(i) an agreement, including related terms, which provides for the transfer of one or more certificates of deposit, mortgage related securities (as defined in section 3 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 [15 USCS § 78c]), mortgage loans, interests in mortgage related securities or mortgage loans, eligible bankers' acceptances, qualified foreign government securities (defined as a security that is a direct obligation of, or that is fully guaranteed by, the central government of a member of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development), or securities that are direct obligations of, or that are fully guaranteed by, the United States or any agency of the United States against the transfer of funds by the transferee of such certificates of deposit, eligible bankers' acceptances, securities, mortgage loans, or interests, with a simultaneous agreement by such transferee to transfer to the transferor thereof certificates of deposit, eligible bankers' acceptance, securities, mortgage loans, or interests of the kind described in this clause, at a date certain not later than 1 year after such transfer or on demand, against the transfer of funds;

(ii) any combination of agreements or transactions referred to in clauses (i) and (iii);

(iii) an option to enter into an agreement or transaction referred to in clause (i) or (ii);

(iv) a master agreement that provides for an agreement or transaction referred to in clause (i), (ii), or (iii), together with all supplements to any such master agreement, without regard to whether such master agreement provides for an agreement or transaction that is not a repurchase agreement under this paragraph, except that such master agreement shall be considered to be a repurchase agreement under this paragraph only with respect to each agreement or transaction under the master agreement that is referred to in clause (i), (ii), or (iii); or

(v) any security agreement or arrangement or other credit enhancement related to any agreement or transaction referred to in clause (i), (ii), (iii), or (iv), including any guarantee or reimbursement obligation by or to a repo participant or financial participant in connection with any agreement or transaction referred to in any such clause, but not to exceed the damages in connection with any such agreement or transaction, measured in accordance with section 562 of this title [11 USCS § 562]; and

(B) does not include a repurchase obligation under a participation in a commercial mortgage loan.

(48) The term "securities clearing agency" means person that is registered as a clearing agency under section 17A of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 [15 USCS § 78q-1], or exempt from such registration under such section pursuant to an order of the Securities and Exchange Commission, or whose business is confined to the performance of functions of a clearing agency with respect to exempted securities, as defined in section 3(a)(12) of such Act [15 USCS § 78c(a)(12)] for the purposes of such section 17A [15 USCS § 78q-1].

(48A) The term "securities self regulatory organization" means either a securities association registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission under section 15A of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 [15 USCS § 78o-3] or a national securities exchange registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission under section 6 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 [15 USCS § 78f].

Legislative Statements

Section 101(2) defines "affiliate." The House amendment contains a provision that is a compromise between the definition in the House-passed version of H.R. 8200 and the Senate amendment in the nature of a substitute to H.R. 8200. Subparagraphs (A) and (B) are derived from the Senate amendment and subparagraph (D) is taken from the House bill, while subparagraph (C) represents a compromise, taking the House position with respect to a person whose business is operated under a lease or an operating agreement by the debtor and with respect to a person substantially all of whose property is operated under an operating agreement by the debtor and with respect to a person substantially all of whose property is operated under an operating agreement by the debtor and the Senate position on leased property. Thus, the definition of "affiliate" excludes persons substantially all of whose property is operated under a lease agreement by a debtor, such as a small company which owns equipment all of which is leased to a larger nonrelated company.

Section 101(4)(B) represents a modification of the House-passed bill to include the definition of "claim" a right to an equitable remedy for breach of performance if such breach gives rise to a right to payment. This is intended to cause the liquidation or estimation of contingent rights of payment for which there may be an alternative equitable remedy with the result that the equitable remedy will be susceptible to being discharged in bankruptcy. For example, in some States, a judgment for specific performance may be satisfied by an alternative right to payment, in the event performance is refused; in that event, the creditor entitled to specific performance would have a "claim" for purposes of a proceeding under title 11.

On the other hand, rights to an equitable remedy for a breach of performance with respect to which such breach does not give rise to a right to payment are not "claims" and would therefore not be susceptible to discharge in bankruptcy.

In a case under chapter 9 to title 11, "claim" does not include a right to payment under an industrial development bond issued by a municipality as a matter of convenience for a third party.

Municipalities are authorized, under section 103(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended [title 26], to issue tax-exempt industrial development revenue bonds to provide for the financing of certain projects for privately owned companies. The bonds are sold on the basis of the credit of the company on whose behalf they are issued, and the principal, interest, and premium, if any, are payable solely from payments made by the company to the trustee under the bond indenture and do not constitute claims on the tax revenues or other funds of the issuing municipalities. Prior law and revision:

Legislative Statements

Sections 301, 302, 303, and 304, are all modified in the House amendment to adopt an idea contained in sections 301 and 303 of the Senate amendment requiring a petition commencing a case to be filed with the bankruptcy court. The exception contained in section 301 of the Senate bill relating to cases filed under chapter 9 is deleted. Chapter 9 cases will be handled by a bankruptcy court as are other title II cases.

Senate Report No. 95-989

Section 301 specifies the manner in which a voluntary bankruptcy case is commenced. The debtor files a petition under this section under the particular operative chapter of the bankruptcy code under which he wishes to proceed. The filing of the petition constitutes an order for relief in the case under that chapter. The section contains no change from current law, except for the use of the phrase "order for relief" instead of "adjudication." The term adjudication is replaced by a less pejorative phrase in light of the clear power of Congress to permit voluntary bankruptcy without the necessity for an adjudication, as under the 1898 act [former title 11], which was adopted when voluntary bankruptcy was a concept not thoroughly tested.

Effective date of section:

This section became effective on October 1, 1979, pursuant to § 402(a) of Act Nov. 6, 1978, P.L. 95-598, which appears as 11 USCS prec § 101 note.

Amendments:

2005. Act April 20, 2005 (effective 180 days after enactment and inapplicable to cases commenced before the effective date, as provided by § 1501 of such Act, which appears as 11 USCS § 101 note), inserted designated the existing provisions as subsec. (a), and, in such subsection as so designated, deleted "The commencement of a voluntary case under a chapter of this title constitutes an order for relief under such chapter." following "such chapter."; and added subsec. (b).

