Benson Torres & Friedman, LLP ("Kasowitz") as Section 327(a) Counsel for the Debtors. [RA, Exhibit 22, at 320, ECF Doc. No. 186.] Kasowitz filed a disclosure statement and plan on January 31, 2007. [RA, Exhibit 22, at 333, ECF Doc. Nos. 287 & 288.]

The Court held a hearing on the Proposed Order on November 22, 2006. [RA, Exhibit 8, at 23.] The Court overruled the objections of the United States Trustee and the Creditors' Committee and entered the Proposed Order (the "Employment Order"), stating:

> My ruling . . . reflects the plain fact, which is evident to everybody, that the firm has rendered a significant service to the debtor -- debtors prior to its withdrawal . . . And so for the reasons that I previously expressed in my oral ruling, the unique circumstances of this case as it was then postured, I will grant the application.

[RA, Exhibit 8, at 32, lines 21-25; & 33, lines 1-2.] The Employment Order provided in part that

> ORDERED that, pursuant to sections 327(a) and 328(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, the Debtors, as debtors in possession, are authorized to employ and retain Cadwalader as their attorneys, in accordance with Cadwalader's normal hourly rates and disbursement policies as set forth in the Bae Affidavit, effective as of the commencement of these cases; and it is further
> ORDERED that Cadwalader shall represent the Debtors until such time as the Debtors promptly select new counsel, and shall continue to represent the Debtors and assist such new counsel during a reasonable transition period so as to facilitate the efficient administration of the Debtors' estates;

[RA, Exhibit 7, at 21-22.] On November 30, 2006, the United States Trustee filed a timely Notice of Appeal. [RA, Exhibit 1, at 1.]

VII. ARGUMENT

This Court Should Reverse the Employment Order Because the Bankruptcy Court Committed Three Errors of Law in Approving Cadwalader's Retention Under 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a).

In an appeal of a retention order entered by the Bankruptcy Court, the appellate court reviews conclusions of law under the de novo standard of review. In re Federated Dept. Stores, Inc., 44 F.3d at 1315. The Bankruptcy Court does not have discretion to approve the employment of professionals who do not meet the disinterestedness requirements of 11 U.S.C.

Section 327(a). In re Mercury, 280 B.R. at 55. See also Childress v. Middleton Arms L.P. (In re Middleton Arms Ltd. Partnership), 934 F.2d 723, 725 (6th Cir. 1991) (the court may not use its equitable powers to approve employment of a person who is not disinterested) and In re Federated Dept. Stores, Inc., 44 F.3d at 1319 (the Bankruptcy Court's approval of professional that was not disinterested based on "equitable considerations" and "familiarity with the debtors' business operations" was error).

In this case, the Bankruptcy Court committed three errors. The Bankruptcy Court properly held that Cadwalader was not disinterested, i.e., that Cadwalader held many adverse interests. [RA, Exhibit 15, at 127, line 25; 128-129; & 130, lines 1-13.] On this basis, Cadwalader was ineligible for retention under the specific requisites of 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a). See, e.g., In re Granite Partners, 219 B.R. at 32-33 (the Section 327(a) requirements are mandatory and apply at retention and throughout the case). The Bankruptcy Court's first error, therefore, was to approve Cadwalader's retention in the face of its own holding and the mandatory language of Section 327(a).

Second, the Bankruptcy Court erred when it held that the facts and circumstances of the case warranted Cadwalader's retention. In so holding, the Bankruptcy Court misapplied the law. Section 327(a) does not authorize the court to approve the retention of counsel under an economic benefit test. If proposed counsel are not disinterested, the Bankruptcy Court cannot approve their retention. Bankruptcy courts have the authority to consider the facts and circumstances in deciding retention matters but only after determining that counsel have met the disinterestedness requirement of Section 327(a). See In re Harold & Williams Development Co., 977 F.2d at 910 (court may look at facts and circumstances only after disinterested requirement has been met).

Third, the Bankruptcy Court erred in approving the retention of Cadwalader as "transition counsel." The Bankruptcy Code does not provide for "transition counsel" and, even if it did, counsel would have to meet the mandatory disinterestedness requirement of Section 327(a). For these reasons, the Employment Order should be reversed.

A. Because the Court Properly Held that Cadwalader Did Not Meet the Mandatory Disinterestedness Standard of 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a), the Court Erred By Entering the Employment Order.

Under Section 327(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, a chapter 11 debtor may employ "one or more attorneys . . . , that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons[.]" 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a) (emphasis added). Disinterestedness is defined in 11 U.S.C. Section 101(14) as a person that "does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or any class of creditors or equity security holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor, or for any other reason." 11 U.S.C. Section 101(14). The 'materially adverse' standard of Section 101(14) incorporated in the disinterestedness test and the 'interest adverse to the estate' language in section 327(a) overlap . . . and form a single test to judge conflicts of interest." In re Granite Partners, 219 B.R. at 33 (citations omitted).

Section 327(a) "serves the important policy of ensuring that the professionals' service presents no conflict of interest." In re Vouzianas, 259 F.3d 103, 107 (2d Cir. 2001). See also Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir.1998) (Section 327(a) ensures that "professionals . . . tender undivided loyalty and provide untainted advice and assistance in furtherance of their fiduciary responsibilities) (quoting Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 58 (1st Cir.1994)). .

The disinterestedness provision of Section 327(a) is mandatory and applies at the time of retention and throughout the case. In re Granite Partners, 219 B.R. at 32-33. The disinterestedness requirement of Section 327(a) is much stricter than the conflict of interest provisions in the New York Code of Professional Responsibility because Section 327(a) does not allow for the waiver of conflicts of interest. Id. at 34.

A professional is not disinterested where the professional had "either a meaningful incentive to act contrary to the interests of the estates . . . , or the reasonable perception of one." Id. at 36 (emphasis added). See also In re Leslie Fay Companies, Inc., 175 B.R. at 534 (debtor's counsel investigating a client "had a perceptible economic incentive not to pursue the possibility of claims . . . with the same vigor and intensity it might have otherwise applied"). See also Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d at 59 (court must determine whether competing interest of a court-appointed professional "created either a meaningful incentive to act contrary to the best interests of the estate and its sundry creditors-an incentive sufficient to place those parties at more than acceptable risk-or the reasonable perception of one"); accord Electro-Wire Products, Inc. v. Sirote & Permutt, P.C. (In re Prince), 40 F.3d 356, 360-361 (11th Cir. 1994) and In re Crivello, 134 F.3d at 835. "To be disinterested is 'to prevent even the appearance of a conflict irrespective of the integrity of the person or firm under consideration.'" In re Vebeliunas, 231 B.R. 181, 191 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1999) (quoting In re Codesco, 18 B.R. 997, 999 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1982)). Therefore, > because section 327(a) is designed to limit even appearances of impropriety to the extent reasonably practicable, doubt as to whether a particular set of facts gives rise to a disqualifying conflict of interest normally should be resolved in favor of disqualification.

In re Angelika Films 57th, Inc., 227 B.R. 29, 39 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1998) (citing In re Rancourt, 207 B.R. 338, 359 (Bankr. D. N. H. 1997), aff'd, 246 B.R. 176 (S.D.N.Y. 2000).

Counsel who cannot sue or investigate clients who are parties in a bankruptcy case have adverse interests and are, therefore, not disinterested. See In re Granite Partners, 219 B.R. at 40 ("the preconceived refusal to sue a potential defendant at the beginning of an investigation constitutes a disqualifying adverse interest"). See also In re Leslie Fay, 175 B.R. at 535 (refusal to sue debtor's accountants and auditors who were also clients rendered counsel not disinterested); In re Amdura Corp., 121 B.R. 862, 871 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1990) (debtor's counsel was not disinterested because counsel would not sue a bank that was a client and a creditor of the debtor); and In re Envirodyne Indust. Inc., 150 B.R. 1008, 1014 n.7 (Bankr. N. D. Ill. 1993) (counsel could not be retained under Section 327(a) because of refusal to investigate or represent debtors in a leveraged buy out).

Here, Cadwalader admitted that it would not sue clients who were significant parties-in-interest in the Debtors' case. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 167, lines 14-23.] For example, Cadwalader represented Wal-Mart, the party on which the Debtors' business depended. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 283, ¶ 49; Exhibit 19, at 225, ¶ 7.] Cadwalader left the negotiations over new contract terms with Wal-Mart to the Debtors' managers rather than sit across the table from its client. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 168, lines 7-15.] Cadwalader represented Wells Fargo, the pre-petition secured lender and DIP lender and would not investigate the validity of the liens because of the connections. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 163, lines 12-25; & 164, lines 1-8; Exhibit 19, at 225, ¶ 6; & Exhibit 20, at 250-251, ¶15; & 255.] Bond holder Goldman Sachs was also one of Cadwalader's significant clients. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 161, lines 11-25; Exhibit 19, at 225, ¶ 5; &

Exhibit 20, at 250-251, ¶ 15; & 255.] Based on these facts, Cadwalader had adverse interests which made Cadwalader not disinterested and, therefore, ineligible for retention under Section 327(a) of the Bankruptcy Code.

The Bankruptcy Court itself held that Cadwalader was not disinterested:

> We are not aware of any case in which a law firm has satisfied the standards set forth in Section 327(a), which is that, quote, "Attorneys . . . . do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and . . . are disinterested persons," under circumstances similar to those presented here by Cadawalader.
> Those circumstances are that Cadwalader has material client relationships with almost all the principal constituents in this chapter 11 case
> I cannot imagine any Court authorizing the retention of a law firm for the debtor with so many client relationships, and important client relationships which, without question, do constitute, quote, "an interest adverse to the estate," and render Cadwalader not a, quote, "disinterested person."

Moreover, the Bankruptcy Court held that Cadwalader’s adverse interests were prejudicial to the Debtors in the Wal-Mart negotiations:

> In the Wal-Mart situation, Wal-Mart, I am told, Wal-Mart, either directly or with the assistance of counsel, is negotiating directly with the president of Portrait Corporation of America, apparently without counsel. Extremely prejudicial. And we're told that in order to document any agreement that may result, conflicts counsel would be retained. Well, it would certainly be unusual, and that is really a big understatement.
> If the crucial negotiations with an adverse third party and again, bear in mind that adverse does not mean that the parties are engaged in legal warfare, it means that they are on the opposite side of a bargaining table, that they have interests which are different from each other, and that certainly is the case with Wal-Mart. In effect, this debtor has no outside counsel or independent counsel to advise it.

[RA, Exhibit 15, at 129, line 25 and 130, lines 1-13.]

The Section 327(a) disinterestedness requirement is mandatory. In re Granite Partners, 219 B.R. at 32-33. The Bankruptcy Court recognized this and held that Cadwalader was not disinterested because it held many adverse interests. [RA, Exhibit 15, at 128-129 & 130, lines 1-13.] Thus, it was error for the Bankruptcy Court to enter the Employment Order under 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a).

B. Cadwalader Was Not Eligible for Employment Because It Was Not Disinterested and the Bankruptcy Court Erred When It Held that the Facts and Circumstances of the Case Warranted Approving Cadwalader's Employment.

The Bankruptcy Court held that the facts and circumstances of the case warranted approving the Employment Order despite the fact that Cadwalader was not disinterested. The Bankruptcy Court, in essence, created an exception to the disinterestedness requirement of 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a). Thus, based on the Bankruptcy Court's ruling, in situations where no party opposes the retention, a plan is negotiated pre-petition, there are no present controversies between creditors and the debtors, a plan will be presented early in the case, and the professional provides valuable services, the disinterestedness requirement of Section 327(a) will not apply.

On the contrary, these facts and circumstances did not warrant approving Cadwalader's retention for three reasons. First, the Bankruptcy Court has an independent duty to review employment applications whether creditors object or not. In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 112 B.R. 584, 586 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990); In re Interwest Business Equipment, Inc., 23 F.3d 311, 317 (10th Cir. 1994) Thus, the lack of creditor objection was irrelevant to the Bankruptcy Court's review.

Second, the Bankruptcy Court may only consider the facts and circumstances after it has determined that the professional is disinterested under Section 327(a). See In re Harold & Williams Development Co., 977 F.2d at 910 (the Bankruptcy Court's discretion with regard to employment applications is circumscribed by the disinterestedness requirement of Section 327(a), which is a “congressionally established” per se rule). These facts and circumstances include “the protection of the interests of the bankruptcy estate and its creditors, and the efficient, expeditious, and economical resolution of the bankruptcy proceeding.” In re Vouzianas, 259 F.3d at 107 (quoting In re AroChem, 176 F.3d at 621)).

Thus, the Bankruptcy Court may disapprove an application not only for lack of disinterestedness but also for other reasons that serve the best interests of the bankruptcy estate and creditors. In re Vebeliunas, 231 B.R. at 194-95. The Bankruptcy Court may disapprove the application of a disinterested professional if the facts and circumstances warrant. In re Vouzianas, 259 F.2d at 108. No authority exists, however, under which a court may approve the retention of an estate professional who is not disinterested under Section 327(a), even if under the facts and circumstances, that retention might benefit the estate by mitigating delay and cost. That arrangement – and the Bankruptcy Court’s ruling in this case – created an unauthorized exception to the disinterestedness requirement of Section 327(a).

Third, a law firm that is not disinterested proceeds in its representation of a debtor at its own risk, as noncompliance with Section 327(a) can lead to forfeiture of fees. In re Mercury, 280 B.R. at 56-57 (citing In re Intech Capital Corp., 87 B.R. 232, 234 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1988)). See also In re Angelika Films, 246 B.R.176, 179 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (provision of valuable services does not mitigate the failure to comply with Section 327(a)). The fact that Cadwalader may have provided valuable services to the estate did not excuse Cadwalader’s lack of disinterestedness. Thus, the facts and circumstances of this case did not warrant the retention of Cadwalader. The Bankruptcy Court misapplied the law and created an unwarranted exception to the mandatory disinterestedness requirement of 11 U.S.C. Section 327(a).

C. The Bankruptcy Court Improperly Approved Cadwalader as "Transition Counsel."

No provision of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes the retention of transition counsel. The term "transition counsel" was coined by Cadwalader as a way to obtain approval of the retention after its withdrawal from representation of the Debtors on October 26, 2006 until such time as Section 327(a) counsel was retained by the Debtors. [RA, Exhibit 14, at 111, lines 18-25; & 112, lines 1-9.] Even if "transition counsel" were appropriate under the Bankruptcy Code, any transition counsel retained under Section 327(a) would have to meet the disinterestedness requirement. As discussed above at Sections A and B, Cadwalader did not.

Retention of Cadwalader as "transition counsel" is likewise inappropriate under 11 U.S.C. Section 327(e), which provides:

> The trustee, with the court's approval, may employ, for a specified special purpose, other than to represent the trustee in conducting the case, an attorney that has represented the debtor, if in the best interest of the estate, and if such attorney does not represent or hold any interest adverse to the debtor or to the estate with respect to the matter on which the attorney is to be employed.

11 U.S.C. Section 327(e). The "threshold requirement" of Section 327(e) is that the attorney be employed for a "special purpose," not to represent the trustee in "conducting the case," which, in a chapter 11 case includes "assisting in the formulation of a plan and assisting the trustee in carrying out the required investigations." In re Neuman, 138 B.R. 683, 685 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). See also In re Tidewater Memorial Hospital, Inc., 110 B.R. 221, 228 (Bankr. E. D. Va. 1989) ("the 'special purpose' to be served by counsel appointed under § 327(e) must not be related to the debtor's reorganization since this is tantamount to representing the debtor in the conduct of the case") (citations omitted). Special counsel must "not hold an adverse interest 'with respect to the matter on which such attorney is to be employed,'" which is a less stringent standard that the one set forth in Section 327(a). In re AroChem Corp., 181 B.R. 693, 699 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1995), aff'd, 176 F.3d 610 (2d Cir. 1999). However, counsel who cannot meet the disinterestedness standard of Section 327(a) cannot "bypass this requirement through employment as special counsel." In re Neuman, 138 B.R. at 686 (quoting Tidewater Memorial Hospital, 110 B.R. at 228).

In this case, the Debtors employed Cadwalader to conduct the bankruptcy case, not to handle special, non-bankruptcy matters. [RA, Exhibit 20, at 240, ¶ 25.] In addition, resort to Section 327(e) would not cure Cadwalader's lack of disinterestedness. Therefore, on the foregoing two grounds, the Court improperly ordered retention of Cadwalader as transition counsel.

VIII. CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully request that the Court reverse the Employment Order.

The United States submits this brief under Fed. R. App. P. 29 as amicus curiae supporting reversal as sought by Appellant Mark R. Stewart, the chapter 13 trustee.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This appeal calls upon this Court to interpret 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3), a statutory provision affecting chapter 13 bankruptcy cases. Section 1325(b)(3) makes two chapter 7 provisions – 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B) – applicable to chapter 13 cases.

The United States has a direct interest in the proper construction of these provisions because United States Trustees, who are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General, supervise the administration of chapter 7 and chapter 13 bankruptcy cases in all federal judicial districts within this circuit. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977) (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena").

This appeal affects the United States' interests for two distinct reasons:

First, by applying section 1325(b)(3), this Court will determine how much above-median-income chapter 13 debtors must repay their creditors in their repayment plans. The United States has an interest in that question because United States Trustees “supervise the administration of [chapter 13] cases and trustees,” monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such plans in connection with plan confirmation hearings under section 1324. See 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

Second, because section 1325(b)(3) incorporates portions of the chapter 7 means test, this appeal will also determine what expenses above-median-income chapter 7 debtors can claim on the means test. The means test determines whether an above-median-income debtor’s chapter 7 case should be dismissed as abusive. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1) and (2). United States Trustees play a unique role in chapter 7 means test cases because section 704(b) requires them to review all such cases and, whenever a case is deemed presumptively abusive under the statute, either seek its dismissal or file a statement declining to seek dismissal.[1] See Schultz v. United States, 529 F.3d 343, 348 (6th Cir. 2008) (describing United States Trustee’s duties to enforce chapter 7 means test).

Given these interests, the United States submits this brief to share its views on the application of sections 1325(b)(3) and 707(b)(2)(A). See 28 U.S.C. 517 (authorizing the Department of Justice “to attend to the interests of the United

The Bankruptcy Code allows debtors to claim a vehicle ownership expense, in a set amount, when "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The expense amount is a standardized dollar value debtors may claim to account for vehicle loan or lease payments. The debtors in this case claimed such a set amount for two vehicles, even though they have no loan or lease payments for one of the vehicles.

The question presented is: Did the bankruptcy appellate panel err in ruling that the debtors could claim the standard ownership expense amount on the vehicle for which they had no associated ownership expense?

STATUTORY BACKGROUND

This appeal involves the interpretation of provisions added to the Bankruptcy Code by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.[2] The 2005 Act significantly altered how debtors obtain chapter 13 bankruptcy relief.

In a chapter 13 case, a chapter 13 trustee may insist the debtor devote all of his "projected disposable income" to repay unsecured creditors over a period of up to five years. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). For above-median-income chapter 13 debtors like the debtors in this appeal, "disposable income" is determined by deducting certain permitted expenses from the debtors' current monthly income. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2) ("disposable income" means current monthly income less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended); 11 U.S.C. 101(10A) (definition of "current monthly income").

Above-median-income chapter 13 debtors determine their permitted expenses by employing the formula found in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B). See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3) (incorporating those provisions). Permitted expenses include certain "applicable" expense amounts and certain prescribed "actual" expenses under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Permitted expenses also include certain additional expenses identified in other subsections of section 707(b)(2)(A).

The "applicable" expense amounts referred to in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) are not the debtor's actual expenses; instead, they are static amounts listed in the Internal Revenue Service's Local and National Standards, which may be greater or less than the debtor's actual monthly expenditure for a category for which the IRS has adopted a standard.[3] Id.

The IRS Local Standards include two separate "transportation" amounts: (1) an operating expense amount and (2) an ownership expense amount. Operating expenses include vehicle maintenance, fuel, state and local registration, required inspection, parking fees, tolls, and driver's license fees. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, § 5.15.1.9, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

Independent of operating expenses, debtors can claim, when "applicable," a standardized ownership expense amount to reflect monthly lease or purchase payments for up to two vehicles. Id. The ownership expense amounts adopted in [3] The IRS Collection Financial Standards are used by the IRS in assessing a taxpayer's ability to pay past-due taxes. Because the debtors filed their case on October 16, 2006, the Collection Financial Standards in effect as of that date are applicable. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The IRS Local Transportation Expense Standards for the West Census Region for cases filed between October 1, 2006, and January 31, 2007, are included in the Appendix filed by the Appellant chapter 13 trustee ("Aplt. App.") at 65.

the IRS Standards are based on the average cost of financing a vehicle as determined annually by the Federal Reserve Board.[4] Id.

This appeal poses the question whether a standardized vehicle ownership expense amount deduction is "applicable" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) when the debtors have no associated vehicle ownership expense. As the debtors in this appeal have no loan or lease payments on one of their vehicles, this Court must determine whether they may nonetheless claim the IRS Local Standard ownership expense amount for that vehicle and thereby reduce their plan payments by $322 for each month of their 60-month repayment plan.

[4] For the debtors' geographic region, the standard operating expense amount for two vehicles is $420. The standard ownership expense amount is $471 for the first vehicle and $332 for the second vehicle. For vehicles six or more years old or with 75,000 miles, an additional $200 per month may be added to the operating expense amount for up to two older vehicles. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, § 5.8.5.6.3, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On October 10, 2006, Jimmy Dean Pearson and Jeanette Lucille Pearson ("Debtors") filed a voluntary petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 701, et seq. Aplt. App. at 1 (Docket Sheet for Bankruptcy Case No. 06-20528). On December 26, 2006, the Debtors' case was voluntarily converted to chapter 13. Id. at 12.

The Debtors own two cars, a Buick and an Oldsmobile. Id. at 28, 29. They own the Buick free of liens and still owe a small amount on the Oldsmobile, which is inoperable. Id. at 28, 29.

The Debtors filed an initial chapter 13 means test form calculating monthly disposable income of $252.[5] Id. at 14-20. The Debtors claimed a $461 monthly vehicle ownership expense deduction on the Buick[6] and a $328 ownership expense deduction on the Oldsmobile.[7] Id. at 16.

[5] The chapter 13 means test form, Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22C, facilitates the computation of a chapter 13 debtor's income and expenses under the 2005 Act. The means test form was approved by the Judicial Conference of the United States, and the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure require all chapter 13 debtors to file the form. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(b)(6).

[6] The Debtors claimed the $471 standard expense amount for a first vehicle minus a $10 average monthly loan payment.

[7] The Debtors claimed the $332 standard expense amount for a second vehicle minus a $4 average monthly loan payment.

The Debtors next sought approval of a chapter 13 repayment plan proposing to pay unsecured creditors a total of $15,120 over five years. Docket No. 19 at 3. The trustee objected to confirmation of the plan, arguing among other things that the Debtors could not reduce their disposable income by claiming an ownership expense amount for vehicles on which they were making no associated ownership expense payments. Docket No. 36 at 3.

In an order dated April 11, 2007, the bankruptcy court directed the Debtors to file an amended means test form claiming the vehicle ownership expense for only one vehicle. Aplt. App. at 30-33. The Debtors responded by filing an amended means test form claiming ownership interest expense amounts of $463[8] on the Buick and $320[9] on the Oldsmobile. Docket No. 59. The Debtors also filed an amended plan proposing, in addition to the payments included in their initial plan, payment of the Oldsmobile's outstanding $1,500 loan. Docket No. 56. Under this amended plan, the Debtors proposed to pay unsecured creditors only $12,060. Id.

The trustee objected to the amended plan, and on June 19, 2007, the bankruptcy court denied confirmation. Aplt. App. at 41. The court allowed the Debtors to claim the ownership expense amount for the Oldsmobile (which had indebtedness) but not for the Buick (which did not). Id. The court directed the Debtors to file an amended plan and means test form that calculated monthly disposable income after claiming the ownership expense amount for the Oldsmobile, but not the Buick. Id.

The Debtors responded by filing an amended means test form showing monthly disposable income of $342, up from $252 on their initial chapter 13 means test form. Id. at 34-40. On the amended means test form the Debtors claimed an ownership expense amount of $459[10] for the Oldsmobile; as for the Buick, they did not claim an ownership expense amount, but they did take an additional $200 "older vehicle" allowance as an operating expense. Id. at 36. The Debtors also filed a second amended plan proposing to pay unsecured creditors $19,200, up from $12,060 on their prior amended plan. Docket No. 67.

The trustee objected to this plan on the grounds that it was not feasible given the amount it proposed to pay unsecured creditors. Docket No. 72. As a result, the Debtors filed a third amended plan in which total payments to unsecured creditors over the life of the plan were reduced to $18,497. Aplt. App. at 42-45. On August 28, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered an order confirming the third amended plan. Id. at 46.

The Debtors then filed an appeal to the United States Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Tenth Circuit of the order confirming their third amended plan and, through it, the previous denial of confirmation of their earlier plans. Id. at 47. The Debtors argued that they should not have had to file an amended means test form and plan, as they should have been allowed to claim the ownership expense amount for both the Oldsmobile and the fully-paid-off Buick. Id. at 52.

The appellate panel acknowledged the reported decisions on both sides of the issue, and ultimately agreed with the Debtors and the courts which "conclude that the word 'applicable' refers to the amount listed in the tables of Local Standards."[11] Id. at 57. The appellate panel found that the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), which requires debtors to have associated vehicle ownership expenses before they can claim a vehicle ownership expense amount, would mean "'applicable expenses' are in reality only 'actual expenses.'" Id. at 58. As Congress used the distinct terms "actual expenses" and "applicable expense amounts," the appellate panel determined that the IRS

Standards are "applicable" regardless of whether a debtor actually has associated vehicle ownership expenses. Id. As a result, the appellate panel reversed the bankruptcy court's order confirming the Debtors' third amended plan, and held that the Debtors can claim the vehicle ownership expense amount for the fully-paid-off Buick. Id. at 59.

On August 19, 2008, the chapter 13 trustee filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Debtors seek to shield over $6,000 from their unsecured creditors by claiming a standardized vehicle ownership expense amount under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) for a vehicle on which they have no ownership expense.[12] The bankruptcy appellate panel allowed the Debtors to claim this expense amount.

Its ruling conflicts with the overwhelming weight of bankruptcy appellate panel and district court rulings, and it is wrong for at least five reasons.

1. The Debtors cannot claim this standardized ownership expense amount because section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows it only when "applicable." The standardized vehicle ownership amount deduction is not applicable to the Debtors'

[12] Section 1325(b)(3) incorporates section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) into the Debtors' chapter 13 bankruptcy case.

Buick because they have no associated ownership expense for that vehicle.

2. Giving the word “applicable” its ordinary definition in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows debtors who have a particular monthly expense to claim the corresponding standard expense amount yet prevents debtors who lack a particular monthly expense from claiming phantom expense amounts. This construction also gives meaning to every word in the section, unlike the appellate panel’s construction.

3. The 2005 Act’s legislative history supports allowing debtors to claim expense amounts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) only when they incur associated expenses. The Act’s House Report reveals Congress enacted the new law to ensure debtors would repay their debts when able, and to eliminate loopholes and incentives for debtor abuse in discharging debts when a portion could be repaid. Allowing the Debtors to claim a fictional expense amount diverges from the purpose of the 2005 Act.

4. Reading the word “applicable” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to require a loan or lease payment also fosters sound public policy. Barring above-median-income debtors from claiming inapplicable ownership expense amounts is fair because it simply prevents them from claiming a monthly expense for a cost they do not incur. This interpretation does not hurt lower-income debtors, because they are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). It is also fair to creditors because they will receive payments when debtors have the financial ability to repay.

5. Finally, the bankruptcy system has two safety valves to ensure higher-income debtors without loan or lease payments will not suffer by being denied phantom vehicle expenses. First, debtors with older vehicles receive an additional $200 monthly operating expense allowance per vehicle for up to two older vehicles. Second, debtors can modify their court-confirmed repayment plan under section 1329(a) if they need a new car during the course of repaying their creditors.

ARGUMENT

THE APPELLATE PANEL ERRED IN RULING DEBTORS CAN CLAIM A VEHICLE OWNERSHIP DEDUCTION UNDER SECTION 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) WHEN THEY HAVE NO ASSOCIATED OWNERSHIP EXPENSES

The United States asks this Court to reverse the appellate panel's ruling that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows debtors to reduce their disposable income available to repay creditors by claiming an inapplicable vehicle ownership expense. This case presents an issue of statutory interpretation reviewed de novo. Rupp v. United Sec. Bank (In re Kunz), 489 F.3d 1072, 1077 (10th Cir. 2007).

I. A Vehicle Ownership Expense Amount is "Applicable" Under Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) Only When a Debtor is Making a Corresponding Loan or Lease Payment

A. Vehicle ownership expense amounts are not "applicable" to a debtor who makes no loan or lease payment

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows a debtor to claim monthly expenses including "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). Since the IRS Local Standards include a standard vehicle ownership expense amount, debtors may claim such expense amount for their geographic region, provided it is "applicable."[13]

As "applicable" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code, it should be given its ordinary meaning. Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning."); Biodiversity Legal Found. v. Babbitt, 146 F.3d 1249, 1254

[13] In calculating disposable income debtors are entitled to claim the full amount specified under the IRS Local Standard provided they incur some vehicle ownership expense, i.e., provided the expense is "applicable." See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (applicable expense amount "shall be" the amount "specified" under the IRS Local Standard). See also Fokkena v. Hartwick (In re Hartwick), 373 B.R. 645, 650 (D. Minn. 2007) (any vehicle ownership expense will make debtor eligible for full IRS standard amount).

(10th Cir. 1998) ("Since Congress did not define or otherwise explain [statutory language] within the statute, we assume Congress intended the words to be given their ordinary meaning.").

This Court has held that the ordinary meaning of statutory language "may [be] discover[ed] through the use of dictionaries." Biodiversity Legal Found. v. Babbitt, 146 F.3d at 1254. The word "applicable" is defined as "capable of being applied: having relevance . . . fit, suitable, or right to be applied: APPROPRIATE." Webster's Third New Int'l Dictionary at 105 (1981) (emphasis in original).

The appellate panel's interpretation is inconsistent with the ordinary, common-sense definition of "applicable" because it allows debtors to claim a monthly vehicle ownership expense amount when they have no associated monthly loan or lease expenses. See Neary v. Ross-Tousey (In re Ross-Tousey), 368 B.R. 762, 767 (E.D. Wis. 2007) (section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not make such "fixed allowances guaranteed to every car owner").

The point here is simple – debtors have no section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) vehicle ownership expense amounts "capable of being applied" to them if they do not make loan or lease payments. Ransom v. MBNA Am. Bank, N.A. (In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 799, 807-08 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007). The overwhelming majority of lower appellate decisions agree on this point, and reject the appellate panel's contrary interpretation. See Tate v. Lentz, 2008 WL 4489761 at *3 (S.D. Miss. Sept. 29, 2008); Babin v. Powell (In re Powell), 392 B.R. 407, 408 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008); Babin v. Wilson (In re Wilson), 383 B.R. 729, 734 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807-08, appeal pending No. 08-15066 (9th Cir.); Grossman v. Sawdy (In re Sawdy), 384 B.R. 199, 204 (E.D. Wis. 2008); Meade v. McVay (In re Meade), 384 B.R. 132, 136 (W.D. Tex. 2008); Wieland v. Thomas (In re Thomas), 382 B.R. 793, 797 (D. Kan. 2008); United States Trustee v. Deadmond (In re Deadmond), 2008 WL 191165 at 4 (D. Mont. Jan. 22, 2008);* Fokkena v. Hartwick (In re Hartwick), 373 B.R. 645, 650 (D. Minn. 2007); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765, appeal pending No. 07-2503 (7th Cir.). But see Hildebrand v. Kimbro (In re Kimbro), 389 B.R. 518, 523-25 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2008), appeal pending No. 08-5871 (6th Cir.) (divided court concluded "applicable" simply directs debtors to pick out and use the dollar amounts set forth in tables published as part of the IRS's Local Standards); Brunner v. Armstrong (In re Armstrong), 2008 WL 4426144 at *4-5 (E.D. Wash. Sept. 24, 2008) (allowing debtor to claim ownership expense amount on vehicle owned free and clear of liens).

B. The appellate panel's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) suffers from three flaws the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation avoids: (a) confusing the distinction between "applicable" and "actual"; (b) rendering "applicable" superfluous; and (c) defining "applicable" inconsistently with its intended use in the immediately following subsection

The appellate panel concluded section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) entitles debtors to claim vehicle ownership expenses even when they have no associated loan or lease payment. Rather than read "applicable" as an eligibility requirement, the panel adopted the reasoning of reported decisions that held "applicable" simply directs debtors to pick out and use the dollar amounts set forth in tables published by the IRS, allowing all debtors to claim the ownership expense amount. See Pearson v. Stewart (In re Pearson), 390 B.R. 706, 714 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2008).

This interpretation suffers from three flaws:

First, it confuses the distinction between the words "actual" and "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The panel held that requiring debtors to incur a monthly cost in an expense category before deducting the corresponding IRS standard expense amount would read "applicable" as meaning "actual." In re Pearson, 390 B.R. at 714. This led the panel to rule "applicable" cannot mean debtors must have an associated expense because that would give identical meaning to two different words in the same statute.

This conclusion places fails to recognize the words "applicable" and "actual" have different meanings in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) because "expense amounts" – the words following "applicable" in the statute – do not refer to "actual" costs. See In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650 ("actual" expense does not control the amount of the vehicle ownership expense deduction under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)). To the contrary, the vehicle ownership "expense amounts" are static numbers drawn from the IRS Local and National Standards, not the debtor's actual vehicle ownership expenses.

Contrary to the appellate panel's assertion, the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not require the use of the debtor's "actual" monthly vehicle ownership costs – it simply requires the court to determine whether such vehicle ownership costs exist. See In re Sawdy, 384 B.R. at 214 (the standard vehicle ownership expense amount "is to be used if and only if the debtor actually has the monthly expense of an actual car payment"). Once it is determined that a debtor has a loan or lease payment,[14] the amount used in the

[14] Section 707(b)(2) provides that monthly expenses may not include any "payments for debts." Although not raised by the appellate panel below, two members of a divided Sixth Circuit bankruptcy appellate panel found that this provision shows Congress intended to allow an ownership expense even when a debtor has no debt payment on a vehicle. In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 523. This reading misinterprets the term "payments for debts"; the standard expense amount allowed to debtors where applicable is not a "payment" for a "debt." The means test form is the IRS standard vehicle ownership expense amount, not the debtor's actual monthly expenditures.

Thus, the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation does not read "applicable" as meaning "actual," but instead gives each word its proper meaning: debtors may claim actual expenses in some expense categories, and may claim standard expense amounts in other expense categories when applicable to their factual situation. See In re Thomas, 382 B.R. at 797 (use of the word "'applicable' . . . does not suggest an intent by Congress that the numbers should simply be plucked from the Standards for a debtor's expenses under the means test as if in a vacuum, without reference to the context and meaning of those numbers" (emphasis in original)); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (United States Trustee's interpretation "gives meaning to the distinction between 'applicable' and 'actual' without taking a

"payment for debts" language exists merely to ensure debtors do not double-deduct actual payments for debts, first under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) and then again for certain categories in the IRS's "Other Necessary Expenses" – such as secured debt payments and repayment of delinquent tax debts – that are already allowed elsewhere under the means test. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, § 5.15.1.10, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html (listing categories of Other Necessary Expenses). See also 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) (permitting deduction for secured debts); 707(b)(2)(A)(iv) (permitting deduction for tax debts). The "payment for debts" language also ensures debtors do not deduct student loan payments under the means test, even though the IRS categorizes them as an "Other Necessary Expense." See In re Knight, 370 B.R. 429, 436-37 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2007) (plain language of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) "precludes deduction" of student loan payments as an expense).

Indeed, the appellate panel’s interpretation would be wrong even if “applicable” and “actual” were read as meaning the same thing in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), as there is nothing inherently wrong with two different words within a single section being synonyms. Cf. Wachovia Bank v. Schmidt, 546 U.S. 303, 314 (2006) (“Congress may well have comprehended the words ‘located’ and ‘established,’ as used in [28 U.S.C.] § 1348, not as contrasting, but as synonymous or alternative terms”). Therefore, even if this Court concludes that “applicable” must be read as synonymous with “actual” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), the Debtors are ineligible for a vehicle ownership expense amount on the Buick because they have no “actual” ownership expense associated with the Buick.

Second, the appellate panel’s reading of “applicable” renders the word superfluous. The panel’s interpretation is the same as if the statute simply read: “[t]he debtor’s monthly expenses shall be the debtor’s ~~applicable~~ monthly expense amounts [under the IRS standards].” See In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (concluding that the Debtors’ construction would “read[] ‘applicable’ right out of the Bankruptcy Code”). After all, striking out the word “applicable” would still lead debtors to the same line under the IRS Local Standards – if that is all Congress intended, there was no need to use the word “applicable.” Yet Congress inserted the word “applicable” before the words “monthly expense amounts,” so that word must be read as adding something to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). See In re Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4 (“The word [applicable] must mean something, and if some monthly expenses are applicable, then other monthly expenses are not applicable.”); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (“Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) [without using the word ‘applicable.’]”).

As the appellate panel’s interpretation renders the word “applicable” superfluous, it should be rejected. See, e.g., United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 36 (1992) (referring to “the settled rule that a statute must, if possible, be construed in such fashion that every word has some operative effect”); Toomer v. City Cab, 443 F.3d 1191, 1194 (10th Cir. 2006) (“When construing a statute, we should give effect, if possible, to every clause and word.”). The proper interpretation is that adopted by the majority of lower appellate courts, which gives full meaning to “applicable” by requiring debtors to actually have monthly vehicle ownership costs before they can claim the standard vehicle ownership expense amount.

Third, and significantly, the chapter 13 trustee’s interpretation permits a reading of “applicable” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) that is consistent with the meaning of the same word in the immediately following subsection. This is consistent with “the normal rule of statutory construction that identical words used in different parts of the same act are intended to have the same meaning.” Gustafson v. Alloyd Co., 513 U.S. 561, 570 (1995) (internal quotations and citations omitted).

Specifically, “applicable” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) means “capable of being applied” or “appropriate.” The immediately following subsection, 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II), uses “applicable” in precisely the same way – i.e., debtors get expenses when they actually incur them. It provides, in relevant part, that “the debtor’s monthly expenses may include, if applicable, the continuation of actual expenses paid by the debtor . . . for care and support of an elderly, chronically ill, or disable household member or member of the debtor’s immediately family. . . .” 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II) (emphasis added).

Subsections (I) and (II) use “applicable” for different purposes – in (I) to allow standardized expense amounts and in (II) to allow actual expenses. But in the latter, Congress clearly intended to allow expenses only if they apply to a particular debtor. Under accepted rules of statutory construction, the same meaning of “applicable” in 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II) should be given to the word in 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

II. Reading Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to Limit Vehicle Ownership Expense Amounts to Debtors with Associated Vehicle Ownership Expenses Fulfills Two Goals of the 2005 Act: Ensuring Above-Median-Income Debtors Repay Their Debts When They Can, and Eliminating Abuse

A. Congress passed the 2005 Act to maximize debtor repayment to creditors and eliminate opportunities for bankruptcy abuse

To the extent section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is ambiguous regarding Congress's reference to "applicable monthly expense amounts specified under" the IRS Standards, this Court may look to the 2005 Act's legislative history to determine the statute's objectives and illuminate its text. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Sikkenga v. Regence Bluecross Blueshield of Utah, 472 F.3d 702, 710 (10th Cir. 2006) (resort to legislative history appropriate where "statute is capable of being understood by reasonably well-informed persons in two or more different senses"); Exxon Corp. v. Lujan, 970 F.2d 757, 761 (10th Cir. 1992) (if legislative history clearly reveals Congress's intent regarding ambiguous statutory language, courts are bound to apply the statute consistent with that intent).

The legislative history establishes that the 2005 Act's purpose was to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89.[15] Indeed, this intent was deemed so important that it was expressed in the very first paragraph of the House Report, and was reiterated where the means test was specifically addressed. Id. at 89, 97-100.

Given the obvious importance to Congress that "debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford," the statute should be interpreted in accordance with the overarching goal underpinning the 2005 Act. See In re Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798 ("If a debtor were permitted a car ownership allowance when he actually incurs no such expense, application of the means test would not accurately reflect the debtor's ability to repay creditors, and the purpose of the statute would be frustrated."). The Debtors can pay over $6,000 more to their unsecured creditors than required by the appellate panel's interpretation. As a result, the panel's interpretation is flawed.

In addition, the 2005 Act sought to eliminate "loopholes and incentives [in the bankruptcy system] that allow and – sometimes – even encourage opportunistic personal filings and abuse." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 5 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92. In amending the Bankruptcy Code to curtail abuse, Congress certainly did not intend to enact a "loophole" that allows debtors to shield money from creditors by claiming deductions to which they are not entitled. To effect Congress's intent to thwart abuse, the statute must be read to limit debtors to only those deductions for which they really have expenses.

Thus, ensuring that above-median-income debtors claim vehicle ownership expense amounts only when they have associated ownership expenses fulfills Congress's intent that such debtors repay their debts when able. See, e.g., In re Wilson, 383 B.R. at 733 ("[T]he purpose [of the 2005 Act] was to require above-median income debtors to make more funds available to their unsecured creditors and to do so by limiting the court's authority to allow expenses[.]"); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807 ("[W]hat is important is the payments that debtors actually make, not how many cars they own, because the payments that debtors make are what actually affect their ability to make payments to their creditors."); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 ("The statute is only concerned about protecting the debtor's ability to continue owning a car, and if the debtor already owns the car, the debtor is adequately protected.").

B. The appellate panel's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would yield results that conflict with Congressional intent

The appellate panel's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would frustrate the 2005 Act's goal of proper repayment by allowing above-median-income debtors to claim phantom expenses that do not apply to them. See, e.g., In re Wilson, 383 B.R. at 734 ("It would turn the logic of [the 2005 Act] on its head to allow above-median debtor such a deduction"); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 (when a debtor "has no monthly ownership expenses, it makes no sense to deduct an ownership expense to shield it from creditors.").

Under the appellate panel's reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), a higher-income debtor with an inoperable car "rusting away in his backyard" could claim the ownership expense amount simply because the car is an "automobile" that he "owns." In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 768. This statutory reading has been rejected by lower appellate courts because it "defies common sense." In re Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4.

III. Barring Above-Median-Income Debtors From Claiming Phantom Vehicle Ownership Expenses Implements Sound Bankruptcy Policy

A. Reading section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to limit vehicle ownership expenses to debtors with a loan or lease payment is fair to debtors and creditors

The chapter 13 trustee's reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as limiting vehicle ownership expenses to debtors with loan or lease payments is fair, as it establishes a threshold for claiming a standardized ownership expense amount that is consistent for all chapter 13 debtors. Significantly, section 1325(b)(2) independently requires below-median-income debtors to incur an expense to claim a deduction. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2) (allowing such debtors only "reasonably necessary" expenses). Reading "applicable" as requiring above-median-income debtors to have associated expenses means these debtors will not be able to claim phantom expenses unavailable to less well-off debtors.

Nor does the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation adversely affect below-median-income debtors – those most likely to file bankruptcy petitions – because such debtors are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Below-median-income debtors represent approximately 73% of the individuals who seek chapter 13 protection.[16] Similarly, in chapter 7 bankruptcies, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) only applies to the 10% of debtors with above-median incomes.[17] See Schultz v. United States, 529 F.3d 343, 347 (6th Cir. 2008) (under section 707(b)(7), presumption of abuse cannot arise with respect to below-median-income debtors).

[16] There were 307,521 non-business chapter 13 cases filed in fiscal year 2007. See U.S. Courts, Bankruptcy Statistics, 2007 Fiscal Year by Chapter, available at http://www.uscourts.gov/bnkrpctystats/sept2007/f2table.xls. Of these, the United States estimates that 83,030 cases may have been filed by above-median-income debtors based on a 2006 survey across a sample of nine judicial districts that estimated 27% of chapter 13 cases were filed by above-median-income debtors. See The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005: Evaluation of the Effects of Using IRS Expense Standards to Calculate a Debtor's Monthly Disposable Income, RAND Institute for Civil Justice at x, 23, available at http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/public_affairs/reports_studies.

[17] During fiscal year 2007, according to data collected by the U.S. Trustee Program, 451,012 non-business chapter 7 cases were filed nationwide, excluding the judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina, whose data were not collected. Of these cases, only 10% had above-median incomes and were thereby subject to the means test and the requirements of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

This interpretation is also fair to creditors. Congress enacted the 2005 Act because under prior law "some bankruptcy debtors [were] able to repay a significant portion of their debts" yet were not required to do so. H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 5 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92. The chapter 13 trustee's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) ensures that above-median-income debtors will not avoid repaying their debts by claiming expense amounts for which they have no associated expense.

B. Other Bankruptcy Code provisions adequately protect above-median-income debtors who own vehicles, but lack ownership expenses

Under the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), at least two safety valves are available to prevent hardship to above-median-income debtors who own vehicles but have no vehicle ownership expenses.

First, every debtor who owns a vehicle, whether or not subject to a loan or lease payment, receives a separate vehicle operating expense under the IRS Local Standards. Operating expenses include vehicle insurance, maintenance, fuel, state and local registration, required inspection, parking fees, tolls, and driver's license fees.[18] And, debtors who own unencumbered vehicles six or more years old or

[18] In a recent decision, a divided Sixth Circuit bankruptcy appellate panel incorrectly characterized many of these operating expenses as "ownership expenses" and failed to acknowledge that all debtors who own vehicles receive the

with 75,000 or more miles receive an additional $200 monthly operating expense deduction per vehicle for up to two older vehicles. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, § 5.8.5.6.3, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html. See also In re Wilson, 383 B.R. at 734 (recognizing $200 additional allowance).

Second, any debtor who needs a new vehicle during the course of his chapter 13 plan can move to modify his plan to reduce payments to creditors to account for the new expense. See 11 U.S.C. 1329(a); In re Wilson, 383 B.R. at 734 ("[I]n the event a debtor needs a new car during the course of a case, the debtor can move to modify the plan based on changed circumstances."). Plan modification is appropriate for such debtors because financing the vehicle usually indicates a substantial change in ability to pay not accounted for at plan confirmation. Cf. Storey v. Pees (In re Storey), 392 B.R. 266, 272 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2008) (plan modification possible if debtor's circumstances change post-confirmation).

operating expense allowance under the IRS Local Standards. In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 531.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Tenth Circuit and remand for further proceedings.

COUNSEL FOR THE UNITED STATES

The United States, as amicus curiae supporting reversal, files this brief pursuant to the order of this Court dated December 16, 2008, which established a time to file a response to the "Appellee's Status Report and Suggestion of Mootness" filed by Appellees Jimmy Dean Pearson and Jeanette Lucille Pearson, which this Court has construed as a motion to dismiss this appeal as moot.

The United States agrees that the appeal is now moot and should be dismissed. But the order dismissing the case should also vacate the order and opinion of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Tenth Circuit. See Shawnee Tribe v. United States, 405 F.3d 1121, 1135 (10th Cir.2005) ("'When causes beyond the appellant's control make a case moot pending appeal, a federal appellate court generally should vacate the judgment below and remand with a direction to dismiss.'" (quoting McClendon v. City of Albuquerque, 100 F.3d 863, 868 (10th Cir.1996)). Vacating the lower court's order "eliminates a judgment, review of which was prevented through happenstance" and prevents a moot judgment "from spawning any legal consequences." See Marc Development v. F.D.I.C., 12 F.3d 948, 949 (1993).

Indeed, it is the "established practice" of the United States Supreme Court when a case becomes moot on appeal to vacate the judgment of lower courts. See United States v. Munsingwear, 340 U.S. 36, 39-40 (1950); see also Radian Guar., Inc. v. Whitfield, 128 S. Ct. 2901 (2008) (relying upon Munsingwear in ruling "[j]udgment vacated, and case remanded to the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit with instructions to dismiss the case as moot"); Arave v. Hoffman, 128 S. Ct. 749 (2008) (relying on Munsingwear in ruling "[b]ecause [responent's] claim for ineffective assistance of counsel during pretrial plea bargaining is moot, we vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals to the extent that it addressed that claim"); Selig v. Pediatric Specialty Care, Inc., 127 S.Ct. 3000 (2007) (relying upon Munsingwear in ruling "[j]udgment vacated with respect to the individual capacity claims against Ray Hanley and Roy Jeffus, and case remanded to the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit with instructions to dismiss the appeal as moot with respect to these claims").

This appeal is moot due to causes beyond the control of both the Appellant and the United States. As a result, the precedent established by the Tenth Circuit and the Supreme Court require the bankruptcy appellate panel's decision and order to be vacated.

WHEREFORE, the United States respectfully requests that this Court dismiss the appeal as moot and vacate the bankruptcy appellate panel's decision and order.

STATUTES AND RULES

I. SUMMARY

The two issues posed by this Court are:

A. "What authority does a bankruptcy judge have with regard to proposed dismissal of a 727 complaint by the plaintiff where the plaintiff has received no consideration for the dismissal."

Summary of Response:

We are not aware of any statute that expressly authorizes a bankruptcy court to prohibit dismissal in such a circumstance. Some courts have expressed concern that debtors improperly purchase a discharge when they advance a sum to a plaintiff in return for the plaintiff dismissing a section 727 action. That concern typically would not be implicated when, as in this case, the plaintiff receives no consideration for withdrawing the section 727 complaint.

Furthermore, that issue is not presented in this appeal. The court below has not indicated whether it would require the United States Trustee to prosecute a section 727 action against his wishes.

Separation of powers issues would be implicated, however, were the court below ever to require the United States, acting through the United States Trustee, to prosecute a complaint the United States had concluded it could no longer advance. Such a denial would impact the discretionary authority of the Executive Branch to determine which cases it will prosecute, or cease prosecuting. But this Court need not address abstract questions about separation of powers in this appeal because they are not before this Court.

B. “What authority does the bankruptcy judge have in considering the request to dismiss a 727 complaint where there has not been notice to all creditors with regard to the intended dismissal.”

Summary Response:

A section 727 complaint may be dismissed without notice being provided to creditors. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7041 (a section 727 complaint may be dismissed without notice being provided to anyone other than the trustee and the United States Trustee). We are unaware of any court having invalidated Rule 7041 on the ground that its notice provisions violated a vested right of some party.

Courts may, however, require additional notice under the rule, and should do so when the court, in the court’s exercise of discretion, deems that appropriate. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7041 (court may require that notice of proposed settlements be sent “to such other persons as the court may direct.”). Providing such notice might enable other parties to seek permission to substitute themselves in place of the dismissing plaintiff.[1] [1] Courts disagree whether a new party plaintiff may be substituted after the deadlines set forth in fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004 have expired.

II. DISCUSSION

Except as set forth herein, the United States Trustee does not offer a position regarding these two issues as they may apply in other factual contexts or offer a position on any other issues presented by Perez's appeal.

A. The "Abuse of Discretion" Standard Applies To Dismissal Rule 7041.

"Under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7041, a plaintiff may dismiss a complaint objecting to discharge after providing notice to the case trustee and the United States Trustee and an opportunity to weigh in. In addition, the rule gives the bankruptcy judge the discretion, on a case by case basis, to require notice to additional parties in interest and also to place conditions upon such dismissal as may be appropriate under the circumstances of the individual case to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy system." McKissack v. McKissack (In re McKissack), 320 B.R. 703, 711 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2005). See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7041. When reviewing a trial court's application of Rule 7041, appellate courts apply the "abuse of discretion" standard. See, e.g., Kallstrom v. Kallstrom (In re Kallstrom), 298 B.R. 753, 757 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2003). An abuse of discretion arises "when the appellate court has a definite and firm conviction that the lower court made a clear error of judgment or exceeded the bounds of permissible choice in the circumstances." Id. (citations and quotations omitted).

B. A Bankruptcy Court May Require Notice Of Dismissal To Creditors.

In this case, the United States Trustee complied fully with the notice requirement of Rule 7041. As evidenced by the United States Trustee's certificate of service of his Notice Pursuant

To L.B.R. 202 of United States Trustee's And Defendant's Stipulation of Dismissal Of Adversary Proceeding ("Notice"), the Notice was mailed to the debtor/defendant, his counsel and the panel trustee assigned in the case. (AD Ex. 16).

In his Notice, the United States Trustee did request that all creditors receive the Notice through delivery by the Bankruptcy Noticing Center ("BNC"). (AD Ex. 16)(on the bottom of the Notice, the United States Trustee included the following: "CLERK OF THE COURT: PLEASE SEND TO BNC"). When such a request is made by the United States Trustee, the BNC generally sends notice to creditors. The record in this case, however, does not reflect whether the Notice was sent by the clerk to the BNC or whether the BNC delivered notice to creditors.

It is within a bankruptcy court's discretion to provide notice to creditors of a plaintiff's motion to dismiss a discharge complaint. Rule 7041 authorizes the bankruptcy courts to order additional notice to "such other persons as the court may direct, and only on order of the court containing terms and conditions which the court deems proper." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7041. In its denial of the parties' Stipulation, the bankruptcy court in this case cited, among its several concerns, the absence of notice to creditors. See United States Trustee v. Perez (In re Perez), 374 B.R. 800, 810-11, 816 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2007).

When a court exercises discretion granted by a rule or statute in a way that does not further the purpose of the rule or statute, the court abuses its discretion. See, e.g., U.S. v. $9,020.00 In U.S. Currency, 30 Fed.Appx. 855, 859 (10th Cir. 2002) ("The overriding purpose of Rule C(6) is to identify claimants and allow them standing in the forfeiture to proceed in defense. . . . Therefore, failing to allow amendment under these circumstances was also an abuse of discretion"); Ebel v. Ebel (In re Ebel), No. 96-1190, 1997 WL 428574 *5 (10th Cir. July 30, 1997)("revisiting issues already addressed is not the purpose of Rule 60(b) . . . and the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in granting relief on that basis").

Various courts have suggested the notice provisions of Rule 7041 address two policy goals – preventing "trafficking in discharges" and providing a mechanism to allow a section 727 action to proceed when the prosecuting plaintiff no longer wishes to continue that pursuit.

C. The Concern That the Debtor is Trafficking in a Discharge is Not Present Here.

Because section 727 non-dischargeability actions are prosecuted by the plaintiff to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy system for the benefit of all creditors, public policy considerations caution against allowing debtors to "buy" their discharge by paying consideration exclusively to the plaintiff bringing the section 727 action -- especially if no benefit is received by the creditor body as a whole.

This policy concern was noted by the lower court in this case. As that court stated, "a debtor may not obtain a discharge by paying a creditor who has filed a § 727(a) complaint in exchange for dismissal of the complaint. This policy of preventing the trafficking of discharges is articulated in Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 7041, which governs the dismissal of adversary proceedings in bankruptcy." In re Perez, 374 B.R. at 817; see also, *State Bank of India v. Chalsani (In re Chalasani), 92 F.3d 1300, 1310 (2d. Cir. 1996) ("Because discharge is a statutory right undergirded by public policy considerations, it is not a proper subject for negotiation and the exchange of a quid pro quo"); McKissack, 320 B.R. at 718 ("[t]he case law makes it clear that public policy concerns arise where the circumstances of a request for dismissal of a § 727 action create the appearance that the debtor is purchasing his discharge. Where a creditor moves to dismiss a § 727 action in return for a consideration paid only to that creditor, such quid pro quo is likely to contravene that public policy and the motion would probably be denied")(citations omitted)).

A general review of the case law reveals that the existence of a quid pro quo largely impacts whether some courts will even consider dismissal of the section 727 action. See, e.g., Kallstrom, 298 B.R. at 753 (stating that "discharge is not a proper subject for negotiation and the exchange of a quid pro quo" between a debtor and creditors) (quoting Chalsani, 92 F.3d at 1310).

Because no payment is to be made in this case, the United States Trustee does not address courts' differing approaches when consideration is paid.[2]

In this case, no "trafficking" of discharge occurred. The court below specifically found that, "claims [under § 727] are not being bought and sold." In re Perez, 374 B.R. at 817.

[2] When payment is being tendered, courts' approaches usually differ depending on: a) the circumstances of the "purchase," b) whether the funds are going exclusively to the plaintiff or the creditor body as a whole and, c) whether, in the court's view, the opportunity of other parties to intervene overcomes the concern over trafficking in discharges. For cases collecting and summarizing the different court approaches when consideration is paid, see, In re McKissack, 320 B.R. at 711-18; WM Cameron & Co. v. Gresham (In re Gresham), 2006 WL 2924622 *2 (Bankr.N.D.Tex. Oct. 21, 2006); In re Sheffer, 350 B.R. 402, 406 (Bankr.W.D.Ky. 2006); Wolinsky v. Maynard (In re Maynard) 269 B.R. 535, 540-41 (D.Vt. 2001).

Even though Defendant Perez was not “buying” a discharge, the lower court stated, nonetheless, that the entry of a “discharge for the Defendant on a false Social Security number . . . would be an extension of the original trafficking of the false Social Security number . . . [which] would aid and abet the original perpetration of misappropriating a Social Security number, and the use and trafficking of the Defendant's false Social Security.” Id.

This extends the definition of “trafficking” well beyond the concept of “buying” of a discharge as contemplated by Rule 7041.[3] Absent paying money or similar consideration in exchange for a discharge, the public policy concern of trafficking in discharges is not present. See, In re McKissack, 320 B.R. at 718 (“[b]ut those public policy considerations are not present where the proposed dismissal is without consideration).

D. Notice to Creditors.

Section 727 actions are brought to vindicate the rights of more than just the named plaintiff; a successful action will deny discharge of all creditors’ debts. For that reason, some

[3] The advisory committee note to Rule 7041 provides that:

> Dismissal of a complaint objecting to a discharge raises special concerns because the plaintiff may have been induced to dismiss by an advantage given or promised by the debtor or someone acting in his interest. Some courts by local rule or order have required the debtor and his attorney or the plaintiff to file an affidavit that nothing has been promised to the plaintiff in consideration of the withdrawal of the objection. By specifically authorizing the court to impose conditions in the order of dismissal this rule permits the continuation of this statutory practice.

Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7041, Advisory Committee Note (1983).

courts have exercised their discretion under Rule 7041 to require notice of proposed dismissal to all creditors so another party, if interested, can seek to substitute itself as the prosecuting plaintiff.[4] See, generally, In re Chalsani, 92 F.3d at 1311-13; The Cadle Co. v. Reed, 392 B.R. at 680*; In re McKissack,* 320 B.R. at 711-18. By ordering notice to creditors in such cases, bankruptcy courts believe the second purpose underlying Rule 7041 is served. When no consideration is being paid by the debtor – the specific factual circumstance for which this Court seeks input – only this second policy concern is present.

E. Requiring A United States Trustee to Continue Prosecuting a Section 727 Action Would Implicate Separation of Powers Concerns.

A plaintiff cannot generally be forced to litigate claims it no longer wishes to pursue – i.e., "the time-honored judicial policy which favors consensual dispute resolution, and the right which a plaintiff always has to decline to continue prosecuting a claim." In re Grosse, Nos. 94-18498, 96-1024, 1997 WL 668059, * 4 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. Oct. 15, 1997); see also, The Cadle Co. v. Reed, 392 B.R. at 679 (same, quoting In re Grosse, supra); In re McKissack, 320 B.R. at 718 (the court, "may not press a creditor into involuntary servitude by forcing it to forego a proposed monetary settlement and continue prosecution of an action it no longer wishes to pursue. Under Rule 7041, the Court may certainly refuse to permit dismissal or it may set appropriate conditions for dismissal. But the Court cannot compel an unwilling plaintiff to continue prosecution of the case"); Hass, 273 B.R. at 55 ("Courts have long recognized (i) unwilling plaintiffs cannot (and probably should not) be compelled to continue litigating, and (ii) new, and willing, parties can be substituted as plaintiffs").

Separation of powers principles could be implicated if a court were to require the United States, acting through the United States Trustee, to prosecute a section 727 action despite the United States' judgment that such prosecution was not appropriate.

Fortunately, that issue is not presented to this Court in this appeal. Again, the court below has not indicated whether it would require the United States Trustee to prosecute the section 727 action against his wishes.

And the United States Trustee cannot formulate a response to such a hypothetical order in a vacuum. Should the issue ever arise in this case, the United States Trustee will evaluate whether to appeal such an order, or determine it is appropriate, based upon the facts known to the United States Trustee at that time, to prosecute his section 727 complaint.

Certainly, such an order would raise separation of power issues. Although analysis of separation of powers issues in the context of section 727 and Rule 7041 appears non-existent, this issue is not foreign to the federal judiciary.

Courts have most often examined separation of powers issues in the context of the executive branch's prosecution of criminal cases, and its request to dismiss criminal prosecutions under Rule 48(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Fed. R. Crim. P. 48(a) requires “leave of court” before the Attorney General or United States Attorney may file a dismissal of an indictment, information or complaint. Tenth Circuit decisions addressing judicial review of these dismissals hold that, “[a] court is generally required to grant a prosecutor’s Rule 48(a) motion to dismiss unless dismissal is clearly contrary to manifest public interest.” United States v. Carrigan, 778 F.2d 1454, 1463 (10th Cir. 1985) (relying on United States v. Cowan, 524 F.2d 504, 513 (5th Cir. 1975)); see also, United States v. Robertson, 45 F.3d 1423, 1437 n. 14 (10th Cir. 1995)(same). This discretion, however, does not mean that the judiciary may impose its views on the merits of a prosecution upon the Executive Branch.

The Fifth Circuit in United States v. Cowan, the very case upon which the Tenth Circuit relied on in Carrigan, delved considerably into the separation of powers issues. The Fifth Circuit held that the judicial power of review embodied in Rule 48(a) was not, “intended to confer on the Judiciary the power and authority to usurp or interfere with the good faith exercise of the Executive power to take care that the laws are faithfully executed.” United States v. Cowan, 524 F.2d at 513. The Fifth Circuit elaborated that under Rule 48(a), “[t]he Executive remains the absolute judge of whether a prosecution should be initiated and the first and presumptively the best judge of whether a pending prosecution should be terminated.” Id.

The Fifth Circuit also observed that the “manifest public interest” to be protected by the judiciary is not present merely because the trial court judge believes the case to be meritorious and that prosecution would be in the “public interest.” That had been the specific view of the trial court in Cowan. In rejecting this view, the Fifth Circuit stated, in unmistakable terms, that a trial court's own view that a prosecution should proceed and is in the public best interest is, "legally insufficient to overcome the presumption of the government's good faith and establish its betrayal of the public interest." Id. at 514 (emphasis added).

Recently, after cataloging circuit authority, the Seventh Circuit followed this basic rule in In re United States, 345 F.3d 450, 453–54 (7th Cir. 2003). In In re United States, the Seventh Circuit noted the general language contained in various circuit court opinions related to the "public interest" or "bad faith." In examining these general statements of law, the Seventh Circuit stated that it was, "unaware, however, of any appellate decision that actually upholds a denial of a motion to dismiss a charge on such basis." Id. at 453. The Seventh found this as "not surprising," because, "[t]he Constitution's 'take Care' clause (art. II, § 3) places the power to prosecute in the executive branch." Id.

These same separation of powers considerations could be triggered by a bankruptcy court's determination not to allow a United States Trustee to dismiss a section 727 complaint. Section 509 of Title 28 provides that "[a]ll functions of other officers of the Department of Justice and all functions of agencies and employees of the Department of Justice are vested in the Attorney General." Section 516 of Title 28 provides:

> Except as otherwise authorized by law, the conduct of litigation in which the United States, an agency, or officer thereof is a party, or is interested, and securing evidence therefor, is reserved to officers of the Department of Justice, under the direction of the Attorney General.

Section 519 of Title 28 similarly provides that "[e]xcept as otherwise authorized by law, the Attorney General shall supervise all litigation to which the United States, an agency, or officer thereof is a party. . . ."[5] 28 U.S.C. § 519.

In Shaw v. Garrison, 293 F. Supp. 937, 944-45 (E.D. La.) (three judge panel),[6] aff'd., 393 U.S. 220 (1968),[7] the court held that Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 does not authorize a party to compel a Justice Department official, in that case the Attorney General, to participate in a civil action as an involuntary plaintiff. In Shaw, Jim Garrison, a state court prosecutor, indicted Clay Shaw for conspiring with Lee Harvey Oswald to assassinate President Kennedy. Shaw sued Garrison in federal court, seeking to enjoin the state court prosecution.

Shaw also sought to bring the Attorney General into the action as an involuntary plaintiff pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 19. Shaw, 293 F. Supp. at 943. The court held that Rule 19 cannot be used to join the Attorney General as an involuntary plaintiff, concluding "we cannot interfere with the Attorney General's decision which would constitute an infringement by us upon the discretion of the executive branch of the United States Government." Id., at 944. The court reached this conclusion because the Attorney General has "discretion in deciding whether the [5] The "except as otherwise authorized by law" language in sections 516 and 519 recognizes that Congress has given some governmental entities independent litigating authority and they can "sue and be sued" without the participation of the Attorney General. See, e.g., FHA Region 4 v. Burr, 309 U.S. 242 (1940).

Cir. Apr. 25, 1996); Nutrition 21 v. Thorne Research, Inc., 130 F.R.D. 671 (W.D. Wash. 1990) (holding that section 516 prevents the joinder of the United States as an involuntary plaintiff under Rule 19 unless the United States has expressly consented to joinder by statute), rev'd. on other grounds, 930 F.2d 1351 (Fed. Cir. 1991); New Jersey E.P.A. v. Gloucester Environmental Management Services, Inc., 668 F. Supp. 404, 407 (D. N.J. 1987) (refusing to join the United States as an involuntary plaintiff).

Similar concerns would exist were the court below ever to require the United States to prosecute a section 727 action.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

INTRODUCTION

This is an appeal from a bankruptcy court decision interpreting section 110 of title 11 which regulates the activity of bankruptcy petition preparers.[1] Appellant Noel Perez, who does business as a bankruptcy petition preparer under the business name "Slamdunkem," has appealed an order of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Nevada requiring him to disgorge two hundred dollars in each of the one hundred forty-nine cases in which he overcharged for preparing the debtors' bankruptcy filings.[2] He charged $350 in each of the cases but the bankruptcy court determined a reasonable fee was $150. He was also conditionally sanctioned fifty dollars in each of those cases for otherwise violating section 110. In addition to overcharging, Mr. Perez violated section 110(c) by not putting his entire social security number on documents he prepared for filing, and he violated section 110(g) by handling the filing fees in each of the cases. Mr. Perez does not appeal or dispute the bankruptcy court's factual determination that he committed the actions that were sanctioned.

Appellant Mr. Noel Perez has appealed from the bankruptcy court's decision to disgorge fees and impose conditional sanctions. He argues that section 110 is unconstitutional and that his fees are proper because they represent market rates.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over a challenge to fees charged by a bankruptcy petition preparer. 28 U.S.C. § 157. The bankruptcy court entered its final order disgorging fees

[1] For the convenience of the Court, a copy of section 110 has been attached to the Addendum hereto.

[2] An example of what Mr. Perez prepared in each bankruptcy case is included in the United States Trustee's Appendix II (hereinafter "USTA II") at pgs. 3-66.

on December 10, 2009, which Mr. Perez timely appealed. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal. 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Did the bankruptcy court correctly assign the burden of proof?
2. Are the bankruptcy preparer provisions of section 110 of title 11 unconstitutionally vague?
3. Did the court below abuse its discretion in determining that Mr. Perez charged excessive fees to prepare bankruptcy petitions for his clients?

APPLICABLE STANDARDS OF REVIEW

"The bankruptcy court's conclusions of law are reviewed de novo, and its findings of fact are reviewed for clear error." In re Doser, 412 F.3d 1056, 1061 (9th Cir. 2005). "A challenge to the constitutionality of a statute is also reviewed de novo." Id. The bankruptcy court's application of law to fact under section 110 is reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re Agyekum, 225 B.R. 695, 698 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1998). This Court "must have a definite and firm conviction that the court below committed a clear error of judgment . . . before reversal is proper." In re Crowe, 243 B.R. 43, 47 (B.A.P. 9th Cir.), aff'd 246 F.3d 673 (9th Cir. 2000). A reduction in an award of fees should not be reversed unless there is "a definite and firm conviction that the bankruptcy court committed clear error in the conclusion it reached after weighing all of the relevant factors." See In re Eliapo, 468 F.3d 592, 596 (9th Cir. 2006).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

In 1994, Congress enacted section 110 of title 11 as part of the Bankruptcy Reform Act, Pub. L. No. 103-394, 308, 108 Stat. 4135 (Oct. 22, 1994), to address the "growing problem of bankruptcy preparers who abuse the system in the course of preparing documents for debtors to file in bankruptcy court." 140 Cong. Rec S. 4506 (daily ed. Apr. 20, 1994) (statement of Senator Metzenbaum); see also In re Doser, 412 F.3d at 1061. Although the Bankruptcy Code and other laws expressly addressed attorney misconduct, the enactment of section 110 created statutory legal tools to regulate non-attorneys seeking to profit at the expense of individuals unwilling or financially unable to hire legal counsel. See In re Gavin, 181 B.R. 814, 820 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1995). The legislative history expresses Congress's concerns in enacting this statute:

> This section adds a new section to * * * title 11 * * * to create standards and penalties pertaining to bankruptcy petition preparers. Bankruptcy petition preparers not employed or supervised by any attorney have proliferated across the country. While it is permissible for a petition preparer to provide services solely limited to typing, far too many of them also attempt to provide legal advice and legal services to debtors. These preparers often lack the necessary legal training and ethics regulation to provide such services in an adequate and appropriate manner. These services may take unfair advantage of persons who are ignorant of their rights both inside and outside the bankruptcy system.

H.R. Rep. 103-834, 103rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 40-41 (Oct. 4, 1994); 140 Cong. Rec. H10770 (Oct. 4, 1994).

Congress passed section 110 to tackle petition preparers who prey on the poor and unsophisticated. It was hoped that the new law would address the abuses of bankruptcy petition preparers and at least provide minimal protection to consumers. "The petition is essential to the proper operation of the bankruptcy process, and all parties suffer if a petition is improperly prepared." In re Doser, 412 F.3d at 1062 (citing In re Moore, 283 B.R. 852, 857 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2002)).

Section 110 regulates "bankruptcy petition preparers." A bankruptcy petition preparer is defined as "a person other than an attorney or an employee of an attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing" in a bankruptcy case. 11 U.S.C. § 110(a).

The statute requires bankruptcy petition preparers to sign each document prepared for filing in a bankruptcy case and to include on each document the preparer's name, address and Social Security number. 11 U.S.C. § 110(b) and (c). Bankruptcy petition preparers are also required to provide the debtor a copy of each document for filing. 11 U.S.C. § 110(d). Section 110 prohibits petition preparers from executing documents on behalf of debtors, from advertising their services as "legal," and from collecting or receiving any payment from the debtor for court fees in connection with the filing of the petition. 11 U.S.C. §§ 110(e), (f), and (g). The statute provides for fines of not more than $500 for each violation of these requirements. 11 U.S.C. § 110(l).

Section 110 authorizes additional methods of enforcement against bankruptcy petition preparers, including actions for damages for the negligent or intentional disregard of the Bankruptcy Code or any "fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive act," and for injunctive relief. 11 U.S.C. §§ 110(i) and (j). The statute provides that any fees "in excess of the value of services" rendered shall be disallowed and ordered to be turned over to the bankruptcy trustee. 11 U.S.C. § 110(h)(3)(A).

In 2005, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005. Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005). Although the Act as a whole provided sweeping changes to the Bankruptcy Code, the changes to section 110 are not germane to the fee issue in this case, other than the addition of a provision to section 110(h) allowing the Supreme Court to set maximum fees, or the Judicial Conference to set fee guidelines, for bankruptcy petition preparers. H.R. 109-31, Pt. 1, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. 62-63 (2005). As discussed below, neither the Supreme Court or the Judicial Conference have chosen to act on setting bankruptcy petition preparer fees.

B. COUNTER-STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

Mr. Perez is a bankruptcy petition preparer conducting business as “Slamdunkem.” United States Trustee’s Appendix I (hereinafter “USTA I”) at 9, lls. 10-11. Mr. Perez is the sole owner and manager of “Slamdunkem, LLC” a Nevada limited liability company. USTA I at 9, lls. 12-13. Mr. Perez advertises bankruptcy petition preparer services on TV, radio, the Yellow Pages, and a website: www.slamdunkem.com. USTA I at 111-112; 162; 293-295; 374-386. In those advertisements he promises his clients enhanced services such as: “Certified Bankruptcy Petition Preparer that guarantees full compliance with court filing requirements”, “Comprehensive step-by-step process to help navigate the complex process of bankruptcy case filing,” and “explanation of the court requirements”. USTA I at 374-375. He also offers “guidance to ensure success in your bankruptcy case,” including an explanation of the differences between chapter 7 and chapter 13. USTA I at 99-104.

On or about July 21, 2009, a letter with attachments was sent by the Office of the United States Trustee by first class mail to all known petition preparers in Northern Nevada. USTA I at 264-265. Mr. Perez received this mailing. USTA I at 154, lls. 20-23. The attachments to the July 21, 2009 letter included the orders and findings of fact and conclusions of law that had been entered by bankruptcy judges in the District of Nevada in the cases: Sattiewhite BK-S-08-20843-BAM, Archie BK-N-09-50273-GWZ and Burkett BK-N-09-50143-GWZ. USTA I at 264-265; 344-362. These orders were sent as examples of cases where bankruptcy petition preparers could not charge more than $150 for their services.

On September 2, 2009, the United States Trustee filed a motion for an order to show cause against Mr. Perez in the case of Gia M. Schwartz, in the District of Nevada, Case no. BK-09-50071. The United States Trustee's motion was granted by the order entered September 2, 2009 setting the show cause hearing for October 7, 2009.

At the conclusion of the hearing to show cause, which was attended by Mr. Perez and telephonically by his counsel Donald Harris, the bankruptcy court ordered Mr. Perez to disgorge two hundred dollars to Ms. Schwartz for overcharging. USTA I at 245-247. In addition, the court set a hearing date for a motion to be filed by the United States Trustee regarding the amount being charged by Mr. Perez in the other bankruptcy cases filed in the District of Nevada. USTA I at 248-251. At that time, Mr. Perez had filed eighty-five bankruptcy cases after August 1, 2009, which was selected because it was ten days after the United States Trustee had sent her July 21, 2009 letter. USTA I at 240-242.

The United States Trustee filed such a motion on October 19, 2009. The United States Trustee's motion sought disgorgement of fees and sanctions against Mr. Perez. It was accompanied by a supporting declaration by Robbin Little, who is a paralegal for the United States Trustee. USTA I at 253-278. At the time the United States Trustee filed her motion, Mr. Perez had filed one hundred thirteen cases after August 1, 2009.[3] USTA I at 253-262. By the hearing date for the United States Trustee's motion, November 12, 2009, Mr. Perez was the bankruptcy petition preparer for one hundred fifty-two cases submitted after August 1, 2009. USTA I at 279-291.

[3] The United States Trustee mailed notice of her motion to the debtors in all of these cases. Notice of Hearing, Bankruptcy Court Docket # 10.

In each case, Mr. Perez, under the penalty of perjury, identified himself as the bankruptcy petition preparer on the Official Form B280 Disclosure Of Compensation Of Bankruptcy Petition Preparer, including his name, address and either his redacted Tax Identification Number xxxxxxxxx-44-001, or his redacted social security number, xxxxx-6559. USTA II at 67-374. For one hundred forty-eight of them, Mr. Perez was paid a fee of $350, for three he was not paid a fee, and for the remaining one he was paid a fee of $450. USTA I at 125-128. For each case, Mr. Perez had the debtors bring in a money order or other certified funds made out to the bankruptcy clerk for the filing fee ($299) or the initial installment of the filing fee ($75), which his runner then delivered with the bankruptcy filings to the clerk. USTA I at 131-134; 300-339.

Mr. Perez filed an opposition to the United States Trustee's motion on November 3, 2009, which relied upon the supporting declaration of Walt McKenna. USTA I at 21-53. Mr. Perez did not file any declaration disputing the allegations of fact in the United States Trustee's motion; the McKenna declaration addressed only the value of Mr. Perez's services. USTA I at 87-88.

The United States Trustee's motion was heard on November 12, 2009. USTA I at 61. Mr. Perez, Mr. McKenna, and Ms. Little testified and numerous exhibits were introduced to create a fairly extensive record. USTA I at 61-222. At the hearing, Mr. Perez failed to introduce any evidence to rebut the United States Trustee's allegations that his actions violated section 110. USTA I at 87-88. The bankruptcy court issued its decision on December 10, 2009. USTA I at 3-6.

On that date, all of the 152 cases at issue were open and pending in the District of Nevada bankruptcy court. USTA II at 375-527.[4]

C. BANKRUPTCY COURT DECISION

During the hearing, the bankruptcy court rejected all of Mr. Perez's arguments supporting his opposition to the United States Trustee's motion for disgorgement. The bankruptcy court found that Mr. Perez was the bankruptcy petition preparer, as that term is defined in 11 U.S.C. § 101(a)(1). USTA I at 13, lls. 16-18. It then determined that Mr. Perez had charged excessive fees for his services. It found section 110(h) controls a reasonable fee for bankruptcy petition preparers. The burden of proof is on the bankruptcy petition preparer in every case where the fee is challenged to establish that the fee charged was reasonable and did not exceed the value of the limited services that may be properly provided. USTA I at 13, lls. 21-26.

The bankruptcy court found that Mr. Perez was provided due process and had been given adequate and proper notice to allow for full and complete defense against the United States Trustee's motion. USTA I at 9, lls. 2-8. It rejected his argument that section 110 is unconstitutionally vague. USTA I at 11-12.

The bankruptcy court also rejected Mr. Perez's argument that the debtors' perceived value of his services determines what he can properly charge. Instead, the bankruptcy court found that the proper test of value for Mr. Perez's services is what a typist would charge – in this case, approximately thirty dollars an hour. USTA I at 13-14. No evidence was introduced that it took Mr. Perez more than five hours to process and prepare the documents, pleadings, and papers on file in each of the cases under consideration. USTA I at 14, lls. 6-8. Therefore, he was ordered to disgorge by May 14, 2010 $200 to each debtor(s) whom he had charged. This represented the difference between the $350 he charged in all but one of the cases and the proper value of his services pursuant to section 110(h)(3)(A)(i). USTA I at 14, lls. 8-11.

[4] The United States Trustee mailed notice of entry of the order granting her motion to all the debtors. Notice of Entry of Order With Certificate of Service, Bankruptcy Court Docket # 25. Appellant also mailed his Notice of Appeal to the debtors. Bankruptcy Court Docket # 27. Copies of Bankruptcy Court Docket #'s 10, 25 and 27 will be submitted should the Court require.

The bankruptcy court also found that Mr. Perez had violated section 110(c) by not putting his entire social security number on documents prepared for filing in each of the 152 cases. USTA I at 14, lls. 15-19. It also determined that Mr. Perez violated section 110(g) by handling the filing fees in each of them. USTA I at 14, lls. 20-21.[5]

For these violations of section 110, the bankruptcy court sanctioned Mr. Perez fifty dollars for each of the 149 cases in which he charged a fee, pursuant to section 110(l). USTA I at 14, lls. 26-28. However, the sanction was held in abeyance until May 14, 2010; if Mr. Perez commits no further violations of section 110 by May 14, 2010, the sanction shall not be payable. USTA I at 14-15.

On December 21, 2009, Mr. Perez timely filed a notice of appeal.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

Much of this appeal is governed by the Ninth Circuit case In re Doser. Scott v. United States Trustee (In re Doser), 412 F.3d 1056 (9th Cir. 2005). Doser rejected the constitutional arguments made by Mr. Perez in this appeal, holding that subsection (h) of section 110 is not void for vagueness. Id. at 1062-64. The Doser Court also held that a bankruptcy petition

[5] Since the United States Trustee's Motion did not allege any violation of Section 110(i), whether Mr. Perez may have acted fraudulently, unfairly, or deceptively, was not before the bankruptcy court. USTA I at 13, lls. 19-20.

preparer's fee cannot exceed what a professional typist or word processor would charge. Id. at 1062-63, 1065. Doser noted the purpose of section 110 – to protect debtors unfamiliar with bankruptcy from being exploited – and therefore implicitly contradicts Mr. Perez's contention that bankruptcy petition preparers should be able to charge what a debtor is willing to pay. Id. at 1061. Mr. Perez's other arguments concerning the burden of proof and his allegations that the bankruptcy court followed the United States Trustee's Guidelines rather than the statute are also without merit. The decision below should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. The bankruptcy court correctly assigned the burden of proof.

Mr. Perez's first argument is that the bankruptcy court failed to place the burden of proof on the United States Trustee regarding the reasonableness of the fees Mr. Perez charged in the 152 cases before the bankruptcy court.[6] Appellant Br. at 10-11.

The bankruptcy court applied the proper burden of proof on Mr. Perez to show his fees were reasonable. In re Doser, 281 B.R. 292, 313 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2002), aff'd, 292 B.R. 652 (D. Idaho 2002), aff'd on other grounds, 412 F.3d 1056 (9th Cir. 2005) (holding the bankruptcy petition preparer "bears the burden of establishing she is entitled to them [fees] once a question regarding their reasonableness is raised.") (citing In re Bush, 275 B.R. 69, 85-86 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2002) and Matter of Geraci, 138 F.3d 314, 318 (7th Cir. 1998)). Other courts have reached [6] Pursuant to the agreement of the parties and the order of the bankruptcy court, the United States Trustee filed her motion and noticed it for hearing in just this case, McGuire, BK-N-09-53599-GWZ, for judicial economy, instead of filing the same motion in all of the cases that Mr. Perez filed after August 1, 2009. USTA I at 240-251; See U.S. Trustee v. Taub, 2007 WL 2238181 (Bankr. D. Or. 2007)(Case No. 07-6056-fra) (citing In re Reynoso, 315 B.R. 544 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004), aff'd 477 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2007)); see also, 11 U.S.C. §§ 105 and 102(1).

the same conclusion. See In re Springs, 358 B.R. 236, 242 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. 2006) (citing In re Froehlich, 23 Fed.Appx. 572, 574, 2001 WL 1530594 (7th Cir. 2001)).

Mr. Perez fails to cite any authority that assigns the burden of proof to the movant when an objection to a bankruptcy petition preparer's fees is filed. Appellant Br. at 10-11. The only case he cites is Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 499 (1954), which discusses the concepts of due process and equal protection in the context of racial segregation. Appellant Br. at 10.

Even if the United States Trustee had the burden of proof on the reasonableness of the fees Mr. Perez charged, she carried that burden. The bankruptcy court found that in the Ninth Circuit "the value of a bankruptcy petition preparer's services must be measured by the very limited proper scope of those services: typing." USTA I at 12, lls. 5-13. The United States Trustee submitted the declaration and testimony of Robbin Little, establishing the cost of typing services in Reno, Nevada to be $30 per hour, which the bankruptcy court found sufficient. USTA I at 14, lls. 2-8. Mr. Perez introduced no rebuttal evidence as to what a typist in Reno would charge. USTA I at 166-169. Therefore the United States Trustee demonstrated that Mr. Perez's $350 fee was not reasonable and thus not allowable under section 110.

II. Section 110 is not unconstitutionally vague.

A. Doser forecloses the argument that section 110 is void for vagueness in the Ninth Circuit

Mr. Perez argues that the Bankruptcy Code and the implementing rules and guidance are unconstitutionally vague. Appellant Br. at 12-21. He fails to cite In re Doser, however, which holds that Congress acted within its power when it enacted section 110 and that the section is not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad and that it does not violate the First Amendment. Doser, 412 F.3d at 1059.[7] It rejected the argument that section 110(h), which gives courts the authority to disgorge fees in excess of the value of the services rendered, is void for vagueness. Id. at 1062-63. Instead, it ruled that a "person of ordinary intelligence would know when a fee is excessive when compared to the limited services that may be permissibly performed by a BPP [bankruptcy petition preparer]," namely transcribing information from the debtor onto the bankruptcy forms. Id. This holding forecloses the success of Mr. Perez's constitutional argument.

B. Mr. Perez's arguments do not cast doubt on the rationale of Doser.

Even if this were not a settled question in the Ninth Circuit, Mr. Perez's argument that section 110(h) is vague would fail. The Supreme Court has held that a vagueness challenge can only succeed if the enactment is "impermissibly vague in all of its applications." Hotel & Motel Ass'n of Oakland v. City of Oakland, 344 F.3d 959, 971 (9th Cir. 2003) (quoting Village of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 494-95 (1982)). Because section 110(h) does not impose any criminal sanction or implicate free speech concerns, a facial challenge would require Mr. Perez to "establish that no set of circumstances exists under which [section 110(h)] would be valid." Hotel & Motel, at 971 (quoting United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745, 107 S.Ct. 2095, 95 L.Ed.2d 697 (1987).

Mr. Perez cites one case in his constitutional argument with respect to vagueness – Grayned v. City of Rockford (dealing with a city anti noise ordinance prohibiting disruptive picketing adjacent to a school that is in session). Appellant Brief at 17. He fails to carry his burden to show that section 110 is void for vagueness. Appellant Br. at 16. Nor is there a persuasive argument to make. Section 110 sets out a clear framework for bankruptcy petitioner preparers to establish their fees.

First, section 110 unambiguously defines a petition preparer as "a person, other than an attorney or an employee of an attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing" by a debtor in a bankruptcy case. 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1). "Person" is a definable term under section 101(41) and includes a corporation. This provides adequate and fair notice of what parties the statute reaches: Mr. Noel Perez and "Slamdunkem, LLC" (his business).

Second, section 110(h) unequivocally prohibits the collection of fees "found to be in excess of the value of services rendered for the documents prepared" by a bankruptcy petition preparer. This section specifies the prohibited conduct: collection of excessive fees. The Bankruptcy Code is clear that the bankruptcy court shall disallow and order the immediate turnover to the bankruptcy trustee of any fee paid to a bankruptcy petition preparer that exceeds the value of services rendered. 11 U.S.C. § 110(h)(3)(A). Mr. Perez was therefore on notice that disgorgement would occur in the event a bankruptcy court deemed his fees to be too high. Mr. Perez was afforded notice and his due process rights were not violated.

C. Mr. Perez's discussion of the United States Trustee Guidelines and former Local Rule 9011 are irrelevant.

Mr. Perez wrongly argues that the Nevada bankruptcy courts have applied section 110(h) in such a way that it becomes void for vagueness because the courts are essentially applying the Region 17 United States Trustee Program Guidelines For Petition Preparers In the District Of Nevada (hereinafter "Guidelines") and former Local Rule 9011,[8] instead of the statute itself. Appellant Br. at 12-21. Since the statute allows the setting of bankruptcy petition preparer fees by the Supreme Court, or the Judicial Conference, and they have not acted, Mr. Perez posits that the court is impermissibly imposing the United States Trustee's policy determination that his $350 fee was excessive. Appellant Br. at 18-19. This argument is unpersuasive.

First, the Guidelines are policy documents. They do not have the force of law. Therefore, they cannot be constitutional or unconstitutional. As Mr. Perez points out, section 2075 of title 28 prohibits any judicial or administrative rule from enhancing or restricting anyone's rights under the Bankruptcy Code. Appellant Br. at 18-19. Therefore, former Local Rule 9011 also has no bearing on any constitutional argument.

In fact, Mr. Perez himself admits that former Local Rule 9011 and the United States Trustee Guidelines "as written and as applied by this Court, do not establish the allowable fee for bankruptcy petition preparers. Section 110(h) controls." Appellant Br. at 13 (emphasis supplied by Mr. Perez). The United States Trustee's motion was based upon section 110; it does not cite or rely upon as a legal authority former Local Rule 9011 or the Guidelines. USTA I at 17-20. Under the terms of section 110, Mr. Perez has overcharged his clients and under 110(h), the bankruptcy court had the authority to order him to disgorge those fees.

Mr. Perez's argument that the bankruptcy court allowed the Guidelines and former Local Rule 9011 to replace section 110 impermissibly is not supported by the record in this case. The [8] For the convenience of the Court, a copy of former LR 9011 is attached to the Addendum hereto. Former Local Rule 9011 was in effect when this matter was heard on November 12, 2009, but was deleted when the Local Rules were amended, effective December 1, 2009. A copy of the Guidelines is located at USTA I pgs. 369-373.

bankruptcy court stated on record that it was applying section 110 only. USTA I at 96-98. When addressing former Local Rule 9011 – which regulated the practice of bankruptcy petition preparers – the court stated "we the judges, make the factual determinations" and make an "independent determination" of whether a fee is warranted. USTA I at 96-97. Subsection (d) of former Local Rule 9011merely stated that the "United States trustee may issue guidelines in connection with the provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 110 setting forth positions that the trustee will generally follow in relation to petition preparers." USTA I at 97. The rule stated that the United States Trustee could make her interpretation public. It did not say that the courts had to accept her view – nor did the bankruptcy court in this case do so without independent analysis.

Finally, the bankruptcy court acknowledged that the United States Trustee's Guidelines provide assistance to bankruptcy petition preparers but that they do not bind the court. USTA I at 92. The Guidelines do not state that they are binding on the bankruptcy courts, just the opposite:

> These Guidelines shall in no way modify rules, orders or guidelines issued by Ninth Circuit courts. Each provision in the Guidelines shall be applied strictly unless in conflict with the United States Bankruptcy Code, the Bankruptcy Rules, Nevada Statutes, Ninth Circuit or United States District Court rules, orders or case law binding in the Ninth Circuit or the District of Nevada.

Addendum hereto.

The Guidelines are simply what they state they are: policy statements, no more no less. The bankruptcy court recognized this when it stated that the Guidelines do not "say the court is going to follow them. It doesn't give an imprimatur of per se application." USTA I at 98. The United States Trustee issued these informational Guidelines to identify under what circumstances she might exercise her prosecutorial discretion to seek relief under section 110, but they do no purport to constrain the United States Trustee's power to respond differently, much less a court's.

Mr. Perez's authorities holding that rules, especially local rules, cannot conflict with the Bankruptcy Code are irrelevant because former Local Rule 9011 and the Guidelines, in fact and as applied by the bankruptcy court, do not conflict with the Bankruptcy Code. Appellant Br. at 18-20; USTA I at 96-98.

D. Mr. Perez's interpretation of "any services" in section 110(h) is incorrect.

Mr. Perez argues that a bankruptcy petition preparer's activities, and thus ability to charge fees, cannot be limited to typing because section 110(h) uses the phrase "any services." Appellant Br. at 20-21. Based on this argument, Mr. Perez posits that the Guidelines conflict with section 110 because they limit a bankruptcy petition preparer's services to "secretarial" or "clerical" services. This has no merit.

Mr. Perez attempts to manufacture some meaningful difference between "secretarial," "clerical," or "typing" services, as used in the Guidelines, and "any services," the language used in section 110(h)(3)(A), to limit the court's authority to order disgorgement for "any service". This construction ignores the bulk of section 110 which lays out numerous restrictions on what a bankruptcy petition preparer may do. See e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(1) (prohibiting a bankruptcy petition preparer from executing documents); 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2) (prohibiting legal advice); 11 U.S.C. § 110(f) (prohibiting the use of the word "legal" in advertising); 11 U.S.C. § 110(g) (prohibiting handling of court fees).

Other than suggesting that a bankruptcy petition preparer might charge a debtor for providing a ride to the courthouse, Mr. Perez does not explain what "services" he could provide beyond preparation of documents that would not otherwise be prohibited by section 110. Appellate Br. at 20-21. Were he to invent such a service, then this Court could determine whether it was allowed under section 110 and whether the charge was reasonable, should the United States Trustee decide to challenge it. That scenario is not before this Court; the issue here is Mr. Perez's excessive fee for his services.

III. The fees charged by Mr. Perez were excessive.

When determining appropriate fees for a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110(h), "the proper reference point is what professional typists or word processors would charge . . . other sorts of services are improper, and those services can perforce not be compensated." Doser, 412 F.3d at 1065 (citation omitted). Other courts have also rejected Mr. Perez's argument and have uniformly held that scrivener services are an appropriate measure of compensation for the services rendered by a bankruptcy petition preparer. In re McDonald, 318 B.R. 37, 46 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2004) (deciding that $50 was a reasonable hourly rate); In re Guttierez, 248 B.R. 287, 297-298 (Bankr.W.D.Tex. 2000) (stating the only service a bankruptcy petition preparer can safely offer is transcription of dictated or handwritten notes for a fee of $50).

The bankruptcy court applied Doser and found that the rate for typing services in Reno is $30 per hour, which is consistent with the evidence showing that typists in Reno charge between $10 and $32.50 per hour. The United States Trustee filed a declaration prior to the hearing, which formed the basis for the United States Trustee's contention that Mr. Perez's $350 fee was excessive. USTA I at 281. Mr. Perez offered no rebuttal evidence in this regard. USTA I at 166-170. The bankruptcy court then multiplied the $30 per hour typing rate times the reasonable number of hours it would take to prepare the documents and determined the reasonable fee to be $150 – rather than the $350 Mr. Perez had charged his clients. USTA I at 14, lls. 6-8. This is in keeping with Ninth Circuit law. A fee of $214 was found to be excessive in In re Doser, and a fee of $100 was affirmed. 412 F.3d at 1065.

The bankruptcy court's factual finding that $150 is a reasonable fee for a bankruptcy petition preparer is not "clear error" and therefore must be affirmed. Smith v. Jackson, 84 F.3d 1213, 1221 (9th Cir. 1996); In re Agyekum, 225 B.R. 695, 698 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1998); In re Crowe, 243 B.R. 43, 47 (B.A.P. 9th Cir.), aff'd 246 F.3d 673 (9th Cir. 2000). Given this record, the court below did not abuse its discretion in determining that a fee of $350 was excessive.

IV. A finding of negligence or fraud is not necessary to order disgorgement under section 110.

Mr. Perez cites In re Stacy for the argument that a requirement for "negligent" or "fraudulent" action is implicit in section 110. In re Stacy, 193 B.R. 31, 35 (Bankr. D. Or. 1996); Appellant Br. at 22. In fact, the Stacy court only mentions negligence and fraud when addressing the United States Trustee's allegations under section 110(j)(2)(a)(i)(III). Stacy, 193 B.R. at 35. Nowhere in the opinion does it hold that negligence or fraud are implicit anywhere else in section 110 except for subsection 110(j)(2)(a)(i)(III). In this matter, the United States Trustee has never alleged a violation of subsection 110(j)(2)(a)(i)(III). USTA I at 13, lls. 19-20.

The subsections of 110 that the United States Trustee's motion alleged Mr. Perez violated are not based upon negligence or fraud and contain their own statutory penalties. For example, pursuant to section 110©, a bankruptcy petition preparer shall place his social security number after his signature on each document he prepares for filing. In re Crawford, 194 F.3d 954, 960 (9th Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1189 (2000). Section 110(h)(3)(B) provides that all fees charged by a bankruptcy petition preparer may be forfeited in any case in which the bankruptcy petition preparer fails to comply with subsection 110(c). Mr. Perez does not dispute that in the 152 cases cited in the United States Trustee's motion, as supplemented, he did not include his full social security number on any of the documents he prepared for filing. Appellant Br. at 4-9; USTA II at 67-374.

Similarly, a bankruptcy petition preparer shall not collect or receive any payment from the debtor for the court fees in connection with filing the petition. 11 U.S.C. § 110(g). This subsection prohibits a bankruptcy petition preparer not only from taking payment for the filing fee but also from receiving a cashier's check or other form of payment from the debtor which is made payable to the bankruptcy clerk. In re Buck, 307 B.R. 157, 163-64 (C.D. Cal. 2004). Section 110(h)(3)(B) provides that all fees charged by a bankruptcy petition preparer may be forfeited in any case where the bankruptcy petition preparer fails to comply with subsection 110(g). Mr. Perez does not dispute that in all 152 cases, he collected from the debtors at least the initial filing fee for the bankruptcy clerk, as reflected in the clerk's log book. Appellant Br. at 4-9; USTA I at 280, 300-339.

Therefore, whether Mr. Perez engaged in negligent or fraudulent activity is irrelevant.

United States Code Annotated Currentness
Title 11. Bankruptcy (Refs & Annos)
Chapter 1. General Provisions (Refs & Annos)
➡ § 110. Penalty for persons who negligently or fraudulently prepare bankruptcy petitions

(a) In this section--

(1) "bankruptcy petition preparer" means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing; and

(2) "document for filing" means a petition or any other document prepared for filing by a debtor in a United States bankruptcy court or a United States district court in connection with a case under this title.

(b)(1) A bankruptcy petition preparer who prepares a document for filing shall sign the document and print on the document the preparer's name and address. If a bankruptcy petition preparer is not an individual, then an officer, principal, responsible person, or partner of the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be required to--

(A) sign the document for filing; and

(B) print on the document the name and address of that officer, principal, responsible person, or partner.

(2)(A) Before preparing any document for filing or accepting any fees from a debtor, the bankruptcy petition preparer shall provide to the debtor a written notice which shall be on an official form prescribed by the Judicial Conference of the United States in accordance with rule 9009 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure.

(B) The notice under subparagraph (A)--

(i) shall inform the debtor in simple language that a bankruptcy petition preparer is not an attorney and may not practice law or give legal advice;

(ii) may contain a description of examples of legal advice that a bankruptcy petition preparer is not authorized to give, in addition to any advice that the preparer may not give by reason of subsection (e)(2); and

(iii) shall--

(I) be signed by the debtor and, under penalty of perjury, by the bankruptcy petition preparer; and

(II) be filed with any document for filing.

(c)(1) A bankruptcy petition preparer who prepares a document for filing shall place on the document, after the preparer's signature, an identifying number that identifies individuals who prepared the document.

(2)(A) Subject to subparagraph (B), for purposes of this section, the identifying number of a bankruptcy petition preparer shall be the Social Security account number of each individual who prepared the document or assisted in its preparation.

(B) If a bankruptcy petition preparer is not an individual, the identifying number of the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be the Social Security account number of the officer, principal, responsible person, or partner of the bankruptcy petition preparer.

(3) [Repealed. Pub.L. 109-8, Title II, § 221(3)(B), Apr. 20, 2005, 119 Stat. 60]

(d) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall, not later than the time at which a document for filing is presented for the debtor's signature, furnish to the debtor a copy of the document.

(e)(1) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall not execute any document on behalf of a debtor.

(2)(A) A bankruptcy petition preparer may not offer a potential bankruptcy debtor any legal advice, including any legal advice described in subparagraph (B).

(B) The legal advice referred to in subparagraph (A) includes advising the debtor--

(i) whether--

(I) to file a petition under this title; or

(II) commencing a case under chapter 7, 11, 12, or 13 is appropriate;

(ii) whether the debtor's debts will be discharged in a case under this title;

(iii) whether the debtor will be able to retain the debtor's home, car, or other property after commencing a case under this title;

(iv) concerning--

(I) the tax consequences of a case brought under this title; or

(II) the dischargeability of tax claims;

(v) whether the debtor may or should promise to repay debts to a creditor or enter into a reaffirmation agreement with a creditor to reaffirm a debt;

(vi) concerning how to characterize the nature of the debtor's interests in property or the debtor's debts; or

(vii) concerning bankruptcy procedures and rights.

(f) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall not use the word “legal” or any similar term in any advertisements, or advertise under any category that includes the word “legal” or any similar term.

(g) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall not collect or receive any payment from the debtor or on behalf of the debtor for the court fees in connection with filing the petition.

(h)(1) The Supreme Court may promulgate rules under section 2075 of title 28, or the Judicial Conference of the United States may prescribe guidelines, for setting a maximum allowable fee chargeable by a bankruptcy petition preparer. A bankruptcy petition preparer shall notify the debtor of any such maximum amount before preparing any document for filing for a debtor or accepting any fee from the debtor.

(2) A declaration under penalty of perjury by the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be filed together with the petition, disclosing any fee received from or on behalf of the debtor within 12 months immediately prior to the filing of the case, and any unpaid fee charged to the debtor. If rules or guidelines setting a maximum fee for services have been promulgated or prescribed under paragraph (1), the declaration under this paragraph shall include a certification that the bankruptcy petition preparer complied with the notification requirement under paragraph (1).

(3)(A) The court shall disallow and order the immediate turnover to the bankruptcy trustee any fee referred to in paragraph (2) found to be in excess of the value of any services--

(i) rendered by the bankruptcy petition preparer during the 12-month period immediately preceding the date of the filing of the petition; or

(ii) found to be in violation of any rule or guideline promulgated or prescribed under paragraph (1).

(B) All fees charged by a bankruptcy petition preparer may be forfeited in any case in which the bankruptcy petition preparer fails to comply with this subsection or subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), or (g).

(C) An individual may exempt any funds recovered under this paragraph under section 522(b).

(4) The debtor, the trustee, a creditor, the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) or the court, on the initiative of the court, may file a motion for an order under paragraph (2).

(5) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall be fined not more than $500 for each failure to comply with a court order to turn over funds within 30 days of service of such order.

(i)(1) If a bankruptcy petition preparer violates this section or commits any act that the court finds to be fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive, on the motion of the debtor, trustee, United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any), and after notice and a hearing, the court shall order the bankruptcy petition preparer to pay to the debtor--

(A) the debtor's actual damages;

(B) the greater of--

(i) $2,000; or

(ii) twice the amount paid by the debtor to the bankruptcy petition preparer for the preparer's services; and

(C) reasonable attorneys' fees and costs in moving for damages under this subsection.

(2) If the trustee or creditor moves for damages on behalf of the debtor under this subsection, the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be ordered to pay the movant the additional amount of $1,000 plus reasonable attorneys' fees and costs incurred.

(j)(1) A debtor for whom a bankruptcy petition preparer has prepared a document for filing, the trustee, a creditor, or the United States trustee in the district in which the bankruptcy petition preparer resides, has conducted business, or the United States trustee in any other district in which the debtor resides may bring a civil action to enjoin a bankruptcy petition preparer from engaging in any conduct in violation of this section or from further acting as a bankruptcy petition preparer.

(2)(A) In an action under paragraph (1), if the court finds that--

(i) a bankruptcy petition preparer has--

(I) engaged in conduct in violation of this section or of any provision of this title;

(II) misrepresented the preparer's experience or education as a bankruptcy petition preparer; or

(III) engaged in any other fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive conduct; and

(ii) injunctive relief is appropriate to prevent the recurrence of such conduct, the court may enjoin the bankruptcy petition preparer from engaging in such conduct.

(B) If the court finds that a bankruptcy petition preparer has continually engaged in conduct described in subclause (I), (II), or (III) of clause (i) and that an injunction prohibiting such conduct would not be sufficient to prevent such person's interference with the proper administration of this title, has not paid a penalty imposed under this section, or failed to disgorge all fees ordered by the court the court may enjoin the person from acting as a bankruptcy petition preparer.

(3) The court, as part of its contempt power, may enjoin a bankruptcy petition preparer that has failed to comply with a previous order issued under this section. The injunction under this paragraph may be issued on the motion of the court, the trustee, or the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any).

(4) The court shall award to a debtor, trustee, or creditor that brings a successful action under this subsection reasonable attorneys' fees and costs of the action, to be paid by the bankruptcy petition preparer.

(k) Nothing in this section shall be construed to permit activities that are otherwise prohibited by law, including rules and laws that prohibit the unauthorized practice of law.

(l)(1) A bankruptcy petition preparer who fails to comply with any provision of subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), or (h) may be fined not more than $500 for each such failure.

(2) The court shall triple the amount of a fine assessed under paragraph (1) in any case in which the court finds that a bankruptcy petition preparer--

(A) advised the debtor to exclude assets or income that should have been included on applicable schedules;

(B) advised the debtor to use a false Social Security account number;

(C) failed to inform the debtor that the debtor was filing for relief under this title; or

(D) prepared a document for filing in a manner that failed to disclose the identity of the bankruptcy petition preparer.

(3) A debtor, trustee, creditor, or United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) may file a motion for an order imposing a fine on the bankruptcy petition preparer for any violation of this section.

(4)(A) Fines imposed under this subsection in judicial districts served by United States trustees shall be paid to the United States trustees, who shall deposit an amount equal to such fines in the United States Trustee Fund.

(B) Fines imposed under this subsection in judicial districts served by bankruptcy administrators shall be deposited as offsetting receipts to the fund established under section 1931 of title 28, and shall remain available until expended to reimburse any appropriation for the amount paid out of such appropriation for expenses of the operation and maintenance of the courts of the United States.

possible (e.g., email, facsimile, or hand delivery) within one business day after the order is entered, unless the court orders otherwise.

LR 9009. LOCAL FORMS.

In addition to the official forms prescribed by the Judicial Conference of the United States, the court may provide additional forms, copies of which are available from the clerk and on the court's website.

LR 9010. ATTORNEYS - NOTICE OF APPEARANCE.

Any corporation, partnership, or other business entity, except when acting as a bankruptcy trustee for a corporation or partnership, must be represented by an attorney.

LR 9011. PRO SE PARTIES.

(a) Petition preparers.

(1) When a nonlawyer petition preparer is alleged to be in violation of 11 U.S.C. § 110(b) through (g), the court will find the facts and, if warranted, impose the fines set forth in those provisions.

(2) When the fees charged by a nonlawyer petition preparer are alleged to be excessive, the court will find the facts and, if warranted, disallow the excess fee and order it turned over to the bankruptcy trustee or the debtor as warranted by the facts of the case.

(b) Injunctions against petition preparers under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j).

(1) An action seeking an injunction under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j) must be brought in bankruptcy court.

(2) The bankruptcy court will find the facts and order an injunction if warranted.

(3) The bankruptcy court will award a successful plaintiff its fees and costs in bringing an action under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(3).

(c) Certification of facts to the district court under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i).

(1) A certification of facts proceeding under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i) starts in bankruptcy court on a motion by the debtor, the trustee, a creditor, or on the court's own motion. The court must:

(A) Give notice to the accused preparer; and

(B) Conduct a hearing before certifying facts to the district court.

(2) In its certification to the district court, the bankruptcy court will include:

(A) Findings of fact it made during the bankruptcy proceeding;

(B) The transcript and the record in the proceeding;

(C) The court's finding of the debtor's actual damages under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1)(A);

(D) The court's finding as to whether the greater sum for inclusion in the penalty under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1)(B) is $2,000 or twice the amount paid by the debtor to the preparer; and

(E) The court's finding as to the amount of the movant's reasonable attorney's fees and costs in connection with the certification proceedings.

(3) When it issues its decision and certifies facts to the district court, the bankruptcy court will also advise the prevailing party in the bankruptcy proceeding that it should file a motion in the district court for imposition of further sanctions under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i).

(4) When the certification of facts is before the district court:

(A) No in-person hearing is required unless the court directs otherwise;

(B) At the hearing, no new evidence will be received, and the hearing will be on the record only;

(C) Only the affected parties will be allowed to submit briefs;

(D) The bankruptcy court's findings of fact will be reviewed under the abuse of discretion standard; and

(E) The bankruptcy court's conclusions of law will be reviewed de novo.

(d) Petition preparer guidelines. The United States trustee may issue guidelines in connection with the provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 110 setting forth positions that the trustee will generally follow in relation to petition preparers. The trustee may revise the guidelines, and when they are revised, they will be reissued in full with a notation of the effective date of the revision. Copies of the guidelines will be available from the United States trustee.

LR 9014. MOTION PRACTICE AND CONTESTED MATTERS - BRIEFS AND MEMORANDA OF LAW.

(a) Hearings and court calendars.

(1) Unless the court directs otherwise, all hearings (including motions in adversary proceedings, objections and other matters for which a hearing is necessary) must be set by counsel or persons acting pro se on the calendar of the judge to whom the case is assigned. The court may set any matter for hearing whether or not a hearing is required by statute or rules.

(2) Each judge will maintain a motion calendar and may adopt specific court

BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Illinois had jurisdiction over these four bankruptcy cases under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b) and § 1334. On March 19, 2009, the bankruptcy court issued a final order under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) converting those four Chapter 11 cases into cases under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. The Debtors timely filed a notice of appeal of that final order on March 26, 2009. This Court, therefore, has jurisdiction to hear this appeal from the bankruptcy court under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion under 11 U.S.C. §§ 1112(b)(4)(F) and (b)(4)(K) in converting the Debtors' four Chapter 11 cases to cases under Chapter 7, where (a) none of the three corporate Debtors nor the individual Debtors paid any statutorily-required fees at any point during their Chapter 11 cases, (b) the individual Debtors repeatedly failed to timely file their monthly operating reports ("MORs"), and (c) the three corporate entities either failed to file any MORs or filed shell documents entitled MORs but which contained no financial information whatsoever.

APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's decision to dismiss or convert a Chapter 11 case for cause is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. In re Woodbrook Assocs., 19 F.3d 312, 316 (7th Cir. 1994); Han v. Linstrom, 2002 WL 31049846, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 12, 2004). This Court reviews the bankruptcy court's findings of fact under the clearly erroneous standard, and reviews conclusions of law under the de novo standard. Woodbrook Assocs., 19 F.3d at 316.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Debtors appeal an order of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Illinois converting four administratively-consolidated Chapter 11 cases to cases under Chapter 7. Docket of In re Gregory and Laura Perkins dba MGP Global Real Estate LLC, No. 08-21919 (hereinafter "Perkins Dkt.") Dkt. #167. Under Chapter 11 (11 U.S.C. §§ 1101-1174) of the Bankruptcy Code, debtors are generally provided the opportunity retain their assets and to reorganize their finances pursuant to a plan of reorganization. Chapter 7 (11 U.S.C. §§ 701-784), in contrast, provides for an orderly liquidation of a debtor's assets and provides that debtors may retain only limited amounts of certain exempt assets.

The bankruptcy court's order converting the Debtors' cases was issued pursuant to the Motion of the United States Trustee to Dismiss or Convert Cases. Perkins Dkt. #151.[1] In their brief, Debtors' apparently concede that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by converting the case of the individual debtors and the cases of MGP I and MGP II. They argue only that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by converting one of the corporate cases, Kedzie Motzart case. Appellants' Brief at 12.

On March 30, 2009, the Debtors filed a motion asking the bankruptcy court to make additional findings, Perkins Dkt. #178, and by order dated April 2, 2009, that motion was stricken. Perkins Dkt. #182. Although that April 2, 2009, order is addressed in Appellants' Brief (at 12-15), the Debtors did not file a notice of appeal concerning that order.

[1] Debtors' notice of appeal identifies another order, also entered on March 19, 2009, concerning a motion to lift the automatic stay, filed on behalf of Appellee LaSalle Bank. The United States Trustee takes no position on Debtors' appeal of that order and does not address it herein.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

Gregory and Laura Perkins ("Perkins" or "individual Debtors") filed their individual Chapter 11 case, No. 08-21919, on August 20, 2008. Perkins Dkt. #1. Petitions were filed under Chapter 11 on behalf of the three corporate Debtors, MGP Auburn Greshem I, LLC, No. 08-33410 ("MGP I"), MGP Auburn Greshem II, LLC, No.08-33409 ("MGP II") and MGP Kedzie Motzart, LLC, No. 08-33411 ("KM" or "Kedzie Motzart") on December 5, 2008. MGP I Dkt. #1, MGP II Dkt. #1 and KM Dkt. #1. MGP I, MGP II and KM are property-owning-and-managing Limited Liability Corporations and Debtor Gregory Perkins holds the position of the managing member of each of them. MGP I Dkt. #1, MGP II Dkt. #1 and KM Dkt. #1. In addition, each Chapter 11 petition was signed by Mr. Perkins in his capacity as the managing member.[2] At the time the corporate cases were filed, however, Mr. Perkins was not in control of the corporate Debtors, as each of the Debtors was in receivership. See generally MGP I Dkt. #42, MGP II Dkt. #37 and KM Dkt. #30 (Motions to Compel Receiver to Turn Over Property to the Debtor). See also March 18, 2009, Transcript at pp. 5-6 (stating Debtors not in control of assets). On January 7, 2009, pursuant to the Debtors' motion, the bankruptcy court entered an order providing for the joint administration of the corporate cases with the individual Debtors' case, No. 08-21919. Perkins Dkt. # 95.