CHAPTER 5. CREDITORS, THE DEBTOR, AND THE ESTATE
SUBCHAPTER II. DEBTOR'S DUTIES AND BENEFITS

Go to the United States Code Service Archive Directory

§ 521. Debtor's duties

(a) The debtor shall--
  (1) file--
    (A) a list of creditors; and
    (B) unless the court orders otherwise--
      (i) a schedule of assets and liabilities;
      (ii) a schedule of current income and current expenditures;
      (iii) a statement of the debtor's financial affairs and, if section 342(b) [11 USCS § 342(b)] applies, a certificate--
        (I) of an attorney whose name is indicated on the petition as the attorney for the debtor, or a bankruptcy petition preparer signing the petition under section 110(b)(1) [11 USCS § 110(b)(1)], indicating that such attorney or the bankruptcy petition preparer delivered to the debtor the notice required by section 342(b) [11 USCS § 342(b)]; or
        (II) if no attorney is so indicated, and no bankruptcy petition preparer signed the petition, of the debtor that such notice was received and read by the debtor;
      (iv) copies of all payment advices or other evidence of payment received within 60 days before the date of the filing of the petition, by the debtor from any employer of the debtor;
      (v) a statement of the amount of monthly net income, itemized to show how the amount is calculated; and
      (vi) a statement disclosing any reasonably anticipated increase in income or expenditures over the 12-month period following the date of the filing of the petition;
  (2) if an individual debtor's schedule of assets and liabilities includes debts which are secured by property of the estate--
    (A) within thirty days after the date of the filing of a petition under chapter 7 of this title [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] or on or before the date of the meeting of creditors, whichever is earlier, or within such additional time as the court, for cause, within such period fixes, the debtor shall file with the clerk a statement of his intention with respect to the retention or surrender of such property and, if applicable, specifying that such property is claimed as exempt, that the debtor intends to redeem such property, or that the debtor intends to reaffirm debts secured by such property;
    (B) within 30 days after the first date set for the meeting of creditors under section 341(a) [11 USCS § 341(a)], or within such additional time as the court, for cause, within such 30-day period fixes, the debtor shall perform his intention with respect to such property, as specified by subparagraph (A) of this paragraph; and
    (C) nothing in subparagraphs (A) and (B) of this paragraph shall alter the debtor's or the trustee's rights with regard to such property under this title [11 USCS §§ 101 et seq.], except as provided in section 362(h) [11 USCS § 362(h)];
  (3) if a trustee is serving in the case or an auditor serving under section 586(f) of title 28 [28 USCS § 586(f)], cooperate with the trustee as necessary to enable the trustee to perform the trustee's duties under this title [11 USCS §§ 101 et seq.];

(4) if a trustee is serving in the case or an auditor serving under section 586(f) of title 28 [28 USCS § 586(f)], surrender to the trustee all property of the estate and any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, relating to property of the estate, whether or not immunity is granted under section 344 of this title [11 USCS § 344];

(5) appear at the hearing required under section 524(d) of this title [11 USCS § 524(d)];

(6) in a case under chapter 7 of this title [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] in which the debtor is an individual, not retain possession of personal property as to which a creditor has an allowed claim for the purchase price secured in whole or in part by an interest in such personal property unless the debtor, not later than 45 days after the first meeting of creditors under section 341(a) [11 USCS § 341(a)], either--

(A) enters into an agreement with the creditor pursuant to section 524(c) [11 USCS § 524(c)] with respect to the claim secured by such property; or

(B) redeems such property from the security interest pursuant to section 722 [11 USCS § 722].

If the debtor fails to so act within the 45-day period referred to in paragraph (6), the stay under section 362(a) [11 USCS § 362(a)] is terminated with respect to the personal property of the estate or of the debtor which is affected, such property shall no longer be property of the estate, and the creditor may take whatever action as to such property as is permitted by applicable nonbankruptcy law, unless the court determines on the motion of the trustee filed before the expiration of such 45-day period, and after notice and a hearing, that such property is of consequential value or benefit to the estate, orders appropriate adequate protection of the creditor's interest, and orders the debtor to deliver any collateral in the debtor's possession to the trustee; and

(7) unless a trustee is serving in the case, continue to perform the obligations required of the administrator (as defined in section 3 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 [29 USCS § 1002]) of an employee benefit plan if at the time of the commencement of the case the debtor (or any entity designated by the debtor) served as such administrator.

(b) In addition to the requirements under subsection (a), a debtor who is an individual shall file with the court--

(1) a certificate from the approved nonprofit budget and credit counseling agency that provided the debtor services under section 109(h) [11 USCS § 109(h)] describing the services provided to the debtor; and

(2) a copy of the debt repayment plan, if any, developed under section 109(h) [11 USCS § 109(h)] through the approved nonprofit budget and credit counseling agency referred to in paragraph (1).

(c) In addition to meeting the requirements under subsection (a), a debtor shall file with the court a record of any interest that a debtor has in an education individual retirement account (as defined in section 530(b)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 [26 USCS § 530(b)(1)]) or under a qualified State tuition program (as defined in section 529(b)(1) of such Code [26 USCS § 529(b)(1)]).

(d) If the debtor fails timely to take the action specified in subsection (a)(6) of this section, or in paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 362(h) [11 USCS § 362(h)], with respect to property which a lessor or bailor owns and has leased, rented, or bailed to the debtor or as to which a creditor holds a security interest not otherwise voidable under section 522(f), 544, 545, 547, 548, or 549 [11 USCS § 522(f), 544, 545, 547, 548, or 549], nothing in this title shall prevent or limit the operation of a provision in the underlying lease or agreement that has the effect of placing the debtor in default under such lease or agreement by reason of the occurrence, pendency, or existence of a proceeding under this title or the insolvency of the debtor. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to justify limiting such a provision in any other circumstance.

(e) (1) If the debtor in a case under chapter 7 or 13 [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq. or 1301 et seq.] is an individual and if a creditor files with the court at any time a request to receive a copy of the petition, schedules, and statement of financial affairs filed by the debtor, then the court shall make such petition, such schedules, and such statement available to such creditor.

(2) (A) The debtor shall provide--

(i) not later than 7 days before the date first set for the first meeting of creditors, to the trustee a copy of the Federal income tax return required under applicable law (or at the election of the debtor, a transcript of such return) for the most recent tax year ending immediately before the commencement of the case and for which a Federal income tax return was filed; and

(ii) at the same time the debtor complies with clause (i), a copy of such return (or if elected under clause (i), such transcript) to any creditor that timely requests such copy.

(B) If the debtor fails to comply with clause (i) or (ii) of subparagraph (A), the court shall dismiss the case unless the debtor demonstrates that the failure to so comply is due to circumstances beyond the control of the debtor.

(C) If a creditor requests a copy of such tax return or such transcript and if the debtor fails to provide a copy of such tax return or such transcript to such creditor at the time the debtor provides such tax return or such transcript to the trustee, then the court shall dismiss the case unless the debtor demonstrates that the failure to provide a copy of such tax return or such transcript is due to circumstances beyond the control of the debtor.

(3) If a creditor in a case under chapter 13 [11 USCS §§ 1301 et seq.] files with the court at any time a request to receive a copy of the plan filed by the debtor, then the court shall make available to such creditor a copy of the plan--

(A) at a reasonable cost; and

(B) not later than 5 days after such request is filed.

(f) At the request of the court, the United States trustee, or any party in interest in a case under chapter 7, 11, or 13 [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq., 1101 et seq., or 1301 et seq.] , a debtor who is an individual shall file with the court--

(1) at the same time filed with the taxing authority, a copy of each Federal income tax return required under applicable law (or at the election of the debtor, a transcript of such tax return) with respect to each tax year of the debtor ending while the case is pending under such chapter;

(2) at the same time filed with the taxing authority, each Federal income tax return required under applicable law (or at the election of the debtor, a transcript of such tax return) that had not been filed with such authority as of the date of the commencement of the case and that was subsequently filed for any tax year of the debtor ending in the 3-year period ending on the date of the commencement of the case;

(3) a copy of each amendment to any Federal income tax return or transcript filed with the court under paragraph (1) or (2); and

(4) in a case under chapter 13 [11 USCS §§ 1301 et seq.]--

(A) on the date that is either 90 days after the end of such tax year or 1 year after the date of the commencement of the case, whichever is later, if a plan is not confirmed before such later date; and

(B) annually after the plan is confirmed and until the case is closed, not later than the date that is 45 days before the anniversary of the confirmation of the plan;

a statement, under penalty of perjury, of the income and expenditures of the debtor during the tax year of the debtor most recently concluded before such statement is filed under this paragraph, and of the monthly income of the debtor, that shows how income, expenditures, and monthly income are calculated.

(g) (1) A statement referred to in subsection (f)(4) shall disclose--

(A) the amount and sources of the income of the debtor;

(B) the identity of any person responsible with the debtor for the support of any dependent of the debtor; and

(C) the identity of any person who contributed, and the amount contributed, to the household in which the debtor resides.

(2) The tax returns, amendments, and statement of income and expenditures described in subsections (e)(2)(A) and (f) shall be available to the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any), the trustee, and any party in interest for inspection and copying, subject to the requirements of section 315(c) of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 [note to this section].

(h) If requested by the United States trustee or by the trustee, the debtor shall provide--

(1) a document that establishes the identity of the debtor, including a driver's license, passport, or other document that contains a photograph of the debtor; or

(2) such other personal identifying information relating to the debtor that establishes the identity of the debtor.

(i) (1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and (4) and notwithstanding section 707(a) [11 USCS § 707(a)], if an individual debtor in a voluntary case under chapter 7 or 13 [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq. or 1301 et seq.] fails to file all of the information required under subsection (a)(1) within 45 days after the date of the filing of the petition, the case shall be automatically dismissed effective on the 46th day after the date of the filing of the petition.

(2) Subject to paragraph (4) and with respect to a case described in paragraph (1), any party in interest may request the court to enter an order dismissing the case. If requested, the court shall enter an order of dismissal not later than 5 days after such request.

(3) Subject to paragraph (4) and upon request of the debtor made within 45 days after the date of the filing of the petition described in paragraph (1), the court may allow the debtor an additional period of not to exceed 45 days to file the information required under subsection (a)(1) if the court finds justification for extending the period for the filing.

(4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, on the motion of the trustee filed before the expiration of the applicable period of time specified in paragraph (1), (2), or (3), and after notice and a hearing, the court may decline to dismiss the case if the court finds that the debtor attempted in good faith to file all the information required by subsection (a)(1)(B)(iv) and that the best interests of creditors would be served by administration of the case.

(j) (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, if the debtor fails to file a tax return that becomes due after the commencement of the case or to properly obtain an extension of the due date for filing such return, the taxing authority may request that the court enter an order converting or dismissing the case.

(2) If the debtor does not file the required return or obtain the extension referred to in paragraph (1) within 90 days after a request is filed by the taxing authority under that paragraph, the court shall convert or dismiss the case, whichever is in the best interests of creditors and the estate.

Section 521 of the House amendment modifies a comparable provision contained in the House bill and Senate amendment. The Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure should provide where the list of creditors is to be filed. In addition, the debtor is required to attend the hearing on discharge under section 524(d).

Senate Report No. 95-989

This section lists three [now four] duties of the debtor in a bankruptcy case. The Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure will specify the means of carrying out these duties. The first duty is to file with the court a list of creditors and, unless the court orders otherwise, a schedule of assets and liabilities and a statement of his financial affairs. Second, the debtor is required to cooperate with the trustee as necessary to enable the trustee to perform the trustee's duties [now para. (3) of this section]. Finally, the debtor must surrender to the trustee all property of the estate, and any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, relating to property of the estate [now para. (4) of this section]. This phrase "recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers," has been used here and throughout the bill as a more general term, and includes such other forms of recorded information as data in computer storage or in

§ 701. Interim trustee

(a) (1) Promptly after the order for relief under this chapter, the United States trustee shall appoint one disinterested person that is a member of the panel of private trustees established under section 586(a)(1) of title 28 [28 USCS § 586(a)(1)] or that is serving as trustee in the case immediately before the order for relief under this chapter to serve as interim trustee in the case.

(2) If none of the members of such panel is willing to serve as interim trustee in the case, then the United States trustee may serve as interim trustee in the case.

(b) The service of an interim trustee under this section terminates when a trustee elected or designated under section 702 of this title [11 USCS § 702] to serve as trustee in the case qualifies under section 322 of this title [11 USCS § 322].

Legislative Statements

The House amendment deletes section 701(d) of the Senate amendment. It is anticipated that the Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure will require the appointment of an interim trustee at the earliest practical moment in commodity broker bankruptcies, but no later than noon of the day after the date of the filing of the petition, due to the volatility of such cases.

Senate Report No. 95-989

This section requires the court to appoint an interim trustee. The appointment must be made from the panel of private trustees established and maintained by the Director of the Administrative Office under proposed 28 U.S.C. 604(e) [28 USCS § 604(f)].

Subsection (a) requires the appointment of an interim trustee to be made promptly after the order for relief, unless a

§ 704. Duties of trustee

(a) The trustee shall--

(1) collect and reduce to money the property of the estate for which such trustee serves, and close such estate as expeditiously as is compatible with the best interests of parties in interest;

(2) be accountable for all property received;

(3) ensure that the debtor shall perform his intention as specified in section 521(2)(B) of this title [11 USCS § 521(2)(B)];

(4) investigate the financial affairs of the debtor;

(5) if a purpose would be served, examine proofs of claims and object to the allowance of any claim that is improper;

(6) if advisable, oppose the discharge of the debtor;

(7) unless the court orders otherwise, furnish such information concerning the estate and the estate's administration as is requested by a party in interest;

(8) if the business of the debtor is authorized to be operated, file with the court, with the United States trustee, and with any governmental unit charged with responsibility for collection or determination of any tax arising out of such operation, periodic reports and summaries of the operation of such business, including a statement of receipts and disbursements, and such other information as the United States trustee or the court requires;

(9) make a final report and file a final account of the administration of the estate with the court and with the United States trustee;

(10) if with respect to the debtor there is a claim for a domestic support obligation, provide the applicable notice specified in subsection (c);

(11) if, at the time of the commencement of the case, the debtor (or any entity designated by the debtor) served as the administrator (as defined in section 3 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 [29 USCS § 1002]) of an employee benefit plan, continue to perform the obligations required of the administrator; and

(12) use all reasonable and best efforts to transfer patients from a health care business that is in the process of being closed to an appropriate health care business that--

(A) is in the vicinity of the health care business that is closing;

(B) provides the patient with services that are substantially similar to those provided by the health care business that is in the process of being closed; and

(C) maintains a reasonable quality of care.

(b) (1) With respect to a debtor who is an individual in a case under this chapter--

(A) the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) shall review all materials filed by the debtor and, not later than 10 days after the date of the first meeting of creditors, file with the court a statement as to whether the debtor's case would be presumed to be an abuse under section 707(b) [11 USCS § 707(b)]; and

(B) not later than 5 days after receiving a statement under subparagraph (A), the court shall provide a copy of the statement to all creditors.

(2) The United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any) shall, not later than 30 days after the date of filing a statement under paragraph (1), either file a motion to dismiss or convert under section 707(b) [11 USCS § 707(b)] or file a statement setting forth the reasons the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) does not consider such a motion to be appropriate, if the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) determines that the debtor's case should be presumed to be an abuse under section 707(b) [11 USCS § 707(b)] and the product of the debtor's current monthly income, multiplied by 12 is not less than--

(A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner; or

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2 or more individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals.