During the four months from the time the Chapter 11 cases of MGP I, MGP II and KM were filed in December 2008 to the day those cases were converted in March 2009, none of the corporate Debtors filed any substantive monthly operating reports ("MORs").[3] Further, no statutory fees due under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) were paid in any of the cases of MGP I, MGP II and KM. Perkins Dkt. #151. Similarly, Gregory and Laura Perkins paid no statutory fees during the seven months from the time they filed their case in August 2008 to the day their case was converted in March 2009, which included the third and fourth quarters of 2008. Perkins Dkt. #151. The individual Debtors also did not timely file their MORs for August, September, October and November 2008, but instead filed them collectively on January 13, 2009. Perkins Dkt. #103-105. They later filed their December 2008 and January 2009 MORs on March 7, 2009. Perkins Dkt. #136-137. The February 2009 MOR was never filed. See Perkins Dkt.

On March 11, 2009,[4] the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss or convert the cases, based on the Debtors' failure to file MORs and their failure to pay quarterly fees under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). Perkins Dkt. #151.[5] The motion was set to be heard on shortened notice as requested on March 18, 2009. Perkins Dkt. #151. Initially, the Debtors stated they had no objection to the motion and informed the bankruptcy court they would be "converting the cases to a chapter 7 at this point . . . ." March 11, 2009, Transcript at p. 9. On the day the United States Trustee's motion was to be heard, counsel for the Debtors appeared in court with an "Emergency Motion Pursuant to Bankruptcy Rules 9023 and 9024" that was filed that same day and sought to (a) amend the order entered at the end of trial on a motion to lift the stay in MGP II case and (b) delay any ruling on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss or convert. Perkins Dkt. #153. Because neither the Court, the United States Trustee, nor the creditors that were present had an opportunity to review the motion, the hearing on both the Emergency Motion and the United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss or Convert were continued to the following day. Perkins Dkt. #157.

[3] Sections 1107(a), 1106(a)(1) and 704(8) of the Bankruptcy Code requires debtors in possession to file reports showing receipts and the disposition of money and property received, changes in liability and assets, disbursements made, and verification of timely payment of its ongoing obligations, including taxes. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2015(a)(3). The United States Trustee requires Chapter 11 debtors to submit these reports on a monthly basis. See United States Trustee Manual, Volume 3: Chapter 11 Case Administration, Subchapter 3-3.3 (Financial Reports), available at http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/ust_org/ustp_manual/volume3/vol3ch03.htm#3-3.3 For a discussion of the importance of MORs, see infra, at 7- 8.

[4] Although the docket indicates the United States Trustee's motion was filed on March 9, 2009, the United States Trustee actually filed the motion on March 11, 2009, as indicated on the motion itself.

[5] The transcript from the March 18, 2009, hearing indicates that Mr. Driscoll, counsel for a secured lender, handed the motion to dismiss or convert to the bankruptcy judge for the clerk to file and serve. However, this is simply a transcription error, since the motion is signed by the United States Trustee and is reflected properly on the docket.

On March 19, 2009, the Debtors' Emergency Motion was denied because the Debtors offered no new evidence. March 19, 2009, Transcript at p. 32. The bankruptcy court then granted the United States Trustee's motion and converted each of the Debtors' Chapter 11 cases to Chapter 7. Perkins Dkt. #167. On March 26, 2009, the Debtors filed their notice of appeal. Perkins Dkt. #174. Later, on March 30, 2009, the Debtors filed a motion asking the bankruptcy court to make additional findings, Perkins Dkt. #178, and on April 2, 2009, that motion was stricken. Perkins Dkt. #182.

The March 19, 2009, order that is the basis for this appeal converted all four of the Debtors' cases. The Debtors' appellate brief challenges only the order converting Kedzie Motzart and does not challenge the court's order converting either the individual debtors' case or the cases of MGP I and MGP II. With respect to Kedzie Motzart, Debtors do not dispute the fact that Kedzie Motzart did not timely file MORs throughout the case, nor do they claim that the statutory fees owed under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) were ever paid. Consequently, the record supports the bankruptcy court's decision to dismiss that case for failure of Kedzie Motzart to timely file its MORs and for failing to pay statutory fees. The Debtors only argument that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in converting the Kedzie Motzart case is the claim that the bankruptcy court failed to recognize an alleged financing agreement that Debtors claimed existed for the benefit of Kedzie Motzart. However, that in no way changes the fact that the Debtor's failure to file reports or pay fees formed an independent basis to convert, which merits affirmance regardless of any alleged financing agreement.[6]

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION BY CONVERTING THE KEDZIE MOTZART CASE, BECAUSE THE DEBTORS' FAILURE TIMELY TO FILE MONTHLY OPERATING REPORTS AND PAY STATUTORY FEES WAS CAUSE FOR DISMISSAL UNDER SECTION 1112(B)(4)(F) AND (B)(4)(K)

Although the March 19, 2009, order converted the four cases of the individual and corporate Debtors, Debtors contend only that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in converting the Kedzie Motzart case, Case No. 08-33411. Appellants' Brief at 12. Because the Debtors do not argue in their brief that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by converting either the case of the individual Debtors or the cases of MGP I and MGP II, they appear to concede that the March 19, 2009, order converting those cases can be affirmed. The United States Trustee will therefore limit his discussion of conversion under § 1112(b) to the Kedzie Motzart case.

Section 1112(b) of the Bankruptcy Code enables the court to administer Chapter 11 cases

[6] Debtors, however, — to the extent that such an agreement might have affected the bankruptcy court's decision on the motion to dismiss or convert — failed to offer any admissible evidence to establish the existence of such an agreement at the hearing on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss or convert.

on its docket, and specifically "grants the authority to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 case to one under chapter 7." In re Johnson, 2008 WL 696917, at *6 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. Mar. 11, 2008); see also In re Kholyavka, 2008 WL 3887653, at *3 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. Aug. 20 2008) (citing In re Timbers of Inwood Forest, Ltd., 808 F.2d 363, 371 (5th Cir. 1987)).

The United States Trustee's motion to dismiss or convert stated two grounds: (1) that the Debtors failed to file required MORs, and (2) that the Debtors failed to pay any of the quarterly fees due under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). These grounds are two of the nonexclusive examples of "cause" for dismissal or conversion expressly set forth in section 1112(b). In re Johnson, 2008 WL 696917, at *6. In this regard, the pertinent portions of subsection 1112(b) provide as follows:

> (4) For purposes of this subsection. The term cause" includes –
> * * *
> (F) unexcused failure to satisfy timely any filing or reporting requirement established by this title or by any rule applicable to a case under this chapter;
> * * *
> (K) failure to pay any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28;

The Debtors do not dispute the United States Trustee's contention that Kedzie Motzart filed no MORs during its Chapter 11 case, nor do they claim that Kedzie Motzart paid any of the statutory fees owed. See Appellants' Brief at 12. Though Appellants never address the issue in their brief, the failure to file timely monthly operating reports "is a serious breach of the debtor's fiduciary obligations and 'undermines the Chapter 11 process.'" In re Rey, 2006 WL 2457435, at *8 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. Aug. 21, 2006) (quoting All Denominational Church, 268 B.R. 536, 538 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2001)).[7] MORs are "'the life blood' of chapter 11, enabling creditors to keep tabs on the debtor's post-petition operations." Id. (quoting In re Berryhill, 127 B.R. 427, 433 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 1991)). Failure to file MORs has consistently been held to be grounds for dismissal, and "[e]ven before the amendment of § 1112 to expressly identify failure to timely file operating reports as cause for dismissal or conversion under § 1112(b), such relief was the consequence to debtors who did not discharge that duty." In re Kholyavka, 2008 WL 3887653, at *4 (referencing pre-BAPCPA case of In re Rey, 2006 WL 2457435).

"A debtor seeking relief in a bankruptcy court must travel a two-way street," In re Kang, 18 B.R. 680 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1982), and filing timely MORs "is a quid pro quo for the protection the debtor enjoys under the reorganization provisions of the Bankruptcy Code." In re Kholyavka, 2008 WL 3887653, at *4. The "failure to file monthly operating reports, whether based on inability to do so or otherwise, undermines the Chapter 11 process and constitutes cause for dismissal or conversion of the Chapter 11 proceeding." All Denominational Church, 268 B.R. at 538.

A debtor's failure to pay the quarterly, statutory fees required under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)6), is equally recognized as cause for dismissal or conversion of a Chapter 11 case. See, e.g., In re Tornheim, 181 B.R. 161, 164 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1995) (holding that "[t]his omission without more, provides cause to convert or dismiss the case"); In re Markhorn Indus., [7] The Rey and All Denominational Church cases involved cases filed prior to 2005, in which the failure to file MORs was a cause for conversion or dismissal that was not expressly listed under a prior version of the statute, but rather was developed under case law. In re Rey, 2006 WL 2457435, at *8. Section 1112(b) was amended pursuant to the Bankruptcy Abuse and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, to include section 1112(b)(4)(F), which made the failure to timely file such reports an express cause for conversion or dismissal.

Inc. 100 B.R. 432, 434-35 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1989) (finding that cause exists where debtor has no funds to pay fees); see also In re Motorworks, Inc., 85 B.R. 661, 662 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 1988) (dismissing case based in part on unpaid fees where debtor had no apparent prospect of paying fees).

The record in this case concerning Kedzie Motzart's failure to file any MORs or to pay any statutory fees is undisputed and there is, consequently, a solid factual and legal basis supporting the bankruptcy court's decision to convert the cases under § 1112(b)(4)(F) ("unexcused failure to satisfy timely any filing or reporting requirement ") and § 1112(b)(4)(K) ("failure to pay any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28").

The only argument raised by the Debtors in support of their claim that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by converting the Kedzie Motzart case is the contention that Kedzie Motzart had entered into an agreement with American Chartered Bank to complete financing within 45 days. Appellant's Brief at 12. Even if true, it would not change the fact that the bankruptcy court properly converted the Kedzie Motzart case under subsections 1112(b)(4)(F) and (b)(4)(K). Therefore, the order should be affirmed because the Debtors do not suggest that the bankruptcy court lacked cause to convert under subsections 1112(b)(4)(F) and (b)(4)(K).

In any event, the Debtors had only offered into evidence a commitment letter setting forth the terms of the alleged financing agreement. March 19, 2009, Transcript at 2. The bankruptcy court held, however, that the proffered document was not evidence admissible to support Kedzie Motzart's claim that it had arranged needed financing. March 19, 2009, Transcript at 32. Specifically, in connection with its denial of the debtor's emergency motion, the bankruptcy court stated that the debtors didn't "have anybody from any lender who is willing to state under oath a position that is parallel to [the] hearsay documents" that Debtors offered, unsuccessfully, as evidence of such an agreement. Id.

In their brief, the Debtors contend that they were somehow disadvantaged by the absence, with the permission of the bankruptcy court, of the attorney for creditor American Chartered Bank. Debtors do not claim, however, that at the March 19, 2009, hearing they had a fact witness who was available and willing to testify that the alleged agreement actually existed and they did not proffer such a witness at the hearing. See generally March 19, 2009, Transcript. Therefore, to the extent that such an agreement might have somehow affected the bankruptcy court's decision on the motion to dismiss or convert, Debtors failed to offer any admissible evidence to establish the existence of such an agreement at the hearing on the United States Trustee's motion.

II. THE ORDER DENYING THE RULE 7052 MOTION WAS NOT APPEALED AND ANY RELATED ISSUES ARE NOT PROPERLY BEFORE THIS COURT.

The cases were converted on March 19, 2009, and from that order the Debtors appealed on March 26, 2009. Perkins Dkt. Entry #174. The Rule 7052 motion was not filed until March 30, Perkins Dkt. Entry #178, after the bankruptcy court had already been divested of jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a) and the order striking that motion was entered on April 2, 2009. Perkins Dkt. Entry #182. That order was never appealed, the 10 days allowed under Rule 8002(a) having long since passed, and any issues regarding the separate Rule 7052 motion and subsequent order are not properly before this Court.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully requests the Court affirm the order entered below.

Respectfully submitted,

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE
AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING REVERSAL

STATEMENT OF INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

The United States Trustee supervises the administration of bankruptcy cases throughout the United States. 28 U.S.C. § 581–89. United States Trustees “serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena.” S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 88 (1978). The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency and to protect and preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. § 307.

The United States Trustee regularly moves under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a) to dismiss bankruptcy petitions filed in bad faith.[1] That provision is a critical tool with which the United States Trustee sanctions and deters fraud upon, and abuses of, the bankruptcy system.

By dramatically limiting the scope of § 707(a), the district court's erroneous construction undermines the United States Trustee's—and bankruptcy courts'—ability to protect creditors (and the institution of bankruptcy) from petitions filed in bad faith by debtors with primarily non-consumer debts ("business debtors").

Moreover, a number of federal agencies, including the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Commerce Department's Economic Development Administration, the Small Business Administration, the Internal Revenue Service, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, regularly appear as creditors in chapter 7 proceedings. Thus, the United States also has a direct interest in preventing debtors who have the ability to repay some or all of their debts from filing in bad faith under chapter 7 in order to have those debts discharged.

[1] The United States Trustee employs the recently amended 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) to move to dismiss petitions for cause when debtors primarily have consumer debts. Section 707(b)(2)'s "means test" defines a formula that triggers a rebuttable presumption that a petition should be dismissed. Section 707(b)(3) alternatively provides for the dismissal of consumer debt petitions when "the debtor filed the petition in bad faith" or "the totality of the circumstances . . . of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse."

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED

Whether a bankruptcy court may consider a business debtor's income and expenses when assessing the debtor's good faith in filing a bankruptcy petition pursuant to a motion to dismiss for cause under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a).

STATEMENT[2]

Dr. Perlin is a radiologist. Along with his wife, he owned and operated a medical imaging clinic, which leased imaging equipment from Hitachi. The Perlins personally guaranteed the unsecured lease obligations to Hitachi. Their clinic went out of business, and Dr. and Mrs. Perlin subsequently filed a chapter 7 bankruptcy petition. Their schedules and statements of affairs reflect approximately $31,000 per month in income and approximately $31,000 in monthly living expenses. The Perlins' debts are primarily business debts.

Soon after the filing of the petition, Hitachi filed a motion to dismiss the case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a), alleging that the petition was filed in bad faith.[3] According to Hitachi, the bankruptcy was the latest in a number of strategies that the debtors had adopted to avoid paying their unsecured obligation to Hitachi of approximately $1.2 million. In its motion to dismiss, Hitachi described in detail the debtors' lavish lifestyle and asserted that the debtors had made no effort to cut expenses or to otherwise free up any funds for the payment of their debts.

In denying the motion to dismiss, the bankruptcy court concluded that it was prohibited from considering a debtor's monthly income and expenses when assessing the good faith of a debtor's bankruptcy petition under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a). Because most of the debtor's obligations arose from their imaging business § 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code—which applies when the debtor's "debts are primarily consumer debts"—is not applicable to the Perlins' petition. The court reasoned that Congress, by expressly enacting § 707(b) to limit the availability of chapter 7 relief for consumer

The court may dismiss a case under this chapter only after notice and a hearing and only for cause, including --

(1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;

(2) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28; and

(3) failure of the debtor in a voluntary case to file, within fifteen days or such additional time as the court may allow after the filing of the petition commencing such case, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521, but only on a motion by the United States trustee.

debtors who could afford to repay some of their debts from income, implicitly prohibited courts from considering a debtor's ability to repay when determining if a case should be dismissed for bad faith under § 707(a).

Hitachi now appeals, arguing that bankruptcy courts can consider business debtors' ability to repay under § 707(a).

ARGUMENT

A BANKRUPTCY COURT CAN CONSIDER A DEBTOR'S INCOME AND EXPENSES WHEN ASSESSING A DEBTOR'S BAD FAITH PURSUANT TO A MOTION TO DISMISS FOR CAUSE UNDER 11 U.S.C. § 707(a).

A. The purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to "relieve the honest debtor from the weight of oppressive indebtedness, and permit him to start afresh free from the obligations and responsibilities consequent upon business misfortunes." Williams v. U.S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 236 U.S. 549, 554–55 (1915) (emphasis added). The Code gives to the "honest but unfortunate debtor who surrenders for distribution the property which he owns at the time of bankruptcy, a new opportunity in life and a clear field for future effort, unhampered by the pressure and discouragement of pre-existing debt." Local Loan Co. v. Hunt, 292 U.S. 234, 244 (1934) (internal citations omitted, emphasis added). This Court has long recognized bankruptcy courts' broad, equitable authority to achieve those ends. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 105(a)

("The court may issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title."); In re Owens Corning, 419 F.3d 195, 209 n.13 (3d Cir. 2005) (construing § 105(a)'s grant of authority broadly to authorize the equitable remedy of substantive consolidation).

Concordant with a bankruptcy court's broad authority is its obligation under § 707(a) to "decide whether [a] petitioner has abused the provisions, purpose, or spirit of bankruptcy law" by filing a petition in bad faith. In re Tamecki, 229 F.3d 205, 207 (3d Cir. 2000). The breadth and equitable nature of bankruptcy courts' authority underpins the basis for and methodology of a § 707(a) analysis; that provision empowers bankruptcy courts' to guard against abuses of the Bankruptcy Code through a searching, totality of the circumstances inquiry. See, e.g., ibid.; In re Integrated Telecom Express, Inc., 384 F.3d 108, 119 (3d Cir. 2004).

It is thus fundamentally inconsistent with both the nature of bankruptcy courts' authority and the purpose of § 707(a) to restrict the factors a bankruptcy court may properly consider when deciding whether a petition was filed in bad faith. In short, there is no basis for excluding debtors' income and expenses from this analysis. And doing so needlessly sanctions, if it does not invite, abuse of the Bankrtuptcy Code by forcing the bankruptcy court to turn a blind eye to evidence that may directly demonstrate a debtor's bad faith.

B. This Court's precedent clearly allows (indeed encourages) a bankruptcy court to consider a debtor's income and expenses when it assesses the debtor's bad faith in filing a chapter 7 petition under an 11 U.S.C. § 707(a) motion to dismiss.

"Section 707(a) allows a bankruptcy court to dismiss a petition for cause if the petitioner fails to demonstrate his good faith in filing." Tamecki, 229 F.3d at 207 (citing In re Zick, 931 F.2d 1124, 1126-27 (6th Cir. 1991); In re Marks, 174 B.R. 37, 40 (E.D. Pa. 1994)); see also In re Lilley, 91 F.3d 491 (3d Cir. 1996) (Chapter 13 case may be dismissed for lack of good faith); In re SGL Carbon Corp., 200 F.3d 154 (3d Cir. 1999) (lack of good faith may constitute "cause" for dismissal of Chapter 11 case).[4]

"Whether the good faith requirement has been satisfied is a 'fact intensive inquiry' in which the court must examine 'the totality of facts and circumstances' and determine where a ‘petition falls along the spectrum ranging from the clearly acceptable to the patently abusive.’” Integrated Telecom Express, 384 F.3d at 119 (quoting SGL, 200 F.3d at 162). “[C]ourts in this circuit have uniformly held that ‘[a]t the very least, good faith requires a showing of honest intention.’” Tamecki, 229 F.3d at207 (quoting Marks, 174 B.R. at 40). “Dismissal based on lack of good faith * * * is generally utilized only in those egregious cases that entail concealed or misrepresented assets and/or sources of income, lavish lifestyles, and intention to avoid a large single debt based upon conduct akin to fraud, misconduct or gross negligence.’” Ibid. (quoting Zick, 931 F.2d at 1129) (emphasis added). “Courts can determine good faith only on an ad hoc basis * * *, and the decision to dismiss a petition for lack of good faith rests within the sound discretion of the bankruptcy court.” Ibid.

[4] Like this case, Tamecki concerned the debtor's anticipated ability to repay his debts. The debtor filed his bankruptcy petition in anticipation of the finalization of divorce proceedings that would dissolve his tenancy by the entirety with his spouse and result in his receipt of sufficient money to both repay his debts and to give him a financial fresh start. The Tamecki court found that this combination of circumstances was sufficient to support the bankruptcy court's determination that the debtor had not filed in good faith. Id. at 208. Considered in the context of the instant dispute, Tamecki illustrates the impropriety of the legal rule announced by the bankruptcy court. At the core of Tamecki was the idea that the debtor was able to pay (some portion of) his debts and his invocation of bankruptcy's protections was thus in bad faith. That Tamecki's anticipated ability to repay his debts came not from income but instead from a sale of property should not matter in the bad faith analysis.

Given that the § 707(a) analysis is a “fact intensive inquiry in which the court must examine the totality of facts and circumstances,” it seems clear that a bankruptcy court may (and should) consider a debtor’s income and expenses. It is similarly clear that in order to determine whether a debtor’s chapter 7 petition “entail[ed] concealed or misrepresented * * * sources of income, lavish lifestyles, [or an] intention to avoid a large single debt,” a bankruptcy court must consider the debtor’s income and expenses. Finally, a prohibition against a bankruptcy court’s consideration of income and expenses cannot be reconciled with "[resting] the decision to dismiss a petition for lack of good faith * * * within the sound discretion of the bankruptcy court" or recognizing that a bankruptcy court's dismissal determination must be made on an "ad hoc basis."

In short, this Court's precedent renders plain the central role of a debtor's income and expenses in a bankruptcy court's assessment of the debtor's bad faith pursuant to a motion to dismiss the debtor's petition under § 707(a).

C. Nothing in § 707(b) supercedes this Court's precedent by prohibiting the consideration of a business debtor's income and expenses under § 707(a).

The Bankruptcy Code does not expressly prohibit a court's consideration of a debtor's income and expenses when making a § 707(a) for cause determination. Purporting to apply the principle "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," the bankruptcy court inferred the existence of such a prohibition in the § 707(a) business debt context from the express discussion of debtors' income and expenses in § 707(b)'s consumer debt provisions.

Section 707(b) expressly treats consumer debtors' income and expenses in its "means test." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).[5] The means test, however, does much more than

[5] The provision states, in pertinent part:

In considering * * * whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of sanction the consideration of debtors' income and expenses. Rather, § 707(b)(2)'s means test defines a specific formula based on income and expenses that triggers a rebuttable presumption of bad faith in the consumer debt context. It makes sense to consider the inclusion of the means test in § 707(b) and not § 707(a) in determining whether § 707(a) contains a similar statutory presumption of bad faith (clearly, it does not). It makes little sense, however, to deem the means test's reference to debtors' income and expenses a prohibition against consideration of the same under § 707(a).

The bankruptcy court's negative implication is further belied by§ 707(b)(3), which implicitly extends consideration of a consumer debtor's income and expenses beyond § 707(b)(2)'s means test, providing for the dismissal of petitions when "the debtor filed the [consumer debt] petition in bad faith" or "the totality of the circumstances . . . of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." Put another way, as the means test does not purport to augment the universe of factors courts may consider in the bad faith analysis (under § 707(b) or otherwise), it is difficult to the provisions of this chapter, the court shall presume abuse exists if the debtor's current monthly income reduced by the amounts [defined herein] and multiplied by 60 is not less than the lesser of–

> (I) 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured claims in the case, or $6,000, whichever is greater; or
> (II) $10,000.
> 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

fathom a negative implication with respect to appropriate bad faith factors in the § 707(a) business debt context on the basis of the means test.

The court's reasoning is further undermined by the legislative purpose of the recent amendments to § 707(b) by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (which did not alter the text of § 707(a)). Most notably, the primary purpose of the inclusion of the means testwas to protect against abuses of the bankruptcy system by consumer debtors—to strengthen, not limit, controls on bankruptcy abuse. Ibid. There is nothing in the text or legislative history of the Act to suggest that Congress intended to loosen restrictions against bad faith filings in the business debt, or any other, context.

It is doubly problematic to imply from a strengthening of protections against bankruptcy abuse by consumer debtors a loosening of protections against abuse by business debtors.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the bankruptcy court should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted,

FOR THE DISTRICT OF HAWAII

BRIEF FOR APPELLEE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This appeal arises out of bankruptcy proceedings instituted by the Debtor, Personal Electric Transports, Inc., and the Debtor's principals, Anthony and Barbara Locricchio. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1). On February 14, 2007, the bankruptcy court issued orders dismissing the case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), denying the application of Richard C. DeWaele to serve as Debtor's pro bono counsel, and denying a motion for recusal of the bankruptcy judge. On February 26, 2007, Personal Electric Transports filed timely motions for reconsideration and rehearing of the orders dismissing the case and denying recusal. Mr. DeWaele also sought rehearing on his application to serve as pro bono counsel. The Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee subsequently filed its own motion for rehearing of the order dismissing the case. On March 5, 2007, the bankruptcy court denied the motions for reconsideration and rehearing filed by the Debtor and by Mr. DeWaele. On March 7, 2007, the court issued an order denying the Unsecured Creditors' Committee's motion.

On March 16, 2007, the Debtor, the Locricchios and Mr. DeWaele filed a notice of appeal from the three March 5, 2007 orders denying the motions for reconsideration and rehearing filed by Personal Electric Transports and Mr. DeWaele. On May 2, 2007, Personal Electric Transports filed a motion for a stay pending appeal in district court. On June 25, 2007, the district court (Hon. David Alan Ezra) issued an order dismissing the appeal for lack of jurisdiction (on the ground that the notice of appeal was untimely under 28 U.S.C. § 158), and denying the motion for a stay as moot. On July 5, 2007, Personal Electric Transports filed a motion for rehearing with regard to the district court's June 25, 2007 order. The district court denied the motion for rehearing on August 13, 2007.

On August 24, 2007, the Debtor filed a timely notice of appeal from the August 24, 2007. Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B). This Court has jurisdiction over the appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

The bankruptcy court entered orders on March 5, 2007, denying reconsideration and rehearing of its prior orders dismissing the case, denying recusal, and denying Mr. DeWaele's application to serve as pro bono counsel. The Debtor filed a notice of appeal from these orders on March 16, 2007. The issues presented are:

1. Whether the Debtor's notice of appeal to the district court, filed more than 10 days after the March 5, 2007 bankruptcy court orders, was untimely, depriving the district court of jurisdiction over the appeal.

2. Whether the pendency of the Unsecured Creditors' Committee's motion for reconsideration of dismissal affected the deadline for the Debtor's notice of appeal.

3. Whether the closing of the bankruptcy court at 4:00 p.m. effectively curtailed the Debtor's right to appeal.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Nature of the Case.

This case involves the timeliness of the Debtor's notice of appeal to the district court following the bankruptcy court's denial of reconsideration of its order dismissing the Debtor's bankruptcy case. The Debtor, Personal Electric Transports, Inc., was in the business of developing electric vehicles for manufacture and sale. The Debtor's principals were Anthony and Barbara Locricchio. The Debtor filed for bankruptcy under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, then subsequently converted the case to one under chapter 11. The former chapter 7 trustee moved to reconvert the case to chapter 7, which the United States Trustee supported. The bankruptcy court (Hon. Robert J. Faris), however, concluded that the Debtor had virtually no chance of reorganizing; therefore, instead of ruling on the motion to reconvert, the bankruptcy court dismissed the case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). The bankruptcy court also denied the Debtor's motion for recusal and Richard C. DeWaele's application to serve as counsel pro bono.

The Debtor and Mr. DeWaele sought reconsideration of the bankruptcy court's orders, which the bankruptcy court denied on March 5, 2007. Eleven days later, on March 16, 2007, the Debtor and DeWaele filed a notice of appeal to the district court. Because the notice of appeal was a day late, the district court held that it lacked jurisdiction to consider the appeal and dismissed the suit. After seeking rehearing of the district court's order, the Debtor and Anthony Locricchio filed this appeal.

The Debtor and Locricchio argue on appeal that the notice of appeal was not out of time because the district court did not finally dispose of all the issues in the case until it ruled on the Unsecured Creditors' Committee's motion on March 7. Alternatively, appellants argue that they were prevented from filing a timely appeal because the bankruptcy court closed at 4:00, allegedly in violation of 28 U.S.C. § 452 and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 5001, which require federal bankruptcy courts to be deemed always open for the purpose of filing any pleading or other proper paper. These arguments lack merit.

B. Statutory and Regulatory Framework.

1. The Bankruptcy Code establishes several basic forms of bankruptcy, two of which are at issue here. Under Chapter 7, which governs liquidations, "an individual debtor receives an immediate unconditional discharge of personal liability for certain debts in exchange for relinquishing his or her nonexempt assets to a bankruptcy trustee for liquidation and distribution to creditors." H.R. Rep. No. 31, 109 Cong., pt. 1, 1st Sess. 10 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 97; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 701–727. By contrast, in a Chapter 11 bankruptcy, the debtor usually administers the bankruptcy estate, exercising most of the rights and fiduciary duties of a trustee. The debtor is then known as a "debtor in possession." 11 U.S.C. § 1107.

Under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), the court is authorized to convert a case under Chapter 11 to a case under Chapter 7 or to dismiss the case, "whichever is in the best interests of creditors and the estate, if the movant establishes cause." "Cause" under § 1112(b) includes "substantial or continuing loss to or diminution of the estate and the absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation." 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(4)(A).

2. Under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals "from final judgments, orders, and decrees" of the bankruptcy courts. Such appeals "shall be taken in the same manner as appeals in civil proceedings generally are taken to the courts of appeals from the district courts and in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2). Rule 8002(a) of the Federal Bankruptcy Rules provides, in turn, that "[t]he notice of appeal shall be filed with the clerk [of the bankruptcy court] within 10 days of the date of the entry of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from."

3. In pertinent part, 28 U.S.C. § 452 provides: "All courts of the United States shall be deemed always open for the purpose of filing papers, issuing and returning process, and making motions and orders." Rule 5001 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure is to the same effect: "The [bankruptcy] courts shall be deemed always open for the purpose of filing any pleading or other proper paper, issuing and returning process, and filing, making, or entering motions, orders and rules." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 5001(a).

C. Statement of Facts and Procedural History.

1. The Debtor, Personal Electric Transports, Inc., was in the business of developing electric vehicles for manufacture and sale. The Debtor's principals were Anthony and Barbara Locricchio. The Debtor's largest creditor is the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power ("LADWP") which lent significant amounts for the Debtor to develop its business.

The Debtor filed a bankruptcy petition under Chapter 7 on February 17, 2006. On May 22, 2006, the Debtor converted its case to Chapter 11. On June 1, 2006, the former Chapter 7 trustee moved to reconvert the case back to Chapter 7 to allow the trustee to complete his liquidation of the estate. The U.S. Trustee[1] joined the trustee's motion.

[1] United States Trustees are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of chapter 7 and chapter 11 bankruptcy cases in all federal judicial districts within this circuit. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977) (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena"); Curry v. Castillo (In re Castillo), 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002) (citing this legislative history). 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(8) authorizes United States Trustees to file motions to dismiss chapter 11 bankruptcy cases under section 1112 of the Bankruptcy Code whenever material grounds exist for seeking such relief.

On July 7, 2006, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on the trustee's motion to reconvert. At the hearing, Mr. Locricchio stated that the Debtor should be given the opportunity to reorganize and that he would know quickly whether his plan would work and whether his sources of money would come through. Tr. 23-30 (July 7, 2006) (Supplemental ER Vol. I at 23-30).[2] The Court stated that it was "deeply skeptical" of the Debtor's prospects for reorganization but gave the Debtor an opportunity to show that reorganization was practical. Id. at 32 (Supplemental ER Vol. I at 32). The court set a deadline for the filing of a disclosure statement and reorganization plan. The court also scheduled a hearing to address both the disclosure statement and the trustee's motion to reconvert. The Court expressly warned the parties that, in addition to re-conversion to Chapter 7, the Court would also consider dismissal of the case. Id. at 32-33 (Supplemental ER Vol. I at 32-33).

The hearing on the motion to reconvert was ultimately heard on January 29, 2007. Prior to the January 29, 2007 hearings, however, the Debtor and the Creditors' Committee filed a series of "Emergency Ex-Parte Motions." On January 22, 2007, the Debtor filed an Emergency Ex-Parte Motion To Strike Any Response That Disclosure Statement Is Unsatisfactory and Does Not Meet the Standard For Submission. On January 26, 2007, the Creditors' Committee filed an Emergency Ex-Parte Motion to Strike Hearing of Former Chapter 7 Trustee To Reconvert Case to Chapter 7. See ER Vol. I at 18. Also on January 26, 2007, the Debtor filed an Emergency Ex-Parte Motion to Stay All Proceedings. See ibid. In this last pleading, the Debtor suggested that the Court should recuse itself.

At the hearing on January 29, 2007, the court orally ruled that there was no basis for its recusal. Tr. 23 (Jan. 29, 2007) (Supplemental ER Vol. I at 60). The court also disapproved the Debtor's Amended Disclosure Statement and denied the remaining motions. Id. at 23-30 (Supplemental ER Vol. I at 60-67). Finally, the court ruled that the case would be dismissed. Id. at 30 (Supplemental ER Vol. I at 67). The court entered written orders consistent with these oral rulings on February 14, 2006. ER Vol. I at 40-51.

2. On February 26, 2007, the Locricchios and the Debtor filed three motions seeking reconsideration of the court's order dismissing the case, rehearing on the issue of recusal, and rehearing of the order of dismissal based on new evidence. ER Vol. II at 28-47, 48-69, 70-116. The Debtor (through attorney Richard DeWaele) also filed a motion for rehearing of the court's February 15, 2007 order denying DeWaele's application to serve as pro bono counsel for the Debtor. Id. at 117-128. On March 5, 2007, the bankruptcy court denied the motions for reconsideration and rehearing filed by the Debtor and by Mr. DeWaele. See ER Vol. I at 32-33, 34-35, 36-39.

The Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee filed its own motion for rehearing of the order dismissing the case on March 5, 2007. Id. at 10-27, 30. On March 7, 2007, the court issued an order denying the Unsecured Creditors' Committee's motion. Id. at 29-31. The bankruptcy court noted that the rehearing motion was untimely under Fed. R. Civ. P. 59 (made applicable by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014); and while the motion may have been timely under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) (also made applicable by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014), the Committee had not made the showing that the rule requires. Id. at 30 n.1. The bankruptcy court went on to deny the motion because the rehearing motion "merely rehashe[d] arguments which others [had] already raised and add[ed] nothing new," and because it already had "disposed of nearly identical arguments made by other parties." Id. at 31.

On March 16, 2007, the Debtor and the Locricchios filed a notice of appeal; but the notice specified that the appeal was only from the bankruptcy court's March 5, 2007 orders:

> Debtor in Possession PERSONAL ELECTRIC TRANSPORTS, INC., and its principals, Anthony and Barbara Locricchio, pro se, and appeals under 28 U.S.C.

> 158(a) from the ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION AND MOTION FOR REHEARING ON ORDER DISMISSING CASE filed on March 5, 2007; ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR REHEARING ON ISSUE OF NEED TO RECUSE JUDGE FARRIS (sic) filed on March 5, 2007; ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR REHEARING ON RICHARD C. DEWAELE OF INTENT TO CONTINUE TO APPEAR AS PRO BONO COUNSEL FOR DEBTOR IN POSSESSION, PERSONAL ELECTRIC TRANSPORTS, INC. filed on March 5, 2007.

ER Vol. I at 27. The notice of appeal nowhere mentions the bankruptcy court's March 7, 2007 order denying the Unsecured Creditors' motion.

3. On May 2, 2007, Personal Electric Transports filed a motion for a stay pending appeal in district court. See ER Vol. I at 8. On May 10, 2007, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the appeal, arguing that the notice of appeal was untimely filed. See ER Vol. I at 20. On June 25, 2007, the district court issued an order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, and denying the motion for a stay as moot. See ER Vol. I at 17-26. The district court noted that the Supreme Court recently had held that "'the timely filing of a notice of appeal in a civil case is a jurisdictional requirement,'" id. at 25 (quoting Bowles v. Russell, 127 S. Ct. 2360, 2366 (2007)), and that "[t]here is no reason that this long-standing rule of law should not apply to an appeal of an order of the Bankruptcy Court," id. at 26.

On July 5, 2007, Personal Electric Transports filed a motion for rehearing, which the district court denied on August 13, 2007. See id. at 6-14. Thereafter, the Debtor filed this appeal on August 24, 2007. Id. at 1-3.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

1. The district court correctly dismissed the appeal for lack of jurisdiction because the notice of appeal was untimely. A party to a bankruptcy action must file a notice of appeal within 10 days after entry of the order being appealed. Because the time for appealing bankruptcy decisions to the district courts is prescribed by statute, the failure to file a timely notice of appeal within the prescribed time is a jurisdictional defect barring appellate review.

2. The notice of appeal to the district court in this case was filed late. After the bankruptcy court entered orders dismissing the case and denying the Debtor's various other motions on February 14, 2007, the Debtor and the Locricchios filed timely motions for reconsideration and rehearing on February 26, 2007, tolling the time for appeal. When the bankruptcy court denied the motions for reconsideration on March 5, 2007, the Debtor and the Locricchios had 10 days – until March 15, 2007 – to appeal from the orders denying reconsideration. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002. The Debtor and the Locricchios, however, filed a notice of appeal on March 16, 2007, 11 days after entry of the bankruptcy court's March 2007 orders. Therefore, the district court properly dismissed the appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

3. The fact that the bankruptcy court did not issue an order denying the Official Creditors' Committee motion for reconsideration until March 7, 2007, did not make the Debtor's and the Locricchios' March 16, 2007 notice of appeal timely. The Committee's motion for reconsideration was filed on March 5, 2007, more than 10 days after the bankruptcy court's February 14, 2007 order of dismissal. As the bankruptcy court noted, that motion was untimely under Fed. R. Civ. P. 59 (made applicable by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014) and the Committee had not made any showing that Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) applied. Therefore, the Committee's motion did not toll the time for filing a notice of appeal from the court's March 5, 2007 order denying reconsideration of the Debtor's and the Locricchios' motion for reconsideration.

This is particularly true here because the Debtor and the Locricchios did not appeal the March 7 order, or even have standing to appeal the order. The notice of appeal does not identify the bankruptcy court's March 7 order; nor does it name the Creditors' Committee as a party, as Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8001 requires. Rather, the notice of appeal specifies only the bankruptcy court's three March 5, 2007 orders; and it lists only the Debtor and its principals as parties to the appeal. Under this Court's precedents, this mistake is fatal to the Debtors' appeal. See In re Dudley, 249 F.3d 1170, 1174 (9th Cir. 2001); United States v. Arkison (In re Cascade Roads, Inc.), 34 F.3d 756, 761 (9th Cir. 1994). As the district court held, because the notice of appeal failed to designate the Creditors' Committee order, the date of the order, or the name of the Creditors' Committee as a party, neither the district court nor the parties involved had any notice that the order was on appeal or that the notice was timely filed.

4. The Debtor argues that it was unable to file its notice of appeal on March 15, 2007, because the courthouse had no night depository box for accepting a filing after the court's normal business hours. This failure, the Debtor claims, was essentially a denial of access to the courts in violation of 28 U.S.C. § 452 and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 5001. As a preliminary matter, this argument was not raised in the Debtor's opposition to the motion to dismiss the appeal as untimely, and therefore was waived. Assuming the argument was not waived, however, the bankruptcy court's failure to have a night depository box for after-hours filings did not excuse the late filing of the notice of appeal in this case. The requirement that the courts shall be deemed always open for purposes for filing papers has been interpreted uniformly to mean that the clerk's office need not be kept open around the clock; and while some clerks' offices have established night depositories to accommodate after-hours filings, they are not mandatory. In the absence of such a night depository, papers can validly be filed after hours only by in-hand delivery to the clerk or other proper official. The Debtor and the Locricchios do not contend that they actually attempted to file the notice of appeal after hours. And, knowing that the courthouse closed for business at 4:00 p.m., and that the court had no night deposit box for late filings, both the Debtor and counsel should have taken care to file the notice of appeal before the official close of business, or to make arrangements with the clerk's office to file the notice of appeal after hours.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews de novo "jurisdictional issues in bankruptcy cases." In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d 933, 938 (9th Cir. 2007). The timeliness of a notice of appeal from the bankruptcy court to the district court is a question of law reviewed de novo. Bigelow v. Stoltenberg (In re Weston), 41 F.3d 493, 491 (9th Cir. 1994).

ARGUMENT

THE DISTRICT COURT CORRECTLY DISMISSED THE APPEAL FOR LACK OF JURISDICTION BECAUSE THE NOTICE OF APPEAL WAS UNTIMELY FILED.

A. The Timely Filing Of A Notice Of Appeal In Bankruptcy Cases Is Jurisdictional.

"Generally, a party to a bankruptcy action must file a notice of appeal within ten days after entry of the order being appealed." In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d 933, 938 (9th Cir. 2007) (citing Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a)). See also 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2). The requirement of a timely appeal "is jurisdictional." In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d at 938 (citing Preblich v. Battley, 181 F.3d 1048, 1056 (9th Cir. 1999)). That is, "'the failure to timely file a notice of appeal is a jurisdictional defect barring appellate review.'" Ibid. (brackets removed) (quoting Lopez v. Long (In re Long), 255 B.R. 241, 243 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2000)). See also In re Slimick, 928 F.2d 304, 306 (9th Cir. 1990) ("The untimely filing of a notice of appeal is jurisdictional.").

The Supreme Court's recent decision in Bowles v. Russell, 127 S. Ct. 2360 (2007), confirms that the time limit for filing a notice of appeal in bankruptcy cases, because it is statutorily prescribed, is jurisdictional. In Bowles, the Supreme Court held that "the taking of an appeal [in civil cases] within the prescribed time is 'mandatory and jurisdictional.'" 127 S. Ct. at 2363. In doing so, the Court recognized "the jurisdictional significance of the fact that a time limitation is set forth in a statute." Id. at 2364. Time constraints set out in a statute "limit a court's jurisdiction," id. at 2365, while time prescriptions set forth in rules of court are merely "claims-processing rules," and do not implicate a court's subject-matter jurisdiction, id. at 2364.

In bankruptcy cases, a district court's appellate jurisdiction to review final judgments, orders and decrees of bankruptcy judges is established by 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and 158(c)(2). While subsection 158(a)(1) provides the general grant of appellate jurisdiction, subsection 158(c)(2) establishes the time for appealing bankruptcy decisions to the district courts, requiring that such appeals "shall be taken in the same manner as appeals in civil proceedings generally are taken to the courts of appeals from the district courts," and "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2). Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8002(a) requires a notice of appeal be filed within ten days of the bankruptcy court's order unless an appellant had filed one of the motions identified in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b) within that ten day period. Because the time for filing a bankruptcy appeal is "statute-based," Bowles, 127 S. Ct. at 2365, the requirement of a timely-filed appeal is, as this Court has held, "jurisdictional." In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d at 938.[3]

B. The District Court Properly Dismissed The Appeal For Lack Of Jurisdiction Because The Notice Of Appeal Was Untimely.

The notice of appeal to the district court was filed late. On February 14, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered orders dismissing the case, denying the Debtor's emergency ex parte motion to stay all proceedings, denying Debtor's emergency ex parte motion for an order to strike any response that its disclosure statement was unsatisfactory, and denying the Creditors' Committee's emergency ex parte motion to strike the hearing on the trustee's motion to reconvert the case to Chapter 7. See ER Vol. I at 40-51. The Debtor and the Locricchios (the Debtor's principals) timely filed motions for reconsideration and rehearing on February 26, 2007. These motions temporarily tolled the time for filing an appeal. See Bigelow v. Stoltenberg (In re Weston), 41 F.3d 493, 495 (9th Cir. 1994) (stating that a motion for reconsideration filed within 10 days after entry of judgment is considered to be a Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9023 motion and tolls the time for filing a notice of appeal).

[3] Cf. Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 454 (2004) (holding that failure to comply with the time requirement in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004 did not affect a court's subject-matter jurisdiction). Critical to the Court's analysis in Kontrick was the fact that "[n]o statute . . . specifies a time limit for filing a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge." 540 U.S. at 448. See also Bowles v. Russell, 127 S. Ct. 2360, 2364 (2007). By contrast to the time limit in Bankruptcy Rule 4004, the time limit for appeals to the district court in bankruptcy cases is derived from 28 U.S.C. § 158.

The bankruptcy court denied the motions for reconsideration and rehearing by orders entered March 5, 2007. ER Vol. I at 32-33, 34-35, 36-39. The Debtor and the Locricchios' then had ten days – or until March 15, 2007 – to appeal from the orders denying reconsideration and rehearing as well as from the underlying orders dismissing the case and denying the Debtor's ex parte motions. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) (an appeal from a final bankruptcy judgment, order or decree "shall be taken in the same manner as appeals in civil proceedings generally are taken to the courts of appeals from the district courts and in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules"); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) ("The notice of appeal shall be filed with the clerk within 10 days of the date of the entry of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from."). The Debtor and the Locricchios, however, filed a notice of appeal on March 16, 2007, 11 days after entry of the bankruptcy court's March 5, 2007 orders. Therefore, the district court correctly concluded that the March 16, 2007 notice of appeal was untimely and properly dismissed the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. See In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d at 938 ("[T]he failure to timely file a notice of appeal is a jurisdictional defect barring appellate review.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

C. The Fact That The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Enter An Order Denying The Unsecured Creditors' Motion For Rehearing Until March 7, 2007, Does Not Make The Notice Of Appeal Involved In This Case Timely.

Debtor and Mr. Locricchio argue that "[t]he final adjudication of all issues related to this matter did not occur until March 7, 2007 when the final order of the Court was entered related to the issues filed by the Official Creditors Committee all of which are directly part of the issues on Appeal." Br. for Appellants at 13. Thus, they contend, "the filing date for the Notice of Appeal was March 17, 2007," and not March 15, 2007. Ibid. As a consequence, Debtor and Mr. Locricchio argue, the notice of appeal in this case was, in fact, timely filed. Id. at 14.

1. The fact that the bankruptcy court did not issue an order denying the Official Creditors' Committee motion for reconsideration until March 7, 2007, did not make the Debtor's and the Locricchio's March 16, 2007 notice of appeal timely. Unlike the Debtor and the Locricchios, the Committee did not file any pleadings to toll the appeal period for the bankruptcy court's February 14, 2007 order dismissing the case and denying various ex parte motions, including the Committee's ex parte motion to strike the hearing on the trustee's motion to reconvert the case to Chapter 7. Therefore, as the bankruptcy court noted, the Creditors' Committee March 5, 2007 motion was untimely under Fed. R. Civ. P. 59 (made applicable by Fed. R. Bankr. P.

9014) and the Committee made no showing that Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) applied. See ER Vol. I at 30 n.1. As a consequence, the Committee's March 5, 2007 motion could not have tolled the time for filing an appeal from the district court's March 5, 2007 order. See Mt. Graham Red Squirrel v. Madigan, 954 F.2d 1441, 1462 (9th Cir. 1992); Straw v. Bowen, 866 F.2d 1167, 1171 (9th Cir. 1989).[4]

2. The Debtor and the Locricchios, in any event, did not appeal the March 7 order. The notice of appeal makes no mention of the bankruptcy court's March 7 order; nor does the notice of appeal name the Official Creditors' Committee as a party. Rather, the notice of appeal specifies that only the bankruptcy court's three March 5, 2007 orders are being appealed; and it lists only the Debtor in Possession and its principals as parties to the appeal. See ER Vol. I at 27.

Bankruptcy Rule 8001(a) makes clear that a notice of appeal from a judgment, order, or decree of a bankruptcy judge "shall (1) conform substantially to the appropriate Official Form, (2) contain the names of all parties to the judgment, order, or decree appealed from and the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of their respective attorneys, and (3) be accompanied by the prescribed fee." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8001(a). The Official Form requires the party appealing to identify the judgment, order or decree of the bankruptcy judge being appealed and its date and the names of all parties to the judgment, order or decree being appealed. Given the clear requirements of Rule 8001(a), the Debtor's failure to mention either the March 7, 2007 order or the Official Creditors' Committee in its notice of appeal means that the notice was effective only as to the March 5, 2007 order.[5]

[4] The Debtor's and the Locricchios' motion for reconsideration did not toll the time for filing the Committee's motion for reconsideration. Both motions, to be timely, had to be filed within 10 days of entry of the February 14, 2007 judgment. See Wages v. IRS, 915 F.2d 1230, 1233 n. 3 (9th Cir.1990) (successive Rule 59 motions generally do not affect the finality of the judgment), cert denied, 498 U.S. 1096 (1991).

In this regard, Debtor's reliance on Fadayiro v. Ameriquest Mortg. Co., 371 F.3d 920, 922 (7th Cir. 2004), and In re Dudley, 249 F.3d 1170, 1174 (9th Cir. 2001), see Br. for Appellants at 12, 15, is misplaced. These cases suggest that nothing in Rule 8001(a) requires that "strict and literal compliance with the rule and the forms should be deemed jurisdictional in the sense that a failure to comply,

[5] Indeed, it is not even clear that the Debtor or the Locricchios would have had standing to appeal the March 7 order, which disposes of a motion filed not by them but by another party. Because bankruptcy cases "generally affect the rights of many," an appellant must demonstrate not only an "injury in fact," in the Article III sense; "[t]he appellant [also] must be a 'person aggrieved' by the bankruptcy court's order." Duckor Spradling & Metzger v. Baum Trust (In re P.R.T.C.), 177 F.3d 774, 777 (9th Cir.1999). A person is "aggrieved" if the bankruptcy court's order diminishes his property, increases his burdens, or detrimentally affects his rights. Ibid. The March 7 order, which simply denies the Creditors' Committee the same relief already denied the Debtor and the Locricchios, did not diminish the Debtor's or Locricchios' property, increase their burdens, or detrimentally affect their rights, particularly when they had an independent right to appeal their own order.

however innocuous, spells doom for the appeal." Fadayiro, 249 F.3d at 922. Thus, this Court held that, although debtors had listed only the bankruptcy court's order denying their motion for reconsideration in their notice of appeal, the district court also had jurisdiction to consider the underlying order denying their exemption claim as well, since the debtors had listed the names of all parties to the order appealed from in their notice of appeal and the district court had considered the merits of the underlying order along with the denial of the reconsideration motion. See Dudley, 249 F.3d at 1173-74. Under these circumstances, the Court held, "Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8001(a) does not require that a notice of appeal to the district court designate the order appealed from." Id. at 1174. The Court's holding, however, relies primarily on the fact that,

> [u]nlike Rule 3(c) [of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure], Rule 8001(a) does not require that notices of appeal to the district court "designate the judgment, order or part thereof appealed from." Rather, the bankruptcy rule requires only that a notice "contain the names of all parties to the judgment, order, or decree appealed from."

United States v. Arkison (In re Cascade Roads, Inc.), 34 F.3d 756, 761 (9th Cir. 1994) (cited in Dudley, 249 F.3d at 1174).

This case, as the district court noted (ER Vol. I at 24), differs from, Dudley and Fadayiro in many respects. First, while it would be fair to assume that the Debtor and the Locricchios intended to appeal both from the March 5, 2007 orders denying reconsideration and the underlying orders dismissing the case and denying recusal, see Dudley, 249 F.3d at 1173, no such assumption can be made with regard to the Debtor's and the Locricchios' intent to appeal the bankruptcy court's March 7, 2007 order. The latter order responded to a motion filed solely by the Creditors' Committee, not to any motion filed by the Debtor or the Locricchios.

As the district court also observed, "unlike the In re Dudley case . . . Debtors are not trying to incorporate the orders underlying their motions for reconsideration and/or for rehearing which they designated in the Notice. Other than the various underlying motions having been heard on the same day in January, Debtors provide no explanation of how the Creditors Committee Order is related or 'interlocked' with the three orders they designated in their appeal." ER Vol. I at 25.

More important, unlike the debtors in Dudley and Arkison, the Debtor and the Locricchios did not name the principal party to the March 7, 2007 order – the Creditors' Committee – in their notice of appeal. As the district court held, "[t]his mistake is fatal to Debtors' appeal, because naming all parties to the order appealed from is a clear requirement of Rule 8001." ER Vol. I at 24. See Dudley, 249 F.3d at 1174 ("The trustee does not contend that the Dudleys failed to list the names of all of the parties to the order appealed from in their notice of appeal to the district court.");

Arkison, 34 F.3d at 761 (Rule 8001(a) "requires . . . that a notice [of appeal] 'contain the names of all parties to the judgment, order, or decree appealed from'"). Cf. Fadayiro, 371 F.3d at 923 ("All the information required by Rule 8001(a) was in fact supplied by the appellant . . . .").

The argument (Br. for Appellants at 15), that the failure to list the Creditors' Committee or the Creditors' Committee order in the notice of appeal was "innocuous" since "the Creditors' Committee did in fact receive the Notice of Appeal," is unavailing. The court in Fadayiro explained the importance of naming all the parties to an appeal:

> A bankruptcy will often spawn multiple subproceedings. Whereas in normal civil litigation it can be safely assumed that everyone who is not an appellant must be an appellee, that is not a safe assumption in bankruptcy. Many parties will be bystanders to a particular adversary proceeding, or other subproceedings, that has given rise to the appeal. It is therefore important that the notice of appeal name the appellees.

371 F.3d at 922. As the district court in this case noted, "[w]ithout either designating the Creditors Committee Order, the date of the order, or listing the Creditors Committee as a party, this Court, nor the other parties involved have any notice that the order is on appeal or that the Notice was timely filed." ER Vol. I at 24.

D. The Bankruptcy Court's Failure To Provide A Receptacle For After-Hours Filing Did Not Curtail The Debtor's Right To Appeal.

The Debtor argues that it was unable to file its notice of appeal on March 15, 2007, the day the notice of appeal was due, because the courthouse had no drop box or other mechanism for accepting a filing after the court's normal business hours. Therefore, the Debtor claims, it had no choice but to file the notice of appeal on the following day. See Br. for Appellants at 10-11, 16-17.

Barbara Locricchio stated in her declaration that when she attempted to file three notices of appeal on March 15, 2007, the bankruptcy clerk informed her that it would be more efficient to file one notice of appeal for all the orders to avoid paying the same filing fee three times. ER Vol. II at 4-5. Mrs. Locricchio decided to take the three notices of appeal back and she and Mr. DeWaele then consolidated the appeal issues in one notice of appeal. Mrs. Locricchio declared, however, that she could not file the new notice that same day "because, unlike the U.S. District Court, the Bankruptcy court does not have an after hours filing receptacle which would have time stamped the document." Ibid. See also Declar. of Richard C. DeWaele (ER Vol. II at 8-9).

Although neither Mrs. Locricchio nor Mr. DeWaele declared that he or she "presented the combined Notice for filing later that same day, only to discover that the office was closed," ER Vol. I at 13, the Debtor claims that the court's failure to provide an after-hours filing procedure "was essentially a denial of access to the courts" in violation of 28 U.S.C. § 452, which provides that "[a]ll courts shall be deemed always open for the purpose of filing proper papers, issuing and returning process, and making motions and orders," and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 5001, to the same effect. Br. for Appellants at 16.

1. As a preliminary matter, this argument has been waived. As the district court noted, the Debtor and the Locricchios failed to raise the argument in their opposition to the Trustee's motion to dismiss and "provide no explanation for failing to raise this argument in their opposition . . . ." ER Vol. I at 13.[6] Rather, after the

[6] The only reference to Barbara Locricchio's attempt to file notices of appeal on March 15, 2007, in the Debtors' Opposition to the Motion to Dismiss Appeal was the following:

> 10) For information of this Court only as it references Appellants conduct with regard to the notice, on March 15, 2007 (ten (10) days after the March 5th Orders had been entered by Judge Farris, Appellants prepared and sought to file multiple Notices of Appeal with the Federal District Bankruptcy Court only to learn that additional Orders related to the Notices of Appeal had been subsequently received in the ordinary mail.
> 11) The multiple notice of Appeals were then combined into one overall Notice of Appeal that was then filed nine (9) days after the Final Order entered by the Court on March 7, 2007. The Notice of Appeal was filed district court granted the motion to dismiss, the Debtors raised the issue for the first time in their motion for rehearing. As this Court has held, "[f]ailure to raise an issue on appeal results in waiver of that issue." Mendoza v. Block, 27 F.3d 1357, 1363 (9th Cir. 1994). See also Preblich v. Battley, 181 F.3d 1048, 1056 (9th Cir.1999) ("We generally refuse to consider issues raised for the first time in a petition for rehearing."); Alexopulos v. Riles, 784 F.2d 1408, 1411 (9th Cir. 1986) (holding that plaintiff's tolling argument was waived for failure to raise the issue in opposition to summary judgment even though the general statute of limitations issue had been briefed). For this reason, the district court correctly held that the Debtor and the Locricchios had waived their "access to the courts" argument, and this Court may affirm on this basis without reaching the merits of the argument.

2. If the Court does reach the merits, however, the district court correctly ruled that the bankruptcy court's failure to have a "night depository box" for after-

Supplemental ER Vol. II at 87-88. No argument was made that the Debtor believed the filing date had been preserved or that the late filing of the notice of appeal on March 16, 2007, should be excused because the bankruptcy court failed to provide an after-hours receptacle for the filing of documents outside of normal business hours. The Argument section focused solely on the timeliness of the notice of appeal filed on March 16, 2007, in light of the fact that the final order issued by the bankruptcy court was entered on March 7, 2007.

hours filings did not excuse the late filing of the notice of appeal in this case. The Debtor suggests that the language in 28 U.S.C. § 452 and in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 5001 that the federal bankruptcy courts shall be deemed "always open" for filing purposes means that the bankruptcy court was required "to provide an after hours filing procedure," and that the court's failure to do so "was essentially a denial of access to the courts . . . ." The Debtor is mistaken.

Before 1948, when the lower federal courts sat in terms, judgments of the court remained under its control only during the term. See Hill v. Hawes, 320 U.S. 520, 524 (1944); Bronson v. Schulten, 104 U.S. 410, 415 (1881). Revisions to the Judicial Code in 1948 ended the significance of terms of court; the federal courts are now "always open," and the expiration of a term or session "in no way affects the power of the court to do any act or take any proceeding." 28 U.S.C. § 452. See Northern Calif. Power Agency v. NRC, 393 F.3d 223, 224 (D.C. Cir. 2004).

As the First Circuit has held, however, the requirement that the courts shall be deemed "always open" for purposes of filing papers "has been interpreted uniformly to mean that the clerk's office need not be kept open around the clock." McIntosh v. Antonino, 71 F.3d 29, 35 (1st Cir. 1995) (citing Greenwood v. State of N.Y. Office of Mental Health, 842 F.2d 636, 639 (2d Cir. 1988); Casalduc v. Diaz, 117 F.2d 915, 916 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 314 U.S. 639 (1941); and 12 Charles A. Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3081, at 179 (1990)). As part of their general rulemaking authority, courts may set business hours and other conditions, as they deem necessary and reasonable, for the filing of papers. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 83. This rulemaking authority also applies to bankruptcy courts. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9029.

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Hawaii has established that its business hours shall be from 8:30 a.m. to 4:00 p.m.[7] Local Bankruptcy Rule 5005 sets forth the general requirements for filing papers with the court. Local Rule 5005-1(a) specifically provides that "[d]ocuments shall be filed with the clerk of the Bankruptcy Court." Local Rule 5005, however, does not provide a mechanism for after-hours filing. These rules appear to be well within the bankruptcy court's authority and reasonably related to the efficient operation of the court. See In re Bradshaw, 283 B.R. 814, 817-18 (1st Cir. B.A.P. 2002) (holding that local bankruptcy rules providing that all filings, including facsimile filings, had to be received in the office of the clerk between the hours of 8:30 a.m. and 4:30 p.m., or be deemed received on the following day, appeared to be within the court's general rulemaking authority).

[7] See http://www.hib.uscourts.gov/courtinfo/location_menu.htm#.

While some clerks' offices have established so-called "night depositories" to accommodate after-hours filings, they are not mandatory. See McIntosh, 71 F.3d at 35 & n.5. In the absence of a night depository, papers can validly be filed after hours, but only by in-hand delivery to the clerk or other proper official. See id. at 35 ("[T]he word 'filing' as used [in Fed. R. Civ. P. 77(a), whose language is substantially identical to 28 U.S.C. § 452,] is a word of art. It 'means delivery into the actual custody of the proper officer.'") (quoting Casalduc, 117 F.2d at 916); see ibid. ("[O]utside of ordinary business hours, merely leaving papers in a closed or vacant office does not constitute 'filing' sufficient for commencement of an action.").

As explained, the declarations of Richard DeWaele and Barbara Locricchio state that Barbara Locricchio initially went to the clerk's office on March 15, 2007, with three separate notices of appeal. When the clerk suggested that it might be more efficient to file one notice of appeal to avoid paying the same filing fee three times, Mrs. Locricchio took back the three notices so that they could be consolidated in one appeal. ER Vol. II at 4-5; 8-9. Although the declarations then assert that "the consolidated Notice of Appeal could not be filed that day because . . . the Bankruptcy court does not have an after hours filing receptacle which would have time stamped the document," id. at 5, 9, the declarations "do[] not state that Debtors presented the combined Notice for filing later that same day, only to discover that the office was closed. Instead, the declaration[s] read[] that the notice was filed the next day." For these reasons, the district court concluded, "it is unclear whether Debtors even made a second attempt to file the Appeal on the deadline." ER Vol. I at 13.

In any event, it was the Debtor's responsibility, along with its counsel, to make sure that the notice of appeal was timely filed. Knowing that the courthouse closed for business at 4:00 p.m., and that the court had no night deposit box for late filings, both the Debtor and counsel should have taken care to file the notice of appeal before the official close of business, or to make arrangements with the clerk's office for an after-hours filing. Local restrictions on the time and manner of filing must be observed. See In re Bradshaw, 283 B.R. at 818.

In this regard, the bankruptcy court clerk's suggestion of a way to save filing fees did not extend the time period in which to file the notice of appeal; nor did the Debtor or the Locricchios seek or obtain a court order extending the time to file the notice. Therefore, there is no basis for their belief that "the filing date had been preserved." ER Vol. II at 5, 8-9.

3. The Debtor's and the Locricchio's reliance on In re Warren, 20 B.R. 900 (Bankr. 1982), see Br. for Appellants at 16, also is unavailing. In that case, by order of the court, September 23, 1981, had been set as the last day for filing a complaint to object to the discharge of debts in a bankruptcy proceeding. The plaintiff filed his complaint on September 23, 1981, at 5:55 p. m. The defendant objected to the complaint as untimely, arguing that the complaint had to be filed by the court's official close of business at 5:00 p.m. on September 23. The bankruptcy court rejected the argument, ruling that, "[b]ecause plaintiff's complaint was, in fact, filed on September 23rd (the last day for filing complaints to dischargeability of debts), it was timely filed." 900 B.R. at 902. Warren is inapposite because, unlike the debtor in that case, the Debtor here did not file its notice of appeal after hours on the day it was due, but on the following day.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should affirm the district court's dismissal of the appeal as untimely.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Middle District of Tennessee had jurisdiction over the debtors' bankruptcy case under 28 U.S.C. 157(a) and (b), and 1334(a). The bankruptcy court overruled the chapter 13 trustee's objection to confirmation by order entered January 31, 2008. [Dkt. 48 (Memorandum Opinion), Dkt. 53(Order Confirming chapter 13 Plan)]. The chapter 13 trustee timely filed a notice of appeal with the bankruptcy court. [Dkt. 56]. Under 28 U.S.C. 158(a)(1) and (b)(1), this Court has jurisdiction over this appeal.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The United States Trustee submits this brief as amicus curiae supporting reversal of the Bankruptcy Court's order. Cf., Fed. R. App. P. 29(a) (amicus participation). The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977). The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. 307. See Thompson v. Greenwood, 507 F.3d 416, 420 n.3 (6th Cir. 2007); In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990).

This case involves a dispute over confirmation of a plan under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. The United States Trustee is authorized, among other things, to "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in chapter 13 cases, monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such chapter 13 plans in connection with a plan confirmation hearing under section 1324 of the Code. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

In 2007, more than 310,000 persons filed bankruptcy petitions under chapter 13.[1] In chapter 13 cases, with so-called above-median debtors,[2] the question of statutory interpretation presented in this case has occurred frequently and is continuing to occur

In this brief, the United States Trustee respectfully offers this Court his views on the correct interpretation of section 1325(b). See 28 U.S.C. 517 (authorizing Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States").

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews the bankruptcy court's findings of fact under the clearly erroneous standard but reviews de novo the bankruptcy court's conclusions of law. In re Isaacman, 26 F3d. 629, 631(6th Cir. 1994) (Citing In re Zick, 931 F.2d 1124, 1126 (6th Cir.1991)). The question of statutory interpretation of the phrase "projected disposable income" presented in this case is an issue of law and subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the Bankruptcy Court erred in holding that the debtors' projected disposable income under section 1325(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code is determined by multiplying the debtors' disposable income, as defined in section 1325(b)(2), by the number of months in the chapter 13 plan, with no other adjustments.

[2] An above-median debtor is the name often used in referring to a debtor whose current monthly income under 11 U.S.C. 101(10A), multiplied by 12, is above the annual median income in the state of a family of comparable size. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statutory Framework.

In 2005, Congress passed and the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005).

One of the innovations of the 2005 amendments was means-testing. In section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code, which addresses dismissal of abusive chapter 7 petitions, Congress established special rules for debtors whose current monthly income, reduced by certain permitted expenses, exceeded a statutorily prescribed amount. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2). This amendment changed the way these expenses are computed; some are no longer the debtor's actual and reasonable expenses but instead are standard expenses under the National Standards and Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the debtor's area of residence. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii).

Congress also applied means-testing to chapter 13 cases, in which the debtor seeks not to liquidate his debts, as in chapter 7, but rather to establish a plan for repaying all or part of those debts. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Before the 2005 amendments were enacted, section 1325, governing confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, required such a plan to provide that all of the debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period would be used to repay debts. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B) (2000 ed.). Disposable income was calculated from the debtor's actual income and expenses set forth on Schedules I and J, which the debtor was required to file. See In re Austin, 299 B.R.482, 487 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2003)(in context of chapter 7 section 707(b) motion, calculating debtor's disposable income for ability to fund a chapter 13 plan); In re Breeden, 304 B.R. 318, 319 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2003)(confirmed plan provides payment of disposable income as calculated by Schedules I and J).

But section 1325 was amended in 2005 to change the definition of "disposable income." The new section 1325(b)(2) defines "disposable income" to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2).[3] This definition incorporates two changes: first, it defines "disposable income" based on an average of past monthly income and expense figures; and second, for debtors with higher income levels, it requires the use of the same standard expenses mandated for certain debtors under section 707(b)(2). Specifically, section 1325(b)(3) now directs that reasonable expenses be determined "in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2)" for those chapter 13 debtors whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is greater than the median family income for a family of the corresponding size. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Chapter 13 debtors in this class are typically referred to as "above-median" debtors. To be clear, an above-median debtor is not one whose income places him in the top half of all debtors; it is one whose income places him in the top half of families of his size in his state of residence.

Under current bankruptcy rules, such a debtor must file a Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22C,[4] setting forth the debtor's income and expense amounts taken from the IRS standards. Because a debtor must also file the traditional Schedules I and J setting forth actual income and expenses, it often becomes apparent there is a significant difference between the above-median debtor's disposable income under Schedules I and J and his disposable income under Form 22C. In some cases, the use of Form 22C captures a temporary increase in the debtor's disposable income that does not continue into the plan period, but in other cases, like the present case, the use of Form 22C actually results in a lower amount of disposable income. In this and other cases, it may become clear that the historical circumstances that produced a particular income figure will change prospectively.

B. Facts.

The debtors, Shawn Petro and Clara Petro, filed a chapter 13 petition on September 12, 2007. Accompanying their petition were two different sets of forms disclosing income and expenses and computing those figures in different ways. The first set of forms, the traditional Schedules I and J,[5] showed a total monthly income of $9,720, less payroll deductions of $1,828.67 and total monthly expenses of $1,772.97, for a monthly net income of $1386.33. [Dkt. 1]. The second form, Form 22C,[6] which is a new form developed for use after the enactment of the BAPCPA, showed the debtors' statutorily defined "current monthly income" to be $6,786.67 ($81,440.04 annually), which

[5] A chapter 13 petition must be accompanied by a variety of schedules to illustrate the debtor's financial situation. Schedule I (Current Income of Individual Debtor(s)) requires the debtor to compute net monthly take home pay, along with additional sources of income. Schedule J (Current Expenditures of Individual Debtor(s)) requires the debtor to set forth estimates of the average monthly expenses of the debtor and his family. At the bottom of Schedule J, the total monthly expenses are deducted from the total income figure from Schedule I.

[6] Form 22C is a new form developed after the enactment of the 2005 Act. Entitled "Statement of Current Monthly Income and Calculation of Commitment Period and Disposable Income," this form provides for the computation of the debtor's income and expenses pursuant to the definitions and rules found in BAPCPA. As we will explain, those definitions and rules are different from those that are found in Schedules I and J.

after computing deductions claimed[7] under BAPCPA, showed monthly disposable income of <$670.66>. [Dkt. 5 at 5].

The income discrepancy is the result of debtor Clara Petro obtaining employment in July 2007. [Dkt. 1, Schedule I ("Joint Debtor's CMI and Schedule I income differ because she has only been working since July 2007")]. Schedule I included her actual $4,000 monthly income, while her Form 22C current monthly income was calculated at only $1,066.77, based on the average of Ms. Petro's income in the six months preceding bankruptcy (during four and one-half months of which Ms. Petro was unemployed).

The debtors filed a chapter 13 plan that called for total monthly payments of $1,439.75, with approximately $322 per month, or $19,000 total, to be paid to unsecured creditors over the life of the plan. [Dkt. 2]. Unsecured creditors stand to receive approximately 23% on account of their claims. In re Petro, 381 B.R. 233, 235 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 2008).

The chapter 13 trustee objected to confirmation, arguing that the debtors' plan failed to provide that all of the debtors' projected disposable income would be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan as required by 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). [Dkt. 47]. The chapter 13

[7] Among the expense deductions claimed by debtors is a vehicle ownership expense in the amount of $332 for a vehicle owned free and clear by the debtors. It is the United States Trustee's position that this deduction is applicable only if the debtor has a vehicle loan or lease payment at the time of the bankruptcy filing, and in this case should have been disallowed by the Bankruptcy Court. See, e.g., Babin v. Wilson (In re Wilson), ___ B.R. ___, 2008 WL 681102 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008); Ransom v. MBNA America Bank, N.A. (In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 799, 807-08 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007), appeal filed (No. 08-15066 9th Cir.). However, this issue is waived because it was neither raised nor briefed below, and the United States Trustee shall not address it in this amicus brief.

trustee argued that when the debtors' actual income varies substantially from current monthly income, the court must utilize the actual income figure in calculating current monthly income.[8]

The bankruptcy court overruled the objection of the chapter 13 trustee and found that section 1325(b)(2) and Form 22C "require the application of a strictly mathematical formula in determining 'projected disposable income.'" In re Petro, 381 B.R. at 235. The bankruptcy court concluded that "projected disposable income shall be calculated based upon Congress' mechanical approach of current monthly income as determined by the []22C less the 707(b)(2) expenses for these above-median debtors." In re Petro, 381 B.R. at 242.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The 2005 amendments to section 1325 have created important interpretive questions about the proper way to understand "projected disposable income." As the case law reflects, there are different ways that courts have interpreted and applied that statutory language in light of the amendments. The interpretation adopted below by the bankruptcy court should be reversed, because it fails to take into account all the language in the statute.

The bankruptcy court interpreted the term "projected disposable income" to require use of the historical "disposable income" figure throughout the chapter 13 plan period, regardless of the debtor's actual income and expenses during that period. In this case, the debtors' historical "disposable income" was artificially low because Ms. Petro was only employed for a portion of the statutory look back period. Under the bankruptcy court's interpretation, the debtors' low disposable income figure would be "projected" over the entire plan period, with the result that debtors would be required to make small plan payments while having significant excess disposable income based on Ms. Petro's actual income, her having obtained a job shortly before filing. If this were what the statute actually required, that would be one thing. But the Bankruptcy Court's interpretation does not account for the usual meaning of "projected" income or for the statutory phrases "to be received" and "will be applied to make payments" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Mechanically extending into the future an historical monthly income calculation, which may bear no relationship to actual income that the debtor will receive in the future, will either permit debtors to avoid using income that does exist to repay creditors, as in this case, or attribute to debtors future income that does not exist (when the debtors have a financial change for the worse).

In contrast, the chapter 13 trustee better reads the term "disposable income" as requiring this historical income figure to be projected as an initial matter, subject to adjustment to account for any significant increases or decreases in the debtor's income that are likely in particular cases. Such adjustments may be necessary in individual cases to ensure that the income attributed to debtors in their chapter 13 plan is actually income that is "projected" and "to be received" and that "will be applied to make payments" to unsecured creditors. While a simple multiplication of the initial disposable income number by the relevant number of months is a presumptive starting point, this correct approach allows adjustments to be made in appropriate cases. This interpretation is also consistent with the overall goals of chapter 13.

ARGUMENT

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN HOLDING THAT A DEBTOR'S "PROJECTED DISPOSABLE INCOME" UNDER SECTION 1325(b) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE IS BASED SOLELY ON "DISPOSABLE INCOME" AS CALCULATED BY FORM 22C, WITHOUT REGARD TO ACTUAL DEMONSTRABLE CHANGES IN INCOME

Congress's amendments to section 1325 three years ago have led the bankruptcy courts to take three different approaches to analyzing what "projected disposable income" means in confirming a chapter 13 plan. We discuss each, and explain why the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation is most consistent with the statutory language and the policies of the Bankruptcy Code.

A Section 1325(b): Before and After BAPCPA

The 2005 amendments to section 1325 created a significant change in the law. Before these amendments were enacted, section 1325(b)(1) provided that if the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objected to the confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, the court was not permitted to approve the plan unless it provided that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the three-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B) (2000 ed.). The term "disposable income" was defined as income received by the debtor that was "not reasonably necessary to be expended" for "maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent" or for necessary business expenses if the debtor was engaged in a business. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A) (2000 ed.). Under that former law, a debtor's projected disposable income was calculated simply by subtracting the debtor's expenses on Schedule J from the debtor's income on Schedule I, two forms that a chapter 13 debtor was required to file.

In contrast, under the 2005 amendments, section 1325(b)(1) now provides that when the chapter 13 trustee or an unsecured creditor objects to confirmation, the plan must provide "that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). And now, "disposable income" is defined expressly to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). "Current monthly income" is defined as the "average monthly income from all sources" that the debtor received during the six-month period ending the last calendar month before the debtor filed the chapter 13 petition. 11 U.S.C. 101(10A). It is, in other words, an historical figure representing the monthly average of the period shortly before the petition was filed. An above-median debtor – one whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is above the annual median income in the state of a family of comparable size – calculates these figures on Form 22C.

The minority position taken in a number of bankruptcy court decisions, and by the court below, is that section 1325 requires "projected disposable income" to be computed by taking the historical "disposable income" figure, as defined in section 1325(b)(2), and simply multiplying it by the number of months in the debtor's chapter 13 plan. See, e.g., In re Mancl, 381 B.R. 537, 541 (W.D. Wis. 2008), appeal filed (No. 08-1635 7th Cir.).

Their underlying rationale is that "disposable income" was defined for the first time in the 2005 amendments and is used nowhere else than in the phrase "projected disposable income" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Thus, the argument goes, "projected disposable income," while still undefined in the Code, must mean nothing more than "disposable income" that is projected out through the plan period – in other words, that is multiplied by the number of months in the plan.

Some courts have found this strict mathematical approach to be difficult to rationalize in cases in which the debtor's income or expenses changed significantly from the pre-petition period on which the historical disposable income figure is based. A handful of those courts have determined projected disposable income based solely on the income and expense figures used in Schedules I and J. See, e.g., In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Riggs, 359 B.R. 649, 652-53 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2007).

But most courts read "projected disposable income" in section 1325 as presumptively starting with the historical disposable income figure but allowing significant changes in the debtor's income or expenses to be considered when that figure inaccurately projects the debtor's ability to fund a chapter 13 plan over the life of that plan. See, e.g., In re Pak, 378 B.R. 257 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007); In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007); In re Lanning, 380 B.R. 17 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007), appeal filed (No. 08-3009 10th Cir.); In re Chriss-Price, 376 B.R. 648, 651-52 (Bankr.M.D.Tenn.2006); In re Jass, 340 B.R. 411, 418-19 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006).

B. The Bankruptcy Court's Mechanical Approach To Section 1325(b) Is Flawed.

The Bankruptcy Court found that section 1325 and Form 22C create "a mathematical formula" for determining what must be paid to the unsecured creditors, and that a court cannot stray from this rigid, mechanical test and consider other factors in making this determination. In re Petro, 381 B.R. at 235. While the Code fails to define "projected disposable income", the court nonetheless determined that "projected disposable income" had the same meaning as "disposable income" for above median debtors, with the "the new computation of 'disposable income' [] simply projected out over the time of the applicable commitment period...". In re Petro, 381 B.R. at 240, quoting In re Musselman, 379 B.R. 583, 587 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2007).

This approach to section 1325 is flawed for at least three reasons. First, it is founded upon a contextually incorrect interpretation of the term "projected." See Hibbs v. Winn, 542 U.S. 88, 101 (2004) (statutory words must be construed in context). The use of the term "projected" in the economic and financial context of this statute suggests a forecast or estimate of an expected future financial reality. See The Random House Dict. of the English Lang. 1546 (2d ed. 1987) (defining to "project" as, inter alia, "to set forth or calculate (some future thing); They projected the building costs for the next five years."); Webster's Third New Int'l Dict. 1813 (1993) (defining "projected" as, inter alia, "planned for future execution: contrived, proposed," as "[projected] outlays for new plant and equipment").[9] While the calculation of "projected" financial data may well begin with historical data, it does not necessarily (or even usually) end there, nor does it entail a rigid and inviolable assumption, made by the bankruptcy court, that projected income will be identical with past income even when the available facts demonstrate otherwise. The Bankruptcy Court's mechanical test ignores this context of the statutory language.

Second, the bankruptcy court wholly failed to account for two other important phrases in section 1325(b)(1)(B). For one thing, the statute refers to the income "to be received by the debtor," but the mechanical test fails to address cases in which the historical income required to be used may have no relationship to the actual income "to be received." The court seems to dismisses these cases as merely "impractical results." In re Petro, 381 B.R. at 241. But when one is trying to understand statutory language and the results of an interpretation are impractical, the proper course is to make absolutely certain that one's interpretation takes all the relevant language into account.[10] In this case, by ignoring the textual phrase "to be received" in section 1325(b)(1)(B), when historical income

[9] See also In re Chriss-Price, 376 B.R. 648 (Bankr. M.D.Tenn. 2006)("'Projected' is defined as '[t]o calculate estimate or predict (something in the future) based on present data or trends.'") (citing the American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language (4th ed. 2000)).

[10] It is unnecessary to decide whether the results of the mechanical test are "absurd" or merely "impractical." In re Petro, 381 B.R. at 240. That test not only is not compelled by the statutory language but, as we show here, also fails to take into account other language in the same section.

bears no relationship with actual income "to be received" by the debtor, the bankruptcy court fails to adhere to the statutory language.

Third, the mechanical test ignores this statutory phrase, as well: "will be applied to make payments." If projected disposable income is based strictly on an historical figure, minus expenses, there will be some cases in which income in the plan is only deemed, or hypothetical, and not actually received. In such cases, the deemed or hypothetical income cannot be applied to make payments for the simple reason that it does not exist. Take a fairly typical example, in which the debtor lost her job at about the time she filed a chapter 13 petition. In that case, the debtor's current monthly income, an average of the past six months income, reflects the income from that job, and the debtor's disposable income (the current monthly income less expenses) would not reflect the loss of that job. Projecting that figure forward would require the debtor to apply deemed or hypothetical income that was not actually "received" in the future "to make payments" under the plan. Or else it would deprive the debtor of recourse to chapter 13 simply because she had lost a job at about the time she filed.

These problems with the bankruptcy court's interpretation are more than mere policy issues; they are critical textual flaws. It is well established that courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect." Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (citing United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1992)). Affirmance of the bankruptcy court's decision would require the Court to ignore this statutory maxim.

C. The Chapter 13 Trustee's Interpretation Appropriately Gives Content To All Parts Of The Statute.

This Court should adopt the interpretation of section 1325(b), which not only gives meaning to the new definition of "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2) as an historical number but also treats “projected” disposable income as a future-oriented concept, as required by the language of section 1325(b)(1).

"Projected disposable income" in the current version of the statute will, as a general matter, be based on the newly defined "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2), which in turn will be based on an historical calculation of current monthly income, computed as the average of the six month before the petition was filed. But there are circumstances in which the debtor's financial condition changes significantly from that pre-petition period and that, in such circumstances, it will not be appropriate to use the historical calculation. "Where it is shown that Form B22C disposable income fails accurately to predict a debtor's actual ability to fund a plan, that figure may be subject to modification," albeit in "exception[al]" cases. In re Lanning, 380 B.R. at 25.

This interpretation not only is faithful to the new definition of "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2) as an historical number but also treats "projected" disposable income as a future-oriented concept, as required by the language of section 1325(b)(1). See In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 264-65; In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. at 307-08. The interpretation requires the use of the historical income figure called for in the definition of "disposable income" as a starting point, and it calls for a presumption that the historical figure should be carried forward throughout the term of the plan, absent evidence to the contrary. But in order to take into account the future-orientation of the remaining language of the statute, and to ensure that projected disposable income is, in fact, a projection, it allows that presumption to be rebutted whenever the debtor is likely to experience (or actually has experienced) either a significant increase or a significant decrease in income after the filing of the chapter 13 plan.

The reason for having a starting presumption that the historical disposable income figure should be applied mathematically to derive the projected disposable income is that, while "projected disposable income" is not the same as "disposable income," it is appropriate in construing the former phrase to give effect to the definition of the latter. Section 1325(b)(2) provides a definition "[f]or purposes of this subsection." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). The only time that "disposable income" is used in "this subsection," section 1325(b), other than in the definition itself, is in the term "projected disposable income." Thus, we accept that a court should begin by applying the historical "disposable income" figure as a starting point and by presumptively carrying that figure forward over the plan period.[11]

At the same time, however, this initial presumption that the historical current monthly income will be used must necessarily be rebuttable. "Parties contending that a debtor's Form B22C disposable income figure does not accurately project the debtor's future ability to fund a plan must present documentation similar to that required by section 707(b)(2)(B)(ii) in support of their claim." In re Lanning, 380 B.R. at 25. See also In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 267 ("It makes no sense to interpret 'projected disposable income,' governing debtors' future payments under their chapter 13 plans, as cast in stone by their pre-bankruptcy history, without any opportunity for the trustee, creditors or the debtor to offer rebutting evidence as to changed income circumstances before the effective date of the plan.").

Thus, contrary to the bankruptcy court's interpretation, application of the historical income figure to the plan period is not the end of the matter in all cases. To the contrary, there are situations in which a debtor has or is likely to have significant changes in income after the period in which the historical "current monthly income" is computed, and in order to give full effect to the statutory text those changes must be taken into account in "project[ing]" the debtor's future disposable income.

[11] Congress may well have expected that the historical figure, computed generally with standard rather than actual expenses, would result in a higher disposable-income total for "above-median" debtors and a greater amount designated for repayment to creditors under the debtor's chapter 13 plan. But the fact that this is often not the case does not authorize a court to ignore the statutory definition altogether. Thus, the decisions that ignore Form 22C in determining projected disposable income and base it instead on Schedules I and J in the ordinary case cannot find support in the statutory language. See, e.g., In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Riggs, 359 B.R. 649, 652-53 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2007).

There are two types of exceptional case that section 1325 must be able to address. First, a debtor may suffer a significant loss of income – for example, by losing a job – at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition. Such a debtor would have a relatively high "current monthly income," based on an average of the six months preceding the month in which the petition was filed. Yet if that historical income were simply extended forward for purposes of the chapter 13 plan, it would not reflect the actual income available to the debtor during that future period.

Second, a debtor may be unemployed during the six-month period in which "current monthly income" is calculated but may accept a job at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition. See In re Pak, supra (debtor was unemployed for three years but found a job paying over $100,000 two months before filing his petition). Such a debtor, as in this case, would have an artificially low "disposable income" but might well be able to fund a chapter 13 plan that would repay most or all of his unsecured debt. That would be precisely the situation in this case if the mechanical test were used. To put it in statutory terms, the future disposable income thus computed would not be the debtors' "projected" disposable income (because it would demonstrably not be based on a reliable estimate of future income) nor would it be the disposable income "received" by the debtors during the applicable commitment period. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). In a case like this, therefore, the court must take into account the debtors' significant increase in income in order to apply section 1325(b) faithfully.[12]

[12] We recognize that when the debtor find himself with a significant increase in income, the lower historical figure would actually be received by the debtor and could be applied to pay unsecured creditors. But it would still not be an accurate "project[ion]" of the debtor's disposable income to be "received" during the plan period, and thus the Bankruptcy Court's interpretation is (continued...)

The United States Trustee is the first to admit that the language of section 1325 is not a model of clarity. But while our interpretation is necessarily based on certain inferences from context, it gives effect to all the statutory language far more faithfully than the Bankruptcy Court's interpretation. Almost as important, it better furthers the overall goal of chapter 13.

Chapter 13 focuses on having debtors devote future income to paying their creditors. Indeed, BAPCPA placed additional emphasis on this goal of paying future income to creditors when it added language to section 707(b) permitting a court, with the debtor's consent, to convert an abusive chapter 7 case to chapter 13, as an alternative to dismissal. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). While the bankruptcy court's interpretation does require future income to be used to pay creditors, that future income is measured exclusively by reference to historical income, and in some cases, like this one, bears no relation to the actual income available to the debtor. In contrast, our interpretation permits a court to consider the actual income that can "be applied to make payments" under the plan in those cases in which a different amount of actual income is available to a debtor because of changed circumstances. The use of actual income in such cases is an important measure of fairness, both to the debtor in cases like In re Lanning, 380 B.R. 17 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007), in which the debtor will earn significantly lower income than reflected in the historical calculation, and to creditors in cases such as this and In re Pak, 378 B.R. 257 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007), in which the debtors' actual and anticipated future income is above their historical income.

irreconcilable with the statutory text in these circumstances also. And in any event, section 1325(b) should be interpreted in one uniform way for all above-median debtors, so the rebuttable presumption approach should be applied across the board.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order entered below and remand the case with instructions that the bankruptcy court determine the debtors' projected disposable income in accordance with this Court's opinion.

I. Whether the Bankruptcy Court properly denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2)(B) after finding that Dr. Phillips intentionally concealed a claim pending against an insurance company.

II. Whether the Bankruptcy Court properly denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(4)(A) after finding that Dr. Phillips knowingly and fraudulently made material false oaths on his schedules and at his Section 341 meeting.

B. STATEMENT OF FACTS

I. SUBSTANTIVE HISTORY

A. Dr. Phillips's claim against Standard Insurance Company

In November 2002, Dr. Phillips obtained a Disability Income Insurance policy from Standard Insurance Company. App. 3, P. 2.[1] [2] On March 22, 2008, Dr. Phillips signed, and on March 27, 2008, Standard received Claim No. 00VD7339 ("the Claim") from Dr. Phillips for benefits under the Policy. App. 3, P. 2-3. Standard asked Dr. Phillips to supply additional information before Standard would process the Claim. App. 3, P. 3. Dr. Phillips filed the above-referenced petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code on July 2, 2008 ("the Petition Date"). App. 3, P. 2. Nancy L. James was appointed to serve as the Chapter 7 trustee. Id. On July 31, 2008, Dr. Phillips appeared and testified at a Section 341 meeting of creditors. Id. The Claim remained pending on the Petition Date and on the date of the Section 341 Meeting. App. 3, P. 3. The maximum value of the Claim was $1,116,000 over the life of the policy. App. 20. Dr. Phillips stood to receive $3,000 per month, potentially until

Dr. Phillips was 67 years old. Id.[3]

Both prior and subsequent to the Petition Date and 341 Meeting, Dr. Phillips and Standard were in communication regarding the Claim and Standard's request for more information to support the Claim. Id. In order to process the Claim, Standard requested information regarding Dr. Phillips's physical condition and his medical practice prior to making the Claim. See, e.g., App. 15, 17, 18, and 19. To further the processing, Dr. Phillips and Standard exchanged numerous communications regarding the Policy and the Claim, including the following:

App. 3, P. 3-4. Dr. Phillips received and read each above-listed letter that was addressed to him. App. 3, P. 4. Dr. Phillips authored each above-listed letter that was sent by him. Id. In addition to these written communications, Dr. Phillips had several phone conversations with representatives of Standard. App. 15, 16, and 19. Further, Dr. Phillips hired an attorney to pursue the Claim. App. 15, P. 1-2, and Supp. App. 1, P. 112-114.[4]

B. Dr. Phillips's failure to disclose the Claim

Dr. Phillips did not include the Claim or the Policy on his Schedule B, which was filed on the Petition Date. Id. Dr. Phillips, however, did include other potential claims on his Schedule B. Id. and Supp. App. 2.[5] Dr. Phillips did not include potential payments from Standard on Line 17 of his Schedule I. Supp. App. 3.

At the Section 341 meeting, Dr. Phillips testified that (i) prior to filing, he reviewed his Petition and Schedules, (ii) the Petition and Schedules were true and accurate, and (iii) no changes needed to be made to the Petition and Schedules. Id. Dr. Phillips did not disclose the Claim or the Policy at the Section 341 Meeting. Id. On the same date as the Section 341 Meeting, Dr. Phillips filed an Amended Schedule B ("the First Amended Schedule B"), which did not disclose the existence of the Claim or the Policy. Supp. App. 4. On September 9, 2008, Standard informed Rory Livesey, Ms. James's attorney in this matter, of the existence of the Claim, the Policy, and Standard's denial of the Claim. App. 3, P. 4. On the same date, Mr. Livesey informed Ms. James and the United States Trustee of the information he received from Standard. Id. On September 15, 2008, Standard filed Adv. Pro. No. 08-1232 against Dr. Phillips, which sought a determination by the Court that any debt Dr. Phillips owed to Standard was nondischargeable in Dr. Phillips's bankruptcy proceeding. Id. Two days later, Dr. Phillips filed with the Court his amendment to his Schedule B to disclose the Claim ("the Second Amended Schedule B"). Supp. App. 5. On October 7, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed his amendment to Schedule C to exempt the value of the Claim ("the Amended Schedule C"). Id.

On October 15, 2008, Dr. Phillips appeared and testified at a Rule 2004 exam. Id. At the Rule 2004 exam, Dr. Phillips testified that he did not disclose the Claim and the Policy on his Schedule B or at the Section 341 Meeting because he forgot about the Claim and the Policy. Id. Dr. Phillips repeated this testimony at trial. Supp. App. 1, P. 12. In addition, Dr. Phillips testified at trial that he did not include possible payments from Standard on Schedule I because he "did not think about [the Claim]." Supp. App. 1, P. 19. At trial, the evidence demonstrated that Dr. Phillips's only sources of income on the Petition Date were a Veteran's Administration disability payment of $3,275 per month and gifts from his family. App. 15, P. 1, and Supp. App. 1, P. 20.

C. Dr. Phillips's mental competency

At trial, Dr. Phillips called Dr. Judith Cohen. Supp. App. 1, P. 29-57. Dr. Cohen testified that she first examined Dr. Phillips on November 20, 2008. Supp. App. 1, P. 32. Dr. Cohen testified that, every day between late fall 2007 and November 20, 2008, Dr. Phillips would have the capacity to form intent but his ability to follow through with an act might have been impaired. Supp. App. 1, P. 51-52, 56-57. Dr. Cohen, however, testified that she did not have any direct knowledge of Dr. Phillips's capacity or ability on the Petition Date or on July 31, 2008, the date of the Section 341 meeting. Supp. App. 1, P. 56-57.

In addition to Dr. Cohen's testimony, Dr. Phillips introduced a Psychiatric Discharge Summary, dated April 18, 2008, from the Menninger Clinic ("the Psychiatric Summary"). App. 13. The Psychiatric Summary states the following regarding Dr. Phillips's mental status at discharge:

> Dr. Phillips was appropriately groomed and attired. Attitude and behavior in examination was cooperative. Psychomotor exam was negative for tics or tremors. He was alert and oriented in all spheres, and cognitively intact. His speech was normal in volume, tone, rate, and amount. His mood was "normal." Affect was euthymic and congruent with stated mood. Thought process was logical and goal-directed. Thought content was appropriate. He reported no suicidal or homicidal ideation and expressed no intent or plan to harm himself or others. He reported no auditory or visual hallucinations and did not appear to be responding to internal or unseen stimuli. Attention and concentration intact. Fund of knowledge was above average. Insight was fair. Judgment was intact. Abstract thinking was intact.

App. 13, P. 3.

To rebut Dr. Phillips's assertion that he was not mentally capable of forming the intent to defraud his creditors, the United States Trustee introduced documentary and testimonial evidence. Ms. James testified that she had been a Chapter 7 trustee for over twenty-four years and had administered approximately 16,000 cases. Supp. App. 1, P. 11-12. Ms. James testified that she conducted the Section 341 Meeting and had no reason to believe that Dr. Phillips was mentally incompetent. Supp. App. 1, P. 100-01. Further, Ms. James testified that she attended the Rule 2004 Exam and that she had no reason to believe that Dr. Phillips was mentally incompetent. Supp. App. 1, P. 101-02.

The United States Trustee also called Jeffrey Wells to rebut Dr. Cohen's testimony. Supp. App. 1, P. 115. Mr. Wells has been a bankruptcy attorney since 1985. He represented Dr. Phillips's medical practice in a bankruptcy case which he filed on October 18, 2008. Supp. App. 1, P. 115-16. Mr. Wells testified that he met with Dr. Phillips two or three times between August and October 2008. Supp. App. 1, P. 116-17. Mr. Wells testified that he had no reason to believe that Dr. Phillips was mentally incompetent. Supp. App. 1, P. 118.

Dr. Phillips testified extensively regarding his litigation activities[6] in the months between the Petition Date and November 20, 2008, which was the date Dr. Phillips first met with Dr. Cohen. During this time, Dr. Phillips pursued unemployment benefits from the State of Washington. Supp.

[6] Dr. Phillips, in addition to having a medical degree, has a juris doctorate and, at the time of trial, was more than half way through obtaining his master's degree in business administration. App. 5, P. 2.

App. 1, P. 87. The State of Washington initially denied that claim. Id. On September 4, 2008, Dr. Phillips appeared and argued his case. Supp. App. 6. Dr. Phillips's argument included well-crafted objections and citations to relevant authority. Supp. App. 6, P. 181-82. On September 5, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed an objection to this denial, complete with case law and argument. Supp. App. 7. On October 7, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed a petition for review of the denial of his claim with the Employment Security Commission. Supp. App. 8. Dr. Phillips's petition included numerous assignments of error and citations of authority. Id. On November 3, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed a separate petition with review with the King County Superior Court. Supp. App. 9. On November12, 2008, Dr. Phillips again argued the issue before the Employment Security Commission. Supp. App. 10. Due to Dr. Phillips's efforts, the Employment Security Commission overturned their initial denial of his claim. Supp. App. 1, P. 95.

In addition to successfully representing himself in obtaining unemployment benefits, Dr. Phillips successfully represented himself in matters before the Bankruptcy Court. FIA Card Services filed an adversary proceeding to determine the dischargeability of a debt against Dr. Phillips. Supp. App. 1, P. 96. Dr. Phillips represented himself in this proceeding. Id. On October 29, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed a four-page answer to the Complaint which included affirmative defenses and a request for a jury trial. Sup. App. 11. Also on October 29, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed a thirteen-page motion to dismiss the adversary proceeding, replete with extensive legal research and multiple exhibits. Supp. App. 12. In response to Dr. Phillips's motion to dismiss, the plaintiff in that proceeding agreed to dismissal of the action with prejudice. Supp. App. 1, P. 96-97.

In addition to FIA Card Services, Prairie Eye Center filed an adversary proceeding against Dr. Phillips. Supp. App. 1, P. 97. Dr. Phillips represented himself in this proceeding. Id. On October 28, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed a twelve-page answer and counterclaim to Prairie Eye Center's complaint which included affirmative defenses and a request for jury trial. Supp. App. 13. Also on October 28, 2009, filed a separate twelve-page motion to dismiss the complaint. Supp. App. 14. After arguing the motion to dismiss, Dr. Phillips was successful in having Prairie Eye Center's complaint dismissed by the Bankruptcy Court. Supp. App. 1, P. 97-98.

II. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On December 5, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a Complaint to deny Dr. Phillips's discharge. App. 1. On March 3, 2009, the Bankruptcy Court conducted a trial on the merits of the United States Trustee's Complaint. App. 5, P. 1. On March 18, 2009, the Bankruptcy Court entered a letter ruling that contained the Bankruptcy Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law, and found that Dr. Phillips violated Section 727(a)(2) and (4). App. 5. On March 23, 2009, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order denying Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2)(A), Section 727(a)(2)(B) and Section 727(a)(4)(A). App. 6. On April 1, 2009, Dr. Phillips filed a motion for reconsideration of the Bankruptcy Court's order denying his discharge. App. 7. On April 2, 2009, Dr. Phillips filed a notice of appeal of the Bankruptcy Court's order denying his discharge. App. 10. On April 8, 2009, the Bankruptcy Court denied Dr. Phillips's motion to reconsider, indicating that the notice of appeal had removed the Bankruptcy Court's jurisdiction over the matter. On April 17, 2009, Dr. Phillips filed a motion for the Bankruptcy Court to reconsider its order denying Dr. Phillips's motion for reconsideration and a motion to amend his original motion to reconsider. App. 8. On May 26, 2009, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order granting Dr. Phillips's motion to reconsider and amended the Bankruptcy Court's order denying discharge to provide that Dr. Phillips's discharge was denied pursuant to Section 727(a)(2)(B) and Section 727(a)(4)(A).[7] App. 9, P. 9.

C. SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Bankruptcy Court denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2)(B) and Section 727(a)(4)(A). In order to overturn the Bankruptcy Court's decision, Dr. Phillips must succeed in overturning the Bankruptcy Court's ruling on both Section 727(a)(2) and (a)(4); each ruling independently serves as the basis for denial of Dr. Phillips's discharge. As discussed below, the Bankruptcy Court properly denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2) because Dr. Phillips intentionally concealed his interest in the Claim by omitting such from his Schedule B, [7] The Bankruptcy Court initially also denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2)(A). App. 5, P. 6. The Bankruptcy Court revised its earlier opinion and removed Section 727(a)(2)(A) as grounds for denial of Dr. Phillips's discharge.

Amended Schedule B, and 341 Meeting testimony. The Bankruptcy Court properly denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(4) because Dr. Phillips knowingly and fraudulently made material false oaths on his Schedule B, Amended Schedule B, and at the Section 341 Meeting.

D. STANDARD OF REVIEW

The Bankruptcy Court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error. In re Searles, 317 B.R. 368, 373 (9th Cir. BAP 2004). The Bankruptcy Court's finding of intent to defraud is a finding of fact. In re Adeeb, 787 F.2d 1339, 1342 (9th Cir. 1986). Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court's finding of intent is reviewed for clear error. Id. The Bankruptcy Court's conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. Searles, 317 B.R. at 373.

E. ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT PROPERLY DENIED DR. PHILLIPS'S DISCHARGE PURSUANT TO SECTION 727(A)(2)(B) BECAUSE DR. PHILLIPS INTENTIONALLY CONCEALED THE CLAIM AND POLICY WITH THE INTENT TO HINDER, DELAY, OR DEFRAUD HIS CREDITORS.

Section 727(a)(2) provides that a debtor's discharge may be denied if > the debtor, with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor or an officer of the estate charged with custody of property under this title, has transferred, removed, destroyed, mutilated, or concealed, or has permitted to be transferred, removed, destroyed, mutilated, or concealed--

> ...
> (B) property of the estate, after the date of the filing of the petition;

11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2). It is undisputed that Dr. Phillips did not disclose the Claim or the Policy on his Schedule B or on his First Amended Schedule B. It is undisputed that, when asked at the Section 341 Meeting, Dr. Phillips testified that (i) prior to filing, he reviewed his Petition and Schedules; (ii) the Petition and Schedules were true and accurate; and (iii) no changes needed to be made to the Petition and Schedules. At trial, the only disputed issue with respect to Section 727(a)(2) was Dr. Phillips's intent when he concealed this asset. See, e.g., App. 5, P. 2; and Supp. App. 1, P. 120-21, 126.

A. Dr. Phillips intentionally concealed the claim.

To sustain an objection to discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2), the plaintiff must show actual fraud. In re Woodfield, 978 F.2d 516, 518 (9th Cir. 1992). "A debtor's fraudulent intent may be established by circumstantial evidence or by inferences drawn from his or her course of conduct." In re Roberts, 331 B.R. 876, 884 (9th Cir. BAP 2005); In re Wills, 243 B.R. 58, 64 (9th Cir. BAP 1999). "Denial of discharge, however, need not rest on a finding of intent to defraud. Intent to hinder or delay is sufficient." In re Bernard, 96 F.3d 1279, 1281 (9th Cir. 1996) (emphasis in original).

The Bankruptcy Court found that Dr. Phillips intentionally concealed the Claim with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors. The Bankruptcy Court's finding of intent is a finding of fact. Adeeb, 787 F.2d at 1342. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court's finding of intent is reviewed for clear error. Id.

The Bankruptcy Court's finding of intent is well supported by the record. Both at the Rule 2004 Exam and at trial, Dr. Phillips testified that he did not disclose the Claim in his Schedules or in his testimony at the Section 341 Meeting because he forgot about the Claim. The Bankruptcy Court heard this testimony, observed Dr. Phillips's demeanor, and determined that this testimony was not credible. App. 5, P. 4.

The Bankruptcy Court's determination that Dr. Phillips had not forgotten about the policy is based upon an extensive amount of evidence. Dr. Phillips had numerous oral and written communications, both before and after the Petition Date and the Section 341 Meeting, with Standard regarding the Claim. Between February 12, 2008, and July 2, 2008, the evidence at trial showed that Dr. Phillips received and read at least eleven letters from Standard. App. 3, P. 3-4. In addition, Dr. Phillips authored at least one letter to Standard and participated in at least two phone conversations with representatives from Standard. App. 15. In one of those conversations, Dr. Phillips represented to Standard that he had consulted with an attorney who specialized in disability insurance law. Id. After the Petition Date, Dr. Phillips continued to communicate extensively with Standard. App. 4, P. 4. Between July 2, 2008, the Petition Date, and September 17, 2008, the date the Second Amended Schedule B was filed, Dr. Phillips received and read seven letters from Standard. Id. During the same time period, Dr. Phillips authored two letters to Standard. Id. In addition, on August 8, 2008, Dr. Phillips participated in an extensive phone conversation with a representative of Standard. App. 19. During that conversation, Dr. Phillips disputed Standard's authority to request further information regarding the Claim, stated that he had spent weeks and thousands of dollars assembling information to support the Claim, and stated that he "was getting ready to sue" Standard over the claim. Id.

In addition to his activity pursuing the Claim, Dr. Phillips testified at trial that his financial condition was challenging. Dr. Phillips, in addition to being bankrupt, testified that his only income was a government disability payment and gifts from his family. Dr. Phillips further testified that the income from the Claim would be helpful to his financial situation.

Upon completing his investigation in this case, the United States Trustee filed his Complaint alleging that Dr. Phillips fraudulently concealed the Claim. Dr. Phillips's initial defense to this allegation was that he forgot about the Claim. When considering the volume, depth, and timing of communications between Dr. Phillips and Standard, Dr. Phillips's "I forgot" defense is not credible. In re Newell, 321 B.R. 885 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2005) (holding that activity in close proximity to the petition date belies the defense that a debtor forgot). Similarly, Dr. Phillips's retention of an attorney and his "weeks of work" that cost "thousands of dollars" in pursuit of the Claim are equally persuasive. App. 19, P. 1. Further, the income that would be paid as a result of the Claim was crucial to Dr. Phillips considering that, on the Petition Date, he was subsisting on government disability and gifts from family. Finally, Dr. Phillips's Schedule B listed numerous other claims, including many upon which Dr. Phillips had taken no action to prosecute. Taken together, the preponderance of the evidence shows that Dr. Phillips intentionally concealed the Claim. As such, the Bankruptcy Court's finding was not clearly erroneous and should be affirmed.

B. Dr. Phillips was mentally capable of intentionally defrauding his creditors.

In an effort to counter the conclusion that he intentionally concealed the Claim, Dr. Phillips sought to introduce evidence that he was mentally incapable of intentionally defrauding his creditors. To support his allegation, Dr. Phillips introduced two pieces of evidence: the April 18, 2008, Psychiatric Summary from the Menninger Clinic and the testimony of a mental health expert who analyzed Dr. Phillips after the Complaint was filed. To demonstrate Dr. Phillips's mental capacity, the United States Trustee introduced documentary evidence of Dr. Phillips's high level of functioning in complex litigation and testimony from bankruptcy professionals who interacted with Dr. Phillips. The Bankruptcy Court carefully considered Dr. Phillips's contention and, citing overwhelming evidence to the contrary, rejected it.

The evidence cited by Dr. Phillips to further his claim of mental incompetence is not persuasive because the Psychiatric Summary describes an individual in good mental health and Dr. Cohen's opinion is both remote in time and contradicted by Dr. Phillips's actions. The Psychiatric Summary states that Dr. Phillips was appropriately groomed and attired. His attention, concentration, and judgment were intact. Dr. Phillips had a normal mood and affect. The Psychiatric Summary describes someone who, far from being mentally incompetent, was alert, oriented, and whose thought process was logical and goal-oriented. Further, the Psychiatric Summary directly contradicts Dr. Cohen's opinion that Dr. Phillips's executive functions were impaired every day between late fall of 2007 and November 20, 2008.

Dr. Cohen's opinion is further cast into doubt when, as the Bankruptcy Court did, one considers the complex and numerous pieces of litigation in which Dr. Phillips successfully represented himself during the summer and fall of 2008. Dr. Phillips overturned the State of Washington's denial of his unemployment benefits claim. In doing so, Dr. Phillips drafted multiple pleadings and argued the matter at multiple hearings. Supp. App. 1, P. 86-98. Concurrently, Dr. Phillips defended himself successfully in two adversary proceedings before the Bankruptcy Court. Dr. Phillips answered and filed a motion to dismiss the complaint of FIA Card Services. Supp. App. 11 and 12. After reviewing the lengthy and well-drafted motion to dismiss, FIA Card Services consented to dismiss the proceeding with prejudice. Further, on October 28, 2008, Dr. Phillips filed a twelve-page answer and counter-claim to the complaint of Prairie Eye Center. Supp. App. 13. On the same date, Dr. Phillips filed a separate twelve-page motion to dismiss Prairie Eye Center's complaint. Supp. App. 14. Prairie Eye Center, unlike FIA Card Services, did not consent to dismissal of their complaint. However, after argument by Dr. Phillips, the Bankruptcy Court dismissed Prairie Eye Center's complaint. Dr. Phillips's answers and motions to dismiss in these adversary proceedings documents were filed less than three weeks before Dr. Phillips's initial meeting with Dr. Cohen. The number and complexity of these documents directly contradicts Dr. Cohen's testimony that Dr. Phillips's executive functioning was impaired every day between late fall of 2007 and November 20, 2008.

In addition to being contradicted by Dr. Phillips's successful litigation activity, Dr. Cohen's opinion is contradicted by other testimony taken at trial. First, Ms. James testified that she conducted the Section 341 Meeting and was present at the Rule 2004 Exam. Ms. James testified that, on both occasions, she had no reason to believe that Dr. Phillips was incapable of conducting his personal affairs. Further, Ms. James testified that, on both occasions, Dr. Phillips was appropriately dressed, answered the questions that were asked of him, and appeared to understand and follow both proceedings. In addition, Mr. Wells, the attorney hired by Dr. Phillips to handle Seattle Eye Surgeons' bankruptcy proceeding, testified at trial. He met with Dr. Phillips two or three times during the period from early August 2008 to October 18, 2008. Mr. Wells testified that, at each meeting, Dr. Phillips was appropriately dressed, answered the questions Mr. Wells asked, and appeared to understand the purpose of filing the corporate bankruptcy. Mr. Wells testified that he never doubted Dr. Phillips's mental competency.

Taken together, the evidence at trial demonstrates that the Court's finding that Dr. Phillips was mentally capable of intentionally defrauding his creditors was not clearly erroneous. With the exception of Dr. Cohen's testimony, all evidence supports the Bankruptcy Court's finding. The Psychiatric Summary describes Dr. Phillips as logical and goal-oriented. The Bankruptcy Court heard two bankruptcy professionals with more than forty-five years of combined experience testify that Dr. Phillips fully participated in multiple bankruptcy proceedings, answered the questions asked of him in appropriate manner, and otherwise gave no appearance of being unfit to handle his affairs. The documentary evidence shows Dr. Phillips successfully representing himself in multiple pieces of complex litigation. After hearing the testimony at trial and considering the documents in evidence, the Bankruptcy Court determined that the evidence demonstrated that Dr. Phillips had the mental capacity to defraud his creditors. That finding, far from being clearly erroneous, is well supported by the evidence in the record and should be affirmed.

C. Dr. Phillips was required to schedule the Claim and Policy.

Dr. Phillips argues that the Claim and the Policy are not property of the estate because Ms. James did not assume the Policy as an executory contract. Whether the Policy is an executory contract has no bearing on the resolution of this case, however. As this Court has stated, "[t]he parties debate whether an executory contract is property of the estate as if that question is relevant to the preparation of schedules and to whether the [executory contract] was required to be scheduled. It is not relevant to either . . . ." In re JZ L.L.C., 371 B.R. 412, 416 (9th Cir. BAP 2007). Rather, the issue is whether Dr. Phillips's failure to list the Claim and Policy on his Schedules justifies denial of his discharge. Id. (stating an executory contract "still must be scheduled," regardless of "whether and when" it becomes property of the estate). Dr. Phillips's argument overlooks the fact that an executory contract must be listed on Schedule G. Dr. Phillips, despite listing a lease on Schedule G, did not disclose the Claim or the Policy on Schedule G. Supp. App. 3. Therefore, Dr. Phillips's failure to include them on Schedule G constitutes concealment of property of the estate and violates Section 727(a)(2)(B).

In addition, Dr. Phillips's argument misstates the nature of the Policy. The Policy is not an executory contract. An executory contract requires "performance [that] is due to some extent on both sides." In re Texscan Corp., 976 F.2d 1269, 1272 (9th Cir. 1992). Furthermore, "the obligations of both parties are so far unperformed that the failure of either party to complete performance would constitute a material breach and thus excuse the performance of the other." Id. Case law does not support Dr. Phillips's argument that activity related to filing and adjudicating a claim makes the Policy an executory contract. In re Baird, 567 F.3d 1207, 1212 (10th Cir. 2009); In re Sudbury, 153 B.R. 776, 779 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1993) (citing cases for the rule that an insured's obligation to cooperate does not make an insurance policy an executory contract under the Countryman definition).

Dr. Phillips raises the executory contract argument for the first time on appeal. He did not introduce any evidence to the Bankruptcy Court regarding any obligation either he or Standard had remaining under the Policy. Indeed, the words "executory contact" were neither contained in Dr. Phillips's Trial Brief nor were uttered at trial. App. 4 and Supp. App. 1. In his opening brief to this Court, Dr. Phillips has asserted for the first time that the Policy was an executory contract. As a general rule, this Court does not consider arguments raised for the first time on appeal. Raich v. Gonzales, 500 F.3d 850, 868 (9th Cir. 2007).

To support his new theory, Dr. Phillips points to a Policy Data sheet introduced at trial by the United States Trustee. App. 20. The Policy Data sheet does not outline any obligations of either Standard or Dr. Phillips. The Policy Data sheet does not address whether either party has performed all or none of the obligations that Dr. Phillips asserts remained under the Policy. The document does not address the issue that Dr. Phillips's argument is based upon. Without any evidence to support his argument, Dr. Phillips's late-found assertion that the Policy is an executory contract is without merit.

Even if Dr. Phillips was correct that the Policy is an executory contract, which it is not, it would not provide grounds to avoid denial of discharge under Section 727(a)(2)(B). First, if an executory contract is rejected, the rights that an estate has under the contract remain property of the estate. Section 365(g) provides that, if an executory contract is rejected, such rejection "constitutes a breach of such contract . . . immediately before the date of the filing of the petition." 11 U.S.C. 365. Section 365(g) does not state that the estate's rights under the contract are abandoned. Rather, numerous courts have recognized that the deemed breach under Section 365(g) simply gives the non-debtor party a claim against the estate. See, e.g., In re Columbia Gas Systems, Inc., 50 F.3d 233, 239 (3d Cir. 1995) ("Rejection leaves the nonbankrupt with a claim against the estate just as would a breach in the nonbankruptcy context."). Courts are clear that a contract is not terminated simply because it is rejected. See, e.g., In re Austin Development Co., 19 F.3d 1077, 1083 (5th Cir. 1994); In re Picnic 'N Chicken, Inc., 58 B.R. 523, 530 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1986). In this case, even if the Policy were an executory contract, the estate's purported rejection of the Policy would have no effect on the Bankruptcy Court's denial of Dr. Phillips's discharge. While a deemed breach might have an effect on what legal rights the estate holds under the Policy, it is the estate that holds those rights regardless of any deemed rejection.

Finally, Dr. Phillips's description of the Claim as a contract, executory or otherwise, is incorrect. Dr. Phillips submitted the Claim to Standard on March 22, 2008. Dr. Phillips's rights with regard to the Claim accrued on that date. On July 2, 2008, the estate acquired Dr. Phillips's rights under the Claim. 11 U.S.C. § 541. While future steps may have been acts necessary to determine Dr. Phillips's right to compensation under the Claim, the right itself was established on the date the Claim was made. As such, the Claim was not an executory contract and no assumption was needed.

D. The Bankruptcy Court's findings with respect to Section 727(a)(2) are not clearly erroneous.

The Bankruptcy Court denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2)(B). Many of the facts underlying this ruling were stipulated. The only issue that remained at trial was Dr. Phillips's intent when he concealed the Claim and the Policy in his Schedules and at his Section 341 Meeting. Dr. Phillips has offered several, often-contradictory theories at different times in an effort to counter the allegation of fraudulent intent, including (i) that he forgot about the Claim and the Policy when filling out his Schedules; (ii) that he intentionally omitted the Policy because it had no cash value (App. Brief, P. 3); (iii) that he intentionally omitted the Policy because he intended to return to work (App. Brief, P. 3); (iv) that his schedules and statements were too difficult to fill out correctly (App. Brief, P. 2); and (v) that he was mentally incapable of intentionally defrauding his creditors. At trial, Dr. Phillips introduced evidence to support his allegations that he forgot about the Claim and that he did not have the mental capacity to defraud his creditors. The Bankruptcy Court considered this evidence, heard the testimony, and found that the evidence showed that Dr. Phillips had the ability to and, in fact, did intentionally conceal the Claim and the Policy. The evidence supports the Bankruptcy Court's finding, and, therefore, the Bankruptcy Court's ruling should be affirmed.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT PROPERLY DENIED DR. PHILLIPS'S DISCHARGE PURSUANT TO SECTION 727(A)(4)(A) BECAUSE DR. PHILLIPS KNOWINGLY AND FRAUDULENTLY MADE SEVERAL FALSE OATHS RELATING TO MATERIAL FACTS IN THE CASE.

Section 727(a)(4) provides that a discharge may be denied if "the debtor knowingly and fraudulently, in or in connection with the case- (A) made a false oath or account...." 11 U.S.C. 727(a)(4). To deny a discharge under Section 727(a)(4)(A), a court must find that "(1) the debtor made a false oath in connection with the case; (2) the oath related to a material fact; (3) the oath was made knowingly; and (4) the oath was made fraudulently." Roberts, 331 B.R. at 882; Wills, 243 B.R. at 62.

As discussed below, Dr. Phillips knowingly and fraudulently made false oaths when he signed his Schedules and when he testified at the Section 341 Meeting that his Schedules were complete and accurate. Dr. Phillips's false oaths were material because the oaths related to the Claim, which is an asset of the estate and for which the Trustee was holding approximately $52,000 at the time of trial. Dr. Phillips argues that the Claim was exempt and, therefore, his false oaths are immaterial. Dr. Phillips's argument, however, misstates the nature of exempt property and was properly rejected by the Bankruptcy Court.

A. Dr. Phillips's declaration on his Schedules and his testimony at the Section 341 Meeting were false oaths.

False statements on a debtor's schedules and statements are false oaths under Section 727(a)(4)(A). In re Chalik, 748 F.2d 616, 618 (11th Cir. 1984); Searles, 317 B.R. at 378. A debtor's false oath may involve an affirmatively false statement or an omission from the debtor's statements and schedules. Wills, 243 B.R. at 62. A false oath is complete when made. Searles, 317 B.R. at 377. The parties have stipulated that Dr. Phillips's Schedule B and Section 341 testimony were false. These statements were made under penalty of perjury and constitute false oaths.

B. Dr. Phillips made material false oaths.

Materiality is broadly defined. An omission may be material even if it is not financially prejudicial to creditors, if it aids in understanding the debtor's financial affairs and transactions. Wills, 243 B.R. at 63.

> The purpose of § 727(a)(4) "is to ensure that dependable information is supplied to those interested in the administration of the bankruptcy estate so that they can rely upon it without the need for the trustee or other interested parties to dig out these true facts in examination or investigations;" the opportunity to obtain a fresh start is thus conditioned upon truthful disclosure."

In re Aubrey, 118 B.R. 268, 274 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1990), quoting In re Martin, 88 B.R. 319, 323 (7th Cir. 1983). A false oath is material if the false oath "bears a relationship to the debtor's business transactions or estate, or concerns the discovery of assets, business dealings, or the existence and disposition of the debtor's property." Wills, 243 B.R. at 62.

The Bankruptcy Court's finding that Dr. Phillips's false oaths were material was well supported by the evidence. The oaths concerned concealment of the Claim, which is an asset of the estate. At trial, Ms. James testified that she, serving as Chapter 7 trustee, had been paid approximately $52,000 by Standard on account of the Claim. Ms. James testified that she was being paid an additional $3,000 per month on account of the Claim. Therefore, Dr. Phillips's multiple false oaths regarding the Claim concerned the discovery of assets of the estate and the existence and disposition of Dr. Phillips's property. If undiscovered, Dr. Phillips's false oaths would have caused financial prejudice to the estate.

Dr. Phillips argues that the Claim is exempt, and, therefore, his false oaths regarding the Claim were not material. Dr. Phillips misstates the relationship between exemptions and property of the estate. Under Dr. Phillips's argument, if a debtor determines that an asset is exempt, there is no duty to report such on the debtor's schedules and a debtor cannot fraudulently conceal an asset. In the vast majority of cases in which there are no non-exempt assets, debtors would not be required to schedule any assets. Trustees, creditors, and the courts would have no ability to review the debtor's exemptions. This result is absurd and is incongruous with a bankruptcy system built on open and full disclosure by honest but unfortunate debtors.

Dr. Phillips's argument is rebutted by his own actions. For instance, on his Schedule B, Dr. Phillips listed numerous assets that were fully exempt. Supp. App. 3, P. 137-42. Dr. Phillips's disclosure of these exempt assets does not comport with his current argument. Given the incredible effects that Dr. Phillips's argument would have on the bankruptcy system and the fact that Dr. Phillips's schedules do not comport with his argument, the Bankruptcy Court correctly rejected Dr. Phillips's argument that exempt property need not be listed on a debtor's schedules.

C. Dr. Phillips knowingly made false oaths.

A debtor acts knowingly if "he or she acts deliberately and consciously." Roberts, 331 B.R. at 884. A false statement is made knowingly when made voluntarily and intentionally. In re Leija, 270 B.R. 497, 501 (Bank. E.D. Cal. 2001). As demonstrated by the volume and extent of communication between Dr. Phillips and Standard, he knowingly chose to omit the claim from his Schedules and Section 341 meeting testimony. Dr. Phillips did so because he needed the income that Standard would pay to him on the Claim. His defense that he forgot the Claim is not credible when compared to his active pursuit of it. Dr. Phillips spent weeks of time, thousands of dollars, and engaged attorneys in pursuit of the Claim. App. 15, P. 1-2; App. 19, P. 1; and Supp. App. 1, P. 113-14. He made the decision that he would sue Standard if they denied the Claim. Supp. App. 1, P. 114. Dr. Phillips defense is further weakened by the number of speculative claims that he listed on Schedule B. In contrast to his constant and costly work in pursuit of the Claim, Dr. Phillips had taken no action on most of the others claims. Supp. App. 1, P. 85-86. The evidence admitted at trial supports the Bankruptcy Court's finding of fact that Dr. Phillips's false oaths were made knowingly.

D. Dr. Phillips fraudulently made false oaths.

A false oath is fraudulently made when a debtor gives the oath with the intent and purpose of deceiving creditors. Roberts, 331 B.R. at 884. The objecting party must demonstrate actual intent. Id. Similar to fraudulent intent under Section 727(a)(2), a "debtor's fraudulent intent may be established by circumstantial evidence or by inferences drawn from his or her course of conduct." Id. ("The analysis of what constitutes intent to defraud with respect to Section 727(a)(2) is applicable under Section 727(a)(4)."); see also Wills, 243 B.R. at 64.

As discussed above, the evidence shows that the oaths were made fraudulently as part of Dr. Phillips's efforts to conceal the Claim. The Bankruptcy Court was not clearly erroneous in determining that Dr. Phillips fraudulently made a false oath.

E. The Court's findings with respect to Section 727(a)(4) are not clearly erroneous.

The Bankruptcy Court denied Dr. Phillips's discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(4)(A). The evidence supports the Bankruptcy Court's finding that, when he concealed the Claim and the Policy in his Schedules and in his Section 341 Testimony, Dr. Phillips knowingly and intentionally made material false oaths. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court's ruling should be affirmed.

D. Conclusion

The Bankruptcy Court properly denied Dr. Phillips discharge pursuant to Section 727(a)(2)(B) and (a)(4)(A). After considering the documentary and testimonial evidence, the Bankruptcy Court found that Dr. Phillips fraudulently concealed property of the estate and knowingly and fraudulently gave material false oaths to further his concealment. The evidence supports the Bankruptcy Court's finding of facts. Therefore, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that this Court affirm the Bankruptcy Court's decision.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

This appeal arises out of the United States Trustee's complaint to deny Dr. Phillips's discharge because he failed to disclose his primary asset – a disability insurance claim – on his bankruptcy schedules. Denial of discharge is a core matter that falls under a bankruptcy court's jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1). On March 23, 2009, the bankruptcy court entered an order denying Dr. Phillips's discharge. A denial of discharge affects substantive rights and resolves the debtor's bankruptcy case and is thus a final order subject to appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a); see Law Offices of Nicholas A. Franke, v. Tiffany (In re Lewis), 113 F.3d 1040, 1044 (9th Cir. 1997).

Dr. Phillips filed a motion for reconsideration on April 1, 2009. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to consider his motion under 28 U.S.C. § 157. It ultimately amended its grounds for denying his discharge on May 26, 2009.

Dr. Phillips filed a timely notice of appeal of the bankruptcy court's original order on April 2, 2009 to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit. 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). It was timely because his motion for reconsideration, filed April 1, tolled the deadline to file a notice of appeal. 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b). See also Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(B)(i) (stating that a notice of appeal filed after entry of judgment but before a motion to alter or amend the judgment has been decided becomes effective once the last remaining motion is decided). Therefore, the appellate panel had jurisdiction to review the denial of discharge under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(1).

The bankruptcy appellate panel affirmed the bankruptcy court's order on April 6, 2010. Mr. Phillips filed a timely notice of appeal on April 12, 2010. This Court has jurisdiction to hear this matter under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(1).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

1. Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion when it found that Dr. Phillips violated section 727(a)(2)(B) of title 11 when he failed to list his pending disability claim against an insurance company for $3,000 a month on his bankruptcy schedules or disclose it at his meeting of creditors?
2. Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion when it found that Dr. Phillips violated section 727(a)(4)(A) of title 11 when he filed bankruptcy schedules and testified at his creditors meeting under oath, yet did not reveal his pending disability claim for $3,000 per month against an insurance company?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Statutory Framework

With limited exceptions, debtors who file chapter 7 bankruptcy are eligible to have their pre-bankruptcy unsecured debts discharged. 11 U.S.C. § 524(a).

Provided that they meet the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code, they will generally receive that discharge. 11 U.S.C. § 727(a). A discharge under section 727(a) releases the debtor from liability for debts that arose before the case was filed, with limited exceptions. See 11 U.S.C. § 727(b). Here, Dr. Phillips had 3.9 million dollars in unsecured debts. In exchange, the pre-petition property of chapter 7 debtors, regardless of the character of their interest in that property, becomes property of the bankruptcy estate and is distributed to creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 541; see also Schwab v. Reilly, 130 S.Ct. 2652, 2662-63 (2010) (stating this).

For this bargain to work, debtors must give a full and accurate picture of their financial situation. 11 U.S.C. § 521. Accordingly, if they fail to provide complete information about their financial circumstances, conceal property from the bankruptcy trustee, or fail to testify truthfully about their affairs, they can be denied their discharge. This allows creditors to pursue recovery of unpaid debt outside of bankruptcy. See generally, 11 U.S.C. §727(a). The chapter 7 trustee, a creditor, or the United States Trustee[1] may object to the granting of a discharge on the basis of any of the grounds set forth in section 727. 11 U.S.C. § 727(c)(1).

The Bankruptcy Code outlines twelve situations under which a bankruptcy court may not grant a discharge. 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(1)-(12). Two subsections of section 727 are at issue in this case. First, section 727(a)(2) prohibits discharge if "the debtor, with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor . . . has transferred, removed, destroyed, mutilated, or concealed . . . (B) property of the estate, after the date of the filing of the petition[.]" Second, section 727(a)(4) prohibits discharge to an otherwise qualified debtor who "knowingly and fraudulently, in or in connection with the case – (A) ma[kes] a false oath or account[.]"

A denial of discharge means the independent chapter 7 trustee continues to liquidate the debtor's non-exempt assets for distribution to creditors, but those creditors are free to pursue the debtors after bankruptcy for the unpaid balance. See 11 U.S.C. § 727(b) (regarding effect of discharge). The Bankruptcy Code broadly defines assets of the estate, which generally include "all legal or equitable

Dr. Phillips is an ophthalmologist, specializing in Lasik eye surgery. A. at 21, 204. He also has a law degree. A. at 77. At the time of trial, he had almost completed an MBA as well. Id. Dr. Phillips finished a medical fellowship in Boston in 2004 and then practiced there for three years. A. at 122. He then moved to Seattle and after a few months working at the Lomas Lasik Eye Care Center, he bought the practice in the fall of 2007. Id.

Dr. Phillips's financial difficulties began after patients began complaining that he appeared to be under the effect of narcotics. A. at 122, 129 (Dr. Phillips's trial testimony). Menninger Clinic on March 22, 2008. A. at 123-25, 199. He was discharged approximately a month later at the end of April. A. at 128, 199.

A. Dr. Phillips's Efforts to Regain Financial Stability

At the same time that Dr. Phillips was attempting to regain his medical license by undergoing treatment, he began to make arrangements to maintain his financial well-being in spite of his inability to practice medicine. He pursued a threefold strategy: (1) filing a claim for disability based on a policy he had acquired in 2002 from the Standard Insurance Company; (2) seeking bankruptcy protection; and (3) applying for unemployment assistance.

1. Dr. Phillips's Claim for Disability Benefits from Standard Insurance

In January or early February of 2008, Dr. Phillips informed the Standard Insurance Company, from which he had obtained a disability insurance policy in 2002, that he intended to file a claim. A. at 145; A. at 214 (letter dated February 12, 2008 from Standard acknowledging Dr. Phillips's intent to file a claim); A. at 209. He did not submit the actual application, however, until March 22 – the day he arrived at the Menninger Clinic. A. at 126, 144. He testified he submitted the claim when he was informed that he would not be "be practicing medicine for a long time." A. at 145-46.

The claim could have paid Dr. Phillips as much as $3,000 per month until he was 67 years old, an aggregate potential total of approximately $1.1 million dollars. A. at 209. Dr. Phillips also relied upon two additional sources of income – his veteran's disability benefits and help from his family. A. at 82.

After Dr. Phillips submitted his claim, Standard asked for additional information. Between March 22 and July 2, 2008, when Dr. Phillips filed his chapter 7 petition, he received ten letters from Standard and wrote Standard one in return. A. at 17 (stipulated exhibit list); A. at 41 (bankruptcy appellate panel recitation of facts). Supp. A. at 117-136. In addition, he spoke with Standard representatives three times on the phone, including a detailed initial interview with a Standard claims processor on June 4. A. at 202-206.

Between the time he filed his bankruptcy petition and his meeting of creditors on July 31, Dr. Phillips received two more letters from Standard, including one sent six days before his meeting of creditors. A. at 17. Supp. A. at 140. On August 8, he had a lengthy telephone conversation with a Standard claims processor concerning the company's documentation requirements for his claim. A. at 212-13. During this same period, Dr. Phillips spent additional time collecting the billing data that Standard requested, which he claimed had cost him several thousand dollars and took several weeks to assemble. A. at 212. He also disputed with Standard the propriety of turning over the information, claiming that revealing the information would violate patient privacy. Id. He also received a letter from Standard dated August 1. Supp. A, at 141. In addition, he wrote Standard twice on August 18, once to provide an updated address and again to request another application so that he could submit an additional claim. Supp. A. at 149, 150.

2. Dr. Phillips Seeks a Chapter 7 Discharge of His Three Million Dollars in Unsecured Debt.

At the beginning of March 2008 – shortly before he began therapy at Menninger, but after he contacted Standard Insurance – Dr. Phillips hired a bankruptcy attorney. A at 131, 134-5, 145. At that point he starting working "on the core" of his [bankruptcy] application." A. at 131-32, 145. He continued to work on gathering information until he filed his petition on July 2, 2008. A. at 131; see Supp. A. at 39-103 (Voluntary Petition). He sought discharge of 3.9 million dollars in unsecured non-priority debt. Supp. A. at 58.

It is undisputed that Dr. Phillips did not include his claim for disability benefits, worth up to 1.1 million dollars, on his schedule B, when he filed his petition on July 2, 2008. Supp. A. at 45-48; A. at 21 (bankruptcy court findings of fact); compare A. at 2 (United States Trustee Complaint) with A. at 6 (Dr.

Phillips's admissions in his Answer); see also A. at 79 (Dr. Phillips's testimony); Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 6, Schedule B, #9 (requiring debtor to disclose interests in insurance policies). Dr. Phillips remembered to list claims against other entities, however. These included a claim for libel and slander which he intended to file against two local television stations. A. at 148; Supp. A. at 46-47.

On July 31, 2008, less than a week after he had received a letter from Standard regarding his claim, Supp. A. at 140, Dr. Phillips fully participated at a meeting of creditors required by section 341 of title 11. A. at 162-63. Dr. Phillips answered questions under oath, and he gave no indication that he was not capable of handling his financial affairs. A. at 162 (testimony of chapter 7 trustee). He swore under oath that he had reviewed his petition and schedules, that they were true and accurate, and that no further changes needed to be made. A. at 6 (admissions in Dr. Phillips's Answer); A. at 136, 183.

On the same day as the creditors' meeting, Dr. Phillips submitted an amended schedule B, which also did not list his claim against Standard. Supp. A. at 106.

3. Dr. Phillips's Claim for Unemployment Benefits

Dr. Phillips applied to the State of Washington for unemployment benefits sometime between March 16-22, 2008, approximately the same time that he checked into the Menninger Clinic. A. at 149; Supp. A. at 177. His application was denied and the denial reviewed by the beginning of April 2008. Supp. A. at 173. The Employment Security Department's records show that a letter informing Dr. Phillips of this determination was mailed to him on April 4, 2008. Supp. A. at 179. Dr. Phillips claimed he never received the letter, although he checked his mail "close" to every day at that time. Id. This was the same period he was at the Menninger Clinic, located in Houston, Texas.[3] A. at 25 (Dr. Phillips testimony).

Dr. Phillips continued to pursue his unemployment benefits claim vigorously. Between March and August 2008, he filed weekly claims for benefits. Supp. A. at 180. He repeatedly called the Department of Employment Security between March and August 2008 to determine the status of his application and the reason that he was not receiving funds. Id. On August 7, 2008 he appealed the denial of benefits. Id. On September 4, 2008, he represented himself unsuccessfully in a telephonic hearing to determine if he had filed a timely appeal. A. at 149, 151, 153. Dr. Phillips then sought further review by filing an action in King County Superior Court. A. at 149-50, 155; Supp. A. at 168-169. After writing his own briefs, he represented himself in a second telephonic hearing with an administrative law judge on November 12, 2008. A. at 155-56; Supp. A. at 170-181 (excepts). As a result of his efforts, the earlier adverse decisions were reversed, and Dr. Phillips began receiving unemployment benefits. A. at 157.

B. Dr. Phillips's Standard Disability Claim Comes to Light.

After reviewing his claim, Standard rescinded Dr. Phillips's policy on August 28, 2008 based on alleged false statements Dr. Phillips made when he applied for coverage. Supp. A. at 155-162. It sent Dr. Phillips a check for $8,400 as a refund of his premium payments. A. at 172-73; Supp. A. at 154.

Dr. Phillips testified that he first realized that his claim against Standard was not listed on his Schedule B on August 29, 2008 when he received the check from Standard returning his premium payments. A. at 136. In the course of investigating the reason for the refund, Dr. Phillips testified that he "discovered Standard was not on the schedules." A. at 173. He also testified that he immediately notified his attorney of the omission. A. at 140.

The record contains a redacted e-mail from Dr. Phillips to his personal bankruptcy attorney, William Malaier, dated September 3, 2008. It states "I already informed David of the possibility of receiving income from the disability policy. While I made the claim in March, there is [sic] a waiting period of 90 days. There is also a question as to when the disability would actually start." A. at 202.

Dr. Phillips explained "[i]f, and only if, I win, the MAXIMUM amount I would receive to cover the time I was disabled before filing bankruptcy would be $6,600. This is the amount I asked David to include on the schedules." Id. (emphasis in original). He concluded the e-mail with "I noticed that David has already e-mailed me. I suspect the schedules are attached. I am sure the above information is already in the schedules." Id. The record does not disclose any e-mail from Dr. Phillips noting the schedules did not include the claim or asking his attorneys to amend the schedule to include it.

At the beginning of September, the chapter 7 trustee[4] learned about Dr. Phillips's claim for the first time when Standard notified the trustee's attorney about the claim and its subsequent rescission of Dr. Phillips's policy. A. at 75. On September 15, Standard sued Dr. Phillips and the chapter 7 trustee for a declaratory judgment to enforce rescission of the policy and to declare any obligations that Dr. Phillips might have to Standard to be non-dischargeable. Supp. A. at 182-186 [Bankr. Dkt. # 44.] Standard paid the chapter 7 trustee the disability payments that Dr. Phillips claimed – $3,000 per month – under a reservation of rights from the time the lawsuit was filed until it was settled. A. at [4] A chapter 7 trustee is the fiduciary who administers the debtor's estate for the benefit of creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 704 (listing a trustee's duties).

74. The trustee eventually received $52,000 from Standard, the sole asset in Dr. Phillips's estate. A. at 74-75, 183.

Dr. Phillips amended his schedule B to include his claim against Standard on September 17, 2008 – two days after Standard filed its lawsuit, and nearly three weeks after he testified that he discovered the omission. A. at 140; Supp. A. at 109; [Bankr. Dkt. # 46.] On October 7, Dr. Phillips amended his schedule C to exempt the claim. Supp. A. at 112 [Bankr. Dkt. # 58.]

A complete time-line is available as an Addendum to this brief.

At trial, Dr. Phillips offered three explanations for his failure to disclose his disability claim against Standard.

Initially, he testified that "I simply forgot it." A. at 79, 82. He explained that he did not think about the Standard claim just as "I didn't think about my auto insurance or my health insurance or my pet insurance." A. at 81.

Subsequently, he explained that he had assumed that he had listed the Standard claim on his schedules. A. at 135, 176. He considered his testimony at the meeting of creditors to be true and accurate because he thought that the claim was listed on his schedule B. A. at 136, 141.

In his brief to this Court, Dr. Phillips asserts for the first time, without record citation, that he provided "the Bankruptcy Trustee copies of documents relating to the insurance contract as part of the initial bankruptcy disclosure required of all debtors" but that he did not go through his schedule "line by line" to make sure that the "contract" was listed. Phillips Br. at 7.

He also blamed his withdrawal from methadone and well as the stress due to the litigation and investigations against him stemming from the closure of his medical practice for causing lapses in memory. A. at 132.

C. The Bankruptcy Court Rules Dr. Phillips Should Not Be Allowed to Discharge His Debts.

On December 5, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a complaint to deny Dr. Phillips's discharge under sections 727(a)(2) and (4) of title 11, alleging that he intentionally concealed his claim against Standard and knowingly made false oaths.

After a trial, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Washington denied Dr. Phillips a discharge. A. at 25, 37. It found that Dr. Phillips concealed property of the estate post-petition with the intent to "hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors." Id.; see 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2)(B). The bankruptcy court also found that Dr. Phillips knowingly and fraudulently made false oaths by failing to disclose his claim against Standard. A. at 26. It found that failure to disclose the claim on his schedules and at the creditors' meeting, all instances in which information is given under penalty of perjury, constituted a false oath. A. at

25. The court found the omission was material based on the facts of this case and because it was "doubtless" that failure to disclose "directly concerned the discovery of assets." Id. It concluded that the false oath was knowingly and fraudulent made based on its analysis of the first count under section 727(a)(2)(B).

The bankruptcy court also rejected Dr. Phillips's explanation that he forgot about the Standard claim, finding that unlikely because of his extensive communications with Standard around the same time that he filed his bankruptcy petition. A. at 23. The court also found it "virtually impossible" that Dr. Phillips would forget about his claim given his "dire financial straits" at the time. Id.

The bankruptcy court also rejected Dr. Phillips's defense of mental impairment on two grounds: first, his sophisticated handling of his legal affairs during the time that he failed to disclose his claim; and second, the testimony of the trustee and one of Dr. Phillips's attorneys that he appeared to grasp the bankruptcy process without difficulty. A. at 24. On reconsideration, the court pointed out that the State of Washington's prohibition on Dr. Phillips against performing eye surgery did not demonstrate that he was incapable of forming intent to conceal his disability claim from his creditors. A. at 34.

The bankruptcy court denied Dr. Phillips's discharge on March 23, 2009. It reaffirmed that order on May 26, 2009 when it denied Dr. Phillips's motion for reconsideration. A. at 37. Dr. Phillips then pursued his appeal to the bankruptcy appellate panel of the Ninth Circuit. A. at 29-31 (explaining timing of appeal).

D. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel Upholds the Bankruptcy Court's Ruling that Dr. Phillips Should Not Be Able To Discharge His Debts.

On April 6, 2010, the bankruptcy appellate panel affirmed the bankruptcy court in an unpublished opinion. Phillips v. United States Trustee (In re Phillips), No. 09-1114 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. Apr. 6, 2010), A. at 38-62. Starting with the false oath count, it held that Dr. Phillips's actions in failing to list, or subsequently identify, the claim against Standard on his schedules or at his creditors' meeting was a false oath. A. at 51-52. It also affirmed the bankruptcy court's finding that the omission was material, rejecting Dr. Phillips's argument that the disability payments were exempt and thus it did not matter whether he scheduled them or not. A. at 53.

The bankruptcy appellate panel held on two grounds that the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in concluding that Dr. Phillips acted "knowingly and fraudulently." First, given the extensive communication Dr. Phillips had with Standard around the time he filed his petition, the appellate panel agreed that he could not have "forgot[ten]" about the claim. A. at 56. Second, the evidence that he was successfully defending his interests in multiple lawsuits outweighed his expert's testimony about his possible psychological impairment. A. at 56-57. The panel held that it was "entirely plausible" that Dr. Phillips made false oaths that violated section 727(a)(2)(B) and thus affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision. A. at 58.

Relying on the same facts, especially his testimony at the meeting of creditors, the bankruptcy appellate panel found no clear error regarding the bankruptcy court's determination that Dr. Phillips intentionally concealed his disability claim to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors under section 727(a)(2)(B). A. at 59-60.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In denial of discharge cases, this Court reviews decisions of the bankruptcy appellate panel de novo. Retz v. Samson (In re Retz), 606 F.3d 1189, 1196 (9th Cir. 2010). This Court applies the same standard of review as the panel applied to the bankruptcy court's decision. Boyajian v. New Falls Corp. (In re Boyajian), 564 F.3d 1088, 1090 (9th Cir. 2009). In this case, the bankruptcy appellate panel reviewed the bankruptcy court's conclusions of law de novo and its findings of fact for clear error. Phillips v. United States Trustee (In re Phillips), No. 09-1114, slip op. at 13 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. Apr. 6, 2010) ("Mem. Op."), A. at 50. A court's factual determination is clearly erroneous if it is “illogical, implausible, or without support in the record.” Retz, 606 F.3d at 1196 (citations omitted).

The bankruptcy appellate panel reviewed the bankruptcy court’s finding of fact that Dr. Phillips acted with intent to “hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors” for clear error. Mem. Op. at 13, A. at 50. It similarly reviewed the bankruptcy court’s factual finding that Dr. Phillips “knowingly and fraudulently made a false oath” for clear error. Id. See also Beverly Bank v. Adeeb (In re Adeeb), 787 F.2d 1339, 1342 (9th Cir. 1986) (holding that a debtor’s intent is reviewed for clear error). Therefore, the bankruptcy court’s finding of intent is reviewed for clear error. Id.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying Dr. Phillips’s chapter 7 discharge because Dr. Phillips failed to disclose a disability claim that he was pursuing against Standard Insurance Company that had a potential value of approximately 1.1 million dollars. Dr. Phillips omitted this asset – which turned out to be the sole significant asset in his estate – three times: on his original bankruptcy petition, on his first amended petition, and at his meeting of creditors. This repeated failure to disclose hindered his creditors under section 727(a)(2)(B) of the Bankruptcy Code and provides grounds for denial of discharge. In addition, his failure to disclose constituted a false oath under section 727(a)(4)(A), a separate and independent ground for denying discharge.

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found that Dr. Phillips concealed his disability claim with the intent to “hinder, delay, or defraud” his creditors under section 727(a)(2)(B). It is undisputed that Dr. Phillips concealed his disability claim, meeting the requirement that the debtor conceal an asset.

The second element – intent – is met as well for three reasons. First, Dr. Phillips failed to disclose his disability claim on three separate occasions: on his original schedule, on his amended schedule, and at his meeting of creditors. This pattern of concealment indicates intent.

Second, Dr. Phillips has admitted that he did not disclose his disability claim until after Standard Insurance brought it to the attention of the Trustee. Even after the claim came to light, Dr. Phillips did not take immediate action to amend his petition, but waited to step forward until Standard filed suit for a declaratory judgment to confirm that the policy was void. His reluctance to disclose the claim and failure to inform the trustee about it shows his intent to “hinder, delay, or defraud” his creditors.

Third, Dr. Phillips scheduled several claims against third parties on his original schedule B and amended his schedule the first time to add another potential claim. According to Dr. Phillips's own notations on his schedule, many of these claims had little chance of yielding funds for his creditors. They included claims for defamation against unnamed media outlets, a claim for malicious prosecution against the City of Renton, and "for various torts, including conversion." The fact that Dr. Phillips listed these claims supports the bankruptcy court's finding that he knew he was required to schedule unresolved legal claims. The fact that he neglected to mention the two claims with a specific long-term pay-out – his disability and unemployment claims – also supports the bankruptcy court's finding that he intended to keep these potential sources of income from his creditors. The bankruptcy court's decision that Dr. Phillips intended to conceal his disability claim from his creditors should be affirmed.

Nor did the bankruptcy court clearly err when it found that Dr. Phillip's failure to reveal his claim against Standard constituted a false oath under section 727(a)(4) because this oversight meets the three elements of a false oath. First, it is uncontested that Dr. Phillips stated under penalty of perjury that his schedules were accurate when they were not.

Second, the estimates of the claim's value ranged from $6,600 (Dr. Phillips's estimation on his second amended schedule B) to a potential of $1.1 million (bankruptcy court). The trustee settled with Standard for $52,000.

Therefore, the claim had significant value and was material to the bankruptcy estate.

Finally, the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in ruling that Dr. Phillips omitted his disability claim knowingly and fraudulently. During the period that he was preparing to file (March 2008) and the time he revealed the existence of the claim (September 2008), Dr. Phillips communicated with Standard on 22 occasions or, on average, nearly once a week for seven months. At trial he complained about the money and time he had to spend complying with Standard's follow-up requests for information. In light on his frequent and sometimes acrimonious exchanges with Standard, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding unpersuasive Dr. Phillips's explanation that omitting his disability claim was an oversight.

And the bankruptcy court did not err in rejecting Dr. Phillips's defenses. It did not commit clear error finding the testimony of a clinical psychologist, who first started treating Dr. Phillips five months after the events at issue in this case, less credible than the testimony of the trustee and Dr. Phillips's attorney, who testified he understood the bankruptcy process. And it did not commit clear error in rejecting Dr. Phillips's claims of impairment because at the same time Dr.

Phillips, who had graduated from law school, was defending himself in multiple court cases with notable success.

Dr. Phillips’s legal arguments are meritless. His argument that the Standard insurance policy would never have benefitted his creditors, and therefore his failure to disclose it is harmless error, fails on three grounds. First, debtors must list all assets, even those they think are worthless. Second, his claim that the policy is an executory contract, and therefore not in the estate, is wrong as a matter of law: an insurance policy is not an executory contract, and even if it were, he was obligated to list it on his schedules. Third, his disability payments were not exempt but even if they had been, Dr. Phillips was still required to disclose them so that the trustee and creditors could verify his assertion. All of Dr. Phillips’s legal arguments are based on a false premise: that his omissions did not affect the outcome of his bankruptcy case and therefore they were excusable. This is wrong as a matter of law. The concept of “no harm, no foul” does not exist in the Bankruptcy Code. It is also wrong as a matter of fact: the claim Dr. Phillips concealed turned out to be worth $52,000.

Because the bankruptcy court did not make any error – much less clear error – in its findings of fact and correctly applied the law, the decision below should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion When it Denied Dr. Phillip's Discharge under Section 727(a)(2)(B) Because it Did Not Commit Clear Error in Concluding That He Intentionally Concealed His Disability Claim with the Intent to Hinder, Delay, or Defraud His Creditors.

The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error when it found that Dr. Phillips had intentionally concealed his disability claim against Standard Insurance to shield the benefits from his creditors.

Section 727(a)(2)(B) precludes giving a chapter 7 debtor a discharge if he "with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor or an officer of the estate . . . has . . . concealed, or has permitted to be . . . concealed . . . (B) property of the estate, after the date of the filing of the petition. 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2)(B). A party seeking denial of discharge under section 727(a)(2) must prove two things. First it must show by the preponderance of the evidence that the debtor concealed property. Hughes v. Lawson (In re Lawson), 122 F.3d 1237, 1240 (9th Cir. 1997). Second, a party challenging the debtor's discharge must show "a subjective intent on the debtor's part to hinder, delay or defraud a creditor" by concealing the property. Emmit Valley Assoc. v. Woodfield (In re Woodfield) 978 F.2d 516, 518 (9th Cir. 1992).

A. It is undisputed that Dr. Phillips did not disclose his claim against Standard Insurance on his bankruptcy schedules or at his creditors meeting, thus concealing it from his creditors.

Dr. Phillips has admitted that he did not disclose his claim against Standard, although he was obligated to do so. 11 U.S.C. § 521(1) (requiring debtors to file a "schedule of assets and liabilities"); Cusano v. Klein, 264 F.3d 936, 946 (9th Cir. 2001) (requiring debtors to prepare their schedules "carefully, completely, and accurately") (citations and quotations omitted). If a debtor fails to list a claim against a third party on his bankruptcy schedules, he has concealed it and his discharge can be denied. Crawforth v. Bachman (In re Bachman), No. 06-6027, 2007 WL 4355620 at *7 (Bankr. D. Idaho Dec. 10, 2007) (denying a chapter 7 discharge in part because the debtor failed to disclose a personal injury claim).

In his brief to this Court, Dr. Phillips asserts for the first time that he provided "the Bankruptcy Trustee copies of documents relating to the insurance contract as part of the initial bankruptcy disclosure required of all debtors" but that he did not go through his schedule "line by line" to make sure that the "contract" was listed. Phillips Br. at 7. He does not provide a record citation, and the United States Trustee is unaware of any such disclosure. In any case, this Court should disregard facts alleged for the first time on appeal. Ministry of Defense of the Islamic Republic of Iran v. Gould, Inc., 969 F.2d 764, 773 (9th Cir. 1992).

B. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that Dr. Phillips intended to conceal his claim against Standard, worth up to 1.1 million dollars, from his creditors.

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that Dr. Phillips intended to conceal his disability claim. A debtor's intent does need not be fraudulent to meet the requirements of section 727(a)(2). It is sufficient to show that the debtor intended to hinder or delay a creditor. Wolkowitz v. Beverly (In re Beverly), 374 B.R. 221, 242-43 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007) ("As the requirement is stated in the disjunctive, it suffices to demonstrate any of the three alternatives, intent either to hinder or to delay or to defraud creditors."). A finding of intent is subject to clear error review. In re Adeeb, 787 F.2d at 1342. Intent may be established by circumstantial evidence or inferred from a debtor's course of conduct. Id. at 1343; Devers v. Bank of Sheridan (In re Devers), 759 F.2d 751, 753-54 (9th Cir. 1985); Roberts v. Erhard (In re Roberts), 331 B.R. 876, 884 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).

Dr. Phillips's course of conduct demonstrates that he intended to conceal the Standard claim. This is so for two reasons.

First, it is undisputed that Dr. Phillips failed on three separate occasions to reveal his claim against Standard Insurance. He did not disclose it on his bankruptcy schedules when he filed his petition on July 2, 2008. He did not disclose the claim on his amended schedule B (list of potential assets). He did not reveal it at the meeting of creditors on July 31, 2008. Furthermore, all three times he affirmed under penalty of perjury that the information he was providing was true and accurate, yet still omitted the claim.

Nor has Dr. Phillips challenged the finding of the bankruptcy court that he first revealed the insurance claim on September 17, 2008 — two days after Standard moved the bankruptcy court for a declaratory judgment against the chapter 7 trustee that the policy was void. Failure to inform the trustee of an estate asset is evidence of intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Retz, 606 F.3d at 1203. Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that Dr. Phillips intended to conceal his claim.

Second, Dr. Phillips scheduled many claims against third parties. Listing one claim on a bankruptcy schedule, yet omitting others indicates intent to conceal because it is clear that the debtor is aware of the requirement to list contingent assets. See White v. Wyndham Vacation Ownership, Inc., – F.3d – , No. 09-5626, 2010 WL 3155161, at *7 (6th Cir. Aug. 11, 2010) (chapter 13 case).

Dr. Phillips indicated on his Schedule B that his contingent claims were not a promising source of repayment for his creditors. On his original schedule B, Dr. Phillips listed "potential claims" against International Optical and various other parties "for various torts including conversion." He listed claims against Dr. Richard Lomas for defamation and fraudulent misrepresentation. He listed potential claims against a "neighbor" and the "media" for libel and slander and a "potential malpractice claim" against Hazeldon Foundation. He either noted that they were "likely uncollectible" or that their values were listed as "unknown." Supp. App. at 45-48.

In contrast, Dr. Phillips did not list his disability claim against Standard Insurance for which he expected to collect $3,000 each month until he reached the age of 67. He also did not list the weekly claims for state unemployment benefits that he was filing at the time he filed his petition.

On his first amended schedule B, Dr. Phillips added a "potential claim" against the City of Renton for "malicious prosecution." Supp. A. at 106. He did not provide more specific information for any other entry. He did not add his claim against Standard or his claim for unemployment benefits at that time.

Relying on a bankruptcy case from the Middle District of Florida, Dr. Phillips argues that "actual intent" must be proven by "a pattern of omissions." Phillips Br. at 12. n. 27 (citing In re Slater, 318 B.R. 881, 888 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2004) (denying debtor's discharge under 11 U.S.C. 727(a)(4)). Even if this were the standard, which it is not, the record in this case shows a pattern of omissions: Dr. Phillips failed on three occasions to disclose his disability claim.

Furthermore, failure to disclose a single asset is sufficient to provide grounds for denial of discharge in the Ninth Circuit. See e.g., Hughes v. Lawson (In re Lawson), 122 F.3d 1237, 1240 (9th Cir. 1997) (affirming denial of discharge based on concealing the transfer of a deed of trust); Duggins v. Heffron, 128 F.2d 546, 548 (9th Cir. 1942) (affirming denial of discharge based on transfer of single property); Creasy v. Birdsell, (In re Creasy), 138 Fed. App'x 45, 46 (9th Cir. 2005) (denial of discharge based on omission of business interest).

C. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in concluding Dr. Phillips's actions hindered his creditors.

Finally, Dr. Phillips's failure to disclose his claim against Standard "hinder[ed], delay[ed], or defraud[ed]" his creditors. 11 U.S.C. § 707(a)(2). The claim would have given him benefits of $3,000 per month for approximately 30 years. It turned out to be the only asset in his estate. A. at 75. When Dr. Phillips concealed this asset, he kept his creditors from discovering the sole source of potential recovery, which “hinded” and “delayed” them from receiving some of the money owed to them. See Crawforth, 2007 WL 4355620 at *7; Woodfield, 978 F.2d at 519 (putting cash beyond creditors’ reach satisfied requirements of section 727(a)(2)).

II. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion When It Denied Dr. Phillips’s Discharge under Section 727(a)(4) Because It Did Not Commit Clear Error in Finding His Omission of the Standard Disability Claim Constituted a False Oath.

The bankruptcy court did not err when it concluded that Dr. Phillips made a false oath under section 727(a)(4)(A) when he omitted the Standard claim from his original schedules, his amended Schedule B, and did not disclose it at his meeting of creditors. A debtor makes a false oath if he (1) makes a false statement or omission, (2) regarding a material fact, and (3) does so knowingly and fraudulently. Khalil v. Dev. Surety & Indem.Co. (In re Khalil), 379 B.R. 163, 172 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007), aff’d 578 F.3d 1167 (9th Cir. 2009); Retz, 606 F.3d at 1197 (dividing “knowingly” and “fraudulently” into separate elements).

“Because a determination concerning fraudulent intent depends largely upon an assessment of the credibility and demeanor of the debtor, deference to the bankruptcy court's factual findings is particularly appropriate.” Williamson v.

Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 828 F.2d 249, 252 (4th Cir. 1987). The bankruptcy court did not err in concluding that all the elements were met.

A. Dr. Phillips's undisputed failure to disclose his disability claim is a false oath.

First, Dr. Phillips's failure to disclose his claim against Standard is a false oath. An omission of information constitutes a false oath. Roberts, 331 B.R. at 882 (stating omission can be a false oath). It is undisputed that Dr. Phillips omitted his disability claim against Standard from his original petition and amended Schedule B.

False statements at a meeting of creditors also constitute false oaths. Farmers Co-op Ass'n of Talmage, Kan. v. Strunk, 671 F.2d 391, 395 (10th Cir. 1982); Homer National Bank v. Farber (In re Farber), 35 F.3d 562, at *3-*4 (5th Cir. 1994). See also Retz, 606 at 1205 (comparing debtor's statements in creditors' meetings with evidence in the case in supporting denial of discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(5) for failure to account for missing assets). Dr. Phillips stated under oath at his meeting of creditors that his schedules were accurate. It is undisputed that they were not. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding Dr. Phillips made a false oath.

B. Dr. Phillips concealed a material fact when he did not disclose his claim against Standard.

Second, the false oath is related to a material fact. "A fact is material 'if it bears a relationship to the debtor's business transactions or estate, or concerns the discovery of assets, business dealings, or the existence and disposition of the debtor's property.'" In re Khalil, 379 B.R. at 173 (citation omitted). The insurance claim represented a primary source of income for Dr. Phillips. See A. at 82. It was potentially worth more than one million dollars. A. at 35. Standard settled the claim with the trustee for over $50,000. A. at 190. In fact, it turned out to be the only asset in the estate. A. at 75. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that the claim had a relationship to Dr. Phillips's estate and was therefore material.

C. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that Dr. Phillips knew he was concealing his disability claim and thus acted fraudulently in doing so.

Third, Dr. Phillips acted knowingly when he omitted the Standard claim. A debtor "acts knowingly if he or she acts deliberately and consciously." Retz, 606 F. 3d at 1198 (quotation marks and citations omitted). Dr. Phillips omitted the claim from his schedules on two separate occasions and failed to mention it on a third (meeting of creditors). See Williamson, 828 F.2d at 252 (finding it "significant" that the debtor made three false oaths in affirming the bankruptcy court's finding of fraudulent intent). Furthermore, Standard sent Dr. Phillips a letter regarding his claim on July 2, 2008 – the day he filed for bankruptcy. Supp. A. at 137. Standard sent him another letter six days before his meeting of creditors on July 31 and another one the day after. Supp. A. at 140-142. Nevertheless he did not reveal any information about his disability claim on his schedules or to his creditors.

A debtor’s actions can belie a claim of ignorance. Dr. Phillips was deeply involved in pursuing his disability claim against Standard. He spent hundreds of hours collecting the information that Standard required to process his claim. Phillips Br. at 7-8. He even hired someone for “thousands of dollars” to help him do so. Id. at n.7. He found the requests so onerous that he threatened to sue Standard. Supp. A. at 146. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that Dr. Phillips must have known about the claim in the same time period in which he filed his petition and met with his creditors.

Finally, Dr. Phillips’s failure to disclose the insurance claim demonstrates fraudulent intent. To demonstrate fraudulent intent, the United States Trustee bore the burden of showing that (1) Dr. Phillips made false representations or omissions which (2) he knew at the time were false and which (3) he made with the intention and purpose of deceiving his creditors. Retz, 606 F. 3d at 1198-99; Khalil, 379 B.R. at 173.

Intent is usually proven by circumstantial evidence or by inferences drawn from the debtor's conduct. Devers v. Bank of Sheridan, Mont. (In re Devers), 759 F.2d 751, 753-54 (9th Cir. 1985). Reckless indifference or disregard for the truth may be circumstantial evidence of intent, but is not sufficient, alone, to constitute fraudulent intent. Khalil, 379 B.R. at 173-75.

Dr. Phillips testified that he discovered on August 29, 2008 that the Standard claim was not listed on his schedule B. A. at 136. He did not take decisive action afterwards, a course of conduct that supports the bankruptcy court's finding that he intended to deceive his creditors for three reasons.

First, the only supporting evidence of Dr. Phillips's claim that he did not know that the Standard claim was not on his schedules is a redacted e-mail from him to his bankruptcy attorney that he sent at 10:30 at night four days after he claimed he discovered that the disability claim was missing from his schedules. A. at 203. In it, he tells his attorney that he already informed "David of the possibility of receiving income from the disability policy" and that he has asked David to include the amount of "$6,600" on his schedules to reflect the value of the benefits he would have received from his eligibility date to the date he filed the petition. Id. The e-mail does not request information about when his amended schedule would be filed. Nor does the record show that Dr. Phillips made any attempt to follow-up to make sure that the amended schedule had been filed.

Second, even after he discovered the omission of the claim – a key inaccuracy in his bankruptcy petition – Dr. Phillips did not bring the error to the trustee's attention. A. at 75. The trustee only found out about the claim when Standard disclosed it in the first week of September. Id. Dr. Phillips did not file an amended schedule B disclosing the Standard claim until the claim became public knowledge when Standard filed for a declaratory judgment in the bankruptcy case to declare the policy void. Supp. A. at 182-186. It was only two days after that – on September 17, three weeks after he testified he found out about the omission – that Dr. Phillips amended his Schedule B. Supp. A. at 109 [Bankr. Dkt #46]. Fraud cannot be absolved by disclosing what has, or will shortly be, generally known. McClenny v. CH & R Enters., Inc., 205 F.3d 1334, at *1 (4th Cir. 2000) (table case) (per curiam); Beauchamp v. Hoose, (In re Beauchamp), 236 B.R. 727, 734 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1999). Only after Standard revealed the existence of the disputed claim, did Dr. Phillips disclose it.

Third, the amended Schedule B fails to provide full information concerning the claim. Dr. Phillips added three items. First, he listed a "Disability claim/Potential increase in disability income" as a "counterclaim." Supp. A. at 109. He did not name the insurance company, as required by the schedule.[5] He noted the "current value" of the claim at $6,600. Second, he listed a "potential claim for unpaid unemployment income" with an "unknown value." Supp. A. at 110. He noted that the claim was "likely uncollectible as claim has been previously denied." Id. He did not mention his then-pending appeal. Third, he listed "refunded disability insurance premiums dating back to 2002 (yet to be received).[6] Id. He also added "Debtor does not believe he is entitled to these funds" and valued the refund at $8,260.13. Again, he did not specify Standard Insurance by name.

[5] In contrast, he had consistently scheduled his term life insurance policy as being with "New York Life Insurance Co." and provided the company's address and policy number. He valued the policy at zero, however.

[6] The notation that he had not received the funds contradicts his trial testimony: "On August 29th, 2008, I received a check from Standard for a refund of the policy premiums I had paid. That was strange because what kind of insurance company refunds policy premiums? So it was a new asset." A. at 172. The letter rescinding his policy also indicated that the refund check for his premiums was enclosed. Supp. A. at 155. On his motion for reconsideration, Dr. Phillips introduced evidence that the letter he received from Standard only contained a copy of the check because the original had been sent to his Massachusetts address. A. at 33. The bankruptcy court ruled, however, that the precise time he received the check was irrelevant to its ruling and therefore declined to admit the exhibits demonstrating that Dr. Phillips received the actual check at a later date. A. at 34.

In light of these contradictions and lack of precision, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found that Dr. Phillips intended to deceive his creditors by hiding his disability claim.

III. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Commit Clear Error Rejecting Dr. Phillips's Justifications for his Actions Nor Did It Err in Rejecting His Legal Arguments That the Omission Did Not Matter.

A. Dr. Phillips's justifications for his actions do not excuse his behavior and the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in rejecting them.

Dr. Phillips provided two grounds to excuse his failure to put the Standard claim on his schedules. First, he claimed he forgot. Second, he explained that he was not capable of understanding his bankruptcy due to his substance abuse. Neither of these excuses survive scrutiny.

First, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that it was "virtually impossible" that Dr. Phillips could have forgotten about the claim in light of his interaction with Standard and his precarious financial situation at the time. A. at 23; A. at 132 (admitting communications with Standard). See Bachman, 2007 WL 4355620 at *7 (rejecting the debtor's assertion that she "plain didn't even think" about a $47,000 personal injury settlement when she filled out her schedules). Dr. Phillips received a letter from Standard dated July 2 – the day he filed his bankruptcy petition. Supp. A. at 137. He received another letter shortly before his meeting of creditors. Supp. A. at 140. Dr. Phillip's numerous interactions with Standard just before and after July 2008 refute his contention that he forgot about the policy.

Furthermore, an action that is repeated is very unlikely to be inadvertent. Devers, 759 F.2d at 754 (repeated sale of secured assets combined with failure to report the sales evidenced fraudulent intent). Dr. Phillips "forgot" to list his claim on three occasions.

The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that Dr. Phillips would not forget about a claim that he was pursuing at the same time as he was involved in his bankruptcy case and which would provide his main source of income. C & H Elec. v. Newell (In re Newell), 321 B.R. 885 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2005) (holding that activity around the time of filing undermines the debtor's explanation that he forgot about the asset). The policy benefit was a major potential source of income outside of Dr. Phillips existing governmental disability payments and family assistance. A. at 82. In addition, Dr. Phillips had to hire someone at considerable expense to collect the billing information that Standard required. Phillips Br. at 8, n.7. The "number and magnitude" of his interactions with Standard supports the court's finding that Dr. Phillips did not forget about his disability claim. Devers, 759 F.2d at 754; Retz, 606 F.3d at 1196 (giving a bankruptcy court's credibility judgments special deference).

B. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that Dr. Phillips had the mental capacity to understand the necessity of disclosing his claim against Standard Insurance.

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that Dr. Phillips had the mental capacity to understand his actions and to attempt to hide his disability claim from his creditors. A. at 24. At the same time that he allegedly lacked the necessary executive functioning to understand the import of his bankruptcy schedules, he discussed his bankruptcy with two attorneys, participated without incident in the meeting of creditors, and, acting pro se, litigated a successful appeal of denial of unemployment benefits by the State of Washington. A. at 131, 157, 162-163. Also in the fall of 2008, Dr. Phillips successfully filed, briefed, and argued two motions to dismiss adversary proceedings in his bankruptcy case. A. at 158-160. Finally, he was able to defend himself against numerous complaints by patients so that he would not lose his medical license. A. at 129.

Furthermore, Dr. Phillips's evidence supporting his alleged lack of mental capacity is not persuasive. He relies upon his discharge report from the Menninger clinic. A. at 199. But that document records that Dr. Phillips "denied decreased energy or concentration." Id. Furthermore, he "was alert and oriented in all spheres and cognitively intact." A. at 116 (recitation at trial of discharge document). His "thought process was logical and goal-directed." A. at 117.

In addition, Dr. Phillips relies on the testimony of a clinical psychologist, Dr. Judith Cohen, but she did not begin treating him until November 2008, after the events at issue in this case. A. at 94, 112. She had no personal knowledge of his mental capacity in July 2008, when Dr. Phillips filed his bankruptcy petition, his first amended petition, and attended his meeting of creditors – in all three instances failing to disclose his claim against Standard. A. at 118-119.

In contrast, the trustee testified that Dr. Phillips appeared fully engaged at the meeting of creditors. A. at 162-64. The attorney who filed the bankruptcy petition for Dr. Phillips's medical practice in August 2008 testified that Dr. Phillips understood the purpose of the filing. A. at 179. The attorney also testified that he had no reason to suspect that Dr. Phillips was not mentally capable of handling his financial affairs. A. at 180. In light of the evidence that Dr. Phillips was handling his financial affairs at a sophisticated level, the bankruptcy court's finding that he had the mental capacity to understand the content and import of his bankruptcy case was not clearly erroneous.

C. The bankruptcy court did not err in rejecting Dr. Phillips's argument that the omission of the Standard claim was "immaterial."

Dr. Phillips's defense in this case is based on the premise of "no harm, no foul," namely that any proceeds from the disability claim would not have been available to creditors, so that it does not matter that he failed to disclose it. This argument has no merit. Chalik v. Moorefield (In re Chalik), 748 F.2d 616, 618 (11th Cir. 1984) (stating that the defense that an omitted asset is worthless is "specious"); Jensen v. Slater (In re Slater), 318 B.R. 881, 888 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2004) (same). Dr. Phillips' reasoning is misguided for two reasons.

1. The fact that Dr. Phillips's disability claim may have been exempt does not excuse his failure to disclose it.

Dr. Phillip's argument that his disability policy is an exempt asset and thus his failure to list it did not matter is incorrect for three reasons.

First, Dr. Phillips was required to disclose all his assets, including his interests in those that were potentially exempt. When a debtor files for bankruptcy, all interests in property are placed in the estate. 11 U.S.C. § 541; see also Schwab, 130 S. Ct. at 2662-63 (stating this). It is well-established that contingent interests in future income are estate property. See Neuton v. Danning (In re Neuton), 922 F.2d 1379, 1382-83 (9th Cir. 1990). This includes rights in insurance policies.

Minaco Gp. of Cos., Ltd. v. First State Underwriters Agency of New England Reinsurance Corp. (In re Minaco), 799 F.2d 517, 519 (9th Cir. 1986). Failure to schedule an asset, including a cause of action, means the asset remains in the estate and does not revert to the debtor. Cusano, 264 F.3d at 945-46.

All assets start out in the estate but can subsequently be removed from the estate through the exemption process. In re Yonikus I, 974 F.2d 901, 905 (7th Cir. 1992). Therefore, a debtor may not claim a property interest to be exempt until he has included that asset in his bankruptcy estate. In re Yonikus II, 996 F.2d 866, 869 (7th Cir. 1993) ("Before an exemption can be claimed, it must be estate property."). To claim, as Dr. Phillips does, that an asset is exempt and therefore not in the estate "puts the cart before the horse." Id.

Second, a debtor must fully disclose what assets he seeks to remove from the estate. 11 U.S.C. § 522(l); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4003(a). Full disclosure is required to give the trustee or creditor a chance to object to a debtor's claimed exemption. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4003(b); Yonikus I, 974 at 904-05. Therefore, the debtor has no discretion in what he chooses to reveal. Woodson, 839 F.2d at 615-16. The bankruptcy system can only function when debtors fully disclose their financial situation so that the trustee and creditors have accurate information without having to conduct their own investigations. Retz, 606 F.3d at 1196 (citation omitted); Chalik, 748 F.2d at 618. By failing to disclose his claim, Dr. Phillips prevented the trustee and creditors from analyzing to what extent – if any – his claim would be exempt. He should not be able to benefit from his failure to abide by the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code.

Third, Dr. Phillips is not correct that his failure to disclose the disability claim was harmless because his interest in it was exempt, and therefore his creditors would not have benefitted from the proceeds. There is no such thing as a "no harm, no foul" defense in the context of section 727. A debtor does not have to harm creditors to warrant denial of discharge because "lack of injury to creditors is irrelevant for purposes of denying a discharge in bankruptcy." Bernard v. Scheaffer (In re Bernard), 96 F.3d 1279, 1281-82 (9th Cir. 1996) (quoting In re Adeeb, 787 F.2d at 1343). Therefore, even if Dr. Phillips were correct that his disability claim was exempt, the bankruptcy court did not err in denying his discharge.

2. Dr. Phillips is incorrect that his disability policy is an executory contract that the trustee failed to reaffirm and thus it is not property of the estate.

As an initial matter, this Court should not consider Dr. Phillips's executory contract argument because he did not raise it at the trial level. See Supp. A. at 189-

191 (excerpt from the United States Trustee's BAP brief making argument with record cites). Courts generally do not consider new arguments on appeal. Raich v. Gonzales, 500 F.3d 850, 868 (9th Cir. 2007). Here, the bankruptcy appellate panel did not address the United States Trustee's argument that the executory contract argument had been waived but rejected Dr. Phillips's legal theory on the merits. A. at 54, n.7

The bankruptcy appellate panel correctly rejected Dr. Phillips's theory that the insurance policy was an executory contract that the trustee failed to affirm and thus it was not in the estate. His argument fails for at least four reasons.

First, an insurance policy is not an executory contract. Olah v. Baird (In re Baird), 567 F.3d 1207, 1212 (10th Cir. 2009).

Second, a debtor must list all insurance policies so that the trustee can determine whether they are assets. Nealon v. Shute (In re Shute), 38 F.2d 769, 770 (9th Cir. 1930).

Third, all contracts must be listed on a debtor's schedules. Diamond Z Trailer, Inc. v. JZ LLC (In re JZ LLC), 371 B.R. 412, 416 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007). Under Dr. Phillips's theory that an insurance policy is an executory contract, he was obligated to list it on his Schedule G – "Executory Contracts and Unexpired Leases." Dr. Phillips failed to list the Standard policy anywhere on his schedules.

Fourth, as the bankruptcy appellate panel pointed out, the disability claim is not executory but an accrued right to benefits. A. at 17, n.7; see Morehead v. Waldock Inv. Co. (In re Morehead), No. 05-141, 2006 WL 1966970 (N.D. W.Va. July 12, 2006) (noting the bankruptcy court found the debtor's disability insurance claim to be an asset of the estate available to creditors); In re Reiland, 377 B.R. 232, 234 (Bankr. D. Minn 2007), vacated as moot on other grounds, Reiland v. Sullivan, Nos. 08-923 & 08-924, 2008 WL 4876758 (D. Minn. Nov. 12, 2008) (describing claim against disability insurer as an asset of the estate).

Even if Dr. Phillips were correct that his disability policy were executory, it would not rescue his legal argument. He had an "express, affirmative duty to disclose all assets, including contingent and unliquidated claims," such as his disability claim against Standard. Hamilton v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 270 F.3d 778, 785 (9th Cir. 2001). The bankruptcy appellate panel did not err in rejecting Dr. Phillips's legal argument and denying his discharge because he did not disclose his disability claim against Standard.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons presented above, the United States Trustee respectfully requests this Court to affirm the bankruptcy court's denial of Dr. Phillips's chapter 7 discharge.

UNITED STATES BANKRUPTCY APPELLATE PANEL

OF THE NINTH CIRCUIT

In re FOOD CASH AND CARRY TRADING, INC., Debtor.	Bankr. No. 99-46230 TT (Chapter 7) Bankruptcy Judge, Leslie Tchaikovsky, presiding
LEWIS PHON, Appellant, v. SARA L. KISTLER, ACTING UNITED STATES TRUSTEE, and FOOD CASH AND CARRY TRADING, INC., DEBTOR, Appellees.	BAP No. NC-04-1634 An Appeal from the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of California

BRIEF OF APPELLEE,
THE ACTING UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

Appellee, Sara L. Kistler, Acting United States Trustee (U.S. Trustee), respectfully submits this Brief in support of the Order (I) Disallowing Fees and Costs of Former Counsel to Debtor in Possession, Lewis Phon, and (II) Requiring Disgorgement of All Fees Received (Fee Order).

I.

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction of the underlying chapter 7 case, under 28 U.S.C. § 157. On October 26, 2004, the bankruptcy court, (Hon. Leslie Tchaikovsky, presiding), entered its Fee Order. The Fee Order denied allowance of all fees requested by Lewis Phon, Esq. (Phon), and requires Phon to return $43,262 to the chapter 7 trustee of the bankruptcy estate of Food Cash and Carry Trading, Inc. (Debtor). Following the November 10, 2004 entry of an order denying Phon's motion for reconsideration, Phon timely filed a notice of appeal of the Fee Order on November 22, 2004. Under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (b)(1), and the Amended Order Continuing the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit, this Panel has jurisdiction of the appeal of the Fee Order.

II. STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED ON APPEAL

At issue in this appeal are the following discrete issues concerning Phon's fees for services as counsel to the former debtor-in-possession.

1. Whether the bankruptcy court, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a),[1] abused its discretion in disallowing all of Phon's requested fees, and ordering him to return $43,262, where he: (a) violated Bankruptcy Code section 327 and Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure (Rule) 2014(a), by failing to make various disclosures in his employment application; (b) violated 11 U.S.C. § 329 and Rule 2016(b), by misrepresenting the post-petition timing of the payment of his retainer; and (c) violated the confirmation order, by not making plan distributions when required and paying himself attorney fees without bankruptcy court authority.

2. Whether the bankruptcy court, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), abused its discretion in finding unreasonable $15,773.33 of $33,840 total pre-confirmation fees that Phon incurred: (a) on services rendered prior to the entry of a retention order; (b) spending excessive time reviewing plan ballots; (c) charging fees pertaining to another bankruptcy estate to the Debtor's estate; (d) performing services benefitting the Debtor's principal, as opposed to the estate; and (e) drafting two inadequate disclosure statements and plans – of seven total versions.

3. Whether the bankruptcy court, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) and the confirmation order, abused its discretion in finding unreasonable $31,840 of $62,100 total post-confirmation fees: (a) that Phon incurred performing services in connection with another case, and negotiating an unsuccessful compromise with a claimant; and (b) the time details of which Phon "clumped" in his fee application.

III. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

This Panel may overturn the Fee Order only if it determines the bankruptcy court has abused its discretion. Franke v. Tiffany (In re Lewis), 113 F.3d 1040, 1043 (9th Cir. 1997); Movitz v. Baker (In re Triple Star Welding, Inc.), 324 B.R. 778, 788 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005). That discretion is ample, for the "bankruptcy court has broad and inherent authority to deny any and all compensation where an attorney fails to meet the requirements of" Bankruptcy Code section 330. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1045. Under the abuse-of-discretion standard, this Panel "must have a definite and firm conviction that the court below committed a clear error of judgment in the conclusion it reached, before reversal is proper." In re Crowe, 243 B.R. 43, 47 (B.A.P. 9th Cir.), aff'd, 246 F.3d 673 (9th Cir. 2000). The bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error, and its conclusions of law de novo. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1043; Fed. R.Bankr.P. 8013.

IV. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Nature of the Case.

Phon is a solo practitioner in San Francisco, who represented the Debtor in both pre- and post-confirmation proceedings during the chapter 11 phase of its bankruptcy case. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, pp.2-14).[2] The Debtor ceased operations long ago, and its case is now in chapter 7. (Id., p.6, l.9-12).

This appeal arises from Phon's First and Final Fee Application (Fee Applica- tion), in which he sought a final allowance of fees for legal services, in the amount of $95,940. (App., Exh, 8). The U.S. Trustee and the Debtor [3] objected to the allowance of all fees requested, and sought the return of all monies paid to Phon during the case. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.6, l.3-13). The bankruptcy court held an extended evidentiary hearing on Phon's Fee Application. (Id., p.7, l.17-18).

[2] Phon has not continuously paginated his excerpts of record, as required pursuant to B.A.P. Rule 8009(b)-1. Therefore, certain excerpts contained in the U.S. Trustee's Appendix, (U.S. TRUSTEE App.), necessarily duplicate those of Phon's Appendix, (App.). The U.S. Trustee's excerpts have been continuously paginated, and are referred to accordingly in this Appellee's Brief.

[3] Certain parties participating below have either changed or are not involved at this appellate stage. First, the Debtor, which objected to the allowance of Phon's fees along with the U.S. Trustee, is a co-appellee here. It is the U.S. Trustee's understanding, however, that the Debtor will not be filing a brief.

Second, Sara L. Kistler is now the other co-appellee. Ms. Kistler was named Acting U.S. Trustee for Region 17, effective January 9, 2005, and has substituted in this appeal for William T. Neary, the prior U.S. Trustee and original co-appellee. B.A.P. Rule 8018(b)-1; Fed.R.App.P. 43(c); Fed.R.Bankr.P. 7025.

On October 4, 2004, the bankruptcy court filed a 22-page Memorandum of Decision. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A). Of the total $95,940 of fees for which Phon sought a final allowance, the court determined that only $49,033.33 of fees, (i.e., approximately half), were reasonable under Bankruptcy Code section 330. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. B). Ultimately, though, due to Phon's many statutory and regulatory violations, the bankruptcy court disallowed all fees, and ordered Phon to return $43,262 of prior payments to the chapter 7 trustee. (Id.)

B. Statements of Facts and Prior Proceedings.

The appellate parties generally do not dispute the facts. The background of this appeal, nonetheless, is extensive and complex.

1. The Related Bankruptcy Case of Doris Ma.

The Debtor filed a voluntary petition under chapter 11 on July 29, 1999, and originally was assigned to another Oakland bankruptcy judge. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.2, l.5-11). A few months earlier, Doris Ma, an individual, filed a chapter 13 petition in the bankruptcy court, with Phon as counsel of record. (Id.) Ma's lower-numbered case had been assigned to the Hon. Leslie Tchaikovsky. (Id.)

On October 22, 1999, the Debtor's case was transferred to Judge Tchaikovsky, who treated the Debtor's case and Doris Ma's as related cases. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.2, l.12-p.3, l.4). Ma, a creditor, had guaranteed certain of the Debtor's debts, and along with the Debtor, had pledged her personal real estate to help secure such debts. (Id.) The Debtor, an Asian food wholesaler and retailer, operated its business from Ma's real property, in downtown Oakland. (Id.) The Debtor paid Ma rent, and Ma was a salaried employee of the Debtor. (Id.) Ma also was the ex-wife of the Debtor's sole owner, William Cheung. (Id., p.2, l.7-9).

Great International Import/Export Corporation (Great International) was a secured creditor with a cross-collateralized claim. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.2, l.19-23). Its pending foreclosure proceedings led to the commencement of both the Debtor's bankruptcy case and Ma's. (Id.)

2. The Problems With Phon's Employment Applications.

a. Phon's Failure to Disclose His Connections With Doris Ma.

On September 21, 1999, Phon filed his initial employment application. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.2, l.23-26). In the application and accompanying verified statement, Phon averred under penalty of perjury that he was not "affiliated" with the Debtor's creditors. (Id., p.16, l.11-16). The bankruptcy court determined that Phon's particular use of the term "affiliated" constituted a "deficiency" in the application. (Id.) That application, therefore, was denied without prejudice, pending Phon's explanation of "affiliated." (Id., p.2, l.23-26).

In his amended employment application, filed on December 27, 1999, Phon indicated that " 'affiliated' included 'being employed by the debtor, and having any relationship with the debtor, [or] the debtor's creditors.' " (Id., p.9, l.9-14, & p.16, l.15-24). Phon, however, did not disclose any relationship with Doris Ma, or that he represented her in her individual bankruptcy case, in his amended application or verified statement. (Id., p.16, l.15-24).

b. The Untimeliness of Phon's Employment Applications.

As set forth above, Phon did not file his initial employment application until September 21, 1999 – i.e., two months into the Debtor's case. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.2, l.23-26). "When a deficiency was noted in the form of the application, it took [Phon] several more months to file an amended application." (Id., p.9, l.24-25). Phon's filing of his amended application on December 27, 1999 came approximately five months into the case. (Id., p.9, l.9-14.) The bankruptcy court entered Phon's retention order on January 12, 2000 – i.e., almost five and a half months after the commencement of the Debtor's case. (Id.)

Phon did not seek the entry of a retroactive retention order. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.9, l.9-14). Thus, the court's retention order did not approve Phon's employment on a retroactive basis. (Id.)

c. Phon's Misrepresentations of His Retainer.

In his Rule 2016 Statement, Phon stated that the Debtor had paid him a retainer of $3,830, which his employment application referred to as a "pre-petition" retainer. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.15, l.5-13). "On various occasions, Phon [also] represented that he had received the retainer one or two days prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition." (Id.) On May 17, 2004, though, in a declaration supporting the Fee Application, Phon revealed for the first time in almost five years that the retainer actually was paid, not at once, but in three separate installments, and paid after the commencement of the Debtor's case, not before. (Id.)

3. The Various Disclosure Statements and Plans.

Pursuant to bankruptcy court order, Phon drafted and filed a proposed plan and disclosure statement of the Debtor on November 30, 1999. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.3, l.3-11). The court denied approval of the disclosure statement, though, on the grounds that both it and the plan were "grossly insufficient." (Id.)

Throughout 2000, Phon drafted five more amended plans and disclosure statements. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.3, n.1). But, "[t]he Court denied approval of each amended disclosure statement on both substantive and technical grounds." (Id.)

In an order entered September 18, 2000, Great International obtained relief from the automatic stay. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.3, l.15-24). Following its foreclosure sale of the Debtor's real estate, it entered into a settlement with the Debtor, which the bankruptcy court approved in an order entered November 1, 2000. (Id.) Pursuant to the settlement, Great International paid $95,000 to the Debtor. (Id.) With Phon's agreement, the funds were deposited into his trust account for eventual payments to creditors, once the Debtor's plan was confirmed. (Id., & p.19, l.1-3).

The Debtor's Sixth Amended Plan (Plan) was confirmed in an order entered April 6, 2001. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p. 4, l.7-9). The Plan provided for the $95,000 to be paid to general unsecured creditors on the "effective date," i.e., 20 days following the date of entry of the confirmation order. (Id., p.18, l.19-26).

Though still holding $95,000 in his trust account, Phon did not make the required Plan distributions within 20 days of the effective date, i.e., by May 6, 2001. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.19, l.1-10). Instead, it appeared Phon did not make creditor distributions until late 2001 and 2002. (Id.) By as late as the spring of 2003, Phon still had not distributed $13,364.14 of the $95,000. (Id.) He later paid that balance over to the Debtor's new counsel, (id., p.19, n.7), who then paid tax creditors in 2003. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. C, p.30, l.8-11).

The Plan first required Phon to obtain bankruptcy court approval for the payment of his fees, and second, reserved jurisdiction for the allowance of Phon's pre- and post-confirmation fees. In particular, Article G of the Plan provides: "[n]o court appointed professionals, including debtor's counsel, shall be paid until their fees are approved by the court." (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.12, l.13-15). Article L of the Plan states:

> The Bankruptcy Court shall retain jurisdiction after confirmation of the Plan (b) to fix and determine expenses of administration and compensation whether existing before or after the confirmation of this Plan; ...

(Id., l.8-13).

4. The Debtor's Post-Confirmation Skirmishes With Morgan Lincoln.

Ten days after confirmation, on April 16, 2001, Morgan Lincoln International Corporation (Morgan Lincoln), an administrative claimant, moved to convert the case to chapter 7 and to reconsider the confirmation order. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.4, l.9-18). Morgan Lincoln's motions would consume the Debtor's case throughout the remainder of 2001, and most of 2002. (Id.)

Morgan Lincoln contended that, as a supplier to the Debtor, it had an administrative expense claim of $387,312.35. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.4, l.9-18). Morgan Lincoln also argued that the disclosure statement failed to disclose its administrative claim, and that the confirmed Plan failed because the Debtor had insufficient funds to pay the claim on the effective date. (Id.)

In opposition, the Debtor alleged that Morgan Lincoln's principal, Alice Huang (Huang), who also was the Debtor's manager and romantically involved with William Cheung, (the Debtor's principal), had purchased merchandise for the Debtor from another entity she controlled. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.4, l.19-26). The Debtor alleged that Huang attended the confirmation hearing at which the Plan was confirmed, and did not then object. (Id., p.5, l.2-3).

Under the circumstances, Judge Tchaikovsky determined that she could resolve Morgan Lincoln's post-confirmation motions only by holding an evidentiary hearing. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.5, l.4-9). To that end, between April and October 2001, the Debtor and Morgan Lincoln took discovery. (Id.) But, Morgan Lincoln's counsel later sought to withdraw, and was authorized to do so in an order entered October 15, 2001. (Id.)

That withdrawal notwithstanding, the Debtor, in papers drafted by Phon, filed a motion to settle Morgan International's administrative claim on January 9, 2002. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.5, l.9-13). The bankruptcy court denied approval of the compromise, on the grounds "it impermissibly impaired the rights of creditors under the Plan." (Id.) Discussions between the Debtor and Morgan Lincoln then continued throughout 2002. (Id., p.13, l.18-p.14, l.2).

Eventually, due to Morgan Lincoln's failure to obtain new counsel, it could not continue prosecuting its post-confirmation motions to convert and reconsider. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.5, l.14-18). On November 2, 2002, those motions were dropped from the court's calendar. (Id.)

5. The Various Pre- and Post-Confirmation Payments to Phon.

Pre-Confirmation Payments. Between January and September, 2000, while Phon drafted various of the Debtor's six amended disclosure statements and plans, he received five payments from the Debtor, totaling $35,932. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.17, l.20-p.18, l.5). Phon contended in his Fee Application that the Debtor had transferred the money to build up a fund for eventual creditor distributions under the Plan. (Id., p.18, l.5-7). But, when the Debtor made the payments, four years earlier, Phon did not seek court approval for the transfers, or disclose the transfers in any manner. (Id., p.18, l.10-12).

Of the total $32,932 Phon received prior to confirmation of the Plan, he returned $10,500 to the Debtor, and applied the $25,432 balance to his post-confirmation fees. (Id., p.18, l.13-17). Phon did not seek court approval before he took the funds for his personal use, and he neither disclosed nor provided notice of the payment of such fees to the bankruptcy court, the creditors or the U.S. Trustee. (Id.) None of these funds were used for creditor distributions under the confirmed Plan. (Id.)

Post-Confirmation Payments. Phon has admitted receiving an additional $47,000 from the Debtor and third parties between April and June, 2001, i.e., after the Plan was confirmed. (Id., p.20, l.10-23). Without seeking or obtaining court approval, Phon also applied this money to his post-confirmation fees. (Id.)

6. Phon's Fee Applications and the Debtor's Turnover Motion.

On November 26, 2002, soon after Morgan Lincoln's post-confirmation motions were dropped, Phon filed a notice of hearing of his initial Fee Application, which Application he did not file until December 6, 2002. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.5, l.18-p.6, l.2, & Exh. D, p.54, Docket nos. 193 & 194). William Cheung, the Debtor's principal (Cheung), filed a pro se objection to the application on December 31, 2002. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.6, l.4-9). Phon then continued the hearing on his fee application several times during 2003, and eventually dropped it from the calendar. (Id.)

On March 12, 2004, the Debtor filed a motion for turnover and disgorgement against Phon, seeking the return of $98,102. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.6, l.14-16). On March 24, 2004, the U.S. Trustee filed an objection to the allowance of Phon's fees, and concurred in the Debtor's turnover motion. (App., Exh. 3). In his response, Phon admitted receiving $50,031 from the Debtor prior to confirmation of the Plan, but argued he returned all but $36,012 to the Debtor and had not applied any of the funds to his pre-confirmation fees. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.7, l.3-13). Instead, Phon contended that he applied the funds to his post-confirmation fees, because they no longer were property of the estate and, thus, bankruptcy court approval was not required. (Id.)

The bankruptcy court held a hearing on the Debtor's turnover motion on April 19, 2004. (App., Exh. 16). Phon, however, was permitted to supplement his initial Fee Application, and did so in various papers filed in May and June, 2004. (App., Exh. 8, and U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. D, pp. 57-58). As supplemented, Phon sought the allowance of fees of $95,040, consisting of $33,840 in pre-confirmation fees, and $61,200 in post-confirmation fees. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.8, l.23-p.9, l.8, & p.13, l.4-13).

The bankruptcy court held two extended evidentiary hearings on the Fee Application and the turnover motion on July 8 and August 2, 2004, at which Phon was represented personally by separate counsel and gave testimony. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.7, l.17-20). Post-hearing papers by Phon and the Debtor followed. (Id.) The bankruptcy court took the matter under submission, (id.), and filed its Memorandum on October 4, 2004. (Id., p.1).

7. The Bankruptcy Court's Memorandum of Decision.

The Memorandum sets forth the bankruptcy court's findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court first determined the extent to which Phon's requested fees were unreasonable under Section 330. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.8, l.21-p.14, l.9). The court next concluded that Phon's requested fees needed to be denied in their entirety, given his many violations of the Bankruptcy Code and Rules, and the terms of the Debtor's confirmed reorganization plan. (Id., p.14, l.9-p.22, l.7).

The court first found that $15,773.33 of $33,840 total fees that Phon incurred pre-confirmation were unreasonable. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.11, l.13-16). The court concluded that part of the fees were for services Phon rendered prior to the entry of the retention order. (Id., p.8, l.21-p.10, l.3). Also, the court found that Phon spent excessive time reviewing plan ballots; charged fees pertaining to another bankruptcy estate to the Debtor's estate; performed services benefitting the Debtor's principal, rather than the estate; and spent excessive time drafting amended versions of a disclosure statement and plan. (Id., p.10, l.9-p.11, l.12).

Second, the bankruptcy court ruled that it had jurisdiction to adjudicate the allowance of Phon's post-confirmation fees in light of the specific terms of the Plan and this Panel's own decisional law. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.11, l.24-p.13, l.2). The court also found that $31,840 of $62,100 total fees that Phon incurred post-confirmation were unreasonable. (Id., p.14, l.3-9). The court concluded that Phon performed services in connection with another case, and that he also unjustifiably continued negotiating the compromise with Great International – after the bankruptcy court had denied approval of the compromise and advised him of its specific substantive problem. (Id., p.13, l.4-p.14, l.2). The court also found that Phon "clumped" the entries in his time details and charged his time in unauthorized increments in his Fee Application. (Id.)

Turning to its blanket disallowance, the bankruptcy court concluded that Phon violated various basic disclosure provisions of the Bankruptcy Code and Rules. (U.S.

TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.14, l.9-p.22, l.7). First, the court found that Phon misrepresented the timing of the payment of his retainer – it was paid post-petition, yet Phon had represented in various papers that it had been paid pre-petition. (Id., p.14, l.22-p.15, l.20). The bankruptcy court also found that Phon, in violation of basic bankruptcy law, neither sought nor obtained court authority for payment of the post-petition retainer under Section 363(b)(1), and the payment of the retainer also violated Section 330(a). (Id.)

Second, the bankruptcy court held that Phon failed to disclose various connections concerning Doris Ma in his employment application. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.15, l.20-p.17, l.19). Third, with regard to the $35,932 the Debtor transferred to Phon pre-confirmation for eventual Plan distributions, the bankruptcy court ruled that Phon failed to disclose the payments, as required. (Id., p.17, l.19-p.18, l.1). Judge Tchaikovsky ruled further that none of the payments were made with court authority, as required under Section 363(b)(1). (Id.)

The bankruptcy court also found that, after confirmation, Phon actually never used the money for creditor payments, as the Plan required. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.18, l.12-17). Instead, he used them to fund the Debtor's defense of Morgan Lincoln's post-confirmation motions. (Id.) The court ruled that Phon's funding of the litigation ran afoul of the specific terms of the confirmation order. (Id., p.18, l.18-p.20, l.8).

Fourth, the court also identified many entries in Phon's time records showing that he had engaged in discussions with the Debtor's principal so that a third-party, on the principal's behalf, could purchase former property of the estate at a foreclo- sure sale. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.21, l.9-p.22, l.7). This, Judge Tchai- kovsky pointedly called "unethical," adding: "[t]he Debtor's conduct, and Phon's cooperation in it, may constitute a bankruptcy crime." See 18 U.S.C. § 153. (Id.)

8. The Fee Order.

On October 26, 2004, the bankruptcy court entered the Fee Order. (U.S. TRUSTEE, Exh. B). The Fee Order provided that, "but for Phon's violations of the Bankruptcy Code and Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure (Rules) and his unethical and perhaps criminal conduct, the Court would allow Phon $49,033.33 in pre- and post-confirmation fees and $916 in pre-confirmation costs." (Id., p.26, l.12-16). Due to Phon's violations of the Bankruptcy Code, the Rules and the Plan, the Fee Order disallowed all of Phon's requested fees and costs, and granted the Debtor's turnover motion to the extent consistent with the Memorandum. (Id., p.26, l.17-p.3, l.7). The Fee Order, moreover, required Phon to refund $43,262 of prior payments to the chapter 7 trustee. (Id., p.26, l.24-27).

After his motion to reconsider failed, Phon appealed the Fee Order on November 22, 2004, without appealing the denial of reconsideration. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. E).

V. SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Based upon the sworn evidence presented, and also upon detailed knowledge culled from presiding over the Debtor's case for over five years, the bankruptcy court disallowed all fees for legal services rendered by Phon, due to his failures to disclose and other misfeasance, and ordered him to disgorge $43,262. The court did not abuse its broad discretion in doing so, and its disallowance should be affirmed.

Phon repeatedly violated the most basic of statutes and rules governing the employment and compensation of professionals in bankruptcy cases. Indeed, as the court's meticulous Memorandum shows, Phon's performance – rife with non-disclosures, misrepresentations, untimeliness, and draft after draft – was responsible for much of the case's stumbling.

Phon does not challenge the bankruptcy court's key conclusions – because he cannot. To the contrary, the court's findings relating to Phon's non-disclosures and misrepresentations go entirely uncontested – and are even admitted – in Phon's Opening Brief. Based as they are on unassailable facts and binding Ninth Circuit law, such conclusions cannot be contested, and merit affirmance of the bankruptcy court's exercise of discretion in sanctioning Phon for that misconduct.

VI. ARGUMENT

A. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Broad Discretion in Disallowing All of Phon's Fees, and Ordering Phon to Disgorge $43,262.

1. The Ninth Circuit has Virtually No Tolerance for Non-Disclosure.

The Ninth Circuit and this Panel have pointedly and repeatedly recognized the importance of scrupulous compliance with the bankruptcy system's disclosure requirements, and have made plain that bankruptcy courts should sanction non-compliant attorneys. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1040; Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049 (1996); Mehdipour v. Marcus & Millichap (In re Mehdipour), 202 B.R. 474, 480 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1996). In addition to Section 327(a) and Rules 2014 and 2016, the bankruptcy courts also have broad and inherent authority to deny any and all compensation where attorneys fail to comply with the disclosure requirements for employment and compensation. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1045.

Under Ninth Circuit law, once a bankruptcy court concludes that a non-disclosing attorney has acted with " 'complete disregard' for the procedures and requirements of the Bankruptcy Rules and the Bankruptcy Code," the court has "discretion over whether to permit [counsel] to receive any fees at all, regardless of their excessiveness or reasonableness." Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1045-46. That is, "given the gravity of counsel's transgressions," a threshold inquiry into the appro- priate amount of the fee under Section 330 is not required. Id., 113 F.3d at 1046.

Here, the court below properly exercised that discretion because Phon violated the most basic rules governing professional compensation – Sections 327, 329 and 330, and Bankruptcy Rules 2014 and 2016. Phon's omissions and misrepresentations go to the heart of the self-reporting system the Bankruptcy Code requires professionals to follow. In order to properly discharge their judicial functions, bankruptcy courts rely exclusively on lawyers' voluntary, complete, and truthful compliance with Rule 2014. Proper disclosure is necessary to enable the court to make an informed decision as to whether the applicant meets the statutory requirements for employment under Section 327(a), i.e., that such person does not "hold or represent an adverse interest to the estate" and is a "disinterested person." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a); Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. Phon repeatedly violated that system, and, given that, the court below acted well within its broad discretion imposing sanctions for that misconduct.

To enable bankruptcy courts to determine properly whether proposed attor- neys meet Section 327(a)'s requirements, Rule 2014(a), in relevant part, requires:

> The application shall state the specific facts showing the necessity for the employment ... and ... all of the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, [and] any other party in interest [ ]. The application shall be accom- panied by a verified statement ... setting forth the person's connections [ ].

Fed.R.Bankr.P. 2014(a) (bold added).

This Panel has ruled that: "the disclosure rules are not discretionary." Mehdipour v. Marcus & Millichap (In re Mehdipour), 202 B.R. 474, 480 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1996). It is controlling law in this circuit that professionals comply with those statutes and rules by making all the disclosures they contemplate:

> All facts that may be pertinent to a court's determination of whether an attorney is disinterested or holds an adverse interest to the estate must be disclosed. ... The duty of professionals is to disclose all connections ... They cannot pick and choose which connections are irrelevant or trivial ... No matter how old the connection, no matter how trivial it appears, the professional seeking employment must disclose it. ...

Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 882 ((applying Bankruptcy Rule 2014 (bold added)).

In the Ninth Circuit, a professional person's failure to comply with the requirements of § 327(a) at any time during his or her employment may result in a denial of compensation. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1045; Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 882; see also 11

U.S.C. § 328(c). The disclosure requirements of Rule 2014 are applied "strictly" and "literally, even if the results are sometimes harsh." Id., 63 F.3d at 881. Negligent or inadvertent omissions "do not vitiate the failure to disclose." Id. The failure to comply with the disclosure rules is a sanctionable violation, even if proper disclosure would have shown that the attorney had not actually violated any Bankruptcy Code provision or Bankruptcy Rule. Id., 63 F.3d at 880.

2. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Concluded that Phon's Failure to Disclose His Connections to Doris Ma was Sanctionable.

Here, the bankruptcy court correctly followed applicable law in concluding that Phon failed to comply with Section 327 and Rule 2014(a) by failing to disclose his connections with Doris Ma in his initial and amended employment applications and verified statements. As indicated above, Ma was a creditor in the Debtor's case by virtue of her landlord, employee and guarantor ties to the Debtor. (See pp. 4-5 above). She also was the debtor in a related bankruptcy case, with Phon as her bankruptcy counsel, and the ex-wife of the Debtor's sole owner. (Id.)

Phon does not dispute any one of the foregoing ties, their depth, or that he also failed to amend his employment application and verified statement at any point to disclose his connections. To the contrary, Phon now admits he failed to disclose his connections in the Debtor's case. (Opening Brief, p.8, l.9-10).

In this regard, Phon points to other filed papers he prepared which refer to the Debtor's ties to Doris Ma, (Opening Brief, p.8, l.1-11). But, the Ninth Circuit has long held that such extraneous references fail to satisfy the applicable regulatory requirement of attorney disclosure. In re Haldeman Pipe & Supply Co., 417 F.2d 1302, 1304-05 (9th Cir. 1969)(strictly construing General Order No. 44 under Bankruptcy Act). Pursuant to the unambiguous provisions of Rule 2014(a), it is in "the application" and "verified statement" in which all connections must be disclosed, not any other papers. Fed.R.Bankr.P. 2014(a). Thus, it is not sufficient that information concerning an applicant's connections "might be mined from petitions, schedules, section 341 meeting testimony, or other sources." In re American Thrift & Loan Ass'n, 137 B.R. 381, 387 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1992) (disallowing all fees of debtor's counsel due to failure to disclose receipt of potential preferences), In re Hathaway Ranch Partnership, 116 B.R. 208, 219-20 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1990) (denying debtor's counsel's revised employment applica- tion where connections not disclosed in original application). See also 9 Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶2014.04, at 2014-6 (15th ed. 2004) ("The fact that disclosure was made elsewhere [ ] is not likely to ameliorate a court's reaction to incomplete disclosure.")

Alone, Phon's failure to disclose his connections to Doris Ma justified the disallowance of all his fees and disgorgement under Ninth Circuit law. While Phon also is quick to point out that the bankruptcy court and the U.S. Trustee became aware of his connections, (Opening Brief, p.4, l.4-8), this transparent attempt to displace his non-compliance also fails. As Judge Tchaikovsky noted, (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.16, l.25 - p.17, l.19), a bankruptcy court simply has no duty to search the file to ferret out information about either a lawyer's adverse interests or other evidence of his noncompliance with Section 327. In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1317 (3rd Cir. 1991). Like the court, the U.S. Trustee also has no duty to search the record for connections or conflicts. In re Marine Outlet, Inc., 135 B.R. 154, 156 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1991). Thus, the court properly recognized that only Phon bore the burden of disclosing all connections – not the court, the U.S. Trustee, or any other party.

3. Phon's Failure to Disclose Exactly When His Retainer was Paid was Also Properly Sanctionable.

In addition to not disclosing his connections to Doris Ma, Phon received a $3,830 post-petition retainer without either proper disclosure or prior court authority. Exactly like the offending lawyer in Lewis, Phon misrepresented the timing of his retainer payments. Counsel in Lewis received $30,000 of his $40,000 retainer post-petition, but disclosed in an amended employment application that he had received the entire retainer pre-petition.

Id., 113 F.3d at 1042-43. Here, Phon received his entire retainer post-petition, in 1999, but disclosed for five years in his Rule 2016(b) statement that it had been paid pre-petition. Only in his amended Fee Application, in 2004, did Phon disclose that he had been paid the retainer post-petition. Even further, Phon failed to seek or obtain court approval for his post-petition retainer under either Section 363(b)(1) or the seminal law of this Panel. United States Trustee v. Knudsen Corp. (In re Knudsen Corp.), 84 B.R. 668 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1988). Phon's acceptance of an unauthorized post-petition retainer also violated Section 330(a). 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1).

Again, either alone, or coupled with Phon's failure to disclose his connections to Doris Ma, (see pp.16-18 above), this misrepresentation justified the disallowance of all of Phon's fees and disgorgement under Ninth Circuit law. Phon offered no explanation or justification for this critical five-year misrepresentation in the lower court. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p. 15, l.19). His Opening Brief also is completely silent about the post-petition payment of his retainer.

The bankruptcy court correctly held that Phon's misrepresentation concerning his retainer violates Rule 2016(b), justifying wholesale disallowance and disgorgement.[4] In [4] In note 8 of its Memorandum, the bankruptcy court calculated the disgorge- ment amount of $43,262 as the sum of (a) the $3,830 retainer, (b) $29,262 in "pre-petition" funds the Debtor paid Phon, and (c) $14,000 in "post-petition" payments. Because these three components actually add up to $46,092, rather than $43,262, the U.S. Trustee has re-examined the arithmetic, and the three separate sources of money constituting the court's total disgorgement amount.

According to the U.S. Trustee's calculation, the court's $43,262 total actually is the sum of (a) the $3,830 retainer (including the filing fee); (b) $25,432 in "pre-confirmation" (not "pre-petition") funds the Debtor paid Phon, which Phon applied post-confirmation, (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.18, l.15-17); and (c) $14,000 in "post-confirmation" (not "post-petition") payments, (Id., p.20, l.14-17).

Thus, the court's $43,262 total disgorgement amount is correct, but in a minor

Park-Helena, the Ninth Circuit held that, by failing to disclose the payment of his retainer by the corporate debtor's president, the debtor's attorney violated the disclosure requirements of Rules 2014 and 2016(b). Id., 63 F.3d at 880-882. In so holding, the Ninth Circuit noted that the fiduciary duties of disclosure under Rule 2014(a) and Rule 2016(b) are similar and overlapping. Id., 63 F.3d at 881. ("The disclosure requirements of Rule 2014 are applied as strictly as the requirements of Rule 2016 and section 329 ..."). Thus, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the disallowance of all fees for counsel's violations. Id.

4. Phon's Violation of the Confirmation Order Also Warranted Disgorgement.

In disallowing Phon's fees, the bankruptcy court also concluded that Phon ignored the provisions of the Plan requiring creditor distributions from the money in his trust account. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.18, l.4 - p.20, l.8). In response, Phon argues that, once Morgan Lincoln sought reconsideration of the confirmation order, he "was caught in an awkward situation." (Opening Brief, p.13, l.17). That is, on the one hand, he would be violating the order by not making timely distribu- tions, and on the other hand, he believed he could be personally liable if he made the distributions and the order were later vacated. (Id., p.13, l.17-22).

Phon's argument, made without citation to any authorities whatsoever, (id.), fails precisely for the two reasons the bankruptcy court noted. That is, first, the motion for reconsideration did not prevent the confirmation order from becoming final. Fed.R.Bankr.P. 9024; Fed.R.Civ.P. 60(b) ("A motion under this subdivision (b) does not affect the finality of a judgment or suspend its operation.") And second, in a sharp retort oversight, the court's semantical references to the three components were slightly mistaken. That is, the court used the terms "pre-petition" and "post-petition," to actually refer to "pre-confirmation" and "post-confirmation," respectively.

In his Opening Brief, Phon does not dispute either the total disgorgement amount, any of its component parts, or the court's semantical references.

to his personal liability argument, Phon also made most of the creditor distributions before the court disposed of the reconsideration motion. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.19, l.11 - p.20, l.8). As Phon admits, no party in interest – himself included – sought a stay of the confirmation order. (Opening Brief, p.14, l.7-9). His "awkward situation" argument, moreover, fails to take account of both the insulating effect of the final confirmation order, and its commanding nature.[5]

Given the clear Plan provisions specifying the use to which the money held by Phon was to be put, Phon violated his Plan obligations by appropriating the money for himself, rather than using it as the Plan directed. Although Phon alleges he did so to protect the funds and himself, the lower court did not accept that characterization, and instead determined Phon transferred those funds to himself in satisfaction of his fees. (Id., p.19, l.11 - p.20, l.8). That is not clearly erroneous, and merits affirmance.

In disallowing Phon's fees for a different violation of the confirmation order, the court also concluded that Phon applied to his post-confirmation fees $25,342 of funds paid to him prior to confirmation, without prior notice and court approval. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.18, l.12-17). Phon does not dispute that the payments were for attorney fees, or that they violated the unambiguous requirements of Articles G and L of the confirmed Plan, requiring post-confirmation approval and reserving jurisdiction, respectively. (Id., p.12, l.13-15). The court's findings here, too, are not clearly erroneous and merit affirmance.[6]

[5] In this regard, Phon mistakenly asserts that the U.S. Trustee and the Debtor failed to raise his non-compliance with the confirmation order in the lower court. (Opening Brief, p.13, l.2-3). The U.S. Trustee indeed did so in her supplemental objection to Phon's Fee Application. (U.S. TRUSTEE, App., Exh. F, p. 76, l.13-15).

[6] With respect to the lower court's sanctioning of Phon for his non-disclosure of post-confirmation fees, (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A., p.20, l.24-26),

5. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Concluded that Phon's Failure to Seek Approval of the Plan Down Payments was Sanctionable.

In disallowing Phon's fees, the bankruptcy court also concluded that the $35,932 cash which the Debtor transferred to Phon pre-confirmation for eventual creditor distributions was a transfer outside the ordinary course of business, for which he did not seek or obtain court approval under Section 363(b)(1). (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.17, l.3 - p.18, l.18). In Monday-morning quarter- backing, and without citation to any authorities, Phon purports to split hairs. (Opening Brief, p.15, l.16 - p.16, l.26).

The court's conclusion was sound. First, Phon did not treat the transfers as "down payments" for later creditor distributions. Rather, he returned some of the money to the Debtor, and paid himself with the balance. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.17, l.20 - p.18, l.5). Second, even had Phon made the distributions, it was not he who had disbursing authority under the Plan and confirmation order. Instead, it was Zili Yu, the President of the Debtor, who was designated as disbursing agent. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. F, p. 70, l.11-12). Third, as the court stated, the "down payments" were entirely undisclosed. Phon presented no evidence that the transfers were disclosed on the Debtor's operating reports. Quite the contrary, in all of the Debtor's disclosure statements – which Phon was drafting and filing at precisely the same time as he was receiving the "down payments" – he failed to reveal his receipt and continued possession of the money. (Id., at p. 77, l.12-24).

Phon questions whether he was required to file post-confirmation Rule 2016(b) statements. (Opening Brief, p.16, l.27 - p.19, l.11). In light of Phon's pre-confirmation non-disclosures, however, the Panel need not reach the question of whether Rule 2016(b) applies post-confirmation. Cf., John G. Berg Assocs. v. Township of Pennsauken (In re John G. Berg Assocs.), 138 B.R. 782, 787 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1992)("There is no end-point to the application of § 329 and F.R.B.P. 2016."); and In re Florence Tanners, Inc., 209 B.R. 439, 444 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1997)(nothing in confirmed plan excuses counsel from filing a Rule 2016(b) statement).

Also, the transfers were highly unorthodox. In the U.S. Trustee's experience, very rare is it that chapter 11 debtors make pre-confirmation transfers to their lawyers for post-confirmation distributions. If anything, it is the U.S. Trustee's experience that the few debtors-in-possession able to segregate cash for plan purposes prior to confirmation establish self-managed reserves that are held at approved depositories under Section 345, and disclosed in their operating reports.

6. The Panel Should Give No Weight to Misconstructions and Misleading Characterizations in Phon's Opening Brief.

In disallowing Phon's fees, the bankruptcy court's independent review of Phon's time records further led it to conclude that he failed to disclose the December, 2001 marriage between the Debtor's principal, Cheung, and Alice Huang. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.21, l.10 - p.22, l.7). The court's time-record review also led it to conclude that Phon assisted Cheung in arranging for a third party – Huang – to act on his behalf to purchase the Debtor's foreclosed real estate. (Id.) Phon spends considerable energy alleging for the first time that he failed to disclose the marriage between Huang and Cheung because he discovered it later, and that he simply did not counsel Cheung to purchase the Debtor's real estate. (See Opening Brief, at p.4, l.14 - p.12, l.17). Phon also contends that, in light of the court's independent, post-hearing review of his time records, he had no opportunity to explain his individual time entries. (Id., p. 10, l.27 - p.12, l.1).

Phon's explanations misconstrue the court's Memorandum, and are also misleading. In any event, even if true, Phon's allegations constitute harmless error.

The bankruptcy court did not base its disallowance on Phon's failure to disclose the 2001 Huang-Cheung marriage in his 1999 employment application and verified statement. Rather, the court appears to have pointed to Phon's failure to disclose the marriage in the proposed compromise between the Debtor and Morgan Lincoln, of which Huang was a principal. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.21, l.21 - p.22, l.4). Phon prepared and filed that failed proposal in January, 2002, i.e., after Huang and Cheung were married. (Id., p.5, l.9-13).

Otherwise, Phon's argument that he had no opportunities to explain his abbreviated time records is misleading. To begin with, as the fee applicant, it was Phon's burden to present both decipherable time records, and a Fee Application narrative explaining such records. Woods v. City Nat. Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268 (1941); Pfeiffer v. Couch (In re Xebec), 147 B.R. 518, 524 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1992); In re S.T.N. Enters., Inc., 70 B.R. 823, 833-34 (Bankr. D. Vt. 1987). The court, moreover, was entitled to exercise its independent duty to review Phon's time records. In re Busy Beaver Bldg. Centers., Inc., 19 F.3d 833, 843-44 (3rd Cir. 1994).

But, more importantly, Phon was given at least five opportunities to explain his time records – but he never did. Not only did Phon have (1 and 2) the narratives to his two fee applications, but he also had (3) his own testimony at the evidentiary hearings, where he was represented by separate counsel, (App., Exhs. 16-18), (4) his post-hearing papers (U.S. TRUSTEE, App., Exh. G), and (5) his motion to reconsider the Fee Order, (App., Exh. 12), which was denied.[7] Therefore, relative to the ordinary fee applicant, the court actually conferred Phon with numerous significant opportunities to elaborate on his time records.

B. Alternatively, the Bankruptcy Court Acted Within its Discretion Under the Compensation Provisions of the Bankruptcy Code in Denying A Portion of Phons's Fee Request.

[7] Phon's reconsideration motion, though not on appeal, is significant; it is there that Phon specifically contended that he first knew of the Cheung-Huang marriage only after it happened, and of Huang's possible involvement in Great International's foreclosure sale. (See App., Exh. 12.)

Phon's many instances of misconduct – separately and collectively – justified the bankruptcy court's total disallowance of fees. If this Panel affirms the court's Fee Order, it need not consider the subsidiary issue of whether the court erred in reducing Phon's fee request. But, should this Panel reach that issue, it should affirm the reduction, given the lower court's findings and the record before it.

In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to an attorney, bankruptcy courts are required to consider the nature, extent, and value of services rendered to the estate, taking into account all statutorily-enumerated factors. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). Section 330(a)(4)(A) prohibits the court from allowing compensation for services that were not either reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate nor necessary to its proper administration. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4)(A); Smith v. Hale (In re Smith), 305 F.3d 1078, 1085-86 (9th Cir. 2002).

Counsel has the duty to exercise proper billing judgment. Unsecured Creditors' Comm. v. Puget Sound Plywood, Inc., 924 F.2d 955, 958-59 (9th Cir. 1991). In assessing such judgment, or lack thereof, bankruptcy courts must consider events reasonably known and anticipated at the time services were rendered, rather than exercise judicial hindsight. Smith, 305 F.3d at 1806. Thus, before undertaking a project, counsel "is obligated to consider": (1) whether the probable cost of legal services is disproportionate to the probable benefit, (2) the extent to which the estate or creditors will suffer if the services are not rendered, (3) the extent to which the estate or creditors will benefit if the services are rendered, and (4) the likelihood of the disputed issues being resolved successfully. Puget Sound, 924 F.2d at 959. If counsel fails either to consider these factors or scale fees accordingly despite considering them, then the excess fees must be subtracted from the allowance requested. Id. As measured in cost-benefit terms, unjustifiable services and services that do not benefit the estate also must be disallowed. In re Riverside-Linden Investment Co., Inc., 925 F.2d 320, 322 (9th Cir. 1991).

As the applicant, Phon bore the burden of establishing that he met these compensation standards. Woods, 312 U.S. at 268; Xebec, 147 B.R. at 524. As set forth below, even had Phon not misrepresented his connections and the circumstances of his retainer, he failed to meet this burden under Section 330.

C. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Err in Concluding That Over Half of Phon's Pre-Confirmation Fees Were Unreasonable Under Section 330.

The court found that $15,733.33 of Phon's $33,840 total pre-confirmation fees were unreasonable. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A., p. 11, l.13-16). Phon disputes neither this finding nor its sub-parts, and the court below did not err in reducing Phon's fee request in that amount.

First, under the circumstances, the bankruptcy court was well within its discretion in finding unreasonable and disallowing fees for services rendered during the five-and-a-half month period preceding the entry of the retention order. It is hornbook bankruptcy law that a chapter 11 lawyer's failure to obtain a retention order simply precludes the payment of his fees. Okamoto v. THC Fin'l Corp. (THC Fin'l Corp.), 837 F.2d 389 (9th Cir. 1988); DeRonde v. Shirley (In re Shirley), 134 B.R. 940, 943 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1992); 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). There "is no unjust hardship in requiring attorneys to observe the strict requirements of § 327 because professionals are charged with knowledge of the law." Andrew v. Coopersmith (In re Downtown Investment Club III), 89 B.R. 59, 63-64 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1987).

Second, Phon never sought or obtained a retroactive retention order. That is, he never presented any evidence trying to justify his delays in filing his employment applications, and never established the existence of extraordinary circumstances justifying retroactive relief. Atkins v. Wain, Samuel & Co. (In re Atkins), 69 F.3d 970, 973 (9th Cir.

1995). Therefore, in light of the strict scriptures of Section 330 and binding law, the bankruptcy court indeed was obligated to disallow Phon's pre-retention fees.[8]

The court's discretion also extended properly to excessive fees Phon incurred drafting serial disclosure statements and plans of the Debtor. Phon drafted seven total versions of these papers, the first six of which had "substantive" and "techni- cal" faults, rendering them unapprovable. If anything, because the court held that fees for only the second and third amended versions of the papers were excessive, rather than fees for also the fourth through seventh versions, it actually gave Phon substantial deference respecting this particular task. In chapter 11, fees incurred in drafting unconfirmable plans are at risk. See In re Wire Cloth Prods, Inc., 130 B.R. 798, 807-08 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1991) (disallowing half of fees requested by debtor's attorney for drafting a plan that was "invalid as a matter of law.")

Furthermore, the lower court did not abuse its discretion in determining that Phon's inept drafting of serial disclosure statements and plans – even when told how to fix the documents – needlessly multiplied the proceedings. There was substantial, undisputed support in the record for that finding. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A., p.11, l.3-13). Fees incurred in needlessly multiplicative proceedings may be disallowed. Riverside-Linden, 925 F.2d at 324-25. Thus, the lower court acted within its discretion in disallowing those fees here.

Furthermore, the lower court acted well within its discretion in disallowing fees for excessive time reviewing plan ballots. Indeed, the Bankruptcy Code specifically directs the court to examine "whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the [ ] task addressed." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(D).

[8] In Doris Ma's related chapter 11 case, the bankruptcy court denied allowance of all of Phon's requested fees, totaling $83,990, based largely on Phon's unjustified failure to obtain a retention order. (U.S. TRUSTEE, App., Exh. H, p.90).

Also well within the court's discretion was the disallowance of fees for services rendered to another estate. See In re Main, Inc., 239 B.R. 59, 71 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1999) (ordering return of fees attributable to services not benefitting debtor's estate). Similarly, Judge Tchaikovsky was well within her discretion to find unreasonable all fees for services rendered for the benefit of the Debtor's principal, rather than the Debtor. Bankruptcy courts ordinarily deny such fees. See, e.g., In re Angelika Films 57th, Inc., 227 B.R. 29 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1998) (disallowing all fees sought by counsel to corporate chapter 11 debtor, where attorneys represented interests of debtor's principal over those of estate).

In light of the foregoing, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that over half of Phon's pre-confirmation fees were unreasonable.

D. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Concluding That $31,840 of Phon's Post-Confirmation Fees Were Unreasonable Under Section 330.

The court found that $31,840 of Phon's $62,100 total post-confirmation fees were unreasonable. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.11, l.24-p.13, l.2). That finding was not clearly erroneous, and the court below did not abuse its discretion in reducing fees in light of that finding. In particular, the court ruled that it had post-confirmation jurisdiction to adjudicate Phon's fees, held that 50 percent of fees Phon incurred litigating Morgan Lincoln's post-confirmation motions was reasonable, and noted many other shortcomings with Phon's post-confirmation services and Fee Application. (Id.). These determinations have not been disputed by Phon, were entirely proper exercises of discretion, and should be upheld.

First, based on the clear and specific terms of Articles G and L of the confirmed Plan, the bankruptcy court correctly held that it had post-confirmation jurisdiction to adjudicate the allowance of Phon's pre- and post-confirmation fees, and that Phon was required to apply for an allowance order prior to the payment of such fees. (Id., p.12, l.8 - p.13, l.3) Even without specific jurisdictional provisions, bankruptcy courts generally have "broad authority to oversee implementation of the plan." Captain Blythers, Inc. v. Thompson (In re Captain Blythers, Inc.), 311 B.R. 530, 537-38 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2004), quoting In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities, 264 F.3d 803, 807 (9th Cir. 2001). Confirmation of a chapter 11 plan does not automatically divest a bankruptcy court of jurisdiction, and bankruptcy courts "must" retain post-confirmation jurisdiction – including over fee matters – to ensure the plans they confirm are consummated. Chase Manhattan Bank v. Sultan Corp. (In re Sultan Corp.), 81 B.R. 599, 602 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1987) (post-confirmation compensation adjudicated pursuant to retention of jurisdiction in confirmed plan). Here, not only did the confirmed Plan expressly reserve jurisdiction for the allowance of all of Phon's fees, but it also specifically required Phon to seek an allowance order. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.11, l.8-15). The court, furthermore, had substantial support in the record for its conclusion that the non-estate source of the funds used to pay Phon's post-confirmation fees did not excuse him from seeking an allowance order, as the Plan expressly required. First, as the court noted, Articles G and L of the Plan did not provide for the automatic allowance of Phon's fees to the extent paid with non-estate property. (U.S. TRUSTEE App., Exh. A, p.12, l.15-16). Furthermore, to the extent paid by the Debtor, the funds used to pay Phon post-confirmation had not revested in the Debtor by virtue of confirmation. In re Powers, 93 B.R. 513, 516-17 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 1988) (plan provision reserving post-confirmation jurisdiction over compensation to professionals negates automatic revesting provision of Section 1141(b)).

Also, the court correctly concluded that Phon unjustifiably continued negotiating a compromise with Morgan Lincoln, after she had both denied approval of the compromise and advised Phon of the specific substantive problem with the deal. In chapter 11 cases, bankruptcy courts routinely disallow fees for legal services incurred in pursuing needless compromises that fail to meet approval. See In re Big Rivers Elec. Corp., 233 B.R. 768, 784-88 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 1999).

Last, the court also found that Phon "clumped" the entries in his time records and charged his time in unauthorized increments in his Fee Application.[9] Clumping disparate time entries into a single entry aggravates a court's review of a fee appli- cation, by preventing it from determining whether each discrete task in the "clump" was completed within a reasonable period of time. Hence, fees for services which have been lumped together may be disallowed. In re Dutta, 175 B.R. 41, 46-47 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1994) (upholding disallowance based on " 'lumping' problem.")

For the foregoing reasons, it was an entirely appropriate exercise of judicial discretion for the bankruptcy court to hold that over 50 percent of the fees Phon incurred post-confirmation was unreasonable.