(c) (1) In a case described in subsection (a)(10) to which subsection (a)(10) applies, the trustee shall--

(A) (i) provide written notice to the holder of the claim described in subsection (a)(10) of such claim and of the right of such holder to use the services of the State child support enforcement agency established under sections 464 and 466 of the Social Security Act [42 USCS §§ 664 and 666] for the State in which such holder resides, for assistance in collecting child support during and after the case under this title;

(ii) include in the notice provided under clause (iii) the address and telephone number of such State child support enforcement agency; and

(iii) include in the notice provided under clause (i) an explanation of the rights of such holder to payment of such claim under this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.];

(B) (i) provide written notice to such State child support enforcement agency of such claim; and

(ii) include in the notice provided under clause (i) the name, address, and telephone number of such holder; and

(C) at such time as the debtor is granted a discharge under section 727 [11 USCS § 727], provide written notice to such holder and to such State child support enforcement agency of--

(i) the granting of the discharge;

(ii) the last recent known address of the debtor;

(iii) the last recent known name and address of the debtor's employer; and

(iv) the name of each creditor that holds a claim that--

(I) is not discharged under paragraph (2), (4), or (14A) of section 523(a) [11 USCS § 523(a)]; or

(II) was reaffirmed by the debtor under section 524(c) [11 USCS § 524(c)].

(2) (A) The holder of a claim described in subsection (a)(10) or the State child support enforcement agency of the State in which such holder resides may request from a creditor described in paragraph (1)(C)(iv) the last known address of the debtor.

(B) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a creditor that makes a disclosure of a last known address of a debtor in connection with a request made under subparagraph (A) shall not be liable by reason of making such disclosure.

SUBCHAPTER I. OFFICERS AND ADMINISTRATION

§ 707. Dismissal of a case or conversion to a case under chapter 11 or 13

(a) The court may dismiss a case under this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] only after notice and a hearing and only for cause, including--

(1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;

(2) nonpayment of any fees [or] and charges required under chapter 123 of title 28; and

(3) failure of the debtor in a voluntary case to file, within fifteen days or such additional time as the court may allow after the filing of the petition commencing such case, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521 [11 USCS § 521], but only on a motion by the United States trustee.

(b) (1) After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee, trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any), or any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts, or, with the debtor's consent, convert such a case to a case under chapter 11 or 13 of this title [11 USCS §§ 1101 et seq. or 1301 et seq.], if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.]. In making a determination whether to dismiss a case under this section, the court may not take into consideration whether a debtor has made, or continues to make, charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3) [11 USCS § 548(d)(3)]) to any qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as that term is defined in section 548(d)(4) [11 USCS § 548(d)(4)]).

(2) (A) (i) In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.], the court shall presume abuse exists if the debtor's current monthly income reduced by the amounts determined under clauses (ii), (iii), and (iv), and multiplied by 60 is not less than the lesser of--

(II) $ 10,950.

(ii) (I) The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief, for the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case, if the spouse is not otherwise a dependent. Such expenses shall include reasonably necessary health insurance, disability insurance, and health savings account expenses for the debtor, the spouse of the debtor, or the dependents of the debtor. Notwithstanding any other provision of this clause, the monthly expenses of the debtor shall not include any payments for debts. In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses shall include the debtor's reasonably necessary expenses incurred to maintain the safety of the debtor and the family of the debtor from family violence as identified under section 309 [320] of the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act [42 USCS § 10421], or other applicable Federal law. The expenses included in the debtor's monthly expenses described in the preceding sentence shall be kept confidential by the court. In addition, if it is demonstrated that it is reasonable and necessary, the debtor's monthly expenses may also include an additional allowance for food and clothing of up to 5 percent of the food and clothing categories as specified by the National Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service.

(II) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include, if applicable, the continuation of actual expenses paid by the debtor that are reasonable and necessary for care and support of an elderly, chronically ill, or disabled household member or member of the debtor's immediate family (including parents, grandparents, siblings, children, and grandchildren of the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case who is not a dependent) and who is unable to pay for such reasonable and necessary expenses.

(III) In addition, for a debtor eligible for chapter 13 [11 USCS §§ 1301 et seq.], the debtor's monthly expenses may include the actual administrative expenses of administering a chapter 13 [11 USCS §§ 1301 et seq.] plan for the district in which the debtor resides, up to an amount of 10 percent of the projected plan payments, as determined under schedules issued by the Executive Office for United States Trustees.

(IV) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include the actual expenses for each dependent child less than 18 years of age, not to exceed $ 1,650 per year per child, to attend a private or public elementary or secondary school if the debtor provides documentation of such expenses and a detailed explanation of why such expenses are reasonable and necessary, and why such expenses are not already accounted for in the National Standards, Local Standards, or Other Necessary Expenses referred to in subclause (I).

(V) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include an allowance for housing and utilities, in excess of the allowance specified by the Local Standards for housing and utilities issued by the Internal Revenue Service, based on the actual expenses for home energy costs if the debtor provides documentation of such actual expenses and demonstrates that such actual expenses are reasonable and necessary.

(iii) The debtor's average monthly payments on account of secured debts shall be calculated as the sum of--

(I) the total of all amounts scheduled as contractually due to secured creditors in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition; and

(II) any additional payments to secured creditors necessary for the debtor, in filing a plan under chapter 13 of this title [11 USCS §§ 1301 et seq.], to maintain possession of the debtor's primary residence, motor vehicle, or other property necessary for the support of the debtor and the debtor's dependents, that serves as collateral for secured debts;

(iv) The debtor's expenses for payment of all priority claims (including priority child support and alimony claims) shall be calculated as the total amount of debts entitled to priority, divided by 60.

(B) (i) In any proceeding brought under this subsection, the presumption of abuse may only be rebutted by demonstrating special circumstances, such as a serious medical condition or a call or order to active duty in the Armed Forces, to the extent such special circumstances that justify additional expenses or adjustments of current monthly income for which there is no reasonable alternative.

(ii) In order to establish special circumstances, the debtor shall be required to itemize each additional expense or adjustment of income and to provide--

(I) documentation for such expense or adjustment to income; and

(II) a detailed explanation of the special circumstances that make such expenses or adjustment to income necessary and reasonable.

(iii) The debtor shall attest under oath to the accuracy of any information provided to demonstrate that additional expenses or adjustments to income are required.

(iv) The presumption of abuse may only be rebutted if the additional expenses or adjustments to income referred to in clause (i) cause the product of the debtor's current monthly income reduced by the amounts determined under clauses (ii), (iii), and (iv) of subparagraph (A) when multiplied by 60 to be less than the lesser of--

(I) 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured claims, or $ 6,000, whichever is greater; or

(II) $ 10,000.

(C) As part of the schedule of current income and expenditures required under section 521 [11 USCS § 521], the debtor shall include a statement of the debtor's current monthly income, and the calculations that determine whether a presumption arises under subparagraph (A)(i), that show how each such amount is calculated.

(D) Subparagraphs (A) through (C) shall not apply, and the court may not dismiss or convert a case based on any form of means testing, if the debtor is a disabled veteran (as defined in section 3741(1) of title 38 [38 USCS § 3741(1)]), and the indebtedness occurred primarily during a period during which he or she was--

(i) on active duty (as defined in section 101(d)(1) of title 10 [10 USCS § 101(d)(1)]); or

(ii) performing a homeland defense activity (as defined in section 901(1) of title 32 [32 USCS § 901(1)]).

(3) In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] in a case in which the presumption in subparagraph (A)(i) of such paragraph does not arise or is rebutted, the court shall consider--

(A) whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith; or

(B) the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse.