VII. CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the bankruptcy court's Fee Order in its entirety.

INTRODUCTION

On December 18, 2009, CRG Partners Group, LLC, applied for a $1 million fee enhancement under 11 U.S.C. § 330. The United States Trustee filed an objection to CRG's application, arguing that CRG had already received $5.98 million in reasonable compensation, as calculated pursuant to the hourly rates provided in CRG's retention agreement. The bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee and denied CRG's application. This appeal followed.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), which confers jurisdiction on the district courts of the United States to hear appeals "from final judgments, orders, and decrees" of bankruptcy judges. The bankruptcy court's final order denying CRG's application for a fee enhancement under section 330 was entered on June 20, 2010. CRG timely filed a notice of appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on July 2, 2010.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion when it denied CRG's request for a fee enhancement because CRG had already received reasonable compensation?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's fee determination is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Caplin & Drysdale v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. (In re Babcock & Wilcox Co.), 526 F.3d 824, 826 (5th Cir. 2008) (per curiam). "A bankruptcy court abuses its discretion when it (1) applies an improper legal standard or follows improper procedures in calculating the fee award or (2) rests its decision on findings of fact that are clearly erroneous." Id. (citation omitted). "This Court reviews the bankruptcy court's findings of fact for clear error and its legal conclusions de novo." Id.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Statutory Framework

A. The compensation of a chapter 11 debtor's professionals under 11 U.S.C. § 330.

When a debtor files a bankruptcy case to reorganize under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, the debtor becomes a "debtor-in-possession." 11 U.S.C. § 1101. The debtor-in-possession maintains control over the debtor's property, but also obtains rights, powers, and fiduciary duties. 11 U.S.C. §§ 1106-08. This control includes the ability to hire employees to manage business operations, 11 U.S.C. § 363(b), and to retain professionals to assist the debtor-in-possession with the reorganization of the bankruptcy estate. 11 U.S.C. §§ 327-28. When a debtor in possession employs a professional in both respects, such as with restructuring professionals like CRG, the professional may be retained as an employee of the estate, but remains subject to the Bankruptcy Code's requirements governing notices and disclosures, conflicts of interest, and bankruptcy court supervision of the professional's fees. See 11 U.S.C.

§§ 327, 330; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014, 2016(a).

Section 330 allows a bankruptcy court to award "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the . . . professional." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). "The court may, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States Trustee . . . award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested" to a reasonable amount. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). "In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to a [professional], the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including —

(A) the time spent on such services;

(B) the rates charged for such services;

(C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title;

(D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the problem, issue, or task addressed;

(E) with respect to a professional person, whether the person is board certified or otherwise has demonstrated skill and experience in the bankruptcy field; and

(F) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3) (emphasis added).

B. The United States Trustee's statutory duty to review and object to section 330 fee applications under 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A).

The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases in this district. 28 U.S.C. § 581(a)(6). The United States Trustee has a statutory obligation to review applications for compensation under section 330 and to object to applications the United States Trustee considers to be inappropriate. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A).

II. Statement of the Facts

The Pilgrim's Pride Corporation produces and distributes chicken and chicken-related products. R. 851-52. In December 2008, Pilgrim's Pride and six related entities filed for chapter 11 bankruptcy relief. R. 2009:20.

In the five years prior to filing for bankruptcy relief, Pilgrim's Pride had employed Bain Consulting to assist with restructuring its operations. R. 2035:7. Pilgrim's Pride, however, was dissatisfied with Bain and sought to replace them prior to filing for bankruptcy relief. R. 2036:9. Pilgrim's Pride therefore interviewed five candidates for the position of Chief Restructuring Officer. R. 2035:11. A Pilgrim's Pride director testified that Pilgrim's Pride interviewed restructuring candidates based on qualifications and hourly rates. R. 2047:15-25; 2048:17-23.

CRG participated in the bidding to replace Bain, and offered to charge less than market rates to win the business from the competitors: $550 per hour. R. 2057:18-2058:20. Employing CRG allowed Pilgrim's Pride to save "a lot of money in excess fees" in comparison to Bain. R. 2045:21-22. Subsequently, CRG was employed under section 363(b). R. 888.

Although the Bankruptcy Code determines compensation under section 330(a) only for those bankruptcy professionals appointed by the court under section 327(a) and 1103(a), the section 363(b) order provided that CRG's fees would be determined under a section 330 "reasonableness standard." R. 890. The order, by approving the section 363(b) application, also provided that CRG would receive compensation for additional personnel at $175-550 per hour, reimbursement for all out-of-pocket expenses, an additional 4.5% of fees paid for administrative expenses, the bi-weekly payment of professional fees and expenses, and a substantial retainer. R. 856. And unlike some other professionals retained in the bankruptcy case, CRG did not include a provision for a bonus or a contingent success fee that would be reviewed under section 330 standards. See, e.g., R. 919 (approving a success fee); R. 936 (discussing a success fee or restructuring fee disclosed in the employment application). In total, CRG offered to charge less than Bain was charging to oversee and manage Pilgrim's Pride's entire reorganization process. R. 2035-36.

This arrangement continued unchanged throughout the bankruptcy case, which proceeded in "a very traditional way." R. 2010:4-16 (reviewing the history of the bankruptcy case). In the midst of the reorganization, another company, JBS Group, offered to purchase Pilgrim's Pride and sponsor the chapter 11 reorganization plan. Id. (describing the JBS Group's offer as "key to the company's emergence" from bankruptcy). The sale price was sufficient to provide for the full payment of all creditors, with some recovery to equity security holders. Id. The plan was confirmed and became effective on December 28, 2009. Id.

III. Statement of the Proceedings Below

After the chapter 11 reorganization plan had been confirmed, the bankruptcy court approved $5.98 million in reasonable compensation under the lodestar calculation, based upon the hourly rates provided in the employment order. R. 2110. CRG then filed an amended application "for an upward adjustment to its reasonable fees" under section 330. R. 891. Although CRG did not specify the amount of the upward adjustment in the motion, it later clarified that it was seeking a $1 million fee enhancement. R. 2027.

In support of this application, CRG argued that there were two reasons justifying an upward adjustment based on the lodestar calculation of its fees under section 330. The first was CRG's "exceptional efficiency" and the "spectacular" result of the full repayment to all creditors. R. 898-99. The second was that CRG, as the restructuring firm, received compensation that was significantly lower than what the financial advisors and investment bankers received due to its below-market billing rates. R. 900-03. CRG stated that had it billed at comparable rates, it would have received an additional $3 million. R. 901.

The United States Trustee objected to CRG's application for a fee enhancement. R. 1956. The United States Trustee argued that CRG already received reasonable compensation for its services under the section 330 lodestar calculation. R. 1959-61. A fee enhancement was not necessary because CRG was compensated at the billing rates it proposed when it competitively bid to be employed by Pilgrim's Pride, rates which were approved by the bankruptcy court in CRG's application for employment. R. 1961. Furthermore, there were no exceptional circumstances or delays that the bankruptcy court failed to consider when determining reasonable compensation, nor any factor relating to CRG's skills and experience that was not already incorporated into its billing rate. Id.

A hearing on the fee enhancement was held on June 1, 2010. R. 2006-99. At the hearing, the bankruptcy court received testimony regarding CRG's performance in the case and heard argument regarding the correct standard for determining whether a fee enhancement should be awarded under section 330. Id.

First, CRG called Blake Lovette, a member of Pilgrim's Pride's board of directors, who testified about Pilgrim's Pride's successful reorganization. R. 2033-44. Lovette stated that CRG did an excellent job facilitating the operational and financial restructuring, which saved Pilgrim's Pride a lot of time and money. R. 2045-46. But Lovette also testified that there were other major factors that contributed to the successful reorganization, including:

1. Don Jackson, Pilgrim's Pride's new chief executive officer, who was hired during Pilgrim's Pride bankruptcy, was a "superior operating person . . . he was able to effect a turnaround program that led the company out of a negative cash flow." R. 2040:22; R. 2041:8;
2. A substantial improvement in commodity feed prices, which was a "big factor" that led to Pilgrim's Pride bankruptcy filing. R. 2044:16-23; R. 2048:24-2049:13; and
3. The willingness of JBS Group to sponsor the chapter 11 repayment plan. R. 2044:21-2045:2; R. 2051:5-24; 2064:6-23.

The bankruptcy court also heard from William Snyder, a managing partner from CRG who served as Pilgrim's Pride's chief restructuring officer. R. 2054. Mr. Snyder testified regarding his knowledge of other professionals' rates in the case, CRG's methods for monitoring its competitors' billing rates, and the below-market rates to win the employment contract with Pilgrim's Pride. R. 2056:1-16; R. 2058:6-20.

Finally, the bankruptcy court heard from Professor Nancy Rappoport, an expert on professional fees and the chair of Pilgrim's Pride's fee review committee. R. 2071. Professor Rappoport testified that although CRG did an excellent job, the result in the case could not be solely attributed to CRG's performance. R. 2082:3-7; R. 2084:18-25; R. 2085:1-2.

The parties also disputed what legal standard governed whether a fee enhancement is justified. After CRG applied for its fee enhancement, but prior to the July 1, 2010, hearing, the Supreme Court decided Perdue v. Kenny, 130 S. Ct. 1662 (2010). In Perdue, the Court held that a fee enhancement for superior performance or results in a lodestar calculation under a different statutory fee-shifting scheme was only available in three circumstances: (1) when the "lodestar calculation does not adequately measure the attorney's true market value," such that the attorney would not be compensated at the rate the attorney would receive outside of fee-shifting statutes; (2) "if the attorney's performance includes an extraordinary outlay of expenses and the litigation is exceptionally protracted"; or (3) if there has been an "exceptional delay in the payment of fees." Perdue, 130 S. Ct. at 1674-75. At the hearing, the parties presented this legal standard issue to the bankruptcy court.

CRG did not deny that if Perdue was instructive, there would be no factual basis for the bankruptcy court to grant CRG's application for a fee enhancement. R. 2088:11-14. Rather, CRG argued that Perdue was irrelevant because fee-shifting cases were not well suited to fee determinations in the bankruptcy context and that CRG deserved a fee enhancement based upon the relative amount of fees received by each professional pursuant to its lodestar calculation, based on In re Mirant Corp., 354 B.R. 113, 143-44 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006). R. 2089-2093.

The United States Trustee argued that the fee-shifting case law was relevant because the Fifth Circuit relies upon it when determining reasonable compensation under section 330. R. 2094:20-25; R. 2095:1-8. The United States Trustee also noted that other circuit courts have similarly relied on fee-shifting law when addressing enhancements, while explicitly recognizing the differences between fee shifting and fee determinations under section 330. R. 2029 (citing to Burgess v. Klenske (In re Manoa Fin. Co.), 853 F.2d 687, 690-91 (9th Cir. 1988) (reviewing the case law)).

The bankruptcy court announced its decision at a hearing on June 8, 2010. R. 2113. The bankruptcy court analyzed the interests behind fee shifting statutes and section 330 and concluded that those interests "suggest that Perdue should apply with greater force in bankruptcy cases than fee shifting cases." R. 2116:9-11. The bankruptcy court then analyzed whether a fee enhancement was necessary for CRG to receive reasonable compensation under the Perdue criteria, with adjustments to conform the analysis to bankruptcy practice. R. 2117:1-13. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court denied CRG's request for a fee enhancement. R. 2122:5-6.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

In this case, the United States Trustee objected to CRG's application for a $1 million fee enhancement under section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code because CRG had already received $5.98 million as reasonable compensation for its services. The bankruptcy court, after considering the testimony, evidence, and legal arguments presented by the parties, agreed with the United States Trustee and denied CRG's application for a fee enhancement. The bankruptcy court held that the $5.98 million in compensation pursuant to the billing rates CRG agreed to in its retention agreement was presumptively reasonable. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court held that there were no circumstances to indicate that a fee enhancement was necessary to provide reasonable compensation under the standard established by the Supreme Court in Perdue v. Kenny. 130 S. Ct. 1662 (2010).

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it entered the order denying the enhancement. First, the bankruptcy court did not err when it decided that the billing rates CRG agreed to in its retention agreement were sufficient to provide a reasonable rate of compensation under the section 330 lodestar determination. The record shows that CRG deliberately under-priced its services in comparison to its competitors to win the restructuring contract with Pilgrim's Pride and that the superior result in Pilgrim's Pride's bankruptcy case could not be solely attributed to CRG's efforts. CRG could have negotiated for higher rates or a contingency fee. It chose not to do so. Section 330 does not require that all professionals be compensated at comparable billing rates. That other professionals such as financial advisors and investment bankers were able to negotiate greater compensation does not render CRG's decision to accept employment at a lower rate unreasonable under the Bankruptcy Code.

In contrast to the bankruptcy court's reasoned findings, CRG's arguments on appeal are unpersuasive and inconsistent. CRG argues that the Supreme Court's fee-shifting jurisprudence should not apply in bankruptcy cases. But this case is decided under Fifth Circuit law, and since 1977, the Fifth Circuit's section 330 jurisprudence has referenced fee-shifting case law. Therefore, the bankruptcy court was correct to deny CRG's request for a $1 million fee enhancement under Perdue.

The bankruptcy court applied the correct legal standard, and its factual determinations were based upon ample evidence in the record. Thus, this Court should affirm the order entered below. But if this Court holds that the bankruptcy court applied the wrong legal standard, then remand — not reversal, as CRG asserts — would be appropriate for the bankruptcy court to consider CRG's application for a fee enhancement under the applicable standard.

ARGUMENT

I. The bankruptcy court correctly decided that a fee enhancement was not appropriate under 11 U.S.C. § 330 because CRG had already received reasonable compensation, as calculated pursuant to the hourly rates provided in CRG's retention agreement.[1]

Under section 330(a)(1)(A), a bankruptcy court may award "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services." § 330(a)(1)(A). The bankruptcy court is specifically authorized to award compensation that is less than the amount requested in the fee application. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). The Bankruptcy Code directs the bankruptcy court to "consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including" a non-exhaustive list of factors when determining if the compensation requested in a fee application is reasonable. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3) (listing factors such as the time spent on services, the rates charged for services, and whether the compensation is reasonable compared to equally skilled practitioners outside of bankruptcy practice); see 11 U.S.C. § 101(3) (stating that under title 11,

[1] Because the court below did not award a fee enhancement, it was not necessary for it to determine whether section 330 would allow one in other circumstances, and the United States Trustee takes no position on that issue in this appeal. R. 2029:23-2030:13.

“includes" and "including" are not limiting terms).

The legislative history of section 330 states that the purpose of the section is to strike a balance “between moderation in the interest of the estate and its security holders and the need to be ‘generous enough to encourage’ lawyers and others to render the necessary and exacting services that bankruptcy cases often require.” S. Rep. 95-989 (1978) at 40, reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5827. In light of the “sordid chapters” in the history of fees in corporate bankruptcy reorganizations, Congress recognized that bankruptcy fees are a matter of concern to the “public interest” and that in a bankruptcy case, “fees are not a matter for private agreement.” Id. Amendments to section 330 indicate Congress’s continuing concern with the “widespread disparity in the fees paid, in the standards and laws used to set them, and in the maneuvering lawyers used to get them.” 103 Cong. Rec. S. 14597 (Oct. 7, 1994) (statement of Sen. Metzenbaun).

Thus, in order to determine whether a fee award is reasonable, Congress required the bankruptcy courts to look at the cost of comparable services outside of bankruptcy. But this reference to the comparable cost of services is “a point of reference, not a controlling determinant of what shall be allowed in bankruptcy cases.” Id. The Third Circuit, for example, has described the purpose of section 330 as requiring the bankruptcy court to review “the fee application much as a sophisticated non-bankruptcy client would review a legal bill.” In re Busy Beaver Building Centers, 19 F.3d 833, 848 (3d Cir. 1994).

A fee applicant carries the burden of proving the reasonableness of the compensation under section 330. Caplin & Drysdale v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. (In re Babcock & Wilcox Co.), 526 F.3d 824, 827 (5th Cir. 2008) (per curiam)(citation omitted). The Fifth Circuit has "traditionally used the lodestar method" to determine a reasonable amount of professional fees under section 330. In re Cahill, 428 F.3d 536, 539 (5th Cir. 2005). The first step in determining a reasonable fee under the lodestar method is to multiply the number of hours reasonably worked by the prevailing community rates for similar work. Id. at 540. Once a reasonable fee has been calculated under the lodestar method, the inquiry often ends because of the strong presumption that the lodestar constitutes reasonable compensation. Pennsylvania v. Del. Valley Citizens' Council for Clean Air, 478 U.S. 546, 565 (1986). As described by the Supreme Court, the lodestar method is virtuous because it produces a fee award that approximates the fee that would be received in a comparable case, is "objective" and "readily administrable," permits meaningful judicial review, and produces "reasonably predictable results." Perdue v. Kenny. 130 S. Ct. 1662, 1672 (2010).

A bankruptcy court may take the second step when a professional is dissatisfied with the result of the lodestar determination. Within the Fifth Circuit, a bankruptcy court can adjust the lodestar rate in consideration of the factors listed in Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714, 717 (5th Cir. 1974), and the section 330 factors to ensure that the amount in an "atypical case will be adjusted to reflect the specifics of that case." Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539.

After a bankruptcy court determines the fee in accordance with section 330, the lodestar, and the applicable Johnson factors, the bankruptcy court can shift to the enhancement request. The applicant also bears the burden on the proof required for an enhancement. Perdue v. Kenny, 130 S.Ct.1662, 1672 (2010). As the Supreme Court has stated, "many of the Johnson factors 'are subsumed within the initial calculation' of the lodestar." Del. Valley Citizens' Council for Clean Air, 478 U.S. at 565 (citation omitted). Therefore, factors such as the "novelty [and] complexity of the issues," "the special skill and experience of counsel," the "quality of representation," and the "results obtained" from the litigation are presumably fully reflected in the lodestar amount, and thus cannot serve as independent bases for increasing the basic fee award. Id. "Although upward adjustments of the lodestar figure are still permissible [when authorized by applicable law], such modifications are proper only in certain "rare" and "exceptional" cases, supported by both "specific evidence" on the record and detailed findings" by the bankruptcy court. Id. The Supreme Court recently clarified that superior performance or the result obtained may only provide a basis for a fee enhancement in case where enhancement is authorized when it "is not adequately taken into account in the lodestar calculation," such as when the method used to determine the hourly rate does not reflect the market rate for the professional or when there have been exceptional delays in the payment of fees. Perdue, 130 S. Ct. at 1673-74.

Here, although CRG received less compensation than other professionals, the evidence in the record shows that the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that CRG received a reasonable fee under section 330. First, CRG's billing rate was the one it sought to gain an advantage over its competitors in acquiring the work. R. 2057:18-2058:20. The Bankruptcy Court expressed concern about professionals underbidding competitors at the commencement of the case and then equalizing the fees to the competitors' rates by seeking an enhancement. R. 2087. Second, CRG did not bear any significant risk of loss, as the retention agreement provided for the bi-weekly payment of all professional fees and expenses and a substantial retainer. R. 856. Third, as the bankruptcy court found there were no unanticipated circumstances that made the previously established rate unreasonable. R. 2120:1-13. Finally, the evidence at trial demonstrated that the exceptional results were not due solely to the performance of CRG. R. 2121:6-21. For example, the efforts of Pilgrim's Pride's chief executive officer Don Jackson, the improvement in commodity feed prices, and JBS Group's willingness to provide funding for the reorganization plan were all major factors that contributed to the success of the bankruptcy case. R. 2040-41; R. 2044-49; R. 2051:5-24; R. 2064:6-23.

Essentially, the bankruptcy court followed the statement in Perdue that "[t]here is nothing unfair about compensating these [professionals] . . . at the very rate they requested." Perdue, 130 S.Ct. at 1676 n.7. CRG was paid at the hourly rate it requested and accordingly received $5.98 million in fees for its services. Therefore, the bankruptcy court's order awarding CRG the compensation at the rate CRG requested at the beginning of the case should be affirmed.

II. CRG's argument that fee-shifting cases should not be considered relevant to fee awards under the Bankruptcy Code is inconsistent with the Fifth Circuit authority.

It has been the law of the Fifth Circuit for over 30 years — since 1977 — that the fee-shifting jurisprudence established in Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714, 717 (5th Cir. 1974), is "equally useful" whenever an award of fees is authorized by statute, including in bankruptcy. Am. Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Baddock (In re First Colonial Corp.), 544 F.2d 1291, 1298 (5th Cir. 1977). Johnson established twelve factors for a court to consider when determining if a fee award is reasonable. Johnson, 488 F.2d at 717-18 (listing those factors). Although they may require some modifications, these factors apply equally in other contexts because they "establish an objective basis for determining the amount of compensation that is reasonable" and make "meaningful review of that determination possible on appeal." First Colonial, 544 F.2d at 1298.

The adoption of the lodestar method for determining reasonable compensation under section 330 "further refined" the Johnson factors. Lawler v. Teofan (Matter of Lawler), 807 F.2d 1207, 1211 (5th Cir. 1987). As such, the Fifth Circuit has continued to hold that fee-shifting cases are "quite persuasive" when determining what is a "reasonable" fee under section 330. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 526 F.3d at 828; see, e.g., TransAmerican Natural Gas Corp. v. Zapata P'ship, Ltd. (In re Fender), 12 F.3d 480, 478 (5th Cir. 1994) see also Cahill, 428 F.3d at 541. Other circuit courts agree. See, e.g., Connolly v. Harris Trust Co. (In re Miniscribe Corp.), 309 F.3d 1234, 1244 (10th Cir. 2002); Boddy v. United States Bankruptcy Court (In re Boddy), 950 F.2d 334, 337 (6th Cir. 1991). These cases all indicate that the Fifth Circuit has already considered and rejected the distinctions between fee-shifting and bankruptcy cases that CRG depends upon in order to contend that Perdue should not apply. See Appellant's Brief at 22-23, 26-28. Just as the Fifth Circuit has incorporated the "reasonable and necessary" standards from fee shifting into bankruptcy, correspondingly three circuits have engrafted the enhancement standards from fee shifting cases into bankruptcy. In re UNR Indus., Inc., 986 F.2d 207 (7th Cir. 1993); In re Apex Oil Co., 960 F.2d 728 (8th Cir. 1992); Burgess v. Klenske (In re Manoa Fin.), 853 F.2d 687 (9th Cir. 1988); see also Fender, 12 F.3d at 488 (suggesting, without discussion, that enhancement allowed in bankruptcy through same fee shifting standards but remanding award). [2]

Still, CRG argues that it may receive a fee enhancement after the determination of its fees under the Johnson criteria. Appellant's Brief at 15-17. But Johnson is a civil-rights fee-shifting case. See Johnson, 488 F.2d at 715 (stating that the case concerns the adequacy of attorney's fees awarded in a Title VII class action). The Fifth Circuit has recently affirmed the significance of Johnson to the determination of reasonable compensation under section 330. See, e.g., Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539. CRG cannot reconcile its contention that the Supreme Court's decision in Perdue, a case involving an enhancement in a civil rights fee shifting case, has no import while simultaneously recognizing that the Fifth Circuit engrafts the fee review standards of the Johnson criteria into its section 330 determination.

FOR THE DISTRICT OF DELAWARE, SITTING IN BANKRUPTCY

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLANT

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The district's court order authorizing the retention of Jones, Day, Reavis and Pogue ("Jones Day") as counsel to the chapter 11 debtor is an appealable final order. See United States Trustee v. First Jersey Securities, Inc. (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504, 508 (3d Cir. 1999); In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 471 (3d Cir. 1998). The United States Trustee has standing to appeal from the retention order. See 11 U.S.C. § 307; United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 140 (3d Cir. 1994).

Because "this is an appeal from a district court exercising original jurisdiction in bankruptcy," this Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Marvel Entertainment Group, 140 F.3d at 470.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

In this Circuit, a law firm that has received a preferential transfer from the debtor in a chapter 11 reorganization bankruptcy is disqualified from representing the debtor. United States Trustee v. First Jersey Securities, Inc. (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504 (3d Cir. 1999).

The questions presented are:

I. Whether the district court erred in authorizing a law firm to represent a chapter 11 debtor when the court had not ruled upon the U.S. Trustee's objection that payments from the debtor to the law firm were preferential transfers.

II. Whether a law firm received preferential transfers when the debtor paid all of the firm's outstanding bills in full on the eve of bankruptcy, making a payment of $778,157.33 four days before the bankruptcy petitions were filed.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This case is an appeal from an order of the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, authorizing Pillowtex, Inc. to retain Jones Day as its chapter 11 bankruptcy counsel. The United States Trustee objected to Pillowtex's application to retain Jones Day, arguing that Jones Day had received payments from Pillowtex that were avoidable as preferences. The district court did not rule on the U.S. Trustee's objections, and did not determine whether or not Jones Day had received a preference. Instead, the court authorized Pillowtex's retention of Jones Day, and ordered that Jones Day would have to return the preference and waive fees if the preference issue were ever decided adversely to Jones Day.

The U.S. Trustee appeals the retention order.

FACTS AND PRIOR PROCEEDINGS

A. Statutes Principally At Issue.

This appeal involves the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code that apply when the debtor in possession in a reorganization bankruptcy case employs legal counsel to represent it. One provision in particular, 11 U.S.C. § 327(a), establishes general principles that apply to the employment of professional persons, including lawyers, by either the bankruptcy trustee or the debtor in possession.[1]

This case also involves the preference provision of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 547(b). That provision describes the circumstances under which the trustee or debtor in possession may avoid "preferences," payments made during the period shortly before the bankruptcy petition was filed and during which the debtor is presumed to have been insolvent.

The statutory basis for the United States Trustee's oversight of the application for employment is also relevant because the appeal is brought by the United States Trustee as part of his oversight of bankruptcy matters in Delaware.

i. 11 U.S.C. § 327(a): Employment of Professionals.

The Bankruptcy Code requires professionals who assist the bankruptcy trustee or the debtor in possession to have certain characteristics that allow them to perform their fiduciary obligations to the debtor loyally.[2] The professional must "not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). The professional must also be a "disinterested person[]." Ibid. A disinterested person is "not a creditor." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(A). Nor does a disinterested person have "an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors * * * by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor * * * or for any other reason." Id., § 101(14)(E).

Congress clarified in a separate provision of the Bankruptcy Code that a professional's prior relationship with an entity that goes into bankruptcy reorganization does not, standing alone, preclude the professional from continuing to represent the debtor. Rather, "[n]otwithstanding section 327 * * * a person is not disqualified for employment under section 327 of this title by a debtor in possession solely because of such person's employment by or representation of the debtor before the commencement of the case." 11 U.S.C. § 1107(b).

this case concerns a debtor in possession, rather than a trustee, we will refer in this brief to the obligations of the debtor in possession.

ii. 11 U.S.C. § 547(b): Preferences.

_____Congress in Section 547 authorized trustees and debtors in possession[3] to set aside certain transfers of funds to creditors, made shortly before the bankruptcy filing, as "preferences." Congress restricted the debtor's ability to extend preferential treatment to creditors for two reasons. First, "by permitting the trustee to avoid pre-bankruptcy transfers that occur within a short period before bankruptcy, creditors are discouraged from racing to the courthouse to dismember the debtor during the debtor's slide into bankruptcy." Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 547.01 (Lawrence P. King ed., 15th ed. 2000). "Second, and more important, the preference provisions facilitate the prime bankruptcy policy of equality of distribution among creditors of the debtor." Ibid.

The preference provision generally authorizes the debtor in possession to "avoid any transfer of an interest of the debtor in property" that satisfies five criteria. See 11 U.S.C. § 547(b). First, the transfer of the property interest must be "to or for the benefit of a creditor." Id., § 547(b)(1). The transfer must be made "for or on account of an antecedent debt owed by the debtor before such transfer was made," and it must have been "made while the debtor was insolvent." Id., § 547(b)(2) and (3). The transfer ordinarily must have been made "on or within 90 days before the date of the filing of the petition." Id., § 547(b)(4)(A).[4] Finally, it must allow the preferred creditor to "receive more than such creditor would receive" in a bankruptcy liquidation, if the transfer had never been made. Id., § 547(b)(5).

[3] Although the language of the Code refers to the powers of the Trustee to set aside avoidable preferences, a debtor in possession in a bankruptcy reorganization also may avoid preferential transfers under Section 547. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a) (providing that "a debtor in possession shall have all of the rights * * * and powers * * * of a trustee"); Matter of Hughes, 704 F.2d 820, 822 (5th Cir. 1983).

The preference provision also exempts from avoidance certain types of transfers that would otherwise be avoidable under the general principles of Section 547(b). See 11 U.S.C. § 547(c). The most important statutory exemption for purposes of this case is the exemption for payments made in the ordinary course of business. See 11 U.S.C. § 547(c)(2). This exemption is designed to "leave undisturbed normal financial relations, because it does not detract from the general policy of the preference section to discourage unusual action by either the debtor or his creditors during the debtor's slide into bankruptcy." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 373 (1977), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787,6329. Under Subsection (c)(2), the debtor in possession "may not avoid" a transfer that was made "in payment of a debt incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee" if the transfer is "made in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee" and is "made according to ordinary business terms." 11 U.S.C. § 547(c)(2).

iii. Oversight Responsibilities of the United States Trustee.

Congress has authorized the Attorney General to appoint twenty-one United States Trustees ("U.S. Trustees"), each to serve in a specific geographic region of the United States. See generally 28 U.S.C. § 581 et seq. (establishing U.S. Trustee Program). The U.S. Trustee must "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within his or her region through a range of oversight responsibilities. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3). See generally United States Trustee v. Columbia Gas Sys., Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Sys., Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994) (explaining that Unites States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law).

The U.S. Trustee's responsibilities include monitoring bankruptcy court filings, such as plans and disclosure statements, monitoring creditors' committees and the progress of bankruptcy cases, and bringing to the attention of the United States Attorneys any possible criminal activity occurring in the bankruptcy context. Id., § 586(a)(3)(B), (C), (E), (F). Of particular relevance to this case, U.S. Trustees are responsible for "monitoring applications filed under section 327 of title 11 and, whenever the United States trustee deems it to be appropriate, filing with the court comments with respect to the approval of such applications." Id., § 586(a)(3)(H).

B. Facts and District Court Proceedings.

i. Pillowtex's Application To Retain Jones Day.

_____Starting in 1996, the law firm of Jones, Day, Reavis and Pogue ("Jones Day") represented the Pillowtex Corporation and its corporate affiliates ("Pillowtex").[5] Jones Day provided "a variety of legal services" for Pillowtex, ranging from corporate and financial services to services involving intellectual property and employee benefits.[6] During the course of their professional relationship, Jones Day's lawyers "worked closely with [Pillowtex's] management and other professionals," and Jones Day became "well acquainted with [Pillowtex's] corporate history, debt structure, business and operational difficulties and related matters."[7]

On November 14, 2000, Pillowtex filed voluntary petitions for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code.[8] Jones Day helped Pillowtex to prepare its filings to initiate the bankruptcy reorganization cases.[9] At the same time that it filed its petitions, Pillowtex also applied for an order authorizing it to retain Jones Day as legal counsel in the bankruptcy reorganization.[10]

In its application to retain Jones Day, Pillowtex represented that Jones Day, as "one of the largest law firms in the United States" with particular expertise in bankruptcy and restructuring, was "particularly wellsuited for the type of representation" that Pillowtex required.[11] The Pillowtex bankruptcy involved substantial assets; when Pillowtex filed its petitions, it had "$1 billion in trade debt, $750 million in senior secured debt and $400 million in subordinated debt."[12] Pillowtex also stated in its application to retain Jones Day that its existing relationship with Jones Day gave Jones Day particular insight into its needs.[13] Pillowtex stated that Jones Day intended to charge Pillowtex at its usual hourly rate, and that it had paid Jones Day a $300,000 retainer on November 13, the day before the petition was filed, "for services rendered or to be rendered and for reimbursement of expenses" in connection with legal services provided "in contemplation of, and in connection with," the bankruptcy case.[14]

Pillowtex also disclosed its payments to Jones Day for legal services for the one-year period that preceded the bankruptcy filing. Pillowtex had "made payments to Jones Day aggregating $2,516,014.00 during the year immediately preceding the Petition Date on account of fees and expenses incurred by Jones Day[.]"[15] Almost a million dollars had been paid in the three-month period before the petitions in bankruptcy were filed: Pillowtex stated that it had made "$997,569.36 of the Prepetition Payments to Jones Day during the 90 days immediately preceding the Petition Date."[16]

Pillowtex disclosed the date and amount of each payment to Jones Day during the year.[17] Although the payment schedule was uneven, Pillowtex generally made a monthly payment to Jones Day, in an amount ranging from a low of $40,759.09 (in November 2000), to a high of $203,520.69 (in November 1999).[18] No payments were made in May, August or October, 2000. Two extraordinary additional payments were made during the course of the year: $450,573.79 was paid on December 27, 1999,

ii. The U.S. Trustee's Objection.

The U.S. Trustee reviewed Pillowtex's application to retain Jones Day, as authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(H) and 11 U.S.C. § 307. The U.S. Trustee objected to Pillowtex's application on the ground that at least some of the payments made within the preference period (the 90 day period immediately before the petition was filed) were avoidable as preferential transfers.[19] The U.S. Trustee described the elements of a preference under the statute, and concluded that each of the elements had been satisfied by some of the payments made by Pillowtex to Jones Day.[20]

The U.S. Trustee acknowledged that under the preference provision "certain transfers that would otherwise be voidable as preferences are not subject to avoidance," but pointed out that Jones Day bore the burden of proof of proving that the transfers at issue were not avoidable.[21] The U.S. Trustee explained that "any defense that [Jones Day] could apply to the avoidance of the payments in question is limited."[22] He therefore concluded that Jones Day had "received voidable preferences * * *."

Citing this Court's decision in United States Trustee v. First Jersey Securities, Inc. (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504 (3d Cir. 1999), which holds that a person who has received a preferential transfer is not a "disinterested person" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Code, the U.S. Trustee stated that "Jones Day is not a disinterested person and cannot be retained to represent the debtors in possession."[23] He accordingly sought an order from the court denying Pillowtex's application to retain Jones Day.[24]

iii. The Parties' Positions Before The District Court.

In their brief in support of Pillowtex's application to retain Jones Day, Pillowtex and Jones Day did not deny that Pillowtex's payments to Jones Day during the preference period represented a departure from the ordinary course of its business relationship with Jones Day.[25] Rather, the brief explained that Jones Day "was brought current on its fees and expenses prior to the chapter 11 filing" – an event that involved extraordinary payments from Pillowtex to Jones Day – "because, as the U.S. Trustee acknowledges, professionals cannot be creditors of the debtors."[26] Jones Day acknowledged that the U.S. Trustee had taken the position that "by becoming current on it[s] fees Jones Day received payments faster than it had historically, thereby preventing the firm from successfully asserting an ordinary course of business defense." The firm responded that "it defies common sense to argue that a professional should be disqualified based on the professional's efforts to comply with the Bankruptcy Code."[27]

[23] Objection at 4, App. 125.

Jones Day and Pillowtex also contested the U.S. Trustee's view that Jones Day had received preferential payments during the preference period. They argued first that the payments received shortly before the bankruptcy filing "were substantially within the historical pattern of payments between Jones Day and [Pillowtex], which included wide swings in the timing of payments."[28] Jones Day and Pillowtex also emphasized that to the extent that Jones Day's legal services were provided in connection with the bankruptcy, Pillowtex "agreed and understood, in connection with [its] decision to engage Jones Day to prepare for the bankruptcy filing, that Jones Day * * * would have to be paid currently for all services and expenses incurred in connection with the bankruptcy filings in order to represent [Pillowtex] in the chapter 11 proceedings."[29]

In any event, Jones Day believed that it was "not necessary or appropriate for the Debtors' estates to incur the time and expense of litigating the preference issue[.]"[30] Rather, Jones Day proposed to "eliminate any potential conflict or appearance of conflict" by agreeing that "if a preference action against the firm is initiated and a final order is entered determining that Jones Day in fact received a preference, Jones Day will return to the Debtors' estates the full amount of the preferential payment and waive any related claim."[31] Jones Day also challenged the

U. S. Trustee's view that it was disqualified from representing Pillowtex because it was Pillowtex's creditor.[32]

The district court, sitting in bankruptcy, heard argument on the preference issue at an omnibus hearing in the Pillowtex bankruptcies but it did not hold an evidentiary hearing or seek development of the pertinent facts. An attorney from Jones Day explained to the bankruptcy court that the firm had "fees outstanding" and was "also continuing to work, including primarily working to prepare the company for [c]hapter 11."[33] He explained that Jones Day was "under a mandate by the Bankruptcy Code not to be a creditor" and stated that accordingly "[w]e have to be paid in full."[34]

Jones Day's lawyer told the court that when it became clear that Pillowtex would have to file for bankruptcy, Jones Day "got payments that brought our fees current, and then we were paid currently thereafter."[35] He explained that in addition to "invoices that had already been outstanding that were paid," the firm "had to basically instantaneously generate invoices and be paid for" its ongoing work for Pillowtex during the period immediately before the bankruptcy petition was filed.[36]

Jones Day's attorney expressed its opinion to the bankruptcy court that Pillowtex's acceleration of payments immediately before the bankruptcy filing was "the industry practice," something that is "done in every case."[37] As the lawyer explained, the firm's position was that if it was "owed one day of time" at the time of the filing, it would be "a creditor who is arguably disqualified," and that it therefore had no choice but to get "an instantaneous payment at some point to get fully caught up."[38]

The U.S. Trustee disagreed with Jones Day's perception of what constitutes ordinary business practices in bankruptcy retentions. He told the court that customarily "professionals entering bankruptcy cases protect themselves from the preference issue by obtaining a retainer, and they would draw down on the retainer during the 90 day period so as to avoid raising the issue of whether or not they received preferential payments."[39] Paying hundreds of thousands of dollars of accrued fees on the eve of bankruptcy was not typical. The U.S. Trustee also explained that Jones Day had not dealt with its payment for pre-petition services by receiving a retainer from Pillowtex, and that the transfers raised serious issues because Pillowtex "wired approximately three quarters of a million dollars to the Jones Day firm" almost immediately before the bankruptcy filing, in a situation where "there is a myriad of unsecured creditors in this case [who] were not paid on the same terms that Jones Day was paid."[40] The U.S. Trustee pointed out that the remaining unsecured creditors were "looking at the prospect of not receiving 100 cents on the dollar,' and questioned "why we should treat the Jones Day firm differently than those creditors?"[41]

iv. The district court's order.

The district court did not determine whether Jones Day had received preferential payments from Pillowtex and it therefore did not determine whether Jones Day was ineligible under First Jersey to represent Pillowtex. Instead, the court not preferential, for reasons that differ depending on the type of retainer employed. Pillowtex did not provide Jones Day with the $300,000 retainer – which the U.S. Trustee does not challenge as a preference – until November 13, 2000, the day before the bankruptcy petitions were filed. adopted Jones Day's suggestion that it authorize the firm's retention subject to certain conditions.[42]

The Order authorizing Pillowtex to retain Jones Day provides that the court has determined "subject to the provisions of this Order," that "the U.S. Trustee Objections should be overruled and the legal and factual bases set forth in the Application, the Affidavit, the Disclosure of Compensation and the Amended Disclosure of Compensation establish just cause for the relief granted herein[.]"[43] It also provides that "[s]ubject to the provisions of this Order, Jones Day does not hold or represent any interest adverse to the Debtors' estates and is a 'disinterested person,' as defined in section 101(14) of the Bankruptcy Code and as required by section 327(a) of the Bankruptcy Code."[44]

The Retention Order is subject to one condition: "[u]pon any determination by final order that Jones Day received one or more avoidable preferential transfers pursuant to section 547 of the Bankruptcy Code, Jones Day shall promptly return the same to the Debtors' estates and waive any unsecured claim it has by virtue thereof

STATEMENT OF THE STANDARD OF REVIEW

Because this case involves the interpretation of the Bankruptcy Code in light of undisputed facts, this Court's review of the order of the district court sitting in bankruptcy is de novo. See Cinicola v. Scharffenberger, 248 F.3d 110, 115 n.1 (3d Cir. 2001).[46]

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

1. This Court held in First Jersey that a law firm that receives a preferential transfer has an actual conflict of interest with the debtor that disqualifies the firm

[45] Retention Order at 3, App. 3.

[46] The district court in this case entered the retention order sitting in bankruptcy. It did not exercise appellate jurisdiction of a prior decision of the bankruptcy court. See In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 470 (3d Cir. 1998).

from representing the debtor in the bankruptcy proceedings. See First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 509. This Court's decision is manifestly correct: the duty of debtor's counsel to seek out preferences and recapture them for the debtor's estate conflicts directly with the law firm's interest in keeping the fees that it has received during the preference period. Many other courts have also so held.

2. Jones Day's argument below that any conflict was merely "potential" unless the court judicially determined that it had received a preference is erroneous. Not only did this Court squarely hold in First Jersey that the receipt of a preference gives rise to an actual conflict, but this Court has held in other cases that an actual conflict of interest arises where there is a present possibility that the firm's work for its client might be tainted by self interest. That possibility arises in the preference situation, because the counsel for the debtor cannot be expected to pursue with great vigor a preference action to recover its own fees for the benefit of the bankruptcy estate. Jones Day's theory that its receipt of the $800,000 on the eve of bankruptcy created only a potential rather than an actual conflict is therefore mistaken.

3. Under these circumstances, the district court erred in authorizing Jones Day's retention without first deciding whether Jones Day suffered from a disqualifying actual conflict of interests. Rather than determining whether the retention would violate First Jersey, the court authorized Jones Day's retention on condition that Jones Day repay to the estate any amounts found to be preferences if a preference action were ever instituted. The court accordingly did not reach the merits of the United States Trustee's pending objection to Jones Day's retention on the ground that Jones Day had received a preferential transfer.

The conditional retention order puts Jones Day in the difficult position of having to decide whether to pursue a preference action on Pillowtex's behalf against itself, on the basis of a construction of the Bankruptcy Code that Jones Day deems to be "frivolous." Transcript at 32, App. 206. The court's conditional retention order is inconsistent with this Court's cases, and it should be vacated.

4. There is nothing frivolous about the U.S. Trustee's objection that Jones Day has received a preference. On the contrary, at least some of Pillowtex's payments to Jones Day satisfy every element of the preference statute and are not exempt from avoidance under the exemption for payments made in the ordinary course of business.

ARGUMENT

I. The District Court Erred in Authorizing Pillowtex to Retain Jones Day Without Ruling on the United States Trustee's Objection That Jones Day Had Received a Preference That Disqualifies it from Representing Pillowtex.

A. First Jersey requires that preference objections be decided as part of the court's determination whether to authorize a debtor to employ a law firm as bankruptcy counsel.

This Court in First Jersey[47] held both that the Section 327(a) of the Bankruptcy Code "mandates disqualification [of professionals] when there is an actual conflict of interest" and that a law firm that receives a preferential transfer has an actual conflict of interest with the debtor. First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 509. Indeed, this Court in First Jersey expressly stated that "a preferential transfer to" a law firm from its debtor client "would constitute an actual conflict of interest between counsel and the debtor, and would require the firm's disqualification." First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 509. See also id. at 514 (concluding that "the preferential payment [to the law firm] was a preference, creating an actual conflict of interest, and thus, disqualifying [the firm] as counsel for the debtor"); ibid. (holding that the preferential payment "created an actual conflict of interest, and therefore disqualification is mandatory").

[47] United States Trustee v. First Jersey Securities, Inc. (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504 (3d Cir. 1999).

This Court's holdings in First Jersey are manifestly correct. Because a preferential payment is subject to avoidance by the debtor in possession (see 11 U.S.C. § 547(b)), a law firm that receives a preferential payment from its debtor client has an actual conflict of interest. The debtor's interest in avoiding preferential transfers and returning preference amounts to the bankruptcy estate for the benefit of the creditors – which would involve suing the law firm and collecting on the judgment – cannot be reconciled with the firm's own interest in retaining the payment that it has received from the debtor. Moreover, a firm that has received a preferential payment cannot be a "disinterested person" who can properly be retained under Subsection 327(a), because the avoidable preferential transfer gives the firm "an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate * * *." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(E).[48] For these reasons, this Court was plainly right to hold both that a law firm's receipt of preferential payments from its client creates an actual conflict and that the conflict absolutely disqualifies the firm from representing the debtor.

This is a serious matter. Every debtor, including Pillowtex, has a fiduciary duty to protect the interests of its creditors. CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355

[48] An interest is adverse to the estate "when counsel has 'a competing economic interest tending to diminish estate values or to create a potential or actual dispute in which the estate is a rival claimant.'" First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 509 (quoting In re Caldor, Inc., 193 B.R. 165, 171 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1996)).

(1985) (holding debtors in possession have a fiduciary duty to their creditors); Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors of United Healthcare Sys., Inc. v. United Healthcare Sys., Inc. (In re United Healthcare Sys., Inc.), 200 F.3d 170, 177 n.9 (3d Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 530 U.S. 1204 (2000) (applying Weintraub and 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a) to hold "a debtor-in-possession[] is a fiduciary for its estate and its creditors"). If the debtor in possession's estate has been diminished because of preferences, the debtor's fiduciary duty requires it to recoup the preference for the benefit of its creditors. That would be practically difficult, if not impossible, if the law firm approved by the court to counsel the debtor were the potential target. For this reason, First Jersey requires law firms to be free from the taint of preference in order to be appointed debtors' counsel.

The district court's conditional Retention Order is therefore in error. The district court declined to determine whether or not Jones Day had received preferential transfers from Pillowtex, and it accordingly made no findings about Pillowtex's payments to Jones Day. In declining to determine whether Jones Day had received a preference, the court apparently overlooked this Court's instruction that disqualification is mandatory for firms that have received preferential transfers. See First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 509, 514. Given that plain instruction in First Jersey, the court should at a minimum have determined whether preferential transfers had taken place, so that it could avoid approving the retention of a law firm with a disqualifying actual conflict of interests.[49]

B. Jones Day's conflict is actual, not potential.

The court's mistaken failure to determine whether First Jersey required Jones Day's disqualification error may have been based, in part, upon a misunderstanding of the distinction between actual and potential conflicts of interest. Because this Court has recognized that a lawyer who has a potential conflict of interest may be retained subject to disqualification at the court's discretion,[50] Jones Day argued in the [49] The bankruptcy court has disapproved on at least one occasion a conditional retention order based upon a law firm's offer to waive any claim against the debtor's estate for pre-petition fees if it were later determined to have received preferential payments with respect to those fees. See In re Michigan General Corporation, 77 B.R. 97, 104 (Bankr. N.D. Tex., 1987). The bankruptcy court in Michigan General first pointed out that "the reluctance of the firm to admit its creditor status before a judicial determination of the issue necessarily implies an adversarial relationship" between the firm and the estate. Id., 77 B.R. at 104. The court also observed that "the ethical constraint against the acceptance of employment when the interests of an attorney may impair his independent professional judgment * * * militates against allowing counsel to at once represent an estate in bankruptcy and be sued by the same estate over attorney fees paid." Ibid. The bankruptcy court accordingly concluded that although it had "no doubt that the 'waiver' of creditor status by [the firm] is wholly ineffectual to cure the conflict of interest created when a putative creditor represents the estate, if there were any doubt it would be resolved against the representation of the estates" by the firm that might have received the preference. Ibid. The same reasoning applies to the conditional retention order entered in this case.

district court that any conflict based upon the allegedly preferential transfers was merely a potential conflict until a judicial determination had been made that the challenged transfers were preferential. See Pillowtex Brief at 8, App. 139. Jones Day took the position, citing First Jersey, that "an actual conflict of interest could not exist unless a court finally determines, after an evidentiary hearing, that the professional received an avoidable preference." Ibid.

Jones Day's position that no actual conflict can exist absent a judicial determination to that effect is mistaken – not only has this Court unambiguously held that a firm that receives a preference has an actual conflict of interest, but Jones Day's proposed distinction between actual and potential conflicts loses sight of the real problem in a situation involving preferences.

Contrary to Jones Day's view, the conflict in a preference case arises whenever the law firm may have received a preference, and not when the preference is judicially found to have occurred. This Court has recognized that a firm's conflict of interest with its debtor client is actual if the case involves a present possibility that the firm's actions on behalf of its client might be tainted by self-interest. See In re BH & P Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1315 (3d Cir. 1991). This Court in BH & P rejected a law firm's argument that its conflict with a debtor in bankruptcy was merely potential because the conflict would arise only if the bankruptcy estate of one debtor were in fact large enough to satisfy the claims of another debtor represented by the same counsel. See ibid. Instead, this Court affirmed the district court's view that under these circumstances the conflict was actual; "'the "actuality" of the conflict * * * was the possibility that the parties would favor one estate over the other in their attempt to serve all of them,'" rather than any inconsistency between the estates' future claims. Id. at 1314 (quoting district court's opinion). Significantly for this case, the district court in BH & P relied for its view of an "actual conflict" upon a preferential transfer case, also quoted with approval in this Court's opinion, explaining that in the preference situation "'[t]he 'actuality' of the conflict is not per se that counsel might hold a preference [under § 547], rather it is that counsel will be tempted to neglect its duties to the estate by being less than zealous in its investigation of the preference.'" Ibid. (quoting In re Michigan General, 78 B.R. 479, 483-84 (1987)).

This Court in BH & P thus acknowledged the commonsense reality that the conflict that arises from the preferential transfer (a conflict between the debtor's interest in regaining the amount of the preference for the estate and the lawyer's interest in keeping its fee) arises as soon as counsel for the debtor in possession has a reason to be less diligent than he or she might otherwise be in investigating the preference claim against the estate. Because "[i]t is the duty of counsel for the debtor in possession to survey the landscape in search of property of the estate, defenses to claims, preferential transfers, fraudulent conveyances and other causes of action that may yield a recovery to the estate * * * [a]ny potential conflict of interest represents a potential to overlook an asset or defense of the estate." In re McKinney Ranch Associates, 62 B.R. 249, 254 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1986).[51]

[51] Courts generally have held that lawyers whose fee arrangements with debtors may involve preferential transfers are disqualified from then representing the debtor. See In re 419 Company, 133 B.R. 867, 869, 870 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio, 1991) (holding that because fee payments might be preferential, they "create[] a potential dispute in which the estate may be a rival," requiring disqualification "to preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy system"); In re Decor Corporation, 171 B.R. 277, 283 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio, 1994) (holding that because payments that a firm received to avoid creditor status "may well constitute preferential payments," the firm's "role as a prospective defendant may constitute a disqualifying adverse interest * * * because [the firm] loses its ability to independently and objectively represent the Debtor"); In re Atlanta Sporting Club, 137 B.R. 550, 553 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 1991) (pointing out that debtor that "may have an action against [its attorneys] for a preferential or fraudulent transfer" could not retain the attorneys); In re Michigan General Corporation, 78 B.R. 479, 483-84 ([t]he 'actuality of the conflict is not per se that counsel might hold a preference, rather it is that counsel will be tempted to neglect its duties to the estate by being less than zealous in its investigation of the preference"). The bankruptcy court in In re American Thrift & Loan Ass'n, 137 B.R. 381, 387 (Bankr. S.D. Ca.,1992) discerned another threat to the debtor's ability to secure diligent representation from a firm that might have received a preference: "assuming the firm recognizes the problem, as it should, the firm may also hesitate to recommend that the debtor pursue other persons or entities similarly situated to recover assets for the benefit of the estate because the parallel circumstances might be recognized by the client or some third party."

Thus, as this Court in BH & P envisioned, the conditional retention order in this case places Jones Day, as counsel for the debtor, in the awkward position of determining whether to pursue a preference action against itself. As this case demonstrates, when a firm has acted in good faith, its understandable interest in defending itself against what it views as "frivolous" preference claims makes it highly unlikely that the firm, in its capacity as counsel for the debtor, will recommend that its client sue it to recover a potential preference.[52] Jones Day in this case was entirely candid in stating that it viewed any litigation of the preference issue as a waste of the estate's resources.[53] Under these circumstances, however, the practical effect of the conditional retention order is to preclude litigation to determine whether counsel has an actual conflict of interest, for which "disqualification is mandatory." First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 514.

Jones Day's own litigation position in the district court further underscores the difficulties inherent in its view. Jones Day's solution to the ethical problem posed by the preference issue was to "eliminate any potential conflict or appearance of conflict" by "agree[ing]" to repay – if a future court order directed it to do so – any preferences that it had received. Pillowtex Brief at 2, App. 133.[54] But Jones Day's "agreement" does no more than describe its existing obligations under the law: if a court determined that Jones Day had received a preference, Jones Day would have little choice but to return that money to the bankruptcy estate. Thus, however useful Jones Day's "agreement" may appear to be at a superficial level, it imposes no new obligations upon Jones Day and it cannot in fact be effective to "eliminate any potential conflict" between Jones Day and its debtor client.[55]

[54] Jones Day also stated that if it were found to have received a preference, it would waive its claims against the estate for the returned fees. Retention Order at 2, App. 2. In avoiding creditor status a firm often may resort to "the ultimate 'curative' measure," the "waiver of its unsecured claim." In re Decor Corporation, 171 B.R. at 283. See also In re Eastern Charter Tours, Inc., 167 B.R. 995, 997 (Bankr. M.D. Ga., 1994) (finding an accountant disqualified because of outstanding pre-petition fees, but suggesting that the court would revisit the issue "[s]hould [the accountant] wish to waive his claim for pre-petition services"); In re Creative Restaurant Management, Inc., 139 B.R. 902, 915 (Bankr. W. D. Mo. 1992) (explaining that the U.S. Trustee "will not object to an application to retain an attorney, who is a creditor, if such attorney agrees to waive its claim, since the attorney then has no incentive to put his own claim ahead of the interests of the debtor"). A waiver conditioned upon a judicial preference determination is ineffective to remove the conflict that results from a preference, however, because the conflict involves the firm's reluctance to pursue the preference action against itself in the first place.

[55] More importantly, of course, the "agreement" to repay preferences does nothing to relieve the actual conflict of interest, which is the tension between the debtor's interests and the interest of the firm that might have received a preference.

In addition to its failure to take seriously the disqualifying nature of an actual conflict of interest, the conditional retention order also undermines the U.S. Trustee's statutory obligation to monitor retention applications filed under Section 327(a). See 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(H). Congress has instructed the U.S. Trustee to monitor proceedings in bankruptcy, and has expressly authorized him in carrying out that responsibility to "fil[e] with the court comments with respect to the approval of" applications for the retention of professionals. Ibid. The U.S. Trustee accordingly objected to Jones Day's retention, based upon his view that the firm had received preferential transfers. But because the district court entered the conditional retention order instead of determining whether Jones Day received a preference, the U.S. Trustee's views upon the preference issue were not heard and determined. The conditional retention order thus overlooks the oversight role that Congress created for the U.S. Trustee.

Because a firm that has received a preferential transfer is absolutely disqualified from serving as counsel to the debtor in possession, the district court's conditional retention order is inconsistent with this Court's cases. This Court should remand the case so that the district court can determine whether Pillowtex made payments to Jones Day that are avoidable as preferences under the Bankruptcy Code, and to disqualify Jones Day if Jones Day has an actual conflict of interests.[56]

II. The U.S. Trustee's Claim That Jones Day Received A Preference Is Not "Frivolous."

In the district court, Jones Day argued that the U. S. Trustee's view that preferences exist is "frivolous." Transcript at 32, App. 206.[57] In the careful exercise of his professional judgment, however, the U.S. Trustee has determined that at least some of Pillowtex's pre-petition payments to Jones Day are preferences.

A. All Of The Elements Of 11 U.S.C. § 547(b) Are Satisfied.

Pillowtex's pre-petition payments to Jones Day include payments that satisfy all of the five elements set forth in the preference provision, 11 U.S.C. § 547(b).

[56] A remand is necessary because the preference issue implicates various questions of fact – such as the nature of the services rendered, the delinquency of the payments and the payment terms that ordinarily subsisted between Jones Day and Pillowtex – that have neither been determined nor stipulated as part of the record.

[57] Jones Day also contended that its actions in securing full payment of its overdue bills were somehow compelled by the Bankruptcy Code, which prohibits the retention of a professional who is a creditor of the debtor. See Pillowtex Brief at 1, App. 132; Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d at 141-142. Courts have sometimes construed the Bankruptcy Code to allow bankruptcy counsel to prepare cases for bankruptcy without thereby becoming creditors of the debtor. See, e.g., In re Martin, 817 F.2d 175, 180 (1st. Cir. 1987). No court, however, has ever held that a firm could invoke the Code's prohibition upon representation by creditors to justify its receipt of a preference.

First, the challenged payments were made "on or within 90 days before the date of the filing of the petition" in bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 547(b)(4). Next, all were made by the debtor in possession "to or for the benefit of a creditor" and "for or on account of an antecedent debt owed by the debtor before such transfer was made." Id., § (b)(1), (b)(2). The disputed payments were made by Pillowtex to Jones Day. Jones Day was a creditor because Pillowtex owed it money for legal services. And Pillowtex incurred a debt to Jones Day "when the law firm performed legal services on the debtor's behalf." First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 510-511. Accordingly, to the extent that Jones Day performed legal services before being paid for those services, payments from Pillowtex to Jones Day were made "for or on account of an antecedent debt owed by the debtor" before the payments were made. 11 U.S.C. § 547(b)(2).

Fourth, the payments that Pillowtex made to Jones Day during the preference period were presumptively made while Pillowtex was insolvent. See 11 U.S.C. § 547(f) (statutory presumption that debtor is insolvent during the 90 day preference period). And finally, to the extent that Jones Day had not taken a retainer as security, it was an unsecured creditor with respect to Pillowtex. Because Jones Day did not obtain its $300,000 retainer until November 13, 2000, the eve of the bankruptcy filing, its receipt of payment in full for its services during the preference period allowed it to receive more than it would have been paid, absent the challenged transfers, in a chapter 7 liquidation. See 11 U.S.C. § 547(b)(5).

A straightforward application of Section 547 to Pillowtex's payments to Jones accordingly shows that every statutory elements of an avoidable preferential transfer is satisfied by at least some of Pillowtex's payments to Jones Day.

B. Pillowtex's Payments To Jones Day Do Not All Qualify For The Exemption For Payments Made In The Ordinary Course Of Business.

The preference provision generally "aims to ensure that creditors are treated equitably, both by deterring the failing debtor from treating preferentially its most obstreperous or demanding creditors" and by discouraging creditors themselves from putting undue pressure upon the debtor. Fiber Lite Corporation v. Molded Acoustical Products, Inc. (In re Molded Acoustical Products, Inc.), 18 F.3d 217, 219 (3d Cir. 1994). See also First Jersey, 180 F. 3d at 511 (explaining that Congress's "overriding intent in enacting Section 547(b) was to promote equal distribution among a debtor's creditors").

In addition to treating creditors equally, however, Congress also wanted to encourage businesses experiencing financial difficulties to stay afloat. It accordingly exempted from the trustee's avoidance power the debtor's payments on debts made "in the ordinary course" of business between the debtor and the creditor. See 11 U.S.C. § 547(c)(2). The "ordinary course exemption to the preference rule is formulated to induce creditors to continue dealing with a distressed debtor so as to kindle its chances of survival without a costly detour through, or a humbling ending in, the sticky web of bankruptcy." In re Molded Acoustical Products, Inc., 18 F.3d at 219 (citing H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 373-374 (1977), reprinted in 1987 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5963, 6138)).

"The preference provisions are designed not to disturb normal debtor-creditor relationships, but to derail unusual ones which threaten to heighten the likelihood of the debtor filing for bankruptcy at all and, should that contingency materialize, to then disrupt the paramount bankruptcy policy of the equitable treatment of creditors." See Molded Acoustical Products, Inc. 18 F.3d at 224. Thus, a hallmark of a payment that does not qualify for the ordinary course exemption even though it occurs as part of an ongoing debtor-creditor relationship is that it allows the creditor unusual advantages that are withheld from other creditors. See Molded Acoustical Products, Inc. 18 F.3d at 225 (recommending that creditor be allowed ordinary course exemption for its payment if the creditor "does not unfairly overreach, impel insolvency, or inequitably advantage itself at other creditors' expense by * * * commanding more stringent repayment schedules than its competitors" and observing that "it is * * * unusual behavior designed to improve the lot of one creditor at the expense of others at a time when bankruptcy looms on the horizon of an infirm debtor-to-be that invokes the need to subdue a creditor's predilection toward self-aggrandizing behavior").

The ordinary course exemption applies only when each of the three statutory elements is satisfied. See 11 U.S.C. § 547(c)(2). A payment that is exempt from avoidance must be 1) incurred in the ordinary course of both the debtor's and the creditor's business, and 2) made and received in the course of the debtor's and creditor's respective businesses, and 3) made according to ordinary business terms. See ibid.

Interpreting the third element – that the payment be made according to ordinary business terms – in light of the twin statutory goals of encouraging ordinary business transactions and discouraging creditors' attempts to gain advantage at the expense of others, this Court has explained that the pre-bankruptcy business relationship between creditor and the debtor is crucial to understanding the scope of the business terms that will be regarded as "ordinary" for purposes of the exemption. Thus, in addition to looking to industry credit and payment standards, "when the parties have had an enduring, steady relationship, one whose terms have not significantly changed during the pre-petition insolvency period," the terms that subsisted over the course of that relationship may constitute "ordinary business terms" despite considerable divergence from prevailing industry standards. Molded Acoustical Products, Inc. 18 F.3d at 226.

See also First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 512 (explaining that "the determination of what is 'in the ordinary course of business' is subjective, calling for the Court to consider whether the transfer was ordinary as between the debtor and the creditor").

Under these standards, some of the payments that Pillowtex made to Jones Day during the preference period are almost certainly exempt from avoidance as payments made in the ordinary course of business. Any payments for Jones Day's legal services that fell due during the preference period in accordance with the ordinary payment terms that subsisted between Jones Day and Pillowtex in their pre-bankruptcy relationship will be exempt as payments in the ordinary course.

In addition to paying bills that had fallen due in the ordinary course of business, however, Pillowtex also made payments to Jones Day that were inconsistent with the pre-bankruptcy relationship between Pillowtex and Jones Day. Jones Day has candidly stated that it accelerated Pillowtex's payment schedule during the preference period, so that in addition to "invoices that had already been outstanding that were paid," the firm would "basically instantaneously generate invoices and be paid for" its ongoing work for Pillowtex. Statement of Gregory M. Gordon, Esq. for Jones Day, Transcript at 31, App. 205. It is undisputed both that these accelerated payments were inconsistent with the ordinary terms of Pillowtex's relationship with Jones Day and that they came about in anticipation of the bankruptcy filing.

In addition to receiving accelerated payments, Jones Day also received payment in full on all of its legal bills, even those that had long been overdue.[58] Jones Day thus received full payment from the debtor on all its outstanding bills on the eve of bankruptcy, whereas other unsecured creditors did not – precisely the result that the preference provisions are intended to forestall. See First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 511 (explaining that Congress's "overriding intent in enacting § 547(b) was to promote equal distribution among a debtor's creditors").

For these reasons, the U.S. Trustee interprets this Court's cases to require a finding that some of the payments from Pillowtex to Jones Day that occurred during the preference period are voidable as preferential transfers.

[58] The U.S. Trustee understands that Pillowtex was behind on some of the bills submitted by Jones Day. The amount of the seriously delinquent payments, however, must determined on remand.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Conditional Retention Order should be vacated, and the case remanded for further proceedings on the U.S. Trustee's objections.

In re Pillowtex, Inc.

DONALD WALTON, the ACTING UNITED STATES TRUSTEE,

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF DELAWARE, SITTING IN BANKRUPTCY

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE APPELLANT

In our opening brief, we explained that because this Court held in First Jersey[1] that a law firm that has received a preferential transfer from a debtor client has an actual conflict of interest~~s~~ that disqualifies it from representing that client in bankruptcy, the district court in this case was required to decide whether Jones Day had a disabling conflict before the court authorized Jones Day's retention as bankruptcy counsel for Pillowtex. Only by resolving the preference issue could the district court satisfy itself that Pillowtex would not be represented by counsel with a disabling conflict. See 11 U.S.C. 327(a) (court may approve employment of professionals that "do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate * * *").

Jones Day's response does nothing to address the fact that the plain language of Section 327(a) of the Code allows the appointment only of conflict-free counsel.[2] This section simply makes no provision for retention of counsel, such as Jones Day, who might be conflict-free, but who also might have a disabling conflict of interests. Bankruptcy courts accordingly must adjudicate objections based upon conflict of interest or lack of disinterestedness before authorizing a firm's retention.

Nor does Jones Day respond to the practical problems that would arise if debtors could employ lawyers with impermissible conflicts of interest. Jones Day neither disputes that a preference is a disabling conflict, nor denies that, unlike Pillowtex's other unsecured creditors, it received 100 cents on the dollar on all of its outstanding legal bills just as Pillowtex went into bankruptcy. Instead, Jones Day argues that because it disclosed its payments to Pillowtex and because the U.S. Trustee "has no economic interest in the potential claim," it was appropriate for the district court to "address the concerns raise by preference allegations without the necessity of an actual adjudication of whether a preferential payment occurred." Jones Day's Answering Brief ("Br.") at 15, 13.

[2] See, e.g., In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 475 (3d Cir. 1998) ("The Bankruptcy Code allows the trustee of a bankruptcy estate to employ attorneys to assist him in his duties. 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). In determining the standards under which an attorney may serve in this capacity, we must, of course, begin with the language of the statute.").

Jones Day's defense of the district court's decision to allow it to represent Pillowtex without first determining whether it had a disabling conflict of interests, despite the undisputed facts giving rise to the U.S. Trustee's concerns, only confirms that the conditional retention order was entered in error. As we shall show, Jones Day's own arguments demonstrate that the conditional order authorizing Jones Day's retention is hopelessly inconsistent with First Jersey and with the Bankruptcy Code's requirement that debtors' counsel be conflict-free.[3]

ARGUMENT

1. This Court held in First Jersey a law firm's receipt of a preferential transfer from a debtor creates an actual conflict of interests that disqualifies the firm from representing the debtor. See First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 514 (discussed in Trustee's Br. at 24 - 25). Jones Day does not dispute that this is the holding of First Jersey. Jones Day nonetheless contends that First Jersey is not directly pertinent here because "[t]he First Jersey court was not presented with the issue of whether it might be appropriate" to retain counsel without actually adjudicating whether a preference had occurred, and because the Court "made no statements regarding a bankruptcy court's discretion when presented with preference allegations." Br. at 13.

---

Jones Day's argument about what this Court failed to say in First Jersey overlooks entirely the Court's holding in First Jersey that a law firm that has received a preferential transfer has a disqualifying conflict and cannot represent the debtor in the bankruptcy proceedings. As a matter of common sense and logic, the only way for the bankruptcy court to be sure that it is not authorizing the retention of a firm with a disabling conflict, in violation of both First Jersey and the Bankruptcy Code itself, is to adjudicate the preference issue before authorizing the retention. First Jersey's holding therefore precludes the type of conditional retention order that the district court approved in this case.

Significantly, Jones Day cites no case - from this or any other circuit - for the novel proposition that bankruptcy courts have discretion to authorize the retention of firms that may be barred by statute from acting as debtor's counsel. We are unaware of any such decision. To the contrary, we thought it universally accepted that "the debtors in this case could not employ accountants or other professional who were not 'disinterested.'" United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse (In re Sharon Steel Corp.), 19 F.3d 138, 141(3rd Cir. 1994). See also Vouzianas and Nota Vouzianas v. Ready & Pontisakos (In re Vouzianas), 259 F.3d 103, 106 (2d Cir. 2001) (holding that 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) allows a debtor in possession or a trustee "with the court's approval" to employ attorneys "that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons").

Neither the Bankrupcty Code itself nor the decisions interpreting it support Jones Day's argument that the district court had discretion to decline to determine whether Jones Day had a disqualifying conflict before the court authorized its retention. See Br. at 10-11. The district court has no discretion to disregard either the plain terms of the Bankruptcy Code, which require that the debtor's professional have no interest adverse to the estate,[4] or this Court's holding in First Jersey. Indeed, even if a bankruptcy court's retention decisions ordinarily are reviewable under an abuse of discretion standard, as Jones Day contends, the district court's legal error must be reversed because an error of law is inherently an abuse of discretion; as this Court has explained, "a court 'abuses its discretion when its ruling is founded on an error of law or a misapplication of law to the facts.'" Montrose Medical Group Participating Savings Plan v. Bulger, 243 F.3d 773, 780 (3d Cir. 2001).[5] Accord:

[5] To the extent that Jones Day argues that the district court always has discretion to determine whether a conflict is actual or potential, its view is erroneous. Indeed, Jones Day quotes this Court's statement that "denomination of a conflict as potential or actual and the decision whether to disqualify a

Cooter & Gell v. Hartmax Corp., 496 U.S. 384, 405 (1990) (explaining that "[a] district court would necessarily abuse its discretion if it based its ruling on an erroneous view of the law or on a clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence").

2. As a threshold matter, Jones Day is wrong to suggest that the U.S. Trustee has argued that "the mere fact that the U.S. Trustee has alleged that Jones Day received preferential payments * * * by itself create[s] an actual conflict of interest mandating disqualification." Br. at 12. Of course, the U.S. Trustee has taken no such position. Rather, the U.S. Trustee has explained that if Jones Day has a conflict with Pillowtex at all, then that conflict is an actual conflict under the rule of law announced by this Court in First Jersey. Because Jones Day has taken and retained payments that may be preferential and it "will not be advising the Debtors to seek to recover payments made to Jones Day[,]" the conflict of interests, if any, has been in place since Jones Day's retention was approved and is an actual conflict today.

In no sense, therefore, is any conflict of interests "created by the U.S. Trustee's allegations." Ibid. On the contrary, if any conflict of interest exists, it has been professional based upon that determination in situations not yet rising to the level of actual conflict are matters committed to the bankruptcy court's sound exercise of discretion." In re BH & P Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1317 (3d Cir. 1991) (quoted at Br. 10). This Court in BH & P thus did not suggest that bankruptcy courts have discretion over matters concerning actual conflicts of interest.

created by Jones Day's receipt of substantial payments from the debtor within the preference period and outside the ordinary course of business. Saying that the U.S. Trustee is responsible for creating the conflict of interests is no more sensible than saying that the person who sets off the fire alarm must be responsible for setting the fire.

For the same reason, Jones Day is also mistaken when it asserts that the U.S. Trustee's position implies that "any law firm would be disqualified * * * as having an actual conflict of interest whenever any party alleged that the firm had received a preferential transfer, regardless of the merits of the allegations." Br. at 18. The U.S. Trustee's point is that when non-frivolous preference allegations are made, they must be resolved before retention is authorized because the receipt of a preferential transfer gives rise to an actual conflict of interest that would disqualify the firm. The ultimate disposition of the preference issue, of course, will depend upon whether the preference allegations are ultimately borne out by the facts.

3. On appeal, as it did in the district court, Jones Day takes the position that "[t]he conditions in the Retention Order * * * eliminate any potential conflict of interest created by the U.S. Trustee's allegations." Br. at 13. Jones Day is mistaken for at least two reasons. Br. at 13. First, although it is quite true that "courts have uniformly recognized that a professional can take steps to eliminate its adverse interest by waiving any claim it has against the estate," (Br. at 13), the waiver eliminates the possibility of a disabling conflict because the law firm actually waives its claim when it undertakes the representation and before it starts work for the client. The cases that Jones Day itself cites and quotes acknowledge this principle. See Br. at 27 (quoting bankruptcy court opinions explaining that "'Creditors may only be employed by the estate if they waive their pre-petition claim' * * * 'A creditor is not a disinterested person and consequently cannot qualify for employment by a debtor [u]nless [he] waives his pre-petition claim'"). These cases show that the courts do, indeed, agree that after a firm has waived its pre-petition claim, then it is not a creditor of the debtor and it may properly proceed with the representation.

Jones Day, however, asks this Court to endorse a quite different principle. Jones Day has not waived any portion of its claim for pre-petition fees. On the contrary, Jones Day has insisted that it has no intention of waiving any of its claim to pre-petition fees (fees that the debtor had already paid, in full, before the filing of the bankruptcy petition) unless a judge finds that it has received a preferential transfer — an event which would, in any event, require the disgorgement of the fees. Jones Day thus does not seek the court's permission to represent the debtor after it has waived its claim. Rather, Jones Day asks the court to approve its retention and allow it to work for the debtor before it has waived its claim for pre-petition fees.

The "conditional retention" mechanism proposed by Jones Day thus allows a bankruptcy court to approve the retention of a law firm even if it is acknowledged that the firm may have a disqualifying conflict with the debtor. Jones Day has failed to cite a single case approving such an arrangement, which simply cannot be reconciled with the Bankruptcy Code's unqualified requirement that professionals be conflict-free. See 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). Indeed, the bankruptcy court in the only reported case to consider a "conditional waiver"of this type deemed that waiver to be "wholly ineffectual to cure the conflict of interest created when a putative creditor represents the estate * * *." In re Michigan General Corporation, 77 B.R. 97, 104 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1987).[6] And the law in this Circuit is particularly clear in precluding a firm from representing a debtor if it has a disqualifying conflict of interests caused by the receipt of a preferential transfer. See First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 509, 514. As a matter of law, therefore, the conditional retention order is inconsistent with both the Bankruptcy Code and this Court's cases, and it should be vacated.

[6] The conditional waiver rejected in Michigan General was proposed by the same law firm that represents the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors in this case. That Committee has supported Jones Day's determination that no hearing on the preference issue should be required in light of the conditional waiver.

4. Furthermore, Jones Day's theory that disclosure of its pre-petition payments to Pillowtex is sufficient to eliminate any conflict of interests is based upon mistaken reasoning. Jones Day starts with the premise that "[b]ecause Jones Day will either prevail [at a hearing to determine whether it received preferences] or be required to return any transfer and waive its claim * * * the U.S. Trustee is, in reality, not seeking disqualification of Jones Day but is instead seeking to use the retention process to recover an alleged preference for the benefit of the Debtors' estates * * * ." Br. at 32. Jones Day then reasons that because "the U.S. Trustee has no economic interest in the recovery of any payments and the parties with the economic interest do not believe it is worthwhile for the estate to incur the expense of litigating the U.S. Trustee's allegations" the U.S. Trustee's objections to retention are insignificant, and it concludes that the conditional retention order should be affirmed. Id. at 33. Jones Day's argument is wrong at every step.

First, Jones Day is mistaken when it assumes that if it is found to have received a preferential transfer, it will simply then "waive its claim," so that "the U.S. Trustee's position will not actually result in the disqualification of Jones Day." Br. at 32. Jones Day assumes the conclusion of its own argument — that the conditional retention order is appropriate, and that it is permissible for Jones Day to represent Pillowtex even though it may suffer from a disabling conflict of interests, provided that it returns preferential transfers to Pillowtex if a court ultimately directs it to do so.

Contrary to Jones Day's apparent view, the U.S. Trustee has never endorsed this view of the law.[7] Rather, the U.S. Trustee in his opening brief expressly sought a remand "so that the district court can determine whether Pillowtex made payments to Jones Day that are avoidable as preferences under the Bankruptcy Code, and to disqualify Jones Day if Jones Day has an actual conflict of interests." Trustee's Br. at 33-34 (emphasis added). Jones Day has consistently refused to waive any portion of its claim to pre-petition fees, or to agree to a hearing on whether the fee payments were preferential.[8] Under First Jersey, if the fee payments are, in fact, preferential, [7] Jones Day is also mistaken when it argues that the U.S. Trustee's settlement of a similar dispute with KPMG, a firm of accountants, undermines the U.S. Trustee's position here. See, e.g., Br. at 18-19. The United States Trustee Program, after a lengthy, deliberate, and thoughtful consideration of the issue, has concluded that conditional retention orders of the type entered in this case are inappropriate. Having reached this conclusion, the United States Trustee Program has sought to oppose such orders whenever practical. Given scarce Justice Department and judicial resources, however, the government has compromised other disputes, but compromise is not tantamount to agreement. This practice is fully consistent with the decision of the Solicitor General of the United States to pursue this appeal.

[8] Jones Day's statement that it "should not be disqualified simply because it chooses to challenge the merits of the preference allegations" is hard to reconcile with its position that the U.S. Trustee does not seek to have it disqualified at all.

then Jones Day is disqualified from representing Pillowtex, and the disqualification is mandatory. See First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 509 (explaining that receipt of a preferential transfer "would constitute an actual conflict of interest between counsel and the debtor, and would require the firm's disqualification"); id. at 514 (concluding that "the preferential payment [to the law firm] was a preference, creating an actual conflict of interest, and thus, disqualifying [the firm] as counsel for the debtor"); ibid. (holding that the preferential payment "created an actual conflict of interest, and therefore disqualification is mandatory"). At other points in its argument, Jones Day itself expressly acknowledges the principle that a conflict requires disqualification: it explains, for example, that unless any determination of the preference issue has preclusive effect, "there would still remain the possibility that Jones Day at some point would be ordered to return a preferential payment, becoming a creditor and requiring disqualification." Br. at 30, n.10 (emphasis added). See also Br. at 18 (explaining Jones Day's view that "any law firm would be disqualified under this Court's decision in Marvel as having an actual conflict of interest" under certain circumstances) (emphasis added).

Moreover, if Jones Day is found to have received preferences from Pillowtex, it will be in the position — albeit with the approval of the district court — of having represented and accepted fees from a client with respect to which it had a disabling conflict. Although in this appeal the U.S. Trustee seeks only a hearing upon the preference issues, Jones Day should be assured that the U.S. Trustee is not "in reality * * * seeking to use the retention process to recover an alleged preference for the benefit of the Debtors' estates" — rather, he is performing his statutory obligation to defend the integrity of the Bankruptcy Code.

Based upon its mistaken view that the U.S. Trustee is merely pursuing a preference action, Jones Day concludes that litigating that action "simply makes no sense where there has been full and adequate disclosure" of its payments to Pillowtex. But the Bankruptcy Code mandates both that prospective counsel disclose its payments to the debtor (11 U.S.C. § 329) and that it be free of conflicts. Id., § 327(a). Jones Day presents no authority for the proposition that disclosure can be used as a substitute for disinterestedness, particularly where, as here, the disclosure itself raises the possibility that counsel has a disqualifying conflict of interest with the debtor.

Moreover, although Jones Day argues in part that disclosure was sufficient to eliminate its conflict of interest problems because the "Retention Order does not preclude the ability of anyone * * * from seeking to pursue a preference action against Jones Day on behalf of the estate," (Br. at 31), Jones Day also repeatedly assures the Court that none of the parties with standing to pursue a preference action against Jones Day has any intention of doing so. See, e.g., Br. at 30 (stating that "the parties with the real interest in any potential recovery * * * have advised the [c]ourt that they see no merit in the allegations and would rather not proceed" with preference litigation). Jones Day's suggestion that disclosure will be sufficient to allow the parties to identify and correct conflict issues is therefore empty. Jones Day nonetheless both criticizes the participation of the U.S. Trustee as a party with "no economic interest in the potential claim," (Br. at 30; see also Br. at 15, 33), and represents that all of the parties that do have an economic interest have no interest in pursuing the preference issue. See Br. at 24, 30.

Jones Day's argument simply confirms the importance of, and necessity for, the U.S. Trustees. Congress created the U.S. Trustees precisely because the integrity of bankruptcy proceedings could not be adequately protected by market forces and the bankruptcy bar. See 28 U.S.C. 586; see also H.R. Rep. No. 595, 109 (1977), reprinted in 1987 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 6070 (explaining that the U.S. Trustees are responsible for "protecting the public interest and ensuring that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law"). This Court, accordingly, has recognized that "Congress was cognizant that the U.S. Trustee would have no pecuniary interest in the cases" under his supervision, and it has endorsed Congress's view that "one of the principal advantages of the new system was that the Trustee 'functions only as an impartial administrator.'" U.S. Trustee v. Columbia Gas Systems, Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Systems, Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 299 (3d Cir. 1994) (emphasis added). Indeed, this Court has acknowledged a particular "need to hear the Trustee * * * where there is no other party interested in bringing the statute to the court's attention." Ibid. Jones Day's complaints about the U.S. Trustee's lack of a financial interest in the case thus merely demonstrate that the U.S. Trustee is doing the job that Congress has charged him with — objecting to an aspect of a bankruptcy proceeding that would be not be brought to the court's attention by any of the other parties to the proceeding.[9]

5. Finally, Jones Day devotes a considerable portion of its brief to a discussion of how attorneys' fees incurred in preparing a bankruptcy petition may be paid in a manner consistent with the Bankruptcy Code. See Br. at 21-23 (discussing cases); 33-36 (discussing Jones Day's view of how fee issues should be addressed in practice). That issue, however, is presented only tangentially in this appeal, in which the U.S. Trustee primarily seeks to have the Order conditionally authorizing Jones Day's retention vacated as inconsistent with this Court's cases and with the Code.

[9] Jones Day also argues that the U.S. Trustee should refrain from litigating the preference issue because the U.S. Trustee's litigation "in most likely some summary proceeding, could potentially preclude parties with an economic interest in the potential claim from later re-litigating the same issue." Br. at 30. To the extent that Jones Day is arguing that a summary proceeding would be insufficient for proper litigation of the preference issue — a view that seems hard to reconcile with its primary argument that no hearing is necessary at all — its difficulties could be resolved by ensuring that an adequate evidentiary hearing is conducted.

In any event, Jones Day's discussion of fees omits entirely the crucial distinction between fees for work performed in the pre-bankruptcy course of the client's business and fees for work performed in preparing the bankruptcy petition. As Jones Day discusses at length, and as the U.S. Trustee noted in his opening brief (at 34, n.57), courts have construed the Bankruptcy Code to allow lawyers to recover at least some of the fees incurred in helping their clients prepare bankruptcy filings even though the Code could be read to provide that the pre-petition fees render the lawyer disqualified as a creditor. See, e.g., In re Martin, 817 F.2d 175 (1st Cir. 1987); Br. at 21-22 (discussing In re American Thrift & Loan Ass'n, 137 B.R. 381, 383 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1992) and other cases). Jones Day and the U.S. Trustee agree that concerns about pre-petition fees for work in preparation for bankruptcy may sometimes also be alleviated by a firm's use of certain types of retainers and by the waiver of claims for pre-petition fees. See Br. at 34-35. This Court has not yet had occasion to consider the extent of the constraints that the Bankruptcy Code places upon attorneys' fees incurred in helping a client prepare for bankruptcy, and the issue has not been presented or briefed in this appeal.

Although a hearing on the preference issue may well address some fees that Jones Day incurred in preparation for Pillowtex's bankruptcy filing, fees of this type do not lie at the heart of the U.S. Trustee's concern in this case. Rather, the U.S.

Trustee is particularly concerned that shortly before the petition was filed, Jones Day received from a bankrupt debtor full payment of all of its outstanding legal bills, including bills long past due and incurred for non-bankruptcy work, while the debtor's other creditors received only cents on the dollar.[10] The purpose of the preference provisions is to prevent precisely such inequalities between creditors. See First Jersey, 180 F.3d at 511. As First Jersey makes clear, law firms are not exempt from the Code's preference prohibition. Nor is there any reason to suppose that lawyers, as a class, should be accorded favorable treatment over other classes of creditors as a client slides into bankruptcy.

Jones Day has disputed neither the facts that form the basis for the U.S. Trustee's allegation that Jones Day received a preference, nor the legal framework established by the Bankruptcy Code and by this Court. At a minimum, a hearing should be held to determine whether Jones Day received preferential transfers from Pillowtex.

[10] Under the plan just filed by the debtors in the bankruptcy court, general unsecured creditors would receive approximately one cent on the dollar for their claims.

Jones Day does not dispute that it received full payment on long-overdue bills. It contends, however, that those payments occurred within the ordinary course of its business with Pillowtex because the "Debtor's payment history to Jones Day had been erratic[.]" Br. at 35, n.14.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons and for the reasons set forth in our opening brief, the Conditional Retention Order should be vacated, and the case remanded for further proceedings on the U.S. Trustee's objections.

INTRODUCTION

On May 16, 2001, Mr. Danny R. Planavsky voluntarily filed for chapter 11 bankruptcy relief. On June 29, 2010, the United States Trustee filed a second motion to convert Mr. Planavsky's chapter 11 case to chapter 7, under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), based on Mr. Planavsky's inability to effectuate a plan of reorganization and the unreasonable delay that has been prejudicial to his creditors. The bankruptcy court granted the motion, finding cause to convert the case under section 1112(b). This appeal followed.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), which confers jurisdiction on the district courts of the United States to hear appeals "from final judgments, orders, and decrees" of bankruptcy judges. The bankruptcy court's final order granting the United States Trustee's motion to convert Mr. Planavsky's chapter 11 bankruptcy case to chapter 7, under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), was entered on August 6, 2010. Mr. Planavsky timely filed a notice of appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on August 18, 2010.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion when it converted Mr. Planavsky's chapter 11 bankruptcy case to chapter 7, under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews a bankruptcy court's decision to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) for abuse of discretion. C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship v. Norton Co. (In re C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship), 113 F.3d 1304, 1312 (2d Cir. 1997). A bankruptcy court abuses its discretion when it bases its decision on "an error of law or a clearly erroneous finding of fact, or a decision that, 'though not necessarily the product of legal error or a clearly erroneous factual finding[,] cannot be located within the range of permissible decisions.'" Jasco Tools, Inc. v. Dana Corp. (In re Dana Corp.), 574 F.3d 129, 145 (2d Cir. 2009) (citations omitted).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Statutory Framework.

A. Dismissal Under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) (2000).

Mr. Planavsky's case was commenced on May 16, 2001, which preceded the effective date of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA"). The statutory authority for the United States Trustee's motion to convert is therefore governed by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code that were in effect prior to the 2005 amendments. Accordingly, all references made herein are to the pre-2005 statutory provisions that were applicable at the time the case was filed in 2001.

Prior to the 2005 amendments under BAPCPA, section 1112(b) stated that "after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title or may dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate, for cause." 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). Section 1112 then lists several subsections that provide examples of cause, "including — . . . (2) inability to effectuate a plan" and "(3) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors." 11 U.S.C. §§ 1112(b)(2), (3). Under 11 U.S.C. § 102(3), "including" is "not limiting," so section 1112(b)'s list was not exhaustive.

B. The Proposal and Confirmation of Chapter 11 Reorganization Plans.

A chapter 11 debtor may file a reorganization plan at any time, including when the case is commenced. 11 U.S.C. § 1121. This plan must conform to the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code, be accepted by the creditors, and be confirmed by the bankruptcy court before the debtor may enact the reorganization plan. 11 U.S.C. §§ 1123 (establishing requirements for the content of a plan), 1126 (requiring creditor acceptance of a plan), 1129 (establishing requirements for the bankruptcy court to confirm a plan). Before a debtor may solicit support for a reorganization plan, it must also provide creditors with a disclosure statement providing "adequate information" allowing a creditor to make an "informed judgment" about the viability of the reorganization plan. 11 U.S.C. § 1125. The disclosure statement often includes historic information, assumptions, accounting and valuation calculations, anticipated litigation, management information, business conditions, tax consequences, and other legal, financial, or economic circumstances that would be relevant to a creditor's decision to accept or reject a proposed plan.

Disclosure statements must be approved by the bankruptcy court. 11 U.S.C. § 1125(b). And if the proposed reorganization plan is modified, the disclosure statement must be modified and re-approved by the bankruptcy court. 11 U.S.C. § 1127(c).

II. Statement of the Facts.

A. Mr. Planavsky's Real Estate Holdings and Municipal Tax Liabilities.

The appellant, Mr. Danny R. Planavsky, leases commercial and residential real estate in multiple locations in or around Broome and Tioga Counties, New York. See Debtor's Chapter 11 Plan of Reorganization, Bankr. Dkt. 239. Mr. Planavsky's assets primarily consist of fifteen commercial properties, having a total value of approximately $3.2 million. Bankr. Dkt. 1. According to Mr. Planavsky's section 1125 disclosure statement and his proposed reorganization plan, his liabilities primarily consisted of mortgage liens secured against the commercial properties in the approximate amount of $1.8 million and statutory tax liens of $1.6 million dollars for unpaid property taxes at the time the case was filed. Bankr. Dkts. 239, 240.

Prior to filing for bankruptcy relief, Mr. Planavsky attempted to resolve the property tax disputes with the municipal taxing authorities in an effort to reduce his liabilities. Id. Mr. Planavsky did this by challenging the tax-assessed valuation of his properties through municipal assessment review proceedings. Id.

Mr. Planavsky's efforts were unsuccessful and the resulting $1.6 million dollars in property tax liabilities became the focus of Mr. Planavsky's reorganization efforts in bankruptcy. Id.

B. Mr. Planavsky's Tax Litigation Within His Bankruptcy Case.

Mr. Planavsky continued to litigate the amount of his tax liabilities within his bankruptcy case. When Mr. Planavsky filed for bankruptcy in 2001, he had no equity in his properties because his secured mortgage and municipal tax claims exceeded the value of the properties. Bank. Dkts. 55, 292, 293. Therefore, in 2002, Mr. Planavsky initiated multiple actions, including a separate proceeding against the municipal taxing authorities, requesting that the bankruptcy court establish the value of his commercial properties and determine his tax liability under 11 U.S.C. § 505 (allowing the bankruptcy court to determine the amount or legality of a tax liability). Bankr. Dkts. 46, 50, 54, 60, 91. Throughout these proceedings, Mr. Planavsky argued that the actual market value of his properties was lower than the tax-assessed value and therefore his property tax liabilities, estimated to be over $1.6 million dollars at the time, should be lowered accordingly. Id.

Mr. Planavsky's first attempt to reduce his tax liability lasted over five years and was unsuccessful. In January 2007, several municipal defendants sought dismissal of the first adversary proceeding. Following a hearing in June 2007, the bankruptcy court dismissed Mr. Planavsky's first adversary proceeding in favor of the movants on the basis that Mr. Planavsky failed to comply with the bankruptcy court's October 31, 2006, unwritten order directing Mr. Planavsky to procure independent appraisals regarding the value of his properties. Planavsky v. County of Broome (In re Planavsky), No. 02-80262-6-dd (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. June 5, 2007), aff'd, Planavsky v. Town of Union, No. 6:07-0832 (N.D.N.Y. Apr. 25, 2008). In August 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an order with respect to the remaining defendants in the first adversary proceeding, assigning the case to mediation and ordering the parties to select a mediator. Planavsky v. County of Broome (In re Planavsky), No. 02-80262-6-dd (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. August 22, 2008) Again, Mr. Planavsky failed to comply with the order. Transcript of hearing on United States Trustee's Motion to Convert at 16:7-8, July 22, 2010.

Mr. Planavsky did not propose a chapter 11 reorganization plan for more than six years. Ultimately, he filed one on August 18, 2007. Bankr. Dkt. 239. Mr. Planavsky's reorganization plan relied on rent receipts from residential properties and a commercial warehouse storage facility. Id. Mr. Planavsky acknowledged that the amount necessary to fund the plan was unknown and would be contingent upon the outcome of the property tax litigation. Id. Mr.

Planavsky's disclosure statement and reorganization plan indicated that his primary tenant, which is his son, would be funding the proposed reorganization plan to extent there would be a deficiency. Bankr. Dkt. 240. The disclosure statement also listed Mr. Planavsky's properties and his personal opinion of their respective values. Id.; see 11 U.S.C. § 1125 (requiring the debtor to disclose "adequate information" that would allow creditors to make an informed judgment about whether to support a proposed reorganization plan).

The United States Trustee objected to Mr. Planavsky's disclosure statement on three grounds: (1) the disclosure statement did not describe in detail or provide a basis for how Mr. Planavsky obtained his values for the properties; (2) the disclosure statement did not adequately address each creditor class and the amount of their claims; and most significantly (3) the disclosure statement failed to adequately disclose a succinct financial analysis, containing Mr. Planavsky's projected receipts and disbursements, upon which creditors could make a determination to accept or reject the proposed plan of reorganization. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A). Further litigation and multiple hearings regarding the deficiencies within the disclosure statement followed. It was not until September 9, 2008 — after Mr. Planavsky amended the disclosure statement four times and added two addendums to it, which took another year — that the bankruptcy court was able to approve a disclosure statement. It then set a hearing for November 17, 2008, to consider Mr. Planavsky's proposed chapter 11 reorganization plan. Bankr. Dkt. 289.

The United States Trustee then objected to that plan on the basis that it was not feasible because Mr. Planavsky failed to show that confirmation would not likely be followed by liquidation or further need of reorganization. Bankr. Dkt. 294; see 11 U.S.C. § 1129 (describing the requirements for plan confirmation). The objection relied upon the monthly financial operating reports that Mr. Planavsky had filed in the case. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A). Those demonstrated that his rental receipts would likely be insufficient to cover his proposed payments under the plan. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A). This was consistent with his fourth amended disclosure statement, in which Mr. Planavsky projected a $3,257.19 per month deficit under the proposed repayment plan. Bankr. Dkt. 286.

The United States Trustee also argued Mr. Planavsky had not shown he had an ability to fund the shortfall, since both the plan and the disclosure statement did not provide any evidence of either Mr. Planavsky's or his son's ability to satisfy the monthly shortfall. Bankr. Dkt. 294. Furthermore, Mr. Planavsky's proposed reorganization plan was not feasible because it failed to adequately provide for the full repayment of the $1.6 million tax debt owed to the municipal taxing authorities, which was secured against his income generating properties. 11 U.S.C. §1129(8); Bankr. Dkts. 292, 293. For these reasons, the United States Trustee argued that Mr. Planavsky's plan did not meet the feasibility requirements under 11 U.S.C. §1129(11) because, based on his monthly operating reports, he could have no success in reorganizing without a significant reduction in his priority tax liability claims. Id. Further reorganization would likely be necessary after confirmation of Mr. Planavsky's plan, and therefore it did not comply with the requirement of section 1129(11).

After Mr. Planavsky filed his reorganization plan and approved disclosure statement in 2008, he continued to litigate his tax liabilities, leaving the various objections to his plan and disclosure statement unresolved. In January 2009, Mr. Planavsky filed a second adversary complaint against the same municipal defendants that were involved in his first adversary proceeding. After the bankruptcy court granted a series of continuances, in May 2010, the court dismissed the second adversary proceeding primarily based on res judicata and laches. Planavsky v. Broome County, No. 09-80001-6-dd (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. May 5, 2010).

By the time Mr. Planavsky's second adversary proceeding was dismissed in May 2010, he had been under the protection of the Bankruptcy Code for nine years. During this period of time, Mr. Planavsky could not resolve the ongoing objections to his reorganization plan. Furthermore, his financial condition continued to deteriorate. In support of the motion to convert Mr. Planavsky's case, the United States Trustee submitted a compilation of Mr. Planavsky's monthly operating reports for the years 2008, 2009, and 2010. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A). The compilation showed that Mr. Planavsky's 2009 income and expenses suffered a monthly shortfall of $9,264.56 under the reorganization plan's proposed payments, almost three times greater than the $3,257.19 deficit projected in his 2008 fourth amended disclosure statement, with no proof that he had a viable method for funding that deficit. Bankr. Dkts. 280, 333. Furthermore, Mr. Planavsky's monthly operating reports for the period of January through May 2010 indicated that, in contrast to 2007, when Mr. Planavsky generated $.45 for every $1 dollar needed to make the payments required by his plan, Mr. Planavsky now only had $.17 available. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A).

III. Statement of the Proceedings Below.

Subsequently, on June 29, 2010, the United States Trustee moved to convert Mr. Planavsky's case for cause under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b). Bankr. Dkt. 333. The United States Trustee asserted two arguments. First, the case should be converted under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(2) based on Mr. Planavsky's inability to confirm or propose a viable plan, as evidenced by the nine-year financial history reflected in the monthly operating reports. Second, the case should be converted under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(3) based on Mr. Planavsky's unreasonable delay in advancing the case and the resulting prejudice to his creditors because they had been prevented from foreclosing on the properties for nearly ten years.

On July 15, 2010, Mr. Planavsky filed an opposition to the United States Trustee's motion to convert his case. Bankr. Dkt. 336. Mr. Planavsky argued that any delay he caused in the case was a result of his participation in "vigorous litigation" concerning the tax disputes. Id at 1. Mr. Planavsky alleged that notwithstanding the unfavorable result of the property tax litigation, his reorganization plan could be still confirmed. Id at 1-2. Mr. Planavsky further argued that the United States Trustee relied on a "convoluted analysis" in reviewing his financial reports and that the motion to convert was "premature." Id. at 2-3. Mr. Planavsky maintained that his business was in fact profitable and he was able to meet his obligations. Id. at 3. Mr. Planavsky, however, provided no documentary support for his argument.

At a hearing held on July 22, 2010, the United States Trustee argued that despite Mr. Planavsky's nine years of bankruptcy protection to reorganize his business and reach a resolution on his tax debts, there was "absolutely no ability to reorganize." Transcript of hearing on United States Trustee's Motion to Convert at 12: 4-14, July 22, 2010. What Mr. Planavsky characterized as "vigorous litigation," was really a dilatory tactic. Id. None of the financial records provided by Mr. Planavsky demonstrated an ability to successfully reorganize or fund a reorganization plan. Tr. at 8-11. And Mr. Planavsky's tax liabilities continued to rise, having now reached $1.8 million. Tr. at 4:25, 5:1. Finally, Mr. Planavsky's assertion that his son would fund his reorganization plan was unsubstantiated and, nevertheless, failed to make Mr. Planavsky's rental operations an independent and viable going concern. Tr. at 16: 22-25.

Mr. Planavsky did not seek to put on evidence at the section 1112(b) hearing. Instead, he suggested he could prove that his case was feasible at a confirmation hearing. Tr. at 15: 1-17. Despite that, Mr. Planavsky acknowledged the shortfall in his income, but suggested that he would present evidence at confirmation proving the financial wherewithal of his son in order to satisfy the deficiency in income to make plan payments. Id. Mr. Planavsky did not ask for permission to present evidence at this hearing, and presented none. To the contrary, Mr. Planavsky asserted that his plan could be confirmed on the terms set forth in his fourth amended disclosure statement. Tr. at 14:13-16. The bankruptcy court, however, noted that its ruling in a related adversary proceeding would already necessitate further amendments to the disclosure statement. Tr. at 14:17-20.

The bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee and held that sufficient cause for conversion of the case to chapter 7 existed under section 1112(b). Tr. at 17: 12-20. The court held that there was an inability to effectuate a plan, based on the lack of income as shown in the record; and that the creditors "have waited nearly a decade to be paid back on prepetition debt." Id. The court noted that Mr. Planavsky had not taken any action in the two months since his second adversary proceeding had been dismissed, he had not complied with the outstanding mediation order, and that he had failed to reply to numerous requests for proof that his son would supplement his income. Id. As the court explained, "things need to be done and they are not, yet again." Id.

Mr. Planavsky was given over nine years to begin repaying his creditors by confirming a chapter 11 repayment plan. He never succeeded, and his deteriorating financial condition could give no one any expectation that he ever would. Having been so patient, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by converting the case to chapter 7, which will allow the debtor's assets to be liquidated to repay some of the debts he owes his creditors.

The bankruptcy court converted Mr. Planavsky's chapter 11 bankruptcy case to one under chapter 7 under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) for two sound reasons: (1) his nine year delay has been prejudicial to his creditors and (2) his inability to confirm a chapter 11 reorganization plan, based upon insufficient income to fund the reorganization plan. Given those facts, the court ordered that Mr. Planavsky's case be converted to one under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code.

This was not an abuse of the bankruptcy court's broad discretion. The record shows that the nine year delay was unreasonable and prejudicial to Mr. Planavsky's creditors due to (1) the extreme amount of time Mr. Planavsky spent litigating with municipal taxation authorities, (2) Mr. Planavsky's inability to propose a confirmable plan after almost a decade under the protection of the automatic stay, and (3) Mr. Planavsky's failure to comply with a bankruptcy court order directing Mr. Planavsky to seek mediation to resolve a remaining disputed issue within a pending adversary proceeding. The record also shows that Mr. Planavsky could not confirm a chapter 11 reorganization plan because, as Mr. Planavsky acknowledged, there was insufficient income to support the proposed plan payments without substantial assistance from his son. But this assistance never came, and Mr. Planavsky never offered any proof that his son could actually provide it.

Mr. Planavsky's arguments on appeal — that his due process rights were violated by the conversion and that the conversion order was erroneous due to the "law of the case" doctrine — are unpersuasive. First, he never presented these arguments to the bankruptcy court and has therefore waived them on appeal. Second, these arguments fail on their merits. The due process argument fails because the bankruptcy court provided the notice and hearing required by the Bankruptcy Code. The "law of the case" argument fails because the doctrine does not apply to factual determinations and it does not bind the bankruptcy court's discretion.

Because the bankruptcy court's factual determinations were based upon ample evidence in the record, its findings were not clearly erroneous and this Court should affirm the order entered below.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Clearly Err When It Found Cause to Convert Mr. Planavsky's Chapter 11 Bankruptcy Case to One Under Chapter 7 Under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b).

Under section 1112(b), a bankruptcy court may convert a chapter 11 case to one under chapter 7 "for cause." § 1112(b). Section 1112(b) sets forth a list of ten examples of what could constitute cause, "including" the "inability to effectuate a plan" and "unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors." §§ 1112(b)(2), (3). "[T]his list is illustrative, not exhaustive." C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship v. Norton Co. (In re C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship), 113 F.3d 1304, 1311 (2d Cir. 1997); 11 U.S.C. § 102(3) (stating that "including" is "not limiting" in the Bankruptcy Code).

Ultimately, the bankruptcy court must decide whether the debtor's efforts "have proven inadequate to the task of reorganizing his affairs effectively within a reasonable amount of time." A. Illum Hansen, Inc. v. Tiana Queen Motel, Inc. (In re Tiana Queen Motel, Inc.), 749 F.2d 146, 150 (2d Cir. 1984). This judgment is a matter of the bankruptcy court's discretion. C-TC, 113 F.3d at 1312; In re Abijoe Realty Corp., 943 F.2d 121, 128 n.12 (1st Cir. 1991) ("[T]he determination of cause under section 1112(b) is subject to judicial discretion under the circumstances of each case.”).

In this case, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found cause to convert Mr. Planavsky’s chapter 11 case to one under chapter 7. There is substantial support in the record for the court’s finding that (1) the nine-year delay in the case was unreasonable and prejudicial to Mr. Planavsky’s creditors and (2) there was no reasonable likelihood that a chapter 11 reorganization plan could be confirmed. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court’s order converting Mr. Planavsky’s case should be affirmed.

A. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Clearly Err When It Found That There Had Been Unreasonable Delay That Was Prejudicial to Mr. Planavsky’s Creditors.

Whether cause exists to convert a debtor’s case under section 1112(b)(3) based on delay that has been unreasonable and prejudicial to creditors must be considered within the context of the bankruptcy case. Tiana Queen, 749 F.2d at 152; compare In re Sphere Holding Corp., 162 B.R. 639, 643 (E.D.N.Y. 1994) (determining that a three month delay in filing monthly operating reports caused by the incapacity of the debtor’s attorney was reasonable) with In re William Steiner, Inc., 139 B.R. 356, 358 (Bankr. D. Md. 1992) (holding that a two year delay in filing a reorganization plan was unreasonable in light of the circumstance that the only significant debt in the case was a state tax claim).

In Tiana Queen, the chapter 11 debtors litigated the value of three properties in the estate, and obtained continuances based on repeated assurances to the bankruptcy court that a cash infusion from a sale necessary for the reorganization plan was imminent. Id. at 151. The bankruptcy court converted the case under section 1112(b) because the case had been paralyzed by litigation and there was no evidence of progress toward confirmation after 15 months. Id.

The Second Circuit affirmed, explaining that although there is no fixed amount of time allowed to confirm a reorganization plan, the bankruptcy judge was not required to grant the "debtors' repeated pleas for more time . . . at the expense of secured creditors" when the debtors had a "proven record for overestimating their chances of success" and an "inability to devise a reorganization plan grounded in reality." Id. at 152. The Second Circuit held that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion because the debtors' failed to demonstrate "that their prospects for prompt rehabilitation were based upon anything more substantial than [the debtors'] boundless confidence." Id.

In Mr. Planavsky's case, the record similarly demonstrates that after nine years, his inability to take meaningful, timely steps to advance the reorganization process has been unreasonable and prejudicial to his creditors. Mr. Planavsky's case was six years old before he filed a proposed reorganization plan and a disclosure statement. Bankr. Dkt. 239, 240. In the main bankruptcy case, the majority of docket activity included Mr. Planavsky's adjournments and the filing of monthly operating reports. And Mr. Planavsky's involvement in so called "vigorous litigation" did nothing more than keep his tax creditors at bay while he enjoyed the protections of the Bankruptcy Code. Tr. at 12:4-14. Rather than actively prosecute his bankruptcy case, Mr. Planavsky (1) engaged in dilatory discovery tactics, (2) refused to comply with court orders, (3) filed frivolous responses to the objections to his disclosure statement and reorganization plan, and (4) brought claims that were without any merit.

For example, consider Mr. Planavsky's first adversary proceeding, which was commenced on October 29, 2002, against Broome County and ten other municipal defendants. Planavsky v. County of Broome (In re Planavsky), No. 02-80262-6-dd (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. June 5, 2007). After years of discovery orders with little progress, in March 2007, the bankruptcy court granted Mr. Planavsky until May 21, 2007, to procure independent appraisals to support his claims in the adversary proceeding or face dismissal. Id. Mr. Planavsky failed to comply with that order and on June 5, 2007 the bankruptcy court dismissed a number of the claims against the municipal defendants. Id. Mr. Planavsky appealed the dismissal, which was affirmed by this Court on August 28, 2008. Planavsky v. Town of Union, No. 6:07-0832 (N.D.N.Y. Apr. 25, 2008) (stating that Mr. Planavsky had failed to comply with the bankruptcy court's orders within the established time limits, had not mentioned any trouble complying with the orders, did not request an extension of time, and had apparently made no attempt to comply with the orders).

Next, Mr. Planavsky repeatedly failed to comply with his statutory obligations regarding his disclosure statements and reorganization plan. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 1125 (governing the requirements for a disclosure statement), 1129 (governing the requirements for plan confirmation). In response to repeated objections to his disclosure statement, Mr. Planavsky ultimately filed four amended disclosure statements. Bankr. Dkts. 240, 263, 278, 280. None of these contained new substantive information or disclosures sufficient to respond to the United States Trustee's objections and provide creditors and parties in interest with a reasonable basis to vote on his proposed reorganization plan. Id. This caused needless delays in the case and further prejudice to Mr. Planavsky's creditors.

Most recently, Mr. Planavsky further frustrated the proceedings by filing the second adversary proceeding on January 11, 2009, which involved nearly the same causes of actions against the same defendants. Bankr. Dkt. 301. This adversary proceeding was ultimately dismissed by bankruptcy court on May 5, 2010, in a 22 page decision, primarily due to res judicata and laches. Planavsky v. Broome County, No. 09-80001-6-dd (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. May 5, 2010).

In addition, the second adversary proceeding wasted time and resources beyond the immediate cost of its prosecution. This is because it was filed after the bankruptcy court approved the fourth amended disclosure statement and had set a plan confirmation hearing. As Mr. Planavsky acknowledged, the bankruptcy court's dismissal of the 2009 adversary proceeding required another amendment to the disclosure statement, which reset the entire plan confirmation process. Tr. at 14:13-20. Also, as the bankruptcy court noted, both during and for two months following the dismissal of the second adversary proceeding, Mr. Planavsky disregarded the outstanding objections to his reorganization plan and ignored the court's previous orders to seek appraisals and mediation for any remaining claims. Tr. at 16: 6-19. No reasonable end to the proceedings was in sight.

Based on these facts, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found cause to convert Mr. Planavsky's case for unreasonable delay and prejudice to his creditors. Over the past nine years, Mr. Planavsky has repeatedly refused to take actions that would materially advance the case — as the bankruptcy court stated, "[t]hings need to be done and they are not, yet again." Tr. at 16:12-13. Because Mr. Planavsky cannot reorganize "his affairs effectively within a reasonable amount of time," like the debtors in Tiana Queen, the bankruptcy court's decision converting his case should be affirmed. Tiana Queen, 749 F.2d at 152.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Clearly Err When It Found That Mr. Planavsky Was Unable to Effectuate a Chapter 11 Reorganization Plan.

Cause also exists under section 1112(b)(2) when a debtor is unable to effectuate a reorganization plan. Id. at 151. Within the Second Circuit, conversion is justified when there is no reasonable probability that the debtor will be able to confirm a reorganization plan and emerge from bankruptcy. C-TC 9th Ave. P'Ship, 113 F.3d at 1311; see, e.g., In re Woodbrook Assocs., 19 F.3d 312, 316 (7th Cir. 1994) (holding that conversion is appropriate when "the court determines that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan can be confirmed in the chapter 11 case.").

When making such a determination, a bankruptcy court is not required to rely upon the "good faith" of a debtor's proposed rehabilitation plan after a debtor has demonstrated the inability to make good on a proposal over the course of the proceedings. Tiana Queen, 749 F.2d at 151. A bankruptcy court need not "blindly accept" a debtor's mere optimism about the prospects of reorganization based on speculation, such as a windfall financial recovery from litigation, as fact. Loop Corp. v. U.S. Trustee, 379 F.3d 511, 518 (8th Cir. 2004). Instead, a court should assess the evidence critically, in light of the debtor's history on the record, the reorganization plan's potential costs to the estate, and the debtor's ability to achieve a confirmable plan with the creditors. Id. "There must be a reasonable possibility of a successful reorganization within a reasonable time." First Jersey Nat'l Bank v. Brown (In re Brown), 951 F.2d 564, 572 (3d Cir. 1991) (quotation omitted) (expressing concern about the viability of a reorganization plan that could not be funded without the consent of the debtor's non-filing husband).

_____The bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found that there was no reasonable possibility that Mr. Planavsky would be able to confirm a reorganization plan. This is because the evidence in the record developed over the past nine years demonstrated that Mr. Planavsky's financial problems could not be rehabilitated through a reorganization plan. An analysis of Mr. Planavsky's 2009 income and expense statements showed an significant and unrefuted monthly shortfall of $9,264.56. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A). And the most recent financial history provided by Mr. Planavsky's monthly operating reports for the period of January through May 2010 indicated that, in contrast to 2007, when Mr. Planavsky generated $.45 for every $1 dollar needed to make the payments required by his plan, he now only had $.17 available. Id.

Even Mr. Planavsky did not dispute that he would be unable to make the payments required under the reorganization plan. He simply projected that he had a monthly shortfall of only $3,257.19 per month in payments under the reorganization plan. Bankr. Dkt. 280 at 4. But this amount did not take into account that Mr. Planavsky's property tax liabilities far exceeded what he proposed to pay in his plan. Bankr. Dkt. 239 at 3. These liabilities, which are fully secured by statutory liens, must be satisfied in full for the plan to be confirmed. 11 U.S.C. §1129(8).

Mr. Planavsky acknowledged these problems concerning his inability to generate enough income to satisfy his payment obligations under the reorganization plan, but alleged that his son would supplement plan payments for a successful reorganization to occur. Tr. at 15. But despite multiple requests for information and four amendments to his disclosure statement, Mr. Planavsky never offered any evidence that the restructuring plan would allow him to reverse his declining revenue from his rental operations or that his son is capable of financing the reorganization plan — as the bankruptcy court observed, "[t]here's been no proof provided the trustee with regard to income being supplemented by the son even after numerous requests." Tr. at 16:14-16. Nor did Mr. Planavsky ever obtain financing from his son.

Consequently, there is no evidence in the record to support Mr. Planavsky's belief that he is capable of meeting his obligations under a restructuring plan or that the reorganization would result in a viable business, especially as his financial condition made no significant improvement despite receiving the benefits of bankruptcy protection during the boom years of 2002-2008. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A). His tax liabilities are too high and his income is too low. The bankruptcy court was not required to adhere to his unreasonable belief that he would be able to reduce his tax liabilities. Loop, 379 F.3d at 518. Therefore, Mr. Planavsky's history of dilatory and litigious behavior, including his unwillingness to mediate with his tax creditors, his repeated submission of inadequate disclosure statements, and his refusal to address objections to the reorganization plan, all suggest that there is no "reasonable possibility of a successful reorganization within a reasonable time." Brown, 951 F.2d at 572.