(4) (A) The court, on its own initiative or on the motion of a party in interest, in accordance with the procedures described in rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, may order the attorney for the debtor to reimburse the trustee for all reasonable costs in prosecuting a motion filed under section 707(b) [11 USCS § 707(b)], including reasonable attorneys' fees, if--

(i) a trustee files a motion for dismissal or conversion under this subsection; and

(ii) the court--

(I) grants such motion; and

(II) finds that the action of the attorney for the debtor in filing a case under this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] violated rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure.

(B) If the court finds that the attorney for the debtor violated rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, the court, on its own initiative or on the motion of a party in interest, in accordance with such procedures, may order--

(i) the assessment of an appropriate civil penalty against the attorney for the debtor; and

(ii) the payment of such civil penalty to the trustee, the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any).

(C) The signature of an attorney on a petition, pleading, or written motion shall constitute a certification that the attorney has--

(i) performed a reasonable investigation into the circumstances that gave rise to the petition, pleading, or written motion; and

(ii) determined that the petition, pleading, or written motion--

(I) is well grounded in fact; and

(II) is warranted by existing law or a good faith argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law and does not constitute an abuse under paragraph (1).

(D) The signature of an attorney on the petition shall constitute a certification that the attorney has no knowledge after an inquiry that the information in the schedules filed with such petition is incorrect.

(5) (A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B) and subject to paragraph (6), the court, on its own initiative or on the motion of a party in interest, in accordance with the procedures described in rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, may award a debtor all reasonable costs (including reasonable attorneys' fees) in contesting a motion filed by a party in interest (other than a trustee or United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any)) under this subsection if--

(i) the court does not grant the motion; and

(ii) the court finds that--

(I) the position of the party that filed the motion violated rule 9011 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure; or

(II) the attorney (if any) who filed the motion did not comply with the requirements of clauses (i) and (ii) of paragraph (4)(C), and the motion was made solely for the purpose of coercing a debtor into waiving a right guaranteed to the debtor under this title.

(B) A small business that has a claim of an aggregate amount less than $ 1,100 shall not be subject to subparagraph (A)(ii)(I).

(C) For purposes of this paragraph--

(i) the term "small business" means an unincorporated business, partnership, corporation, association, or organization that--

(I) has fewer than 25 full-time employees as determined on the date on which the motion is filed; and

(II) is engaged in commercial or business activity; and

(ii) the number of employees of a wholly owned subsidiary of a corporation includes the employees of--

(I) a parent corporation; and

(II) any other subsidiary corporation of the parent corporation.

(6) Only the judge or United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any) may file a motion under section 707(b) [11 USCS § 707(b)], if the current monthly income of the debtor, or in a joint case, the debtor and the debtor's spouse, as of the date of the order for relief, when multiplied by 12, is equal to or less than--

(A) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(B) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(C) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $ 575 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(7) (A) No judge, United States trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any), trustee, or other party in interest may file a motion under paragraph (2) if the current monthly income of the debtor, including a veteran (as that term is defined in section 101 of title 38 [38 USCS § 101]), and the debtor's spouse combined, as of the date of the order for relief when multiplied by 12, is equal to or less than--

(i) in the case of a debtor in a household of 1 person, the median family income of the applicable State for 1 earner;

(ii) in the case of a debtor in a household of 2, 3, or 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of the same number or fewer individuals; or

(iii) in the case of a debtor in a household exceeding 4 individuals, the highest median family income of the applicable State for a family of 4 or fewer individuals, plus $ 575 per month for each individual in excess of 4.

(B) In a case that is not a joint case, current monthly income of the debtor's spouse shall not be considered for purposes of subparagraph (A) if--

(i) (I) the debtor and the debtor's spouse are separated under applicable nonbankruptcy law; or

(II) the debtor and the debtor's spouse are living separate and apart, other than for the purpose of evading subparagraph (A); and

(ii) the debtor files a statement under penalty of perjury--

(I) specifying that the debtor meets the requirement of subclause (I) or (II) of clause (i); and

(II) disclosing the aggregate, or best estimate of the aggregate, amount of any cash or money payments received from the debtor's spouse attributed to the debtor's current monthly income.

(c) (1) In this subsection--

(A) the term "crime of violence" has the meaning given such term in section 16 of title 18 [18 USCS § 16]; and

(B) the term "drug trafficking crime" has the meaning given such term in section 924(c)(2) of title 18 [18 USCS § 924(c)(2)].

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), after notice and a hearing, the court, on a motion by the victim of a crime of violence or a drug trafficking crime, may when it is in the best interest of the victim dismiss a voluntary case filed under this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] by a debtor who is an individual if such individual was convicted of such crime.

(3) The court may not dismiss a case under paragraph (2) if the debtor establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that the filing of a case under this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] is necessary to satisfy a claim for a domestic support obligation.

Section 707 of the House amendment indicates that the court may dismiss a case only after notice and a hearing.

Senate Report No. 95-989

This section authorizes the court to dismiss a liquidation case only for cause, such as unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors or nonpayment of any fees and charges required under chapter 123 [§ 1911 et seq.] of title 28. These causes are not exhaustive, but merely illustrative. The section does not contemplate, however, that the ability of the debtor to repay his debts in whole or in part constitutes adequate cause for dismissal. To permit dismissal on that ground would be to enact a non-uniform mandatory chapter 13, in lieu of the remedy of bankruptcy.

§ 707. Dismissal

(a) The court may dismiss a case under this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.] only after notice and a hearing and only for cause, including--

(1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;

(2) nonpayment of any fees [or] and charges required under chapter 123 of title 28; and

(3) failure of the debtor in a voluntary case to file, within fifteen days or such additional time as the court may allow after the filing of the petition commencing such case, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521 [11 USCS § 521], but only on a motion by the United States trustee.

(b) After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee, but not at the request or suggestion of any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts if it finds that the granting of relief would be a substantial abuse of the provisions of this chapter [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.]. There shall be a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor. In making a determination whether to dismiss a case under this section, the court may not take into consideration whether a debtor has made, or continues to make, charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3) [11 USCS § 548(d)(3)]) to any qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as that term is defined in section 548(d)(4) [11 USCS § 548(d)(4)]).

§ 7430. Awarding of costs and certain fees.

(a) In general. In any administrative or court proceeding which is brought by or against the United States in connection with the determination, collection, or refund of any tax, interest, or penalty under this title, the prevailing party may be awarded a judgment or a settlement for--

(1) reasonable administrative costs incurred in connection with such administrative proceeding within the Internal Revenue Service, and

(2) reasonable litigation costs incurred in connection with such court proceeding.

(b) Limitations.

(1) Requirement that administrative remedies be exhausted. A judgment for reasonable litigation costs shall not be awarded under subsection (a) in any court proceeding unless the court determines that the prevailing party has exhausted the administrative remedies available to such party within the Internal Revenue Service. Any failure to agree to an extension of the time for the assessment of any tax shall not be taken into account for purposes of determining whether the prevailing party meets the requirements of the preceding sentence.

(2) Only costs allocable to the United States. An award under subsection (a) shall be made only for reasonable litigation and administrative costs which are allocable to the United States and not to any other party.

(3) Costs denied where party prevailing protracts proceedings. No award for reasonable litigation and administrative costs may be made under subsection (a) with respect to any portion of the administrative or court proceeding during which the prevailing party has unreasonably protracted such proceeding.