In light of this evidence, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found that there was no reasonable likelihood to expect a chapter 11 reorganization plan to be confirmed.

II. Mr. Planavsky's Arguments on Appeal Are Unavailing.

Mr. Planavsky raises two arguments on appeal: (1) his due process rights were violated because his bankruptcy case was converted from one under chapter 11 to one under chapter 7 without an evidentiary hearing and (2) the conversion order was erroneous due to the bankruptcy court's deviation from "the law of the case." Appellant's Brief at 2-3. This Court does not need to consider those arguments because they have been raised for the first time on appeal.

A. Because Mr. Planavsky Did Not Initially Present His Arguments to the Bankruptcy Court, They Have Been Waived on Appeal.

"An argument raised for the first time on appeal is typically forfeited." Katel L.L.C. v. AT & T Corp., 607 F.3d 60, 68 (2d Cir. 2010). "[T]his rule is prudential, not jurisdictional," and an appellate court "may consider a forfeited argument if there is a risk that 'manifest injustice' would otherwise result." Id. But "the circumstances normally do not militate in favor of an exercise of discretion to address new arguments on appeal where those arguments were available to the parties below and they proffer no reason for their failure to raise the arguments below." In re Nortel Networks Corp. Sec. Litig., 539 F.3d 129, 133 (2d Cir. 2008).

There is no risk of "manifest injustice" here. Mr. Planavsky had two opportunities to present these arguments to the bankruptcy court. First, he could have raised these arguments when he filed his written opposition to the United States Trustee's motion to convert his bankruptcy case. Bankr. Dkt. 336. Second, he could have raised these arguments at the hearing on the conversion motion. See generally Transcript. He did not. And the record shows no reason why he could not have raised them below. Therefore, Mr. Planavsky has waived these arguments.

B. Even If This Court Decided to Consider Mr. Planavsky's Arguments, They Are Entirely Without Merit.

1. The Bankruptcy Court Provided the Due Process Required Under the Bankruptcy Code Prior to Converting Mr. Planavsky's Case.

First, the bankruptcy court did not violate Mr. Planavsky's due process rights by converting his case without holding an additional evidentiary hearing. Section 1112(b) provides that "after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title." § 1112(b). The Bankruptcy Code defines "notice and a hearing" as "notice as is appropriate in the particular circumstances, and such opportunity for a hearing as is appropriate in the particular circumstances." 11 U.S.C. § 102(1)(A). Additionally, the Bankruptcy Code "authorizes an act without an actual hearing if such notice is given properly and if such a hearing is not requested timely by a party in interest." § 102(1)(B)(I).

The Second Circuit has held that a bankruptcy court need not always hold "a full evidentiary hearing prior to the entry of a conversion order." Tiana Queen, 749 F.2d at 150. In this circuit, "[w]hen the record is sufficiently well developed to allow the bankruptcy court to draw the necessary inferences to [convert] a Chapter 11 case for cause, the bankruptcy court may do so." C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship, 113 F.3d at 1312. The Eighth Circuit has also held that a chapter 11 case can be converted or dismissed without an evidentiary hearing. Loop, 379 F.3d at 519.

In Tiana Queen, the Second Circuit affirmed a conversion order under circumstances very similar to Mr. Planavsky's case. Tiana Queen, 749 F.2d at 150. Like Mr. Planavsky, the debtors in Tiana Queen argued that a section 1112(b) conversion was entered without "notice and a hearing" because the bankruptcy court did not hold a "full evidentiary hearing" prior to the entry of the conversion order. Id. The Second Circuit rejected this argument, explaining that "the record reveals that the appellants were on notice that the conversion . . . was being considered." Id. As the Second Circuit observed, "the appellants had ample opportunity to argue against conversion" over the course "of a period of several months" when "the debtors, the secured and unsecured creditors, and the United States Trustee gave their views on the critical issues" of the likelihood of rehabilitation of the estate and prejudice to the creditors. Id. Thus, there was "no such specific need for further development of the record." Id.

In Mr. Planavsky's case, the record was sufficiently developed, based on nine years of failure to confirm a plan. Mr. Planavsky had the ability to put on evidence, but chose not to do so. Mr. Planavsky received notice of the United States Trustee's motion to convert. Bankr. Dkt. 334. Mr. Planavsky had an opportunity to respond to the United States Trustee's motion, and utilized that opportunity by submitting a written opposition to the bankruptcy court and participating at the court's hearing on the motion to convert. See generally Transcript. But, Mr. Planavsky never requested a separate evidentiary hearing, or ever described what new, specific evidence would have been presented at an additional hearing. Id.

In addition, much of the evidence in the record that established cause for the conversion was based upon material that Mr. Planavsky supplied. Mr.

Planavsky's monthly operating reports, for example, documented his deteriorating financial position. Bankr. Dkt. 333 (Exhibit A). And Mr. Planavsky estimated that he would be unable to meet his financial obligations under his proposed reorganization plan. Bankr. Dkt. 280 at 4. Finally, Mr. Planavsky never challenged the accuracy of the data that he submitted, so it was reasonable for the court to rely upon it when it found cause to convert Mr. Planavsky's bankruptcy case. To the extent that there is no evidence on the record concerning Mr. Planavsky's ability to obtain third-party funding from his son, that is Mr. Planavsky's fault: Despite multiple requests from the case trustee, Mr. Planavsky never submitted any proof to support his contention that his son could or would come to Mr. Planavsky's rescue. Tr. at 16:14-16. And that this never happened at any point in the case's nine-year history is telling.

Mr. Planavsky cannot now complain that — despite having multiple opportunities to submit favorable evidence on the record, filing a written objection to the motion to convert, and participating at oral argument on whether his case should be converted — the bankruptcy court failed to provide him with adequate process prior to conversion solely because it did not conduct an additional evidentiary hearing. Just like in Tiana Queen, since the record was sufficiently developed at the time the court considered the motion to convert, the bankruptcy court did not deny Mr. Planavsky his procedural rights by ruling without an additional evidentiary hearing. Tiana Queen, 749 F.2d at 150; see also C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship, 113 F.3d at 1312; accord Loop, 379 F.3d at 519.

2. The Law of the Case Doctrine Is Inapplicable.

Second, Mr. Planavsky cannot rely upon the law of the case doctrine to excuse his refusal to timely obtain appraisals of his properties for the years in which he is contesting his tax liability on such properties. The "law of the case" doctrine states, "when a court decides upon a rule of law, that decision should continue to govern the same issues in subsequent stages of the same case." Arizona v. California, 460 U.S. 605, 618 (1983). "Application of the law of the case doctrine varies depending upon the context" and a trial court my revise an order "at any time before the entry of final judgment." Rezzonico v. H & R Block, Inc., 182 F.3d 144, 148 (2d Cir. 1999). "The law of the case doctrine is discretionary, not mandatory" and "does not purport to be a legally binding limitation on the court's authority to reconsider such matters." Id. at 149.

The law of the case doctrine does not apply because Mr. Plavansky is attempting to rely upon the order establishing the value in 2002 for a limited subset of his properties located within the city of Binghamton for the purpose of determining his 2001 tax liability on the properties. Bankr. Dkt. 60. The bankruptcy court made a limited finding of fact regarding the 2002 value of the property and did not announce a rule of law. Furthermore, on February 17, 2010, the bankruptcy court held that proper valuation for purposes of 11 U.S.C. §505 (determining tax liability) is a "moving target" and that Mr. Planavsky had the burden of establishing such value for each year under which he sought consideration. In re Planavsky, No. 01-63125-6-dd (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 2010). Mr. Planavsky could have appealed this decision. He did not.

The "law of the case" doctrine does not require a property's value in 2002 to control in tax assessments nearly a decade later, nor does it allow Mr. Planavsky to engage in a collateral attack on the bankruptcy court's February 2010 order to avoid suffering the consequences from his refusal to comply with that order.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered below.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF MANDAMUS TO, AND APPEAL FROM THE DECISION OF,

THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF PUERTO RICO

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF MANDAMUS & BRIEF OF APPELLANT

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED AND RELIEF SOUGHT

1. Whether this Court should issue a writ of mandamus directing the district court to withdraw its appointment of a bankruptcy trustee since, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 1104(c), only the United States Trustee has the authority to appoint the trustee.

2. In the alternative, whether this Court should, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1291 and the "collateral order" rule of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 545-47 (1949), set aside the district court's order appointing a trustee.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

This case arises from the decision of the court below that it, rather than the U.S. Trustee, would appoint the bankruptcy trustee to administer the debtor's affairs.

After the debtor, the Plaza De Diego Shopping Center, Inc., filed for bankruptcy under Chapter 11, its shareholders initiated Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act (RICO) [FN1] actions against three of the shopping center's creditors. One of the creditors then moved for the appointment of a trustee pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 1104(a). The Office of the United States Trustee also moved for the appointment of trustee, on the grounds of mismanagement by the debtor-in-possession.

On June 19, 1989, Chief U.S. District Judge Perez-Gimenez, sitting, he believed, as a bankruptcy judge, ordered the appointment of a trustee. [FN2] He further ordered that the U.S. Trustee within five days submit for his consideration the names of three candidates for trustee. Judge Perez-Gimenez' order further stated that he would review the U.S. Trustee's candidates -- and any candidates suggested by "any party in interest" -- and that the court would then "approve the appointment of one of the candidates." Slip. op. at 4. [FN3]

The U.S. Trustee objected, and filed a motion to alter or amend the order on the ground that under 11 U.S.C. 1104(c) the U.S. Trustee, not the court, is to appoint the trustee, subject only to the court's approval. With this motion, the U.S. Trustee submitted a Notice of Appointment naming Mr. Roberto Lopez Alvarez as trustee, subject to the court's confirmation. On June 29, 1989, the court, without explanation, denied approval to the appointment of Mr. Alvarez and again directed the U.S. Trustee to submit three candidates for the court's consideration.

Subsequently, during an "emergency" hearing on other bankruptcy matters convened on July 13, 1989, the district court, sua sponte and over the objection of the U.S. Trustee, "expanded" the scope of the hearing to include the matter of appointing a trustee. The court put forward the name of its suggested trustee candidate, one Pedro J. Fuste. After finding that members of the creditors committee generally approved of the idea of Mr. Fuste serving as trustee, Judge Perez-Gimenez declared his intention to confirm Mr. Fuste's "appointment", and gave the U.S. Trustee until July 18 to inform the court of its position on his proposed action. The U.S. Trustee again objected, reminding the court that only the U.S. Trustee has authority under the bankruptcy laws to make this appointment.

[*4] In its Opinion and Order of July 20, 1989, the district court confirmed the appointment of Mr. Fuste as trustee. In support of its decision, the court explained that the state of the debtor's affairs made quick action in appointing a trustee imperative, and that it had chosen to ask for candidates and make the appointment itself "in order to expedite the process of selecting a qualified trustee." Slip op. at 5.

The court rejected the U.S. Trustee's argument that this unusual method of appointing the trustee violated 11 U.S.C. 1104(c). While conceding that "the statute does speak of the submission of 'one disinterested person"' by the U.S. Trustee, Judge Perez-Gimenez concluded that the statute was not "meant to preclude" the method he had adopted. Slip op. at 8. Furthermore, the court opined that it had not in fact usurped the U.S. Trustee's appointment power, since, in the court's view, "the appointment of the trustee power remained at all time in the U.S. Trustee, while the power of approval remained at all times in the Court." Accordingly, the court stated, its appointment was merely "a time saving measure with the success of the Chapter 11 reorganization in mind," made pursuant to its inherent equitable power to "do what needs to be done." Id. at 10.

STATEMENT REGARDING JURISDICTION

It appears that Judge Perez-Gimenez, the Chief Judge for the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, believed throughout these proceedings that he was acting as a bankruptcy court judge, rather than as a district court judge sitting in bankruptcy. Were the decision to appoint Mr. Fuste truly that of the bankruptcy court, appeal therefrom properly would lie in the district court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 158(a). As we explain below, however, the decision below could not have been that of the bankruptcy court. Under the revised Bankruptcy Code it is not possible for a federal district judge to act as the bankruptcy court. It is possible, however, for the federal district court to assert original jurisdiction over the bankruptcy, with the district court sitting in bankruptcy. When a district judge makes a final bankruptcy decision pursuant to the district court's original jurisdiction, as opposed to the district court's appellate jurisdiction to review a bankruptcy judge's determination, the appeal lies in the circuit court of appeals.

Under the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, 11 U.S.C. 101 et seq., original jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases was vested in the bankruptcy courts. In Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipeline Co., 458 U.S. 50 (1982), however, the Supreme Court held that bankruptcy court jurisdiction over "non-core" bankruptcy disputes was unconstitutional. Following the Marathon Pipeline decision, Congress amended the Bankruptcy Code through passage of the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984. [FN4] The 1984 amendments cured the constitutionality problem by providing that "the district court shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all cases under title 11." 28 U.S.C. 1334(a) (1985).

[*5] As a result of the 1984 Act, bankruptcy courts became adjuncts of the district courts. [FN5] Functionally, though, bankruptcy courts were revested with the authority to adjudicate "core" bankruptcy disputes in the first instance. The Act provided that while the district courts possess original jurisdiction over bankruptcies, "[e]ach district court may provide that any or all cases under title 11 * * * shall be referred to the bankruptcy judges for the district." 28 U.S.C. 157(a).

At this time all district courts, including Puerto Rico's, have provided by rule for the automatic reference of all title 11 cases to bankruptcy judges. See 1 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 3.01 (15th ed. 1989). Reference is not irrevocable, however, and a case may be withdrawn by the district court at any time. 28 U.S.C. 157(d). There is no provision in the Code, however, for a district court judge to act as a bankruptcy judge.

Notwithstanding his inability to so act, Judge Perez-Gimenez appears to have believed that he was acting as a bankruptcy judge throughout the proceedings below. The case was captioned and docketed as a bankruptcy court case, and all files were kept in the bankruptcy court. Judge Perez-Gimenez' Opinion and Order of June 29, like all other orders in this case, was issued as a decision of "The United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Puerto Rico." Moreover, that opinion seems clearly to assume that in making the appointment of the trustee, Judge Perez-Gimenez was acting as judge of the bankruptcy court.

For the reasons already stated, however, Judge Perez-Gimenez could not have been acting as the de jure bankruptcy judge. Rather, once Puerto Rico's two bankruptcy judges had recused themselves from this case, it necessarily reverted to the jurisdiction of the district court, notwithstanding the fact that Judge Perez-Gimenez never formally withdrew the reference from the bankruptcy court. This conclusion is supported both by the case law and the structure of the bankruptcy appeals process itself.

For example, a similar jurisdictional question was presented in Klenske v. Goo (In re Monoa Finance Company, Inc.), 781 F.2d 1370 (9th Cir. 1986), where a district judge had assumed control of a case following the bankruptcy judge's refusal. The papers in the case, however, continued to be filed in the bankruptcy court, some with bankruptcy court and some with district court headings. After the judge granted summary judgment in one dispute in the litigation, the losing party appealed to the Ninth Circuit. Initially, the party prevailing on summary judgment argued that the court of appeals lacked jurisdiction over a direct appeal from what it believed was a decision of the bankruptcy court.

The Ninth Circuit disagreed, reasoning that a bankruptcy decision by a district court judge can only be a decision of the district court. While acknowledging that the trial judge believed himself to be "sitting as the bankruptcy court," the court of appeals concluded that this could not change the fact that "he is a district judge." Id. at 1372. In holding that appeal from the district judge's decision was properly made to the court of appeals, the Ninth Circuit observed that it was "logical to assume" that Congress had provided in 11 U.S.C. 158 for appeals from final bankruptcy court decisions to be lodged in the district court "to prevent an appeal to this court before an Article III judge had ruled on an issue." Id. This concern, however, was "not present if the original decision was made by an article III district judge." Id. [FN6]

[*6] The Klenske court also emphasized the a strong practical considerations why the decision of the district judge, sitting in bankruptcy, must be appealed to the court of appeals:

> if appeal is not taken to this court, it would go to the district court of the district that includes the bankruptcy court, 28 U.S.C. 158(a) * * * it does not make sense to have appeals from an Article III judge heard by * * * another judge of that judge's district court. We accordingly will hold that we will treat an appeal from the decision of a district court judge sitting as a bankruptcy court as an appeal from a final decision of a district court appealable under 28 U.S.C. 1291.

Id.

The same considerations, obviously, obtain here. There is no jurisdictional reason for the decision of Chief District Judge Perez-Gimenez to be reviewed by another district judge. Nor does it make any practical "sense" to appeal his decision to the district court. Accordingly, relief is properly sought from this Court. [FN7]

STATEMENT OF REASONS WHY THE WRIT SHOULD ISSUE

I. A WRIT OF MANDAMUS SHOULD ISSUE TO DIRECT THE DISTRICT COURT TO WITHDRAW ITS APPOINTMENT OF A TRUSTEE, AND, AS REQUIRED BY 11 U.S.C. 1104(C), PERMIT THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE TO APPOINT THE STANDING TRUSTEE

A writ should issue "to confine the [district court] to a lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction." Roche v. Evaporated Milk Association, 319 U.S. 21, 26 (1943). Contrary to law and over the government's repeated objections, the court below assumed to itself the authority to appoint the trustee. Therefore, the preemptory writ is appropriate to correct a course of action "amounting to a 'judicial usurpation of power.'" Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 95 (1967) quoting DeBeers Consol. Mines, Ltd. v. United States, 525 U.S. 212, 217 (1945). Mandamus is necessary to return the authority to appoint trustees the rightful party: the United States Trustee. [FN8]

11 U.S.C. 1104(c) plainly states that the U.S. Trustee, not the court, shall appoint the trustee in bankruptcy cases. The statute provides:

> If the court orders the appointment of a trustee * * * then the United States trustee, after consultation with the parties in interest, shall appoint, subject to the court's approval, one disinterested person other than the United States Trustee to serve as trustee * * * in the case.

(emphasis supplied). Obviously, the statute admits of no interpretation other than that urged by the government. Where, as here, the court decides that a trustee is to be appointed, the U.S. Trustee makes the appointment, subject only to the court's approval. Nothing in section 1104(c), or any other provision of the Bankruptcy Code, reposes the power of appointment in the bankruptcy or district courts.

In view of this statute's clarity, it is, of course, unnecessary to look further to interpret its meaning. "The 'plain purpose' of legislation * * * is to be determined in the first instance with reference to the plain language of the statute itself." Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System v. Dimension Financial Corp., 474 U.S. 361, 373 (1986). See also Burlington Northern R.R. Co. v. Oklahoma Tax Comm'n, 107 S.Ct. 1855, 1860 (1987) ("When we find the terms of a statute unambiguous, judicial inquiry is complete"). Nonetheless, a look behind this unambiguous statute reveals that Congress had many good reasons to get bankruptcy judges out of the business of appointing trustees. Indeed, the U.S. Trustees were created for the express purpose of taking on many of the ministerial and administrative duties, including the selection of trustees, previously born by bankruptcy judges. Contrary to the district court's opinion, the statute was "meant to preclude" the method of appointment employed by Judge Perez-Gimenez. The court's decision to name its own candidate as trustee in this case is more than a mere usurpation of the U.S. Trustee's authority; it is precisely the practice that Congress intended to stop.

A. The Legislative History Behind 11 U.S.C. 1104(c) Confirms That Congress Intended To Prohibit The Appointment of Trustees By The Courts.

[*7] Section 1104(c) was added to the Bankruptcy Code through enactment of the "Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986" [FN9] ("the 1986 Act"). Prior to the 1986 Act, U.S. Trustees were empowered to appoint trustees in specified districts under the U.S. Trustee pilot program in effect following enactment of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 ("the 1978 Act"). Under the 1978 Act, 11 U.S.C. 151104 provided -- in language identical to the current section 1104(c) -- for U.S. Trustees in pilot program districts to appoint bankruptcy case trustees. The 1986 Act transmogrified the United States Trustee program from the pilot program that had been in effect in 18 judicial districts to a permanent, nationwide program. [FN10]

In the course of expanding the U.S. Trustee program, the 1986 Act amended the Bankruptcy Code to accommodate the more comprehensive role of the U.S. Trustees. Among the changes was an amended 11 U.S.C. 1104(c), the statutory provision governing the appointment of trustees in Chapter 11 cases. Prior to the 1986 Act, section 1104(c) permitted the appointment of trustees by the court in non-pilot program districts. The amended section 1104(c), however, codified the pilot-program's trustee appointment provision, former 11 U.S.C. 151104 (1978). As amended, section 1104(c) states unambiguously that the U.S. Trustee, not the court, "shall appoint, subject to the court's approval, one disinterested person other than the United States Trustee to serve as trustee in the case."

Thus, in view of the statute's evolution, section 1104(c) is best understood in light of the legislative history behind section 151104 of the 1978 Act and the history of the 1986 amendments. That history demonstrates that Congress shifted the power of appointment from judges to the U.S. Trustees for two reasons: (1) to free bankruptcy judges from burdensome administrative tasks and, more important, (2) to avoid the possibility or appearance of a conflict of interest necessarily arising when a judge must decide matters litigated between a trustee of his own selection and other parties to the bankruptcy. [FN11] See generally H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong. 1st Sess. 88-89 reprinted in U.S. Code Cong. & Admn. News 5787, 6049-6061. [Hereinafter "the 1978 legislative history."]

A principal concern for Congress was the operation of "bankruptcy rings," among bankruptcy lawyers and the courts, wherein judges appointed practioners well known to them as trustees, set their compensation, and then ruled on disputes between their hand-picked candidates and parties to the bankruptcy. [FN12]

Accordingly, the 1978 Act sought to remedy these problems by relegating judges to a purely judicial role. In the pilot districts U.S. Trustees were "to perform the supervisory and appointing functions [previously handled] by bankruptcy judges." Under the new scheme, a bankruptcy judge was merely to decide that a trustee was necessary to administer the debtor's affairs. The U.S. Trustee would select the case trustee, and it was expected that appointment would be confirmed in all but the most extraordinary cases. As the House Report explains:

> [*8] If the court determines that a trustee is to be appointed in the case, the bill separates the court from the appointing process. The United States Trustee will make the appointment, after consultation with parties in interest and subject to approval by the court. The court's approval should in most cases be perfunctory, and is available mainly as a safeguard against impropriety on the part of the United States Trustee. Under current chapter X, the court appoints the trustee. The court's involvement in the process not only appears to be improper when the court must later rule in the litigation between the court's appointee (the trustee) and an adverse party, but had also led to cronyism in some instances and unqualified or incompetent trustees. Again, the separation of the court from the administration of the case should lead to fairer and more efficient administration.

Id. at 6194.

Following the success of the pilot program, the U.S. Trustee system was made permanent and universal in the 1986 Act. The legislative history behind the 1986 Act, reiterates and confirms the congressional conclusion that judge- appointed trustees are a bad idea. As the House report on the 1978 bill explains:

> The handling of both administrative and judicial functions by the bankruptcy courts had eroded the public confidence in the bankruptcy system. An example of this could be seen in the appointment by the bankruptcy court of private trustees to administer bankrupt debtors estates. In many cases, these trustees appeared in bankruptcy courts before the very same judges who appointed them to make recommendations regarding matters of the estate. In such circumstances, a trustee would often be reluctant to take positions, contrary to the judge who appointed the trustee, even though the trustee was supposed to be an impartial administrator of the estate. This awkward relationship between trustees and judges created > an improper appearance of favoritism, cronyism, and bias, and generate great disrespect for the bankruptcy system.

The report then notes that to help accomplish the separation of judicial and administrative functions, "[t]he U.S. Trustees were given responsibility for many of the administrative functions that had previously been handled by the bankruptcy courts (such as appointing individuals to serve as private trustees to handle administrative duties in chapter 7 and chapter 13 cases * * * and appointing a trustee in Chapter 11 reorganization proceedings when ordered by the court). H.R. Rep. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2nd Sess. 28 reprinted in 1986 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 5227, 5230. [hereinafter "the 1986 Legislative History"]. [FN13]

Not surprisingly, the plain-meaning interpretation of the statute, clearly supported by the legislative history, has been accepted in the opinions of the courts which have examined the respective roles of the courts and the U.S. Trustees under the Bankruptcy Code amendments. "As the legislative history of the Bankruptcy Code indicates, the establishment of the office of the United States trustee is designed to accomplish the separation of judicial and administrative functions currently performed by bankruptcy judges." In re Kontaratos, 15 B.R. 298, 299 (Bkrtcy. App. 1st Cir. 1981). As a result of the 1978 and 1986 Acts, "[t]he U.S. Trustee, rather than the court * * * will appoint trustees, supervise administration of bankruptcy cases, and exercise any other function prescribed by the Attorney General * * *" id. at 300.

[*9] Indeed, Congress' decision to vest the authority to select the trustee in the U.S. Trustee has been held even to limit the grounds on which a court may veto the U.S. Trustee's appointment of a trustee. In the case of In re Lathrop Mobile Investors, 55 B.R. 766 (Bkrtcy. App. 9th Cir. 1985), a bankruptcy appellate panel reviewed an appeal "rais[ing] questions as to the respective roles of the bankruptcy judge and the United States Trustee in the appointment process for a Chapter 11 trustee." Id. at 767. In the underlying case, the bankruptcy judge, in chambers, refused to confirm the U.S. Trustee's appointee because the proposed trustee was not drawn from the county's bankruptcy panel. On the U.S. Trustee's motion for reconsideration, the bankruptcy court again refused to confirm, and ordered the U.S. Trustee to choose an appointee from the county panel.

The appellate panel reversed for the "fundamental reason [that] the trial court's procedure was inappropriate * * *" id. at 768. The appellate court reasoned that under Chapter 11 there was no legitimate ground for constricting the U.S. Trustee's choices to members of the trustee panels, and certainly no basis for vetoing the U.S. Trustee's appointment in chambers, since a public proceeding would best promote the avoidance of any appearance of cronyism -- the very end which the amendments, by lodging the appointment power in the U.S. Trustee, sought to achieve. In sum, the plain meaning of section 1104(c), its legislative history, and its interpretation by the courts all demonstrate that the U.S. Trustee, not the district court, should have appointed the trustee in this case.

B. The Court Below Had No "Equitable Authority" To Appoint A Trustee.

Despite the apparent clarity of the statute, the court below "d[id] not believe, as the U.S. Trustee asserts, that this order [appointing the trustee] order contravenes the plain meaning of Section 1104(c)." Slip op. at 8. While conceding that "the statute does speak of the submission of 'one disinterested person," Judge Perez-Gimenez reasoned that he was not obligated to "read statutory words with a computer's ease" since the bankruptcy courts "operate under the overriding consideration that equitable principles govern the exercise of bankruptcy jurisdiction." Id. (citations omitted).

The appointment order was justified on the ground that "in the case at bar equitable considerations mandated an expedited approval procedure such as that contemplated by our order." Slip op. at 8-9. In addition to its "inherent" equitable power, the court found the authority to make the appointment in "the broad equity power granted by Section 105(a)." Id. at 10.

Contrary to Judge Perez-Gimenez view, however, neither section 105(a) nor the supposed inherent equity power of the bankruptcy court extends to override section 1104(c)'s clear command that the U.S. Trustee appoint bankruptcy trustees. Moreover, on the facts of this case, there was no advantage in the court rather the U.S. Trustee making the appointment.

[*1]0 11 U.S.C. 105(a) provides simply that "[t]he bankruptcy court may issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title." By its terms, it provides no warrant for the court to disregard the express commands of the Bankruptcy Code. Even as a court of equity, the bankruptcy court's equitable discretion is limited, and cannot be used in a manner inconsistent with the commands of the Bankruptcy Code. See, e.g., Johnson v. First National Bank of Montevideo, Minnesota, 719 F.2d 270 cert. denied 465 U.S. 1012 (1983); In re Alcap Manufacturing Co., 457 F. Supp. 1247 (D. Conn. 1978).

Moreover, in the instant case, the court's decision to appoint the trustee was neither "necessary" nor "apopriate" to protect the interests of creditors or the estate. Once the court ordered the appointment of a trustee, the U.S. Trustee acted promptly in consulting creditors and then appointing Mr. Roberto Lopez Alvarez as trustee. [FN14] Furthermore, since the court denied (without explanation) confirmation of Mr. Alvarez' appointment before it "appointed" its candidate, Mr. Fuste, as trustee, its actions cannot be defended as expediting the administration of the bankruptcy. Certainly there was an interest in arresting the "rapid deterioration" (Slip op. at 4) of the debtor's estate, but that objective justified only the rapid appointment of a trustee, not the rapid ultra vires appointment of a trustee by the court. Nothing in the record indicates that confirmation of the U.S. Trustee's appointee, Mr. Alvarez, would not have served these laudable objectives equally well.

II. THE ORDER APPOINTING THE COURT'S CANDIDATE, MR. FUSTE, IS AN APPEALABLE COLLATERAL

ORDER REVIEWABLE BY THIS COURT UNDER 28 U.S.C. 1291.

The sequence of the district court's actions, beginning with the June 20, 1989 order that the U.S. Trustee submit the names of three candidates for the court's review for appointment as trustee, through its order of July 20, 1989 "confirming" the appointment Mr. Fuste, constitute an ultra vires course of conduct amenable to correction through a writ of mandamus from this Court directing that the district court comply with 11 U.S.C. 1104(c). In the alternative, however, we submit that the July 20 order "confirming the appointment" of Mr. Fuste is an appealable collateral order subject to review by this Court under the doctrine of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 545-47 (1949).

As we have explained above, [FN15] despite Judge Perez-Gimenez apparent impression that his orders were those of the bankruptcy court, the order appointing Mr. Fuste to be trustee could have only been that of the district court. Moreover, while this order does not conclusively resolve all issues among the parties to the bankruptcy litigation, it is clearly an appealable collateral order, ripe for review by this Court.

Within the scheme of the Bankruptcy Code, district courts [FN16] ordinarily review appeals from the final decisions of the bankruptcy courts. See 28 U.S.C. 158(a). These decisions are in turn appealable to the circuit courts of appeal, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 158(d). When, however, the district court exercises its original jurisdiction over a bankruptcy case, review is to be had in the court of appeals pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1291. See e.g., Triangali v. Hathaway Machinery Co., Inc., 796 F.2d 553 (1st Cir. 1986) ("Of course, this appeal coming directly from the district court, falls within the scope of 28 U.S.C. 1291").

[*1]1 In bankruptcy cases the finality requirement of section 1291 is more liberally and pragmatically applied than in most civil litigation. This owes to the special nature of bankruptcy litigation, in which separable issues ripe for final disposition more readily arise. Like other circuits, [FN17] this Court has held repeatedly that "in the bankruptcy context, the word 'final' has a somewhat special meaning. It is not limited to the single final order issued at the very end of an entire bankruptcy case" Triangali, supra, 796 F.2d at 558. Instead, in view of the relevant legislative history, it is clear that "Congress has long provided that orders in bankruptcy cases may be immediately appealed if they finally dispose of discrete disputes within the larger case" In re Saco Local Development Co., 711 F.2d 441, 445 (1983) (emphasis in original). Accordingly, "the concept of finality under [section 1291] has traditionally been applied in a more pragmatic and less technical way in bankruptcy cases than in other situations." A.H. Robbins Co. v. Piccinin, 788 F.2d 994, 1009 (4th Cir. 1986) quoted with approval in Triangoli, supra, at 558.

Thus, this Court has concluded that a " 'proceeding within a bankruptcy case * * * [not the entire case, is] the relevant 'judicial unit' for purposes of finality * * * *" id., at 558, quoting Saco, supra at 445. (elipses in original).

There is little question that the court's order of July 20 is exactly the sort of "discrete proceeding" appropriate for collateral review. Put simply, there is nothing left for the district court to do on the appointment issue. Judge Perez-Gimenez' choice as trustee is in place, and the U.S. Trustee's objection to the circumvention of 11 U.S.C. 1104(c) stands. Nothing that will happen in the overall bankruptcy dispute from this point forward will cure the district court's error, nor can the dispute between the court and the U.S. Trustee come into sharper focus. In these circumstances, this "order that conclusively determines a separable dispute" (Saco, supra, at 809 F.2d at 153) is ripe for review.

In sum, whether this Court chooses to issue mandamus to cure the district court's repeated refusal to recognize the U.S. Trustee's exclusive authority to appoint case trustees, or chooses to treat particularly the July 20 order through which the court below purported to appoint the trustee, it is clear that the district court's action was ultra vires and cannot stand. Review by this Court is appropriate to compel compliance with 11 U.S.C. 1104(c).

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, we respectfully request that a writ of mandamus issue directing the district court to permit the U.S. Trustee to appoint the Trustee or, in the alternative, that the district court's order of July 20 be reversed.

FOOTNOTES

FN1. 18 U.S.C. (& Supp. IV) 1961 - 1968.

FN2. Puerto Rico's two bankruptcy judges had recused themselves from this case. The case file was held in the bankruptcy court, and Judge Perez-Gimenez' orders were issued as "bankruptcy court" orders. Although he is a district court judge, he apparently never withdrew the reference of the case to the bankruptcy court, thus generating some confusion as to where appeal in this case lies. See "STATEMENT REGARDING JURISDICTION" infra.

FN3. "Slip op." citations are to the court's "Order and Opinion" of July 20, 1989.

FN4. Pub. L. 98-353, 98 Stat. 333 (1984).

FN5. 28 U.S.C. 151 provides that bankruptcy judges constitute a unit of the district court known as the bankruptcy court.

FN6. See also In re Matter of Hawaii Corp., 796 F.2d 1139, 1141 (9th Cir. 1986) ("this appeal comes to us directly from a federal district judge sitting in bankruptcy * * * * Appellate jurisdiction over appeals from district judges sitting in bankruptcy exists under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, the statute governing final decisions of a district court.")

FN7. Understandably, we have protected our appeal rights by noticing appeal both to the district court and to this Court.

Specifically, on July 12, 1989, we filed a notice of appeal to the district court from Judge Perez-Gimenez' order of June 20, 1989, which ordered the United States Trustee to submit the names of three candidates for appointment to the court, and from the order of June 29, 1989, wherein the court denied the United States Trustee's appointment of Roberto Lopez Alvarez as trustee. On July 28, 1989 we filed a notice of appeal to the district court from the order of July 18, 1989, wherein Judge Perez-Gimenez appointed Pedro J. Fuste as trustee. The July 28 order was confirmed by order of July 20, 1989.

On September 13, 1989, we filed a notice of appeal to this Court from the order of July 18, 1989, purporting to appoint Mr. Fuste as trustee. This notice of appeal, however, was at some point diverted from its intended recipient, the clerk of the district court, to the bankruptcy court. All of the U.S. Trustees' appeals (including, erroneously, the notice of appeal intended for the Court of Appeals) were then docketed as appeals to the district court, and a briefing deadline of January 2, 1990 was set. On December 20, 1989 the clerk of the district court "pursuant to instructions received from the Clerk's Office of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals" referred the September 13, 1989 appeal to this Court.

On December 22, 1989, the U.S. Trustee moved for a consolidation of the pending protective appeals to the district court and an extension of time to file a brief in the district court until January 29, 1990. This motion has been granted. On January 25, 1990, the U.S. Trustee requested the district court to stay disposition of the appeals to the district court, pending disposition of the petition and appeal to this Court.

FN8. As this Court has stated previously, a writ of mandamus is properly sought in cases involving "challenges to the authority of the district court to act." In re United States, 565 F.2d 173 (1st Cir. 1977). See also In re Arvedon, 523 F.2d 914, 916 (1st Cir. 1975); In re Ellsberg, 446 F.2d 954, 956 (1st Cir. 1971); In re Melvin, 546 F.2d 1, 2 (1st Cir. 1976).
Moreover, even should the decision of Judge Perez-Giminez be viewed as a decision of the bankruptcy court rather than the district court, mandamus from this Court is nonetheless appropriate. As we explained above, infra pp. 5-6, the Revised Bankruptcy Code established bankruptcy courts as adjuncts of the district courts. Accordingly, mandamus from this court to the bankruptcy court is, jurisdictionally, a species of mandamus to the district court. In any event, it is well settled that mandamus may be directed from a superior court to an inferior tribunal "in aid of appellate jurisdiction" even when, "no appeal has been perfected" to the superior court. FTC v. Dean Foods Co. 384 U.S. 597, 602-603 (1965). See also Refractarios Monterrey, S.A. v. Ferro Corp., 606 F.2d 966, 971 (Ct. Pat. App. 1979).

FN9. Pub. L. No. 99-554, 100 Stat. 3088 (1986).

FN10. Pursuant to the transition provisions of section 302 of the 1986 Act, the United States Trustee program became effective in Puerto Rico on August 23, 1987.

FN11. As the House Report states:

> It is enough of a reason for change that these functions and duties of the bankruptcy judge constitute no part of his judicial responsibilities, and divert him from the important judicial and legal work that must be done in bankruptcy cases. However, if that were the system's only vice, adjustments less than those proposed in the bill might suffice. Deeper problems arise because of the inconsistency between the judicial and administrative roles of the bankruptcy judges. The inconsistency places him in an untenable position of conflict, and seriously compromises his impartiality as an arbiter of bankruptcy disputes.

1978 Legislative History at 6050.

FN12. The House Report observes that:

> litigants and observers frequently object to the apparent, and in many case real, cronyism between bankruptcy judges and their trustees. The "bankruptcy ring" is reflected not only in the appearance of unfairness in bankruptcy judges ruling in litigation between their appointees and third parties, but also in the awarding of compensation by the appointing authority * * * *.
> There is an unusually close relationship between the bankruptcy judges and the bankruptcy bar, especially the debtors' and trustees' bars. They are in frequent contact with the judge as a result of the necessity for the judge's review of the administrative actions of the trustee or debtor in possession. Usually, a trustee is appointed by the bankruptcy judge, and is appointed in numerous cases before the same judge. Debtor's attorneys make frequent appearances in the same court representing numerous different debtors. All of these contacts and relationships have led to a feeling among bankruptcy practioners that there is a "bankruptcy ring" that has an inside track on all bankruptcy matters the judge's favoritism.

FN13. See also 1986 Legislative History at 5241: "Section 219 amends 11 U.S.C. to make it clear that the U.S. Trustee can seek the appointment of a trustee or examiner in a chapter 11 case. If the court orders the appointment to be made, the U.S. Trustee makes the appointment, subject to the court's approval." (emphasis supplied).

FN14. Two creditors, City Federal Savings Bank and the Banco National, supported the appointment of Mr. Fuste and filed oppositions to the U.S. Trustee's Motion to Alter or Amend the court's order appointing Fuste. They were, however, consulted by the U.S. Trustee prior to the decision to appoint Mr. Alvarez.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF MANDAMUS TO, AND APPEAL FROM THE DECISION OF, THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF PUERTO RICO

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF MANDAMUS & REPLY BRIEF OF APPELLANT

In our opening brief we demonstrated that although the language and legislative history of 1104(c) unequivocally vest the right to appoint a trustee in the U.S. Trustee, the district court [FN1], acting entirely without legal authority, arrogated that power to itself. As we showed, this ultra vires action presents precisely the " 'usurpation of judicial power' " that mandamus is designed to correct. In re Puerto Rico Electric Power Authority, 687 F.2d 501, 503 (1st Cir. 1982) (quoting DeBeers Consolidated Mines v. United States, 325 U.S. 212, 217 (1945)). In the alternative, this Court has jurisdiction to reverse the district court's invalid appointment of a trustee as an appealable final order or under the collateral order doctrine of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 545-47 (1949).

[*2] 1. City Federal apparently concurs with our interpretation of the relevant statute, admitting that "[s]ection 1104(c) plainly provides that the U.S. Trustee appoints [the trustee in bankruptcy]." Br. at 26. Nor does City Federal contest our reading of 1104(c)'s legislative history, acknowledging that Congress intended to withdraw the courts' power to appoint trustees in order to eliminate the "favoritism or cronyism that obviously compromised the integrity of the bankruptcy system." Br. at 31. [FN2] Since under 1104(c) only the U.S. Trustee has the authority to appoint a trustee, the court's appointment of a trustee "exceeded it discretion 'to such a degree that is actions amount[] to a "usurpation of power," ' " making mandamus appropriate. In re Recticel Foam Corp., 859 F.2d 1000, 1006 (1st Cir. 1988) (citations omitted).

However, City Federal argues that "enforcement of a plain reading of § 1104(c)" is not necessary because compliance would produce detrimental "delays associated with repeated approval proceedings." Br. at 26, 27. As we noted in our opening brief, the prospect of delays cannot justify the court's exceeding its statutory authority. Br. at __. In any event, no delay would have been occurred if the court, in compliance with 1104(c), had promptly approved an appointment made by the U.S. Trustee.

City Federal also contends that the district court's actions were "only a measure taken pursuant to the authority reserved to the court of approving the appointment by the U.S. Trustee." Br. at 29. In fact, the court did not approve any appointment made by the U.S. Trustee. On the contrary, Mr. Lopez Alvarez, the trustee appointed by the U.S. Trustee, was rejected by the court. (App. at 172). Judge Perez-Gimenez then issued an order stating "we hereby APPOINT Mr. Pedro J. Fuste as operating trustee." (App. at 309). (capitalization in original). The court's right to approve appointments made by the U.S. Trustee does not include the authority to make appointments.

Nor, contrary to City Federal's contention, was the court acting within its statutory authority when it "requested the U.S. Trustee to submit three candidates [for trustee] instead of one." Br. at 28. The procedure ordered by the court directly contradicts the statutory requirement that the U.S. Trustee appoint "one disinterested person." 11 U.S.C. 1104(c) (emphasis added). In addition, the order deprived the U.S. Trustee of his appointment authority, in that it provided that parties in interest other than the U.S. Trustee could "submit additional candidates for [the court's] approval." slip op at 2; See App. at 154. An order providing that the court may select a trustee proposed by some party other than the U.S. Trustee cannot be construed as a legitimate exercise of the court's power to approve appointments made by the U.S. Trustee. [FN3]

Contrary to City Federal's contention, the district court's ultra vires actions cannot be justified on the grounds that "there was barely any consultation with the parties in interest," City Federal and Banco Nacional, concerning the appointment of a trustee. [FN4] Br. at 33. 1104(c) requires that the U.S. Trustee "make a good faith effort to get input from the parties in interest" concerning the appointment of a trustee. See In re Capital Services & Investments, Inc., 90 B.R. 382, 385 (Bankr. C.D. Ill. 1988). Here, the record reveals extensive consultation between City Federal and the United States Trustee, including meetings with two different assistant U.S. Trustees to discuss candidates for the trustee position and the delivery to City Federal of the resumes of the three candidates under consideration. Br. at 34-35 & n.15. Indeed, City Federal concedes that an Assistant U.S. Trustee, after submitting the resumes of two candidates to City Federal "requested undersigned counsel to indicate, as soon as possible, City Federal's position as to these * * * candidates." Br. at 35. The U.S. Trustee also sought the input of Banco Nacional regarding the appointment of a trustee by telephoning counsel and sending Banco Nacional the resumes of the three candidates under consideration. App. at 203-04; 249-50.

[*3] Despite this consultation concerning the appointment of a trustee, City Federal complains that the U.S. Trustee "never informed any of the parties that her office was contemplating a challenge to the June 20 order and that the submission would include one candidate, not three." Br. at 34. (emphasis in original). Certainly, information regarding contemplated litigation positions is not covered by the consultation requirement of 1104(c). Nor should it be necessary for the U.S. Trustee to inform the parties that he intends to comply with the governing statute.

Since the record shows that the U.S. Trustee conferred with the parties in interest, City Federal's citation of In re Capital Services & Investments, Inc., 90 B.R. 382 (Bankr. C.D. Ill. 1988) is entirely inapposite. In that case, the United States Trustee refused to disclose to the creditors the name of the person he intended to appoint as trustee and informed the parties in interest that "anyone trying to change his decision would be brought up on charges before the attorney disciplinary commission." Id. at 384. See also In re Ruffin, Inc., 10 B.R. 862, 863 (D. R.I. 1981) (inadequate consultation where parties were never contacted by the United States Trustee regarding the appointment of a trustee.).

The gravamen of City Federal's grievance appears to be that "the U.S Trustee failed to include [Mr. Fuste, the candidate supported by City Federal] as a candidate for appointment as trustee in his submission to the * * * court." Br. at 35-36. However, section 1104(c)'s consultation requirement does not oblige the U.S. Trustee to select the candidate preferred by a particular creditor.

Finally, even if the U.S. Trustee's consultation with the parties in interest could be considered in some way deficient, the court still would not be justified in its ultra vires appointment of a trustee. For example, in In re Capital Services & Investments, Inc., only minimal consultation occurred, but the court nonetheless approved the U.S. Trustee's appointment, after determining that the trustee was experienced and disinterested. 90 B.R. at 386.

2. City Federal argues that mandamus is not available in this case because the U.S. Trustee will be able to vindicate his right to appoint a trustee through "an end-of-case appeal." Br. at 22. However, the special circumstances of this case prevent the U.S. Trustee from challenging the court's ultra vires appointment of a trustee at the end of the case. [FN5] The relevant statutory provision permits the appointment of a trustee only "before confirmation of a plan." 11 U.S.C. 1104(a) (emphasis added). Because a chapter 11 case generally ends with the confirmation of a reorganization plan, forcing the U.S. Trustee to wait until the end of the case to obtain review of the court's appointment will deprive him of the opportunity for any meaningful relief. By the terms of the statute no trustee can be appointed after confirmation of the plan. Therefore, even if at the end of the case the court's appointment was found to have been invalid, the U.S. Trustee would be precluded by statute from making a valid appointment.

[*4] Such preclusion would also exist as a practical matter. When the plan is confirmed, the trustee's oversight of the reorganization ends. After the trustee's duties have been fully performed, a claim regarding the validity of the trustee's initial appointment would presumably be moot. Thus, the U.S. Trustee cannot protect its right to appoint the trustee through an appeal at the end of the bankruptcy proceeding. As this Court has stated where, as here, the circumstances of an order "would make an end-of-case appeal ineffectual or leave legitimate interests unduly at risk" a writ of mandamus may issue. Recticel, 859 F.2d at 1005-06.

3. In the alternative, Judge Perez-Gimenez' order is reviewable as an appealable final order. City Federal erroneously suggests that the U.S. Trustee "has conceded that the order [that is the] subject of this appeal is not a final * * * order." Br. at 11-12. On the contrary, as our opening brief demonstrated, the court's order is immediately appealable because in the bankruptcy context an order is final when it "finally dispose[s] of [a] discrete dispute[] within the larger case" In re Saco Local Development Co., 711 F.2d 441, 445 (1st Cir. 1983) Contrary to appellee's assertion, the court's order is not merely "a step in the procedural ladder," (Br. at 12), but conclusively and finally determines the rights of the U.S. Trustee under 1104(c) with respect to the power to appoint the trustee. In addition, the question of where the appointment power lies under 1104(c) is entirely separate from any issues involved in the larger bankruptcy case.

City Federal suggests that the court's appointment of a trustee is not appealable because "the court may, at the request of a party terminate the trustee's appointment and restore the debtor to possession and management of the * * * estate" Br. at 14. However, returning possession to the debtor in no way cures the court's violation of the plain terms of 1104(c). The usurpation of the exclusive appointment authority of the U.S. Trustee occurs when the court appoints a trustee, regardless of the later actions of the trustee or the court. [FN6] In a similar case, the Sixth Circuit held that the denial of the U.S. Trustee's right to compel the appointment of an examiner under 11 U.S.C. 1104(b)(2) was an appealable final order. See In re Revco (Morgenstern v. Revco D.S., Inc.), No. 89-4545 (6th Cir. Mar. 14, 1990), slip op. at ___.

4. Alternatively, this Court has jurisdiction under the collateral order doctrine of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 545-47 (1949). Under this doctrine, a court of appeals has jurisdiction to hear an interlocutory order involving:

> (1) an issue unrelated to the merits of the main dispute, capable of review without disrupting the main trial; (2) a complete resolution of the issue, not one that is "unfinished" or "inconclusive"; (3) a right incapable of vindication on appeal from final judgment; and (4) and important and unsettled question of controlling law, not merely a question of the proper exercise of the trial court's discretion.

[*5] United States v. Sorren, 605 F.2d 1211, 1213 (1st Cir. 1979). This Court has summarized these four requisites as separability, finality, urgency and importance. In Re Continental Inv. Corp., 637 F.2d 1, 5 (1st Cir. 1980). The order issued by the district court satisfies each of these requirements and thus is subject to immediate review by this Court.

The court's order appointing a trustee is clearly collateral to the merits of any substantive dispute regarding Plaza's chapter 11 case. The court's order also conclusively resolves the issue of the appointment authority of the U.S. Trustee. The finality of the order is not affected by the fact that the court may later terminate the appointment of the trustee. As this Court has held, the requirement of finality is met even when the trial court judge retains the right to reconsider in light of later developments so long as the judge has "effectively rejected the claim as proffered." In re Continental, 637 F.2d at 5.

The claim here also satisfies the criteria of urgency, "the dispositive criterion of interlocutory appealability." Id. at 6. As explained above, should the case proceed to the approval of a reorganization plan, the right of the U.S. Trustee to appoint a trustee would be permanently lost. Finally, the issue presented is of clear importance for bankruptcy proceedings and involves "unsettled questions of controlling law." Sorren, 605 F.2d at 1213. Contrary to City Federal's contention, the record on appeal is sufficiently developed to permit review. Although the trustee may be engaged in "the preliminary stages of the administration of the estate," (Br. at 16), this appeal challenges only his initial appointment.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, and those expressed in our opening brief, we respectfully request that a writ of mandamus issue directing the district court to permit the U.S. Trustee to appoint the Trustee or, in the alternative, that the district court's order of July 20 be reversed.

FOOTNOTES

FN1. City Federal repeatedly refers to Judge Perez-Gimenez' order as that of the "bankruptcy court" See e.g., Br. at 11, 14, 17, 20. As we showed in our opening brief, this order can only have been issued by the district court sitting in bankruptcy.

FN2. City Federal suggests that because the particular judge involved in this case "is not a bankruptcy judge who is in close daily contact with the bankruptcy bar" that 1104(c) is not applicable. Br. at 33 n.14. However, 1104(c) is a prophylactic rule, whose application does not depend on the actual existence of impropriety in any particular case.

FN3. City Federal asserts that the Assistant U.S. Trustee "agreed" to this appointment procedure. Br. at 6. However, her verbal indication at the hearing that she would comply with the court's order cannot estop the government from challenging that order. The U.S. Trustee protected his statutory power of appointment by refusing to submit three names, requesting reconsideration, and taking a prompt appeal.

FN4. City Federal also criticizes the certification of consultation filed by the U.S. Trustee because the "obvious inference from this certification" was that the creditors consented to the appointment. Br. at 34. Since consent is entirely different from consultation, no such inference can be drawn from the certification that "the United States Trustee's Office has consulted the [listed] parties in interest." App. at 167.

FN5. For this reason City Federal's comments regarding the general presumption against piecemeal appeals are not germane.

FN6. In contrast, in a case not involving the appointment authority of the U.S. Trustee, the court's power to reinstate the debtor might well preclude review. Where it is the trustee's future actions that may produce the threatened harm, the return of the debtor to possession will generally resolve the matter. Under these circumstances, the appointment of a trustee could be found nonappealable. All the cases cited by City Federal in which a court found the appointment of a trustee to be nonappealable involve such a situation. Br. at __.

STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This is an appeal from two interlocutory orders entered by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Georgia in the Appellant's chapter 7 bankruptcy case, one denying a motion by the Appellant for the immediate entry of a chapter 7 discharge [BC #86][1] and the other granting a motion by the United States Trustee for an extension of the deadlines for filing a motion to dismiss the case for abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) or a complaint objecting to Appellant's discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727 [BC #87].

This court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a) to hear appeals from "interlocutory orders and decrees of bankruptcy judges" entered in bankruptcy cases, but only "with leave of court."[2] To date, this court has not granted leave to hear this

[2] 28 U.S.C. § 158(a) provides as follows:

> The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals
> (1) from final judgments, orders, and decrees;
> (2) from interlocutory orders and decrees issued under section 1121 (d) of title 11 increasing or reducing the time periods referred to in section 1121 of such title; and
> (3) with leave of the court, from other interlocutory orders and decrees; and, with leave of the court, from interlocutory orders and decrees, of appeal, and the United States Trustee contends, in Section 1 of the Argument portion of this Brief, that such leave should not be granted.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES

If this court grants Appellant's Motion for Leave to Appeal, the issues on appeal are whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in denying the Appellant's motion for the immediate entry of a chapter 7 discharge or in granting the United States Trustee's motion for an extension of the deadlines for filing a motion to dismiss the case for abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) or a complaint objecting to Appellant's discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727.

APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

On appeal from a decision of the bankruptcy court, the district court applies a clearly erroneous standard to the bankruptcy court's findings of fact and conducts a de novo review of conclusions of law. See Fed. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Appellant, Ronald Andrew Poch (the "Appellant," "Poch," or the "Debtor"), commenced his bankruptcy case by filing a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code on May 5, 2008. The bankruptcy court docket reflects that the section 341 meeting of creditors was held and concluded on June 10, 2008. On June 12, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an order finding that the case was not subject to dismissal under 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1).[3] [BC #14].

[3] 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1) provides as follows:

> (1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and (4) and notwithstanding section 707 (a), if an individual debtor in a voluntary case under chapter 7 or 13 fails to file all of the information required under subsection (a)(1) within 45 days after the date of the filing of the petition, the case shall be automatically dismissed effective on the 46th day after the date of the filing of the petition.

Paragraphs (2) and (4) of section 521(i) provide, respectively, as follows:

> (2) Subject to paragraph (4) and with respect to a case described in paragraph (1), any party in interest may request the court to enter an order dismissing the case. If requested, the court shall enter an order of dismissal not later than 5 days after such request.

On July 15, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a motion for authorization to conduct an examination of Poch pursuant to Rule 2004 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. [BC# 16]. The United States Trustee asserted in this motion that Poch had filed bankruptcy schedules listing indebtedness of over $450,000 on two credit card accounts, while scheduling property valued at only $22,800 and reporting gross income in his statement of financial affairs of only $19,200 in 2007 and $17,500 in 2006. The United States Trustee stated that he desired to conduct a Rule 2004 examination "to inquire about the debtor's assets, liabilities, income, expenses, financial transaction, and other matters pertaining to the administration of this case and the debtor's entitlement to a discharge." Id. The bankruptcy court entered an order authorizing the United States Trustee to conduct the examination on July 17, 2009. [BC# 17].

A few weeks later, on August 11, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a motion for an extension of the deadlines for filing motion to dismiss under section 707(b) or > (4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, on the motion of the trustee filed before the expiration of the applicable period of time specified in paragraph (1), (2), or (3), and after notice and a hearing, the court may decline to dismiss the case if the court finds that the debtor attempted in good faith to file all the information required by subsection (a)(1)(B)(iv) and that the best interests of creditors would be served by administration of the case.

a complaint objecting to discharge under section 727. [BC# 20]. The United States Trustee asserted in this motion that these deadlines were set to expire on that date and that he had commenced the Rule 2004 examination of Poch but had not been able to conclude it because Poch had failed to produce all the records he had been asked to produce. On August 28, 2008, Poch filed a Motion for Discharge, in which he asserted that he was entitled to a discharge because no party had filed a complaint objecting to his discharge pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 727(c), no party had filed a "Presumption of Abuse" under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), and the chapter 7 trustee had issued a report stating that there was no non-exempt property available for distribution from the bankruptcy estate. [BC# 23].

On September 15, 2008, the United States Trustee filed an objection to Poch's Motion for Discharge. [BC #29]. In this pleading, the United States Trustee listed some of the additional information and documentation he was seeking from Poch, including bank statements and cancelled checks pertaining to three bank accounts. Following a hearing, the bankruptcy court entered an order on January 30, 2009, granting the United States Trustee's motion for an extension of the deadlines for filing a section 707(b) motion to dismiss and a section 727 objection to discharge, finding that the United States Trustee had shown that Poch had "failed to produce the information requested or to appear for a continued Bankruptcy Rule 2004 examination." [The "Extension Order," BC# 87]. Having granted those extensions, the court entered a separate order on the same date denying Poch's Motion for Discharge [BC# 86]. Poch filed a notice of appeal from both orders on February 9, 2009 [BC# 98].

Simultaneously with the filing of his notice of appeal, Poch filed a "Motion for Extension of Time to File Appeal and Leave to Appeal" [the "Motion for Leave to Appeal" [BC# 99]. In this regard, Rule 8001(b) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure provides as follows:

> An appeal from an interlocutory judgment, order, or decree of a bankruptcy judge as permitted by 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) shall be taken by filing a notice of appeal, as prescribed in subdivision (a) of this rule, accompanied by a motion for leave to appeal prepared in accordance with Rule 8003 and with proof of service in accordance with Rule 8008.

Because he had already filed a notice of appeal [BC #98], Poch presumably intended for the Motion for Leave to Appeal to be considered as a request for additional time to prepare a motion for leave to appeal that complied with the requirements of Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8003(a).[4] The United States Trustee filed an

[4] The Appellant's Motion for Leave to Appeal did not meet any of the requirements of Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8003(a), which provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

Answer in opposition to the Motion for Leave to Appeal on February 18, 2009 [BC# 105]. On February 13, 2009, prior to the filing of that Answer, the bankruptcy court entered an order denying the motion. [BC# 104].

Subsection (b) of Bankruptcy Rule 8003 provides that in cases where a motion for leave to appeal is filed under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a), "[t]he clerk shall transmit the notice of appeal, the motion for leave to appeal and any answer thereto to the clerk of the district court ... as soon as all parties have filed answers or the time for filing an answer has expired" and that "[t]he motion and answer shall be submitted without oral argument unless otherwise ordered." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8003(b). In accordance with that provision, the clerk of the bankruptcy court on February 19, 2009, transmitted to this court copies of the Motion for Leave to Appeal and the United States Trustee's Answer thereto, along with copies of the Notice of Appeal and the Extension Order. [DC #1].[5] The order denying Poch's motion for the entry of a chapter 7 discharge [BC

On February 27, 2009, Poch filed a motion in the bankruptcy court seeking a stay of the Extension Order pending appeal. [BC #113]. The effect of such a stay would, of course, have been to extinguish the United States Trustee's ability to file a section 707(b) motion to dismiss or a section 727 objection to discharge, inasmuch as the initial 60-day deadlines for filing such pleadings had long since expired.[6] The > (e) Dismissal of an individual debtor's chapter 7 case, or conversion to a case under chapter 11 or 13, for abuse. The court may dismiss or, with the debtor's consent, convert an individual debtor's case for abuse under § 707(b) only on motion and after a hearing on notice to the debtor, the trustee, the United States trustee, and any other entity as the court directs.

The time limitation for filing an objection to discharge is set forth in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004, as follows:

bankruptcy court entered an order denying the motion for stay on March 5, 2009, based on findings that Poch had failed to show a likelihood of success on appeal or to describe how providing the information requested by the United States Trustee would constitute irreparable injury [BC# 116]. On March 9, 2009, Poch filed a motion in this court for an order "staying the Bankruptcy proceeding" pending Appeal. [DC# 5]. The United States Trustee filed a response in opposition to that motion on March 18, 2009. [DC #8].

STATEMENT OF FACTS

This appeal arises from efforts by the United States Trustee to obtain information and records from Poch under Rule 2004 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure for the purpose of determining whether cause exists to seek the dismissal of his chapter 7 bankruptcy case as abusive pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)

> Grant or Denial of Discharge
> (a) Time for filing complaint objecting to discharge; notice of time fixed. In a chapter 7 liquidation case a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge under § 727(a) of the Code shall be filed not later than 60 days following the first date set for the meeting of creditors under § 341(a). ...
> (b) Extension of time. On motion of any party in interest, after hearing on notice, the court may extend for cause the time for filing a complaint objecting to discharge. The motion shall be filed before the time has expired.

or to file a complaint objecting to his discharge pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 727.[7] In his motion for authorization to conduct the examination, the United States Trustee stated that Poch had scheduled unsecured debt totaling more than $450,000 on two credit card accounts but had scheduled property valued at only $22,800 and reported gross income in his statement of financial affairs of only $19,200 in 2007 and $17,500 in 2006. [BC #16]. The United States Trustee sought to use the Rule 2004 examination to secure additional information regarding Poch's credit card purchases and other pre-petition financial transactions in an effort to determine whether the granting of a chapter 7 discharge would be an abuse of the bankruptcy process.

[7] The provisions of Rule 2004 relevant to this case are as follows:

> (a) Examination on motion. On motion of any party in interest, the court may order the examination of any entity.
> (b) Scope of examination. The examination of an entity under this rule or of the debtor under § 343 of the Code may relate only to the acts, conduct, or property or to the liabilities and financial condition of the debtor, or to any matter which may affect the administration of the debtor's estate, or to the debtor's right to a discharge. ...
> (c) Compelling attendance and production of documentary evidence. The attendance of an entity for examination and for the production of documents ... may be compelled as provided in Rule 9016 for the attendance of a witness at a hearing or trial. ...
> ...

On August 11, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a motion for an extension of the deadlines for filing a section 707(b) motion to dismiss or a section 727 objection to discharge. [BC #20]. The United States Trustee asserted in this motion that those deadlines were set to expire on that date and that the Rule 2004 examination of Poch, which had commenced on that date, had not been concluded because Poch not yet produced all of the information and records the United States Trustee had asked him to produce. [BC #20]. Poch responded by objecting to the requested extensions [BC #25, 26, 34, & 75], and moving for the immediate entry of a chapter 7 discharge [BC# 23]. At no point has Poch objected to any of the United States Trustee's requests for information or records, nor has he sought a protective order based on allegations that the purpose of the investigation was to abuse or harass or that the scope of the investigation otherwise exceeded the permissible scope of discovery under Rule 2004. Consequently, the bankruptcy court has never issued a ruling on the dispute that gives rise to this appeal.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. The interlocutory orders from which this appeal is taken arise from discovery efforts undertaken by the United States Trustee pursuant to Bankruptcy Rule 2004 and do not involve any controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion, nor would an immediate appeal from the orders materially advance the ultimate termination of any litigation. Consequently, leave to appeal the orders should be denied and the appeal dismissed.

2. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in granting the United States Trustee's motion to extend the deadlines for filing a section 707(b) motion to dismiss or a section 727 objection to discharge.

3. Having granted the requested extensions, the bankruptcy court likewise did not abuse its discretion in denying Poch's motion for the immediate entry of a chapter 7 discharge.

4. The bankruptcy court acted properly in granting the United States Trustee's motion for authorization to conduct a Rule 2004 examination of Poch on an ex parte basis.

5. The filing by the chapter 7 trustee of a report of no distribution had no bearing on whether the case should be dismissed as abusive pursuant to section 707(b) or whether the debtor's discharge should be denied under section 727.

6. The entry of the order finding that the case was not subject to dismissal under section 521(i)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code likewise had no bearing on the availability of relief under section 707(b) or 727.

7. The United States Trustee was not required to file a statement under section 704(b) of the Bankruptcy Code as to whether the case was presumed to be abusive in order to preserve his ability to file a motion to dismiss the case as abusive under section 707(b)(3).

8. The record contains no support for Poch's contentions that the bankruptcy court failed to consider any of his pleadings.

ARGUMENT

1. Poch's Motion for Leave to Appeal Should Be Denied, as this Interlocutory Appeal Arises from a Simple Discovery Dispute and Involves No Controlling Issue of Law.

Because 28 U.S.C. § 158(a) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8003 provide no criteria to apply in determining whether to grant leave to appeal an interlocutory bankruptcy court order, district courts have generally applied the standards in 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), which governs discretionary interlocutory appeals from district courts to courts of appeals, in making this determination. See In re Ashoka Enterprises, Inc., 156 B.R. 343, 346 (S.D. Fla. 1993); In re Celotex Corp., 187 B.R. 746, 749 (M.D. Fla. 1995) (citing In re Charter Co., 778 F.2d 617, 620 (11th Cir. 1985)); Gache v. Balaber-Strauss, 198 B.R. 662, 664 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1996).

Under section 1292(b), a district court may certify an interlocutory order for immediate appeal to the court of appeals when it is of the opinion that "that such order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation ..." 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). Section 1292(b) appeals "were intended, and should be reserved, for situations in which the court of appeals can rule on a pure, controlling question of law without having to delve beyond the surface of the record in order to determine the facts." McFarlin v. Conseco Servs., LLC, 381 F.3d 1251, 1259 (11th Cir. 2004) (citations omitted).

> The legal question must be stated at a high enough level of abstraction to lift the question out of the details of the evidence or facts of a particular case and give it general relevance to other cases in the same area of law. And the answer to that question must substantially reduce the amount of litigation left in the case. ... Because permitting piecemeal appeals is bad policy, permitting liberal use of § 1292(b) interlocutory appeals is bad policy.

Id.

The Extension Order that Poch seeks to appeal does not, of course, purport to adjudicate the issue of whether cause exists to dismiss his case pursuant to section 707(b) or to deny his discharge pursuant to section 727. Rather, its purpose is simply to allow the United States Trustee additional time to investigate those issues pursuant to Rule 2004 in order to determine whether and to what extent grounds may exist for such relief. No controlling question of law is presented by the Extension Order that would serve to advance the ultimate resolution of that question. "In general, discovery orders do not present 'controlling questions of law' capable of significantly advancing litigation so as to justify interlocutory appeal." State of Florida ex rel. Butterworth v. Industrial Chemicals, 145 F.R.D. 585, 589 (N.D.Fla. 1991) (citing North Carolina Assoc. of Black Lawyers v. North Carolina Board of Law Examiners, 538 F.2d 547, 548-49 (4th Cir.1976)). See also In re American Freight System, Inc., 194 B.R. 659, 662 (D. Kan. 1996).

The order denying Poch's motion for the immediate entry of a discharge likewise presents no controlling question of law. Rather, it simply begs the question of whether the information and records requested by the United States Trustee pursuant to Rule 2004 will establish facts that would support a dismissal of his case under section 707(b) or a denial of his discharge under section 727. Poch's request for the immediate entry of a chapter 7 discharge is simply an effort to moot those issues without providing the information and records requested from him. Poch has not demonstrated that this discovery dispute differs materially from the type of routine discovery disputes from which interlocutory appeals are discouraged on the ground that they contravene the policy against piecemeal litigation.

2. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion in Granting the United States Trustee's Motion to Extend the Deadlines for Filing a Section 707(b) Motion to Dismiss or Section 727 Objection to Discharge.

A Rule 2004 examination "is properly used as a pre-litigation device to determine whether there are grounds to bring an action to determine a debtor's right to discharge or the dischargeability of a particular debt." In re Bennett Funding Group, Inc., 203 B.R. 24, 28 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 1996) (citation omitted). "In this regard, courts have recognized that Rule 2004 examinations are broad and unfettered and in the nature of fishing expeditions." In re Enron Corp., 281 B.R. 836, 840 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2002). See also In re Wilcher, 56 B.R. 428, 433 (Bankr. N.D.Ill. 1985); In re Recoton Corp., 307 B.R. 751, 755 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2004) ("The scope of Rule 2004 examination is very broad, broader even than discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.") (citations omitted); In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 123 B.R. 702, 711 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1991).

The effect of dismissing a chapter 7 case is similar to the effect of denying the debtor's discharge in that it prevents the issuance of a discharge.[8] It follows that a

[8] Denial of the debtor's discharge under section 727 is, however, a more serious sanction in that, unlike a dismissal, it precludes, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 523 (a)(10), any subsequent discharge of the debts that were or could have been scheduled in the case. Section 523(a)(10) provides as follows:

> Exceptions to discharge.
> (a) A discharge under section 727, 1141, 1228(a), 1228(b), or 1328(b) of this title does not discharge an individual debtor from any debt –
> (10) that was or could have been listed or scheduled by the debtor in a prior case concerning the debtor under this title or under the Bankruptcy Act in which the debtor waived discharge, or was denied a discharge under section 727(a)(2), (3), (4), (5), (6), or (7) of this title, or under section 14c(1), (2), (3), (4), (6), or (7) of such Act; ...

Rule 2004 examination is also properly used as a pre-litigation device to determine whether grounds exist to seek dismissal of a chapter 7 case as abusive pursuant section 707(b). See generally 2435 Plainfield Ave. v. Township of Scotch Plains (In re 2435 Plainfield Ave.), 223 B.R. 440, 456 (Bankr. D.N.J. 1998) ("A Rule 2004 exam has been explained as a broad investigation into the financial affairs of the debtor for the purpose of the discovery of assets of the estate and the exposure of fraudulent conduct."); In re Symington, 209 B.R. 678, 684 (Bankr. D.Md. 1997) (Rule 2004 examination "represents a threshold inquiry into the assets and conduct of debtors bankruptcy"); In re Valley Forge Plaza Assocs., 109 B.R. 669, 674 (Bankr. E.D.Pa. 1990).

Poch obviously would prefer to receive a chapter 7 discharge without providing the information and records sought by the United States Trustee in connection with the Rule 2004 examination. However, by filing a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 7, he assumed a duty under the Bankruptcy Code and the Bankruptcy Rules to provide complete and accurate information concerning his assets, his liabilities, and any financial transactions that might affect his entitlement to a discharge or the administration of his case. "The debtor's obligation to provide the required information is a cost imposed on the debtor for the benefit of obtaining bankruptcy relief." In re Russell, 392 B.R. 315, 358 (Bankr. E.D.Tenn, 2008). Further, the debtor's fulfillment of that duty is "crucial to the working of the bankruptcy system." Id., citing Eastern Diversified Distributors, Inc. v. Matus (In re Matus), 303 B.R. 660 (Bankr. N.D.Ga. 2004).

"An abuse of discretion arises when the ... court's decision rests upon a clearly erroneous finding of fact, an errant conclusion of law, or an improper application of law to fact." United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189, 1202 (11th Cir. 2005). Poch has not established that the bankruptcy court based its decision to extend the deadlines for filing a section 707(b) motion to dismiss or a section 727 objection to discharge on a clearly erroneous finding of fact, an errant conclusion of law, or an improper application of law to fact.

3. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Denying Poch's Motion for the Immediate Entry of a Chapter 7 Discharge.

Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004(c)(1) specifies, in pertinent part as follows:

> In a chapter 7 case, on expiration of the time fixed for filing a complaint objecting to discharge and the time fixed for filing a motion to dismiss the case under Rule 1017(e), the court shall forthwith grant the discharge unless:
> ...
> (E) a motion to extend the time for filing a complaint objecting to the discharge is pending;

> (F) a motion to extend the time for filing a motion to dismiss the case under Rule 1017(e)(1)[9] is pending;

There has been no period in this case when the time fixed by the bankruptcy court and/or the bankruptcy rules for filing a complaint objecting to discharge or a motion to dismiss had expired and there was no motion to extend those deadlines pending. It follows that the bankruptcy court did not err in denying Poch's motion for the entry of a chapter 7 discharge.

4. The Court Did Not Violate Poch's Due Process Right or Otherwise Err in Granting the United States Trustee's Motion to Examine Him Pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2004 on an Ex Parte Basis.

> Rule 2004 provides for an ex parte procedure. The party seeking a Rule 2004 examination of the debtor files a motion, with or without notice to the debtor, and the court can enter an order for the examination without allowing the debtor an opportunity to object. Fed. R. Bankr.P. 2004(a). The ... debtor can raise any objections to the examination by filing a motion. In re Dinubilo, 177 B.R. 932 (E.D.Cal. 1993); In re Sutera, 141 B.R. 539 (Bankr. D.Conn. 1992). This procedure recognizes the debtor's legal duty to testify to facts relevant to administration of the bankruptcy case.

In re Russell, 392 B.R. 315, 360 (Bankr. E.D.Tenn. 2008). See also In re Symington, 209 B.R. 678, 689 (Bankr. D.Md.1997) ("Rule 2004 motions are generally granted ex parte, as was the case here, without the advance notice required to be given in a contested matter) (citing 9 COLLIER ON BANKRUPTCY ¶ 2004.01[2] (15th ed. rev.1996)).

Contrary to Poch's contention at paragraph 24 of his Brief on appeal, a motion to authorize a Rule 2004 examination does not constitutes a contested matter. See In re Martin, 403 B.R. 359, 362 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2009) ("Because Rule 2004 examinations are independent of a complaint or contested matter, the examination need not be tied to specific factual allegations and is subject to fewer objections on grounds of relevance that apply to discovery under Fed.R.Civ.P. 26."); In re Russell, 392 B.R. 315, 324 (Bankr. E.D.Tenn. 2008) ("Under the bankruptcy statutes and procedural rules, neither the meeting of creditors nor a Rule 2004 examination is part of a contested matter or an adversary proceeding."); In re Symington, 209 B.R. 678, 689 (Bankr. D.Md. 1997) ("The filing of a motion for Rule 2004 examination does not per se create a contested matter governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure."). Because a motion to authorize a Rule 2004 examination does not initiate a contested matter, Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(c) does not apply to such a motion, with the result that the discovery rules set forth in Rules 26 and Rules 28 through 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which are made applicable to contested matters by Rule 9014(c) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7026 and 7028-37, do not apply to such a motion, either.

Poch has never filed a motion in the bankruptcy court seeking to limit the scope of the United States Trustee's Rule 2004 examination, nor has he objected to any request for information or records made by the United States Trustee based on allegations that its purpose is to abuse or harass or that it otherwise exceeds the permissible scope of discovery under Rule 2004. His due process rights in this regard remain fully intact.

5. The Filing of a Report of No Distribution Has No Bearing on the Availability of Relief under Section 707(b) or Section 727.

Poch appears to contend that the question of whether cause exists to dismiss his case under section 707(b) or to deny his discharge under section 727 was rendered moot by the chapter 7 trustee's filing of a Report of No Distribution in the case. The bankruptcy court docket reflects that the chapter 7 trustee filed a Report of No Distribution on June 11, 2008, but withdrew it on September 8, 2008. [BC# 27]. Poch apparently takes the position, without benefit of any supporting argument or authority, that the trustee's withdrawal of this report was ineffective. However, even had the chapter 7 trustee not withdrawn the Report of No Distribution, the filing of that document would have had no bearing on the availability of the sanctions provided by sections 707(b) and 727.

A Report of No Distribution is simply a statement by the chapter 7 trustee that, after a diligent investigation, he or she has found no assets to fund a distribution to unsecured creditors. The issue of whether unsecured creditors will receive a distribution is unrelated to the issue of whether the debtor is entitled to receive a discharge, except in the sense that a discharge would be rendered moot by payment of all creditor claims in full. The filing of a Report of No Distribution by no means entitles the debtor to receive a discharge in a chapter 7 case in which the deadlines for filing a section 707(b) motion to dismiss or a section 727 objection to discharge have not expired. See, e.g., In re Fieser, 248 B.R. 648 (Bankr. M.D.Fla. 1999) (granting section 727(a) denial of discharge based on complaint filed by United States Trustee in case in which chapter 7 trustee had filed report of no distribution).

6. Likewise, the Entry of an Order Finding that a Case Is Not Subject to Dismissal under 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1) Has No Bearing on the Availability of Relief under Section 707(b) or Section 727.

Poch apparently takes the position that the order entered by the bankruptcy court on June 12, 2008, finding that the case was not subject to dismissal under 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1)[10] [BC #14] absolved him of any duty to provide the information requested by the United States Trustee. Section 521(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code requires debtors to file various documents, including, a list of creditors, schedules of assets and liabilities, a statement of financial affairs, and copies of all payment advices or other evidence of payment received by the debtor from any employer within 60 days before the date of the filing of the petition; and section 521(i)(1) enforces these requirements by providing for the automatic dismissal of cases in which the information required under subsection (a)(1) is not filed. This statutory provision simply has no relevance to the ability of a creditor or the United States Trustee to file a motion to dismiss a chapter 7 case as abusive under section 707(b), to object to the debtor's discharge under section 727, or to seek information pursuant to Rule 2004 to determine whether relief under section 707 or 727 is warranted. Indeed, the court's order of June 12, 2008, specifically provided that "this does not prevent the United States Trustee or Chapter 7 Trustee from requesting by any authorized means, including but not limited to motion, that the Debtor supply further information." [BC #14].

7. The United States Trustee Was Not Required to File a Statement under Section 704(b) as to Whether the Case Was Presumed to Be Abusive as a Prerequisite to Filing a Motion to Dismiss the Case as Abusive under Section 707(b)(3).

Section 707(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code provides for the dismissal of chapter 7 cases that are deemed abusive, stating as follows:

> After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee, trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any), or any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts, or, with the debtor's consent, convert such a case to a case under chapter 11 or 13 of this title, if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter. ...

11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1).

Sections 707(b)(2) and 707(b)(3) establish different standards pursuant to which the "abuse" referred to in section 707(b)(1) may be established. Section 707(b)(2) provides that "the court shall presume abuse exists" if the debtor's disposable income, as determined by the formula set forth therein, generally referred to as the "means test," exceeds certain specified limits. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i). If a presumption of abuse does not arise under section 707(b)(2), the court may nevertheless find that the granting of chapter 7 relief would be an abuse under section 707(b)(3), which provides as follows:

> In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter in a case in which the presumption in subparagraph (A)(i) of [paragraph (2)] does not arise or is rebutted, the court shall consider —
> (A) whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith; or
> (B) the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse.

11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3).

The United States Trustee is obligated by 11 U.S.C. § 704(b) to take the following actions with regard to chapter 7 cases filed by debtors who are individuals:

> (1) With respect to a debtor who is an individual in a case under this chapter —
> (A) the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) shall review all materials filed by the debtor and, not later than 10 days after the date of the first meeting of creditors, file with the court a statement as to whether the debtor's case would be presumed to be an abuse under section 707 (b); and
> (B) not later than 5 days after receiving a statement under subparagraph (A), the court shall provide a copy of the statement to all creditors.
> (2) The United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any) shall, not later than 30 days after the date of filing a statement under paragraph (1), either file a motion to dismiss or convert under section 707 (b) or file a statement setting forth the reasons the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) does not consider such a motion to be appropriate, if the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) determines that the debtor's case should be presumed to be an abuse under section 707 (b) and the product of the debtor's current monthly income, multiplied by 12 is not less than—
> (A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner; or
> (B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2 or more individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals.

11 U.S.C. § 704(b).

Poch contends that because the United States Trustee did not file in this case a statement pursuant to section 704(b)(1)(A) "as to whether the debtor's case would be presumed to be an abuse under section 707(b)," he is barred from filing a motion to dismiss under section 707(b). However, a statement as to whether the a presumption of abuse arises under section 707(b) has no application or relevance to a motion to dismiss which is based on section 707(b)(3) rather than section 707(b)(2), because a motion to dismiss under section 707(b)(3) is not predicated on presumed abuse. Rather, the considerations for determining whether a case is abusive under section 707(b)(3) are "whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith" and whether the "totality of the circumstances ... of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse."

While Poch cites In re Draisey, 385 B.R. 274 (Bankr. D.Minn. 2008), as support for his argument, that decision was reversed by the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Eighth Circuit in October, 2008 in In re Draisey, 395 B.R. 79 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2008), and virtually every other court that has considered the issue has likewise ruled that the failure to file a 10-day statement under section 704(b)(1)(A) does not affect the ability of the United States Trustee's ability to file a motion to dismiss under section 707(b)(3). See Turner v. Close (In re Close), 384 B.R. 856, 871 (D.Kan.2008) aff'g 353 B.R. 915 (Bankr. D.Kan. 2006); In re Perrotta, 390 B.R. 26, 31 (Bankr. D.N.H. 2008); In re Ansar, 383 B.R. 344, 348 (Bankr. D.Minn. 2008); In re Byrne, 376 B.R. 700, 704 (Bankr. W.D.Ark. 2007); In re Clark, 393 B.R. 578, 584-85 (Bankr. E.D.Tenn. 2008); In re Fennell, 395 B.R. 905 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2008). The United States Trustee is aware of no extant contrary authority supporting Poch's argument.

8. The Record Contains No Support for Poch's Contentions that the Bankruptcy Court Failed to Consider Any of His Various Pleadings.

Poch contends that the bankruptcy court failed to consider numerous pleadings that he filed, including his Objection [BC #25] and Supplemental Objection [BC #34] to the United States Trustee's Motion for Extension of Deadlines [BC #25], his Response to the United States Trustee's Objection to Debtor's Motion for Discharge [BC #38], his hearing brief filed on October 14, 2008[BC #45], his hearing brief filed on October 20, 2008 [BC #50], his "Objection to 2004 Examination" filed on October 31, 2008 [BC #56], his "Objection to and Motion to Strike Statement of the United States Trustee in Response to (i) Debtor's Motion for Reconsideration; (ii) Debtor's Motion to Withhold Rulings; (iii) Debtor's Hearing Brief; and (iv) Affidavit of Ronald Poch in Support of Hearing Brief" filed on November 5, 2008 [BC #59], and his "Renewed Objection to the United States Trustee's Motion for Extention (sic) of Deadlines, and Objection to the United States Trustee's Supplemental Motion for Extention (sic) of Deadlines and Amendment to Supplemental Motion for Extention (sic) of Deadlines" filed on December 9, 2008 [BC #75]. However, Poch cites to nothing in the record that would support a finding that the bankruptcy court failed to consider any of these pleadings.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully requests this court to enter an order denying the Appellants Motion for Leave to Appeal and dismissing this appeal or, in the alternative, affirming the interlocutory orders from which the appeal is taken.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over this matter pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b) and § 157(b)(2)(L). The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel has jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (b) and Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8001. Joyce Babin, Chapter 13 Trustee, appeals from orders of the United States Bankruptcy Court, Western District of Arkansas, overruling her Objection to Confirmation of Chapter 13 Plan filed in the cases of Leonard and Margaret Powell ("the Powells") and Cho Pun Davis ("Davis") and confirming their plans.

Davis and the Powells filed their Chapter 13 cases and proposed plans on April 20, 2007. On June 4, 2007, the Chapter 13 Trustee timely objected to each plan. The objections to confirmation of the respective plans were heard on October 17, 2007. At the hearing, the court allowed the parties until December 14, 2007 to file briefs. On February 26 and 27, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered discrete orders overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objections to confirmation and confirming the plans of Davis and the Powells, respectively. On March 6, 2008, the Chapter 13 Trustee filed her notice of appeal in each case.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watchdogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88 (1977). The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency and to protect and preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy system. By statute, "[t]he United States Trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this Title." 11 U.S.C. § 307. See also In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d 498, 499-500 (6th Cir. 1990) (upholding broad appellate standing of United States Trustees).

These cases involve a dispute over confirmation of a plan under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. In this matter, the United States Trustee has two separate and distinct interests. First, the United States Trustee has the statutory duty to oversee the administration of Chapter 13 cases, which includes monitoring and, if necessary, objecting to Chapter 13 plans under 11 U.S.C. § 1324. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(C). Second, the United States Trustee has an interest in this appeal because the issue on appeal directly implicates 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), which the United States Trustee oversees pursuant to duties set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 704(b), and under which United States Trustees regularly seek relief involving the same legal issue.

The question of law involved in these appeals is not limited to Davis and the Powells. Rather, it will apply globally to thousands of debtors in a myriad of different financial circumstances who will file bankruptcy cases in this district and nationally. For this reason, the United States Trustee respectfully offers this Court her views on whether the bankruptcy court can confirm the Debtors' plans when the Debtors claim the IRS Standard expense allowance for a vehicle in the calculation of disposable income even though the Debtors have no vehicle financing expense because they own the vehicle debt free.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

The Chapter 13 Trustee objected to confirmation of the plans filed by Davis and the Powells on the grounds that all of their disposable income was not committed to the plan, as required under 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1)(B). The bankruptcy court overruled the Chapter 13 Trustee's objections and confirmed the plans, holding that Davis and the Powells could properly claim the IRS Standard expense allowance for vehicle ownership, notwithstanding the fact that neither Davis nor the Powells had vehicle loans or lease payments, thereby substantially reducing the funds available to pay creditors under the plans.

In these cases, Davis's and the Powells' income both exceed the family median income for the State of Arkansas. In Chapter 13 bankruptcy cases, when a debtor's income exceeds the applicable state's median family income, 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3) requires debtors to determine their expenses in accordance with the "means test" provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A) and (B). Given that 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows only "applicable" vehicle ownership expenses to be deducted under the means test, the issue presented to this Court for determination is whether the bankruptcy court erred by holding that the Davis and the Powells could claim the IRS Standard expense allowance for vehicle financing in the calculation of their disposable income, even though they have no vehicle financing expense because they own their cars debt free.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel reviews the bankruptcy court's factual findings for clear error and the conclusions of law de novo. DeBold v. Case, 452 F.3d 756, 761 (8th Cir. 2006); Litzinger v. Litzinger (In re Litzinger), 340 B.R. 897, 903 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2006); Ford v. Student Loan Guarantee Foundation (In re Ford), 269 B.R. 673, 675 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2001) [citing *Andresen v. In this case, the facts are not in dispute. Therefore, the bankruptcy court's interpretations of the relevant provisions, including 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(2), 1322(a), and 1325, are legal conclusions that are reviewed de novo.

STATUTORY FRAMEWORK AND BACKGROUND

I. Statutory Framework

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA") altered the analysis bankruptcy courts must employ when determining whether to confirm proposed Chapter 13 repayment plans. When, as here, a trustee or holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to plan confirmation, 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1) conditions plan confirmation upon the debtors committing all of their "projected disposable income" to payments to unsecured creditors through the Chapter 13 plan. "Disposable income" is the current monthly income received by the debtors (other than child support payments, foster care payments, or disability payments for a dependent child) less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2). The term "current monthly income" is the average monthly income from all sources that the debtors receive during the six-month period ending on the last day of the calendar month immediately preceding the date of the commencement of the case, including any amount paid by a third party on a regular basis for the household expenses of the debtor or the debtor's dependents, but excluding benefits received under the Social Security Act. 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A). For above-median-income debtors, the "amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" are determined "in accordance with"

§ 707(b)(2)(A)[1] and (B), which provides various specific expense categories from which debtors may reduce their "current monthly income."[2] 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3).

The "means test" provisions of §§ 707(b)(2)(A) and (B) are used in determining the expenses of Chapter 13 debtors, like these debtors, whose income exceeds their state's family median income. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3). In determining expenses, § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) provides that a debtor's "monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added).

II. Factual Background

Davis owns outright a 1998 Chevrolet Cavalier. Her Cavalier is not encumbered by any debt, and she makes no monthly payments for her ownership of the vehicle. App. p. 1.[3] In her Form 22C, Davis claims the IRS Standard "Transportation

[1] As amended by the BAPCPA, § 707(b)(2) repealed the former presumption in favor of the debtor, and replaced it with a new presumption. A case is an "abuse" of Chapter 7 if a detailed mathematical formula set out in the statute, commonly referred to as the "means test," yields a minimum amount of monthly disposable income. The means test uses a series of calculations to determine whether the § 707(b)(2) presumption of abuse arises in Chapter 7 cases. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A).

[2] Form 22C, which debtors must file pursuant to Interim Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 1007(b)(6), serves, in part, to calculate debtor's "current monthly income."

Ownership Lease Expense" in the amount of $471 for her Chevrolet Cavalier.[4]

The Powells own a 2003 Dodge Dakota free and clear of liens, and make no monthly payment for their ownership of the vehicle. App. p 10.[5] At Line 29 of their Form 22C, the Powells take a deduction of $332 for "Local Standards: Transportation Ownership Lease Expense; Vehicle 2," for their Dodge Dakota.[6]

The Chapter 13 Trustee objected to confirmation of the plans of Davis and the Powells, claiming the plans failed to provide all of their disposable income for the payment of creditors, contrary to 11 U.S.C. §§ 1325(a)(3) and (b)(1)(B). The Chapter 13 Trustee argued that the Debtors had more income to devote to paying creditors because they were improperly claiming the IRS Standard expense for vehicle financing expenses, even though these Debtors have no vehicle or lease payments. App. pp. 2, 11.

On February 26, 2008, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Arkansas entered an order overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection and confirming Davis' Chapter 13 plan. The next day, February 27, 2008, the same court

Because her vehicle is over six years old, the United States Trustee would also allow Davis an additional $200 operating expense per vehicle, based on the Internal Revenue Manual which allows such an additional vehicle operating expenses. See Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5 (entitled Collecting Process), Chapter 8, § 5.8.5.5.2, Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses, which may be found on the IRS website at http://www/irs/gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html.

entered an order overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection and confirming the Powells' Chapter 13 plan. The court ruled that Davis and the Powells were entitled to reduce their disposable income by the amount of the IRS Standard expenses allowance for vehicle financing costs even though they had no vehicle financing costs. On March 6, 2008, the Trustee timely filed her notice of appeal of the court's orders of February 26, 2008 and February 27, 2008.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court erred as a matter of law in overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection to confirmation and confirming the Chapter 13 plans of Davis and the Powells. It did so by misinterpreting when debtors can claim a vehicle ownership expense under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). The court held that Davis was entitled to deduct $471 in vehicle ownership expenses for her 1998 Chevrolet Cavalier, even though that vehicle was owned free and clear of encumbrances. The court also held that the Powells were entitled to deduct $332 for their 2003 Dodge Dakota, even though that vehicle was owned free and clear of debt.

This conclusion of law by the bankruptcy court is incorrect because the law allows these Debtors to claim only "applicable" expenses under § 707(b)(2), and they have no applicable vehicle ownership expenses because neither vehicle is subject to a loan or lease payment. This Court has already resolved this issue and reached the same conclusion in In re Wilson, 383 B.R. 729, 2008 WL 681102 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008), and should follow that decision here.

By using the word "applicable," Congress limited eligibility for expenses under Local Standards to debtors for whom the expenses apply. Because the vehicle acquisition/financing expense does not apply with respect to these Debtors' vehicles, the bankruptcy court erred in holding they were eligible to deduct the vehicle ownership expenses under their means test.

Significantly, the bankruptcy court's interpretation of "applicable" in § 707(b)(2) has the erroneous effect of applying the means test in a manner that is inconsistent with the Internal Revenue Service's longstanding application of this standard. Under § 707(b)(2), the means test looks to the IRS to establish certain standard expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i)(I). In applying its standards to taxpayers, the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim vehicle ownership expenses absent a monthly car expense. See IRS Collection Financial Standards attached hereto as Exhibit 4 of the Addenda.[7] Congress's use of "applicable" in § 707(b)(2) means this expense should be denied to debtors like Davis and the Powells who do not have a car loan or lease, for the same reasons the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim such phantom expenses.

Finally, the bankruptcy court's orders overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objections to confirmation of the plans of Davis and the Powells conflict with sound notions of public policy and the primary purpose of Congress in passing bankruptcy reform legislation in 2005, including the amendments at issue in this appeal. The 2005 legislation was intended to ensure that debtors repay their debts when they can. By allowing Davis and the Powells to claim a fictional expense for each of their vehicles, the bankruptcy court subverted that purpose.

[7] The IRS revised its Collection Financial Standards, effective October 1, 2007, and such revisions were made applicable to bankruptcy cases filed as of January 1, 2008. Because the Davis and Powell cases were filed on April 20, 2007, only the Collection Financial Standards in effect prior to October 1, 2007, are applicable to these cases. For the Court's convenience, a true and correct PDF copy of the Collection Financial Standards applicable to these cases is included in the Appendix, pp. 13-23, and incorporated herein by reference. It is important to note, however, that the revisions made by the IRS effective October 1, 2007, do not change any result in these cases. As set forth in the current Collection Financial Standards, the Local Standard for Vehicle Operation is still made expressly contingent on the existence of a loan or lease payment on a vehicle. See App. pp. 13-23. As explained by the IRS, the recent revisions to the Local Standards were made to create equal allowances for first and second vehicles, add a separate public transportation allowance, and reorganize the manner in which taxpayers in certain counties calculate their transportation operating expenses. See id., under heading "Recent Revisions."

ARGUMENT

I.

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN HOLDING THAT DAVIS AND THE POWELLS WERE ELIGIBLE TO CLAIM THE IRS LOCAL STANDARDS FOR VEHICLE OWNERSHIP FOR THEIR VEHICLES BECAUSE THE EXPENSE WAS NOT APPLICABLE TO THEM.

The bankruptcy court's orders overruling the Chapter 13 trustee's objection to confirmation of the Davis and Powell plans should be reversed because they fail to recognize that the Bankruptcy Code only allows debtors to claim vehicle expenses that are applicable to the debtors. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Davis and the Powells do not have any "applicable" vehicle ownership expense because they own their respective vehicles outright. Their attempt to claim what is a phantom expense is prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code because the Code allows debtors to claim only "applicable" expenses, not phantom ones. For this reason, the orders entered by the bankruptcy court merit reversal.

A. Vehicle ownership expenses are allowable only if "applicable" to the debtors.

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the...Local Standards...issued by the Internal Revenue Service." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The statute expressly provides that before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense must itself first be applicable to the debtor. Id.

The Bankruptcy Code does not define the word "applicable," nor has the United States Trustee identified any United States Supreme Court or United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit decision that provides a definition in the bankruptcy context. Where, as here, a statutory term is undefined, a basic principle of statutory construction provides that courts should give such terms their ordinary meanings. E.g., Smith v. U.S., 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning."); s*ee also Watson v. Ray*, 192 F.3d 1153, 1155 (8th Cir. 1999) (stating that, "When interpreting a statute the court starts with the statute's plain meaning."). The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean applying or capable of being applied; relevant; suitable; appropriate. Random House Unabridged Dictionary (2006). Accordingly, such a meaning should be imparted to the term "applicable" as it appears in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) absent clear indication that Congress intended to give such term a different meaning. See Schumacher v. Cargill Meat Solutions Corp., 515 F.3d 867, 871 (8th Cir. 2007) ("In the absence of a statutory definition or clear contrary legislative intent, statutory terms are given their plain, ordinary, and commonly understood meaning. This court often turns to a commonly used dictionary to ascertain a word's ordinary meaning." (citations omitted)); Hutchins v. Champion International Corporation, 110 F.3d 1341, 1344 (8th Cir. 1997)("Ordinary meaning is determined by the dictionary definition of the word and the context in which it is used.").

This Court has recently held that "a vehicle ownership expense is only applicable if a debtor is in fact incurring such an expense." See In re Wilson, 383 B.R. 729, 2008 WL 681102 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008). In Wilson, Chapter 13 debtors sought to claim vehicle ownership expenses for two vehicles they owned outright. Id. at *2. This Court concluded that "debtors who do not incur vehicle ownership expenses are not permitted to claim the IRS Standard deductions for such expenses because such expenses are not applicable under § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)." Id. at *4. See also In re Ransom, 380 B.R. 799 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007) (holding that under § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) the deduction of a vehicle ownership expense only applies to the debtor when he or she has that particular expense); Wieland v. Thomas, 382 B.R. 793 (D. Kan. 2008) (stating that the court is more persuaded by the trustee's argument that the statute should be construed to allow a car ownership expense only if the debtor in fact incurs such an expense in the form of a car payment, and it believes that the Tenth Circuit would adopt such an interpretation); In re Meade, ___ B.R. ___, 2008 WL 792060 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 24, 2008) (stating the court is of the opinion that the plain meaning of "applicable" necessitates an existing ownership or lease payment for a debtor to claim an ownership or lease payment deduction); In re Deadmond, ___ B.R. ___, 2008 WL 191165 (D. Mont. Jan. 22, 2008) (following the rationale in Ransom) (stating that "[W]hen the debtor has no monthly ownership expenses, it makes no sense to deduct an ownership expense to shield it from the creditors"); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762, 764-67 (E.D. Wis. 2007) (holding that word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) means that "ownership expenses must exist" in the form of an actual loan or lease payment); Fokkena v. Hartwick, 373 B.R.

645, 650 (D. Minn. 2007) (finding that "word 'applicable' in [section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)] means that, before the expense amount can be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense itself must actually be applicable to the debtor–in other words, the debtor must actually have a loan or lease payment obligation"). Cf. In re Devilliers, 358 B.R. 849, 859 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2007) (stating that debtors may claim IRS ownership expense only after "a determination is made as to the type of expenses allowed and applicable to the debtor"); In re Carlin, 348 B.R. 795, 798 (Bankr. D. Or. 2006) (finding that statute plainly and unambiguously does not allow the vehicle operating expense at issue to "free and clear" owners).

The bankruptcy court's order is inconsistent with the ordinary, common sense definition of "applicable" because it allows debtors like Davis and the Powells to deduct expenses that do not apply to them. Here, Davis and the Powells seek to claim a loan or lease payment, but they have none. If the expense, which Davis does not incur on a monthly basis, is disallowed, in a 60-month repayment plan under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, Davis will have the ability to repay her unsecured creditors $36,336.60, which is fifty-nine percent (59%) of her total scheduled unsecured claims. Likewise, the Powells will have the ability to repay their unsecured creditors $17,460.00, which amount will pay in excess of one hundred percent (100%) of their total scheduled unsecured claims. By inserting the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom such expenses are "relevant; suitable; appropriate"--thereby excluding phantom ones. Because neither Davis nor the Powells have vehicle financing expenses for their vehicles, the IRS ownership expense does not apply to those vehicles.

The court below concluded that Davis and the Powells could deduct vehicle expenses they do not have because "applicable" in § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) refers solely to the number of vehicles claimed and where the debtors reside, not whether the debtors own their car free and clear of liens. In other words, according to the bankruptcy court, "applicable" in the statute refers to the number of standardized expenses these debtors can claim. This interpretation by the court not only contradicts this Court's holding in Wilson but also effectively rewrites the statute. For the court's interpretation to be correct, the statute would need to read "[t]he debtor's monthly expenses shall be the ~~debtors'~~ applicable [number of] monthly expense amounts...." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (as modified). Such statement is not in the statute. Nowhere does it state "applicable" means the "number" of expenses. Because "applicable" follows the word "debtors," it is clear that the statute asks debtors to claim the IRS standard expenses that apply to them. For these reasons, Davis and the Powells should not be allowed deductions for inapplicable phantom expenses they do not have.

The bankruptcy court's proffered numerical definition also fails to appreciate that a debtor's ability to pay creditors is not affected by mere vehicle ownership but by payments on a car. Accordingly, § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not focus on how many cars a debtor owns, but how many cars he or she makes payments on every month. See In re Wilson, 383 B.R. 729, 2008 WL 681102 at *3 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008), citing Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 ("The statute is only concerned about protecting the debtor's ability to continue owning a car, and if the debtor already owns the car, the debtor is adequately protected."); s*ee also Hartwick,* 373 B.R. at 652 (same).

Hartwick and Ross-Tousey reversed the bankruptcy court rulings in those cases because those courts, like the bankruptcy court here, failed to give the word "applicable" its ordinary meaning. Instead, bankruptcy courts, like the one in these cases, made an arbitrary distinction between the word "actual" and "applicable" expenses in § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). See, e.g., In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414, 418 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006) ("The use of 'actual' with respect to the Other Necessary Expenses and 'applicable' with respect to the National and Local Standards must mean that Congress intended two different applications.") The bankruptcy court here agreed that "applicable" and "actual" must have different meanings as Congress used both terms in the statute and, therefore, debtors like Davis and the Powells need not have any "actual" expense for the Ownership Expense Standard to be "applicable." App. pp. 6-7. This logic is misguided, however. As the Ross-Tousey court explained, there is no indication in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) that Congress intended the words "applicable" and "actual" to have essentially opposite meanings. Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765. Rather, as Ross-Tousey held, the better reading of "applicable" in the context of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is that it may have two meanings: first, the ownership expense is "applicable" if the debtor makes a loan or lease payment on a vehicle, and second, the amount allowed to the debtor is the "applicable" amount provided under the IRS Standards, and not the "actual" amount." Id., see also Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 653. "This reading gives meaning to the distinction between 'applicable' and 'actual' without taking a further step to conclude that 'applicable' means "nonexistent' or 'fictional.'" Ross-Tousey, 365 B.R. at 765.

By using the term "applicable" in this way, a determination of allowable expenses under the means test is a two-step process. The first step is eligibility—i.e., does the debtor qualify for an expense allowance in the category at issue? If so, then the second step is to quantify the expense amount the eligible debtor is allowed by looking at the IRS Standard amounts that are specified for the number of vehicles owned by the debtor and where the debtor lives. See, e.g., Carlin, 348 B.R. at 798 ("There is nothing absurd in Congress drawing the line for vehicle ownership expense eligibility at those debtors who are making payments on the vehicle."). The bankruptcy court's ruling impermissibly skips the first step of determining whether Davis and the Powells are eligible for the ownership expense by virtue of having a loan or lease payment for a vehicle, and proceeds directly to the second—only considering the amount the IRS would allow eligible taxpayers to claim for the number of vehicles they own and where they reside.

B. The UST's construction of "applicable" in § 707(b)(2) has the salutary effect of treating transportation costs the same way in bankruptcy cases that the IRS treats them.

Reversal of the bankruptcy court's orders will have the additional benefit of treating inapplicable, phantom expenses in bankruptcy cases the way the IRS has long treated them. In providing which deductions debtors may take under the means test, Congress specifically stated that debtors are permitted to deduct "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the...Local Standards...issued by the Internal Revenue Service." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). Accordingly, how the Internal Revenue Service applies the Standards that it developed for its own internal debt collection purposes is instructive on the question of how the same Standards might be applied in bankruptcy cases under section 707(b)(2). See, e.g., Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650-51 ("in order to determine whether the expense Standards issued by the IRS are 'applicable,' the most logical resource to consult is the IRS"); s*ee also In re Slusher,* 359 B.R. 290, 309 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007) ("if guidance is sought on the meaning of the IRS standards Congress incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code, practical reason would suggest that courts should consider the full manner by which the IRS uses these standards.").

The IRS Collection Financial Standards in effect as of the date of Davis' and the Powells' bankruptcy filings[8] fully support the United States Trustee's construction of the term "applicable" and provide as follows:

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs....The ownership costs provided maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense....If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

In addition, Chapter 8 of the Financial Analysis Handbook clarifies that the ownership expense is allowed only for the "purchase and/or lease of a vehicle." As of the date Davis and the Powells filed their bankruptcy petitions,[9] the "ownership cost" was specifically calculated by the IRS based on the cost to finance the acquisition of a vehicle, and not simply a cost associated with owning a car, such as repair or maintenance. The "ownership cost" Standards are based on the "five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors." See IRS Collection Financial Standards, supra (at section entitled "Recent Revisions.") (emphasis added). As such, the IRS does not treat the "ownership cost" expense as applicable when a taxpayer does not have a monthly expense related to financing a car. In exercising its discretion to collect taxes, the IRS recognizes that taxpayers may claim the vehicle "ownership cost" portion of the Local Transportation Standards only in situations where the taxpayer has a monthly vehicle acquisition financing expense, i.e., has a monthly vehicle loan or lease payment. See id.

The bankruptcy court agreed that Congress did incorporate the IRS's Local Standards into the bankruptcy code, but ruled that the Internal Revenue Manual (IRM) is not incorporated into the bankruptcy code. App. p. 6.

[9] See Footnote 7, supra.

Some courts, however, consider the IRM an aid in interpreting the language of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). See In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 805. This Court itself relied on the IRM in its analysis. See In re Wilson, 383 B.R. 729, 2008 WL 681102 at *3 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008). In stating that the amounts "specified" by the IRS Standards may be deducted from current monthly income to yield a debtor's disposable income, Congress "essentially read [ ] into the Code not only the actual numbers contained in the IRS Standards, but also the Manual's context for their application." In re Howell, 366 B.R. 153, 157 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2007). Thus, "if guidance is sought on the meaning of the IRS Standards that Congress incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code, practical reason would suggest that court should consider the full manner by which the IRS uses these standards." In re Slusher, 359 B.R. at 309; see also In re Howell, 366 B.R. at 157 ("It is unlikely that Congress intended the Statute to merely import the numbers without their attendant meaning and context."); In re Oliver, 350 B.R. 294, 301 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2006) (holding that debtor is not entitled to vehicle ownership expense because IRS Financial Analysis Handbook and Internal Revenue Manual limit expense to individuals that have loan or lease payment); In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 726 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) (same).

Unlike the bankruptcy court, the court in Thomas was not dissuaded by the statute's failure to refer to or incorporate the IRM, which instructs that the numbers in the standards represent caps. Wieland v. Thomas, 382 B.R. 793, 798 (D. Kan. 2008). The Thomas court stated that:

> "the statute as written sufficiently adopts the numbers in their context as part of the National and Local Standards created by the IRS. It is also > worth noting that the committee report accompanying the statute makes specific reference to the IRS's Financial Analysis Handbook in connection with the National and Local Standards. See H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I); 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 99-100. Thus, it does not appear that Congress intended to adopt only the numbers contained in the Standards without the context and meaning provided by the IRS in creating the Standards and in its normal application of those numbers as set forth in the Handbook and Manual. Although the proper interpretation is dictated by the language of the statute itself, the court notes that its interpretation comports with the purposes of BAPCPA."

Id.

Given the IRS's historic application of its National Standards and Local Standards up to the time of BAPCPA's enactment, "it would be quite odd if Congress intended to preclude courts from examining the context in which the authoring agency, the IRS, used and employed those standards." See Slusher, 359 B.R. at 309. Nothing compels such an odd reading. Consistent with IRS practice, this Court should hold that courts should use the IRM as a tool in interpreting the IRS Vehicle Ownership Standards with regards to the means test.

The court below also expressed concern that the IRM differs from § 707(b)(2)'s means test because the IRM lets taxpayers deduct the actual amount of their car payment up to the cap set out in the IRS's Local Standards, but the means test allows debtors to claim the full amount of the Local Standard, even if their car payment is less. App. p. 6. That concern is irrelevant. The relevant point is that the IRS prohibits individuals from claiming a car payment when they have none. The exact same thing happens under the means test because a debtor without an "applicable" car expense cannot claim a car payment either.

Further, considering IRS practice in interpreting "applicable" expenses in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not negate the section's later allowance of "actual" monthly expenses in the IRS categories of Other Necessary Expenses. Rather, "a natural reading" of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) indicates that the words "actual" and "applicable" limit the relevant expense deductions in different ways. Slusher, 359 B.R. at 308. "Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to read, "The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the monthly amounts specified under the National Standards and the Local Standards....' rather than 'The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National and Local Standards." Id. (Emphasis in original).

II.

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S ORDERS CONFLICT WITH THE MAJOR GOALS OF THE 2005 AMENDMENTS TO THE BANKRUPTCY CODE.

The bankruptcy court's orders in the Davis and Powell cases are also inconsistent with Congress's goals and purpose in implementing bankruptcy reform. Congress amended the Bankruptcy Code in 2005 to rectify perceived abuses in the bankruptcy process. "Among the abuses identified by Congress was the easy access to chapter 7 liquidation proceedings by consumer debtors who, if required to file under chapter 13, could afford to pay some dividend to their unsecured creditors." In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 720 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) (citing 151 Cong. Rec. S2459, 2469-70 (March 10, 2005)). A "primary goal" of the 2005 Reform Act was to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798; see also In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89). In cases such as these, where Davis and the Powells have no loan or lease payment, Congress has established a system which does not provide them an expense deduction for vehicle financing. "Allowing debtors to deduct from their disposable income a fictional ownership allowance would give debtors with unencumbered vehicles a windfall at the expense of their unsecured creditors." In re Howell, 366 B.R. 153, 157 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2007).

CONCLUSION

For all of these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the February 26, 2008 Order entered by the Bankruptcy Court in the Davis case and the February 27, 2008 Order entered in the Powell case, denying the Chapter 13 Trustee's objections to confirmation of the Debtors' plans and Order confirming the Debtors' plans, and remand these cases to the Bankruptcy Court for further proceedings.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE IN OPPOSITION[1]

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the court of appeals (Pet. App. 1a-18a) is reported at 564 F.3d 1052. The opinion of the bankruptcy appellate panel (Pet. App. 19a-44a) is reported at 332 B.R. 404. The opinion of the bankruptcy court (Pet. App. 45a-70a) is unreported.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court of appeals was entered on April 28, 2009. The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on July 24, 2009. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. 1254(1).

STATEMENT

1. In late 2003, debtor Patricia Lehtinen retained petitioner to represent her in filing for bankruptcy. Lehtinen told petitioner that she wanted to secure a home improvement loan, perform various repairs on her house, and then sell the house to repay debts. Petitioner offered to serve as her attorney in filing the bankruptcy petition and as her real estate broker in listing her house for sale. In December 2003, with petitioner's assistance, Lehtinen filed for bankruptcy under Chapter 13. Pet. App. 47a-48a.

Pursuant to their retention agreement, petitioner agreed to attend the meeting of creditors held pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 341. On February 19, 2004, Lehtinen attended that meeting, but petitioner did not attend. Rather, petitioner sent in his stead another attorney who was not a member of his firm. Pet. App. 48a. Petitioner did not notify Lehtinen that he would be absent from the meeting, nor did he secure her consent to another attorney's appearance. Ibid.

In March and April 2004, petitioner advised Lehtinen to list her house for $340,000 to $345,000 in order to induce a quick sale. Pet. App. 50a-51a. Meanwhile, petitioner arranged for Lehtinen to receive a home improvement loan, but the mortgage company conditioned the loan on Lehtinen's using petitioner as her broker. Id. at 49a-50a. Lehtinen decided to list the house through another broker without performing any improvements, and shortly thereafter she accepted an offer for $390,000. Id. at 52a.

On June 3, 2004, Lehtinen attended the confirmation hearing, but petitioner again did not attend. Pet. App. 52a-53a. Petitioner was absent because he had agreed to represent another client at a hearing that afternoon in a different courthouse. Id. at 53a. The bankruptcy court confirmed Lehtinen's plan, but it also issued an order for petitioner to appear at a hearing on July 8, 2004, and show cause why he should not be required to disgorge any compensation received from Lehtinen for his failure to attend the creditors' meeting and confirmation hearing. Ibid. The next day, on June 4, 2004, petitioner sent Lehtinen a letter stating that her case had been dismissed at the confirmation hearing—a statement that was not true and that petitioner had made no attempt to verify. Id. at 53a-54a.

At the July 8 hearing, the bankruptcy court ordered petitioner to reduce by $300 the fee of $1500 that he had charged Lehtinen for representing her in the bankruptcy case. Pet. App. 55a. After receiving a letter from Lehtinen describing petitioner's conduct in greater detail, however, the court issued an order for petitioner to appear for a second hearing on July 26, 2004. Ibid. The order identified four instances of petitioner's alleged misconduct, and stated that "the facts point to a clear conflict of interest between [petitioner] acting as the debtor's lawyer, soliciting the debtor to use his services as a real estate broker, and serving as a loan broker." Id. at 5a (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). The order therefore required petitioner to show cause "why [he] should not be sanctioned pursuant to this court's inherent sanction power * * * for bad faith conduct" and "why he should not be suspended or disbarred from practice in this court." Id. at 4a (internal quotation marks omitted). The court also ordered Lehtinen to appear and testify at the hearing. Ibid.