(4) Period for applying to IRS for administrative costs. An award may be made under subsection (a) by the Internal Revenue Service for reasonable administrative costs only if the prevailing party files an application with the Internal Revenue Service for such costs before the 91st day after the date on which the final decision of the Internal Revenue Service as to the determination of the tax, interest, or penalty is mailed to such party.

(c) Definitions. For purposes of this section--

(1) Reasonable litigation costs. The term "reasonable litigation costs" includes--

(A) reasonable court costs, and

(B) based upon prevailing market rates for the kind or quality of services furnished--

(i) the reasonable expenses of expert witnesses in connection with a court proceeding, except that no expert witness shall be compensated at a rate in excess of the highest rate of compensation for expert witnesses paid by the United States,

(ii) the reasonable cost of any study, analysis, engineering report, test, or project which is found by the court to be necessary for the preparation of the party's case, and

(iii) [Caution: See § 3.39 of Rev. Proc. 2007-66 (26 USCS § 1 note) for provision that, for fees incurred in calendar year 2008, the attorney fee award limitation under this clause is $ 170 per hour.] reasonable fees paid or incurred for the services of attorneys in connection with the court proceeding, except that such fees shall not be in excess of $ 125 per hour unless the court determines that a special factor, such as the limited availability of qualified attorneys for such proceeding, the difficulty of the issues presented in the case, or the local availability of tax expertise, justifies a higher rate.

In the case of any calendar year beginning after 1996, the dollar amount referred to in clause (iii) shall be increased by an amount equal to such dollar amount multiplied by the cost-of-living adjustment determined under section 1(f)(3) [26 USCS § 1(f)(3)] for such calendar year, by substituting "calendar year 1995" for "calendar year 1992" in subparagraph (B) thereof. If any dollar amount after being increased under the preceding sentence is not a multiple of $ 10, such dollar amount shall be rounded to the nearest multiple of $ 10.

(2) Reasonable administrative costs. The term "reasonable administrative costs" means--

(A) any administrative fees or similar charges imposed by the Internal Revenue Service, and

(B) expenses, costs, and fees described in paragraph (1)(B), except that any determination made by the court under clause (ii) or (iii) thereof shall be made by the Internal Revenue Service in cases where the determination under paragraph (4)(C) of the awarding of reasonable administrative costs is made by the Internal Revenue Service.

Such term shall only include costs incurred on or after whichever of the following is the earliest: (i) the date of the receipt by the taxpayer of the notice of the decision of the Internal Revenue Service Office of Appeals; (ii) the date of the notice of deficiency; or (iii) the date on which the first letter of proposed deficiency which allows the taxpayer an opportunity for administrative review in the Internal Revenue Service Office of Appeals is sent.

(3) Attorneys' fees.

(A) In general. For purposes of paragraphs (1) and (2), fees for the services of an individual (whether or not an attorney) who is authorized to practice before the Tax Court or before the Internal Revenue Service shall be treated as fees for the services of an attorney.

(B) Pro bono services. The court may award reasonable attorneys' fees under subsection (a) in excess of the attorneys' fees paid or incurred if such fees are less than the reasonable attorneys' fees because an individual is representing the prevailing party for no fee or for a fee which (taking into account all the facts and circumstances) is no more than a nominal fee. This subparagraph shall apply only if such award is paid to such individual or such individual's employer.

(4) Prevailing party.

(A) In general. The term "prevailing party" means any party in any proceeding to which subsection (a) applies (other than the United States or any creditor of the taxpayer involved)--

(i) which--

(I) has substantially prevailed with respect to the amount in controversy, or

(II) has substantially prevailed with respect to the most significant issue or set of issues presented, and

(ii) which meets the requirements of the 1st sentence of section 2412(d)(1)(B) of title 28, United States Code (as in effect on October 22, 1986) except to the extent differing procedures are established by rule of court and meets the requirements of section 2412(d)(2)(B) of such title 28 (as so in effect).

(B) Exception if United States establishes that its position was substantially justified.

(i) General rule. A party shall not be treated as the prevailing party in a proceeding to which subsection (a) applies if the United States establishes that the position of the United States in the proceeding was substantially justified.

(ii) Presumption of no justification if Internal Revenue Service did not follow certain published guidance. For purposes of clause (i), the position of the United States shall be presumed not to be substantially justified if the Internal Revenue Service did not follow its applicable published guidance in the administrative proceeding. Such presumption may be rebutted.

(iii) Effect of losing on substantially similar issues. In determining for purposes of clause (i) whether the position of the United States was substantially justified, the court shall take into account whether the United States has lost in courts of appeal for other circuits on substantially similar issues.

(iv) Applicable published guidance. For purposes of clause (ii), the term "applicable published guidance" means--

(I) regulations, revenue rulings, revenue procedures, information releases, notices, and announcements, and

(II) any of the following which are issued to the taxpayer: private letter rulings, technical advice memoranda, and determination letters.

(C) Determination as to prevailing party. Any determination under this paragraph as to whether a party is a prevailing party shall be made by agreement of the parties or--

(i) in the case where the final determination with respect to the tax, interest, or penalty is made at the administrative level, by the Internal Revenue Service, or

(ii) in the case where such final determination is made by a court, the court.

(D) Special rules for applying net worth requirement. In applying the requirements of section 2412(d)(2)(B) of title 28, United States Code, for purposes of subparagraph (A)(ii) of this paragraph--

(i) the net worth limitation in clause (i) of such section shall apply to--

(I) an estate but shall be determined as of the date of the decedent's death, and

(II) a trust but shall be determined as of the last day of the taxable year involved in the proceeding, and

(ii) individuals filing a joint return shall be treated as separate individuals for purposes of clause (i) of such section.

(E) Special rules where judgment less than taxpayer's offer.

(i) In general. A party to a court proceeding meeting the requirements of subparagraph (A)(ii) shall be treated as the prevailing party if the liability of the taxpayer pursuant to the judgment in the proceeding (determined without regard to interest) is equal to or less than the liability of the taxpayer which would have been so determined if the United States had accepted a qualified offer of the party under subsection (g).

(ii) Exceptions. This subparagraph shall not apply to--

(I) any judgment issued pursuant to a settlement; or

(II) any proceeding in which the amount of tax liability is not in issue, including any declaratory judgment proceeding, any proceeding to enforce or quash any summons issued pursuant to this title, and any action to restrain disclosure under section 6110(f) [26 USCS § 6110(f)].

(iii) Special rules. If this subparagraph applies to any court proceeding--

(I) the determination under clause (i) shall be made by reference to the last qualified offer made with respect to the tax liability at issue in the proceeding; and

(II) reasonable administrative and litigation costs shall only include costs incurred on and after the date of such offer.

(iv) Coordination. This subparagraph shall not apply to a party which is a prevailing party under any other provision of this paragraph.

(5) Administrative proceedings. The term "administrative proceeding" means any procedure or other action before the Internal Revenue Service.

(6) Court proceedings. The term "court proceeding" means any civil action brought in a court of the United States (including the Tax Court and the United States Claims Court [United States Court of Federal Claims]).

(7) Position of United States. The term "position of the United States" means--

(A) the position taken by the United States in a judicial proceeding to which subsection (a) applies, and

(B) the position taken in an administrative proceeding to which subsection (a) applies as of the earlier of--

(i) the date of the receipt by the taxpayer of the notice of the decision of the Internal Revenue Service Office of Appeals, or

(ii) the date of the notice of deficiency.