2. a. Following the July 26 hearing, the bankruptcy court determined that petitioner had violated several provisions of the California Business & Professions Code and the California Rules of Professional Conduct. Pet. App. 45a-70a; see id. at 69a. The court found that petitioner had intentionally failed to appear at the creditors' meeting and confirmation hearing, id. at 59a, 64a, and had pressured Lehtinen to hire him as her real estate broker, id. at 68a. The court stated that petitioner's "conduct in this case was outrageously improper, unprofessional and unethical under any reading of California's ethical standards for attorneys." Ibid. The court therefore ordered petitioner "to disgorge to [Lehtinen] the entire balance of the $1,500 fee he was paid in this case." Id. at 70a. Moreover, "[i]n light of the egregious nature of [petitioner's] conduct," the court suspended petitioner "from the practice of law in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of California for a period of three months," with the exception of any "cases and adversary proceedings already filed in which [petitioner] has already made an appearance as the attorney of record." Ibid. Petitioner appealed and obtained a stay of his suspension. Id. at 5a.

b. The bankruptcy appellate panel held that the bankruptcy court had authority to sanction petitioner, but it vacated the portion of the bankruptcy court's order that suspended petitioner from practice, and it remanded for further proceedings to reconsider the appropriate sanction. Pet. App. 19a-44a. The panel concluded that "the bankruptcy court could discipline" petitioner, and that the court had "afforded [petitioner] due process." Id. at 30a. In the panel's view, petitioner "ha[d] not shown that the bankruptcy court clearly erred in its factual findings, nor that it lacked clear and convincing evidence." Ibid. But while the panel determined that "discipline was appropriate," ibid., it remanded the case so that the bankruptcy court could "consider the ABA Standards in determining the appropriate sanction," id. at 31a. See id. at 44a ("[T]he record does not disclose that the court considered all appropriate factors in determining what sanction to impose.").

c. The court of appeals affirmed the order of the bankruptcy appellate panel. Pet. App. 1a-18a. Although the decision under review was non-final, the court of appeals found that it possessed jurisdiction because the appeal presented a question of law, i.e., whether the bankruptcy court had authority to sanction petitioner. Id. at 6a. On the merits, the court of appeals held that bankruptcy courts possess inherent power to sanction attorneys appearing before them for bad faith or willful misconduct. Id. at 8a-11a. The court further held that petitioner had received adequate notice of the possible suspension, id. at 12a-15a, and that the Northern District of California Civil Local Rules did not require the bankruptcy court to refer the suspension action to a standing committee, id. at 16a-18a.

ARGUMENT

The decision of the court of appeals is correct and does not conflict with any decision of this Court or of any other court of appeals. Further review is not warranted.

1. a. As a threshold matter, there is a substantial question whether the court of appeals had jurisdiction to hear petitioner's appeal. The bankruptcy appellate panel vacated the decision of the bankruptcy court and remanded for that court to "consider[] all appropriate factors in determining what sanction to impose." Pet. App. 44a. Ten courts of appeals have held that "a decision by the district court on appeal remanding the bankruptcy court's decision for further proceedings in the bankruptcy court is not final, and so is not appealable * * * , unless the further proceedings contemplated are of a purely ministerial character." In re Lopez, 116 F.3d 1191, 1192 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 1014 (1997); see id. at 1192 (citing cases from eight other courts of appeals); see In re Swegan, 555 F.3d 510, 512 (6th Cir. 2009).

The Third and Ninth Circuits, however, have adopted a more liberal approach to appealability. See, e.g., United States Trustee v. Gryphon at the Stone Mansion, Inc., 166 F.3d 552, 556 (3d Cir. 1999). As relevant here, the Ninth Circuit has held that it possesses "jurisdiction over a non-final order in a bankruptcy case where 'the appeal concerns primarily a question of law.'" Pet. App. 6a (quoting DeMarah v. United States, 62 F.3d 1248, 1250 (9th Cir. 1995)). This Court would be required to consider that jurisdictional issue if it granted the petition, see Bender v. Williamsport Area Sch. Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 541 (1986), and the Court might ultimately conclude that it could not reach the merits of petitioner's claims, see United States v. Corrick, 298 U.S. 435, 440 (1936).

b. At the least, the non-final nature of the decision below counsels against further review at this time. The remand by the bankruptcy appellate panel leaves open the possibility that the bankruptcy court will not suspend petitioner once it "consider[s] all appropriate factors." Pet. App. 44a. In the event that petitioner is again suspended, he may raise his current claims—together with any other claims that might arise during the proceedings on remand—in a new petition for a writ of certiorari. See Major League Baseball Players Ass'n v. Garvey, 532 U.S. 504, 508 n.1 (2001). Accordingly, review by this Court would be premature at this time.

2. a. On the merits, petitioner argues (Pet. 3-5) that bankruptcy courts lack inherent authority to sanction the bad faith misconduct of attorneys who appear before them. That contention lacks merit. This Court's precedents have "recognized the 'well-acknowledged' inherent power of a court to levy sanctions in response to abusive litigation practices." Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752, 765 (1980) (citing Link v. Wabash R.R., 370 U.S. 626, 632 (1962)). "It has long been understood that '[c]ertain implied powers must necessarily result to our Courts of justice from the nature of their institution,' powers 'which cannot be dispensed with in a Court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others.'" Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 43 (1991) (quoting United States v. Hudson, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 32, 34 (1812)).

"A primary aspect" of a court's inherent powers is "the ability to fashion an appropriate sanction for conduct which abuses the judicial process." Chambers, 501 U.S. at 44-45. A court thus confronted with a party's bad faith misconduct in the course of proceedings has the discretion to respond with a variety of sanctions. Id. at 45. And just as courts can sanction parties for their bad faith conduct, so too can courts can sanction parties' counsel for the same types of misconduct. Roadway Express, 447 U.S. at 766 ("The power of a court over members of its bar is at least as great as its authority over litigants."). Here, the bankruptcy court imposed a sanction—suspending petitioner from accepting new cases before that court for three months—less severe than others that have been upheld as within courts' inherent authority. Chambers, 501 U.S. at 45.

A clear expression of congressional intent is required to displace a court's inherent power to sanction bad faith conduct. Chambers, 501 U.S. at 47. The Bankruptcy Code, far from displacing the inherent powers of courts, expressly recognizes the bankruptcy court's authority to sanction litigants for abusive litigation practices. The Code states that "[n]o provision of this title providing for the raising of an issue by a party in interest shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action or making any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process." 11 U.S.C. 105(a) (emphasis added); see 132 Cong. Rec. 28,610 (1986) (statement of Sen. Hatch) (Section 105(a) "allows a bankruptcy court to take any action on its own, or to make any necessary determination to prevent an abuse of process and to help expedite a case in a proper and justified manner.").

Accordingly, it is well established that bankruptcy courts have the power to sanction parties or counsel for bad faith conduct in bankruptcy proceedings. See, e.g., In re Sunshine Jr. Stores, Inc., 456 F.3d 1291, 1304-1306 (11th Cir. 2006); In re DeVille, 361 F.3d 539, 548-551 (9th Cir. 2004); In re Rimsat, Ltd., 212 F.3d 1039, 1046-1049 (7th Cir. 2000); Pearson v. First N.H. Mortgage Corp., 200 F.3d 30, 42 n.7 (1st Cir. 1999); Weiss v. First Citizens Bank & Trust Co., 111 F.3d 1159, 1171-1172 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 950 (1997); Mapother & Mapother, PSC v. Cooper, 103 F.3d 472, 477 (6th Cir. 1996); In re Huckfeldt, 39 F.3d 829, 832 (8th Cir. 1994); Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Case, 937 F.2d 1014, 1023-1024 (5th Cir. 1991). Petitioner identifies no decision holding that bankruptcy courts lack such authority.

b. Petitioner's reliance (Pet. 3, 5-6) on In re Sheridan, 362 F.3d 96 (1st Cir. 2004), is misplaced. In In re Sheridan, the bankruptcy court did not sanction counsel in the course of an ongoing bankruptcy case. Id. at 107. Rather, the court presided over an omnibus disciplinary proceeding to investigate potential ethical violations that spanned many closed bankruptcy cases. Ibid. Absent the consent of the parties, however, a bankruptcy court may enter a final judgment only with respect to "core" proceedings, or proceedings related to the administration of a bankruptcy case. Id. at 99-100 (citing Northern Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 86-87 (1982)). The First Circuit held in In re Sheridan that the omnibus disciplinary action involved in that case was not a core proceeding, and thus "in th[o]se particular circumstances[] the bankruptcy court was not empowered to arrive at a final resolution of the disciplinary matter absent further district court participation and oversight." Id. at 110.

Nothing in In re Sheridan casts doubt on the result in the present case. As the court of appeals concluded, "[t]he circumstances here are clearly different," Pet. App. 7a n.1, because the bankruptcy court sanctioned petitioner for his bad faith misconduct in the context of an ongoing bankruptcy case. The First Circuit in In re Sheridan "d[id] not question that the case law overwhelmingly suggests that the bankruptcy court possesses the requisite authority, either inherent or statutory, to regulate its bar as necessary and appropriate." 362 F.3d at 110. For that reason, the First Circuit made explicit that its opinion did not extend to other types of disciplinary proceedings, including proceedings conducted during the course of a bankruptcy case. Id. at 111.[2]

c. Petitioner is also incorrect in arguing (Pet. 6-7) that the bankruptcy court acted in violation of the Northern District of California Civil Local Rules. As the court of appeals explained, see Pet. App. 17a, Civil Local Rule 11-6(a)(2) permits bankruptcy courts, inter alia, to "[i]mpose other appropriate sanctions" for attorney misconduct. In electing to suspend petitioner from bringing new bankruptcy cases in the Northern District for three months, rather than to initiate contempt proceedings or refer petitioner to the California Bar, the bankruptcy court imposed the sort of "other appropriate sanctions" contemplated by Civil Local Rule 11-6(a)(2). The lower courts' interpretation of their own Rules does not warrant this Court's review. And because the court of appeals affirmed the order of the bankruptcy appellate panel, which remanded the case to the bankruptcy court to reconsider the appropriate sanction, further review of the specific sanction that was previously imposed would be premature at this time. See pp. 6-7, supra.

[2] Although the court of appeals considered and rejected petitioner's contention (Pet. 5) that his disciplinary hearing was not a core proceeding, see Pet. App. 6a-7a & n.1, the bankruptcy appellate panel declined to consider that argument on the ground that "[petitioner] ha[d] waived any issue respecting the core or non-core nature of the disciplinary proceeding." Id. at 27a; see id. at 27a-28a.

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

Respectfully submitted.

STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This Court has jurisdiction over these appeals under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES

The issue before this Court on appeal is whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion in converting this bankruptcy case from a Chapter 11 case to a case under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code.

APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

A district court applies a clearly erroneous standard to a bankruptcy court's findings of fact and conducts a de novo review of conclusions of law. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013; Resyn Corp. v. United States, 851 F.2d 660, 664 (3d Cir.1988); In re Jersey City Medical Center, 817 F.2d 1055, 1059 (3d Cir.1987); In re Winthrop Nurseries, Inc., 50 F.3d 72, 73 (1st Cir.1995). "Courts have generally held that the decision regarding whether to convert or dismiss a Chapter 11 bankruptcy case is reviewed only for abuse of discretion." Kates v. Mazzocone (In re: Mazzocone), 180 B.R. 782, 785 (E.D.Pa.1995) (citations omitted). See In re SGL Carbon, 200 F.3d 154 (3d Cir. 1999); Marsch v. Marsch (In re Marsch), 36 F.3d 825, 828 (9th Cir.1994).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Appellant, Jeffrey J. Prosser ("Prosser" or the "Debtor"), commenced this bankruptcy case on July 31, 2006, by filing a voluntary petition for relief under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. (Docket No. 1).[1] On December 19, 2006, his primary creditors, Greenlight Capital Qualified, L.P., Greenlight Capital, L. P., and Greenlight Capital Offshore, Ltd. (collectively, "Greenlight") and Rural Telephone Finance Cooperative (the "RTFC") filed motions under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) seeking conversion of the case to Chapter 7. (Docket Nos. 174 & 178). Following an evidentiary hearing held on January 9, 2007, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order on February 13, 2007 (the "Examiner Order," Docket No. 370) together with a Memorandum Opinion (the "Examiner Opinion," Docket No. 371) denying the motions to convert without prejudice but directing, sua sponte, the appointment of an Examiner to "investigate and report on Prosser's prospects for proposing and confirming a plan." (Examiner Opinion, pp. 34-5). In reaching this decision, the Bankruptcy Court concluded that "[g]rounds for conversion clearly exist[ed]" but that the appointment of an examiner was the preferable alternative for creditors and the bankruptcy estate at that time. (Id., p. 35). On March 12, 2007, the United States Trustee filed a Notice of Appointment of Steven A. Felsenthal to serve as Examiner in the case (Docket No. 415), and on April 5, 2007, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order approving that appointment. (Docket No. 465).

On July 18, 2007, Greenlight filed a renewed motion for conversion of the case to Chapter 7. (Docket No. 684). That motion came before the Bankruptcy Court for a hearing on September 21, 2007 (the "Conversion Hearing"), at which the Examiner recommended that the case be converted. (Docket No. 863, p. 47). See also Examiner's Fourth Interim Report, p.44.[2] The Bankruptcy Court entered its order converting the case to Chapter 7 on October 3, 2007 (the "Conversion Order," Docket No. 865). Prosser filed a Motion to Reconsider that Order on October 5, 2007 (Docket No. 870), and the Bankruptcy Court entered orders denying that motion on November 29, 2007 (Docket No. 1058) and December 5, 2007 (Docket No. 1108). Prosser filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court on December 7, 2007. (Docket No. 1110).

STATEMENT OF FACTS

According to his original and amended bankruptcy schedules filed in this case (Docket Nos. 26 and 359), Prosser's liabilities exceed his assets by over $147 million. His primary source of income from which to fund a Chapter 11 plan consisted of monies received from two corporations, Emerging Communications, Inc. ("EmCom") and Innovative Communication Company, LLC ("ICC, LLC"). As noted by the Bankruptcy Court in the Examiner Opinion, Prosser is the sole owner of ICC, LLC, which in turn owns or controls 100% of the stock of EmCom (52% through direct ownership and the 48% through its ownership of the remaining shareholder, Innovative Communications Subsidiary Company, LLC). EmCom in turn is the sole owner of Innovative Communication Corporation ("New ICC"), which through non-debtor corporations owns a number of USVI cable and telecommunications companies, including Vitelco, the Virgin Islands telephone company, along with the largest daily newspaper in the USVI. (Docket No. 371, pp.2-3). EmCom derives all its revenues from New ICC, and ICC, LLC, derives all of its revenues from EmCom.

[2] The Examiner's Fourth Interim Report was not filed of record in the bankruptcy case but was designated as Item R-93 in the Joint Counter-Designation of Additional Items to be Included in the Record on Appeal filed by Appellees RTFC and Greenlight. It will be referred to hereafter simply as "the Examiner's Report."

EmCom and ICC, LLC filed voluntary petitions for relief under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on the same date that Prosser filed his Chapter 11 petition.[3] Also before the Bankruptcy Court at the January 9, 2007, hearing on the motions to convert filed by Greenlight and the RTFC were motions filed by the United States Trustee seeking the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee in EmCom and ICC, LLC bankruptcy cases. The Bankruptcy Court granted those motions (Examiner Opinion, pp. 14-22),[4] and subsequently approved the appointment of Stanford Springel (the "Trustee") to serve as Chapter 11 trustee in those cases.[5]

On July 6, 2007, the Trustee filed a motion for authorization to vote EmCom's stock in such a manner as to assume operational control over New ICC and its subsidiaries. (Case No. 06-30008, Docket No. 738). At a hearing on that motion held on September 6, 2007, the Trustee offered undisputed testimony that Prosser was "out of the money" in the EmCom and ICC, LLC cases and "was not going to get anything" from the sale of New ICC and its subsidiaries, "no matter what the price ..." (Docket No. 829, p. 123). The Trustee further testified that, notwithstanding Prosser's lack of equity in New ICC and its subsidiaries, he had been receiving a salary in excess of $1.5 million per year from those companies, plus $11,000 per month for expenses, (Docket No. 829, p. 54-5),[6] over a period in which those companies were accruing an indebtedness of at least $10 million to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation for unpaid pension plan contributions. (Docket No. 829, p. 126).

In an effort to satisfy the claims of Greenlight and RTFC, Prosser had negotiated a financing commitment during the pendency of the bankruptcy cases that would have resulted in his owing an initial stake of 70% of the companies without any investment on his part. (Docket No. 828, p. 63). As summarized by the Bankruptcy Court during the hearing on September 7, 2007:

> So, now we have before this Court somebody who negotiated a 70 percent return on an investment without contributing a single dime, not a single dime, for keeping that investment going when he's already out of the money in companies that are returning, apparently, enough of a profit that he can take $50,000 twice a month out of this company to put into his own pocket to support a very nice lifestyle, meanwhile not paying pension liabilities to the tune of $10 million for his employees.

Id. at p. 151.

During the 14-months that this case was pending as a Chapter 11 case prior to the entry of the Conversion Order, Prosser made no progress toward securing confirmation of a Chapter 11 plan of reorganization or liquidation. Although he filed a Joint Plan of Reorganization with ICC, LLC and EmCom on January 8, 2007 (Docket No. 245), he concedes that plan was unconfirmable (Examiner Opinion, p. 27),[7] and he never filed the disclosure statement that is a prerequisite under 11 U.S.C. § 1125 to seeking acceptances of a Chapter 11 plan. Prosser contends in his Brief on appeal that the Conversion Order was entered "less than two days before [he] was going to file a plan of liquidation." (Appellant's Brief, p. 1). However, to this date he has never disclosed, either to the Bankruptcy Court or to this Court, what the terms of such a plan might have been. As shown infra in this Brief, the obstacles to confirmation of any plan of liquidation Prosser might have proposed were both numerous and formidable. The Examiner concluded that Prosser did not have a "reasonable likelihood of confirming a plan of reorganization or liquidation," and that it was in the best interests of the estate, as well as Prosser himself, to convert the case. (Docket No. 863, p. 76)

[7] In addition, the Conversion Order contains a finding, at p. 5, that this plan was unconfirmable.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Bankruptcy courts possess broad discretion when determining whether to dismiss or convert a Chapter 11 case. The court below did not abuse that discretion in this case. In particular, the Bankruptcy Court was authorized by the evidence of record to conclude that 1) Prosser had failed either to schedule a potential claim by the IRS or to provide the IRS with written notice of the bar date in the case, 2) Prosser had failed to cooperate fully with the Examiner in providing access to his books and records, including bank account records, 3) Prosser had failed to demonstrate that he had the ability to propose a confirmable plan of liquidation, and 4) 1) the cost of litigation would be substantially greater in Chapter 11 than in Chapter 7.

ARGUMENT

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN CONVERTING THE CASE TO CHAPTER 7.

A. Legal Standards Governing Conversion.

"The bankruptcy court has broad discretion in deciding whether to dismiss or convert a Chapter 11 case." *In re Lumber Exchange Bldg. Ltd. "This standard of review is supported by the legislative history of 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b); the applicable House and Senate reports both state that this section was intended to give 'wide discretion to the court to make an appropriate disposition of the case' and to allow the court 'to use its equitable powers to reach an appropriate result in individual cases.' The statutory requisite for dismissal or conversion of a Chapter 11 case based on a motion by a party other than the debtor is set forth at 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)(1), as follows:

B. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Commit Clear Error in Finding That Cause to Convert Existed under Section 1112(b) of the Bankruptcy Code.

"Pursuant to Rule 8013 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, on appeal, findings of fact by the bankruptcy court are set aside if clearly erroneous." Schlumberger Resource Management Svcs. v. Cellnet Data Systems (In re CellNet Data Systems, Inc.), 327 F.3d 242, 244 (3d Cir.2003). See also Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Dykes (In re Dykes), 10 F.3d 184, 185 (3d Cir.1993). "The decision to convert the case to Chapter 7 is within the bankruptcy court's discretion [and] ...will be reversed only if based on an erroneous conclusion of law or when the record contains no evidence on which [the bankruptcy court] rationally could have based that decision." Pioneer Liquidating Corporation v. U.S. Trustee (In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortg. Entities), 264 F.3d 803, 806-7 (9th Cir.2001) (Citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

As a debtor in possession, Prosser had a fiduciary obligation to place the economic interests of creditors above his own. See Integrated Solutions, Inc. v. Service Support Specialties, Inc., 124 F.3d 487, 498 (3d Cir.1997) ("So long as the debtor remains in possession, [he] bears essentially the same fiduciary obligation to the creditors as does the trustee for the debtor out of possession."). The evidence of record in this case shows that he violated this fiduciary obligation by continuing to pay himself over $1.5 million per year from the revenues of New ICC and its subsidiaries while those companies were accruing over $10 million in liabilities for unpaid contributions to their employ pension plans. Furthermore, Prosser made no showing that he had the ability to propose a confirmable Chapter 11 plan. The evidence of record in this case amply supports the Bankruptcy Court's decision to convert the case to Chapter 7.

In his brief on appeal, Prosser focuses on four specific findings that he contends were not supported by the evidence.

1. The Bankruptcy Court did not base its ruling on an erroneous finding regarding whether the IRS had a claim in the case.

The Bankruptcy Court accurately observed in the Conversion Order that the Bankruptcy Code requires a debtor to list all claims, including contingent claims, that Prosser failed to schedule the IRS as a creditor, and that, according to the case docket, he also failed to provide the IRS with proper notice of the claims bar date "in the event [it] has a claim." None of these findings or conclusions is subject to reasonable dispute. The Examiner reported that Prosser had received substantial sums of money from New ICC in the form of loans which New ICC "never expected him to repay" but had neither scheduled these receipts as claims on his bankruptcy schedules nor reported them as income on his income tax returns. In the Examiner Opinion, the Court observed that "[t]he audited consolidated financial statements show 'net advances' to Prosser of approximately $13 million in 2005 and 2004 and of over $14 million in 2003, at a time when Prosser was personally indebted to New ICC in an amount in excess of $156 million." (Docket No. 371, p. 25) (footnotes omitted).[10] It is no surprise under these circumstances that the Examiner anticipated that "the Internal Revenue Service may have a substantial claim in the Debtor's bankruptcy." (Examiner's Report, p. 10). Prosser does not contend that the IRS has no basis upon which to assert a claim but asserts that there is "no basis to assume that the IRS will file a claim in the next several weeks." Brief of Appellant, p.9. Whether and to what extent the IRS may ultimately assert a claim in the case, however, is not the issue upon which the Court was focusing in the Conversion order. Rather, the point the Court was presumably making with regard to the potential IRS claim was that Prosser had displayed a lack of candor unbefitting a debtor in possession case by failing either to schedule such a claim or to provide the IRS with a written bar date notice. That this is the case is not open to question.

[10] The Examiner reported that '[f]rom 1998 through 2005, New ICC loaned an aggregate amount of $156,612,000 to the Debtor and ICC LLC, which is a single member limited liability company owned by the Debtor." (Examiner's Report, p. 13) (footnote omitted).

2. The Record Fully Documents Prosser's Lack of Co-Operation with the Examiner.

The duties of the Examiner as specified by the Bankruptcy Court in the Examiner Opinion were "to investigate the income and expenses claimed and to prepare a report on the reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation." (Docket No. 371, p. 29). In this regard, the Examiner Order specifically ordered Prosser to cooperate with the examiner. (Docket No. 372, p. 2). The issue of Prosser's cooperation with the Examiner subsequently arose at a hearing held on May 16, 2007, at which time the Bankruptcy Court set a two-week deadline for Prosser to provide the Examiner certain information. (Docket No. 593, pp. 49-50). Notwithstanding these directives, and notwithstanding Prosser's role as a fiduciary for creditors, the Examiner found it necessary to seek an order compelling Prosser to provide him with the information in question. On June 20, 2007, the Examiner filed a "Motion to Compel Debtor to Provide Examiner Access to Certain Personnel and Records" (the "Motion to Compel," Docket No. 627), alleging that despite his continued efforts to schedule a time to review Prosser's accounting and business records and those of his various business entities, including New ICC and its subsidiaries, Prosser had failed to make these records available to him. Prosser's response was to oppose the motion. (Docket No. 656). In a response to that opposition filed on July 6, 2007, the Trustee in the corporate cases asserted that Prosser had likewise failed to provide him with requested information. (Docket No. 666, ¶ 3).

On August 3, 2007, the Court entered an order granting the Motion to Compel and directing Prosser to provide the Examiner and his professionals "immediate, full complete and unfettered access to any and all [of his] personnel, books, records, documents and accounts, including bank accounts" and those of any entities or organizations in which he had any interest or exercised any influence or control." (Docket No. 729, p. 1) In the Conversion Order, the Court found that > as of the hearing on September 21, 2007, Debtor still had not released to the Examiner his personal checking account statement and had not requested, or only recently requested, records from his bank and, although information was sought for a time period of 10 years, no effort was made by Debtor to provide recent information.

(Docket No. 865, p. 5) (emphasis supplied).

While Prosser maintains in his brief on appeal that he has "cooperated fully with the Trustee and Examiner" and that "[t]he record is replete with examples of [such] cooperation," he has cited no examples of such cooperation. Further, his cooperation in providing some requested information does not excuse his failure to provide other information requested by the Examiner. The Court's statement regarding the requested bank records was obviously not directed to Prosser's delay in providing the Examiner with records for the past 10 years but rather to his delay in providing "recent information." The Debtor has offered this Court no basis upon which to question the Bankruptcy Court's finding that "no effort was made by Debtor to provide [such] information."

3. Prosser Failed Utterly to Demonstrate that He Has the Ability to Propose a Confirmable Plan of Liquidation.

Prosser asserts at page 1 of his brief on appeal that the Bankruptcy Court entered the Conversion Order "less than two days before [he] was going to file a plan of liquidation." However, he has never provided the Bankruptcy Court with any summary of the terms of this plan, nor has he provided this Court with any clue to as to what the terms of this plan might have been.

The obstacles to confirmation of any such plan are clearly formidable. In his analysis of the Prosser's prospects for securing confirmation of a plan of liquidation pursuant to the "cramdown" procedure available under 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b)(2)(B), the Examiner noted that because Greenlight and RTFC would control the unsecured creditor class and because they have announced their unwillingness to support any plan proposed by Prosser, Prosser would have to obtain the consenting vote of an impaired class consisting of a secured creditor in order to comply with 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(10).[11] The Examiner questioned Prosser's ability to do this because his secured creditors appeared to be "adequately collateralized" and therefore entitled to full payment of their claims, rendering them unimpaired. (Examiner's Report, pp. 34-8). Further, even assuming Prosser could obtain acceptance by an impaired class, the Examiner concluded that he could not meet the "best interest of creditors" requirement established by 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(7)(A)[12] without liquidating certain property that he had expressed an unwillingness to part with. (Id. at pp. 38-9). Confirmation of any plan proposed by the Debtor would also have raised the issue of how to estimate his "projected disposable income" over the 5-year period beginning on the date the first payment was due under the plan, so as to determine the amount of plan payments needed to satisfy 11 U.S.C.

[11] Under 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(10), a plan can be confirmed only if "at least one class of claims that is impaired under the plan has accepted the plan, determined without including any acceptance of the plan by any insider."

[12] Section 1129(a)(7)(A) specifies that a plan can be confirmed only if, with respect to each impaired class of claims or interests –

> each holder of a claim or interest of such class –
> (i) has accepted the plan; or
> (ii) will receive or retain under the plan on account of such claim or interest property of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, that is not less than the amount that such holder would so receive or retain if the debtor were liquidated under chapter 7 of this title on such date ...

§ 1129(a)(15).[13] As noted by the Bankruptcy Court at pages 3 &4 of the Conversion Order, the Trustee for the corporate debtors had terminated Prosser's employment with New ICC,[14] rendering any estimate of his projected disposable income over the next five years a speculative endeavor at best.[15] Finally, the Court was entirely correct in its observation that, although Prosser admitted his

[13] Section 1129(a)(15) establishes the following requirement for confirmation of a Chapter 11 plan:

> In a case in which the debtor is an individual and in which the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan –
> (A) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or
> (B) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan is not less than the projected disposable income of the debtor (as defined in section 1325 (b)(2)) to be received during the 5-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan, or during the period for which the plan provides payments, whichever is longer.

[14] On September 7, 2007, the Court entered an order in the ICC, LLC bankruptcy case (Case No. 06-30008, Docket No. 870) authorizing the Trustee to vote EmCom's shares of stock in New ICC to remove the directors and officers of New ICC and take any related corporate action necessary to transfer exercise control over that corporation. On October 3, 2007, the Bankruptcy Court directed the appointment of a trustee in New ICC's own Chapter 11 case, In re: Innovative Communication Corporation, Case No. 07-30012 (Docket No. 112), and on October 4, 2007, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order approving the appointment of Stanford Springel as Chapter 11 trustee in that case, as well.

[15] In this regard, Prosser's counsel engaged in the following colloquy with the Court during the Conversion Hearing:

> THE COURT: But unless he's going to pay – well, I mean the test isn't that clear, but in all probability he's going to have to commit his post-petition earnings for five years to this plan. That's what –
> MR. CRAIG: Sure.
> THE COURT: Okay, so what are those earnings going to be? What are they coming from?
> MR. CRAIG: He may not have any, Your Honor.
> THE COURT: Well, then he's not too likely to confirm a plan.
> MR. CRAIG: Well, sure he can.
> THE COURT: I don't think so.
> MR. CRAIG: And, Your Honor, he has to be able to allocate whatever -- wife would have to contribute her interest in their jointly owned property in order for a plan to succeed, there was no evidence of any agreement by his wife to do so. (Docket No. 865, p. 3). Even assuming the correctness of Prosser's assertion that his wife was willing to participate in the sale of their jointly owned property, such willingness does not equate to an agreement to contribute her portion of the proceeds from a sale to fund his hypothetical Chapter 11 plan.

By the time the Bankruptcy Court entered the Conversion Order on October 3, 2007, over fourteen months had transpired since Prosser filed his petition for relief under Chapter 11. Prosser had the right, if he chose to do so, to file a plan of reorganization and disclosure statement at any time during the fourteen months the case was pending in Chapter 11. As previously indicated, Prosser filed a joint plan with ICC, LLC and EmCom on January 8, 2007, but failed to file a disclosure statement (Examiner Opinion, p. 16, Conversion Order, p. 6), and the Bankruptcy Court found the plan to be unconfirmable as a matter of law (Conversion Order, p. 6). The Court found that "[g]rounds for conversion clearly exist[ed]" as early as February 13, 2007, when the Examiner Opinion was entered. (Docket No. 371, p. 35). Over six months passed between the entry of the Examiner Order and the entry of the Conversion Order, during which Prosser could have filed a new Chapter 11 plan, along with a disclosure statement, yet he again failed to do so.

> whatever his net disposal income is. And, Your Honor, the cases -- there aren't very many on this issue yet, but there are situations where it's acknowledged that may be a negative number, and if it is a negative number, the financial standard to be met is (a)(7), liquidation value. Okay?
> THE COURT: I understand. We're talking about a gentleman who, even though my math likes to put him into multiple millions of dollars improperly, still makes a million to a year before all of this issue with the Trustee happened has an earning potential, which I still believe the courts will be looking at in Chapter 11 for the five years post-petition, that is very high.

(Docket No. 863, pp. 58-9.

The Court was clearly authorized to conclude from the evidence of record in this case that Prosser could not propose a confirmable plan of liquidation, with the result that there was "no likelihood of a reasonable prospect of rehabilitation of [his] financial affairs in a Chapter 11." (Conversion Order, p. 6).

4. The cost of litigation would be greater in Chapter 11 than in Chapter 7.

Prosser's two major creditors, RTFC and Greenlight, have made it clear that they will not support any plan proposed by him, and Prosser does not dispute that the only manner in which he could obtain confirmation of a plan would be pursuant to the "cram down," provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b). The correctness of the Examiner's conclusion that "any attempt by the Debtor to cramdown a plan would be rife with difficulties and costly to the estate" (Examiner's Report, p. 32) is not reasonably open to question. Among the issues that would have to be litigated in such a scenario would be Prosser's ability to create an accepting class to satisfy 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(10),[16] whether the payments to non-accepting classes were at least equivalent to what such creditors would receive in a Chapter 7 liquidation,[17] whether Prosser was committing all of his projected disposable income to the plan so as to satisfy 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(15),[18] and whether he had satisfied the pre-confirmation disclosure requirements established by 11 U.S.C. § 1125. Prosser's counsel freely acknowledged that an attempt by Prosser to confirm a plan would entail litigation, stating, > there's some other requirements under 1129, and when we get to confirmation, we'll have to fight over those ... We're just saying we will file that plan. There will be objections. We > will have some debates, and Your Honor will resolve that. If it doesn't get confirmed, you can convert.

(Docket No. 863, pp. 52-3).

The Bankruptcy Court clearly did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the avoidance of such litigation was in the best interest of the bankruptcy estate and its creditors.

CONCLUSION

"'[A]n abuse of discretion exists where the district court's decision rests upon a clearly erroneous finding of fact, an errant conclusion of law, or an improper application of law to fact.' In re SGL Carbon Corp., 200 F.3d [154], at 159 [(3d Cir.1999)] (quoting ACLU v. Black Horse Pike Reg'l Bd. of Ed., 84 F.3d 1471, 1476 (3d Cir.1996))." In re Integrated Telecom Express, Inc., 384 F.3d 108, 118 (3d Cir.2004). It is clear that the Bankruptcy Court's decision to convert this case from Chapter 11 to Chapter 7 was not predicated on any clearly erroneous finding of fact, errant conclusion of law, or improper application of law to fact. Any one of the numerous reasons articulated in the Conversion Order was sufficient by itself to support the decision to convert the case. For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully requests the Court to enter an order affirming the Bankruptcy Court's order.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This is an appeal from an order of the District Court of the Virgin Islands affirming a decision of that Court's Bankruptcy Division. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(d)(1) and 1291.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES

Did the District Court err by affirming the Bankruptcy Division's order converting the Appellant's bankruptcy case from chapter 11 to chapter 7, when that order was based on findings of fact supported by ample evidence in the record?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Appellant, Jeffrey J. Prosser ("Prosser," the "Debtor," or the "Appellant"), filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on July 31, 2006, in the Bankruptcy Division of the District Court of the Virgin Islands, Division of St. Thomas and St. John. (JA-13, Vol.2, p. 380).[1] On December 19, 2006, his primary creditors, Greenlight Capital Qualified, L.P., Greenlight Capital, L.P., and Greenlight Capital Offshore, Ltd. (collectively, "Greenlight") and Rural Telephone Finance Cooperative (the "RTFC") filed motions under 11 U.S.C.

§ 1112(b) seeking conversion of the case to chapter 7. (JA-27, Vol.3, p. 864 and JA-30, Vol.3, p. 922, respectively). Following an evidentiary hearing held on January 9, 2007, the Bankruptcy Division entered a Memorandum Opinion (the "Examiner Opinion," JA-60, Vol.6, pp. 2524) and Order (the "Examiner Order," (JA-61, Vol.6, p. 2560) on February 13, 2007, denying the motions to convert without prejudice but directing, sua sponte, the appointment of an Examiner to "investigate and report on Prosser's prospects for proposing and confirming a plan." (Examiner Opinion, pp. 34-5; JA-60, Vol.6, p. 2557-8). In reaching this decision, the Bankruptcy Division concluded that "[g]rounds for conversion clearly exist[ed]" but that the appointment of an examiner was the preferable alternative at that time for creditors and the bankruptcy estate. Id. at p. 35, 2558. On March 12, 2007, the United States Trustee filed a Notice of Appointment of Steven A. Felsenthal to serve as Examiner in the case (JA-65, Vol.6, p. 2651), and on April 5, 2007, the Bankruptcy Division entered an order approving that appointment. (JA-71, Vol.6, p. 2906).

On July 18, 2007, Greenlight filed a renewed motion for conversion of the case to chapter 7. (JA-86, Vol.8, p. 3602). That motion came before the Bankruptcy Division for a hearing on September 21, 2007 (the "Conversion Hearing"), at which the Examiner recommended unequivocally that the case be converted. (JA-122, Vol.10, pp. 4907-08). See also Examiner's Fourth Interim Report, p.44; JA-103, Vol.9, p.4107).[2] The Bankruptcy Division entered its order converting the case to chapter 7 on October 3, 2007 (the "Conversion Order," JA-123, Vol. 10, p. 4925). Prosser filed a Motion to Reconsider the Conversion Order on October 5, 2007 (JA-125, Vol.10, p. 4935), and the Bankruptcy Division entered orders denying that motion on November 29, 2007 (JA-148, Vol.13, p. 6061) and December 5, 2007 (JA-150, Vol.13, p. 6224). Prosser filed a notice of appeal to the District Court on December 7, 2007, (JA-151, Vol.13, p. 6225), and on June 6, 2008, the District Court entered a Memorandum Opinion (JA-181, Vol.14, p. 6823) and Order (JA-182, Vol.14, p. 6833) affirming the orders of the Bankruptcy Division. Prosser filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court on June 9, 2008. (JA-183, Vol.14, p. 6836).

STATEMENT OF FACTS

According to his original and amended bankruptcy schedules filed in this case (JA-16, Vol.2, p. 555 and JA-58, Vol.6, p. 2374, respectively), Prosser's liabilities exceed his assets by over $147 million. At the time he commenced his bankruptcy case, Prosser's primary source of income consisted of monies received from two corporations, Innovative Communication Company, LLC ("ICC, LLC") and Emerging Communications, Inc. ("EmCom"). As noted in the Examiner Opinion, Prosser is the sole owner of ICC, LLC, which in turn owns or controls 100% of the stock of EmCom (52% through direct ownership and the 48% through ownership of the remaining shareholder, Innovative Communications Subsidiary Company, LLC) (Examiner Opinion, p.2; JA-60, Vol.6, p. 2525). EmCom, in turn, is the sole owner of Innovative Communication Corporation ("New ICC"), which through non-debtor corporations owns a number of USVI cable and telecommunications companies, including Vitelco, the Virgin Islands telephone company, and the largest daily newspaper in the USVI. Id. at pp. 2-3, 2525-6. EmCom derives all its revenues from New ICC, and ICC, LLC, derives all of its revenues from EmCom. Id.

[2] The Examiner's Fourth Interim Report was not filed of record in the Bankruptcy Division but was before the Bankruptcy Division at the Conversion Hearing (see Conversion Hearing Transcript, pp. 46-7; JA-122, Vol.10, pp. 4878-9) and was included in the record before the District Court as Item R-93 of Joint Counter-Designation of Additional Items to be Included in the Record on Appeal filed by Appellees RTFC and Greenlight. It is before this Court as JA-103, Vol 9, p. 4107, and will be referred to hereafter as "the Examiner's Report."

EmCom and ICC, LLC filed voluntary petitions for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on the same date that Prosser filed his chapter 11 petition.[3] Also before the Bankruptcy Division at the January 9, 2007, hearing on the initial motions to convert filed by Greenlight and the RTFC were motions filed by the United States Trustee seeking the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee in the EmCom and ICC, LLC bankruptcy cases (the "Corporate Cases"). The Bankruptcy Division granted those motions (Examiner Opinion, pp. 14-22; JA-60, Vol.6, pp. 2537-45),[4] and subsequently approved the appointment of Stanford Springel (the "Trustee") to serve as chapter 11 trustee in those cases. (JA-67, Vol.6, p. 2718).

At a hearing held on September 6, 2007, on a motion by the Trustee for authorization to vote EmCom's stock in such a manner as to assume operational control over New ICC and its subsidiaries, the Trustee offered undisputed testimony that Prosser was "out of the money" in the EmCom and ICC, LLC cases and "was not going to get anything" from the sale of New ICC and its subsidiaries "no matter what the price ..." (9/6/07 Transcript, p.123; JA-107, Vol.10, p.4520). The Trustee further testified that, notwithstanding Prosser's lack of equity in New ICC and its subsidiaries, he had been receiving a salary in excess of $1.5 million per year from those companies, plus $11,000 per month for expenses, Id. at pp. 54-5, 4451-2,[5] over a period in which those companies were accruing millions of dollars of liability to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation for unpaid pension plan contributions. Id. at pp.125-6, 4522-3.

In an effort to satisfy the claims of Greenlight and RTFC, Prosser negotiated a financing commitment during the pendency of the bankruptcy cases that would have resulted in his owning an initial stake of 70% of the companies without any investment on his part. (9/7/07 Transcript, p.63; JA-106, Vol.9, p.4243). As summarized by the Bankruptcy Division during the hearing on September 7, 2007:

> So, now we have before this Court somebody who negotiated a 70 percent return on an investment without contributing a single dime, not a single dime, for keeping that investment going when he's already out of the money in companies that are returning, apparently, enough of a profit that he can take $50,000 twice a month out of this company to put into his own pocket to support a very nice lifestyle, meanwhile not paying pension liabilities to the tune of $10 million for his employees.

Id. at p. 151, 4331.

During the more than 14 months this case was pending as a chapter 11 case prior to the entry of the Conversion Order, Prosser made no progress toward securing confirmation of a chapter 11 plan of reorganization or liquidation. Although he filed a Joint Plan of Reorganization with ICC, LLC and EmCom on January 8, 2007, he conceded that plan was unconfirmable (Examiner Opinion, p. 27; JA-60, Vol.6, p.2550),[6] and he never filed the disclosure statement that is a prerequisite under 11 U.S.C. § 1125 to seeking acceptances of a chapter 11 plan. (Conversion Order, p.5; JA-123, Vol.10, p.4929). Furthermore, Prosser has never disclosed to the Bankruptcy

---

[6] In addition, the Conversion Order contains a finding, at p. 5, that this plan was unconfirmable. (JA-123, Vol.10, p.4929)

Division, the District Court, or this Court what the terms of a confirmable chapter 11 plan would be if he proposed one. During the Conversion Hearing, Prosser's counsel stated: "We just ask for another couple of weeks to file the plan, and then we can get into the substance of all these issues that they want to raise." (Conversion Hearing Transcript, p.81; JA-122, Vol.10, p.4193). The Court responded that nothing had prevented Prosser from "putting a plan on the table" prior to the hearing and added: "[T]hat's the problem. It's always ... a day late and a dollar short." Id. at p.82, 4914. The Examiner concluded that Prosser did not have a "reasonable likelihood of confirming a plan of reorganization or liquidation" (Examiner's Report, p.43; JA-103, Vol.9, p.4149) and that it was in the best interests of the bankruptcy estate, as well as Prosser himself, to convert the case. (Conversion Hearing Transcript, p.76; JA-122, Vol.10, p. 4908).

The primary reason articulated by the Bankruptcy Division for its decision to convert the case was that the case was "over 14 months old and there is no likelihood of a reasonable prospect of rehabilitation of Debtor's financial affairs in a Chapter 11." (Conversion Order, p.6; JA-123, Vol.10, p.6). In addition, the Court articulated several other factors that militated in favor of conversion, including that 1) the cost of litigation would be less in a chapter 7 because "in light of the acrimony between the RTFC and Greenlight on the one hand and Debtor on the other, a Chapter 7 Trustee as an independent fiduciary will be better able to assess what is in the best interest of the estate," Id. at p.3, 4927; 2) although Prosser conceded that it would be necessary to have his wife's agreement and cooperation in order to confirm a plan and sell assets, there was no showing that her agreement would or could be obtained, Id.; 3) there was information of record indicating that the IRS "may have a claim," yet Prosser had failed either to list the IRS as a creditor or to provide it with notice of the claims bar date, Id. at p.4, 4928; and 4) although he had been ordered to provide the Examiner and the Trustee with "immediate, full, complete and unfettered access" to his financial records, including bank account records, Prosser "still had not released to the Examiner his personal checking account statement and had not requested, or only recently requested, records from his bank." Id. at 5, 4929.

On appeal to the District Court, Prosser contended that the record did not support any of the latter four findings. The District Court examined two of the findings – that there was no showing of any agreement by his wife to cooperate and that he had not complied with the order to make his financial records available to the Examiner – and found support in the record for both of them. (District Court Memorandum Opinion, pp. 8-9; JA-181, Vol.14, pp.6830-1). The Court concluded that "[i]n light of the entire record, the Court ... did not abuse its discretion in converting this case from a Chapter 11 to a Chapter 7 proceeding." Id. at 10, 6832.

APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

In an appeal from an order entered by a bankruptcy court, the appellate court, whether it be the district court or the court of appeals on appeal from the district court, applies a clearly erroneous standard to the bankruptcy court's findings of fact and conducts a de novo review of conclusions of law. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013; Resyn Corp. v. United States, 851 F.2d 660, 664 (3d Cir.1988); In re Jersey City Medical Center, 817 F.2d 1055, 1059 (3d Cir.1987); In re Winstar Communications, Inc., 554 F.3d 382, 400 (3rd Cir. 2009); In re Winthrop Nurseries, Inc., 50 F.3d 72, 73 (1st Cir.1995). "Courts have generally held that the decision regarding whether to convert or dismiss a Chapter 11 bankruptcy case is reviewed only for abuse of discretion." Kates v. Mazzocone (In re Mazzocone), 180 B.R. 782, 785 (E.D.Pa.1995) (citations omitted). See also In re SGL Carbon, 200 F.3d 154 (3d Cir. 1999); *Marsch v. SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT Bankruptcy courts possess broad discretion when determining whether to dismiss or convert a chapter 11 case. The Bankruptcy Division did not abuse that discretion in this case. In particular, the evidence of record supported the Bankruptcy Division's conclusions that 1) Prosser had failed either to schedule a potential IRS claim or to provide the IRS with written notice of the bar date in the case, 2) Prosser had failed to cooperate fully with the Examiner in providing access to his books and records, including bank account records, 3) Prosser had failed to demonstrate that he had the ability to propose a confirmable plan of liquidation, and 4) the cost of litigation would be substantially greater in chapter 11 than in chapter 7.

ARGUMENT

THE BANKRUPTCY DIVISION DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN CONVERTING THE CASE TO CHAPTER 7.

A. Legal Standards Governing Conversion.

The bankruptcy court has broad discretion in deciding whether to enter an order dismissing or converting a Chapter 11 case. *In re Lumber Exchange Bldg. Ltd. The statutory requisite for dismissal or conversion of a chapter 11 case based on a motion by a party other than the debtor is set forth at 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)(1), as follows:

B. The Bankruptcy Division Did Not Commit Clear Error in Finding That Cause to Convert Existed under Section 1112(b) of the Bankruptcy Code.

Cellnet Data Systems (In re CellNet Data Systems, Inc.)*, 327 F.3d 242, 244 (3d Cir. 2003). See also Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Dykes (In re Dykes), 10 F.3d 184, 185 (3d Cir.1993). "The decision to convert the case to Chapter 7 is within the bankruptcy court's discretion [and] ...will be reversed only if based on an erroneous conclusion of law or when the record contains no evidence on which [the bankruptcy court] rationally could have based that decision." Pioneer Liquidating Corporation v. U.S. Trustee (In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortg. Entities), 264 F.3d 803, 806-7 (9th Cir.2001) (Citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

As a debtor in possession, Prosser had a fiduciary obligation to place the economic interests of creditors above his own. See Integrated Solutions, Inc. v. Service Support Specialties, Inc., 124 F.3d 487, 498 (3d Cir.1997) ("So long as the debtor remains in possession, [he] bears essentially the same fiduciary obligation to the creditors as does the trustee for the debtor out of possession."). As set forth in the Statement of Facts, supra, the evidence of record in this case shows that he violated this fiduciary obligation by continuing to pay himself over $1.5 million per year from the revenues of New ICC and its subsidiaries during a period when the unfunded pension liabilities of those companies were growing to in excess of $10 million. Furthermore, Prosser never filed a confirmable chapter 11 plan, nor has he otherwise disclosed what the terms of such a plan would be. The evidence of record in this case amply supports the Bankruptcy Division's decision to convert the case to chapter 7.

As he did in the District Court, Prosser focuses in his brief on appeal to this Court on four findings that he contends were not supported by the evidence.

1. The Bankruptcy Division did not base its ruling on an erroneous finding regarding whether the IRS had a claim in the case.

The Bankruptcy Division accurately observed in the Conversion Order that the Bankruptcy Code requires a debtor to list all claims, including contingent claims, yet

Prosser had failed to schedule the IRS as a creditor and, according to the case docket, had failed to provide the IRS with proper notice of the claims bar date "in the event that [it] has a claim." (Conversion Order, p. 4; JA-123, Vol.10, p.4928). These findings or conclusions are not subject to reasonable dispute. The Examiner reported that Prosser had received substantial sums of money from New ICC in the form of loans which New ICC "never expected him to repay" (Examiner's Report, p.18; JA-103, Vol.9, p.4124), but that he had neither scheduled these receipts as claims on his bankruptcy schedules, Id. at p.16, 4122, nor reported them as income on his income tax returns. Id. at pp.17-8, 4123-4.[9] In the Examiner Opinion, the Bankruptcy Division observed that "[t]he audited consolidated financial statements show 'net advances' to Prosser of approximately $13 million in 2005 and 2004 and of over $14 million in 2003, at a time when Prosser was personally indebted to New ICC in an amount in excess of $156 million." (Examiner Opinion, p. 25; JA-60, Vol.6, p.2548) (footnotes omitted). It is no surprise under these circumstances that the Examiner anticipated that "the Internal Revenue Service may have a substantial claim in the Debtor's bankruptcy." (Examiner's Report, p. 10; JA-103, Vol.9, p.4116).

[9] The Examiner reported that "[f]rom 1998 through 2005, New ICC loaned an aggregate amount of $156,612,000 to the Debtor and ICC LLC, which is a single member limited liability company owned by the Debtor." (Examiner's Report, p. 13; JA-103, Vo.9, p.4119) (footnote omitted).

At page 14 of his brief on appeal, Prosser characterizes the Examiner's analysis of his potential income tax liability as "unsupported, unwarranted and careless speculation." Clearly, however, the Examiner articulated a detailed, well-grounded and convincing basis upon which Prosser could be assessed substantial tax liability for unreported income. Whether and/or to what extent such a claim is ultimately allowed is entirely beside the point. The point is that by failing to recognize this potential claim in his bankruptcy schedules and failing to serve the IRS with a written bar date notice, Prosser displayed a lack of candor inconsistent with his fiduciary responsibility to his creditors as a debtor in possession.

2. The record fully documents Prosser's lack of cooperation with the Examiner.

The duties of the Examiner in this case, as specified by the Bankruptcy Division in the Examiner Opinion, were "to investigate the income and expenses claimed and to prepare a report on the reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation." (Examiner Opinion, p.29; JA-60,Vol.6, p.2552). The Examiner Order specifically ordered Prosser to cooperate with the Examiner in this regard. (Examiner Order, p.2; JA-60, Vol.6, p.2561). The issue of Prosser's cooperation with the Examiner subsequently arose at a hearing held on May 16, 2007, at which time the Bankruptcy Division set a two-week deadline for Prosser to provide the Examiner certain information. (5/16/07 Transcript, pp.49-50; JA-77, Vol.7, pp.3066-7). Notwithstanding these directives, and notwithstanding Prosser's role as a fiduciary for creditors, the Examiner found it necessary to seek an order compelling Prosser to provide him with the information in question. On June 20, 2007, the Examiner filed a "Motion to Compel Debtor to Provide Examiner Access to Certain Personnel and Records" (the "Motion to Compel," JA-80, Vol.7, p.3301), alleging that despite his continued efforts to schedule a time to review Prosser's accounting and business records and those of his various business entities, including New ICC and its subsidiaries, Prosser had failed to make these records available to him. In a response to Prosser's opposition to that motion, the Trustee in the Corporate Cases asserted that Prosser had likewise failed to provide him with requested information. (JA-85, Vol.8, p.3592, ¶3).

On August 3, 2007, the Court entered an order granting the Motion to Compel and directing Prosser to provide the Examiner "immediate, full complete and unfettered access to any and all [of his] personnel, books, records, documents and accounts, including bank accounts" and those of any entities or organizations in which he had any interest or exercised any influence or control. (JA-93, Vol.8, p.3819). The Bankruptcy Division found in the Conversion Order that > as of the hearing on September 21, 2007, Debtor still had not released to the Examiner his personal checking account statement and had not requested, or only recently requested, records from his bank and, although information was sought for a time period of 10 years, no effort was made by Debtor to provide recent information.

(Conversion Order, p.5; JA-123, Vol.10, p.4929) (emphasis supplied).

While Prosser maintains in his brief on appeal that he has "cooperated fully with the Trustee and Examiner" and that "[t]he record is replete with examples of [such] cooperation," he has cited to nothing in the record that is inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Division's conclusions to the contrary. His asserted cooperation in providing some requested information obviously does not excuse his failure to provide other information requested by the Examiner. As a debtor in possession, Prosser was not entitled to pick and choose what information he made available to the Examiner or his creditors. The Court's statement regarding the requested bank records was not directed to Prosser's delay in providing the Examiner with records for the past 10 years, as suggested in his brief, but to his delay in providing "recent information." The evidence of record amply supports the Bankruptcy Division's finding that Prosser made no effort to provide such information.

3. Prosser failed utterly to demonstrate that he has the ability to propose a confirmable plan of liquidation.

As noted in the Statement of Facts, supra, Prosser had ample opportunity to propose a chapter 11 plan prior to the entry of the Conversion Order but never did so. The obstacles to confirmation of any such plan would clearly have been formidable. In his analysis of Prosser's prospects for securing confirmation of a plan of liquidation pursuant to the "cramdown" option available under 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b)(2)(B), the Examiner noted that because Greenlight and RTFC would control the unsecured creditor class and because they had announced their unwillingness to support any plan proposed by Prosser, Prosser would have to obtain the consenting vote of an impaired class consisting of a secured creditor in order to comply with 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(10).[10] (Examiner's Report, pp.34-5; JA-103, Vol.9, pp.4140-41). The Examiner questioned Prosser's ability to do this, stating that his secured creditors appeared to be "adequately collateralized" and that, "[a]lthough it is conceivable that one or more of [them] may be impaired by a Debtor plan, the Debtor has not sufficiently explained why his secured creditors would not be paid in full pursuant to the terms of their loan and security instruments." Id. at pp.35-6, 4141-2. Further, even assuming Prosser could obtain acceptance by an impaired class, the Examiner concluded that he could not meet the "best interest of creditors" requirement established by 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(7)(A)[11] without liquidating certain property that

[10] Under 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(10), a plan can be confirmed only if "at least one class of claims that is impaired under the plan has accepted the plan, determined without including any acceptance of the plan by any insider."

[11] Section 1129(a)(7)(A) specifies that a plan can be confirmed only if, with respect to each impaired class of claims or interests –

> each holder of a claim or interest of such class –
> (i) has accepted the plan; or
> (ii) will receive or retain under the plan on account of such claim or interest property of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, that is not less than the amount that such holder would so receive or retain he had expressed a lack of willingness to part with. Id. at pp. 38-9, 4141-5. Confirmation of any plan proposed by the Debtor would also have raised the issue of how to estimate his "projected disposable income" over the five year period beginning on the date the first payment was due under the plan, so as to determine the amount of plan payments needed to satisfy 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(15).[12] As the Bankruptcy Division noted in the Conversion Order, the Trustee for the Corporate Debtors had terminated Prosser's employment with New ICC (Conversion Order, pp.3-4; JA-123, Vol.10, pp.4927-8),[13] rendering any estimate of his projected disposable income over > if the debtor were liquidated under chapter 7 of this title on such date

> ...

[12] Section 1129(a)(15) establishes the following requirement for confirmation of a chapter 11 plan:

> In a case in which the debtor is an individual and in which the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan –
> (A) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or
> (B) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan is not less than the projected disposable income of the debtor (as defined in section 1325 (b)(2)) to be received during the 5-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan, or during the period for which the plan provides payments, whichever is longer.

[13] On September 7, 2007, the Court entered an order in the ICC, LLC chapter 11 case (Case No. 06-30008, JA-104, Vol.9, p.4148) authorizing the Trustee to vote EmCom's shares of stock in New ICC to corporate action necessary to exercise control over that corporation. On October 3, 2007, the Bankruptcy Division directed the appointment of a trustee in New ICC's own chapter 11 case, In re:

the next five years a speculative endeavor at best.[14] Finally, the Court was entirely correct in its observation that, while conceding that his wife would have to contribute her interest in their jointly owned property in order for a plan to succeed, Prosser had produced no evidence of any agreement on her part to do so. (Conversion Order, p.3; JA-123, Vol.10, p.4927). Prosser's assertion at page 21 of his brief on appeal that his Innovative Communication Corporation, Case No. 07-30012 (JA-124, Vol.10, p.4933), and the Bankruptcy Division subsequently entered an order approving the appointment of Stanford Springel as chapter 11 trustee in that case, as well.

[14] In this regard, Prosser's counsel engaged in the following colloquy with the Court during the Conversion Hearing:

> THE COURT: But unless he's going to pay – well, I mean the test isn't that clear, but in all probability he's going to have to commit his post-petition earnings for five years to this plan. That's what –
> MR. CRAIG: Sure.
> THE COURT: Okay, so what are those earnings going to be? What are they coming from?
> MR. CRAIG: He may not have any, Your Honor.
> THE COURT: Well, then he's not too likely to confirm a plan.
> MR. CRAIG: Well, sure he can.
> THE COURT: I don't think so.
> MR. CRAIG: And, Your Honor, he has to be able to allocate whatever -- whatever his net disposal income is. And, Your Honor, the cases -- there aren't very many on this issue yet, but there are situations where it's acknowledged that may be a negative number, and if it is a negative number, the financial standard to be met is (a)(7), liquidation value. Okay?
> THE COURT: I understand. We're talking about a gentleman who ... makes a million to (sic) a year before all of this issue with the Trustee happened has an earning potential, which I still believe the courts will be looking at in Chapter 11 for the five years post-petition, that is very high.

(Conversion Hearing Transcript, pp. 58-9; JA-122, Vol.10, pp.4890-91).

wife had agreed to the sale of the Palm Beach property is obviously no substitute for her testimony or agreement to that effect. Furthermore, as the District Court pointed out, even if Prosser's wife was willing to participate in the sale of their jointly owned property, that does not equate to a willingness to contribute her portion of the proceeds from such sales to fund his hypothetical chapter 11 plan. (District Court Memorandum Opinion, pp. 8-9; JA-181, Vol.14, pp. 6830-1).

By the time the Bankruptcy Division entered the Conversion Order, over 14 months had transpired since Prosser filed his petition for relief under chapter 11. Prosser had the right, if he chose to do so, to file a plan of reorganization and disclosure statement at any time during this period. The Court found that "[g]rounds for conversion clearly exist[ed]" as early as February 13, 2007, when the Examiner Order was entered. (Examiner Opinion, p.35; JA-60, Vol.6, p.2558). Over six months later, at the Conversion Hearing, Prosser was asking for an additional two weeks to file a plan. The evidence clearly supported the Court's conclusion that Prosser could not propose a confirmable plan of liquidation and that there was consequently "no likelihood of a reasonable prospect of rehabilitation of [his] financial affairs in a Chapter 11." (Conversion Order, p.6; JA-123, Vol.10, p.4930).

4. The Bankruptcy Division had ample basis upon which to conclude that the cost of litigation would be greater in chapter 11 than chapter 7.

Prosser's two major creditors, RTFC and Greenlight, have made it clear that they will not support any plan proposed by him, and Prosser does not dispute that the only manner in which he could obtain confirmation of a plan would be pursuant to the "cram down," provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b). The correctness of the Examiner's conclusion that "any attempt by the Debtor to cramdown a plan would be rife with difficulties and costly to the estate" (Examiner's Report, p. 32; JA-103, Vol.9, p.4138) is not reasonably open to question. Among the issues that would have to be litigated would be Prosser's ability to create an accepting impaired class to satisfy 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(10),[15] whether the payments to non-accepting classes were at least equivalent to what such creditors would receive in a chapter 7 liquidation,[16] the validity of Prosser's as yet non-existent projections regarding his anticipated disposable income during the five year period beginning on the date the plan payments commenced,[17] whether he was committing all such projected disposable income to the plan so as to satisfy 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(15),[18] and whether he had satisfied the pre-confirmation disclosure requirements established by 11 U.S.C. § 1125. Prosser's counsel freely acknowledged that an attempt by Prosser to confirm a plan would entail litigation, stating, > there's some other requirements under 1129, and when we get to confirmation, we'll have to fight over those ... We're just saying we will file that plan. There will be objections. We will have some debates, and Your Honor will resolve that. If it doesn't get confirmed, you can convert.

(Conversion Hearing Transcript, p. 53; JA-122, Vol.10, p.4885).

The Bankruptcy Division clearly did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the avoidance of such litigation was in the best interest of the bankruptcy estate and its creditors.

CONCLUSION

"'[A]n abuse of discretion exists where the district court's decision rests upon a clearly erroneous finding of fact, an errant conclusion of law, or an improper application of law to fact.' In re SGL Carbon Corp., 200 F.3d [154], at 159 [(3d Cir.1999)] (quoting ACLU v. Black Horse Pike Reg'l Bd. of Ed., 84 F.3d 1471, 1476 (3d Cir.1996))." In re Integrated Telecom Express, Inc., 384 F.3d 108, 118 (3d Cir.2004). It is clear that the Bankruptcy Division's decision to convert this case from chapter 11 to chapter 7 was not predicated on any clearly erroneous finding of fact, errant conclusion of law, or improper application of law to fact. Any one of the numerous reasons articulated in the Conversion Order was sufficient by itself to support the decision to convert the case. Based on the foregoing arguments and authorities, the United States Trustee respectfully requests the Court to enter an order affirming the District Court's Order affirming the decision of the Bankruptcy Division.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The United States Trustee submits this brief as amicus curiae supporting reversal of the decision of the bankruptcy court. Cf. Fed. R. App. P. 29(a)(permitting the United States to file an amicus curiae brief without the consent of the parties or leave of court).

This appeal calls upon this Court to examine certain statutes that affect chapter 13 and chapter 7 bankruptcy cases: 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b) and 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii). The United States has a direct interest in the construction of these provisions. The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of chapter 7 and chapter 13 bankruptcy cases in nearly all federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. § 581(a). United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 595-595, at 88, reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6049.

This case involves a dispute over the interpretation of "projected disposable income" under 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1) and interpretation of certain expense deductions under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii), in the context of confirmation of plans under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. This appeal affects the United States Trustee's interest for two reasons.

First, by interpreting section 1325(b), this Court will determine how much higher income chapter 13 debtors must repay their creditors in their chapter 13 plans. The United States Trustee has an interest in that question because United States Trustees supervise the administration of chapter 13 cases and trustees and monitor chapter 13 plans. 28 U.S.C. §586(a)(3)(C).

Second, by interpreting a provision of section 707(b)(2), the decision of this Court will impact what expenses higher income chapter 7 debtors can claim in determining their disposable income that can be paid to creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (2). The United States

Trustees are required to review all such cases and determine whether a case is abusive under the means test and should be dismissed. See 11 U.S.C. § 704(b). One of the allowed means test expenses that is the subject of this appeal - payments on secured debts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) - is critical to the United States Trustee's analysis of whether there is a presumption of abuse.

In light of these interests, the United States Trustee respectfully submits this brief to offer this Court its views on the proper interpretation of sections 1325(b) and 707(b)(2)(A)(iii).

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error and but its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. In re White, 487 F.3d 199,204 (4th Cir. 2007). In this case, the facts are undisputed and the bankruptcy court's interpretations of 11 U.S.C. § 1325 (b) and § 707(b)(2) are conclusions of law subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court erred in holding that the disposable income an above median income chapter 13 debtor must pay to creditors in her plan may include deductions for secured debt payments that the debtor would never make because she was surrendering the property to secured creditors.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

I. Statutory Framework.

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA) [1] significantly altered how individual debtors obtain bankruptcy relief under chapter 7 and chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. One of the innovations of BAPCPA was means-testing, a well-publicized change in bankruptcy law that involves calculation of a debtor's ability to pay debts.

In chapter 7 cases, where the debtor's primary objective is to receive a discharge of debts, BAPCPA amended section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code and established a new statutory presumption. A chapter 7 case is presumed to be an abuse (and subject to dismissal) if a mathematical formula, based on historical income and expenses allowed by statute, results in a certain level of disposable income. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). In addition to establishing the presumption, the amendment changed the way expense deductions are computed. The prior law permitted debtors to use actual, reasonable and necessary expense amounts. Under BAPCPA, some of the allowed expenses continue to be actual expenses but other allowed expenses are either specified by statute or based on standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the debtor's area of residence. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii). The calculation of disposable income is made on Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22A (Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation). See 11 U.S.C. § 521 and § 707(b)(2)(C). If the calculation results in a certain level of disposable income, the case will be presumed abusive and subject to dismissal under section 707(b)(1) .

[1] Pub L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005)

Congress also applied means-testing to chapter 13 cases. In a chapter 13 case the objective is to pay creditors over time through a repayment plan, rather than by liquidating pre-petition assets as occurs in chapter 7. In chapter 13, the debtor's chapter 13 plan must provide that all the debtor’s "projected disposable income" will be used to pay creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1). The term “projected disposable income” has not been defined in the Bankruptcy Code and remains undefined after the BAPCPA amendments.

Prior to BAPCPA, “disposable income” was defined to mean “income which is received by the debtor and which is not reasonably necessary to be expended ... for the maintenance or support of the debtor.” 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2)(2000 ed.). The disposable income was calculated from the debtor’s actual income and expenses shown on Schedules I and J filed by the debtor.

BAPCPA amended section 1325(b)(2) to change the definition of "disposable income" to mean "current monthly income [2] received by the debtor ... less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended ... for the maintenance or support of the debtor.” 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2). This new definition of disposable income incorporated two changes: first, it defines "disposable income" based on an average of historical monthly income figures; and second, for debtors with higher income levels, it requires the debtor to use the same standard expenses allowed for chapter 7 debtors. Section 1325(b)(3) thus now directs that reasonable expenses be determined "in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2)" for above-median income debtors. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3).

[2] "Current monthly income," added to the Bankruptcy Code by BAPCPA, means the "average monthly income from all sources" that the debtor received during the six-month period ending the last calendar month before the debtor filed his bankruptcy petition. 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A).

Above-median income chapter 13 debtors determine disposable income by using Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22C (Chapter 13 Statement of Current Monthly and Disposable Income). On it, debtors list historical income. Because a debtor's income or expenses may change after the petition is filed, there is often a significant difference between the disposable income calculated under Form 22C and the debtor's actual disposable income.

This appeal involves the interpretation of a specific statutory expense deduction that BAPCPA provided for chapter 7 debtors but that is applicable in this case. Section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) allows chapter 7 debtors to deduct "average monthly payments on account of secured debts" which are "scheduled as contractually due in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii). Although this deduction is found in chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, it is made applicable to above median income chapter 13 debtors in the calculation of disposable income under section 1325(b)(3).

II. Factual Background

Susan Quigley filed her Chapter 13 petition on January 11, 2008. (Doc. 6-2, p.2). She also filed the following documents that are relevant to this appeal: Official Form 22C (Doc. 6-2, p.38); Chapter 13 Plan (Doc. 6-2, p.46); Schedules I and Schedule J (Doc. 6-2, p.29), which reflected her present employment, income, and expenses; and Schedules A and B (Doc. 6-2, p.17,18), which list all her assets. The debtor's Form 22C stated that her current monthly income was $3,339.33, or $40,071 annually. (Doc. 6-2, p.38). This is above the median income for a family size of one in West Virginia.[3]

The debtor's expenses included four deductions for debt payments on secured claims. (Form 22C, Line 47; Doc. 6-2, p.43). First, debtor deducted a secured payment of $45.83 for her 2003 Ford Ranger. The debtor indicated in her plan that she intended to retain this vehicle and continue to make the payments. (Doc. 6-3, p.3). This expense deduction is not at issue on appeal.

Second, debtor deducted monthly payments of $40.87 and $122.46 for two all terrain vehicles (ATVs). (Doc. 6-2, p.43). Debtor stated in her plan she was surrendering both ATVs to the secured creditors, HSBC Customer Service and Suzuki Retail Services, and did not provide for any payments on those vehicles in the plan. (Doc. 6-3, p.2). Debtor's Schedule J, listing projected expenses, also does not contain either of these payments. (Doc. 6-2, p.30. These expense deductions are at issue in this appeal.

Finally, debtor deducted a monthly payment of $307.83 for a Ford F-150 truck. (Doc. 6-2, p.43). On Schedule B, debtor stated that this truck "belongs to ex-boyfriend. He is making the payments on the vehicle." (Doc. 6-2, p.21). The bankruptcy court found while the ex-boyfriend is in possession of the truck and making payments on the truck, the debtor and her ex-boyfriend are co-owners of the truck and are co-obligated on its debt. (Doc. 6-3, p.27). Debtor's plan did not provide for any future payments on the truck (Doc. 6-2, p.46), and Schedule J does not list the truck payment as a monthly expense. (Doc. 6-2, p.30).

[3] See http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/bapcpa/20080101/bci_data/median_income_table.htm (table containing median family income data applicable to this case).

After accounting for the ATVs and truck expense deductions, debtor's Form 22C disposable income was <$48.08>. (Doc. 6-2, p.44). The Debtor's proposed chapter 13 repayment plan suggested bi-weekly payments of $122.77 (or $266 per month) for 60 months. (Doc. 6-2, p.46). The chapter 13 trustee objected to the plan, arguing that debtor failed to dedicate all of her disposable income to the plan because the debtor improperly deducted expense payments for the ATVs she was surrendering and the truck that was being paid by debtor's ex-boyfriend. (Doc. 6-3, p.9). See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1)(B)(if chapter 13 trustee objects to a proposed plan, debtor must dedicate all projected disposable income to repay unsecured creditors in order to have plan confirmed). The chapter 13 trustee objected because she believed that eliminating improper deductions claimed by the debtor would increase debtor's disposable income and monthly plan payments to $423.

In a Memorandum Opinion (Doc. 6-2, p.26) entered June 20, 2008, the bankruptcy court determined that the debtor's "projected disposable income" under section 1325(b)(1) may include expense deductions for payments on secured debt that the debtor would not be making in the future because she was surrendering the collateral.[4] The chapter 13 trustee timely appealed.

[4] The bankruptcy court also held that the debtor could deduct the payments for the Ford F-150 truck that were being made by her ex-boyfriend, provided that the debtor included in her income the payments her ex-boyfriend was making on the truck. In its order, the bankruptcy court required the debtor to file an amended Form 22C that either (1) included in her income the payments the ex-boyfriend was making, or (2) instead of including the payments made by the ex-boyfriend in income, eliminated the contested truck payment from her Form 22C expenses. (Rec 54) The debtor filed an amended Form 22C which eliminated the truck payment as an expense deduction. This increased the debtor's stated disposable income from <$48.08> to $248.75. The amended Form 22C is not part of the record designated for this appeal. The United States Trustee raises this point because elimination of the truck payment expense is consistent with the position taken by the United States Trustee before the bankruptcy court. Accordingly, because deduction of a secured debt expense when payment is made by a third party is no longer an issue, the United States Trustee shall only address the surrender issue in this amicus brief.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This Court should reverse the decision of the bankruptcy court for three independent reasons. First, when a creditor or the chapter 13 trustee objects to confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, section 1325(b)(1) prohibits bankruptcy courts from confirming the plan unless the debtor provides all of his projected disposable income to repay unsecured creditors during the applicable commitment period. That did not occur here because the debtor artificially reduced her projected disposable income by claiming secured debt expenses on two ATVs that she was not going to be paying over the life of her chapter 13 plan because she was surrendering the vehicles to the secured creditors.

The bankruptcy court allowed the debtor to claim these non-existent expenses because the court failed to recognize projected disposable income is a forward-looking concept that requires the court to exclude expenses that the debtors do not or will not incur. By allowing a disposable income calculation in a chapter 13 plan that included deductions for payments on property that the debtor will surrender to secured creditors, the bankruptcy court did not compel the debtor to dedicate all her projected disposable income as section 1325(b)(1) requires.

Second, the bankruptcy court failed to appreciate that in calculating "disposable income" under section 1325(b)(2), debtors may only deduct from current monthly income “amounts reasonably necessary to be expended." The bankruptcy court should not have allowed the debtor to deduct payments on the two ATVs she was giving up because payments on that property was not going to be “expended" during the life of the plan, so it cannot be therefore be a “reasonably necessary” expense. To the contrary, it is a non-existent expense. Given this, the bankruptcy court erred in determining that the debtor could deduct as amounts "to be expended" payments the debtor will never make in the future on property being surrendered.

Third, and alternatively, the bankruptcy court misapplied section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii), which is incorporated into section 1325(b)(3) in above-median income chapter 13 cases by section 1325(b). It did so by excluding payments on surrendered property even though section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) should be read as allowing deduction only for amounts that are "scheduled as contractually due" to secured creditors.

ARGUMENT

I. Section 1325(b)(1) Requires That Debtors Commit To Unsecured Creditors All Of Their "Projected Disposable Income" Over The Applicable Commitment Period

Under section 1325(b)(1), bankruptcy courts may not confirm chapter 13 plans over the chapter 13 trustee's objection unless "the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period. . .will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan." 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1). The chapter 13 trustee objected to the chapter 13 plan filed by the debtor. The bankruptcy court erred because it did not require payment of all the debtor's projected disposable income over the applicable commitment period.

A. "Projected Disposable Income" Is a Future Oriented Concept That Does Not Permit Debtors To Subtract Secured Debt Payments As Expenses When The Property At Issue Will Be Surrendered Under The Plan.

In considering "projected disposable income," this Court should adopt an interpretation that gives meaning to the definition of "disposable income" under section 1325(b)(2), by recognizing that the section's use of "projected" means that its expense analysis is forward looking. Under this construction, the debtor's historical income and expense deductions under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv) are a starting point, and should be carried forward throughout the term of the plan, absent evidence that the debtor's income or expenses are "projected" to change. When evidence demonstrates that the debtor is projected to have a significant change in income or expenses during the life of the chapter 13 plan, the Court should consider this evidence in its calculations of the debtor's projected disposable income.

This reading is based squarely upon section 1325(b)(1)'s text, which expressly requires that all of the debtor's projected disposable income "be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors. . ." 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1).

1. Courts have taken two principal approaches in interpreting "projected disposable income under section 1325(b).

Two principal approaches have emerged in the interpretation of section 1325(b) "projected disposable income." One view is that section 1325(b) requires "projected disposable income" to be computed by taking the historical "disposable income" amount calculated on Form 22C and projecting it over the plan period, without any consideration of post-petition or future changes in income or expenses. The Ninth Circuit has adopted that interpretation. See In re Kagenveama, 527 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2008). The underlying rationale is that "disposable income" was defined for the first time in BAPCPA and is used nowhere other than in the phrase "projected disposable income" in section 1325(b)(1). Thus, the argument goes, "projected disposable income," while still undefined in the Code, must mean nothing more than historical "disposable income" that is projected out through the plan period. In re Kagenveama, 527 F.3d at 996 (to get from the statutorily defined 'disposable income' to 'projected disposable income, one simply takes the calculation . . . and does the math.); see also In re Simms, 2008 Bankr.LEXIS 224 at *38 (Bankr.N.D.W.Va., January 23, 2008)(debtor's projected disposable income is the disposable income calculation on Form 22C carried forward through the plan period, not based on any "actual" expenses of the debtor).

This definition of projected disposable income has been criticized because it ignores that the word “projected” in section 1325 requires courts to address projected changes to income and expenses over the life of the plan. For them, “projected” in section 1325(b) exists so that historical income and expenses will not necessarily be used when they will not be accurate during the plan period. While starting with the historical disposable income amount, they have read "projected disposable income" to permit the consideration of significant changes in income and expenses that are likely to occur over the life of the debtor's chapter 13 plan. See, e.g., In re Lanning, 380 B.R. 17, 24 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007), appeal pending, No. 08-3009 (10th Cir.); In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302, 314 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007); In re Pak, 378 B.R. 257 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007), overruled by In re Kagenveama, 527 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2008) . These courts have noted that this reading of "projected disposable income" is consistent with a debtor's actual financial situation over the life of the chapter 13 plan.

2. The mechanical approach utilized in Kagenveama and Simms is flawed and should not be followed.

The bankruptcy court utilized the Kagenveama strict backward looking approach to “projected disposable income” in adopting a “mechanical calculation" for determining what must be paid to unsecured creditors. This backward looking approach is flawed and should not be followed.

First, this backward looking interpretation fails to consider the term "projected" in its proper context. See Hibbs v. Winn, 542 U.S. 88, 101 (2004) (statutory words must be construed in context). The use of the term "projected" in the economic and financial context of this statute suggests a forecast or estimate of an expected future financial reality.[5] While the calculation of "projected" financial data may well begin with historical data, it does not necessarily (or even usually) end there, nor does it entail a rigid and absolute assumption that projected income will be identical to past income when the available facts demonstrate otherwise. The backward looking test applied by the Ninth Circuit in Kagenveama and by the bankruptcy court here ignores the statutory language's context.

The backward looking approach utilized by the bankruptcy court also fails to reflect that section 1325(b)(1) explicitly requires chapter 13 plans to include all the debtor's projected disposable income "to be received" during the plan period. (emphasis added). Only a forward-looking approach that takes into account significant changes in post-petition income and expenses results in the amount of projected disposable income "to be received" by the debtor during the plan period. The mechanical test fails to address cases in which historical disposable income calculated on Form 22C may be substantially more or less than the actual disposable income "to be received" by the debtor in the future.

Moreover, the backward looking approach fails to take into account another statutory phrase in section 1325(b)(1)(B), that the plan must provide that all the projected disposable income to be received "will be applied to make payments" under the plan. For reasons stated in connection with the "to be received" requirement, projected disposable income should include the disposable income that can "be applied to make payments" under the plan. In Kagenveama

[5] See The Random House Dict. of the English Lang., 1546 (2nd ed.1987)(defining to "project" as inter alia , "to set forth or calculate (some future thing); They projected the building costs for the next five years."); Webster's Third New Int'l Dict. 1813 (1993) (defining "projected" as inter alia "planned for future execution; contrived, proposed," as "[projected outlays for new plant and equipment").

the Ninth Circuit based its understanding of projected disposable income strictly on the historical “current monthly income” amount, minus expenses. But projecting forward this deemed or hypothetical income does not permit it to be "applied to make payments" simply because it does not exist.

It is well established that courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect." Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (citing United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1992)). The interpretation by the Kagenveama court and the court below ignores this statutory maxim.

B. Under Section 1325(b)(3), “Disposable Income” Is A Future-Oriented Concept That Does Not Permit Debtors To Subtract Amounts They Will Never “Expend” Because They Are Surrendering The Property Under The Plan.

Section 1325(b)(2) defines disposable income to include "current monthly income received by the debtor . . . less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for the maintenance or support of the debtor. For above-median debtors, section 1325(b)(3) provides that "amounts reasonably necessary to be expended . . . shall be determined in accordance with [section 707(b)(2)(A) and (B)]." 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3).

The phrase "reasonably necessary to be expended" in section 1325(b)(2) also supports reading section 1325(b)(1) as allowing courts to factor in projected income and expense changes because the words “to be expended” are future-oriented. The term requires courts to look into the future to determine, inasmuch as possible, what expenses the debtor will have during the life of the plan." In re Smith, 383 B.R. 441, 454 (Bankr.E.D. Wis. 2008). Indeed, to give this phrase meaning, one must consider whether the debtor will actually "expend" a particular amount going forward. Id. See also In re Renicker, 342 B.R. 304, 309 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2006) (concluding that the "plain language of section 1325(b)(2) unambiguously indicates that prospective - not historical - expenses are to be used to calculate disposable income").

That term thus makes clear that the bankruptcy court should not have allowed the debtor to claim expenses she would not incur because she was surrendering the property securing the debt. Payments on property a debtor is surrendering, by definition, will never be "expended" and therefore cannot be "reasonably necessary" for the debtor's support. In re McPhereson, 350 B.R. 38, 45-46 (Bankr.W.D.Va. 2006) (payments the debtor does not propose to make, and is not required to make under the debtor's plan, cannot be reasonably necessary for debtor's support); In re Coleman, 382 B.R. 759, 763 (Bankr. W.D. Ark. 2008); In re Koch, 2008 WL 2910574, at *3 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. July 25, 2008); In re Hoss, 2008 WL 3854448, at *6-7 (Bankr. D. Kan August 20, 2008)(rationale applied to eliminate expense deductions for second, third and fourth mortgage liens stripped off debtor’s residence, and to reduce allowed expense deduction to amount actually being paid by debtor where undersecured motor vehicle claim crammed down in chapter 13 case).

Because they will never be “reasonably necessary to be expended,” section 1325(b)(3) prohibits debtors such as Ms. Quigley from deducting from their disposable income secured debt payments on property they are surrendering. Thus, the bankruptcy court erred in holding that payments on the surrendered ATVs are allowed in determining debtor's disposable income. The bankruptcy court should be reversed and the case remanded with instructions to exclude from debtor’s Form 22C the expense deductions for payment on the surrendered ATVs.

II. Section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) Does Not Allow Expense Deductions, As Future Payments on Secured Debt, For Collateral That Debtors Are Surrendering and Will Not Make Payments On Going Forward

The bankruptcy court's ruling should be reversed for a separate and distinct reason - section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I), which section 1325(b)(3) incorporates in this case, independently prohibits chapter 13 debtors from claiming expenses associated with surrendered property. In determining disposable income for above-median income debtors, section 1325(b)(3) provides that the debtor's reasonably necessary expenses shall be determined "in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2)." 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3). Under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I),[6] the bankruptcy court determined that the debtor could deduct payment on the ATVs notwithstanding that she would not actually be making any future payments because she was surrendering the collateral securing the debt. There are several reasons why this ruling is not correct.

First, the terms of section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) contemplate that only future secured payments may be used to determine the debtors disposable income available to pay creditors. The statute provides: "[t]he debtor's average monthly payments on account of secured debts shall

[6] 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) provides:

> The debtor's average monthly payments on account of secured debts shall be calculated as the sum of –
> (I) the total of all amounts scheduled as contractually due to secured creditors in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition; and
> (II) any additional payments to secured creditors necessary for the debtor, in filing a plan under chapter 13 of this title, to maintain possession of the debtor's primary residence, motor vehicle, or other property necessary for the support of the debtor and the debtor's dependants, that serves as collateral for secured debts;

be calculated as the sum of ... the total of all amounts scheduled as contractually due to secured creditors in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition." (Emphasis added). The court must begin with the statute's plain language and avoid constructions that render some words redundant or another part of the same statute superfluous. United States v. Alaska, 521 U.S. 1, 59 (1997). A fundamental canon of statutory construction requires that "unless otherwise defined, words will be interpreted as taking their ordinary, contemporary, common meaning. United States v. Lehman, 225 F.3d 426, 428-29 (4th Cir.2000); see also 2A Norman J. Singer, *429 Sutherland Statutory Construction § 46:01 (6th ed.2000).

The dictionary defines "following" as "subsequent to" or "next in the order of time" or in the future. Merriam-Webster Online Dictionary (2008).[7] This meaning should be imparted to the term "following" as it appears in section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I), absent indication that Congress intended to give the term a different meaning. Bailey v. United States, 516 U.S. 137, 144-45 (1995)(using the dictionary definition of a term in order to determine it's statutory meaning). Using the common, ordinary meaning of "following" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I) would only allow deduction for payments to secured creditors that will be made subsequent to or after the petition date. Payments for surrendered property that will never be made do not qualify under the statute. See In re Naut, 2008 WL 191297 at *9 (Bankr.E.D.Pa. Jan 22, 2008) (applying dictionary definition of "following" to conclude that secured payments must actually be due in the 60 months after the bankruptcy filing for the debtor to deduct the expense).

Second, the section requires that the debts be "scheduled as contractually due." Significantly, Congress has "used the phrase 'scheduled as' several times in the Bankruptcy Code

. . . to refer to whether a debt is identified on a debtor's bankruptcy schedules." The phrase “scheduled as contractually due” as used in that section and in conjunction with other sections of the Bankruptcy Code and Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure demonstrate that secured debts must be included on a debtor's Schedule J to be deducted from income under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii). In re Skaggs, 349 B.R. 594, 599 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2006); In re Harris, 353 B.R. 304, 308-10 (Bankr.E.D.Okla. 2006); In re Naut, 2008 WL 191297 at *9.[8] This use of the phrase "scheduled as contractually due" indicates Congress' intention that secured debts are permissible deductions under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) only to the extent they are legitimately on the debtor's schedules as a debt to be paid in the 60 months after the debtor filed bankruptcy.

"When Congress amends the bankruptcy laws, it does not write 'on a clean slate.'" Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410, 419 (1992). The prior bankruptcy law's ". . . longstanding meaning forms the background against which Congress legislates. . . [and] [t]he courts presume that Congress will use clear language if it intends to alter an established" meaning. Skaggs, 349 B.R. at 599 (citing Firstar Bank v. Faul, 253 F.3d 982, 988 (7th Cir. 2001). Accordingly, a debtor's “schedules and statements form the basis from which . . . [a] court should determine whether a debt is 'scheduled as contractually due. '" Id. The entire phrase "average monthly payments on account of secured debts scheduled as contractually due in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition" is best construed as contemplating a forward-looking calculation. In re Ray, 362 B.R.680, 685 (Bankr.D.S.C.2007).

[8] See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 1111(a) ("wherein a claim or interest is not deemed filed if it is scheduled as disputed, contingent or unliquidated"). Other examples where the term "scheduled" is used to refer to a debtor's bankruptcy schedules include 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(3)(individual debtor not discharged from debt "neither listed nor scheduled under section 521(1) of this title...") and 11 U.S.C. 554(c) ("Unless the court orders otherwise, any property scheduled under section 521(1) of this title not otherwise administered at the time of the closing of the case is abandoned to the debtor and administered for purposes of section 350 of this title.") (Emphases added).

The bankruptcy court rejected an interpretation of the term "scheduled as" in 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I) as referring to a debtors schedules required to be filed by the bankruptcy code, in part because a statement of intention or chapter 13 plan is not a "schedule" under the bankruptcy code. But the court did not consider that a debtor is required to file Schedule J and to list thereon all projected living expenses, including projected payments to secured and other creditors. See In re Skaggs, 349 B.R. at 599; In re Harris, 353 B.R. at 308-10 (Bankr.E.D.Okla. 2006); In re Naut, supra. Accordingly, Schedule J that shows the debtor has not listed future payments on the ATV debts, in conjunction with the statements in her chapter 13 plan that she is surrendering the vehicles and will not be making the payments, demonstrates that these debts have not been "scheduled."

Third, a comparison of section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I) in context with its “conjunctive partner,” section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(II), “reinforces the conclusion that section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I) applies only to payments on debts secured by collateral that a debtor intends to keep.” In re Burden, 380 B.R. 194, 202 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2007). While section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I) allows secured debt payments scheduled as contractually due, the following section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(II) allows deductions for certain payments to secured creditors necessary for the debtor "to maintain possession of the debtor’s primary residence. . .” Allowing only debtors who intend to retain property to deduct secured debt expenses under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(I) is consistent with the explicitly forward-looking nature of section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(II), which contemplates the debtor’s intent to maintain possession of property. In re Burden, 380 B.R. at 201-02.

Finally, the United States Trustee's approach is consistent with Congress' stated intent in enacting BAPCPA, which was to make certain that debtors "repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I) at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88,89. The disposable income test in chapter 13 and the means test in chapter 7 were intended to accomplish this objective, but mechanical interpretations of the statute that allow debtors such as Ms. Quigley to reduce their disposable income by deducting non-existent debt payments on property they intend to surrender conflicts with Congress' stated intent in enacting BAPCPA.

CONCLUSION

For all these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order of the bankruptcy court denying the chapter 13 trustee's objection to plan confirmation, and remand this case for further proceedings.

Respectfully submitted,

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky has jurisdiction over the underlying case, initiated by Michael J. Ragle and Tammy J. Ragle on August 16, 2006, by their filing of a voluntary petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code,[1] title 11, United States Code. See also 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b) and 1334(a).

[1] As used herein, the term "Bankruptcy Code" refers to title 11, United States Code.

On March 23, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered a Memorandum of Opinion and Order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Ragles' case for abuse. The United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from that Order under section 158(c)(2) of title 28, United States Code, and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on April 2, 2007.[2] This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under section 158(a)(1) of title 28, United States Code.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Did the bankruptcy court err in holding that the Ragles were eligible to claim the IRS Standard vehicle financing expense allowance in calculating their disposable income under the Bankruptcy Code's statutory means test, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), when they owned their car debt-free and thus had no automobile vehicle financing expense.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

deduct a vehicle ownership expense for their Honda Accord is a question of law and therefore subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On August 16, 2006, Michael J. Ragle and Tammy J. Ragle (the "Ragles") filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. RA 1.[3] On October 30, 2007, the United States Trustee timely filed a Motion to Dismiss Case for abuse. RA 18.

The bankruptcy court on November 28, 2006 ordered the parties to enter into joint stipulations and stated that it would rule without further evidentiary hearing. RA 24. The Ragles and the United States Trustee entered into a Joint Stipulation of Facts on December 12, 2006, RA 26, and submitted the Motion to Dismiss to the Court for decision without an evidentiary hearing. The bankruptcy court concluded that the presumption of abuse did not arise and entered an Order overruling the motion to dismiss on March 23, 2007. RA 30. The United States Trustee timely filed a Notice of Appeal and an Election to Appeal to District Court on April 2, 2007. RA 32, 33.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. Statutory Framework

On October 17, 2005, most provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA"), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (Apr. 20, 2005), took effect, implementing significant changes to the Bankruptcy Code. As part of this effort, [3] All references to "RA [number]" herein refer to the number of the Record on Appeal.

Congress significantly amended section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, which governs dismissal of chapter 7 bankruptcy cases. The general goal of Congress in its complete overhaul of section 707(b) was to ensure "that those who can afford to repay some portion of their unsecured debts be required to do so...". 151 Cong. Rec. S2470 (March 10, 2005).

As it existed prior to BAPCPA, section 707(b) only authorized dismissal based on a finding that allowing the debtor relief (i.e., granting a discharge of debts) constituted a "substantial abuse" of chapter 7. Prior to its amendment by BAPCPA, section 707(b) also required courts to presume that a debtor was entitled to relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 707(b) now authorizes dismissal where the court finds that the granting of relief would be an "abuse" of chapter 7. As amended by BAPCPA, section 707(b)(2) repealed the former presumption and replaced it with a new presumption: a case is an "abuse" of chapter 7 if a detailed mathematical formula set out in the statute, commonly referred to as the "means test," yields a minimum amount of monthly disposable income.

The means test uses a series of calculations to determine whether the section 707(b)(2) presumption of abuse arises. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A). Specifically, the means test calculates a debtor's "current monthly income" ("CMI") based on the debtor's average income for the six calendar months preceding the month of the bankruptcy filing. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A). If a debtor's CMI is above the applicable state median family income, as is the case here, section 707(b)(2)(A) calculates the debtor's monthly disposable income available to repay creditors by reducing the CMI by certain enumerated categories of expenses. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv).

At issue in this appeal is whether the Ragles qualify for an expense allowance for vehicle ownership costs under Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service. In determining expenses, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) provides that a debtor's "monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service include transportation and housing related expenses, and apportion transportation expenses into two components. The first component includes costs associated with financing vehicle acquisition. The second component is associated with the costs of vehicle operation.

If the debtor's monthly disposable income, calculated by reducing CMI by allowed expenses, is less than $100 per month (or $6,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does not arise. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i).[4] If the debtor's monthly disposable income is equal to or exceeds $166.67 per month (or $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does arise. Id. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is between $100 and $166.67 per month (between $6,000 and $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse arises if the disposable income, over 60 months, is sufficient to pay 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured debt. Id.

[4] Pursuant to section 104 of the Bankruptcy Code, dollar amounts set forth in Title 11 applicable to a determination of presumed abuse under the means test were adjusted by the Judicial Conference of the United States effective April 1, 2007. 72 Fed. Reg. 7082 (Feb. 14, 2007). This case is not subject to the recent dollar amount adjustments.

If the presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2) arises after completion of the means test, the debtor may attempt to rebut the presumption by demonstrating special circumstances that justify income or expense adjustments for which there is no reasonable alternative. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B).

Each debtor with primarily consumer debts is required to file, in conjunction with the bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs, a Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation, Official Form 22A ("Form 22A"). 11 U.S.C. §§ 521 and 707(b)(2)(C). The purpose of Form 22A is to calculate monthly disposable income following the formula set forth in section 707(b)(2), and determine whether the presumption of abuse arises.

II. Factual Background

The Ragles filed a Form 22A with the petition commencing their case on August 16, 2006. RA 1. Because the "Annualized Current Monthly Income" reported on Line 13 of Form 22A was above the applicable state median income for their household size, the Ragles completed the form to calculate monthly disposable income. The result of the Ragles' calculation was monthly disposable income of $136.28 and 60-month disposable income of $8,176.80. RA 1 (Form 22A, lines 50-51). Because this latter amount is less than the presumed abuse threshold of one quarter of their total non-priority unsecured debt, the Ragles checked the box at the top of the first page of the Form 22A indicating that the presumption of abuse did not arise. Id. (Form 22A).

The Ragles own a 1987 Honda Accord and a 2004 Jeep Liberty. Id. (Schedule B). While the Ragles scheduled a debt secured by the Jeep, the Debtors own their Honda free of any secured debt. Id. (Schedule D). On Line 23 of the Form 22A, the Ragles included a deduction of $471 for a "transportation ownership/lease expense" for the Honda, and on line 24 claimed a "transportation ownership/lease expense" in the amount of $338 for the Jeep.[5] Id. (Form 22A).

As required by 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1), the United States Trustee reviewed all of the documentation submitted by the Ragles and concluded that the presumption of abuse arose. RA 15. The United States Trustee filed a Motion to Dismiss Case on October 30, 2006, explaining that the presumption arose because the Ragles' monthly disposable income was $333.05 instead of $136.28. RA 18. This difference was due to (a) eliminating the ownership expense for the Honda and recalculating the ownership expense for the Jeep, (b) allowing the Ragles an additional vehicle operating expense of $200 for the Honda,[6] and (c) correctly calculating the average payment on the secured claim of Heights Finance. Id.

In response to the United States Trustee's Motion, the Ragles filed a Rebuttal of Presumption of Abuse which contended that the following "special circumstances" rebutted the presumption of abuse: (a) the Ragles incurred additional commuting expenses, and (b) the Ragles were in "dire need" of a more reliable automobile than the Honda. RA 20.

[5] The vehicles were not expressly identified on lines 23 and 24 of Form 22A, but the calculations on Line 24 reference the secured debt payments (from Line 42) attributable to the Jeep.

[6] The United States Trustee allows an additional $200 operating expense under the means test for each debtor who owns a vehicle that is six year old or older or with more than 75,000 miles, based on the Internal Revenue Manual which allows such an additional vehicle operating expense. See Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5, (entitled Collecting Process), Chapter 8 § 5.8.5.5.2, Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html.

On November 21, 2006, the Ragles filed an amended Form 22A. RA 21. Unlike the original Form 22A, the Ragles admitted on their amended Form 22A that their case was presumptively abusive after calculating monthly disposable income of $216.33. Id. The Ragles' amended Form 22A adopted the United States Trustee's position that they were not entitled to a vehicle ownership expense for the Honda, added the additional $200 vehicle operating expense for the Honda, corrected the amount of the average payment on the secured claim of Heights Finance, and added a childcare expense. Id. The Ragles also listed additional vehicle replacement and commuting expenses in Part VII of the amended Form 22A, which they contend should also be deducted from their CMI.. Id.

The Ragles and the United States Trustee filed Joint Stipulations of fact on December 12, 2006. RA 26. Stipulation 9 stated: "The debtors have two operating vehicles listed in Form 22A [sic], a 1987 Honda Accord, and a 2204 [sic] Jeep Liberty. Due to the unencumbered state of the 1987 Honda Accord, the debtors only claimed an ownership/lease allowance for one vehicle on line 23 and 24 of this Form." Id. (emphasis added). Stipulation 14 stated: "There is no dispute as to the figures listed in parts I-VI of the amended form B22A." Id. (emphasis added). Stipulation 18 stated: "The sole legal dispute before the Court is whether the debtors should be entitled to claim the additional expenses on form B22A that are listed in part VII." Id.

Pursuant to the bankruptcy court's scheduling order, RA 24, both parties filed Memoranda of Law. RA 27 (United States Trustee) and 28 (Ragles). The only issue briefed by the parties, per their joint stipulation, was whether the Ragles' claimed replacement vehicle cost and additional commuting expenses constituted "special circumstances" that rebutted the presumption of abuse. Id.

On March 23, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered a Memorandum Opinion and Order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. RA 30. The bankruptcy court, sua sponte and without providing the opportunity for briefing by the parties, revisited the issue of whether the Ragles' case was presumptively abusive. The court determined that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code allowed the Ragles to include a vehicle ownership expense for their Honda Accord and gave the Ragles ten days to prepare and file an amended Form 22A that included these expenses. Id. On April 2, 2007, the United States Trustee appealed to this court for relief. RA 32 (Notice of Appeal) and 33 (Election to Appeal to District Court).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court erred in denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss by holding that the Ragles were entitled to deduct a vehicle ownership expense for their Honda Accord, even though the Ragles were not obligated to pay on a loan or lease for that vehicle.

The bankruptcy court's ruling was incorrect for three reasons. First, the Ragles could claim only "applicable" expenses under section 707(b)(2), and they had no applicable vehicle ownership expense for their Honda Accord because the vehicle was not subject to a loan or lease payment. By using the word "applicable," Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom the expenses apply. Because the vehicle acquisition/financing expense does not apply with respect to the Ragles' Honda Accord, the bankruptcy court erred in holding that they were eligible to deduct the expense under the means test.

Second, the bankruptcy court's failure to construe the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as conditioning eligibility for the IRS Local Standard for vehicle ownership on the debtor having a monthly car payment is inconsistent with the Internal Revenue Service's longstanding application of this standard. Because the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim vehicle ownership expenses absent a monthly car payment expense, courts should not allow debtors to do so when applying the same Standard for means testing purposes. Indeed, both case law and legislative history underscore that Congress intended that the IRS' application of the Standards be considered in applying these Standards under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

Finally, the bankruptcy court's order conflicts with sound notions of public policy and the primary purpose of Congress in passing bankruptcy reform legislation in 2005 - including the amendments at issue in this appeal. The 2005 legislation was intended to ensure that debtors would repay their debts when they can. By allowing the Ragles to claim a phantom expense for their Honda Accord, the bankruptcy court subverted that purpose, and allowed debtors who had the ability to repay some of their debts to avoid doing so.

ARGUMENT

I. The bankruptcy court erred in holding that the Ragles were eligible to claim the IRS Local Standards for vehicle ownership for their Honda Accord because the expense was not applicable to them.

The bankruptcy court order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Ragles' case as a presumed abuse of chapter 7 should be reversed because the Ragles were not entitled to deduct a vehicle ownership expense under the means test when they had no vehicle loan or lease payment. Although the bankruptcy court held that the Ragles could claim such an expense, the bankruptcy court's order fails to recognize that the Bankruptcy Code only allows debtors to claim "applicable" expenses, and the Ragles' claimed vehicle ownership expenses are not applicable because they do not have a monthly car payment obligation. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

A. The vehicle ownership expense may be claimed only if such expense is "applicable" to a debtor

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service. . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The statute expressly provides that before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense must itself first be applicable to the debtor.

The Bankruptcy Code does not define the word "applicable," nor has the United States Trustee identified any Supreme Court decision that provides a definition. Where, as here, a statutory term is undefined, a basic principle of statutory construction provides that courts should give such terms their ordinary meanings. E.g., Smith v. U.S., 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning.") The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean applying or capable of being applied; relevant; suitable; appropriate. Random House Unabridged Dictionary (2006). Accordingly, such a meaning should be imparted to the term "applicable" as it appears in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) absent clear indication that Congress intended to give such term a different meaning. See Clark Equipment Co. v. United States, 912 F.2d 113,117 (6th Cir. 1990)(applying dictionary definition to ascertain common meaning of term not defined by statute) cert. denied, 500 U.S. 941 (1991); see also Thompson v. Goetzmann, 337 F.3d 489, 498 n.20 (5th Cir. 2003) ("dictionaries are a principal source for ascertaining the ordinary meaning of statutory language.")

The bankruptcy court's order is inconsistent with the word's ordinary, common sense definition because it allows debtors to deduct expenses that do not apply to them. By inserting the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom such expenses are "relevant; suitable; appropriate." Since the Ragles did not have vehicle financing expenses for their Honda Accord, the IRS vehicle ownership expense did not apply to them for that vehicle. See In re Devilliers, 358 B.R. 849, 859 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2007) (debtor may claim IRS ownership expense only after "a determination is made as to the type of expenses allowed and applicable to the debtor"); In re Wiggs, 2006 WL 2246432, *2-3 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006) (statute is "clear and unambiguous," and "term 'applicable' modifies the amounts specified to limit the expenses to only those that apply," such that debtors were not allowed ownership expense when they did not have a vehicle payment.).

By using the term "applicable" in this way, a determination of allowable expenses under the means test is a two-step process. The first step is eligibility – i.e., does the debtor qualify for an expense allowance in the category at issue? If so, then the second step is to quantify the expense amount the eligible debtor is allowed by looking at the IRS Standard amounts that are specified for the number of vehicles owned by the debtor and where the debtor lives. See, e.g., In re Carlin, 348 B.R. 795, 798 (Bankr. D. Or. 2006)("There is nothing absurd in Congress drawing the line for vehicle ownership expense eligibility at those debtors who are making payments on the vehicle."). The bankruptcy court's ruling skips the first step and proceeds directly to the second.

B. The IRS definition of the vehicle ownership expense, which states that the expense may be claimed only when a taxpayer has a loan or lease payment for that vehicle, was incorporated in the Bankruptcy Code

The bankruptcy court's order allowing a deduction of vehicle financing where the Ragles did not have a loan or lease payment on their Honda Accord is also supported by the Internal Revenue Service's longstanding application of its own Standards. In providing which deductions debtors may take under the means test, Congress specifically stated that debtors are permitted to deduct "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . .Local Standards . . .issued by the Internal Revenue Service." (emphasis added). 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

On page two of its Collection Financial Standards under the heading "Transportation" the IRS provides as follows:

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs . . . . The ownership costs provided maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense . . . . If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

See IRS Collection Standards (emphasis added), available at ww.irs.gov/individuals /article/0,,id=96543,00.html; see also Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5 /ch15s01.html.

The "ownership cost" was specifically calculated by the IRS based on the cost to finance the acquisition of a vehicle, and is not simply a cost associated with owning a car, such as repair or maintenance. Under the heading "Recent Revisions" to the Collection Financial Standards posted on the IRS website, the IRS notes that the "ownership cost" Standards are based on the "five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors." See id. (emphasis added). As such, the "ownership cost" expense is not applicable if a debtor does not have a monthly expense related to financing a car. See In re Devilliers, 358 B.R. at 864 (The ownership allowance "is not the equivalent of an allowance for depreciation or an invitation for a debtor to 'save' for the ultimate replacement of an existing vehicle. Instead, the deduction is designed to assist with the acquisition of a vehicle on credit.").

The IRS recognizes that the vehicle "ownership cost" portion of the Local Transportation Standards is intended to apply only in situations where the debtor has a monthly vehicle acquisition financing expense, i.e., has a monthly vehicle lease or loan payment. Accordingly, the Local Standard for vehicle ownership is an expense that is not necessarily "applicable" to every debtor. This stands in stark contrast to the National Standards for food, clothing, and other items, which the IRS allows to all debtors based on their family size and income level "without questioning amounts actually spent."[7] "Thus, if a debtor is not incurring expenses for the purchase or lease of a vehicle, the debtor cannot claim a vehicle ownership expense under the IRS standards."[8] In re McGuire, 342 B.R. 608, 613 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2006); see also In re

[8] Under the IRS Transportation Standards, in situations where the debtor has no loan or lease payment obligation on a vehicle that is over six years old and/or has reported mileage of Ceasar, --- B.R. ---, 2007 WL 777821, *5 (Bankr. W.D. La. Mar. 6, 2007) (agreeing with the McGuire line of cases and noting that courts that disagree give too little weight to the critical qualifying word "applicable.").

How the Internal Revenue Service applies the Standards that it developed for its own internal debt collection purposes is relevant and should be considered by courts in applying the same Standards in analysis under section 707(b)(2). When Congress developed the means test, it "could have started from scratch, and created a system that was rigid but easy to administer, such as how many view workers' compensation or social security schemes." In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290, 306 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007). Instead, Congress "incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code an existing, administrative system that the IRS had long had in place." Id. This incorporation "strongly suggests that courts should look to how the IRS determined those standards; that is, as to how the IRS would have applied them in similar circumstances." Id. at 309.

In stating that the amounts "specified" by the IRS Standards may be deducted from current monthly income to yield a debtor's disposable income, Congress "essentially read[ ] into the Code not only the actual numbers contained in the IRS Standards, but also the Manual's context for their application." In re Howell, --- B.R. ---, 2007 WL 1237832 at *3 (Bankr. D. Kan. Apr. 26, 2007). Thus, "if guidance is sought on the meaning of the IRS standards that Congress incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code, practical reason would suggest that court should consider the full manner by which the IRS uses these standards." In re Slusher, 359 B.R. at 309; see also Howell, 2007 WL

75,000 or more miles, an additional operating expense of $200 may be allowable. See Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5 (entitled Collecting Process), Chapter 8, § 5.8.5.5.2, Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses, which may be found on the IRS website at http://www/irs/gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html. In this case, the United States Trustee factored in the additional $200 allowance in its means test analysis. RA 18.

1237832 at *3 ("It is unlikely that Congress intended the Statute to merely import the numbers without their attendant meaning and context"); In re Oliver, 350 B.R. 294, 301 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2006) (holding that debtor is not entitled to vehicle ownership expense because IRS Financial Analysis Handbook and Internal Revenue Manual limit expense to individuals that have loan or lease payment); In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 726 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) (same).

Finally, the court below expressed concern that the IRS Manual differs from section 707(b)(2)'s means test because the Manual lets taxpayers deduct the actual amount of their car payment - up to the cap set out in the IRS' Local Standards, but the means test allows debtors to claim the full amount of the Local Standard, even if their car payment is less. RA 30, p. 7-9. That is irrelevant. The relevant point is the IRS prohibits individuals from claiming a car payment when they have none. The exact same thing happens under the means test because a debtor without an "applicable" car expense cannot claim a car payment either.

Given the IRS' historic application of its National Standards and Local Standards up to the time of BAPCPA's enactment, "it would be quite odd if Congress intended to preclude courts from examining the context in which the authoring agency, the IRS, used and employed those standards." Id. Nothing compels such an odd reading. Consistent with IRS practice, this Court should hold that the IRS vehicle Ownership Standards do not apply to the Ragles' Honda Accord, and the bankruptcy court's order should be reversed.

II. The bankruptcy court's order should be reversed because it is inconsistent with the major goals of the 2005 amendments to the Bankruptcy Code.

The bankruptcy court's order also is inconsistent with Congress' goals and purpose in implementing bankruptcy reform. Congress amended the Bankruptcy Code in BAPCPA to rectify perceived abuses in the bankruptcy process. "Among the abuses identified by Congress was the easy access to chapter 7 liquidation proceedings by consumer debtors who, if required to file under chapter 13, could afford to pay some dividend to their unsecured creditors." Hardacre, 338 B.R. at 720 citing 151 Cong. Rec. S2459, 2469-70 (March 10, 2005). A "primary goal" of BAPCPA was to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006) citing H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 1 (2005), as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89. In cases such as this one, where the debtor has no loan or lease payment, Congress has established a system which does not provide her an expense deduction for vehicle financing. "Allowing debtors to deduct from their disposable income a fictional ownership allowance would give debtors with unencumbered vehicles a windfall at the expense of their unsecured creditors." Howell, 2007 WL 1237832 at *3.

CONCLUSION

For all of these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the November 15, 2006 Order entered by the bankruptcy court denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, and remand this case to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings.

Respectfully submitted,

Appellees.

Civil No. 3:07-cv-00026-KKC

MOTION FOR REHEARING

Richard F. Clippard, United States Trustee, by counsel, respectfully moves for a rehearing pursuant to Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8015 on the issue of whether the order of the bankruptcy court overruling the United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss Case was a final order, and in support states as follows:

Procedural History

On August 16, 2006, Michael J. Ragle and Tammy J. Ragle (the "Ragles") filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. On October 30, 2006, the United States Trustee timely filed a Motion to Dismiss Case for abuse. The United States Trustee's motion was grounded upon only the "presumed abuse" basis for dismissal. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). On March 23, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered an order ("Bankruptcy Court Order") overruling the motion to dismiss, concluding that the presumption of abuse did not apply. The United States Trustee timely filed a Notice of Appeal and an Election to Appeal to District Court on April 2, 2007.

On December 3, 2007, this Court entered an order dismissing the instant appeal for lack of jurisdiction. The Court concluded, without briefing from the parties, that the Bankruptcy Court Order was not a final order for purposes of appeal. The United States Trustee files this Motion for Rehearing to provide the Court with the position of the Department of Justice that an order overruling or denying a motion to dismiss a bankruptcy case is "final" for purposes of appeal.

Argument

A. The Bankruptcy Court Order Finally Decided The Issue of the United States Trustee's Right to Dismiss For Abuse of Chapter 7.

1. The Bankruptcy Court Order is a final order from which immediate appeal can be taken as of right. A bankruptcy court order is final and appealable where, as here, it "finally dispose[s] of discrete disputes within the larger case." In re Dow Corning Corp., 86 F.2d 482, 488 (6th Cir. 1996) (quoting In re Saco Local Dev. Corp., 711 F.2d 411, 441 (1st Cir. 1983)). The United States Trustee's motion to dismiss instituted a contested matter under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9014[1], and the order denying the motion finally resolved that contested

[1] Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 1017(f)(1) provides as follows: "Rule 9014 governs a proceeding to dismiss or suspend a case, or to convert a case to another chapter, except matter. See In re UAL Corp., 408 F.3d 847, 850 (7th Cir. 2005) (noting that an order resolving a contested matter is final if equivalent to the disposition of a stand-alone suit).

Here, the bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion. This is akin to entering judgment for the debtor. The order means the case filed by the Ragles will never be dismissed and instead must proceed to discharge.[2]

In this case, the court's order denying the motion to dismiss completely resolved the issue of the United States Trustee’s claim that granting relief to the debtor was a presumed abuse of chapter 7, and rejected the relief sought by the United States Trustee’s motion. The order was a formal adjudication of the section 707(b) proceeding and critically determined both the right of the debtor to proceed and that the United States Trustee could not dismiss the case for abuse. This is the epitome of a final order. See In re Morse Electric Co., 805 F.2d 262, 265 (7th Cir.1986) (“Finality of the order comes from the fact that it resolves all of [the appellant’s] claims . . .”) (emphasis in original).

Bankruptcy court orders denying motions to dismiss brought under section 707(b) differ fundamentally from orders in district court civil cases that deny motions to dismiss complaints, because section 707(b) motions are, themselves, the functional equivalents of complaints.

under §§ 706(a), 1112(a), 1208(a) or (b), or 1307(a) or (b).” Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014 governs contested matters and provides, inter alia, that a motion initiating a contested matter “shall be served in the manner provided for service of a summons and complaint by Rule 7004.”

[2] Under the facts of this case, the court below can never revisit the dismissal issue because the United States Trustee’s deadline has run for filing a motion to dismiss for presumed abuse. See 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(2).

In a civil case outside of bankruptcy, the denial of a motion to dismiss a complaint is not a final decision. See, e.g., Simon v. Pfizer, Inc., 398 F.3d 765, 771 (6th Cir. 2005). Such an order is not final because it "ensures that litigation will continue in the District Court." Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 485 U.S. 271, 275 (1988).

In the section 707(b) context, however, the denial of a motion to dismiss operates as a judgment for the debtor ensuring the debtor's case will not be dismissed. The Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure underscore why the denial of such a motion is final. Under the Rules, the filing of the 707(b) motion initiates a contested matter under Rule 9014. A motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b) is therefore the functional equivalent of a complaint commencing a cause of action, and an order either sustaining or overruling the motion is equivalent to a final judgment on the merits.

A denial of a section 707(b) motion conclusively determines the Rule 9014 contested matter, terminates it, and prevents the United States Trustee from asserting any claim under that section in the future. Thus, in cases like these, there is no litigation to "continue," so the denial order is final and appealable.