(d) Special rules for payment of costs.

(1) Reasonable administrative costs. An award for reasonable administrative costs shall be payable out of funds appropriated under section 1304 of title 31, United States Code.

(2) Reasonable litigation costs. An award for reasonable litigation costs shall be payable in the case of the Tax Court in the same manner as such an award by a district court.

(e) Multiple actions. For purposes of this section, in the case of --
(1) multiple actions which could have been joined or consolidated, or
(2) a case or cases involving a return or returns of the same taxpayer (including joint returns of married individuals) which could have been joined in a single court proceeding in the same court, such actions or cases shall be treated as 1 court proceeding regardless of whether such joinder or consolidation actually occurs, unless the court in which such action is brought determines, in its discretion, that it would be inappropriate to treat such actions or cases as joined or consolidated.

(1) Court proceedings. An order granting or denying (in whole or in part) an award for reasonable litigation or administrative costs under subsection (a) in a court proceeding, may be incorporated as a part of the decision or judgment in the court proceeding and shall be subject to appeal in the same manner as the decision or judgment.
(2) Administrative proceedings. A decision granting or denying (in whole or in part) an award for reasonable administrative costs under subsection (a) by the Internal Revenue Service shall be subject to the filing of a petition for review with the Tax Court under rules similar to the rules under section 7463 [26 USCS § 7463] (without regard to the amount in dispute). If the Secretary sends by certified or registered mail a notice of such decision to the petitioner, no proceeding in the Tax Court may be initiated under this paragraph unless such petition is filed before the 91st day after the date of such mailing.
(3) Appeal of Tax Court decision. An order of the Tax Court disposing of a petition under paragraph (2) shall be reviewable in the same manner as a decision of the Tax Court, but only with respect to the matters determined in such order.

(g) Qualified offer. For purposes of subsection (c)(4)--
(1) In general. The term "qualified offer" means a written offer which--
(A) is made by the taxpayer to the United States during the qualified offer period;
(B) specifies the offered amount of the taxpayer's liability (determined without regard to interest);
(C) is designated at the time it is made as a qualified offer for purposes of this section; and
(D) remains open during the period beginning on the date it is made and ending on the earliest of the date the offer is rejected, the date the trial begins, or the 90th day after the date the offer is made.
(2) Qualified offer period. For purposes of this subsection, the term "qualified offer period" means the period--
(A) beginning on the date on which the first letter of proposed deficiency which allows the taxpayer an opportunity for administrative review in the Internal Revenue Service Office of Appeals is sent, and
(B) ending on the date which is 30 days before the date the case is first set for trial.

§ 157. Procedures

(a) Each district court may provide that any or all cases under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11 shall be referred to the bankruptcy judges for the district.

(b)

(1) Bankruptcy judges may hear and determine all cases under title 11 and all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11, referred under subsection (a) of this section, and may enter appropriate orders and judgments, subject to review under section 158 of this title [28 USCS § 158].

(2) Core proceedings include, but are not limited to--

(A) matters concerning the administration of the estate;

(B) allowance or disallowance of claims against the estate or exemptions from property of the estate, and estimation of claims or interests for the purposes of confirming a plan under chapter 11, 12, or 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1101 et seq., 1201 et seq. or 1301 et seq.] but not the liquidation or estimation of contingent or unliquidated personal injury tort or wrongful death claims against the estate for purposes of distribution in a case under title 11;

(C) counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate;

(D) orders in respect to obtaining credit;

(E) orders to turn over property of the estate;

(F) proceedings to determine, avoid, or recover preferences;

(G) motions to terminate, annul, or modify the automatic stay;

(H) proceedings to determine, avoid, or recover fraudulent conveyances;

(I) determinations as to the dischargeability of particular debts;

(J) objections to discharges;

(K) determinations of the validity, extent, or priority of liens;

(L) confirmations of plans;

(M) orders approving the use or lease of property, including the use of cash collateral;

(N) orders approving the sale of property other than property resulting from claims brought by the estate against persons who have not filed claims against the estate;

(O) other proceedings affecting the liquidation of the assets of the estate or the adjustment of the debtor-creditor or the equity security holder relationship, except personal injury tort or wrongful death claims; and

(P) recognition of foreign proceedings and other matters under chapter 15 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1501 et seq.].

(3) The bankruptcy judge shall determine, on the judge's own motion or on timely motion of a party, whether a proceeding is a core proceeding under this subsection or is a proceeding that is otherwise related to a case under title 11. A determination that a proceeding is not a core proceeding shall not be made solely on the basis that its resolution may be affected by State law.

(4) Non-core proceedings under section 157(b)(2)(B) of title 28, United States Code, shall not be subject to the mandatory abstention provisions of section 1334(c)(2) [28 USCS § 1334(c)(2)].

(5) The district court shall order that personal injury tort and wrongful death claims shall be tried in the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending, or in the district court in the district in which the claim arose, as determined by the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending.

(1) A bankruptcy judge may hear a proceeding that is not a core proceeding but that is otherwise related to a case under title 11. In such proceeding, the bankruptcy judge shall submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court, and any final order or judgment shall be entered by the district judge after considering the bankruptcy judge's proposed findings and conclusions and after reviewing de novo those matters to which any party has timely and specifically objected.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the district court, with the consent of all the parties to the proceeding, may refer a proceeding related to a case under title 11 to a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine and to enter appropriate orders and judgments, subject to review under section 158 of this title [28 USCS § 158].

(d) The district court may withdraw, in whole or in part, any case or proceeding referred under this section, on its own motion or on timely motion of any party, for cause shown. The district court shall, on timely motion of a party, so withdraw a proceeding if the court determines that resolution of the proceeding requires consideration of both title 11 and other laws of the United States regulating organizations or activities affecting interstate commerce.

(e) If the right to a jury trial applies in a proceeding that may be heard under this section by a bankruptcy judge, the bankruptcy judge may conduct the jury trial if specially designated to exercise such jurisdiction by the district court and with the express consent of all the parties.

§ 158. Appeals

(a) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals[--]
(1) from final judgments, orders, and decrees;
(2) from interlocutory orders and decrees issued under section 1121(d) of title 11 increasing or reducing the time periods referred to in section 1121 of such title; and
(3) with leave of the court, from other interlocutory orders and decrees;

of bankruptcy judges entered in cases and proceedings referred to the bankruptcy judges under section 157 of this title [28 USCS § 157]. An appeal under this subsection shall be taken only to the district court for the judicial district in which the bankruptcy judge is serving.