2. Significantly, the Bankruptcy Court Order finally denying the United States Trustee all relief in his contested matter is more final than most bankruptcy court orders determining contested matters. That is so because the Bankruptcy Code's statutory deadline for moving to dismiss this case for presumed abuse, set out in section 704(b)(2), has expired. See 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(2). A motion brought under section 707(b)(1) for presumed abuse under section 707(b)(2) is not only the functional equivalent of a cause of action, but one that must be pled within the time specified by section 704(b).

Unlike a motion to dismiss predicated on other grounds, this section 707(b) motion cannot be renewed. Whereas a motion to dismiss a chapter 7 case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a)(1) based on “unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors” has no statutory deadline and could be renewed if denied, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(a)(1), the bankruptcy court can no longer consider whether grounds exist for dismissal of a case for presumed abuse once the statutory deadline for filing such a motion has expired. Under section 704(b)(2), the United States Trustee’s deadline to file a motion to dismiss the debtor's case for presumed abuse expired on October 30, 2006. Thus, were there a question whether final rulings in contested matters are generally final, those concerns should evaporate given the Code’s filing deadline, which slams shut the door on any future trial court litigation concerning the right of the Ragles to bankruptcy relief.

Because the bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee’s section 707(b) motion to dismiss in this case, and the deadlines have run for filing a motion to dismiss under section 707(b)(3) and for objecting to discharge,[3] the Ragles must be issued a discharge absent reversal by this Court. The Bankruptcy Court Order ended the section 707(b) contested matter on the merits and left nothing further for the court to do with respect to the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. Because the Bankruptcy Court Order constituted a final adjudication by the bankruptcy court of this controversy, it qualifies as a final order subject to appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

[3] Under Interim Bankruptcy Rule 1017(e)(1) and Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9006(1), the deadline for filing a motion to dismiss pursuant to section 707(b)(3) or the motion to extend the time to file such a motion expired on August 21, 2006, the first business day after the 60th day following the first date set for the meeting of creditors in the bankruptcy case. Under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 4004(a), the deadline for filing a complaint objecting to discharge likewise expired on that date.

3. This Court's dismissal order indicates the Bankruptcy Court Order is not final because the bankruptcy court "must address the 'totality of the circumstances.'" Opinion and Order at 8. This is not correct. The United States Trustee's underlying motion was grounded only upon "presumed abuse," 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), and does not allege, or present any evidence on, whether the underlying case was otherwise abusive under the "bad faith" or "totality of the circumstances" standards. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). Nor is there any section 707(b)(3) proceeding before the bankruptcy court. See Bankruptcy Court Docket. Moreover, under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 1017(e)(2), it is too late for the parties or the court to commence one. Put simply, there was no section 707(b)(3) claim for the court to adjudicate, and the parties presented no evidence to enable the bankruptcy court to make findings on these issues.[4]

4. Although the United States Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit have not specifically addressed whether orders determining Rule 9014 contested matters triggered by the filing of section 707(b) motions are final, the clear weight of circuit law supports the conclusion that they are. Four United States courts of appeals–the Eighth, Third, Fifth, and Second– adjudicated appeals under the prior law that emanated from bankruptcy court orders denying section 707(b) motions to dismiss. See Stuart v. Koch (In re Koch), 109 F.3d 1285, 1289 (8th Cir. 1997) (holding that an order denying a section 707(b) motion to dismiss a chapter 7 case for substantial abuse is appealable); In re Christian, 804 F.2d 46, 47-48 (3d Cir. 1986) (same); see also In re Cortez, 457 F.3d 448, 453-54 (5th Cir. 2006) (treating as final for appeal purposes a bankruptcy court order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss); Schwartz v. Geltzer (In re Smith), — F.3d —, 2007 WL 3242846 (2d Cir. Nov. 5, 2007) (same).

5. Given the Sixth Circuit's finality jurisprudence, there is every reason to think it would follow the Second, Third, Fifth, and Eighth Circuits and treat orders denying section 707(b) motions as final. Indeed, the Sixth Circuit made clear that finality in the context of bankruptcy is broader than it is in ordinary civil litigation. In the case of In re Dow Corning Corp., 86 F.3d 482 (6th Cir. 1996), it held that the denial of motions to transfer tort litigation to the bankruptcy forum constituted a final order. The Court reasoned:

> The finality requirement is considered in a more pragmatic and less technical way in bankruptcy cases than in other situations. In bankruptcy cases, a functional and practical application [of appellate jurisdiction] is to be the rule. . . . Therefore, where an order in a bankruptcy case finally dispose[s] of discrete disputes within the larger case, it may be appealed immediately.

Id. at 488 (citations and internal quotations omitted). The same reasoning applies equally in the instant case, where the bankruptcy court's denial of the motion to dismiss finally disposed of that discrete dispute.

The decision of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel in the case of In re V Companies, 292 B.R. 290 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2003) ignores the pragmatic approach of finality set forth in Dow Corning. Without discussing the framework of Dow Corning, the panel merely stated without analysis that "the denial of a motion to dismiss is not a final order." 292 B.R. at 292. Ironically, the same panel in the case of In re Morton, 298 B.R. 301, 303 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2003), inconsistently held that a bankruptcy court's order overruling an objection to claim–itself a contested matter pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014–was a final order for purposes of appeal.

Not surprisingly, another panel of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel ignored the crabbed reading of finality espoused by V Companies when deciding whether an order was final. In the case of In re Geberegeorgis, 310 B.R. 61 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2004), the panel explicitly followed the Sixth Circuit's practical view of finality set forth in Dow Corning and held that "an order that concludes a particular adversarial matter within the larger case should be deemed final and reviewable in a bankruptcy setting." Id. at 63 (citations omitted). In that case, the panel concluded that an order vacating a chapter 13 dismissal "concluded the dispute over dismissal" and was a final order immediately appealable without waiting for completion of the chapter 13 plan and the debtor's discharge. Id. at 64. An even stronger case for finality is present in the instant appeal. Unlike the chapter 13 case in Geberegeorgis, which would involve considerable future administration of plan payments and likely disputes over future defaults and issues of plan interpretations, the instant bankruptcy case absent appeal awaits only entry of a Final Decree.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Order Decided the Ultimate Issue of Whether the Debtors' Case is Actually Abusive.

Nothing in this Court's December 3, 2007, order changes the fact that the Bankruptcy Court Order, like other orders denying section 707(b) motions, is final. The Bankruptcy Court Order finally disposed of the abuse issue and the ultimate issue of whether the debtor's petition should be dismissed.

Although the United States Trustee filed a motion alleging presumptive abuse under section 707(b)(2), he did not file a motion alleging abuse under section 707(b)(3). Significantly, he is precluded now from doing so, because the deadline for filing a section 707(b)(3) motion was August 21, 2006. See supra n.3. And because the Bankruptcy Court Order held that the presumption of abuse did not arise under section 707(b)(2), there are no proceedings regarding "special circumstances" that must be undertaken.

The bankruptcy court completely adjudicated the issue of presumptive abuse under section 707(b)(2), and there are no further proceedings that remain regarding abuse under section 707(b)(3). Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court Order finally rejected dismissal of the Ragles' case under section 707(b). The order is final.[5]

C. Failure to Treat the Order as Final Will Adversely Impact the Administration of the Bankruptcy Case.

[5] Even if there were pending motions to dismiss in this case from parties other than the United States Trustee, which there were not, the rights of the United States Trustee to seek dismissal under section 707(b) have been completely adjudicated by the Bankruptcy Court Order. The court's order conclusively determining the contested matter instituted by the United States Trustee's motion is therefore a final order. Moreover, even if the bankruptcy court should have considered the section 707(b)(3) factors itself after rejecting presumed abuse under section 707(b)(2), it did not, so that does not affect finality. The time for the court to consider this sua sponte has run. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(e)(2).

If the order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss is not immediately appealable as a final order, review of the decision will be delayed. If the order is ultimately reversed, this will have resulted in a needless expenditure of time and resources by the bankruptcy court, the Ragles, the chapter 7 trustee, and the United States Trustee. Forcing such a delay is "[n]either desirable nor practical." See Christian, 804 F.2d at 48 ("If the order [denying the section 707(b) motion to dismiss] here is not now appealable the entire bankruptcy proceedings must be completed before it can be determined whether they were proper in the first place. We do not view such a resolution as either desirable or practical.").

Debtors should not endure longer periods of limbo, creditors should not be forced to wait longer for case closure, and judicial resources should not be expended on matters that would become irrelevant and unnecessary if the dismissal order were ultimately overturned. See Koch, 109 F.3d at 1288 ("Requiring trustees to complete Chapter 7 proceedings before appealing denial of their § 707(b) motions wastes debtor resources that should be used to pay creditors, and forces trustees and bankruptcy courts to expend their scarce institutional resources on abusive Chapter 7 petitioners.").

Deeming orders denying section 707(b) motions as interlocutory will also lead to the appeal of multiple orders. If orders denying section 707(b) motions are not final, the United States Trustee will have to appeal each subsequent order that may be final in a case, in order to preserve its ability to appeal this issue. Those would include discharge orders, case closure orders, and perhaps others. The United States Trustee will also need to continue appealing orders denying motions to dismiss under section 707(b) to preserve its rights, should the Sixth Circuit hold that such orders are final.

Finally, treating denial of section 707(b) motions as interlocutory could impede the development of case law interpreting the recent Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA"), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (Apr. 20, 2005). Because BAPCPA is a new statute, any number of important appeals over the meaning of its provisions will likely arise from rulings such as the one at issue in this case. Everyone will benefit if this Court and other appellate courts are able to resolve these issues expeditiously, thereby removing uncertainties not just in the cases being appealed but in future cases presenting the same issues.

Conclusion

For the reasons detailed above, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to vacate its order dismissing this appeal, hold that the Bankruptcy Court Order is final order within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), and rule on the merits[6] of this appeal.

Respectfully submitted,

[6] During the pendency of this appeal, the only two appellate decisions that have been issued support the position of the United States Trustee that the Ragles are not entitled to claim the IRS vehicle ownership expense on Form 22A. See In re Harwick, 373 B.R. 645 (D. Minn. 2007); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762 (E.D. Wis. 2007). In both cases, the district courts treated bankruptcy court orders denying section 707(b) motions to dismiss as final orders for appeal.

INTRODUCTION

Pursuant to Fed. R. App. P. 29 and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8018(b), the United States submits this brief as amicus curiae urging affirmance of the bankruptcy court's ruling. The United States will address the following question presented upon appeal:

Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion in dismissing the Appellants' chapter 7 petition under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a)?

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of the federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6049. The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. Morganstern v. Revco D.S., Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990) ("the U.S. trustees are responsible for 'protecting the public interest and ensuring that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law.'") (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 109, reprinted in 1978 U.S.S.C.A.N. at 6070). To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding. . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 307; see also In re Revco, 898 F.2d at 500 (Congress intended United States Trustees to have appellate standing); In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) (allowing the United States Trustee to intervene and appear "at any level of the proceedings from the bankruptcy court on . . . as either a party or an amicus").

In this brief, the United States respectfully offers this Court its views on the correct interpretation of 11 U.S.C. § 707(a). See 28 U.S.C. § 517 (authorizing the Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States"). Section 707(a) authorizes bankruptcy courts at their discretion to dismiss cases pending under chapter 7 "for cause." 11 U.S.C. § 707(a). The statute is broad in scope and provides a critical mechanism by which bankruptcy courts can dispose of cases that should not proceed under chapter 7 for any number of reasons. The United States has not identified any case where debtors with such high incomes and lavish lifestyles have been permitted to discharge their debts through chapter 7 liquidation; the United States acts here to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy system by ensuring that such egregious cases may be dismissed for cause.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court, in holding that Appellants' chapter 7 petition was filed in bad faith, abused its discretion in dismissing Appellants' chapter 7 petition under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statute Involved.

The bankruptcy court dismissed the Appellants' cases under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a):

> The court may dismiss a case under this chapter [chapter 7] only after notice and a hearing and only for cause, including -
> > (1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;
> > (2) nonpayment of any fees and charges required under chapter 123 of title 28; and
> > (3) failure of the debtor in a voluntary case to file, within fifteen days of such additional time as the court may allow after the filing of the petition commencing such case, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521(a), but only on a motion by the United States trustee.

11 U.S.C. § 707(a) (2010) (emphasis added). Section 707(a) applies to all cases under chapter 7. 11 U.S.C. § 103(b).

B. Facts of the Case.

The Appellants, Dr. Mahmoud S. Rahim and Dr. Raya H. Abdulhaussain, (the "Doctors") are married, and are both medical doctors with separate practices. Slip Op. at 1. Their chapter 7 schedules establish they have approximately $39,400 in monthly income. Beyond that, the lower court found that additional income sources not disclosed by the Doctors raised their average monthly income to $42,446, corresponding with annual income of over $509,000. Id. at 1-2. On top of these income sources, the lower court found that the Doctors irregularly withdrew money from their medical practice "in varying but significant amounts" - though the amount of those withdrawals could not readily be determined at the time of the evidentiary hearing due to the "meager records" produced by the Doctors. Id. at 2 n.2. The Doctors' medical practices also paid $2,046 a month for their luxury vehicles - two Mercedes and a BMW.

The Doctors allege that all but $20.00 of their monthly income is consumed by their day-to-day expenditures. Id. at 3. These expenditures, which the lower court found "reflect[ed] a lifestyle that can only be described as extravagant and lavish[,]" Id. at 5, included $15,714 in expenses for their primary residence - including $14,503 in mortgage payments. Id. at 2. The Doctors also spend just shy of $5,000 per month on a second home in Florida, and an additional $2,600 per month on an unprofitable rental home. Id.

In addition to these considerable expenses, the lower court also noted that the Doctors spend over $1,800 per month on food and recreation, over $600 per month caring for the mother of one of the Doctors, $4,575 per month on private school for their two children, and $1,000 per month supporting a niece. Id. at 3. Thus, the lower court found that the Doctors make, and spend, over a half a million dollars each year. Id. at 1.

Against this income and these expenditures, the lower court noted that the Doctors' debts only totaled slightly more than ten million dollars - $3,417,423 in secured debts on real property, and $6,671,939 in unsecured claims, mostly on account of failed guaranties on failed real estate investments. Id. at 3. While these debts are, by any standard, a considerable sum, the lower court found that it would be possible for the Doctors to repay a considerable amount of these debts:

> If they would take the necessary steps to reduce their yearly expenses to, for example, half ($255,000 - still an extraordinary expense budget for a family of four in bankruptcy), they could commit the other half to a five year chapter 11 plan that would pay their creditors over $1,000,000. If they further reduced their yearly expenses to a more modest, but still comfortable, $150,000, the dividend to creditors might be $1,800,000.

Id. at 5.

Two of the Doctors' creditors, with claims of $329,485 and $3,815,352 each, respectively, filed a motion to dismiss the Doctors' chapter 7 petition pursuant to 11 U.S.C.

§ 707(a), arguing that the petition had been filed in bad faith.[1] The lower court held an evidentiary hearing on the matter which lasted an entire day, reviewed all the evidence presented and weighed the credibility of the witnesses presented, and issued a ten-page opinion dismissing the Doctors' case pursuant to § 707(a).

In that opinion, the lower court noted that the Doctors' "only substantial defense to the motion is that because their debts are business debts rather than consumer debts, ability to pay, on its own, is not sufficient to establish their bad faith." Id. at 6. While the lower court did consider the Doctors' ability to repay their creditors - finding that the Doctors had such an ability - the lower court also made other findings relevant to the motion, including that the Doctors had failed to make appropriate lifestyle adjustments, had not tried to meaningfully repay their creditors, and that the Doctors' use of chapter 7 was unfair. Id. at 5-6. The lower court also made findings that indicated the Doctors were paying expenses on behalf of insiders. Id. at 3. With all of these facts in mind, the lower court found that the Doctors' chapter 7 petition had been filed in bad faith, and dismissed the case. This appeal followed.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the Doctors' chapter 7 case for cause under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a) because it concluded that the Doctors had not filed their case in good faith. Although "cause" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code, each operative chapter of the Bankruptcy Code contains a provision permitting the court to dismiss a case "for cause,"[2] and courts have interpreted the "for cause" language broadly to encompass reasons well beyond the examples enumerated in each statute.

[1] The lower court noted that, as the Doctors' debts were not primarily consumer debts, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) was not applicable in this action. Slip Op. at 3, n.5.

[2] See 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(a); 930(a); 1112(b); 1208(c) & 1307(c).

The Sixth Circuit has held expressly that bad faith filing constitutes cause for dismissal under section 707(a). Industrial Ins. Servs. v. Zick, 931 F.2d 1124, 1127 (6th Cir. 1991). Courts identify bad faith based on a multi-factored, ad hoc analysis of the facts of the individual case. Ultimately, the bad faith analysis depends on whether the case passes the "smell test" based on consideration of the debtor's need for bankruptcy relief and whether the debtor has treated his creditors fairly. See Merritt v. Franklin Bank, N.A., No. 98-2399, 2000 WL 420681, at * 3 (6th Cir. Apr. 12, 2000) (unpublished).

The bankruptcy court made a number of factual findings that support its bad faith finding, none of which the Doctors challenge as clearly erroneous. Chief among those findings was that the Doctors made well over $500,000 annually, and spent essentially all of it living a lavish lifestyle. Those excessive expenditures continued, despite the Doctors' mounting debts. Instead of reducing their expenditures so they could pay their debts, the Doctors sought to discharge their debts through a chapter 7 liquidation. The bankruptcy court found that the Doctors could have paid their creditors as much as $1.8 million under chapter 11 or otherwise. Those findings establish this as an extraordinarily egregious case of debtors unfairly seeking relief the Bankruptcy Code was not intended to provide. The United States Trustee agrees with the bankruptcy court that the Bankruptcy Code does not envision chapter 7 liquidation relief under these circumstances; this case is more appropriately filed under chapter 11 where creditors would have some say in what they receive in return for a discharge of the Doctors' debts. Given its bad faith finding, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by dismissing this case for cause.

The Doctors argue that the bankruptcy court erred by relying solely on their ability to pay in dismissing the case. But this Court need not decide whether a debtor's ability to repay may be the sole basis for a finding of bad faith because the bankruptcy court made no less than five additional factual findings regarding the Doctors' conduct that constitute a sufficient basis for a bad faith dismissal, including (a) the Doctors' failure to disclose income on their schedules, (b) the Doctor's failure to disclose expenditures on their schedules, (c) their lavish lifestyle, (d) their continuing extravagant expenditures, and (e) their payment of expenses owed by family members, but not their own debts. All of these findings support the bankruptcy court's conclusion that the Doctors filed in bad faith.

The Doctors contend that their case may not be dismissed for bad faith under section 707(a) because the court did not find that they incurred their debts through misconduct. But it found facts that constitute misconduct. Even if it had not, that would not matter because there is no specific requirement as to how their debts were incurred. To the contrary, the bad faith inquiry is an ad hoc, multi-factored inquiry into the debtor's intent in filing.

Finally, the bankruptcy court did not, as the Doctors contend, improperly apply a section 707(b) analysis. The bankruptcy court cited and followed Zick. The Sixth Circuit contemplated some overlap between sections 707(a) and (b) in Zick. But the bankruptcy court's findings include indicia of the Doctors' bad faith beyond their prospective ability to pay their creditors – which is the primary focus of the abuse determination under section 707(b)(3)(B).

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN DISMISSING THE DOCTORS' CHAPTER 7 PETITION.

A. The Court's Factual Findings Support Its Bad Faith Finding.

Section 707(a) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that bankruptcy courts may dismiss a case for "cause." 11 U.S.C. § 707(a). A bankruptcy court's decision to dismiss pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(a) will be reversed only for abuse of discretion. Zick, 931 F.2d at 1126.

Section 707(a) enumerates three specific examples of cause, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(a)(1)-(3), but the Sixth Circuit has held that "the word 'including' was not meant to be a limiting word," Zick, 931 F.2d at 1126, and that other conduct could also establish "cause" for dismissal under § 707(a). Accord 11 U.S.C. § 102(3) (defining "including"). Each operative chapter of the Bankruptcy Code contains a similar provision authorizing the court to dismiss a case for cause. 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(a), 930(a), 1112(b)(1), 1208(c), 1307(c). In applying those provisions, courts have consistently applied "cause" broadly to permit courts to dismiss cases for various reasons beyond the examples specified in the provisions. For example, courts have dismissed cases under section 1112(b) for bad faith. See, e.g., In re Trident Associates L.P., 52 F.3d 127, 131 (6th Cir. 1995); In re McNallen, 197 B.R. 215, 220 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1995). And the Supreme Court has expressly held that "cause" under section 1307 includes bad faith. Marrama v. Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, 549 U.S. 365, 373-74 (2007).

"Under the in pari materia canon of statutory construction, statutes addressing the same subject matter generally should be read as if they were one law." Wachovia Bank v. Schmidt, 546 U.S. 303, 315-16 (2006) (internal citations and quotations omitted). The Sixth Circuit has acknowledged "the Bankruptcy Act as a detailed and calculated statutory scheme particularly appropriate to in pari materia construction." Lynch v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 710 F.2d 1194, 1198 (6th Cir. 1983). This Court should therefore construe 11 U.S.C. § 707(a)'s "for cause" requirement in a similarly broad fashion.

The Sixth Circuit has long held that lack of good faith is a valid basis to dismiss a chapter 7 case for cause under § 707(a). In re Zick, 931 F.2d at 1126-27. Reasoning that the principal purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to grant a "fresh start" to the "honest but unfortunate debtor," the Sixth Circuit concluded that a debtor who is not needy or who appears to be seeking a "head start" instead of dealing with his creditors on an equitable basis is not entitled to chapter 7 relief. Zick, 931 F.2d at 1128 (citing In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123, 126, 127-28 (6th Cir. 1989)).

Under Zick, the Sixth Circuit held that "[t]he facts required to mandate dismissal based upon a lack of good faith are as varied as the number of cases," Id. at 1127, and that the inquiry is necessarily "ad hoc" in nature. Id. at 1129. This Court subsequently held that the bad faith "ad hoc determination" should be "evaluated under various flexible standards." In re Laguna Assocs. L.P., 1993 WL 730746, at *3 (E.D. Mich. Apr. 12, 1993)(Edmunds, J.).

Over time, courts within the Sixth Circuit have developed a non-exhaustive list of facts that may support dismissal for cause under § 707(a) based on the debtor's lack of good faith, including but not limited to the following:

1. The debtor has reduced the creditor body to a single creditor immediately before filing;
2. The debtor has failed to make appropriate lifestyle adjustments;
3. There is an intent to avoid payment of a large single debt that has been reduced to judgment;
4. The debtor did not try to repay;
5. The use of chapter 7 is unfair;
6. The debtor has sufficient resources to pay debts;
7. The debtor is paying obligations to insiders;
8. The schedules inflate expenses;
9. The debtor transferred assets;
10. The debtor is abusing the protections of the Code;
11. The debtor showed a pattern to evade a single major creditor;
12. The debtor failed to make full disclosure;
13. The debts are modest in relation to assets and income;
14. There are multiple bankruptcy filings or other procedural "gymnastics"

In re Stump, 280 B.R. 208, 214 n.2 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2002) (internal citations omitted).

Not all these facts must be present. See In re Lichtenstein, 328 B.R. 513, 515 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 2005) (". . .where a combination of the factors is present, courts have held that dismissal is warranted"). As the Sixth Circuit has held, a bad faith inquiry is ad hoc. Zick, 931 F.2d at 1129. Each case is determined on its unique facts.

The bankruptcy court has wide discretion in finding bad faith by the debtor. Zick, 931 F.2d at 1126 ("A bankruptcy court decision to dismiss pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(a) will be reversed only for abuse of discretion"). That is because myriad factors can indicate bad faith. Indeed, in Marrama, the Supreme Court expressly declined to constrain "bad faith" with a single definition. 549 U.S. at 375 n.11. And the bankruptcy court is in the best position to evaluate the debtor's conduct and motives for seeking bankruptcy relief for two reasons. The bankruptcy court hears the debtor's testimony and evaluates the debtor's credibility. And it has a wide range of experience with debtors' reasons, both expressed and unexpressed for filing for bankruptcy.

Applying this law, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding bad faith. The court termed this case "truly . . . egregious." Slip Op. at 5. The court found that with their yearly income of over $500,000, the Doctors could repay their creditors up to $1.8 million with moderate adjustments to their budget. Id. In addition to the Doctors' prospective ability to pay their creditors in another chapter or outside of bankruptcy, the court made several findings concerning the Doctors' conduct that support its finding of bad faith:

- It found that the Doctors failed to disclose certain income and expenditures on their schedules. Slip Op. at 1-3.

- It found that the Doctors continued to live an "extravagant and lavish" lifestyle that was unprecedented in chapter 7 cases in the Court's experience, spending over $40,000 a month on themselves instead of paying their creditors. Id. at 5.

- It implicitly found that the Doctors did not try to repay their creditors, finding they had made "no effort whatsoever to reduce their expenses" and stating:

> It is significant that the debtors did not attempt to argue that they are unable to repay a meaningful portion of their debts through a chapter 11 plan or otherwise.

Id. at 5-6.

- It found that the Doctors supported their niece, and paid unspecified expenses for their mother as well as their mother-in-law's cable bills. Id. at 3. That amounts to preferring insiders over their creditors.

- The court also found that the Doctors' use of chapter 7 was "extraordinarily unfair" to their creditors and that "allowing bankruptcy relief to these debtors would also be unfair to every other debtor in bankruptcy." Id. at 5 & n.6.

These findings concerning both the Doctors' misconduct and their prospective ability to repay their creditors are sufficient to support the lower court's determination that the Doctors filed their case in bad faith. For these reasons, the court was well within its discretion to dismiss the case for cause under section 707(a).

B. This Court Need Not Address the Question of Whether Ability to Repay, Alone, Can Justify Dismissal Under Section 707(a) Because the Bankruptcy Court Found Additional Facts That Support Its Finding of Bad Faith.

While the Doctors concede, as they must, that a debtor's ability to repay his debts is relevant to a good faith inquiry,[3] (Appellants' Brief, Doc. No. 15, p. 9) they argue that the Ky. 1995) (listing post-petition ability to repay as a factor); In re Collins, 250 B.R. 645, 654-55 (Bankr. N.D.Ill. 2000) (present ability to pay is the "most important factor"); In re Cappuccetti, 172 B.R. 37, 40 (Bankr. E.D. bankruptcy court erred by relying solely on their prospective ability to repay their creditors.[4] Id. at 19. Although the United States believes that finding alone might be sufficient in some cases,[5] this Court need not reach that argument because as demonstrated above, many other factual findings - including the Doctors' prepetition misconduct - supported the bankruptcy court's finding that the Doctors filed their chapter 7 petition in bad faith. On these facts, the Court should affirm the finding of the lower court that the Doctors filed their case in bad faith, and hold that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing their petition under § 707(a).

C. The Bankruptcy Court Was Not Required to Find Misconduct in the Doctors' Incurrence of Their Debts.

The Doctors argue that dismissal for bad faith requires a finding of misconduct by the debtors in the occurrence of their debts, relying on Zick. Appellants' Brief, Doc. No. 15, pp. 12-19. In Zick, by way of example, the Sixth Circuit relied upon the following facts as establishing "cause" for dismissal:

> In this case, the court based its decision on (1) the debtor's manipulations which reduced the creditors in this case to one; (2) the debtor's failure to make significant lifestyle adjustments or efforts to repay; (3) the fact that the petition was filed clearly in response to [a creditor] obtaining a mediation award; and (4) the unfairness of the debtor's use of Chapter 7 under the facts of this case. We believe that the factors noted by the bankruptcy court may be sufficient to support its findings of bad faith.

[4] See, e.g., Appellants' Brief, Doc. No. 15, p. 3 ("The Court's holding was based upon the lone belief that the Appellants['] income was sufficient to warrant some form of meaningful repayment to their creditors"); id. at 18 ("The Bankruptcy Court in its Order to Dismiss relied exclusively on the Appellants' income and expenses, the Appellants' perceived ability to pay, in ruling that the Appellants filed their case in bad faith").

[5] The Sixth Circuit quoted Collier on Bankruptcy for the proposition that "when a debtor capable of at least partial repayment has made every effort to avoid payment of an obligation, lack of good faith sufficient to justify dismissal may be found." Zick, 931 at 1127 (quoting 4 Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 707.03 (15th ed. 1989)).

Zick, 931 F.2d at 1128. The Sixth Circuit found that those factors supported the bankruptcy court's finding of lack of good faith and noted that, "generally[,]" bad faith dismissal is used in "egregious cases" that involve similar factors. Id at 1129. While Zick articulated a list of non-exhaustive factors which were relevant to the appeal before it at that time, it did not specify any mandatory prerequisites to a court finding bad faith under § 707(a). See, e.g., Appellants' Brief, Doc. No. 15, pp.13-17. The Sixth Circuit merely observed that certain factors "generally" are present in cases that have been dismissed for bad faith under section 707(a); it did not hold that any or all of those factors must be present to warrant dismissal. Zick, 931 F.2d at 1129.[6] That would be contrary to Zick's other pronouncements that § 707(a) analyses are necessarily "ad hoc," and that "[t]he facts required to mandate dismissal based upon a lack of good faith are as varied as the number of cases," under which dismissal is appropriate. Id. at 1127, 1129.

Further, the specific criterion upon which the Doctors contend is required for a bad faith finding – debtor misconduct in incurring debts – is not even among the factors identified in Zick as generally present in cases dismissed under section 707(a). And the Doctors have cited no authority for the proposition that a finding of bad faith under section 707(a) must be based on evidence of debtor misconduct in the incurrence of a debt.

The Doctors' reliance upon cases in which courts have cited such wrongdoing in support of a bad faith finding is misplaced. It simply does not follow from the fact that specific misconduct can be indicative of bad faith that the same misconduct is required to justify dismissal for bad faith.

[6] Cf. Merritt, 2000 WL 420681 (affirming section 707(a) dismissal for bad faith despite absence of 1) a single large debt and 2) a finding of intent to avoid debt based on conduct akin to fraud, misconduct, or gross negligence - both of which are factors supporting bad faith as identified in Zick).

D. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision Does Not Circumvent Section 707(b).

Both section 707(a) and section 707(b) permit a bankruptcy court to dismiss a chapter 7 case. There is some overlap between section 707(a), which broadly authorizes dismissal "for cause," and section 707(b), which is targeted specifically at abusive cases, because both allow the court to dispose of cases that are in some sense unfair. Compare 11 U.S.C. § 707(a) with 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). Section 707(a) applies to all cases filed under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. In contrast, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) is applicable only in cases where a debtor's debts are primarily "consumer debts." See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1).[7]

Under section 707(b), the court may dismiss a case brought by a consumer debtor if the totality of the debtor's financial situation indicates that he has a meaningful ability to repay his creditors. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B); cf. In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (interpreting predecessor statute).

In their brief, the Doctors argue that the bankruptcy court erred by using a section 707(b) analysis to dismiss their case under section 707(a). They contend that:

> The Bankruptcy Court's ruling in the present case, if affirmed, would permit creditors and other parties in interest to use § 707(a) to circumvent the limitations in the application of a § 707(b) analysis, which strictly limits such a review of a debtor's financial situation and ability to pay for signs of abuse to consumer debt cases, and assert abuse claims against a debtor in a non-consumer debt case. This is a slippery slope that contradicts Congress' intent when it enacted BAPCPA.

Appellants' Brief, Doc. No. 15, p. 23. That argument is unpersuasive for several reasons.

[7] "Consumer debts" are defined in the Bankruptcy Code as "debt incurred by an individual primarily for a personal, family, or household purpose." 11 U.S.C. § 101(8). Debts outside the scope of "consumer debts," for example, would include debts incurred for a business purpose or with a profit motive in mind. See, e.g., In re Westberry, 215 F.3d 589, 593 (6th Cir. 2000). It was undisputed in the proceedings below that the Doctors' debts were not primarily consumer debts, and that § 707(b) therefore did not apply to their case.

First, review of a debtor's financial situation and ability to pay is not limited to section 707(b); case law from both inside and outside the Sixth Circuit demonstrates that bankruptcy courts may consider a debtor's ability to repay creditors in the context of a § 707(a) motion. See, e.g., In re Merritt, 2000 WL 420681, at *3; In re Perlin, 497 F.3d 364, 371 (3d Cir. 2007).

Second, the bankruptcy court did not apply the standard for abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B) to dismiss the Doctors' case under section 707(a). An abuse analysis under section 707(b)(3)(B) focuses primarily on the debtor's post-petition financial situation and analyzes the debtor's ability to make meaningful payments to his creditors. Cf. In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (6th Cir.1989) (interpreting predecessor statute). But the bankruptcy court's bad faith analysis under section 707(a) also examines the debtor's prepetition conduct and seeks to ascertain the debtor's motive in filing for bankruptcy. To that end, the court considered much more than the Doctors' substantial prospective ability to repay their creditors under chapter 11 or outside of bankruptcy. The bankruptcy court was particularly offended by the fact that despite having accrued enormous debt, the Doctors made no effort to "tighten their belts," but continued to spend their $500,000 annual income on extravagant expenditures and a lavish lifestyle. Instead of paying some of what they owed, the Doctors chose to put their substantial resources beyond the reach of their creditors.

Third, the Doctors' assertion that allowing ability to repay considerations within § 707(a) would somehow contravene Congressional intent in enacting BAPCPA is entirely without merit. In enacting BAPCPA in 2005, Congress did not speak at all about non-consumer debtors. Rather, the primary change pertinent to this appeal in the BAPCPA amendments to the Bankruptcy Code was to lower the § 707(b) threshold showing from "substantial abuse" to simple "abuse." That Congress sought to make it easier to dismiss consumer debtors' chapter 7 petitions says nothing about the review given to non-consumer debtors' chapter 7 filings.

If anything, the BAPCPA amendments would counsel against the Doctors' current arguments. Congress enacted BAPCPA "to correct perceived abuses of the bankruptcy system." Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, 130 S.Ct. 1324, 1329 (2010). Such "perceived abuses" included a general intent to "push more debtors toward paying their creditors[.]" In re Cavanaugh, 2007 WL 6363170, at *3 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. Aug. 24, 2007) (Shapero, J.). It is inconceivable, that, in enacting provisions designed to increase payments to creditors, Congress could have intended non-consumer debtors to evade review on something as fundamental to the bankruptcy process as an ability to repay creditors. As noted by the lower court:

> If Congress fully intended to allow chapter 7 relief to a debtor with primarily business debt regardless of income, expenses, ability to pay or lack of need, surely it would have stated so explicitly in the code.

Slip Op. at 9. A contrary holding by this - or any - Court would judicially insulate non-consumer filers from review under the overwhelming majority of circumstances, with absolutely no Congressional authority upon which to base such a holding.

Finally, both the Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit have ruled that "cause" in a dismissal statute includes bad faith. Marrama, 549 U.S. at 393-94; Zick, 931 F.2d at 1126-27. The fact that section 707(b)(3)(A) alternatively allows courts to dismiss for bad faith does not change the fact that section 707(a) permits dismissal on that ground too. Here the trial court did not clearly err in finding bad faith under section 707(a), so its order merits affirmance.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the bankruptcy court should be affirmed.

11 U.S.C. §707(b)(2) 1, 3

11 U.S.C. §707(b)(2)(A)(iii) 1, 2

ARGUMENT

In his opening brief, the United States Trustee established the Debtor's chapter 7 case should have been dismissed because her disposable income exceeded the statutory maximum under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2). Open br. at 5, 6. That is so because the Debtor improperly sought to reduce her disposable income by claiming a secured debt mortgage expense under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) for her house even though she was surrendering the house, the house was in foreclosure, and the Debtor had not made any mortgage payments for the 16 months prior to filing for bankruptcy. Open br. at 4.

On appeal, the Debtor advances two justifications for claiming a mortgage expense she will not have: (1) the plain meaning of section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) compels the expense deduction notwithstanding her surrender of her house; and (2) excluding the mortgage expense payment from the means test for property surrendered or to be surrendered by debtors would frustrate the mechanical nature of the means test. Both arguments lack merit.

First, the Debtor's plain meaning argument misreads section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii). Under the Debtor's construction, a debtor could claim a mortgage deduction so long as the mortgage was on the books at the time the debtor sought bankruptcy - even if, as here, the debtor was in the process of abandoning the property, had long ceased making mortgage payments, and freely admitted no more would ever be made. Not only does that reading produce arbitrary and unfair results, it conflicts with two phrases in section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii): (a) the requirement that debts "shall be calculated" as "scheduled as contractually due," and (b) that debt be determined as due "in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(iii). See In re Skaggs, 349 B.R. 594, 600 (Bankr.E.D.Mo. 2006) (adopting the reading suggested here). Given that these phrases are forward looking, section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) is best read as contemplating a forward looking calculation that factors in "the debtors' intention to surrender the collateral and make no future payments to the creditor." In re Ray, 2007 WL 690131, *5 (Bankr.D.S.C. Feb. 28, 2007).

Applying this forward looking reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) to this Debtor's case makes clear that the mortgage expense she seeks to claim under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) is improper. The Debtor concedes she is in the process of surrendering her residence (R. 15). She has acquiesced in the secured creditor's motion for relief from stay so the property can be foreclosed upon (R. 20 / R. 25). Upon foreclosure, the Debtor will receive a discharge from her personal liability on the mortgage debt and creditor will obtain a foreclosure decree through its in rem proceeding against the real property. See First Federal Sav. Bank of Proviso Tp. v. Drovers Nat'l Bank of Chicago, 237 Ill.App.3d 340, 606 N.E.2d 1253, 1258. (Ill.App. 2 Dist.1992)(bankruptcy discharge extinguishes creditor's right to proceed in personam against defaulting debtor, not right to proceed in rem in mortgage foreclosure action.) This means the secured creditor is taking title to the property and the Debtor will no longer have a mortgage payment. Id. Because the Debtor will have no payments due on the residence's secured debt in any of the 60 months following the date of the petition, in calculating the maximum amount the debtor has available going forward to repay her unsecured debt, these prior payment obligations cannot be deducted.

Second, the Debtor argues the United States Trustee's approach is inconsistent with the mechanical nature of the means test. Response br. at 10-11. The United States Trustee's interpretation does not alter the mechanical nature of the means test because conditioning the secured debt expense deduction on having a monthly payment obligation is applied in the same mechanical fashion as other allowed expenses under the means test. Under the United States

Trustee's interpretation, debtors deduct either (a) their mortgage expense when the debtor is making a mortgage payment, or (b) the IRS Housing and Utility Standard, when the debtor is not. This simple election is as mechanical as other parts of the means test.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, as well as those reasons stated in his opening brief, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order entered below and remand this case with instructions to the bankruptcy court to correctly apply the means test under 11 U.S.C. section 707(b)(2).

FEDERAL CASES

FEDERAL STATUTES

OTHER AUTHORITIES

The United States submits this brief under Fed. R. App. P. 29 as amicus curiae supporting the appellee, MBNA America Bank, N.A.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This appeal calls upon this Court to examine a statutory provision affecting chapter 13 bankruptcy cases, 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Section 1325(b)(3) makes two chapter 7 provisions – 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B) – applicable to chapter 13 cases.

The United States has a direct interest in the proper construction of these provisions because United States Trustees, who are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General, supervise the administration of chapter 7 and chapter 13 bankruptcy cases in all federal judicial districts within this circuit. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977) (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena."); Curry v. Castillo (In re Castillo), 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002) (citing this legislative history).

This appeal affects the United States' interests for two distinct reasons:

First, by applying section 1325(b)(3), this Court will determine how much above-median-income chapter 13 debtors must repay their creditors in their chapter 13 repayment plans. The United States has an interest in that question because United States Trustees "supervise the administration of [chapter 13] cases and trustees," monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such chapter 13 plans in connection with plan confirmation hearings under section 1324 of the Code. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

Second, because section 1325(b)(3) incorporates two parts of the chapter 7 means test, sections 707(b)(2)(A) and (B), this appeal will also determine what expenses above-median-income chapter 7 debtors can claim on the means test. The means test determines whether an above-median-debtor's chapter 7 case should be dismissed as abusive. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1) and (2).

United States Trustees play a unique role in chapter 7 means test cases because section 704(b) requires them to review all such cases and, whenever a case is deemed presumptively abusive under the statute, either (a) seek its dismissal, or (b) file a statement declining to seek dismissal. See 11 U.S.C. 704(b). In fiscal year 2007, United States Trustees filed 3,370 motions to dismiss under section 707(b)(2) and 1,441 statements declining to seek dismissal when a presumption of abuse existed in a case.

In light of these interests, the United States submits this brief to share its views on the application of sections 1325(b)(3) and 707(b)(2)(A) in cases like Mr. Ransom's. See 28 U.S.C. 517 (authorizing the Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States"). See also 11 U.S.C. 307 ("The United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding."); In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) (interpreting section 307).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

The Bankruptcy Code allows debtors to claim a vehicle ownership expense, in a set amount, when "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). In this case, Mr. Ransom claimed such an expense even though he had no vehicle ownership expenses.

Did the bankruptcy court and the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit err in ruling Mr. Ransom could not claim that expense because it was not "applicable" in his case?[1] bankruptcy relief.

STATUTORY BACKGROUND

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("Reform Act")[2] significantly altered how chapter 13 debtors obtain chapter 13

[2] Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005). The Reform Act applies to Mr. Ransom's case, because the act's general effective date is for cases filed on or after October 17, 2005.

In a chapter 13 case, a debtor's unsecured creditors or trustee may insist the debtor devote all of his "projected disposable income" to repay unsecured creditors. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). Disposable income is a net number: income less expenses.

Under the Reform Act, an above-median-income debtor, like Mr. Ransom, determines disposable income by first calculating his gross income.[3] Next, the debtor deducts his permitted expenses. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2).

Above-median-income chapter 13 debtors determine their permissible expenses by employing the formula found in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B). 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3) (incorporating those provisions). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) permits debtors to deduct (a) certain prescribed "actual" expenses, and (b) other "applicable" expense amounts. Applicable expense amounts are determined under the Internal Revenue Service's Local and National Standards. Id. Last, a debtor

[3] The Bankruptcy Code provides that income is "current monthly income received by the debtor (other than child support payments, foster care payments, or disability payments for a dependent child made in accordance with applicable nonbankruptcy law to the extent reasonably necessary to be expended for such child)." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2).

The term "current monthly income" itself is defined in the Code. 11 U.S.C. 101(10A).

may deduct additional expenses identified in other subsections of section 707(b)(2)(A). That yields a net number – disposable income, which establishes the minimum an above-median-income debtor must pay to unsecured creditors under a chapter 13 plan. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B).

This appeal involves one part of the expense-side calculation of disposable income – whether a vehicle ownership deduction under an IRS Local Standard is "applicable" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to a particular debtor. The IRS Local Standard allows debtors to claim an expense amount to cover monthly vehicle loan or lease payments. See IRS Collection Financial Standards, Local Standards: Transportation (explaining that the vehicle ownership Local Standard is a "figure[] for monthly loan or lease payments").[4] In calculating disposable income, if an IRS Local Standard is applicable to a debtor, the debtor may deduct the precise dollar amount the standard sets out as the reasonable amount. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

In this case, Mr. Ransom has no loan or lease payments on his vehicle, so [4] We attach the IRS Collection Financial Standards in our addendum. Because Mr. Ransom filed his case on July 5, 2006, the Collection Financial Standards in effect prior to October 1, 2007, are applicable. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (stating that the IRS standards will be those "as in effect on the date of the order for relief").

this appeal requires this Court to determine whether he may nonetheless claim the IRS Local Standard amount expense of $471 for each month of his 60-month plan.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On July 5, 2006, Mr. Ransom filed a voluntary petition under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. His means test form claimed monthly disposable income of $210.55.[5] In making this calculation, Mr. Ransom claimed on his means test form a $471 monthly vehicle ownership expense deduction under the IRS Local Standard, although he owns his vehicle free and clear of any loan or lease obligation. Mr. Ransom's chapter 13 repayment plan proposed to pay $500 monthly to unsecured creditors over 60 months.

The chapter 13 trustee and an unsecured creditor, MBNA America Bank, objected to confirmation of Mr. Ransom's plan, alleging the plan violated 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). They argued that Mr. Ransom had monthly disposable income of $681.55 available to repay unsecured creditors, because Mr. Ransom was ineligible to claim the $471 vehicle ownership expense amount. Mr. Ransom countered that he was entitled to claim the expense amount regardless of whether his car was paid in full.

[5] The chapter 13 means test form, Form 22C, is a new form developed after the enactment of the Reform Act. This form provides for the computation of a chapter 13 debtor's income and expenses under the Reform Act.

The means test form was approved by the Judicial Conference of the United States and is a part of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure.

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Nevada sustained the objections of the trustee and MBNA. Bankr. Op. at 7. It read 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as allowing Mr. Ransom "[to] only deduct a vehicle ownership expense if he is currently making loan or lease payments on that vehicle." Id. at 4. The court denied confirmation of Mr. Ransom's plan, because Mr. Ransom incorrectly deducted his phantom vehicle payments when calculating his disposable income available to pay unsecured creditors under 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). Id. at 7.

The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Ninth Circuit affirmed. Ransom v. MBNA America Bank, N.A. (In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 799 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007). The panel held that debtors may not claim vehicle ownership expense amounts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) for vehicles owned free and clear of any liens and encumbrances. Id. at 801.

The same day it affirmed the bankruptcy court, the appellate panel sua sponte certified the bankruptcy court's decision to this Court under 28 U.S.C. 158(d)(2). Ransom v. MBNA America Bank, N.A.(In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 809 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The lower courts ruled Mr. Ransom has no “applicable” vehicle ownership expense amount that he can claim under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) because he has no loan or lease expense obligation on his vehicle. This interpretation best reads this section because it (1) uses the ordinary dictionary meaning of “applicable,” and does so in a way that gives meaning to each word in the section; (2) fulfills Congress’ stated reasons for enacting the section; (3) determines expense eligibility like the Internal Revenue Service does “under” the IRS standards referenced in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I); and (4) treats all debtors fairly, while treating creditors fairly as well.

1. Giving “applicable” its ordinary definition in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) validates the lower courts’ interpretation of the statute. That ordinary definition yields a statute that allows debtors who have an expense to claim the IRS expense amount, while simultaneously preventing those who lack one from artificially reducing payments to their creditors by claiming phantom expenses. It avoids conflating two words in the section – “applicable” and “actual,” a flaw inherent in Mr. Ransom’s reading. It also yields a statute that gives meaning to every word in the section, something Mr. Ransom’s proffered construction does not. Given this, it is no surprise that all eight appellate courts to interpret the meaning of "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) – six United States district courts and two bankruptcy appellate panels – have rejected the construction of "applicable" that Mr. Ransom advances before this Court.[6]

2. The Reform Act's legislative history supports the lower courts' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). It reveals Congress enacted the new law to (a) ensure that debtors would repay their debts when they could, and (b) eliminate loopholes and incentives for abuse. The lower courts' construction fulfills these congressional goals. Mr. Ransom's does not.

3. The lower courts interpreted a debtor's eligibility to claim a vehicle ownership expense amount under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) like the IRS determines eligibility under the IRS standards that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) references. This harmonious application is not the product of mere coincidence.

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s text and its legislative history indicate Congress wanted courts to employ the IRS's methodology in determining whether debtors are eligible to claim standards expense amounts in particular cases.[7] The lower courts' interpretation achieves that; Mr. Ransom's does not.

4. The lower courts' interpretation also comports with sound notions of public policy. Barring above-median-income debtors like Mr. Ransom from claiming phantom ownership expenses is fair. It simply prevents them from claiming expenses they do not have. This interpretation does not hurt lower-income debtors, because they are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). The lower courts' interpretation is also fair to creditors because they will receive payments on their debts when debtors have the financial ability to repay.

Finally, the bankruptcy system has two safety valves to ensure that higher-income debtors without loan or lease payments will not suffer by being denied phantom vehicle expenses. First, if they have older vehicles, they are entitled to an additional $200 monthly expense allowance to fund operating their older vehicles. Second, above-median-income chapter 13 debtors can modify their court-confirmed repayment plan under section 1329(a) if they require a new car during the course of repaying their creditors.

ARGUMENT

THE LOWER COURTS CORRECTLY RULED DEBTORS CANNOT CLAIM A VEHICLE OWNERSHIP DEDUCTION UNDER SECTION 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE WHEN THEY HAVE NO VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSES.

The United States asks this Court to affirm the lower courts' rulings that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code does not allow Mr. Ransom to reduce his disposable income available to repay creditors by claiming an inapplicable vehicle ownership expense. Those courts ruled Mr. Ransom cannot claim such a vehicle expense amount in his case because Mr. Ransom has no vehicle ownership expenses.

I. The lower courts' interpretation is the best reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

A. Vehicle ownership expense amounts are only applicable if a debtor is making loan or lease payments on a vehicle.

The Bankruptcy Code permits above-median-income debtors like Mr. Ransom to claim a vehicle ownership expense amount when that expense is "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), which section 1325(b)(3) incorporates into Mr. Ransom's chapter 13 case, provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service. . . ." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The statute thus expressly provides that before a specific expense amount may be claimed by a debtor under the IRS Local Standards, the expense amount must first be applicable to the debtor. Id.

"Applicable" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code, so the word should be given its ordinary meaning. Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning."); United States v. TRW Rifle 7.62 x 51 mm Caliber, One Model 14 Serial 593006, 447 F.3d 686 (9th Cir. 2006) (same); United States v. Hursh, 217 F.3d 761, 769 (9th Cir. 2000) (recognizing that when a word is not defined by statute or case law, a court "must look to the dictionary for the ordinary, common meaning of this word").

The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean "applying or capable of being applied; relevant; suitable; appropriate." Random House Unabridged Dictionary (2006).[8] [8] Even though this Court has not defined "applicable" in a bankruptcy context, it has interpreted it in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as meaning "capable of being applied." Fong v. Glover, 197 F.2d 710, 711 (9th Cir. 1952).

The courts below applied this ordinary meaning in concluding Mr. Ransom could not claim a vehicle expense amount when he had no vehicle expenses. The point here is simple – a debtor has no "applicable" section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) vehicle ownership "expense amounts "capable of being applied to the debtor if he does not make any lease or loan payments." Ransom v. MBNA America Bank, N.A.(In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 799, 807-08 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007). Unsurprisingly, all the appellate courts agree on this point, and all reject Mr. Ransom's contrary interpretation. Grossman v. Sawdy (In re Sawdy), __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 789116 (E.D. Wis. March 17, 2008); Wieland v. Thomas (In re Thomas), __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 597586 (D. Kan. March 4, 2008); Meade v. McVay (In re Meade), __B.R. __, 2008 WL 792060 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 24, 2008); United States Trustee v. Deadmond (In re Deadmond), 2008 WL 191165 (D. Mont. Jan. 22, 2008); Fokkena v. Hartwick (In re Hartwick), 373 B.R. 645 (D. Minn. 2007); Neary v. Ross-Tousey (In re Ross-Tousey), 368 B.R. 762 (E.D. Wis. 2007); Babin v. Wilson (In re Wilson), __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 681102 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008).

This definition coincides with the lower courts' construction of "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

B. Mr. Ransom's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) suffers from three flaws the lower courts' interpretation avoids: (a) conflating "applicable" with "actual," (b) rendering the word "applicable" superfluous, and (c) misinterpreting the official means test form.

Mr. Ransom does not read "applicable" as an eligibility requirement. Instead, he suggests "applicable" merely refers to "the region of the country where a debtor resides as well as the number of vehicles a debtor owns." Appellant's Br. at 5. Under Mr. Ransom's reading, he can claim the amount under the IRS Local Standard for each car he owns even if he does not have any loan or lease payments.[9] Id.

Mr. Ransom's interpretation suffers from at least three flaws:

First, Mr. Ransom's reading confuses the distinction between the words "actual" and "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). See Appellant's Br. at 6. He argues the lower courts equate "applicable" with "actual" and that cannot be because Congress used both words in the statute, and the words therefore must have different meanings. Id. Therefore, he argues that he need not have any actual expense for the ownership expense amount to be applicable. Id.

---

[9] Two of the bankruptcy court decisions Mr. Ransom relies upon heavily in his opening brief have been reversed. See Appellant's Br. at 9 (citing In re Sawdy, 362 B.R. 898 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2007), since rejected, and vacated for further proceedings by Grossman v. Sawdy, __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 789116 (E.D. Wis. March 17, 2008)); Appellant's Br. at 12 (citing In re Wilson, 373 B.R. 638 (Bankr. W.D. Ark. 2007), since reversed by Babin v. Wilson, __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 681102 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008)).

This argument fails to recognize that “expense amounts” – the words following “applicable” in the statute – do not refer to “actual” costs. Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650 (recognizing that a debtor’s “actual” expense does not control the amount of the vehicle ownership deduction” under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)). To the contrary, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) uses numbers under the IRS Local and National Standards as fixed amounts regardless of the debtor’s “actual” expenses. Id. In calculating disposable income, so long as a debtor incurs some vehicle ownership expense, i.e., the expense is applicable to the debtor, the debtor is entitled to list the amount specified under the IRS Local Standard. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (providing that the applicable expense amount “shall be” the amount “specified” under the IRS Local Standard). See also Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650 (recognizing that any vehicle ownership expense will make a debtor eligible for the full IRS standard amount).

Under the better reading, the IRS standard expense amounts are not applicable to a debtor if the debtor lacks any costs in the first place. This reading “gives meaning to the distinction between ‘applicable’ and ‘actual’ without taking a further step to conclude that ‘applicable’ means ‘nonexistent’ or ‘fictional.’”

Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765. Accord Thomas, __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 597586 at *4 (rejecting Mr. Ransom's applicable-actual argument); Meade, __B.R. __, 2008 WL 792060 at *3 (same).

As the lower appellate courts have concluded, "applicable" and "actual" have distinct meanings in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). But the Supreme Court has recognized that different words within a single section can be synonyms. Wachovia Bank v. Schmidt, 546 U.S. 303, 314 (2006) (noting "Congress may well have comprehended the words 'located' and 'established,' as used in [28 U.S.C.] § 1348, not as contrasting, but as synonymous or alternative terms"). Therefore, should this Court conclude that "applicable" is synonymous with "actual" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Mr. Ransom would remain ineligible for a vehicle ownership expense amount because he has no "actual" ownership expenses.

Second, Mr. Ransom's reading of "applicable" renders it superfluous. Under Mr. Ransom's reading, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would have the same meaning without the word "applicable" in it. Mr. Ransom suggests the word simply instructs debtors to go to the IRS standards referenced in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) and locate the standard dollar figure it allows in a debtor's locality for the number of vehicles the debtor has. Appellant's Br. at 5. But debtors would do the same thing if the word applicable were not in the statute because the statute would still provide "[t]he debtor's monthly expense shall be the debtor's ~~applicable~~ monthly expense amounts" in the IRS standards. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). That would still lead the debtor to the same line under the Local Standard that Mr. Ransom suggests the word "applicable" exists to accomplish. Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (Mr. Ransom's construction would "read[] 'applicable' right out of the Bankruptcy Code"); Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (E.D. Wis. 2007) ("Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) [without using the word 'applicable.']"); Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4 ("The word ['applicable'] must mean something, and if some monthly expenses are applicable, then other monthly expenses are not applicable.").

Because Mr. Ransom's reading renders "applicable" superfluous, the word must have a different meaning. See generally Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect. (citation omitted)); United States v. Vidal, 504 F.3d 1072, 1081 (9th Cir. 2007) ("We presume that a legislature does not employ redundant language in crafting a statute . . ."). As we explain above – it does. Under its dictionary meaning, the word exists to allow debtors to claim a standard vehicle expense amount that is applicable to them because they have a loan or lease expense.

Third, Mr. Ransom misinterprets the significance of the official means test form when he suggests the form dictates that "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) must mean the number of vehicles a debtor owns and their location, rather than meaning that the vehicles must be encumbered by a loan or lease expense. Appellant's Br. at 16-17. See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22C, line 28 (the portion of the chapter 13 means test form that permits debtors to "claim" vehicle ownership expenses).

The form merely instructs debtors to "check the number of vehicles for which you claim an ownership/lease expense." Official Form 22C, line 28 (emphasis added). It does not define what ownership expense amounts debtors may lawfully deduct under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Nor does it purport to define "applicable."

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) determines which "applicable" expense amounts debtors may deduct – not the form. See In re Lasowski, __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 833971 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 31, 2008) (noting that the Bankruptcy Code, not the chapter 13 means test form, controls the calculation of amounts to be excluded from disposable income). The form makes that clear by merely instructing debtors to enter the expenses they "claim," not the expenses to which they are entitled.

See, e.g., Sawdy, __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 789116 at *4 (rejecting the argument that the means test form contemplates ownership expense amount deductions regardless of the existence of ownership costs).

And federal law prohibits an official form from being interpreted as altering the meaning of "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). 28 U.S.C. 2075 (providing that the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure "shall not abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right"); In re Beaty, 306 F.3d 914, 924 (9th Cir. 2002) ("[A] Bankruptcy Rule cannot create an exception to the Bankruptcy Code . . .") (internal quotation omitted). Instead, "national or local forms are only valid to the extent that they conform to the substantive provisions of the Bankruptcy Code," and "it is axiomatic that guidelines in a form cannot stand as independent authority in opposition to the Bankruptcy Code itself." Ransom, 380 B.R. at 805 n.13.[10]

[10] Mr. Ransom also suggests that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s proviso that monthly expenses may not include any "payments for debts" means it is irrelevant whether or not a debtor is making loan or lease payments on a vehicle. Appellant's Br. at 7-8. This suggestion misunderstands the statute. Debtors for whom the ownership expense is applicable do not deduct their "payments" for debts. Instead, they receive a fixed standard allowance that is the dollar amount of the IRS Local Standard.

The "payment for debts" language ensures that debtors do not deduct their actual payments for debts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) for categories in the IRS's Other Necessary Expenses. Other Necessary Expenses categories include secured debt payments, repayments of delinquent tax debts, and student loans. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, §

II. The lower courts' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) fulfills two goals Congress expressed in enacting the Reform Act: (a) to ensure above-median-income debtors repay their debts when they can, and (b) to eliminate abuse.

A. Congress passed the Reform Act to maximize debtor repayment to creditors and to eliminate opportunities for bankruptcy abuse.

In interpreting "applicable" in 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), this Court may consider whether the lower courts' reading is "most harmonious with [the Code's] scheme and with the general purposes that Congress manifested." United States v. Alghazouli, __ F.3d __, 2008 WL 564986 (9th Cir. March 4, 2008) (internal quotation omitted).

The Reform Act's legislative history confirms that the lower courts' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is fully consistent with the intent of the act. See, e.g., American Fed'n of Gov't Employees, AFL-CIO Local 2152 v. Principi, 464 F.3d 1049, 1056 (9th Cir. 2006) (examining legislative history "to ensure that our reading comports with Congress' intent" and to demonstrate that alternative readings "are inconsistent with the logical meaning of the language").

The "heart" of the Reform Act is the means test, which seeks to "ensure that Secured debt payments may be deducted under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii), and repayments of delinquent tax debts may be deducted under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iv). debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89. Cf. Thomas, 2008 WL 597586 at *5 ("If a debtor were permitted a car ownership allowance when he actually incurs no such expense, application of the means test would not accurately reflect the debtor's ability to repay creditors, and the purpose of the statute would be frustrated."). The Reform Act also seeks to eliminate "loopholes and incentives" in the system "that allow and – sometimes – even encourage opportunistic personal filings and abuse." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5, 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 92.

Ensuring that above-median-income debtors are eligible to claim standardized deductions for vehicle ownership expenses only when they have ownership expenses honors congressional intent that such debtors repay their debts when they can. See Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807 ("[W]hat is important is the payments that debtors actually make, not how many cars they own, because the payments that debtors make are what actually affect their ability to make payments to their creditors."); Wilson, __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 681102 at *3 ("[T]here can be no doubt that the purpose of these amendments to [sections] 707(b) and 1325(b) was to require above-median income debtors to make more funds available to their unsecured creditors, and to do so by limiting the court's authority to allow expenses."); Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 ("The statute is only concerned about protecting the debtor's ability to continue owning a car, and if the debtor already owns the car, the debtor is adequately protected."); Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same).

B. Mr. Ransom's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would yield results that conflict with congressional intent.

Mr. Ransom's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would frustrate the Reform Act's goals by unnecessarily reducing payments to creditors by allowing above-median-income debtors to claim phantom expenses that do not apply to them. In Mr. Ransom's case, for example, $28,260 of his income would be shielded from unsecured creditors over his five-year repayment plan, although none of this money applies to an applicable expense.[11]

Under Mr. Ransom's reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), higher-income debtors "who own two unusable cars rusting in their back yard would be entitled to the windfall benefit of both ownership and operating expense deductions although they, in fact, incur no expenses by owning the vehicles." Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (citations omitted). This statutory reading has been rejected by appellate courts because it "defies common sense." Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4.

[11] By incorrectly deducting $471 in monthly ownership expense amounts for nonexistent costs in calculating disposable income, Mr. Ransom's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would reduce payments to creditors by $28,260 over his 60-month plan (60 months x $471 = $28,260).

III. The lower courts' interpretation of section 707(b)(2) (A)(ii)(I) coincides with the IRS's refusal to allow parties to claim nonexistent vehicle ownership expenses under its Local Standard.

Mr. Ransom suggests the bankruptcy court "erred in consulting the IRS manuals" in examining the proper application of the IRS standards identified in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Appellant's Br. at 15-16.

This suggestion is incorrect for two reasons.

First, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s text requires that expense amounts be those established "under" the IRS standards. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). This textual "reference to amounts specified 'under' the Standards indicates that one should use the numbers that result when the Standards are applied as they usually are . . ." Thomas, 2008 WL 597586 at *4. Given the text of the statute, "the most logical resource to consult is the IRS" to determine whether the IRS's Local Standard is "applicable" to a particular debtor. Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650-51.

Under its Local Standard for vehicle ownership, the IRS prohibits vehicle ownership deductions if an individual has no loan or lease payments.[12] See IRS

[12] For individuals with existing vehicle ownership costs, the IRS applies the expense deduction as a "cap," under which an individual may take the lower of his actual expense or the standardized expense amount. See addendum, IRS Collection Financial Standards (stating that under the Local Standards, "the taxpayer is allowed the amount actually spent or the standard, whichever is less").

The Bankruptcy Code prescribes a different application for debtors with Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B) (providing that if a taxpayer has no vehicle loan or lease payments, the Local Standard ownership cost cannot be claimed by the taxpayer); id., § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

The lower courts correctly applied section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in denying Mr. Ransom's nonexistent expenses, just as the IRS does under the Local Standard.[13] Accord Sawdy, 2008 WL 789116 at *4 (finding it "logical to look at the actual IRS Collection Financial Standards in determining the applicable expense Standards in bankruptcy actions"); Thomas, 2008 WL 597586 at * 4 ("[I]t does not appear that Congress intended to adopt only the numbers contained in the Standards without the context and meaning provided by the IRS in creating the Standards and in its normal application of those numbers . . .").

Second, Congress was interested in more than the mere numbers found in the IRS Local Standards in crafting section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The House Report to existing ownership costs: in calculating disposable income, it permits debtors the entire expense amount. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (providing that the applicable expense amount "shall be" the amount "specified" under the IRS Local Standard).

[13] Were Mr. Ransom correct, Congress would have worded the statute so debtors could deduct expenses in the amount set out "in" the standards rather than "under" them.

the legislation provides that the debtor's monthly expenses "must be the applicable monthly amounts set forth in the [IRS] Financial Analysis Handbook as Necessary Expenses under the National and Local Standards categories. . ." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 99-100(2005).[14] The Financial Analysis Handbook provides that the Local Standard ownership cost cannot be claimed if a taxpayer has no vehicle loan or lease payments.[15] See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

[14] Mr. Ransom argues that language from an unenacted version of bankruptcy legislation from a prior session of Congress reveals that the Reform Act meant to forbid courts from consulting the IRS methodology. Appellant's Br. at 9. Mr. Ransom attaches special importance to the fact that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Reform Act defines allowable expenses differently than the proposed 1998 legislation, which included a specific reference to the IRS's Financial Analysis Handbook.

This argument has three weaknesses. First, the language of the Reform Act does not indicate any intent to preclude reference to the IRS's application of its own expense standards and requires that deductions be taken "under" the Local Standards. Second, the legislative history of the Reform Act specifically references the IRS Financial Analysis Handbook in describing "applicable" expense amounts. See H.R. Rep. 109-31 (I), at 99-100 (2005). Third, Mr. Ransom's citation to Russello v. United States, 464 U.S. 16, 23-24 (1983) is unavailing, because that addressed a situation – unlike here – where "limiting language" is deleted from otherwise-identical prior legislation.

[15] For the other reasons advanced by the lower courts and in this brief, the lower court rulings should be affirmed even if they relied incorrectly upon the IRS application.

IV. The lower courts' construction of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) implements sound bankruptcy policy.

1. The lower courts' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is fair to all debtors, because it establishes a threshold – the existence of vehicle loan or lease payments – for claiming an ownership deduction that is consistent for all chapter 13 debtors. Just as below-median-income debtors must incur an expense before claiming a deduction, see 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2) (allowing such debtors only "reasonably necessary" expenses), above-median-income debtors must also meet this threshold by claiming "applicable" expenses before shielding income from creditors.

The lower courts' interpretation does not hurt below-median-income debtors – those most likely to file bankruptcy petitions – because such debtors are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). The approximately 73% of chapter 13 debtors with below-median incomes are not subject to the vehicle ownership expense requirement because their ability to fund chapter 13 payments is calculated in a different way.[16] Similarly, in chapter 7

[16] There were 307,521 non-business chapter 13 cases filed in fiscal year 2007. See U.S. Courts, Bankruptcy Statistics, 2007 Fiscal Year by Chapter, available at http://www.uscourts.gov/bnkrpctystats/sept2007/f2table.xls. Of these cases, the United States estimates that 83,030 cases may have filed by above-median debtors. The United States' estimate is based on a 2006 survey conducted by RAND across a sample of 9 judicial districts that estimated that 27% of chapter

bankruptcies, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) only applies to the 10% of debtors with above-median incomes.[17]

The lower courts' interpretation is also fair to creditors because they will receive payments on their debts when above-median-income debtors have the financial ability to repay. See In re Mann Farms, Inc., 917 F.2d 1210 (9th Cir. 1990) (stating that proposed chapter 13 plans "are reviewed for fundamental fairness in dealing with one's creditors"). In enacting the Reform Act, Congress was concerned that under the prior system, "some bankruptcy debtors are able to repay a significant portion of their debts" but are not required to do so. H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92. The proper reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is fair to creditors because it ensures that above-median-income debtors significantly repay their debts in chapter 13 plans

13 cases were filed by above-median debtors. See The Bankruptcy Abuse and Consumer Protection Act of 2005: Evaluation of the Effects of Using IRS Expense Standards to Calculate a Debtor's Monthly Disposable Income, RAND Institute for Civil Justice at x, 23, available at http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/public_affairs/reports_studies/index.htm.

[17] During fiscal year 2007, according to data collected by the United States Trustee Program (USTP), 451,012 non-business chapter 7 cases were filed nationwide, excluding the judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina which are not part of the USTP. Of these chapter 7 cases, according to USTP data, only 10% had above-median incomes and were thereby subject to the means test and the requirements of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

when they are able.

2. Mr. Ransom's interpretation is unfair, by contrast, because it would allow above-median-income debtors to deduct nonexistent expenses, something section 1325(b)(2) prevents below-median-income debtors from claiming. See Wilson, 2008 WL 681102 at *2 (observing that below-median income chapter 13 debtors, who are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), are not entitled to deduct ownership costs for unencumbered vehicles in determining projected disposable income).

Prior to the Reform Act, above-median-income chapter 13 debtors, like Mr. Ransom, could not deduct vehicle payments when they had no ownership costs in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2) (2004) (previously requiring that expenses for all chapter 13 debtors be "reasonably necessary") (subsequently amended in 2005). To read the Reform Act as loosening the expense requirements for above-median-income debtors would benefit the very group of debtors that Congress enacted the Reform Act to scrutinize more closely.

3. Mr. Ransom nonetheless argues that requiring expenses to exist before expense amounts are "applicable" somehow discriminates against above-median-income debtors who cannot afford newer cars that are more likely to involve loan or lease payments. See Appellant's Br. at 17-18.

This argument has been uniformly rejected by the lower appellate courts and is incorrect for two reasons.[18] First, where any debtors do have older or higher-mileage vehicles, those debtors are shielded from potential harm. Debtors who own an unencumbered vehicle that is over 6 years old or with 75,000 or more miles are entitled to an additional $200 in monthly operating expenses. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Pt. 5, ch. 8, § 5.8.5.5.2 ("Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses"), available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html. See also Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (recognizing $200 additional allowance); Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same); Wilson, 2008 WL 681102 at *4 (same).

Second, if any debtor needs a new vehicle during the course of his chapter 13 plan, the debtor can move to modify his plan to reduce payments to creditors to account for the new expense. See 11 U.S.C. 1329(a); Wilson, 2008 WL 681102 at *4 ("[I]n the event a debtor needs a new car during the course of a case, the debtor can move to modify the plan based on changed circumstances."). For debtors who require a new vehicle, plan modification is appropriate because financing the vehicle usually indicates a substantial change in a debtor's ability to pay that was not already taken into account at the time of plan confirmation. See In re Anderson, 21 F.3d 35, 358 (9th Cir. 1994).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States respectfully asks this Court to affirm the decision of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Ninth Circuit, affirming the decision of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Nevada.

ADDENDUM

11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)

The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief, for the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case, if the spouse is not otherwise a dependent. Such expenses shall include reasonably necessary health insurance, disability insurance, and health savings account expenses for the debtor, the spouse of the debtor, or the dependents of the debtor. Notwithstanding any other provision of this clause, the monthly expenses of the debtor shall not include any payments for debts. In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses shall include the debtor's reasonably necessary expenses incurred to maintain the safety of the debtor and the family of the debtor from family violence as identified under section 309 of the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act, or other applicable Federal law. The expenses included in the debtor's monthly expenses described in the preceding sentence shall be kept confidential by the court. In addition, if it is demonstrated that it is reasonable and necessary, the debtor's monthly expenses may also include an additional allowance for food and clothing of up to 5 percent of the food and clothing categories as specified by the National Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service.

11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1), (2), (3)

(b)(1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan--

> (A) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or
> (B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "disposable income" means current monthly income received by the debtor (other than child support payments, foster care payments, or disability payments for a dependent child made in accordance with applicable nonbankruptcy law to the extent reasonably necessary to be expended for such child) less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended--

> (A)(i) for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent of the debtor, or for a domestic support obligation, that first becomes payable after the date the petition is filed; and
> (ii) for charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3) to a qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as defined in section 548(d)(4)) in an amount not to exceed 15 percent of gross income of the debtor for the year in which the contributions are made; and
> (B) if the debtor is engaged in business, for the payment of expenditures necessary for the continuation, preservation, and operation of such business.

(3) Amounts reasonably necessary to be expended under paragraph (2), other than subparagraph (A)(ii) of paragraph (2), shall be determined in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2), if the debtor has current monthly income, when multiplied by 12, greater than--

> (A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(C) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $575 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(3) Amounts reasonably necessary to be expended under paragraph (2), other than subparagraph (A)(ii) of paragraph (2), shall be determined in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2), if the debtor has current monthly income, when multiplied by 12, greater than--

(A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(C) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $575 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

IRS Collection Financial Standards

Internal Revenue Service
United States Department of the Treasury

Collection Financial Standards

General

Collection Financial Standards are used to help determine a taxpayer's ability to pay a delinquent tax liability.

Allowances for food, clothing and other items, known as the National Standards, apply nationwide except for Alaska and Hawaii, which have their own tables. Taxpayers are allowed the total National Standards amount for their family size and income level, without questioning amounts actually spent.

Maximum allowances for housing and utilities and transportation, known as the Local Standards, vary by location. Unlike the National Standards, the taxpayer is allowed the amount actually spent or the standard, whichever is less.

Food, Clothing and Other Items

National Standards for reasonable amounts have been established for five necessary expenses: food, housekeeping supplies, apparel and services, personal care products and services, and miscellaneous.

All standards except miscellaneous are derived from the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) Consumer Expenditure Survey (CES). The miscellaneous standard has been established by the IRS.

Alaska and Hawaii

Due to their unique geographic circumstances and higher cost of living, separate standards for food, clothing and other items have been established for Alaska and Hawaii .

Housing and Utilities

The housing and utilities standards are derived from Census and BLS data, and are provided by state down to the county level.

Transportation

The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs broken down by Census Region and Metropolitan Statistical Area (MSA). Public transportation is included under operating costs. A conversion chart has been provided with the standards which shows which IRS districts fall under each Census Region, as well as the counties included in each MSA. The ownership cost portion of the transportation standard, although it applies nationwide, is still considered part of the Local Standards.

The ownership costs provide maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense. The operating costs are derived from BLS data.

If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, only the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

Recent Revisions

The Local Standards for housing and utilities and transportation were revised on 02/01/06 to:

- add family size to the housing and utilities allowances (two or less, three, and four or more);
- base automobile ownership/leasing costs on the five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors; and,
- reflect updated information from the Bureau of Labor Statistics.
- Housing and Utility Standards have been established in 2006 for U.S. Territories

The revised Local Standards for housing and utilities and transportation are effective for financial analysis conducted on or after January 1, 2006.

QUESTION PRESENTED

In a Chapter 13 bankruptcy proceeding, if a trustee or unsecured creditor objects to the confirmation of a debtor's plan, and the plan does not provide for all unsecured creditors to be paid in full, the bankruptcy court may confirm the plan only if all of the debtor's "projected disposable income" will be used to pay unsecured creditors. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). The Bankruptcy Code defines the debtor's "disposable income" as his current monthly income less certain "reasonably necessary" expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A)(i). For an above-median-income debtor like petitioner, those reasonably necessary expenses are determined using the means test set forth in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2). See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). That means test allows deductions for a variety of expenses, including the "debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards" issued by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). As relevant here, the IRS Local Standards include expense amounts for vehicle ownership expenses. The question presented is as follows:

Whether a Chapter 13 debtor who is not making any loan or lease payments on his vehicle may claim a vehicle ownership expense deduction in calculating the projected disposable income he has available to pay unsecured creditors.

FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING RESPONDENT

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This case presents the question whether a Chapter 13 debtor who makes no car loan or lease payments may deduct a vehicle ownership expense in calculating the disposable income he will have available to pay unsecured creditors. The United States has a direct interest in the resolution of that question because United States Trustees—who are Department of Justice officials appointed by the Attorney General—supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. See 28 U.S.C. 581-589a (2006 & Supp. II 2008); H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88 (1977). In Chapter 13 cases, United States Trustees are authorized to review proposed repayment plans and submit comments about them to the bankruptcy courts. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C). Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any [bankruptcy] case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. 307.

STATEMENT

1. a. Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code permits an individual with regular income whose debts fall within statutory limits to obtain a discharge of those debts while retaining possession of his assets. 11 U.S.C. 1301 et seq. The debtor must agree to a court-approved plan under which he will repay his creditors a portion of his future income. 11 U.S.C. 1306(b), 1321, 1322, 1325. The debtor typically receives a discharge of debts only after he pays creditors in accordance with the terms of the plan. 11 U.S.C. 1325-1328.

Chapter 13 establishes several prerequisites to confirmation of the debtor's plan. See 11 U.S.C. 1325. If the trustee or an unsecured creditor objects to confirmation of the plan, and the plan does not provide for payment of all unsecured claims in full, the court may not confirm the plan unless "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received" during the plan period "will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). The question in this case concerns the manner in which a Chapter 13 debtor's "projected disposable income" is calculated.

b. Determining the debtor's "projected disposable income" is a two-step process. First, the bankruptcy court must calculate the debtor's "disposable income," based on his current income and expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). Second, to determine the debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period, the court should account for "known or virtually certain information about the debtor's future income or expenses" that makes the initial calculation of disposable income a demonstrably unreliable predictor of the debtor's financial condition during the plan period. Hamilton v. Lanning, 130 S. Ct. 2464, 2474-2475 (2010); see 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1).

i. The Bankruptcy Code defines the term "disposable income" as the debtor's "current monthly income" minus the debtor's "reasonably necessary" expenses for "maintenance or support," qualifying charitable contributions, and business expenditures. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). For an above-median-income debtor like petitioner, the amounts that are "reasonably necessary" for support or maintenance are determined using the methodology (commonly known as the "means test") set forth in Section 707(b)(2). See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3).[1]

Under the means test, certain allowed monthly expenses are deducted from the debtor's income to determine what funds he has available to pay creditors. As relevant here, the allowed monthly expenses include "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service [IRS]." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

[1] Because the Section 707(b)(2) means test is also used to determine whether an individual is eligible for bankruptcy relief under Chapter 7, see 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i), the Court's decision in this case may affect the disposition of Chapter 7 bankruptcy proceedings as well as cases under Chapter 13.

Section 707(b)(2) was amended in respects not relevant here in 2008. This brief refers to the 2006 version, which was in effect when petitioner filed his bankruptcy petition.

The IRS has established Local Standards for vehicle "ownership costs" and vehicle "operating costs." Resp. Br. App. 2a-3a.[2] For the vehicle ownership expense deduction, which is at issue here, the Local Standards identify amounts of $471 per month for a debtor's first car and $332 per month for his second. Id. at 5a. Those dollar amounts are based on the average cost of financing a vehicle as determined annually by the Federal Reserve Board. Id. at 3a; see In re Meade, 384 B.R. 132, 136 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2008). The IRS Collection Financial Standards state that "[t]he transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs broken down by" geographic area. Resp. Br. App. 2a (italics omitted). They further explain that "[i]f a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, only the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense." Id. at 3a.[3]

[2] In connection with its own tax-collection efforts, the IRS uses the National and Local Standards "to help determine a taxpayer's ability to pay a delinquent tax liability." Resp. Br. App. 1a; see 26 U.S.C. 7122(d)(2). This brief generally cites the National and Local Standards in place at the time petitioner filed for bankruptcy, because those are the standards that apply to this case. See 11 U.S.C. 301(b), 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

[3] The Collection Financial Standards explain that, for IRS tax-collection purposes, "[t]axpayers are allowed the total National Standards amount for their family size and income level, without questioning amounts actually spent." Resp. Br. App. 1a. Under the Local Standards, by contrast, "the taxpayer is allowed the amount actually spent or the standard, whichever is less." Ibid. The Collection Financial Standards note that "[t]he ownership cost portion of the transportation standard, although it applies nationwide, is still considered part of the Local Standards." Id. at 2a.

ii. As this Court explained in Lanning, calculating a Chapter 13 debtor's "disposable income" is only the first step in determining the amount of "projected disposable income" the debtor will have available to repay unsecured creditors. 130 S. Ct. at 2471. The bankruptcy court also must "project" the debtor's disposable income over the life of the plan and "account for changes in the debtor's income or expenses that are known or virtually certain at the time of confirmation." Id. at 2471-2472, 2478; see 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). In so doing, the court tailors the results of the mathematical calculation of "disposable income" to account for circumstances that will affect the debtor's ability to repay creditors. Lanning, 130 S. Ct. at 2471-2472.

2. Petitioner filed a voluntary Chapter 13 bankruptcy petition in July 2006. Pet. App. 3, 17. Among his assets, he listed a 2004 Toyota Camry. Id. at 3. Petitioner owns that vehicle outright and therefore does not make any loan or lease payments. Ibid.; see J.A. 38, 44. Petitioner reported liabilities of $82,542.93 in general unsecured claims, including a $32,896.73 claim held by respondent. Pet. App. 3; J.A. 40-41. Petitioner reported a current monthly income of $4248.56, which qualified him as an above-median-income debtor. Pet. App. 3; J.A. 45-48.

In calculating his monthly disposable income, petitioner claimed the $471 vehicle ownership expense deduction. Pet. App. 3; J.A. 49. With that deduction, petitioner's total monthly expenses would be $4038.01, making his monthly disposable income $210.55. Pet. App. 3; J.A. 53. If petitioner's plan had been confirmed, the vehicle ownership deduction would have allowed petitioner to shield approximately $28,000 from unsecured creditors over the five-year life of his plan.

Petitioner proposed to pay $500 per month over the life of the plan, $389 per month of which would be paid to unsecured creditors, resulting in repayment of approximately 25% of the unsecured claims. Pet. App. 3, 45; J.A. 53, 56. The Chapter 13 trustee, respondent, and another unsecured creditor objected to confirmation of petitioner's plan on the ground that the plan did not provide for all of petitioner's projected disposable income to be used to pay unsecured claims, as required by 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). J.A. 60, 71. They contended that petitioner had understated his projected disposable income by taking a vehicle ownership expense deduction that was not "applicable" to him because he has no loan or lease payment. J.A. 60, 67-71.

3. The bankruptcy court denied confirmation of the plan. Pet. App. 36-47. Relying on its prior decision in In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007), the court determined that, under the "plain language" of 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2), a debtor "may only deduct a vehicle ownership expense if he is currently making loan or lease payments on that vehicle." Pet. App. 40-41.

4. The bankruptcy appellate panel affirmed. Pet. App. 15-35. The panel determined that Congress's use of the word "applicable" in Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) evidenced its intent to limit the vehicle ownership deduction to debtors who are actually making loan or lease payments. Id. at 30-33. The panel explained that the vehicle ownership deduction "becomes relevant to the debtor (i.e., appropriate or applicable to the debtor)" only "when he or she in fact has such an expense." Id. at 32.

5. The court of appeals affirmed. Pet. App. 1-14. The court concluded that the "statutory language, plainly read" does not allow a debtor "to deduct an 'ownership cost' that the debtor does not have." Id. at 11. The court explained that, because the ordinary meaning of "applicable" is "capable of or suitable for being applied," the vehicle ownership expense deduction is "applicable" only if the debtor actually has an expense associated with vehicle ownership. Id. at 12 (internal quotation marks omitted). To allow the debtor to "assert a deduction for an expense he does not have," the court stated, would "read[] 'applicable' right out of the" statute. Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted). The court of appeals further concluded that allowing a debtor to "diminish payments to unsecured creditors * * * on the basis of a fictitious expense not incurred by [him]" would be contrary to the statute's main objective, which is "to ensure that debtors repay as much of their debt as reasonably possible." Id. at 11, 13 (internal quotation marks omitted).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I. Because petitioner owns his vehicle outright and does not make loan or lease payments on the car, he is not entitled to deduct vehicle ownership expenses in calculating his "disposable income."

A. In calculating petitioner's monthly disposable income, the bankruptcy court was required to deduct, inter alia, "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I); see 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3) (incorporating Section 707(b)(2) means test to calculate the disposable income of an above-median-income Chapter 13 debtor). A deduction for a particular type of expense is not "applicable" if the debtor will not pay that expense during the plan period. That reading of the statute is strengthened by Congress's reference to "the debtor's" applicable expenses, which suggests that the applicability of a particular deduction depends in part on the debtor's own circumstances.

Petitioner's reading of Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), under which any debtor with a car may claim a vehicle ownership expense deduction, disserves the purposes for which the debtor's expenses are calculated. A debtor's "applicable monthly expense amounts" are deducted from his monthly income in order to ascertain what resources are available to pay his creditors. Allowing petitioner to deduct $471 per month in vehicle ownership expenses, notwithstanding the fact that petitioner owes no car loan or lease payments, would make that calculation demonstrably less accurate. Petitioner's approach also ignores the fact that the IRS Local Standards provide separate deductions for vehicle ownership and vehicle operating expenses. That distinct treatment of ownership and operating expenses would be superfluous if every debtor with a vehicle could claim both deductions.

B. Other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code confirm that a debtor who has no loan or lease payments is not entitled to a vehicle ownership expense deduction. In several places, Congress used the word "applicable" to require a threshold finding that an action or procedure is justified based on the individual debtor's specific circumstances, and "applicable" should have the same meaning here. Contrary to petitioner's contention, requiring such a threshold showing would not equate "applicable" with "actual." If a debtor qualifies for a vehicle ownership expense deduction because he has loan or lease payments, then the IRS Local Standard prescribes a standard amount to be used. Petitioner is likewise mistaken in relying on the statute's exclusion of "payments for debts." That provision excludes certain deductions that otherwise would be allowed; it cannot authorize a deduction for an expense that is not "applicable" to the debtor.

C. In enacting Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s means test, and in directing that the test be used to calculate the disposable income of an above-median-income Chapter 13 debtor, Congress sought to ensure that such a debtor would pay as much as reasonably possible to his unsecured creditors during the life of his plan. Restricting the vehicle ownership deduction to debtors who will make vehicle loan or lease payments furthers that objective, while petitioner's approach would allow him to shield more than $28,000 in income from creditors during the plan period. Moreover, although Congress took steps in 2005 to scrutinize and circumscribe the expenses of above-median-income debtors, petitioner's approach would give such individuals a windfall not available to below-median-income debtors.

II. Even if a debtor without vehicle loan or lease payments could claim a vehicle ownership deduction under Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s means test, no such deduction would be appropriate in calculating a Chapter 13 debtor's "projected disposable income" under 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). As this Court explained in Hamilton v. Lanning, 130 S. Ct. 2464 (2010), a bankruptcy court may account for "known or virtually certain information about the debtor's future income or expenses" that makes the initial calculation of disposable income an unreliable predictor of the debtor's available resources during the plan period. Id. at 2475. Here, allowing petitioner to claim a vehicle ownership expense would "deny creditors payments the debtor could easily make," a result that Congress sought to avoid. Id. at 2476.

ARGUMENT

WHEN CALCULATING HIS PROJECTED DISPOSABLE INCOME, AN ABOVE-MEDIAN-INCOME CHAPTER 13 DEBTOR WHO HAS NO VEHICLE LOAN OR LEASE PAYMENTS TO MAKE MAY NOT DEDUCT VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSES

A debtor who seeks Chapter 13 bankruptcy relief and who cannot satisfy all of his unsecured claims must propose a plan in which all of his "projected disposable income" will be used to pay unsecured creditors. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). As part of the calculation of "disposable income," an above-median-income Chapter 13 debtor may deduct his "applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added); see p. 3, supra. Because the IRS Local Standard for vehicle ownership expenses covers loan and lease payments alone, the "expense amounts specified under" that Standard are not "applicable" to debtors who do not make such payments. Limiting the vehicle ownership expense to debtors who actually incur loan or lease payments directly furthers Congress's efforts "to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. 1, at 2 (2005) (House Report).

I. THE VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSE DEDUCTION IS NOT "APPLICABLE" TO A DEBTOR WHO WILL NOT MAKE ANY LOAN OR LEASE PAYMENTS DURING THE PLAN

Under the means test contained in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2), petitioner may deduct the vehicle ownership expense only if it is "applicable" to him. The word "applicable" is naturally construed to require a threshold showing that the debtor will pay the expense over the life of the plan. That understanding is firmly rooted in the context of the statute, and it furthers the statute's primary purpose, which is to ensure that Chapter 13 debtors pay as much as they can reasonably afford before obtaining a discharge of their debts.

A. Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) Allows Deduction Of Vehicle Ownership Expenses Only If Such Expenses Are "Applicable"

"As with any case of statutory construction, [this Court's] analysis begins with the language of the statute." Hughes Aircraft Co. v. Jacobson, 525 U.S. 432, 438 (1999) (internal quotation marks omitted). Congress provided that only "applicable" expense amounts under the National and Local Standards may be deducted from an above-median-income debtor's income. The vehicle ownership expenses expense amounts contained in the relevant IRS Local Standard are not "applicable" to a debtor who will not be making any loan or lease payments on his vehicle.

1. Under the Bankruptcy Code, a debtor's "disposable income"—i.e., the presumptive amount he has available to pay unsecured creditors—is calculated by subtracting from the debtor's income his "reasonably necessary" expenses for "maintenance or support," qualifying charitable contributions, and business expenditures. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). For an above-median-income debtor like petitioner, the means test contained in Section 707(b)(2) is used to determine the amounts that are "reasonably necessary" for maintenance and support. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3).

The means test provides, in pertinent part:

> The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides.

11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i)(I). This language identifies two categories of allowable expenses: "applicable" expense amounts specified in the IRS's National and Local Standards, which establish schedules for expenses such as food, clothing, health care, housing, and transportation; and "actual" amounts for certain other necessary expenses, such as legal and accounting fees, child-care expenses, and education expenses. See Resp. Br. App. 21a-27a.

Because the Bankruptcy Code does not define the word "applicable," that term should be given its ordinary meaning. See, e.g., Hamilton v. Lanning, 130 S. Ct. 2464, 2471 (2010); Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993). In ordinary use, "applicable" means "relevant," "appropriate," or "suitable." See The New Oxford American Dictionary 74 (2d ed. 2005) ("applicable" is "relevant or appropriate"); 1 The Oxford English Dictionary 405 (1978) ("applicable" is "[c]apable of being applied" or "fit or suitable for its purpose, appropriate"); Webster's Third New International Dictionary of the English Language 105 (1993) ("appropriate" is "capable of being applied; having relevance" or "[f]it, suitable, or right to be applied: appropriate"). This Court has used that common definition, see Patterson v. Shumate, 504 U.S. 753, 758-759 (1992) (equating "applicable" with "relevant" in the phrase "applicable nonbankruptcy law"), as did the court of appeals below, see Pet. App. 12 ("applicable" is "capable of or suitable for being applied" (internal quotation marks omitted)).

In Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), "applicable" modifies "monthly expense amounts," which are the dollar amounts listed in the National and Local Standards. That structure evidences the purpose of the word "applicable," which is to identify those expenses that are relevant to the particular debtor. Congress did not say that the debtor may deduct all expense amounts listed in the National and Local Standards; it limited the deduction to "applicable" expense amounts. Congress thus required a threshold determination, based on the debtor's circumstances, that a particular expense category is "appropriate" or "suitable." Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s reference to "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts" (emphasis added) reinforces that understanding and confirms that the applicability of a particular amount depends in part on the debtor's own expenses. See In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290, 309 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007).

2. To determine whether the vehicle ownership expense deduction listed in the Local Standards is "applicable" to petitioner, the courts below correctly sought to identify the types of expenses that are covered by the deduction and to ascertain whether petitioner will have those expenses. The vehicle ownership expense deduction accounts for the debtor's monthly expenses associated with acquiring use of the vehicle, i.e., it is for "monthly loan or lease payments." Resp. Br. App. 2a. A table in the IRS Local Transportation Standards gives two standard nationwide amounts for vehicle ownership costs, one for a debtor's first car and the other for the debtor's second car. Id. at 5a. As the court of appeals recognized, those expense amounts are "relevant to the debtor (i.e., appropriate or applicable to the debtor)" only if "he or she in fact has such an expense." Pet. App. 12 (internal quotation marks omitted).

This understanding of the term "applicable" is consistent with the word's usage in other contexts. For example, one dictionary provides the example of "add[ing] the applicable sales tax." The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language 87 (4th ed. 2006) (italics omitted). No sales tax would be "applicable" if an individual did not purchase any items, just as no vehicle ownership expense would apply if the debtor did not have a car. But a sales tax similarly would not be "applicable" to a purchased item that was exempt from tax under the relevant law. By the same token, the vehicle ownership expense amounts specified in the Local Standards are not "applicable" to a debtor who owns a vehicle free and clear and therefore incurs no loan or lease payments.

3. Petitioner acknowledges (Br. 33) that bankruptcy courts must make a threshold determination—that the debtor has a car—before allowing the vehicle ownership deduction. He contends (Br. 14, 51), however, that the vehicle ownership expense is "applicable" to every debtor who owns a vehicle, regardless of whether he even has any loan or lease payments to make. In his view, "an applicable expense is one set down for a category, such as vehicle ownership expense, according to geographic region and number of cars." Br. 14; see NACBA Amicus Br. 9.

Petitioner's argument disregards the purposes that the means test is intended to serve. As the court of appeals explained, "what is important is the payments that debtors actually make, not how many cars they own, because the payments that debtors make are what actually affect their ability to make payments to their creditors." Pet. App. 11 (internal quotation marks omitted). Petitioner's approach also cannot be reconciled with the IRS's decision to establish two separate vehicle expense deductions—one for ownership costs and one for operating costs. Resp. Br. App. 2a-3a, 5a-6a. That separate treatment of ownership and operating costs would be superfluous if every debtor with a vehicle were allowed both expenses. The distinction between the two deductions in the IRS Standards reflects the real-world fact that debtors who are making car payments have less income available to pay creditors than those who are not making such payments, even if both have vehicle operating expenses.

4. Petitioner suggests (Br. 3, 43, 45-48) that the court of appeals improperly gave precedence to the IRS's tax-collection guidelines rather than following the "plain language" of the Bankruptcy Code. That argument is misconceived.

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) incorporates by reference the "National Standards and Local Standards" issued by the IRS, and it allows the debtor to deduct his "applicable monthly expense amounts specified under" those Standards. That provision directs bankruptcy courts to look to certain aspects of IRS tax-collection practice in identifying the expenses that particular debtors may deduct. To determine whether a particular Local Standard is "applicable" to a particular debtor, the court must identify the categories of expenses that the Standard is intended to cover. Although the Bankruptcy Code does not incorporate every aspect of the IRS's tax-collection practices, the IRS's authoritative explanation of the National and Local Standards may assist the court in properly applying those Standards.

In its Collection Financial Standards, the IRS explained that "[t]he transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs broken down by" geographic area. Resp. Br. App. 2a (italics omitted); see id. at 16a; see also IRS, Local Standards: Transportation (Mar. 18, 2010), http://www.irs.gov/businesses/small/article/0,,id=104623,00.html (current version).[4] The Collection Financial Standards further provide that "[i]f a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, only the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense." Resp. Br. App. 3a.

In giving weight to those statements by the IRS (see Pet. App. 10), the court of appeals did not improperly disregard the text of the Bankruptcy Code. Rather, the court appropriately treated those statements as relevant to the proper interpretation of the pertinent statutory language. The court correctly understood the IRS's explication of the Local Standards governing transportation expenses to establish that the "expense amounts specified under the" vehicle ownership Local Standard [4] Petitioner contends (Br. 15, 53) that the vehicle ownership expense is also designed to cover expenses such as taxes and depreciation. That is incorrect. Taxes, including personal property taxes associated with a vehicle, are considered "Other Necessary Expenses" by the IRS; they are not part of the National Standards and Local Standards. See Resp. Br. App. 20a-27a. Depreciation is not an expense but a way to measure the change in a car's value over time. See, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary 506 (9th ed. 2009). The transportation expenses in the Local Standards do not account for depreciation of a vehicle; they are designed to determine monthly cash flow, not to measure the value of assets over time.

are not "applicable" to petitioner's own circumstances because those expense amounts pertain to a category of costs that petitioner does not incur.

B. The Statutory Context Confirms That "Applicable" Expenses Are Those The Debtor Will Actually Pay

In interpreting a statutory term, the Court considers not only "the language itself [and] the specific context in which that language is used," but also "the broader context of the statute as a whole." Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 341 (1997). Here, other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code confirm that a debtor who has no loan or lease payments is not entitled to a vehicle ownership expense deduction.

1. In the subclause immediately following the one at issue here, Congress provided that a "debtor's monthly expenses may include, if applicable, the continuation of actual expenses paid by the debtor" to care for an elderly, ill, or disabled household or family member. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II). In that context, the word "applicable" requires a threshold finding that the expense is one the debtor expects to continue paying during the plan period. It would be anomalous to interpret "applicable" to require that showing in Subclause (II), but to preclude it in the portion of Subclause (I) at issue here, when both provisions are designed to determine allowable expenses in bankruptcy. See, e.g., NASA v. FLRA, 527 U.S. 229, 235 (1999) (word or phrase "should ordinarily retain the same meaning wherever used in the same statute").

Other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code similarly use the term "applicable" to denote rules or procedures that are triggered by the specific factual circumstances of the bankruptcy case. One such provision requires a debtor to file a statement of intention to retain or surrender property and, "if applicable, specify[] that such property is claimed as exempt, that the debtor intends to redeem such property, or that the debtor intends to reaffirm debts secured by such property." 11 U.S.C. 521(a)(2)(A). The word "applicable" is used to signify that the debtor should take only the actions that are justified by his own circumstances.

Similarly, the bankruptcy court may enter a Chapter 11 or 13 discharge only if it finds that 11 U.S.C. 522(q)(1) is not "applicable" to the debtor. 11 U.S.C. 1141(d)(5)(C), 1328(h). Section 522(q)(1) concerns a debtor who has been convicted of a felony that demonstrates the bankruptcy filing is abusive, or who owes a debt arising from certain securities law violations and torts. Here again, determining whether a particular restriction on dischargeability is "applicable" requires an inquiry into the debtor's individual circumstances—i.e., whether he has a conviction or debt of the type specified in Section 522(q)(1).

2. Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) refers separately to the debtor's "applicable monthly expense amounts" under the National and Local Standards and his "actual monthly expenses" for the other necessary expense categories allowed by the IRS. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Petitioner suggests (Br. 26, 39-42) that, by restricting the vehicle ownership expense deduction to debtors with loan or lease payments, the court of appeals improperly disregarded the statutory distinction between "applicable" and "actual" expenses. That argument misconceives the manner in which the vehicle ownership expense deduction is calculated under the relevant Local Standard.

The IRS Local Standard for vehicle ownership expenses prescribes an amount of $471 for a first car and $332 for a second car. See Resp. C.A. Br. 5a. Although the applicability of that Local Standard depends on the debtor's actual circumstances (i.e., whether the debtor has vehicle loan or lease payments, and if so on how many vehicles), the "expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards," 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), are standardized amounts that are determined without reference to a particular debtor's actual monthly payments. See, e.g., Fokkena v. Hartwick, 373 B.R. 645, 650 (D. Minn. 2007). That approach to determining the allowed expense amount is different from Congress's approach to "Other Necessary Expenses." The IRS has not promulgated any table of standardized amounts for those expenses, and the statute requires that "actual" costs be used. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). This approach "gives meaning to the distinction between 'applicable' and 'actual' without taking a further step to conclude that 'applicable' means 'nonexistent' or 'fictional.'" In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762, 765 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2007), rev'd, 549 F.3d 1148 (7th Cir. 2008).

3. The Collection Financial Standards explain that, when the IRS uses the Local Standards in its tax-collection efforts, "the taxpayer is allowed the amount actually spent or the standard, whichever is less." Resp. Br. App. 1a; see note 3, supra. Respondent contends (Br. 12, 45-46) that bankruptcy courts should apply the same methodology in calculating the debtor's monthly expenses under Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Under that approach, a debtor who makes car loan or lease payments that are less than the standardized amounts reflected in the governing IRS table (here, $471 per month, see Resp. Br. App. 5a), could deduct only his actual monthly payments rather than the standardized amounts.

That argument is not without force, since use of a debtor's actual vehicle ownership expenses (when they are less than the standardized amounts) would more fully accomplish Congress's purpose of making the debtor's entire resources available to unsecured creditors. In the government's view, however, Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is better read to allow a debtor with a car loan or lease payment to deduct the standardized amount even when it is greater than his actual payment. As applied to vehicle ownership expenses, Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) thus strikes a balance between precision and ease of administration by requiring a debtor who invokes that deduction to establish the existence, but not the exact amount, of a vehicle loan or lease payment. See pp. 25-26, infra.

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not incorporate by reference every feature of the IRS's tax-collection methodology, but rather allows the debtor to deduct his "applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards." Although the IRS in collecting delinquent taxes considers the taxpayer's actual loan or lease payments, those actual "expense amounts" are not "specified" either in the Local Standards themselves or in any accompanying statements, but are instead derived from evidence unique to the particular debtor involved. The only vehicle ownership "expense amounts" that are "specified under the * * * Local Standards," 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), are the standardized amounts ($471 per month for a first car and $332 per month for a second, Resp. Br. App. 5a) listed in the relevant IRS table. The IRS's statement that "the taxpayer is allowed the amount actually spent or the standard, whichever is less," id. at 1a, supports this reading of the Bankruptcy Code, since that statement contrasts the "standard" with the "amount actually spent" and presumes that the former term refers to the standardized amounts set out in the IRS tables. This reading of Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) also accords with the consensus view among the bankruptcy courts, see, e.g., In re Briscoe, 374 B.R. 1, 6-7 (Bankr. D.D.C. 2007), and with the view of the Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure (Advisory Committee), see Official Bankr. Forms 22A, 22B & 22C advisory committee's note C.1 (2005-2008). In any event, the Court in this case need not decide the proper deduction for a debtor with vehicle loan or lease payments of less than the standardized amounts, since petitioner has no vehicle loan or lease payments at all.

4. Petitioner also contends (Br. 21, 27-28, 44-45) that he may claim the vehicle ownership expense deduction, even though he has no vehicle loan or lease payments, because 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) further provides that, "[n]otwithstanding any other provision of this clause, the monthly expenses of the debtor shall not include payments for debts." Petitioner's reliance on that sentence is misplaced.

By its terms, the sentence in question operates to exclude "payments for debts" from the debtor's "monthly expenses," even when such payments are encompassed by the remaining sentences of Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Under no circumstances can the "notwithstanding" sentence have the effect of authorizing a deduction for an expense that the remainder of Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not cover. Thus, if the court of appeals' analysis is otherwise sound—i.e., if the amounts specified in the Local Standards for vehicle ownership expenses are not "applicable" to a debtor who has no loan or lease payments—the "notwithstanding" sentence provides no basis for allowing an ownership expense deduction.

Properly understood, the "notwithstanding" sentence serves to ensure that the bankruptcy court does not include unsecured debt payments in the calculation of the debtor's monthly expenses. In addition to forward-looking expenses such as child care and education expenses, the IRS standards for "Other [Necessary] Expenses" include a category for "unsecured debts" and for student loan payments (which are unsecured debts). Resp. Br. App. 21a, 25a-26a. Although the IRS treats these unsecured debts as expenses in determining a taxpayer's ability to pay delinquent taxes, that approach would be inappropriate in the means test calculation under the Bankruptcy Code, since the purpose of that calculation is to determine the amount of money the debtor has available to pay unsecured debts after accounting for his living expenses. Congress therefore excluded "payments for debts" from the list of other expenses the IRS otherwise would allow. See, e.g., In re Knight, 370 B.R. 429, 436-437 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2007) (applying this reasoning to student loan debts).

The exclusion of "payments for debts" also can serve to avoid double-counting of expenses that could fall within two different expense provisions of the means test. Under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(iii), a debtor may deduct as monthly expenses certain "payments on account of secured debts." Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s exclusion of "payments for debts" helps to ensure that a debtor who makes vehicle loan payments may not deduct both the standardized amount set forth in the vehicle ownership Local Standard (under Clause (ii)(I)) and his actual monthly payment (under Clause (iii)). See, e.g., In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 726-727 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006); see also Pet. Br. 33-34 (accepting this view).[5]

C. Allowing Debtors Without Loan Or Lease Payments To Deduct Vehicle Ownership Expenses Would Disserve Congress's Purposes In Enacting BAPCPA And Would Lead To Inequitable Results

Congress enacted the provision at issue here in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23. Congress's overarching objectives in enacting BAPCPA were to ensure that debtors pay as much of their debts as reasonably possible and to eliminate opportunities for abuse. Treating the standardized vehicle ownership expense amounts as "applicable" to debtors who have no loan or lease payments would subvert those goals.

[5] A vehicle loan payment typically is secured by the vehicle and thus would qualify as a secured debt. There is some uncertainty about how the "notwithstanding" sentence operates in this context. It could be read to allow the debtor to deduct his car loan payment under Clause (iii), but not to claim any amount under Clause (ii), on the theory that the Clause (ii) standardized amount is intended to compensate him for a debt payment. Or it could be read to allow the debtor to deduct his car loan payment under Clause (iii), and claim the portion of the standard amount in Clause (ii) that exceeds his actual debt payment, on the theory that the Clause (ii) amount is an allowance to which the debtor is entitled so long as he has car ownership expenses, and that the "notwithstanding" sentence simply requires him to subtract out any amounts he will actually pay for debts. This is the approach taken on Form 22C, which was developed by the Advisory Committee for use in determining disposable income in Chapter 13 cases. See J.A. 49, 52-53. This debate is far afield from the dispute in this case, however, because petitioner has no loan or lease payments whatsoever.

1. As the House Judiciary Committee report explained, a primary goal of BAPCPA is "to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." House Report 2. The report explained that consumer bankruptcy filings were having significant "adverse consequences for our nation's economy," with creditors passing on to other consumers the substantial losses associated with bankruptcy. Id. at 4. The report concluded that those "bankruptcy debtors [who] are able to repay a significant portion of their debts" should do so, and that Congress should eliminate the "loopholes and incentives" in the current bankruptcy system that permit "opportunistic personal filings and abuse." Id. at 5.

In order to achieve those objectives, Congress changed the way in which bankruptcy courts would ascertain debtors' ability to repay their creditors. See House Report 2 (defining this change as "the heart of [BAPCPA's] consumer bankruptcy reforms"). Before BAPCPA was enacted, a Chapter 13 debtor's "disposable income" was defined as the debtor's current income less the amounts that were "reasonably necessary" for the debtor's "maintenance or support," "charitable contributions," or "business * * * expenditures." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A)-(B) (2000). Because the Bankruptcy Code provided no additional guidance for determining when an expense was "reasonably necessary," bankruptcy courts addressed that question on a case-specific basis. See, e.g., Hebbring v. United States Trustee, 463 F.3d 902, 907-908 (9th Cir. 2006). In BAPCPA, Congress established a means test to determine whether a debtor seeking Chapter 7 bankruptcy relief has sufficient ability to repay creditors that he should instead be required to proceed under Chapter 13. BAPCPA § 102(a)(1)(C), 119 Stat. 27 (enacting 11 U.S.C.

707(b)(2)). Congress also incorporated that means test into Chapter 13 in order to cabin the amounts that above-median-income debtors may shield from creditors. Id. § 102(h)(2), 119 Stat. 33 (enacting 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)-(3)).

2. In revising the method of calculating a debtor's "reasonably necessary" expenses, Congress sought, inter alia, to effectuate the Bankruptcy Code's requirement that a Chapter 13 debtor repay creditors to the maximum extent possible before obtaining a discharge. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). If petitioner were allowed to claim a vehicle ownership expense deduction that is unrelated to any expense he will actually incur, he would be able to shield approximately $28,000 from creditors over the lifetime of his plan. See p. 5, supra. That is precisely the type of "senseless result" Congress wanted to avoid. Lanning, 130 S. Ct. at 2475-2476.

Indeed, petitioner's argument suggests that BAPCPA opened rather than closed a loophole for above-median-income debtors. Prior to BAPCPA, petitioner could have deducted from his income only those expenses that he demonstrated were "reasonably necessary." See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A)-(B) (2000). Under that standard, petitioner would not have been allowed to deduct a vehicle ownership expense he did not have. In petitioner's view, however, the changes worked by BAPCPA allow him to deduct such an amount. Such a perverse reading of the statute "flies in the face of all Congress intended to accomplish" in BAPCPA. In re Washburn, 579 F.3d 934, 943 (8th Cir. 2009) (Magnuson, J., dissenting).

3. Petitioner's amicus observes (NACBA Br. 22) that "BAPCPA moved bankruptcy courts from a system of case-by-case determinations of reasonableness to a more uniform approach, based on standardized deductions listed in IRS tables." The amicus is correct that, by incorporating the "expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards," 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Congress obviated the need for an individualized determination of all the debtor's actual expenses. But by limiting permissible deductions to the "applicable" expense amounts, Congress made clear that, even with respect to types of expenses for which the IRS Standards prescribe a standardized deduction, the debtor's own circumstances remain relevant to the expense calculation. Allowing a debtor with no loan or lease payments to deduct vehicle ownership expenses would disserve the balance struck by Congress between precision and ease of administration.

The amicus further contends (NACBA Br. 23) that, "[g]iven the inherent uncertainties of predicting a debtor's expenses several years into the future," Congress could reasonably eschew any inquiry into "the particular mix of a debtor's actual vehicle expenses at the time the case is commenced." Petitioner himself concedes (Br. 33), however, that a debtor who claims a vehicle ownership expense must at least make the threshold showing that he owns a car. There is no reason to believe that requiring bankruptcy courts to make the additional determination whether the debtor is making loan or lease payments will meaningfully increase the administrative burden on the courts. And there is likewise no reason to believe that a debtor who owns a vehicle free and clear when his bankruptcy petition is filed is more likely to incur loan or lease payments during the plan period than a debtor who at the time of filing owns no car at all.

4. In addition to furthering the important goal of ensuring that debtors pay their debts to the extent possible, disallowing a vehicle ownership expense deduction under the circumstances presented here fosters equitable treatment of debtors under the Bankruptcy Code. Not only would petitioner's view create a new loophole in the Bankruptcy Code, but it would do so for only one class of Chapter 13 debtors—those with above-median incomes. Under petitioner's view, an above-median-income debtor could shield income from creditors by claiming expenses he will never incur, while a below-median-income debtor would have to prove that each of his expenses—including vehicle ownership expenses—are reasonably necessary under 11 U.S.C. 1325(b). Such a result would loosen expense requirements for the very class of Chapter 13 debtors that Congress wished to scrutinize more closely. Under the court of appeals' approach, by contrast, above-median and below-median debtors are both entitled to deductions only for those types of automobile expenses they actually pay.

Petitioner (Br. 55) and his amicus (NACBA Br. 24-25) suggest that the court of appeals' approach will penalize thrifty debtors who continue to drive old vehicles and encourage debtors to take on additional debt to purchase new cars. The Bankruptcy Code, however, takes the debtor as he is on the date he files his petition. Based on the debtor's financial circumstances at that time, the court determines what amounts he requires for living expenses and what amounts he will be able to pay creditors. Lanning, 130 S. Ct. at 2471. As one court explained, "[t]he statute is only concerned about protecting the debtor's ability to continue owning a car, and if the debtor already owns the car, the debtor is adequately protected. * * * When the debtor has no monthly ownership expenses, it makes no sense to deduct an ownership expense to shield it from creditors." In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766.

Rather than assume that Congress was trying to further policy goals far afield of what the means test was designed to accomplish, this Court should faithfully apply the BAPCPA provisions by which Congress sought to ensure that Chapter 13 debtors—particularly those with higher monthly incomes—will repay creditors as much as they reasonably can afford. In any event, debtors who drive older cars will not in fact be worse off than those who buy new cars, since the former will have less overall debt than the latter. And a thrifty debtor who needs to buy a new car during the life of the plan may seek a plan modification to account for that expense. See 11 U.S.C. 1329(a).

5. Petitioner contends (Br. 17, 60-61) that disallowing a vehicle ownership deduction in the circumstances presented here would deny Chapter 13 bankruptcy relief to himself and to other honest debtors. Petitioner is mistaken. As a general matter, a debtor like petitioner who has a positive monthly disposable income, so that he is able to make regular payments to creditors, should be able to propose a confirmable Chapter 13 plan. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b) (listing requirements for plan confirmation). In most cases, the debtor's monthly income will be the same during the plan period as it was during the six months before he filed his petition, and his expenses will be the same during the plan period as at the time of filing. See Lanning, 130 S. Ct. at 2474-2475; see 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2) (means test). If it is known or reasonably certain that a debtor's income or expenses will change in a manner that will affect his ability to pay creditors, the bankruptcy court may account for that prospect in projecting his disposable income over the life of the plan. Lanning, 130 S. Ct. at 2471.

Petitioner's belief that he cannot obtain confirmation of a Chapter 13 plan absent a deduction for a vehicle ownership expense appears to rest on errors in his calculation of income and expenses. For example, on Form 22C, the form for calculating Chapter 13 debtors' disposable income, petitioner failed to claim a $70.00 health care expense and a $247.50 retirement deduction expense, even though he identified those expenses on his Schedule J, which lists current expenditures. See J.A. 43, 44, 53, 56; 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (authorizing deduction of "Other Necessary Expenses," which include health care); 11 U.S.C. 541(b)(7), 1306(a)(1) (authorizing deduction for contributions to qualified retirement plans). Petitioner also listed different income amounts for his income and for taxes on Schedule I (which shows current income) and on Form 22C. See J.A. 43, 45, 50. When these discrepancies are resolved, petitioner's monthly disposable income will be known and he should be able to obtain confirmation of a Chapter 13 plan.

Petitioner is also mistaken in contending (Br. 28, 34) that Form 22C authorizes him to deduct vehicle ownership expenses he will not pay. The form instructs debtors to "[c]heck the number of vehicles for which you claim an expense," J.A. 49 (emphasis added), leaving it to the debtor and his attorney to determine whether that expense category is applicable to him. Contrary to petitioner's suggestion (Br. 28-31), the Advisory Committee has not taken the position that debtors who have no loan or lease payments may deduct vehicle ownership expenses. Instead, recognizing the disagreement in the lower courts on this issue, the Committee recently clarified that "[t]he forms take no position on the question of whether the debtor must actually be making payments on a vehicle in order to claim the ownership/lease allowance." Official Bankr. Forms 22A, 22B & 22C advisory committee's note C.1 (2005-2008). In any event, even if the form or the Committee's note supported petitioner's view, they could not trump the text of the statute, which requires the vehicle ownership expense to be "applicable" to the debtor. See, e.g., Schwab v. Reilly, 130 S. Ct. 2652, 2660 & n.5 (2010).

II. A DEBTOR'S "PROJECTED" DISPOSABLE INCOME SHOULD NOT EXEMPT VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSES THE DEBTOR WILL NOT INCUR

Even if this Court determines that a debtor without loan or lease payments may deduct a vehicle ownership expense under the means test used to calculate "disposable income," that does not end the matter. As this Court explained in Lanning, the Bankruptcy Code requires that all of a Chapter 13 debtor's "projected disposable income" be dedicated to repaying unsecured creditors. In determining the debtor's projected disposable income, the bankruptcy court should take account of the fact that funds claimed as vehicle ownership expenses are in fact available to pay secured creditors.

1. Calculating a Chapter 13 debtor's "disposable income" under the means test in Section 707(b)(2) is only the first step in determining what funds the debtor has available for his repayment plan. In order to confirm the plan, the bankruptcy court must ensure that the amount the debtor proposes to repay uses all the disposable income that the debtor is "projected" to receive over the plan's five-year life span. 11 U.S.C. 1324, 1325(b)(1)(B). As this Court explained in Lanning, that two-step process ensures that, in determining the debtor's ability to repay creditors, the court will take account of "known or virtually certain information about the debtor's future income or expenses." 130 S. Ct. at 2475.

2. Even if the means test would mechanically allow every debtor with a vehicle to claim a vehicle ownership expense deduction, the bankruptcy court should take account of the fact that some debtors will not pay those expenses. Here, where it is known that petitioner has no vehicle loan or lease payments, the bankruptcy court should ensure that the amounts petitioner claims under the Local Standard for vehicle ownership expenses are available to creditors as part of his "projected disposable income." That step is necessary so that all of petitioner's available funds can be used to pay unsecured creditors; without it, he will be able to shield more than $28,000 over the lifetime of the plan.

Although the facts of this case are slightly different from those in Lanning, the Court's holding and rationale apply equally here. Shortly before filing her bankruptcy petition, the debtor in Lanning had received a one-time buyout that made her pre-petition monthly income a demonstrably poor predictor of the income that she could expect to receive during the plan period. 130 S. Ct. at 2470. The Court explained that a "forward-looking approach" was necessary to ensure that the debtor would not be required, as a condition of plan confirmation, to commit to pay more during the plan period than she could actually afford. Id. at 2474-2475. Here, deducting vehicle ownership expenses in calculating petitioner's "projected disposable income" would be inappropriate, not because any change in the relevant circumstances has occurred or is expected to occur, but because petitioner currently has no vehicle loan or lease payments and has identified no reason to believe that he will make such payments during the plan period.

The Court in Lanning did not limit its holding to changed circumstances; it stated that the bankruptcy court could account for "known or virtually certain information about the debtor's future income or expenses" that makes the initial calculation of disposable income a demonstrably unreliable predictor of the debtor's financial condition during the plan period. 130 S. Ct. at 2474-2475 (emphasis added). And the concern that led the Court to the forward-looking approach is directly applicable here. If this Court rejects the construction of Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) advocated by the government and by respondent, and holds that the IRS Local Standard for vehicle ownership expenses is "applicable" to petitioner, use of the "mechanical approach" in projecting petitioner's disposable income "would deny creditors payments the debtor could easily make." Id. at 2476. Here, as in Lanning, there is no reason to "throw[] out undisputed information bearing on how much a debtor can afford to pay." In re Turner, 574 F.3d 349, 355 (7th Cir. 2009); accord In re Wentzel, 415 B.R. 510, 517-518 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2009) (relying on this reasoning to deny vehicle ownership deduction for individual who had no car loan or lease payments). Accordingly, the fact that petitioner is not "projected" to have any vehicle ownership expenses provides an independent basis for affirming the judgment below.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted.

APPENDIX

1. 11 U.S.C. 707 provides:

Dismissal of a case or conversion to a case under chapter 11 or 13

(a) The court may dismiss a case under this chapter only after notice and a hearing and only for cause, including—

(1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;

(2) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28; and

(3) failure of the debtor in a voluntary case to file, within fifteen days or such additional time as the court may allow after the filing of the petition commencing such case, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521, but only on a motion by the United States trustee.

(b)(1) After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee, trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any), or any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts, or, with the debtor's consent, convert such a case to a case under chapter 11 or 13 of this title, if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter. In making a determination whether to dismiss a case under this section, the court may not take into consideration whether a debtor has made, or continues to make, charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3)) to any qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as that term is defined in section 548(d)(4)).

(2)(A)(i) In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter, the court shall presume abuse exists if the debtor's current monthly income reduced by the amounts determined under clauses (ii), (iii), and (iv), and multiplied by 60 is not less than the lesser of—

(I) 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured claims in the case, or $6,000, whichever is greater; or

(II) $10,000.

(ii)(I) The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief, for the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case, if the spouse is not otherwise a dependent. Such expenses shall include reasonably necessary health insurance, disability insurance, and health savings account expenses for the debtor, the spouse of the debtor, or the dependents of the debtor. Notwithstanding any other provision of this clause, the monthly expenses of the debtor shall not include any payments for debts. In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses shall include the debtor's reasonably necessary expenses incurred to maintain the safety of the debtor and the family of the debtor from family violence as identified under section 309 of the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act,[1] or other applicable Federal law. The expenses included in the debtor's monthly expenses described in the preceding sentence shall be kept confidential by the court. In addition, if it is demonstrated that it is reasonable and necessary, the debtor's monthly expenses may also include an additional allowance for food and clothing of up to 5 percent of the food and clothing categories as specified by the National Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service.

(II) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include, if applicable, the continuation of actual expenses paid by the debtor that are reasonable and necessary for care and support of an elderly, chronically ill, or disabled household member or member of the debtor's immediate family (including parents, grandparents, siblings, children, and grandchildren of the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case who is not a dependent) and who is unable to pay for such reasonable and necessary expenses.

(III) In addition, for a debtor eligible for chapter 13, the debtor's monthly expenses may include the actual administrative expenses of administering a chapter 13 plan for the district in which the debtor resides, up to an amount of 10 percent of the projected plan payments, as determined under schedules issued by the Executive Office for United States Trustees.

(IV) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include the actual expenses for each dependent child less than 18 years of age, not to exceed $1,500 per year per child, to attend a private or public elementary or secondary school if the debtor provides documentation of such expenses and a detailed explanation of why such expenses are reasonable and necessary, and why such expenses are not already accounted for in the National Standards, Local Standards, or Other Necessary Expenses referred to in subclause (I).

(V) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include an allowance for housing and utilities, in excess of the allowance specified by the Local Standards for housing and utilities issued by the Internal Revenue Service, based on the actual expenses for home energy costs if the debtor provides documentation of such actual expenses and demonstrates that such actual expenses are reasonable and necessary.

(iii) The debtor's average monthly payments on account of secured debts shall be calculated as the sum of—

> (I) the total of all amounts scheduled as contractually due to secured creditors in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition; and
> (II) any additional payments to secured creditors necessary for the debtor, in filing a plan under chapter 13 of this title, to maintain possession of the debtor's primary residence, motor vehicle, or other property necessary for the support of the debtor and the debtor's dependents, that serves as collateral for secured debts;

divided by 60.

(iv) The debtor's expenses for payment of all priority claims (including priority child support and alimony claims) shall be calculated as the total amount of debts entitled to priority, divided by 60.

(B)(i) In any proceeding brought under this subsection, the presumption of abuse may only be rebutted by demonstrating special circumstances, such as a serious medical condition or a call or order to active duty in the Armed Forces, to the extent such special circumstances that justify additional expenses or adjustments of current monthly income for which there is no reasonable alternative.

(ii) In order to establish special circumstances, the debtor shall be required to itemize each additional expense or adjustment of income and to provide—

(I) documentation for such expense or adjustment to income; and

(II) a detailed explanation of the special circumstances that make such expenses or adjustment to income necessary and reasonable.

(iii) The debtor shall attest under oath to the accuracy of any information provided to demonstrate that additional expenses or adjustments to income are required.

(iv) The presumption of abuse may only be rebutted if the additional expenses or adjustments to income referred to in clause (i) cause the product of the debtor's current monthly income reduced by the amounts determined under clauses (ii), (iii), and (iv) of subparagraph (A) when multiplied by 60 to be less than the lesser of—

(I) 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured claims, or $6,000, whichever is greater; or

(II) $10,000.

(C) As part of the schedule of current income and expenditures required under section 521, the debtor shall include a statement of the debtor's current monthly income, and the calculations that determine whether a presumption arises under subparagraph (A)(i), that show how each such amount is calculated.

(D) Subparagraphs (A) through (C) shall not apply, and the court may not dismiss or convert a case based on any form of means testing, if the debtor is a disabled veteran (as defined in section 3741(1) of title 38), and the indebtedness occurred primarily during a period during which he or she was—

(i) on active duty (as defined in section 101(d)(1) of title 10); or

(ii) performing a homeland defense activity (as defined in section 901(1) of title 32).

(3) In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter in a case in which the presumption in subparagraph (A)(i) of such paragraph does not arise or is rebutted, the court shall consider—

(A) whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith; or

(B) the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse.

(4)(A) The court, on its own initiative or on the motion of a party in interest, in accordance with the procedures described in rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of

Bankruptcy Procedure, may order the attorney for the debtor to reimburse the trustee for all reasonable costs in prosecuting a motion filed under section 707(b), including reasonable attorneys' fees, if—

(i) a trustee files a motion for dismissal or conversion under this subsection; and

(ii) the court—

(I) grants such motion; and

(II) finds that the action of the attorney for the debtor in filing a case under this chapter violated rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure.

(B) If the court finds that the attorney for the debtor violated rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, the court, on its own initiative or on the motion of a party in interest, in accordance with such procedures, may order—

(i) the assessment of an appropriate civil penalty against the attorney for the debtor; and

(ii) the payment of such civil penalty to the trustee, the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any).

(C) The signature of an attorney on a petition, pleading, or written motion shall constitute a certification that the attorney has—

(i) performed a reasonable investigation into the circumstances that gave rise to the petition, pleading, or written motion; and

(ii) determined that the petition, pleading, or written motion—

(I) is well grounded in fact; and

(II) is warranted by existing law or a good faith argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law and does not constitute an abuse under paragraph (1).

(D) The signature of an attorney on the petition shall constitute a certification that the attorney has no knowledge after an inquiry that the information in the schedules filed with such petition is incorrect.

(5)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B) and subject to paragraph (6), the court, on its own initiative or on the motion of a party in interest, in accordance with the procedures described in rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, may award a debtor all reasonable costs (including reasonable attorneys' fees) in contesting a motion filed by a party in interest (other than a trustee or United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any)) under this subsection if—

(i) the court does not grant the motion; and

(ii) the court finds that—

(I) the position of the party that filed the motion violated rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure; or

(II) the attorney (if any) who filed the motion did not comply with the requirements of clauses (i) and (ii) of paragraph (4)(C), and the motion was made solely for the purpose of coercing a debtor into waiving a right guaranteed to the debtor under this title.

(B) A small business that has a claim of an aggregate amount less than $1,000 shall not be subject to subparagraph (A)(ii)(I).

(C) For purposes of this paragraph—

(i) the term "small business" means an unincorporated business, partnership, corporation, association, or organization that—

(I) has fewer than 25 full-time employees as determined on the date on which the motion is filed; and

(II) is engaged in commercial or business activity; and

(ii) the number of employees of a wholly owned subsidiary of a corporation includes the employees of—

(I) a parent corporation; and

(II) any other subsidiary corporation of the parent corporation.

(6) Only the judge or United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any) may file a motion under section 707(b), if the current monthly income of the debtor, or in a joint case, the debtor and the debtor's spouse, as of the date of the order for relief, when multiplied by 12, is equal to or less than—

(A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(C) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(7)(A) No judge, United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any), trustee, or other party in interest may file a motion under paragraph (2) if the current monthly income of the debtor, including a veteran (as that term is defined in section 101 of title 38), and the debtor's spouse combined, as of the date of the order for relief when multiplied by 12, is equal to or less than—

(i) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(ii) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(iii) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(B) In a case that is not a joint case, current monthly income of the debtor's spouse shall not be considered for purposes of subparagraph (A) if—

(i)(I) the debtor and the debtor's spouse are separated under applicable nonbankruptcy law; or

(II) the debtor and the debtor's spouse are living separate and apart, other than for the purpose of evading subparagraph (A); and

(ii) the debtor files a statement under penalty of perjury—

(I) specifying that the debtor meets the requirement of subclause (I) or (II) of clause (i); and

(II) disclosing the aggregate, or best estimate of the aggregate, amount of any cash or money payments received from the debtor's spouse attributed to the debtor's current monthly income.

(c)(1) In this subsection—

(A) the term "crime of violence" has the meaning given such term in section 16 of title 18; and

(B) the term "drug trafficking crime" has the meaning given such term in section 924(c)(2) of title 18.

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), after notice and a hearing, the court, on a motion by the victim of a crime of violence or a drug trafficking crime, may when it is in the best interest of the victim dismiss a voluntary case filed under this chapter by a debtor who is an individual if such individual was convicted of such crime.

(3) The court may not dismiss a case under paragraph (2) if the debtor establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that the filing of a case under this chapter is necessary to satisfy a claim for a domestic support obligation.

2. 11 U.S.C. 1325 provides:

Confirmation of plan

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the court shall confirm a plan if—

(1) the plan complies with the provisions of this chapter and with the other applicable provisions of this title;

(2) any fee, charge, or amount required under chapter 123 of title 28, or by the plan, to be paid before confirmation, has been paid;

(3) the plan has been proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law;

(4) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of each allowed unsecured claim is not less than the amount that would be paid on such claim if the estate of the debtor were liquidated under chapter 7 of this title on such date;

(5) with respect to each allowed secured claim provided for by the plan—

(A) the holder of such claim has accepted the plan;

(B)(i) the plan provides that—

(I) the holder of such claim retain the lien securing such claim until the earlier of—

(aa) the payment of the underlying debt determined under nonbankruptcy law; or

(bb) discharge under section 1328; and

(II) if the case under this chapter is dismissed or converted without completion of the plan, such lien shall also be retained by such holder to the extent recognized by applicable nonbankruptcy law;

(ii) the value, as of the effective date of the plan, of property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the allowed amount of such claim; and

(iii) if—

(I) property to be distributed pursuant to this subsection is in the form of periodic payments, such payments shall be in equal monthly amounts; and

(II) the holder of the claim is secured by personal property, the amount of such payments shall not be less than an amount sufficient to provide to the holder of such claim adequate protection during the period of the plan; or

(C) the debtor surrenders the property securing such claim to such holder;

(6) the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan;

(7) the action of the debtor in filing the petition was in good faith;

(8) the debtor has paid all amounts that are required to be paid under a domestic support obligation and that first become payable after the date of the filing of the petition if the debtor is required by a judicial or administrative order, or by statute, to pay such domestic support obligation; and

(9) the debtor has filed all applicable Federal, State, and local tax returns as required by section 1308.

For purposes of paragraph (5), section 506 shall not apply to a claim described in that paragraph if the creditor has a purchase money security interest securing the debt that is the subject of the claim, the debt was incurred within the 910-day preceding the date of the filing of the petition, and the collateral for that debt consists of a motor vehicle (as defined in section 30102 of title 49) acquired for the personal use of the debtor, or if collateral for that debt consists of any other thing of value, if the debt was incurred during the 1-year period preceding that filing.

(b)(1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan—

(A) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or

(B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "disposable income" means current monthly income received by the debtor (other than child support payments, foster care payments, or disability payments for a dependent child made in accordance with applicable nonbankruptcy law to the extent reasonably necessary to be expended for such child) less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended—

> (A)(i) for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent of the debtor, or for a domestic support obligation, that first becomes payable after the date the petition is filed; and
> (ii) for charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3)[1] to a qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as defined in section 548(d)(4)) in an amount not to exceed 15 percent of gross income of the debtor for the year in which the contributions are made; and
> (B) if the debtor is engaged in business, for the payment of expenditures necessary for the continuation, preservation, and operation of such business.

(3) Amounts reasonably necessary to be expended under paragraph (2), other than subparagraph (A)(ii) of paragraph (2), shall be determined in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2), if the debtor has current monthly income, when multiplied by 12, greater than—

> (A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

[1] So in original. Probably should be followed by a second closing parenthesis.

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(C) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(4) For purposes of this subsection, the "applicable commitment period"—

(A) subject to subparagraph (B), shall be—

(i) 3 years; or

(ii) not less than 5 years, if the current monthly income of the debtor and the debtor's spouse combined, when multiplied by 12, is not less than—

(I) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(II) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(III) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $525 per month for each individual in excess of 4; and

(B) may be less than 3 or 5 years, whichever is applicable under subparagraph (A), but only if the plan provides for payment in full of all allowed unsecured claims over a shorter period.

(c) After confirmation of a plan, the court may order any entity from whom the debtor receives income to pay all or any part of such income to the trustee.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b) to issue its final order denying the United States Trustee's motion seeking the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.[1] Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a), any final judgment, order, or decree of a bankruptcy court can be appealed to the District Court.

II.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES ON APPEAL

Did the bankruptcy court err by finding that cause did not exist for the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1), even though the debtors' pre-bankruptcy management had abdicated their management responsibilities, leaving a void in management that could be filled only by the appointment of an independent fiduciary?

III.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 582 et seq., the United States Attorney General has appointed United States Trustees in 21 geographic regions throughout the United States. United States Trustees are senior officials of the Department of Justice who "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within their respective regions through the exercise of a range of oversight responsibilities. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3). See generally In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002) (explaining that the United States Trustee is the "watchdog" of the bankruptcy system). conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. See In re Bibo, 76 F.3d 256, 258 (9th Cir. 1996). Because the facts underlying this appeal are not in dispute, the de novo standard of review applies to this Court's review of the bankruptcy court's conclusions of law.

IV.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statutory Framework

A "debtor" is a person who commences a case under the United States Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 101(13). Corporations are persons, making them eligible for chapter 11 bankruptcy relief. 11 U.S.C. § 101(41) (definition of "person"); 11 U.S.C. § 109(b) and (d) (collectively making corporations eligible for chapter 11 relief).

When a debtor files a petition under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, the debtor ordinarily becomes a "debtor in possession." 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a). The debtor in possession has virtually all of the rights, powers, and duties of a trustee, and accordingly serves as a fiduciary for the bankruptcy estate. Id.; see also Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985) ("[T]he willingness of courts to leave debtors in possession 'is premised upon an assurance that the officers and managing employees can be depended upon to carry out the fiduciary responsibilities of a trustee.'") (quoting Wolf v. Weinstein, 372 U.S. 633, 651 (1963)).

Under § 1104(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code, the bankruptcy court "shall" order the appointment of a trustee upon a finding of "cause." The Bankruptcy Code sets forth a non-exclusive list of examples of what can constitute cause, "including fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, or gross mismanagement of the affairs of the debtor . . . ." Because the list of examples is introduced by the word "including," the list is not limiting. 11 U.S.C. § 102(3). The appointment of a chapter 11 trustee is the sole statutory remedy set out in the Bankruptcy Code by which a bankruptcy court may direct the appointment of a fiduciary to replace management of a debtor that is unable or unwilling to fulfill its fiduciary obligations to the estate.

The Bankruptcy Code authorizes bankruptcy courts to issue any order necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 105(a), but specifically prohibits bankruptcy courts from appointing receivers in bankruptcy cases. 11 U.S.C. § 105(b). Nothing in the Bankruptcy Code or Rules authorizes a court to appoint a "responsible person" to exercise the duties of a § 1104(a) trustee.

B. Factual Background

On September 6, 2007, the Securities and Exchange Commission (the "SEC") filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the Central District of California against Real Estate Partners, Inc., seven related entities, Dawson Davenport, and other individuals. This case is now pending as Case No. 8:07-cv-10122-AG-RNB. The SEC alleges that the defendants committed securities fraud in connection with raising $50 million from investors between January 2003 and August 2006. The complaint seeks disgorgement and civil penalties against the defendants. Shortly after filing its complaint, the SEC filed a motion for the appointment of a receiver which the defendants opposed. A hearing on the matter was set for October 9, 2007.

One day before the receiver hearing, on October 8, 2007, Real Estate Partners, Inc., a California Corporation ("REP") and its seven related entities (collectively, the "debtors") filed petitions under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Central District of California. II ROA at 1032, 1057, 1061, 1066, 1071, 1076, 1080 and 1084.

These cases are being jointly administered as 8:07-13239-TA through 8:07-13246-TA. I ROA at 52-54.

REP purports to be in the business of acquiring, managing and disposing of real estate properties. I ROA at 43. REP is the operating entity for all of the debtors. I ROA at 47. The debtors' primary assets are the interests held by seven debtor entities in real estate projects. As of the petition date, the debtors had approximately $3.7 million in cash on hand along with $150,000 worth of office equipment. The debtors' unsecured claims total approximately $33,141.28, exclusive of the SEC's claims. I ROA at 46-47.

On the first day of the debtors' bankruptcy case, the debtors filed motions seeking an order from the bankruptcy court approving the hiring of a "responsible person" by REP's board of directors and majority shareholder, Davenport. I ROA at 258-360. These first day motions disclosed that REP had entered into an engagement letter with Richard Kipperman on October 5, 2007 to hire him as "responsible person."[2]

On October 12, 2007, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on the debtors' responsible person motions. I ROA at 506. The United States Trustee presented the court with a written opposition before the hearing. I ROA at 65-69. At the hearing, counsel for the SEC made an oral request that the court direct the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee sua sponte, which the bankruptcy court denied. I ROA at 530.

[2] Before the filing of the cases, Dawson Davenport resigned as the CEO of REP, but he retained ultimate control of the debtors as REP's majority shareholder. I ROA at 43. At the time of filing, REP's board of directors consisted of its president, Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Itzel. II ROA at 606-607.

The United States Trustee stated at the hearing that he would be filing a motion for the appointment of a trustee for cause under § 1104(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code. The court stated that the debtors' responsible person motions, in and of themselves, established cause and, therefore, the United States Trustee need not submit further evidence to establish cause for the appointment of a trustee. Instead, the court viewed the United States Trustee's upcoming trustee motion as an opportunity for the parties to brief the issue of whether the appointment of the responsible person in lieu of a chapter 11 trustee was appropriate where "cause" exists for the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a). I ROA at 562-566.

At the conclusion of the hearing the court entered an interim order (the "October 12 order") appointing Mr. Kipperman to serve as a "responsible person" for the period between October 12 and a hearing scheduled for November 19 while the court considered whether to order the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. I ROA at 556-557. The October 12 order effectively fired the debtors' officers and directors and put a responsible person in place who would act until the November 19 hearing.[3] While the appointment of the responsible person was interim, the removal of management was permanent. The court stated, "There is no scenario under which former management is to return to authority whatsoever. I want to make that very

[3] The October 12 Order states:

> The Responsible Person shall have (i) the authority, responsibilities, rights, duties and obligations to make all decisions that would otherwise be made by the board of directors, officers, members, and/or trustee of each respective Debtor and all persons who are presently directors and/or officers of any of the Debtors are accordingly hereby terminated, and (ii) the authority, responsibilities, rights, duties and obligations to make all decisions associated with the conducting the day to day operations of the Debtors' business.

I ROA at 62. (emphasis added).

clear." I ROA at 559. Between the two hearings, the remaining officers and directors submitted formal letters of resignation, thereby establishing beyond any doubt that the "responsible person" was in complete control of the debtors. II ROA 606-607.

On October 26, 2007, the United States Trustee filed his § 1104(a) motion for appointment of a chapter 11 trustee with the Court. I ROA at 70. The SEC filed pleadings supporting the United States Trustee's motion. II ROA at 781.

The debtors opposed the United States Trustee's motion, claiming that the court-appointed responsible person could constitute "new" management of the debtors who was not tainted by prior management's misconduct, and that, therefore, "cause" would not exist under § 1104(a)(1) to appoint a chapter 11 trustee. II ROA at 568, 580-590. The United States Trustee filed a reply to the opposition, pointing out that because the responsible person was not properly empowered under applicable non-bankruptcy law to manage the debtors, the debtors had no current management. II ROA at 817-818. Accordingly, the United States Trustee asserted that the appointment of a § 1104(a) trustee was necessary to fill the management vacuum created by the wholesale resignation of the debtors' prior management.

On November 19, 2007, the bankruptcy court entertained oral argument on the United States Trustee's Motion and took the matter under submission. II ROA at 957, 1020-1021. On November 20, 2007, the bankruptcy court issued its order (the "November 20 order") denying the United States Trustee's § 1104(a) motion. The November 20 order appointed Mr. Kipperman to serve as a "responsible person" in all eight bankruptcy cases, thus making final the October 12 order. II ROA at 905. The court vested Mr. Kipperman with all of the rights, powers, and duties of a chapter 11 trustee.[4] It is from these orders that the United States Trustee filed his timely notice of appeal.

VI.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Section 1104(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code makes the appointment of a trustee mandatory if "cause" exists. 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1) (the court "shall" order the appointment of a trustee). In this case, the debtors' management abdicated their management responsibilities and the bankruptcy court itself, at the October 12 hearing and in the October 12 order, made it clear that under no circumstances would prior management be permitted to regain control of the companies. This utter absence of management to carry out the duties of a debtor in possession constituted cause under § 1104(a)(1). Given that cause existed, the court below erred in refusing to order the appointment of a § 1104(a) trustee.

The bankruptcy court erred in finding that it could avoid the statutory mandate of § 1104(a) by appointing a "responsible person." The Bankruptcy Code and Rules nowhere

[4] The October 12 Order also vests Mr. Kipperman with the following powers:

> The authority, responsibilities, rights, powers, duties, and obligations of the Debtors' Responsible Person shall include those set forth in 11 U.S.C. §§ 1106(a), 1107 and 1108, including but not limited to investigating the acts, conduct, assets, liabilities, and, financial affairs of the Debtors, the operation of the debtors' business and the desirability of the continuance of such business, and any other matter relevant to the case or to the formulation of a plan. The Responsible Person shall also have the authority to bring, on behalf of the bankruptcy estate(s), such actions as may be appropriate to recover funds and/or property.

I ROA at 62-63.

recognize the concept of a responsible person. To the contrary, the mandatory nature of a § 1104(a)(1) appointment – that statute uses "shall" – underscores that bankruptcy courts must appoint a trustee when cause exists.

Although the bankruptcy court cited §§ 105(a) and 1107(a) of the Bankruptcy Code in support of its decision to appoint a "responsible person" to perform the duties of a trustee, neither statute empowers the bankruptcy court to refuse to order a trustee appointment in the face of cause. First, it is hornbook law that § 105(a) does not permit a bankruptcy court to exercise its equitable powers to override other explicit mandates of other sections of the Bankruptcy Code such as § 1104(a)(1). Second, the court's power under § 105(a) is specifically limited by § 105(b), which expressly prohibits bankruptcy courts from appointing receivers. The responsible person in this case is a receiver in all but name. Finally, the court's authority to limit a debtor in possession's powers under § 1107(a) cannot fairly be read to authorize the court to appoint replacement management instead of ordering the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

The bankruptcy court's apparent reliance on California Corporations Code § 1400 as a source of the court's authority to appoint replacement management for the debtors was also misplaced. Section 1400 is not a corporate governance provision. That statute merely provides that a California corporation that files a chapter 11 petition may amend its articles of incorporation or bylaws to effectuate the terms of a confirmed plan of reorganization without board or shareholder approval. The statute does not empower bankruptcy courts to appoint a "responsible person" during the pendency of the bankruptcy case to supplant management or to fill a management vacuum. Under these circumstances the court's sole remedy is to order the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

Finally, the clear weight of authority supports the appointment of § 1104(a) trustees when cause exists and does not support recourse to the non-statutory alternative of a responsible person to appoint or replace the management of a debtor in possession. If management must be appointed or replaced, and if such appointment or replacement cannot be effectuated pursuant to state law, the proper remedy is the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

VII.

ARGUMENT

A. Because the debtors' utter absence of management constituted cause under 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1), the appointment of a trustee for these cases was mandatory.

A.1. The appointment of a trustee is mandatory when cause exists under § 1104(a)(1)

Section 1104(a) of the Bankruptcy Code provides as follows:

> (a) At any time after the commencement of the case but before confirmation of a plan, on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee, and after notice and a hearing, the court shall order the appointment of a trustee –
> (1) for cause, including fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, or gross mismanagement of the affairs of the debtor by current management, either before or after the commencement of the case, or similar cause, but not including the number of holders of securities of the debtor or the amount of assets or liabilities of the debtor . . . .

11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1) (emphasis added).

The use of the word "shall" in § 1104(a) mandates the appointment of a trustee when "cause" exists. See Escoe v. Zerbst, 295 U.S. 490, 493 ("shall" is the language of command; its use in a statute indicates congressional intent that the statute be mandatory). "The willingness of Congress to leave a debtor-in-possession is premised on an expectation that current management can be depended upon to carry out the fiduciary responsibilities of a trustee. And if the debtor-in-possession defaults in this respect, Section 1104(a)(1) commands that the stewardship of the reorganization effort must be turned over to an independent trustee." In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 474 (3rd Cir. 2000), quoting In re V. Savino Oil & Heating Co., Inc., 99 B.R. 518, 526 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1989). See also In re Oklahoma Refining Company, 838 F.2d 1133, 1136 (10th Cir.1988).

A.2. The debtors' lack of properly constituted management constituted "cause" for the appointment of a trustee

Although § 1104(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code lists a number of examples of what can constitute cause for the appointment of a trustee, that list is not exhaustive. Section 1104(a)(1)'s use of the word "including" to preface the list indicates that the list is not limiting. 11 U.S.C. § 102(3) (rule of construction establishing that "including" is "not limiting"). See also In re Savino Oil & Heating Co., Inc., 99 B.R. 518 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1989).

The total absence of duly empowered management is "cause" for the appointment of a § 1104(a) chapter 11 trustee. The usual presumption in favor of allowing a debtor's management to remain in the case vanishes completely when management does not or cannot perform its fiduciary duties. See Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985) ("[T]he willingness of courts to leave debtors in possession 'is premised upon an assurance that the officers and managing employees can be depended upon to carry out the fiduciary responsibilities of a trustee.'") (quoting Wolf v. Weinstein, 372 U.S. 633, 651 (1963)).

In this case, the debtors' prepetition officers and board of directors sought in the responsible person motions to completely get out of the business of running these debtors. They agreed to turn over their state law management duties to a person who would answer only to the bankruptcy court. By their motions, they demonstrated their unwillingness to manage the debtors in possession and acknowledged their lack of fitness to perform the necessary tasks. Indeed, the bankruptcy court's October 12 order expressly terminated all officers and directors of the debtors who were serving on that date. As the court stated at the October 12 hearing, "[t]here is no scenario under which former management is to return to authority whatsoever. I want to make that very clear." I ROA at 559. As of that date, therefore, the debtors had no management. This lack of management, in and of itself, constituted clear cause for the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

Rather than relying upon § 1104(a)(1) by ordering the appointment of a trustee, the federal bankruptcy court sought to replace the debtors' state law officers and directors by appointing a "responsible person" who would be answerable only to the court. The court then went on to analyze the case as if Mr. Kipperman was "new management."

Once the bankruptcy court effectively fired the debtors' officers and directors, the court had no choice but to order the appointment of a § 1104(a) trustee. The court's error was in concluding that it was not required to order the appointment of a § 1104(a) trustee to effectuate a change in management. In a case with quite analogous facts to those at bar, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the First Circuit concluded that, if a debtor's duly authorized management must be displaced, the court's only alternative is to order the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

In In re Casco Bay Lines, Inc., 17 B.R. 946 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 1982), the bankruptcy judge to whom the case was originally assigned barred the debtor's principal stockholders, directors, and officers from any participation in or control of the debtor in possession. The court ordered that a former owner of the debtor's business be hired as the debtor's sole operating officer. Id. at 949.

Upon the death of the former owner, the control of the debtor's case was assumed by the debtor's attorney. Id. The original bankruptcy judge was later appointed to the district court. The bankruptcy judge to whom the case was reassigned raised issues about the management of the debtor in possession, and convened a hearing to consider whether a chapter 11 trustee should be appointed. Relying upon the dearth of properly constituted corporate management, the bankruptcy court found that cause existed for the appointment of a trustee and ordered the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

On appeal, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel affirmed. The court found that the following undisputed facts mandated the trustee appointment: "(1) The principal officers had been barred from any participation in the management of the debtor; (2) new "management" had been installed by the court; and (3) no trustee had been appointed." Id. Affirming the bankruptcy court, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel observed that in a chapter 11, there is either a debtor in possession or a trustee. Because the owners and officers of the debtor had been "ordered not in any way to have anything further to do with management of the company, that is the usual grounds for appointment of a Trustee, both under law and simple logic." Id. at 951. The court further held that > . . . a Chapter 11 reorganization contemplates only two possible scenarios for control of the debtor's business operations: a debtor in possession, or a debtor out of possession. The latter situation contemplates and mandates the appointment of a trustee. . . . [E]ither the debtor must be in control, or the court will authorize the appointment of a trustee to take control of the debtor's affairs. Furthermore, the phrase "in possession" not only means physical possession, but actual control over decisions regarding conduct of the business. In sum, the debtor, to be in possession, must have some form of control over its business destiny and be able to make the day to day business decisions required of its operation.

Id. The court observed that "the appointment of a trustee is the only statutorily authorized alternative to a debtor in possession. The bankruptcy court is specifically prohibited from appointing a receiver. 11 U.S.C. § 105(b)." Id. at 952. The court concluded:

> Because a corporation is an inanimate legal entity, it acts only through its officers and agents. In this case, the court removed those agents from control and in effect replaced them with "new management". The court had no authority under the Bankruptcy Code to do so. Once it removed the debtor's agents from control, it had no alternative but to authorize those agents to be replaced with a trustee.

Id.

This case is factually indistinguishable from Casco Bay Lines. Just as the bankruptcy court in Casco Bay Lines had removed that debtor's managers from power and attempted to replace them with its designated representative, the court here sought to remove the debtors' management and replace them with Mr. Kipperman.

Worse, the alleged "management structure" used in this case, as imposed by the October 12 order and as confirmed by the November 20 order, is in derogation of California law. Under California law, "the business and affairs of the corporation shall be managed and all corporate powers shall be exercised by or under the direction of the board [of directors]." California Corporations Code § 300(a). Corporate officers, who are agents of the corporation, are "chosen by the board and serve at the pleasure of the board . . . ." California Corporations Code § 312(b). Mr. Kipperman clearly does not serve at the pleasure of the board of directors, as all pre-petition officers and directors have been terminated by order of the bankruptcy court. The October 12 order appointing Mr. Kipperman as the responsible person states that he answers only to the court. I ROA at 62-63. Mr. Kipperman is therefore not properly empowered under California corporate law to manage these debtors. Because Mr. Kipperman is not "current management" of the debtors, the debtors suffer from a management vacuum.

B. Because cause existed, the bankruptcy court was required by § 1104(a) to order the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

B.1. Neither § 105(a) nor § 1107(a) empowers a court to appoint a responsible person instead of ordering the appointment of a § 1104(a) trustee.

(a) 11 U.S.C. § 105(a)

When "cause" exists for the appointment of a trustee, Congress has established only one remedy that can supplant management while allowing the case to remain in chapter 11 – the appointment of a trustee pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a). Because § 1104(a) expressly and specifically sets forth a mechanism for the appointment of an independent fiduciary to replace management of a debtor in possession, debtors and bankruptcy courts cannot ignore this provision by writing alternative remedies into the Code, such as the employment of a "responsible person" who would act as quasi-trustee. The court must be faithful to the plain meaning of the Bankruptcy Code's provisions, as drafted by Congress, and read them narrowly. See, e.g., Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 533 (2004) (strictly interpreting 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)). There is no "quasi-trustee" provision in the Code, and Congress has provided for no such entity. Any such alternative remedy would nullify the mandatory nature of trustee appointments as expressed in § 1104(a). See H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 402 (1977).

The bankruptcy court relied on 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) in holding that it had the authority to appoint a responsible person in lieu of a trustee. Section 105(a) of the Bankruptcy Code provides, in relevant part, that "[t]he court may issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of [the Bankruptcy Code]." 11 U.S.C. § 105(a). While this provision does grant bankruptcy courts broad equitable powers, it does not create substantive rights that would otherwise be unavailable under the Bankruptcy Code. See In re Continental Airlines, 203 F.3d 203, 211 (3d Cir. 2000); United States v. Sutton, 786 F.2d 1305, 1308 (5th Cir. 1986).

And it is universally accepted that a court cannot employ § 105(a) to ignore, supersede, misconstrue any bankruptcy statute or rule. GAF Corp. v. Johns-Manville Corp. (In re Johns-Manville Corp.), 26 B.R. 405, 414-18 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.). As the Supreme Court has held, "Whatever equitable powers remain in the bankruptcy courts must and can be exercised within the confines of the Bankruptcy Code." Northwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988).

Accordingly, a court may not use § 105(a) to disregard specific Code sections addressing an issue and cannot use it to achieve a result not contemplated by the Code, such as the substitution of a so-called "responsible person" for a § 1104 trustee. See In re Fesco Plastics Corp., 996 F.2d 152 (7th Cir. 1993). Thus, § 105(a) can only be used to carry out provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, not to engraft new provisions onto the statute that Congress neither enacted nor intended. See Southern Ry. Co. v. Johnson Bronze Co., 758 F. 2d 137, 141 (3d Cir. 1985).

While the bankruptcy court's decision cited to its general equitable power under § 105(a), neither the court nor the debtors addressed the specific limitation on that power contained in § 105(b): "Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, a court may not appoint a receiver in a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 105(b). Legislative history underlying this prohibition could not be more clear: "[T]he bankruptcy judge is prohibited from appointing a receiver in a case under title 11 under any circumstances. The Bankruptcy Code has ample provision for the appointment of a trustee when needed. Appointment of a receiver would simply circumvent the established procedures." S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 29 (1978). While the responsible person in this case is not called a "receiver" by name, he clearly is exercising the types of powers and performing the duties traditionally performed by receivers. See Casco Bay Lines, 17 B.R. at 952 ("[T]he appointment of a trustee is the only statutorily authorized alternative to a debtor in possession. The Bankruptcy Court is specifically prohibited from appointing a receiver. 11 U.S.C. § 105(b)").

Significantly, a recent decision from the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York rebuffed efforts by parties in interest to have the court rely on § 105(a) to appoint a non-trustee fiduciary. In re Adelphia Comm. Corp., 336 B.R. 610 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006). The court made short shrift of the argument, pointing out that § 1104 calls for only two kinds of fiduciaries – trustees and examiners. Id. at 664. The movant had not shown grounds for a trustee appointment, and had not sought an examiner appointment. The bankruptcy court held that "[a]ppointing a trustee equivalent, under these circumstances, would be doing exactly what the Second Circuit told the lower courts not to do: using section 105(a) 'to create substantive rights that are otherwise unavailable under applicable law' and to 'invent remedies that overstep statutory limitations.'" Id. at 664 (footnotes omitted)(emphasis in original). The Adelphia court's analysis is compelling and should be followed here.

(b) 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a)

The bankruptcy court also cited § 1107(a) of the Bankruptcy Code as a source of its power to appoint a responsible person. Section 1107(a) provides that the debtor in possession will have most of the rights, powers, and duties of a chapter 11 trustee, "subject . . . to such limitations or conditions as the court prescribes. . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a). The bankruptcy court relied on § 1107(a) in its November 20 order: "Under 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a) the corporate debtor in possession has all of the powers and duties of a trustee subject to such limitations or conditions as the court prescribes. In effect, not only the assets of the estate but its governance as well are in custodia legis." II ROA at 913 (emphasis in original). This reliance on § 1107 to support an order supplanting corporate management with a court-appointed quasi-trustee is plainly wrong.

The court in Adelphia extensivly analyzed § 1107(a) and declined to rely on that statute as a legal basis to circumvent § 1104(a) and to appoint non-statutory fiduciaries. The court observed that the circumstances under which a bankruptcy court exercises its discretion to prescribe conditions and limitations on normal debtor in possession status should be relatively limited, and that the court's power to prescribe additional conditions and limitations restricting normal debtor in possession rights and powers should be exercised with restraint. Adelphia, 336 B.R. at 665. The court expressed considerable doubt over whether § 1107(a) may be read as a license for a court to circumvent or displace more specific sections of the Code any more than § 105(a) may. Id. The court concluded that it might be "altogether forbidden" from using § 1107(a) to impose limitations on the rights of a debtor in possession that circumvented other sections of the Bankruptcy Code. Id. at 666.

The Adelphia court correctly recognized that bankruptcy courts may not properly rely on § 1107(a) as a source of authority to appoint or supplant estate fiduciaries. Section 1107(a) cannot be fairly read as an appointment statute. The drafters of the Bankruptcy Code knew how to create a power to appoint a person to serve in an office in a bankruptcy case. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 701 (appointment of interim Chapter 7 trustees); 11 U.S.C. § 1104(d) (appointment of Chapter 11 trustees and examiners); 11 U.S.C. § 1202 (appointment of Chapter 12 trustees); and 11 U.S.C. § 1302 (appointment of Chapter 13 trustees). While § 1107(a) clearly enables a court to place some limitations on the duties of a debtor in possession, it does not even implicitly authorize the court to appoint a person to perform those duties.

In point of fact, the Bankruptcy Code already specifically states who should perform duties the debtor in possession is ordered not to perform. If the court believes that a debtor should not perform some of the ordinary duties of a trustee that should nevertheless be performed, the proper course of action is to order the appointment of an examiner under 11 U.S.C. § 1104(c) to perform those duties. Section 1106(b), which sets out the duties of an examiner, states that an examiner shall, in addition to conducting an investigation and filing a report, perform, "except to the extent that the court order otherwise, any other duties of the trustee that the court orders the debtor in possession not to perform." The remedy is not, however, to appoint a responsible person pursuant to no express statutory authority.

B.2. California Corporations Code § 1400 does not empower the bankruptcy court to appoint an independent fiduciary

In its November 20 order, the bankruptcy court also relied on California Corporations Code § 1400 as additional authority for its appointment of the responsible person. That section provides in pertinent part:

> (a) Any domestic corporation with respect to which a proceeding has been initiated under any applicable statute of the United States, as now existing or hereafter enacted, relating to reorganizations or arrangements of corporations, has full power and authority to put into effect and carry out any plan of reorganization or arrangement and the orders of the court or judge entered in such proceeding and may take any proceeding and do any act provided in the plan or directed by such orders, without further action by its board or shareholders. Such power and authority may be exercised and such proceedings and acts may be taken, as may be directed by such orders, by the trustee or trustees of such corporation appointed in the reorganization or arrangement proceeding (or a majority thereof), or if none is appointed and acting, by officers of the corporation designated or a master or other representative appointed by the court or judge, with like effect as if exercised and taken by unanimous action of the board and shareholders of the corporation.
> (b) Such corporation may, in the manner provided in subdivision (a), but without limiting the generality or effect of subdivision (a), alter, amend or repeal its bylaws; constitute or reconstitute its board and name, constitute or appoint directors and officers in place of or in addition to all or some of the directors or officers then in office...

California Corporations Code § 1400.

This statute is not a corporate governance provision. Instead, it "merely provides that an existing corporation which files for reorganization under the Bankruptcy Code may amend its articles of incorporation or bylaws to effectuate the terms of a plan of reorganization without board or shareholder approval." In re Mahoney, 80 B.R. 197, 202 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1987); see also R. Franklin Balotti & Jesse A. Finklestein, Delaware Law of Business Corporations and Business Organizations § 11.15 (2007) (virtually identical Delaware statute intended to enable a corporation to effectuate a confirmed plan without further action by the directors or stockholders). When viewed properly, therefore, section 1400 has no bearing on the power of the bankruptcy court to enter an order; it simply provides that California corporations may implement lawful orders of the bankruptcy court. The bankruptcy court's holding that section

1400 creates an independent source of power under which it may approve the appointment of an independent fiduciary in a bankruptcy case must therefore be rejected.[5] See Mahoney at 202 (nothing in section 1400 authorizes the bankruptcy court to enter an order creating an entity violative of existing California corporations law).[6]

B.3. The great weight of case law does not support the appointment of responsible persons in lieu of chapter 11 trustees when cause exists.

In its November 20 order, the bankruptcy court cited to two older cases, In re Gaslight Club, Inc., 782 F.2d 767 (7th Cir. 1986) and In re FSC Corp., 38 B.R. 346 (Bankr. W.D. Penn.1983), in support of the appointment of the responsible person. These decisions are neither

[5] Seven of these eight debtors are either Nevada Limited Liability Companies or Nevada Business Trusts. I ROA at 62. California Corporations Code § 1400 could therefore not possibly grant the Court authority to appoint a responsible person for them. In changing management of these entities, the debtors must comply with Nevada state laws.

[6] If section 1400 is properly interpreted to simply direct California corporations to implement lawful orders of bankruptcy courts, the statute could in no way be considered to be inconsistent with federal law. If, on the other hand, section 1400 is construed to provide bankruptcy courts with the power to appoint estate fiduciaries, serious questions of federal preemption might arise. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has pointed out that

> [t]here can be no doubt that federal bankruptcy law is "pervasive" and involves a federal interest "so dominant" as to "preclude enforcement of state laws on the same subject"-much like many other areas of congressional power listed in Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution, such as patents, copyrights, currency, national defense and immigration. The Bankruptcy Clause, which grants Congress the power to make bankruptcy laws, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4, stresses that such rules must be "uniform." Bankruptcy law occupies a full title of the United States Code. It provides a comprehensive system of rights, obligations and procedures, as well as a complex administrative machinery that includes a special system of federal courts and United States Trustees.

Sherwood Partners, Inc. v. Lycos, Inc., 394 F.3d 1198, 1201 (9th Cir. 2005). In light of this broad preemption by the federal Bankruptcy Code of inconsistent state statutes, the enforceability of a state statute that purports to enable a bankruptcy court to enter orders inconsistent with clear provisions of the Bankruptcy Code is questionable.

controlling nor persuasive, and the great weight of authority since those cases were decided rejects the notion that a bankruptcy court may appoint a responsible person in lieu of appointing a trustee.

Both Gaslight and FSC relied exclusively on § 105(a), §1107(a), and state corporate statutes to justify their decisions upholding the power of the bankruptcy court to appoint a responsible person in a chapter 11 case instead of ordering the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. The analyses in sections B.1 and B.2 of this brief demonstrate that none of these justifications are legally sound. The flawed legal reasoning of Gaslight and FSC cannot serve to support the flawed legal reasoning of the bankruptcy court in this case.

While Gaslight was decided over twenty years ago, it has not been widely followed. Reported decisions almost universally reject its underlying premises or limit its holding to cases where all parties consent to the "responsible person" appointment. See, e.g., In re 1031 Tax Group, LLC, 2007 WL 2085384 at * 3 fn. 4 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. , July 17, 2007) ("Sections 105(a) and 1107(a) may empower a bankruptcy court to prevent a debtor from removing a manager, officer or director, but they do not provide the Court with an independent power of appointment."); (In re Adelphia Comm. Corp., 336 B.R. 610, 668 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2006) (A request for the appointment of an "independent fiduciary" "that is in substance if not name a trustee, and represents a back-door means of circumventing the statutory requirements, and case law, applicable to the appointment of trustees under section 1104 . . . . is not the type of relief that, in this Court's view, it should exercise its discretion to grant."); In re Suncruz Casinos, LLC, 298 B.R. 821, 832 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2003) ("[T]he Committee recommends that the Court appoint a "responsible Person" in lieu of a trustee, in the event the Court determines that Debtors' management should be replaced. . . . The Bankruptcy Code expressly provides for appointment of a trustee when a debtor's management is replaced. The Code does not contemplate appointment of a 'responsible Person' to perform the duties of a trustee."); In re National Century Financial Enterprises, Inc., 292 B.R. 850 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2003) (Court rejected request to vest crisis manager with exclusive rights and powers of a debtor in possession); In re Freedlander, Inc., The Mortg. People, 86 B.R. 66, 68 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1988) (adoption of "responsible person" rationale would enable every debtor to defeat a trustee motion by nominating its own successor; this result is not contemplated by the Bankruptcy Code); but cf. In re United Press Int'l, Inc., 60 B.R. 265 (Bankr. D.D.C. 1986) (court relied on Gaslight to support order vesting CEO with management powers over the debtor).

In light of this near unanimity in post-Gaslight reported decisions, it is not surprising that Collier On Bankruptcy, perhaps the most frequently cited bankruptcy treatise, treats responsible person appointments with barely-disguised disdain:

> It is really unnecessary to misinterpret the Code and look for ways to circumvent its provisions. In an appropriate case, section 1104 can be utilized to provide the proper persons to run the business and assist in the reorganization. When a court finds that management should be replaced, that should be sufficient cause under section 1104(a)(1) to order the appointment of a trustee.

7 Collier On Bankruptcy ¶ 1104.03[6][a], at 1104-50 (15th Ed. Rev.) (footnotes omitted) (emphasis added).

Thus, the bankruptcy court's decision to appoint a responsible person instead of directing the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee cannot withstand scrutiny under either the governing sections of the Bankruptcy Code or under the great weight of case law and other authorities that have considered the issue. The decision must be reversed.

VIII.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that this Court reverse the decisions of the bankruptcy court and vacate the order appointing Mr. Kipperman as the responsible person and grant the United States Trustee's motion for the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT OF RELATED CASES

Pursuant to Ninth Circuit Rule 28-2.6, Appellant hereby identifies the following related case. On September 6, 2007, the Securities and Exchange Commission (the "SEC") filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the Central District of California against Real Estate Partners, Inc., seven related entities, Dawson Davenport, and other individuals. This case is now pending as Case No. 8:07-cv-10122-AG-RNB. The SEC alleges that the defendants committed securities fraud in connection with raising $50 million from investors between January 2003 and August 2006. The complaint seeks disgorgement and civil penalties against the defendants. Shortly after filing its complaint, the SEC filed a motion for the appointment of a receiver which the defendants opposed. A hearing on the matter was set for October 9, 2007.

One day before the receiver hearing, on October 8, 2007, Real Estate Partners, Inc., and its seven related entities filed petitions under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Central District of California.

Respectfully submitted,

I.
INTRODUCTION

When stripped to its essence, the appellees' position is that a chapter 11 debtor should be able to name its own bankruptcy fiduciary pursuant to an extra-statutory procedure in lieu of the appointment of a bankruptcy trustee under established statutory procedures. Their arguments in favor of this extraordinary proposition lose sight of the following:

(1) The United States Trustee sought the appointment of a trustee in these cases because the debtors have no legally constituted management, and this absence of management constitutes cause for the appointment of a trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1);

(2) This case has nothing to with any conduct engaged in by the debtor's former management, with the sole exception of their decision to abdicate their authorities as officers, directors, shareholders, and interest holders, which is a matter of record;

(3) This case has nothing to do with any misconduct by Mr. Kipperman;

(4) What matters in this case is the end result of the process by which Mr. Kipperman acquired complete control over these bankruptcy estates, not whether he was first retained by the debtors and then approved by the bankruptcy court, or whether he was appointed by the bankruptcy court; and

(5) It is uncontroverted that Mr. Kipperman has, since the entry by the bankruptcy court of the October 12 order, completely controlled the affairs of the debtors free from any supervision by a board of directors, the debtors' equity holders, with this control being subject only to further orders of the bankruptcy court.

In light of the foregoing, the issue in this appeal case can be restated simply: Is Mr. Kipperman "new management" of the debtors? While the appellees' brief describes Mr. Kipperman as new management as if this were a given, they do not address the fact that Mr. Kipperman occupies a position vis-a-vis the debtor California corporation that cannot be described as management under any reading of California corporate law. If Mr. Kipperman were truly an officer of the debtors duly elected by and answerable to an independent board of directors untainted by prepetition fraud and abuse, the United States Trustee would not have sought the appointment of a trustee in the absence of other grounds. Because he is not, federal law mandates that a chapter 11 trustee must be appointed.

The appellees' brief is replete with content that is either irrelevant, inaccurate or both. In the limited space available here, the United States Trustee will address those points that are crucial to this Court's determination of this appeal.

II.
ARGUMENT

A. Mr. Kipperman is not management of the debtor California corporation.

While the appellees' entire argument hinges off of the proposition that Mr. Kipperman is "new management" of the debtors, they assiduously avoid any mention of the corporate governance provisions of the California Corporations Code discussed in the United States Trustee's brief. Appellant's Brief at 13-14. Mr. Kipperman is not a member of the debtor's board of directors, whose duty under California law is to manage the business and affairs of the debtor and to exercise or to direct the exercise of all corporate powers. California Corporations Code § 300(a). The bankruptcy court's October 12 order disbanded the board of directors. To be an officer of the corporate debtor, Mr. Kipperman must have been chosen by and serve at the pleasure of the board of directors. California Corporations Code § 312(b). While Mr. Kipperman may have been originally brought on board by the corporate debtor's former board of directors, he no longer serves at the pleasure of a board of directors, as no such board exists. In fact, the October 12 order states categorically that Mr. Kipperman answers only to the bankruptcy court. I ROA at 62-63.

The appellees seek solace in the 1031 Tax Group decisions, but they are plainly distinguishable. There the court ultimately concluded that the debtors had taken appropriate steps under applicable state laws to remove a tainted former manager and to have the selected turnaround manager assume complete control as the sole manager, sole director, or partner of the entities, which were corporations, limited liabilities, and partnerships. In re The 1031 Tax Group, LLC, 374 B.R. 78, 89 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007). In other words, the court concluded as a matter of applicable non-bankruptcy law that the debtors had new management that was untainted by connections to old management. It is noteworthy that the court in 1031 Tax Group rejected out of hand the proposition that it could appoint or approve the appointment of a "responsible person." It stated that the only manner in which the bankruptcy court may impose upon state law corporate governance is by directing the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee under § 1104(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. In re The 1031 Tax Group, 2007 WL 2085384 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.) at *3 fn. 4. Here, Mr. Kipperman cannot be found to be management, because the California corporation has no board of directors.

The appellees seek a lifeline in California Corporations Code § 1400. As the United States Trustee discussed in his opening brief, this statute is not a corporate governance provision. Appellant's brief at 18-20. Instead, it empowers a corporation to put into effect corporate changes mandated by a confirmed plan of reorganization or court orders implementing such a plan without board or shareholder approval. The appellees seek to distinguish In re Mahoney, 80

B.R. 197 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1987), where the bankruptcy court concluded that § 1400 did not empower the court to confirm a plan of reorganization that would impose upon a reorganized debtor a non-cumulative shareholder voting structure that ran afoul of California corporate law. Id. at 202. This was a holding, not dictum as stated by the appellees. While the appellees claim that Mahoney "narrowly" construes § 1400, the secondary source cited by the appellees itself recognizes that the amendments, changes or other authorizations ordered by the bankruptcy court must be "authorized under the General Corporation Law." 9 Witkin Summary of California Law, Corp § 191, 963 (2005) (quoted by Appellees' brief at 29). Just as the court in Mahoney recognized that it could not dispense with cumulative voting when such voting is required by California law, a bankruptcy court cannot through the appointment of a "responsible person" dispense with the California law requirement that a corporation be managed by a board of directors elected by the shareholders of the corporation. Because § 1400 provided the bankruptcy court with no independent authority to appoint Mr. Kipperman to serve as management of these estates, the estates had no duly constituted corporate management from and after the entry by the court of the October 12 order relieving the board of directors of all power.

B. The absence of duly constituted management constitutes cause for the appointment of a trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1)

The appellees assert that cause exists for the appointment of a trustee under § 1104(a)(1) only if current management has committed misconduct. This is incorrect. While § 1104(a)(1) lists various types of misconduct by current management as being examples of cause, the use of the word "including" demonstrates that this list is not exhaustive. 11 U.S.C. § 102(3); Appellant's Brief at 10. The Supreme Court has held that the willingness of courts to leave debtors in possession is dependent upon an assurance that corporate management can be depended upon to carry out the fiduciary responsibilities of a trustee. Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985). In the absence of a board of directors properly constituted and operating under California law, the debtor cannot remain in possession. Cause therefore exists and a trustee must be appointed.

The decision of the first circuit bankruptcy appellate panel in In re Casco Bay Lines, Inc., 17 B.R. 946 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 1982), discussed in Appellant's Brief at pages 11-13, is directly on point here. The appellees seek to distinguish the decision based upon factual differences between these cases and the Casco Bay Lines case. While the facts of Casco Bay Lines and these cases differ, not one difference is a legally cognizable distinction. The appellees expend much paper and ink discussing the fact that Poulos, the person in charge of the debtor in Casco Bay Lines, suffered from conflicts of interest while Mr. Kipperman does not. The Casco Bay Lines court specifically discounted these conflicts of interest as a reason for its decision, however: "[T]he question of whether Poulos is a disinterested party is superfluous in view of what we conclude was the judge's real reason for authorizing the appointment of a trustee." Id. at 951. The court found that the bankruptcy court's "real reason" for authorizing the appointment of a trustee was that a chapter 11 estate could be operated only by a debtor in possession or a trustee, and that if a corporate debtor's owners and officers have been removed from control of the debtor, the debtor is no longer "in possession" and cause necessarily exists for the appointment of a trustee. Id. at 951-52. This holding is equally applicable to the present cases.

C. Whether Mr. Kipperman was chosen by the debtors' prior management or appointed by the court is irrelevant. He is now serving as a receiver in violation of § 105(b) of the Bankruptcy Code.

Because cause exists for the appointment of a trustee, the bankruptcy court erred in failing to direct such an appointment without regard to whether Mr. Kipperman is a receiver appointed in violation of § 105(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. Any rational interpretation of the Bankruptcy Code will, however, establish that Mr. Kipperman is in fact serving as such a receiver.

The appellees cannot seem to decide whether it best suits their case for Mr. Kipperman to have been employed by the debtors' prior management or appointed by the bankruptcy court. They attempt to resolve this problem by seeking to have it both ways. They argue that Mr. Kipperman cannot be a receiver appointed by the court in violation of § 105(b) of the Bankruptcy Code because he was employed by the debtors. Appellee's Brief at 18. They seek to distinguish Casco Bay Lines based upon the fact that Mr. Kipperman was chosen by the debtors, while the responsible person in Casco Bay Lines was chosen by the court. Appellees' Brief at 15. Elsewhere in the brief, they assert that Mr. Kipperman is untainted by the debtors' prepetition conduct because he "was not selected by prior management . . . ." Appellees' brief at 13. They also argue that California Corporations Code § 1400 "clearly provides an independent basis for the bankruptcy court to appoint a representative on behalf of the corporation . . . ." Appellees' brief at 29.

This semantic exercise is necessitated by the appellees' efforts to show that Mr. Kipperman is not a receiver appointed by the bankruptcy court in violation of the express statutory prohibition found in § 105(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. They claim that Mr. Kipperman cannot be a receiver prohibited by § 105(b) because he was not involuntarily foisted upon them by the court and because his duties extend beyond the mere preservation of property pending litigation. Appellees' brief at 18-19. They cite In re Madison Avenue Ltd. Partnership, 213 B.R. 888 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1997) in support of their very limited definition of "receiver." But the bankruptcy court in Madison Avenue Ltd. Partnership itself distinguished between two types of receivers. First is the ordinary receiver appointed pre-bankruptcy by a non-bankruptcy court to preserve property pending litigation, such as a receiver appointed to operate mortgaged property pending a foreclosure. Such a receiver may be permitted to retain possession and control of property of a debtor after a bankruptcy filing, 11 U.S.C. § 543(d), but the receiver will not have any of the rights, powers, and duties of a trustee or a debtor in possession. 213 B.R. at 894.

The second type of receiver identified by the Madison Avenue Ltd. Partnership court is a receiver appointed in a bankruptcy case. The court noted that while receiver appointments were common in cases under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, such appointments are expressly prohibited by § 105(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. Id. at 894 n. 13. Two circuit courts have also recognized the distinction between equity receivers and bankruptcy receivers. See Cassidy Land and Cattle Co., Inc. v. Craig, 836 F.2d 1130, 1133 (8th Cir. 1987) (§ 105(b) precludes a bankruptcy court from appointing a receiver in lieu of a trustee, but does not limit authority of court to appoint a receiver to take possession of mortgaged property of a third party pending a foreclosure instituted by the bankruptcy trustee); In re Memorial Estates, Inc., 797 F.2d 516, 519 (7th Cir. 1986) (distinguishing between bankruptcy receiver and equity receiver; appointment of bankruptcy receiver in lieu of a trustee prohibited by § 105(b)). That § 105(b) prohibits the appointment of bankruptcy receivers is made clear by the legislative history of that provision. "[T]he bankruptcy judge is prohibited from appointing a receiver in a case under title 11 under any circumstances. The Bankruptcy Code has ample provision for the appointment of a trustee when needed. Appointment of a receiver would simply circumvent the established procedures." S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 29 (1978).

The appellees argue that Mr. Kipperman cannot be a receiver prohibited by § 105(b) because they consented to his appointment. But the consent of a debtor, or of all parties to a bankruptcy case for that matter, cannot vest the bankruptcy court with power expressly denied it by the Bankruptcy Code. No legally cognizable difference exists between a situation where a debtor consents to a court order vesting all of the debtor's rights as debtor in possession in a person selected by the debtor and one where the court vests all of the debtor's rights as a debtor in possession in a person over the objection of the debtor. The end result is the same. The debtor's estate is subject to the complete control of a person who is neither a true debtor in possession nor a trustee. Either process "circumvents the procedures" established by the Bankruptcy Code for the selection of independent fiduciaries. Under those procedures, the United States Trustee appoints chapter 11 trustees after consultation with parties in interest, subject to the right of creditors to elect a candidate of their choice. See 11 U.S.C. § 1104(d), (b).

That Mr. Kipperman is not just a representative of the debtor in possession is clear from the court's October 12 order, which substantially expanded his authority. While the debtors granted Mr. Kipperman broad control over their operations under his Engagement Letter, he remained subject to termination by the board of directors. I ROA at 268. The October 12 order gave Mr. Kipperman exceedingly broad control over the affairs of the debtors. It also terminated "all person who are presently directors and/or officers of any of the Debtors." I ROA at 62. This termination was effectuated by the court, not by the debtors themselves. Even more tellingly, the October 12 order vested in Mr. Kipperman all of the authority, responsibilities, rights, powers, duties and obligations set forth in 11 U.S.C. §§ 1106(a), 1107, and 1108, including but not limited to the obligation to investigate the debtors under § 1106(a)(3). This obligation cannot have derived from the debtors in possession, as § 1107(a) specifically excludes the trustee's duty to investigate from the duties vested in a debtor in possession. Because Mr. Kipperman's legal powers and obligations under the October 12 order exceed those of a debtor in possession, he cannot be a debtor in possession. As he clearly is not a trustee, the inescapable conclusion is that he is a receiver appointed in violation of § 105(b).

D. Gaslight, FSC, and the only two reported cases that followed them were incorrectly decided.

The appellees rely heavily on In re Gaslight Club, Inc., 782 F.2d 767 (7th Cir. 1986) and In re FSC Corp., 38 B.R. 346 (Bankr. W.D. Penn. 1983) to support their arguments. They claim that there is "substantial federal case law" following these cases.

It is telling that the appellees are able to marshal precisely two reported decisions following these cases in the last 21 years. See In re United Press International, Inc., 60 B.R. 265 (Bankr. D.C. 1986) and In re Communications Options, 299 B.R. 481 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2003). The other post-Gaslight cases cited by the appellees are inapposite. As was discussed above, the court in 1031 Tax Group expressly found that it did not have the authority to appoint a responsible person. Furthermore, while the Ninth Circuit bankruptcy appellate panel noted in In re Guy F. Atkinson Co. of Cal., 242 B.R. 497 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1999) that a responsible person had been appointed to manage and represent the estates, the propriety of such an appointment was not the issue before the court.[1]

[1] Similarly, the Ninth Circuit court of appeals cannot be said to have implicitly approved the appointment of responsible persons in In re Boileau, 736 F.2d 503 (9th Cir. 1984). The propriety of such an appointment was not before the court on appeal. Instead the issue was whether the responsible person had the authority to waive the debtor's attorney-client privilege.

The United States Trustee's opening brief discusses at length the fallacies in the legal rationale of Gaslight and FSC. Appellant's Brief at 14-20. The limited reported authority that follows these cases suffers from the same shortcomings. One additional point should be made. The appellees cite Gaslight for the incorrect proposition that Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9001(5) authorizes a responsible person appointment. Appellee's Brief at 23. By its very terms, this rule applies to only two situations involving debtors who are not natural persons. The first is when an action is required by the rules to be performed by the debtor. An example of such an action would be the filing of schedules and statements of affairs under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007. The second is when it is necessary to compel attendance of a debtor for examination, such as an examination under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2004. The rule does not, and indeed cannot, enable the court to designate the person to exercise the powers and perform the duties of a debtor in possession. Those powers and duties arise under the Bankruptcy Code, not under the rules. Under 28 U.S.C. § 2075, bankruptcy rules may not "abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right." The Bankruptcy Code substantively requires that the fiduciary duties of a trustee be performed by either a trustee or by the debtor in possession, and this requirement cannot be changed by rule.

The appellees struggle mightily to distinguish each of the numerous cases cited by the United States Trustee in his opening brief that held that responsible person appointments are not appropriate. Space does not permit the United States Trustee to refute each of these purported distinctions; suffice it to say that each represents an immaterial factual difference that was not germane to the court's decision.

Finally, the appellees cannot distinguish Collier on Bankruptcy, because it is a treatise, albeit the most authoritative in the bankruptcy field. As was noted in the United States Trustee's opening brief, the Collier editors reject the "responsible person" out of hand. Appellant's Brief at 22.

E. Because the facts in this case are undisputed and establish that cause exists, the United States Trustee has met the burden of proof.

One fact is salient to the determination of the legal issue presented by this appeal, and that fact is not in dispute. Since the entry by the bankruptcy court of the October 12 order, Mr. Kipperman, a person with no ownership interest in or prior relationship with the debtors, has been in complete control of the debtor's estates, vested with all of the rights, powers, and duties of a chapter 11 trustee, and only subject to supervision by the bankruptcy court. As was discussed above, this fact alone establishes cause for the appointment of a trustee, without regard to whether the burden of proof is clear and convincing or preponderance of the evidence.

The appellees nevertheless assert that the United States Trustee seeks an "extraordinary remedy" against which there is a "strong presumption" and grounds for which must be proven with "clear and convincing evidence." Appellee's brief at 8. While the United States Trustee acknowledges that cases can be found to support each of these propositions, these decisions are not well-grounded in the statutory language of the Bankruptcy Code or in its legislative history.[2] For instance, nothing in the language of § 1104 warrants the requirement that the proponent of a trustee appointment present the court with clear and convincing evidence. See In re Tradex Corp., 339 B.R. 823 (D. Mass. 2006) (relying on Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S 279 (1991) to hold that proper burden of proof for appointment of chapter 11 trustee is preponderance of the evidence). This Court need not address these issues to decide this appeal, however.

[2] For a full discussion of the development of these propositions, see Clifford J. White III & Walter W. Theus, Jr., Chapter 11 Trustees and Examiners After BAPCPA, 80 Am. Bank. L.J. 289, 314-18 (2006)

F. Even if the standard of review is "abuse of discretion," the bankruptcy court abused its discretion because it had no legal discretion to refuse to direct the appointment of a trustee in the face of clear cause.

The appellees' discussion of the standard of review is confusing. Appellees' Brief at 1-2. They appear to posit a two part test. They first cite several Ninth Circuit cases for the general proposition that an appellate court will apply an abuse of discretion standard in reviewing a lower court's decision to order the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. See, e.g., In re Lowenschuss, 171 F.3d 673 (9th Cir. 1999).[3] They then say that factual determinations are to be reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard. The appellees do not address the standard for reviewing conclusions of law.

The United States Trustee stands by his position that the bankruptcy court's determinations of fact should be reviewed for clear error and its conclusions of law should be reviewed de novo. In point of fact, these two standards, when combined, comprise the "abuse of discretion" standard advanced by the appellees. A trial court abuses its discretion if it basis its ruling on an erroneous view of the law or on a clearly erroneous assessment of facts. See

---

[3] It should be noted that In re San Joaquin Roast Beef, 7 F.3d 1413 (9th Cir. 1993), cited by the appellees, had nothing whatsoever to do with whether grounds existed for the appointment of a trustee under § 1104(a). In that case the trustee himself, having failed to bring a cause of action within the statute of limitations period, sought an order vacating the order approving his appointment and the reentry of an order on a later date so that he could bring the action. The circuit court held that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to engage in this sleight of hand with the trustee. Id. at 1418. The appellees' citation to this decision is misleading at best.

Coughlin v. Tailhook Ass'n, 112 F.3d 1052, 1055 (9th Cir. 1997); U.S. v. Plainbull, 957 F.2d 724, 725 (9th Cir. 1992).

The proper application of the abuse of discretion standard does not grant a court discretion to enter relief contrary to statutory mandates. See Cann v. Carpenters' Pension Trust Fund for Northern California, 989 F.2d 313, 318 (9th Cir. 1993) (district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to apply a multiplier to damages, as it had no statutory discretion to do so); Mississippi Power & Light Co. v. United Gas Pipe Line Co., 760 F.2d 618, 629 (5th Cir. 1985) (although the grant of a preliminary injunction is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard, the court has no discretion to grant such relief absent an adequate showing of likely irreparable harm).

Once a court determines that cause exists for the appointment of a trustee under § 1104(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code, the court has no discretion; a trustee must be appointed. See In re V. Savino Oil & Heating Co., Inc., 99 B.R. 518, 525 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1989); In re Oklahoma Refining Company, 838 F.2d 1133, 1136 (10th Cir. 1988). The bankruptcy court's failure to direct the appointment of a trustee in the face of the cause resulting from the debtors' absence of management is therefore reversible error, without regard to whether it is treated as an error of law or an abuse of discretion.

G. The U.S. Trustee is not "judicially estopped" from contesting the validity of responsible person appointments.

At pages 20-21 of their brief, the appellees assert that the United States Trustee is judicially estopped from opposing the appointment of a responsible person because the United States Trustee has previously either consented to or failed to object to responsible person appointments. Leaving aside for the moment whether this is an appropriate case for judicial estoppel, it should be noted that the United States Trustee for the Central District of California has very recently opposed the appointment of a responsible person. In May of 2006, in a case styled In re National Consumer Mortgage (SA 06-10429-TA) the United States Trustee successfully moved for the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee while opposing the appointment of a responsible person. That case factually paralleled these cases, as it arose in the wake of an SEC investigation of investment fraud by one of the debtor's insiders, Sam Favata. II ROA at 825, 839, and 862. Even more recently, in June of 2007, in the case of In re Branford Partners, LLC (SV 06-12551-KT) the United States Trustee opposed the appointment of a responsible person. II ROA at 874-81.

"Judicial estoppel" is an equitable doctrine that precludes a party from gaining an advantage by asserting one position in litigation, and then later seeking an advantage by taking a clearly inconsistent position. Hamilton v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 270 F.3d 778, 782 (9th Cir. 2001). As a matter of law, judicial estoppel only applies when a party takes a position, generally on a factual issue, in a case for its benefit and then takes a contrary position in the same case or in a related case with the same party when it suits its needs. New Hampshire v. Maine, 532 U.S. 742, 749 (2001). Contrary to the appellee's assertion, the Ninth Circuit has never held that a party, having taken a position on a legal issue in one case, is judicially estopped from taking a contrary position in all future cases, whether related or not. The appellees have cited no case holding that a party, having merely acquiesced in a legal position taken by parties in a case, was later estopped from taking a contrary legal position in a different case involving different parties. The court of appeals has held that judicial estoppel will not prevent a government agency from changing its interpretation of a statute; "public policy considerations allow the government to change its position in ways that might be inappropriate if merely a matter of private interest." New Edge Network, Inc. v. F.C.C. , 461 F.3d 1105, 1114 (9th Cir. 2006). Yet this is the result that the appellees ask this court to reach. If the appellees' argument were to be accepted, the U.S. Department of Justice, merely by consenting to or not objecting to relief sought in one or more bankruptcy cases, would be deemed to have foresworn for all time its right to argue that the relief is not appropriate under the Bankruptcy Code. This Court should reject the appellees' argument in favor of an unwarranted and radical expansion of the equitable doctrine of judicial estoppel that would threaten the ability of the Department of Justice and other federal agencies to continually refine their views of the statutes they deal with on a daily basis.

III.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee asks this Court to reverse the bankruptcy court's orders and remand with instructions that the bankruptcy court enter an order directing the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b), and 1334(a) to issue its final order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Reeds' chapter 7 bankruptcy case[1]. That order was entered on the docket on May 29, 2007, from which the Reeds filed a timely notice of appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

Did the bankruptcy court err in dismissing the Reeds' bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)?

STATEMENT OF APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court "reviews a bankruptcy court order dismissing a chapter 7 case for abuse of discretion; legal conclusions are reviewed de novo, and factual findings are reviewed for clear error." In re Hebbring 463 F.3d 902, 905 (9th Cir. 2006).

---

[1] The United States Trustee prosecuted the motion to dismiss under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 581, et seq. the United States Attorney General has appointed United States Trustees in 21 geographic regions throughout the United States. United States Trustees are senior officials of the Department of Justice who "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within his or her region through the exercise of a range of oversight responsibilities. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3). See generally In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002) (explaining that the United States Trustee is the "watchdog" of the bankruptcy system). United States Trustees may raise, appear, and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under title 11. 11 U.S.C. § 307; See also In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) (upholding broad appellate standing of United States Trustees).

Whether the bankruptcy court properly interpreted the Bankruptcy Code provisions is an issue of law subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On November 30, 2006, Peter and Andrea Reed filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. (Excerpt of Record ("ER") at 1). On February 15, 2007, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the Reeds' case, asserting that their chapter 7 case was abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). (ER at 77).

The United States Trustee sought dismissal under two different theories. First, that a statutory presumption of abuse arose in the Reeds' case which mandated its dismissal as a matter of law under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). In the alternative, the United States Trustee asserted that the Reeds' case should be dismissed because the totality of their financial circumstances demonstrated that their use of chapter 7 was abusive, as prescribed by 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) .

On May 29, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered an order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss on both grounds. (ER at 247). This appeal followed. (ER at 273 - 279).

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

A. Statutory Framework

1. Overview of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)

On October 17, 2005, most provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (the "2005 Reform Act"), S. 256, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, took effect implementing significant changes to the Bankruptcy Code. In it, Congress made sweeping changes "to improve bankruptcy law and practice by restoring personal responsibility and integrity in the bankruptcy system and ensure that the system is fair to both debtors and creditors." H.R. Rep. No. 31(I), at 2, 109 Cong., 1st Sess. (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 97.

As part of this effort, Congress made significant changes to section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, which polices the system for abuse, to ensure "that those who can afford to repay some portion of their unsecured debts be required to do so . . . ." 151 Cong. Rec. S2470 (March 10, 2005). First, Congress lowered the legal standard for dismissal from "substantial abuse" to mere "abuse." Likewise, Congress eliminated a statutory presumption that debtors were entitled to relief, and replaced it with a statutory presumption of abuse mandating dismissal or, with the debtor's consent, conversion to a chapter 13 debt repayment case. This presumption is identified and arises via a "means test," which contains specific objective criteria for the calculation of debtors' "disposable income" in an effort to identify those debtors who have the ability to repay. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A).

The means test calculates a debtor's current monthly income, as defined under 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A) (hereafter "CMI"), based on the debtor's average income for the six calendar months preceding the month of the bankruptcy filing.

Under the first part of the means test, if the debtor's CMI is below the applicable state median family income, no presumption arises and the case is reviewed for "abuse" under a totality of circumstances analysis. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A) and (b)(3).

When, as is the case here, a debtor's CMI is above the applicable state median family income, their monthly disposable income must be calculated to determine their ability to repay creditors. This is completed by reducing the debtor's CMI by certain categories of expenses identified in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv). If the debtor's monthly disposable income is equal to or exceeds $167 per month (or $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse arises.[2] Id. If the presumption of abuse arises under section 707(b)(2) based on the means test, the debtor may attempt to rebut it by demonstrating special circumstances that justify income or expense adjustments for which there is no reasonable alternative. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B)

Each debtor with primarily consumer debts is required to file, in conjunction with his or her bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs, Official Form 22A, titled "Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation" (the "Means Test Form"). 11 U.S.C. § 521 and § 707(b)(2)(C). In

[2] Under 11 U.S.C. § 104, the dollar amounts set forth in title 11 and applicable to the threshold amounts for determining when the presumption of abuse arises under the means test were adjusted based on the consumer price index for cases filed on or after April 1, 2007. This case was filed in November 2006, chapter 7 cases the main purpose of the Means Test Form is to calculate monthly disposable income (ability to pay) following the formula set forth under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), and determine whether the presumption of abuse arises.

2. Under the 2005 Reform Act, United States Trustees first file initial statements regarding the presumption of abuse and thereafter file motions to dismiss for abuse.

Under the 2005 Reform Act, United States Trustees analyze the Means Test Form and other materials filed by debtors to enforce section 707(b)(2). Section 704(b)(1)(A) specifies that United States Trustees review all materials filed by the debtor and then file a statement with the bankruptcy court as to whether the debtor's case should be presumed to be an abuse (the "10-Day Statement"). The 10-Day Statement is filed "not later than 10 days after the date of the first meeting of creditors," which is convened between 20 and 40 days after the case is commenced. 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1)(A) (emphasis added); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(a). If the presumption arises, as it did here, section 704(b)(2) requires the United States Trustee to file either a motion to dismiss or a statement indicating why the United States Trustee does not believe that a motion to dismiss is appropriate "not later than 30 days after the date of filing" the 10-Day Statement.

3. The "first" meeting of creditors.

The "meeting of creditors," which is the event that establishes the filing dates set forth in section, is defined and mandated by section 341 of the

and is therefore not subject to the dollar amount adjustments.

Bankruptcy Code. However, the Code does not define the specific phrase "first meeting of creditors," which is the precise language used by section 704. Historically, the Bankruptcy Act that preceded the modern Bankruptcy Code, Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, c. 541, ss 301-99, 30 Stat. 544 (formerly codified at 11 U.S.C. ss 701-99), repealed, Act of Nov. 6, 1978, Pub.L.No. 95-598, s 401(a), 92 Stat. 2549 (hereinafter "Bankruptcy Act") provided for a "first" meeting of creditors early in the progress of each bankruptcy case. Bankruptcy Act § 55(a). That proviso also contained authority for optional interim meetings after the "first meeting," and for a "final" meeting in some cases. Bankruptcy Act §§ 55(d) and (e).

The "first meeting" under the Bankruptcy Act was designed as an occasion for creditors to meet, establish their claims, and elect a trustee to administer a debtor's bankruptcy estate. 3 Collier on Bankruptcy (14th ed. 1977) ¶ 55.01; In re Vance, 120 B.R. 181, 184 (Bankr. D. Okla. 1990). By contrast, under modern bankruptcy practice, creditors make claims by filing proofs with the clerk and litigating any disputes with the debtors. 11 U.S.C. §§ 501-502; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 3001-3008. Although trustees may still be elected, chapter 7 trustees are now generally appointed by the United States Trustee or the court. 11 U.S.C. §§ 701, 702(d), 703(c).

Therefore, the "first" meeting of creditors has lost the legal significance it once had under the old Bankruptcy Act. Vance, 120 B.R. at 184. Nevertheless, the initial meeting of creditors under section 341 of the Bankruptcy Code still often is loosely referred to as the "first meeting of creditors" as a vestige of pre-Code practice under the Bankruptcy Act, and still provides an opportunity for parties in interest (the trustee, creditors, and any others) to meet and question the debtor regarding his or her financial affairs. It is still required by statute that the meeting be held, 11 U.S.C. § 341(a)[3], and that the debtor "submit to interrogation under oath." 11 U.S.C. § 343.

In addition to the mandatory initial – or first – meeting, the Bankruptcy Code and the Bankruptcy Rules also allow "final" meetings and "special meetings" under section 341. 11 U.S.C. § 341(a) (meeting of creditors); 341(b) (meeting of equity security holders); 341(c) (referencing "any" final meeting of creditors). Cf. In re Duplante, 204 B.R. 49 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1996) rev'd, 215 B.R. 444 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1997) (creditor did not attend the section 341 "final" meeting of creditors).

Adjournment or continuation of an initial meeting of creditors required under section 341 of the Code is governed by Bankruptcy Rule 2003(e). It provides that the meeting may "be adjourned from time to time." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(e).

4. Dismissal for abuse under section 707(b)(3) when the presumption does not arise or the debtor rebuts the presumption.

If no presumption of abuse arises under section 707(b)(2) or if the

[3] See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(a)(requiring the United States Trustee to "call" the presumption is rebutted under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B), the court must then consider whether the case should be dismissed as an "abuse" of chapter 7. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). In particular, the court "shall consider" whether the case was filed in "bad faith," 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or whether "the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation . . . demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B).

Thus, sections 707(b)(2) and (b)(3) provide distinct and separate bases upon which the court may determine that a chapter 7 case is abusive; first, by application of an un-rebutted statutory presumption of abuse arising from the means test, then by a finding of abuse based upon bad faith or from the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation.

B. Factual Background

1. Mr. and Mrs. Reed's Bankruptcy Filing

On November 30, 2006, the Reeds jointly filed for bankruptcy protection under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. (ER at 1). The Reeds had $36,676.42 in unsecured debt. (ER at 21). They enjoyed stable income because Mr. Reed is employed as a supervisor at Aerospace Dynamics. (ER at 24).

Although Mrs. Reed was unemployed as of the date of the bankruptcy filing (ER at 24), she had operated a hair salon from December 2004 until it closed in August 2006. Mrs. Reed reported receiving no income from the business or meeting within 20 to 40 days after the commencement of the case).

otherwise in the six months before the bankruptcy filing (ER at 30, 37, 63, 67).

The Reeds' Means Test Form reflected average gross monthly income for the six months prior to filing of $5,947.57 ($71,370.84 annually). (ER at 37 - 38). Using this amount, the Reeds calculated they had no monthly disposable income available to repay their creditors. (ER at 41). In their schedules of current income (Schedule I) and expenses (Schedule J) filed with the bankruptcy court, the Reeds admitted, however, that Mr. Reed's gross monthly income was actually $7,645, and that they enjoyed $186.46 in monthly disposable income, available to repay creditors. (ER at 24 - 25).

2. The Meeting of Creditors Begins on January 8, 2007

The Bankruptcy Clerk noticed the Reeds' section 341 meeting of creditors for January 8, 2007. (ER at 47). However, because the gross income reported on the Reeds' Means Test Form was almost $1,700 lower than that reported on their Schedule I, the United States Trustee contacted the Reeds' attorney, Janet Lawson, prior to the January 8 meeting and asked her to explain and correct the discrepancy. (ER at 324, Line 21 - ER 326, Line 5). Notwithstanding this request, the Reeds failed to address the income discrepancy prior to or during the January 8 meeting of creditors. (ER at 322 - 328). Instead, the Reeds' attorney agreed to make appropriate corrections (ER at 325, Lines 3-4) to Schedule I and Means Test Form regarding their income, and the chapter 7 trustee appropriately sought to continue the meeting to January 29, 2007. (ER at 326, Line 20 - ER 327, Line 8). The Reeds' attorney rejected this date and asked that the meeting be continued until the next available date, which was February 20, 2007. Id.

3. The United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss

On January 17, 2007, ten days after the January 8 meeting, the United States Trustee filed a 10-Day Statement under section 704(b)(1) stating he could not determine whether the presumption of abuse arose in the Reeds' bankruptcy case.[4] (ER at 77). On January 25, 2007, the United States Trustee sent a letter to Ms. Lawson, again requesting evidence to verify the Reeds' income included on their Means Test Form. (ER at 146).

On February 15, 2007, after further evaluating materials the Reeds filed with the bankruptcy court, the United States Trustee filed a supplemental statement stating that the presumption of abuse arose.[5] (ER at 80 - 82). The next day, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the Reeds' bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(2) and (b)(3). (ER at 83 - 165). The United States Trustee

[4] The 10-Day Statement provides: Having reviewed the documents, if any, filed by the Debtor and any additional documents provided to the United States Trustee, the United States Trustee is currently unable to determine whether the Debtor's case would be presumed to be an abuse under Section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code." (ER at 77).

[5] The supplemental statement provides, in relevant part: ". . .the United States Trustee originally declared that a determination could not be made as to whether the Debtors' case is presumed abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). The United States Trustee filed a 'statement of inability to determine presumed abuse' on January 17, 2007. Based on the information the Debtors have provided to date, the United States Trustee has determined that a presumption of abuse arises in the calculated that the Reeds had $576.51 in monthly disposable income, which exceeded the $167 threshold necessary to trigger the statutory presumption of abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). Id. Alternatively, the United States Trustee asserted that the Reeds' use of chapter 7 was abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) because their schedules listed monthly disposable income that was available to repay creditors. (ER at 92).

4. The Meeting of Creditors continues; Reeds file two more Means Test Forms

The continuation of the 341 meeting occurred on February 20, 2007. At it the chapter 7 trustee noted the Reeds had filed a second Means Test Form that morning, and that neither he nor the United States Trustee had an opportunity to review it. (ER at 330). The second Means Test Form purported to increase the Reeds' CMI, decrease their tax withholding expense, and increase their health care expenses from $318 to $611.54. (Compare ER at 37 - 41 with ER at 167 - 171). In light of the different data just submitted by the Reeds, the chapter 7 trustee felt "obligat[ed]" to adjourn the meeting until March 12. (ER at 330, Lines 11-14). The Reeds did not appear at their March 12 meeting, so the chapter 7 trustee continued their meeting again until April 2 to allow them an opportunity to appear and explain their newest Means Test Form. (ER at 331 - 332]. The Reeds attorney appeared at the adjourned meeting on April 2, but the Reeds did not, so the chapter present case.

7 trustee continued the meeting again until May 14, 2007. (ER at 333).

On April 17, 2007, the Reeds filed a third Means Test Form containing a third set of gross income and income tax figures, adjusting health care and health insurance expenses, and adding a new monthly child care expense in the amount of $333.66. (ER at 219 - 223). Given these changes, the United States Trustee filed a motion to continue the hearing on his motion to dismiss, which was scheduled for April 25, 2007, so that he could examine the Reeds under oath at the May 14 creditors meeting, and obtain documentation to support the Reeds' third set of income and expense calculations. The bankruptcy court granted the United States Trustee's request, and continued the hearing on the motion to dismiss until May 16, 2007. See Bankruptcy Case Docket Entry No. 24.

On May 14, 2007, the United States Trustee examined the Reeds under oath at their section 341 meeting of creditors. (ER at 335 - 345). He asked Mrs. Reed to document the child care expenses contained in the Reeds' third Means Test Form. (ER at 337, Lines 6 - 24). The Reeds could not present any evidence that they actually incurred child care at the meeting, but promised to do so later. (ER at 294, Line 21 - ER 295, Line 2). Two days later, on May 16, 2007, at the hearing on the motion to dismiss, the Reeds gave the United States Trustee a statement reflecting the Reeds incurred day care expenses through September 6, 2006, which was approximately two months before the bankruptcy filing. Id. They provided no evidence that the expense was continuing now that Mrs. Reed had stopped working. Id.

5. Hearing on the Motion to Dismiss

The bankruptcy court heard the motion to dismiss on May 16, 2007. (ER at 284 - 306). At the hearing, the court rejected the Reeds' argument that the United States Trustee's initial 10-Day Statement did not satisfy the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1). For that reason, the court rejected the Reeds' argument that the motion to dismiss under § 707(b)(2) was time-barred. (ER at 297, Line 15 - ER 299, Line 6).

Turning to the merits of the section 707(b)(2) portion of the dismissal motion, the bankruptcy court ruled that the childcare expenses claimed by the Reeds for $333.66 were neither reasonable nor necessary because Mrs. Reed was unemployed and the Reeds' only child attended school. (ER at 300 Lines 4 - 13; ER at 305, Lines 10 - 16). The court concluded this meant the Reeds had between $500 and $770 in monthly disposable income to pay creditors, so a presumption of abuse arose under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). (ER at 304, Line 14 - ER 305, Line 3). Alternatively, the bankruptcy court found that even if the presumption of abuse did not arise under section 707(b)(2), the case should be dismissed under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) based on the totality of the circumstances of the Reeds' financial situation. (ER at 294, Lines 6 - 17; ER 300 Lines 2 - 22; ER at 304, Line 14 to ER 305, Line 3). In support of this finding, the bankruptcy court cited to the Reeds' admission in their schedules that they enjoyed at least $186 in disposable income to pay creditors. The court reiterated the Reeds' childcare expenses were not reasonable or necessary, and accordingly under the totality of the circumstances, the Reeds' financial situation demonstrated that that their chapter 7 case was abusive. Id.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court properly dismissed the Reeds' chapter 7 case under two alternative theories, first as presumptively abusive under section 707(b)(2), and second because the totality of the circumstances of the Reeds' financial situation under section 707(b)(3)(B) demonstrated abuse. The first ground, section 707(b)(2), raises pure legal issues, including interpretation of the United States Trustee's duties to file required statements under section 704(b), and is reviewed under a de novo standard. The second ground, section 707(b)(3)(B), is reviewed under the more deferential abuse of discretion standard. Because this Court may affirm on either theory, it may be simplest to affirm the bankruptcy court's abuse of discretion, totality of the circumstances, ruling under section 707(b)(3)(B).

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Dismissing the Reeds' Case Under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B).

A. The bankruptcy court did not err in finding that Reeds' financial situation demonstrated abuse under a totality of the circumstances analysis provided for in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). Under section 707(b)(3), the court must consider whether "the totality of the circumstances . . .of the debtor's financial situation . . . demonstrates abuse" Id.

The plain language of section 707(b)(3) requires the bankruptcy court to consider a debtor's ability to pay his or her debts in determining whether the case is an abuse of the provisions of chapter 7. See Duncan v. Walker, 533 U.S. 167, 172 (2001)(plain language).

Given section 707(b)(3)'s command that courts look at all financial circumstances, the Reeds are wrong in arguing "financial circumstances" cannot be considered when debtors pass section 707(b)(2)'s means test. See Reeds' Open. Br. at 11 – 25. First, their argument conflicts with the statute's text. Section 707(b)(3), by its express terms, applies to all debtors subject to section 707(b). Nowhere does it exclude debtors who pass section 707(b)(2)'s means test.

Not surprisingly, then, bankruptcy courts have rejected the Reeds' argument in other cases. See In re Mestemaker, 359 B.R. 849, 853-56 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007); In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651, 663 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006) ("The broad language 'totality of the circumstances' and 'financial situation' clearly encompasses a debtor's ability to pay."); In re Mundy, 363 B.R. 407, 414 (Bankr. M.D. Pa. 2007) (decreased expenses due to surrender of collateral securing a debt allowed by the court under the means test "may be a factor . . .under the totality of the circumstances test under § 707(b)(3). . . ."). This is how the court below applied the means test here, so its section 707(b)(3) ruling merits affirmance.

Considering the Reeds' ability to pay under section 707(b)(3) is consistent with the 2005 Reform Act's legislative history. In adopting section 707(b)(3), Congress codified judicial decisions interpreting the old version of section 707(b) as giving courts discretion to dismiss cases when debtors' financial circumstances demonstrated they could make some payments to creditors. See, e.g., In re Lamanna, 153 F.3d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 1998)(totality of the circumstances test "demands a comprehensive review of the debtor's current and potential financial situation"). Cf. 146 Cong. Rec. S11683-11729 (explaining the proposed Reform Act would codify cases like Lamanna that give courts "additional discretion" to dismiss based on debtors' financial circumstances), Dec. 7, 2000.

Finally, this construction of section 707(b)(3) is consistent with the Ninth Circuit's construction of pre-Reform Act law. In those cases, the Ninth Circuit held that, in considering motions to dismiss under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), a debtor's ability to pay was the primary factor in evaluating the totality of the circumstances, and that such ability to pay alone warranted dismissal. See In re Kelly, 841 F.2d 908, 941 (9th Cir. 1988)("debtor's ability to pay his debts will, standing alone, justify a section 707(b) dismissal"); In re Price, 353 F.3d 1135, 1138-40 (9th Cir. 2004)(principal factor in determining "substantial abuse" is debtor's ability to pay his or her debts).

B. Given this, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in holding that the Reeds' demonstrated ability to pay a meaningful portion of their debt constituted abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3); see also Kelly, 841 F.2d at 941; Price, 353 F.3d at 1138-40. Nor did the court commit clear error in finding the Reeds' child care expenses were not reasonably necessary for the Reeds' support. (ER at 294, lines 6 – 17). Mrs. Reed was unemployed and had not worked since before the Reeds' bankruptcy filing. Their son was six and attending school. Id. Given that, this finding was not clearly erroneous. In re Hebbring, 463 F.3d 902, 905 (9th Cir. 2006)(court reviews "for clear error a bankruptcy court's fact-intensive determination that an expense or property interest is not reasonably necessary for a debtor's support").

Nor did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion in concluding that the Reeds have the ability to pay a substantial portion of their unsecured debts. Hebbring, 463 F.3d at 905, 908-09 (upholding the bankruptcy court's dismissal where the debtor had the ability to pay creditors a portion of their debts).

Even without removing the Reeds' claimed child care expenses, the Reeds admitted on their bankruptcy schedules that they have $186.46 in monthly disposable income, which is more than the debtor had in Hebbring. Removing the day care expense further increases their monthly disposable income to $520.12, or $31,207.20 over 60 months. This would be sufficient to repay approximately 85% of the Reeds' $36,676.42 in scheduled unsecured debt.

II. The bankruptcy court correctly held that the Reeds' bankruptcy case was presumptively abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (2).

Alternatively, the bankruptcy court's ruling under section 707(b)(2) should be affirmed because the bankruptcy court correctly concluded an unrebutted presumption of abuse in the arose in the Reeds' bankruptcy case. As discussed below, none of the Reeds' procedural or substantive challenges to the bankruptcy court's ruling warrants reversal.

A. The bankruptcy court correctly ruled that the United States Trustee's initial 10-Day Statement is a valid "statement as to whether" the Reeds' bankruptcy case would be presumed to be an abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b).

1. Section 704(b)(1)(A) requires the United States Trustee to file "a statement as to whether the debtor's case would be presumed to be an abuse under section 707(b)." (emphasis added). The Reeds assert that the statutory requirement is not satisfied when the United States Trustee's statement explains the United States Trustee cannot determine whether the presumption of abuse arises because the debtor has failed to adequately explain the debtor's financial circumstances. Open. Br. at 9-10. The Reeds' argument fails for at least two separate and independent reasons.

2. First, that is not what the statute requires. Instead, the 10-Day Statement filed by the United States Trustee is merely a "statement as to whether" the Reeds' case "would be presumed to be an abuse under section 707(b)," as required by the statute. 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1)(A)(emphasis added).

Congress' use of the words "as to whether" and "statement" make clear that all the statement must say is whether the United States Trustee can determine at the time if the presumption of abuse arises. The dictionary defines the phrase "as to" to mean "about," e.g., "Melissa was at a loss as to how to explain the error." Merriam Webster Online Dictionary, available at www.m-w.com. Courts also "generally avoid restricting 'whether' to a binary choice. Thus, words or phrases following 'whether' in a statute will generally not limit the statute's meaning." In re Cadwallder, 2007 WL 1864154 at *15 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. June 28, 2007) citing Galbreath v. Gulf Oil Corp., 294 F.Supp. 817, 824 (D. Ga. 1968) (stating that "[t]he cases hold without exception that words following 'whether' do not restrict the meaning to any following terms; rather they enlarge upon it"), aff'd, 413 F.2d 941 (5th Cir. 1969); see also State ex rel. Berra v. Sestrict, 349 Mo. 182, 159 S.W.2d 786, 789 (1942) (stating that "the word whether, neither in common parlance, nor in legal phraseology, has ever had the force of a videlicet.").

Further, Congress could have, but did not dictate the language of the "statement" required. Had Congress intended section § 704(b)(1)(A) to require the United States Trustee to make an unequivocal, final determination that the presumption either does or does not arise, it could easily have done so. See BFP v. Resolution Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531, 537 (1993) (courts presume that Congress acts intentionally and purposely when it omits particular language from a statute). Accordingly, the bankruptcy court correctly ruled that the United States Trustee's 10-Day Statement satisfied the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1)(A).

3. Alternatively, the United States Trustee's second, February 15, 2007, statement also was timely, and it independently satisfied section 704(b)(1)(A). Section 704(b)(1)(A) requires the United States Trustee to file a statement "not later than 10 days after the date of the first meeting of creditors. . ." 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1)(A) (emphasis added). The first meeting is a single event that may be adjourned from time to time, as it was in this case, and the United States Trustee was not required to file his 10-Day Statement until "after" that meeting, i.e., after the meeting "concluded." By timely filing his supplemental 10-Day Statement – that expressly found abuse - before the conclusion of the adjourned meeting, the United States Trustee cured any possible defect in his original 10-Day Statement.

The text of section 341 supports this reading because it provides for a single "meeting of creditors" that may be continued, and the United States Trustee filed a definitive statement before that meeting ended. 11 U.S.C. §§ 341(a) and 341(d); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(e) - (g). Thus, a single "meeting of creditors," also called the "first meeting of creditors," may take place on more than a single date. Cf. In re Barnard, 40 F. 3d 1028, 1031 (9th Cir. 1994) (noting that Bankruptcy Rule 2003(e) contemplates that the "first meeting" under section 341 "can't always be completed in one session [and] thus authorizes the trustee to adjourn the meeting to enable the debtor to give additional testimony or to enable creditors to conduct additional examination.") Id.[6]

The Bankruptcy Code and Rules also support this reading because they make clear the term "first" in section 341 is used to distinguish it from the discretionary "special" or "final" meetings that they also allow. See 11 U.S.C. § 341(c) (discussing "any final meeting"); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(f) and (g) (special meetings).

Section 704's legislative history also supports the conclusion that the 10-Day Statement can be filed any time within 10 days of the end of the 341 meeting because it says that the statement is filed "following" the meeting. Specifically, it states that the United States Trustee must file the 10-Day Statement "within ten days following the meeting of creditors held pursuant to section 341 of the Bankruptcy Code. . . ." House Report No. 31, Pt. 1, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. 52 (2005). The reference to the section 341 meeting of creditors being "held" indicates that the meeting has been concluded. Cf. In re Stewart, 2006 WL 4043319, *4 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2006) (deadline in statute that ran from the date that the section 341 meeting is "held" meant the conclusion of the meeting, not the first day on which the meeting was commenced), and In re Shelton, 343 B.R. 545

[6] Many courts have similarly acknowledged that the first meeting may not be completed on the date first set. See In re Spenler, 212 B.R. 625, 627 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1997); In re Burrell, 289 B.R. 109, 110 (Bankr. C.D. Ill. 2002); In re Lake States Commodities, Inc., 173 B.R. 642, 644 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1994); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 497 F.Supp. 979, 980 (E.D. Pa. 1980); In re Young, 1 B.R. 387, 389 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1979).

(Bankr. W.D. Va. 2006)(same). See also 6 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶704.17[1], p. 704-36 to 704-37 (rev. 15th ed. 2006)(stating that the "first meeting of creditors" refers to section 341(a) meeting of creditors and that reading the deadline as running from the conclusion of the meeting of creditors makes the most logical sense.)

Finally, the United States Trustee's interpretation finds further support in the Bankruptcy Code's Rules of Construction, which provide that "[i]n this title – . . . the singular includes the plural." 11 U.S.C. § 102(7). Viewed through the lens of section 102(7), section 704(b)(1)(A) should be read as providing "the United States Trustee . . .shall. . ., not later than 10 days after the date or dates of the first meeting of creditors, file with the court a statement as to whether the debtor's case would be presumed to be an abuse under section 707(b)." Since the language allows the "first meeting of creditors" to occur over multiple dates, the only correct reading of section 704(b)(1) is that the 10-Day Statement deadline is ten days after the last of these dates.[7]

[7] The legislative history to section 102(7) supports this reading, by noting that "[t]he bill uses only the singular, even when the item in question most often is found in plural quantities. . ." House Report No. 95-595, 95th Cong. 1st Sess. (1977) 316; Senate Report No. 95-989, 95th Cong., 2nd Sess. (1978). Further, courts routinely apply section 102(7) to read singular terms in the Code as including the plural, even though the plural is not specifically enumerated. See, e.g., Universal Church v. Geltzer, 463 F.3d 218, 223 (2d Cir. 2006) (construing the term "transfer" in 11 U.S.C. § 548(a)(2) to include multiple "transfers" and noting that section 102(7) is a "significant provision of the Bankruptcy Code."); see also In re Hailes, 77 F.3d 873, 875 (5th Cir. 1996)("transfer" in section 547(c)(8)

Here, there is no dispute that the meeting of creditors was suspended on January 8, 2007, February 20, 2007, April 2, 2007, and May 14, 2007, and was never concluded. (ER at 322 – 345). The United States Trustee filed his initial 10-Day Statement on January 17, 2007, and his supplemental 10-Day Statement on February 15, 2007, before the conclusion of the meeting of creditors. (ER at 77, 80 – 82). Therefore, the United States Trustee timely filed his motion to dismiss because his second, unequivocal statement, was filed within the time specified by section 704.

B. The Reeds have waived any challenge to the bankruptcy court's substantive ruling that the presumption of abuse arose under section 707(b)(2) because they failed to present argument on any issues other than the court's ruling on child care expenses in their opening brief.

The bankruptcy court specifically found that after disallowing child care expenses claimed by the Reeds, the Reeds had sufficient monthly disposable income to trigger 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)'s presumption of abuse. The Reeds have not challenged the bankruptcy court's calculation of "current monthly income" or expenses other than child care expenses under the means test. The Reeds' failure to present any argument challenging the bankruptcy court's finding regarding these issues in their opening brief waives any such arguments. See Arpin v. Santa Clara Valley Transp. Agency, 261 F3d 912, 919 (9th Cir. 2001) (stating that "issues which are not specifically and distinctly argued and raised in a party's opening brief are means "more than one transfer").

waived") (citation omitted).

C. The bankruptcy court correctly determined that the Reeds' claimed child care expenses were not allowed expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii).

Under the means test, debtors may deduct their "actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service . . ." except to the extent the IRS's categories of "Other Necessary Expenses" permit repayment of debts. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

The Reeds contended below that their child care expenses were allowed as "Other Necessary Expenses." (ER at 221, Line 30). But section 5.15.1.10 of the IRS's Internal Revenue Manual[8] allows only "reasonable and necessary" expenses for child care, and considers the age of the child and whether both parents work in assessing whether an expense meets that standard. The Reeds bore the burden of proving this. In re Lara, 347 B.R. 198, 203 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2006). See also In re Crittendon, 2006 WL 2547102 at *4 n.4 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. Sept. 1, 2006) ("The enumerated 'other necessary expenses' must be 'necessary' in order to be deductible ...."); In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 905 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006) (debtor's claim for Other Necessary Expenses must "must itemize, document and provide a detailed" showing that such expenses are reasonable and necessary.).

[8] Available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html#d0e187963.

Here, they did not meet that burden and the bankruptcy court specifically found that the Reeds' claimed child care expenses were not necessary or reasonable because Mrs. Reed was unemployed, their son was six years old and Mrs. Reed had "a half day to herself every day at least even if [her son was] in kindergarten. . ." (ER at 294, Line 6 to ER 295, Line 14; ER at 300, Lines 2 - 13). In addition, the Reeds neither presented any evidence that they actually continue to incur child care expenses.

III. The bankruptcy court did not commit any procedural errors in dismissing the Reeds' case.

In their opening brief, the Reeds raise procedural matters that they claim require reversal. The Reeds' claims are without merit.

The Reeds claim the bankruptcy court should have granted their oral request for a continuance at the hearing on the motion to dismiss because (1) an "accurate" Means Test Form "was not on file" and (2) the Reeds needed additional time to address "new issues" purportedly raised by the United States Trustee as to child care expenses claimed by the Reeds in their Third Means Test Form filed on April 17, 2007. (Open. Br. at 26 - 27). Because the Reeds have not demonstrated diligent preparation for the hearing, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying their request. United States v. Flynt, 756 F.2d 1352, 1358-59 (9th Cir. 1985)(setting forth factors for reviewing denials of motion for continuance). In addition, the Reeds failed to prove that they were prejudiced by the bankruptcy court's denial of their motion. Id. at 1359 ("[A]ppellant must show at a minimum that he has suffered prejudice as a result of the denial of his request") 756 F.2d at 1359.

Finally, the Reeds' contend that they were denied due process or a proper hearing because they did not receive proper notice of "new issues." (Open. Br. at 2, 27). Their complaints as to notice lack merit. A case may be dismissed under section 707(b) only "[a]fter notice and a hearing." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). Section 102(1) of the Bankruptcy Code explains that "notice and a hearing" means whatever notice and hearing "as is appropriate in the particular circumstances." Such circumstances do not require a full-blown evidentiary hearing. In re Zick, 931 F.2d 1124, 1128-29 (6th Cir. 1991). In this case, the Reeds were given a full and fair "opportunity to present pleadings or an affidavit in opposition and to respond to the court through his counsel." Id. at 1129.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered below.

IN THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE THIRD CIRCUIT

IN RE RENAISSANCE CORPORATION,	)
RENAISSANCE BROADCASTING CORP.,	)
Appellant-Debtor,	)
UNITED STATES TRUSTEE,	)	No. 06-2342
Appellee.	)

MOTION FOR SUMMARY AFFIRMANCE UNDER THIS COURT'S RULE 27-4 AND INTERNAL OPERATING PROCEDURE 10.6

Pursuant to this Court's Rule 27-4, and Internal Operating Procedure 10.6, the appellee, the United States Trustee,[1](“US Trustee”) respectfully moves for an order summarily affirming the district court's order of April 3, 2006. There is no substantial question presented in this appeal. Summary action will avoid the needless expenditure of this Court's and appellee's resources, and avoid unnecessary briefing in the above-referenced appeal.

This case marks yet another attempt by the debtor (“Renaissance”) in its 23-year odyssey to undo the appointment of a bankruptcy trustee in a bankruptcy case that has been closed for over 19 years. To that end, the debtor has filed several lawsuits.

[1] The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice, charged by statute with the duty to oversee and supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. See 28 U.S.C. 586(a).

The present appeal arises from a series of confusing pleadings filed in the district court, including motions to: (i) withdraw the reference of the 1983 bankruptcy case to the bankruptcy court under 28 U.S.C. 157(d); (ii) withdraw the reference of Renaissance's motion to reopen the 1983 bankruptcy case; (iii) vacate the 1983 order appointing the bankruptcy trustee; and (iv) strike the U.S. Trustee's memorandum of law opposing such motions. Dkt #1, 6.[2]

By these motions, the ultimate relief Renaissance seeks is to vacate the appointment of the bankruptcy trustee and regain the broadcast license it lost in the 1983 bankruptcy. Because debtor's various claims are plainly barred by res judicata and are untimely after 23 years, this case is appropriate for summary affirmance. Moreover, summary affirmance will put an end to the debtor's continuous attempts in various guises, including two trips to this Court, to vacate the appointment of the trustee over 20 years ago. Finally, the debtor's pleadings are unintelligible, and as the district court noted, confusingly captioned. For this reason also, summary affirmance is warranted.

[2] References to the district court record will be to the docket entry and corresponding exhibits filed by the US Trustee or debtor, "Dkt. #_ (Exh. _)." Because of the numerous exhibits associated with the debtor's lawsuits, we have not attached any of the exhibits. We will of course do so, should the Court request any of them.

1. On September 28 1983, Renaissance Broadcasting Corporation, which owned and operated a television station in Vineland New Jersey, filed a Chapter 11 petition in bankruptcy. Dkt. #4 (Exh. 2). After the US Trustee filed a motion to appoint a trustee under 11 U.S.C. 1104, the bankruptcy court held a hearing at which Renaissance's objections were considered. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 5). On October 7, 1983, the bankruptcy court entered an order directing the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee.[3] Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 6).

Under Federal Communications Commission (FCC) regulations, 47 C.F.R. 73.3541, the debtor became legally disabled once the Chapter 11 trustee was appointed, and the bankruptcy trustee acquired control of the broadcast license through an involuntary transfer. Renaissance appealed the trustee's appointment to the district court, and the district court affirmed the appointment. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 10).

In 1984, the trustee negotiated a sale of the debtor's assets under 11 U.S.C. 363, including the broadcast license, for $3.5 million. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 13). The bankruptcy court denied Renaissance's objections to the sale. Ibid. In April of 1985, the FCC approved the trustee's request for a voluntary transfer of the [3] Subsequently, on July 10, 1984, the bankruptcy case was converted to a case under Chapter 7, and the US Trustee appointed the former Chapter 11 trustee to serve as a Chapter 7 trustee under 11 U.S.C. 701(a)(1) and (c) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1019(4). Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 11).

broadcast license to the purchaser of the estate’s assets under 47 C.F.R. 73.3540(a). Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 16). Thereafter, on November 6, 1987, the bankruptcy court closed the debtor’s bankruptcy case. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 18).

2. In 1985, the debtor ‘s principal and owner, Mr. Donald C. McMeans, filed a civil rights lawsuit in the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey against several defendants, including the bankruptcy trustee and US Trustee personnel. Dkt. #4 (Exh. 14). McMeans alleged, inter alia, that appointment of a trustee was part of a vast racially-motivated conspiracy against Renaissance. The district court dismissed the claims against the bankruptcy trustee and the US Trustee personnel, ruling that claims attendant to the appointment of the bankruptcy trustee had been fully aired in bankruptcy court and either had been or should have been raised in the appeal of the trustee's appointment. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 17 at 13). In 1990, the civil rights action went to trial against other defendants, and the district court ruled against McMeans, in a directed verdict. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 21). McMeans appealed to this Court, which affirmed without opinion. McMeans v. Twp. of Waterford, 924 F.2d 417 (3d Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 854.

In 1995, McMeans filed a 60(b) motion seeking to resurrect his civil rights case by vacating, inter alia, the order appointing the trustee in the 1983 bankruptcy case. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 25). The district court found that McMeans had not shown fraud upon the Court and that his allegations were "mere restatements of earlier contentions that have been litigated fully or could have been litigated fully." Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 26 at 4). The district court dismissed the claims with prejudice. Ibid. McMeans appealed to this Court, which summarily affirmed. Dkt. # 4 (Exh. 29).