(b) (1) The judicial council of a circuit shall establish a bankruptcy appellate panel service composed of bankruptcy judges of the districts in the circuit who are appointed by the judicial council in accordance with paragraph (3), to hear and determine, with the consent of all the parties, appeals under subsection (a) unless the judicial council finds that--
(A) there are insufficient judicial resources available in the circuit; or
(B) establishment of such service would result in undue delay or increased cost to parties in cases under title 11.
Not later than 90 days after making the finding, the judicial council shall submit to the Judicial Conference of the United States a report containing the factual basis of such finding.
(2) (A) A judicial council may reconsider, at any time, the finding described in paragraph (1).
(B) On the request of a majority of the district judges in a circuit for which a bankruptcy appellate panel service is established under paragraph (1), made after the expiration of the 1-year period beginning on the date such service is established, the judicial council of the circuit shall determine whether a circumstance specified in subparagraph (A) or (B) of such paragraph exists.
(C) On its own motion, after the expiration of the 3-year period beginning on the date a bankruptcy appellate panel service is established under paragraph (1), the judicial council of the circuit may determine whether a circumstance specified in subparagraph (A) or (B) of such paragraph exists.
(D) If the judicial council finds that either of such circumstances exists, the judicial council may provide for the completion of the appeals then pending before such service and the orderly termination of such service.
(3) Bankruptcy judges appointed under paragraph (1) shall be appointed and may be reappointed under such paragraph.
(4) If authorized by the Judicial Conference of the United States, the judicial councils of 2 or more circuits may establish a joint bankruptcy appellate panel comprised of bankruptcy judges from the districts within the circuits for which such panel is established, to hear and determine, upon the consent of all the parties, appeals under subsection (a) of this section.

(5) An appeal to be heard under this subsection shall be heard by a panel of 3 members of the bankruptcy appellate panel service, except that a member of such service may not hear an appeal originating in the district for which such member is appointed or designated under section 152 of this title [28 USCS § 152].

(6) Appeals may not be heard under this subsection by a panel of the bankruptcy appellate panel service unless the district judges for the district in which the appeals occur, by majority vote, have authorized such service to hear and determine appeals originating in such district.

(c) (1) Subject to subsections (b) and (d)(2), each appeal under subsection (a) shall be heard by a 3-judge panel of the bankruptcy appellate panel service established under subsection (b)(1) unless--

(A) the appellant elects at the time of filing the appeal; or

(B) any other party elects, not later than 30 days after service of notice of the appeal, to have such appeal heard by the district court.

(2) An appeal under subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be taken in the same manner as appeals in civil proceedings generally are taken to the courts of appeals from the district courts and in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules [USCS Court Rules, Bankruptcy Rules, Rule 8002].

(d) (1) The courts of appeals shall have jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees entered under subsections (a) and (b) of this section.

(2) (A) The appropriate court of appeals shall have jurisdiction of appeals described in the first sentence of subsection (a) if the bankruptcy court, the district court, or the bankruptcy appellate panel involved, acting on its own motion or on the request of a party to the judgment, order, or decree described in such first sentence, or all the appellants and appellees (if any) acting jointly, certify that--

(i) the judgment, order, or decree involves a question of law as to which there is no controlling decision of the court of appeals for the circuit or of the Supreme Court of the United States, or involves a matter of public importance;

(ii) the judgment, order, or decree involves a question of law requiring resolution of conflicting decisions; or

(iii) an immediate appeal from the judgment, order, or decree may materially advance the progress of the case or proceeding in which the appeal is taken;

and if the court of appeals authorizes the direct appeal of the judgment, order, or decree.

(B) If the bankruptcy court, the district court, or the bankruptcy appellate panel--

(i) on its own motion or on the request of a party, determines that a circumstance specified in clause (i), (ii), or (iii) of subparagraph (A) exists; or

(ii) receives a request made by a majority of the appellants and a majority of appellees (if any) to make the certification described in subparagraph (A);

then the bankruptcy court, the district court, or the bankruptcy appellate panel shall make the certification described in subparagraph (A).

(C) The parties may supplement the certification with a short statement of the basis for the certification.

(D) An appeal under this paragraph does not stay any proceeding of the bankruptcy court, the district court, or the bankruptcy appellate panel from which the appeal is taken, unless the respective bankruptcy court, district court, or bankruptcy appellate panel, or the court of appeals in which the appeal in pending, issues a stay of such proceeding pending the appeal.

(E) Any request under subparagraph (B) for certification shall be made not later than 60 days after the entry of the judgment, order, or decree.

§ 586. Duties; supervision by Attorney General

(a) Each United States trustee, within the region for which such United States trustee is appointed, shall--

(1) establish, maintain, and supervise a panel of private trustees that are eligible and available to serve as trustees in cases under chapter 7 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq.];

(2) serve as and perform the duties of a trustee in a case under title 11 when required under title 11 to serve as trustee in such a case;

(3) supervise the administration of cases and trustees in cases under chapter 7, 11, 12, 13, or 15 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 701 et seq., 1101 et seq., 1201 et seq., 1301 et seq., or 1501 et seq.] by, whenever the United States trustee considers it to be appropriate--

(i) reviewing, in accordance with procedural guidelines adopted by the Executive Office of the United States Trustee (which guidelines shall be applied uniformly by the United States trustee except when circumstances warrant different treatment), applications filed for compensation and reimbursement under section 330 of title 11; and

(ii) filing with the court comments with respect to such application and, if the United States Trustee considers it to be appropriate, objections to such application.[;]

(B) monitoring plans and disclosure statements filed in cases under chapter 11 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1101 et seq.] and filing with the court, in connection with hearings under sections 1125 and 1128 of such title, comments with respect to such plans and disclosure statements;

(C) monitoring plans filed under chapters 12 and 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1201 et seq., 1301 et seq.] and filing with the court, in connection with hearings under sections 1224, 1229, 1324, and 1329 of such title [11 USCS §§ 1224, 1229, 1324, and 1329], comments with respect to such plans;

(D) taking such action as the United States trustee deems to be appropriate to ensure that all reports, schedules, and fees required to be filed under title 11 and this title by the debtor are properly and timely filed;

(E) monitoring creditors' committees appointed under title 11;

(F) notifying the appropriate United States attorney of matters which relate to the occurrence of any action which may constitute a crime under the laws of the United States and, on the request of the United States attorney, assisting the United States attorney in carrying out prosecutions based on such action;

(G) monitoring the progress of cases under title 11 and taking such actions as the United States trustee deems to be appropriate to prevent undue delay in such progress;

(H) in small business cases (as defined in section 101 of title 11 [11 USCS § 101]), performing the additional duties specified in title 11 pertaining to such cases; and

(I) monitoring applications filed under section 327 of title 11 [11 USCS § 327] and, whenever the United States trustee deems it to be appropriate, filing with the court comments with respect to the approval of such applications;

(4) deposit or invest under section 345 of title 11 money received as trustee in cases under title 11;

(5) perform the duties prescribed for the United States trustee under title 11 and this title, and such duties consistent with title 11 and this title as the Attorney General may prescribe;

(6) make such reports as the Attorney General directs, including the results of audits performed under section 603(a) of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 [note to this section];

(7) in each of such small business cases--

(A) conduct an initial debtor interview as soon as practicable after the date of the order for relief but before the first meeting scheduled under section 341(a) of title 11 [11 USCS § 341(a)], at which time the United States trustee shall--

(i) begin to investigate the debtor's viability;

(ii) inquire about the debtor's business plan;

(iii) explain the debtor's obligations to file monthly operating reports and other required reports;

(iv) attempt to develop an agreed scheduling order; and

(v) inform the debtor of other obligations;

(B) if determined to be appropriate and advisable, visit the appropriate business premises of the debtor, ascertain the state of the debtor's books and records, and verify that the debtor has filed its tax returns; and

(C) review and monitor diligently the debtor's activities, to identify as promptly as possible whether the debtor will be unable to confirm a plan; and

(8) in any case in which the United States trustee finds material grounds for any relief under section 1112 of title 11, the United States trustee shall apply promptly after making that finding to the court for relief.

(b) If the number of cases under chapter 12 or 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1201 et seq. or 1301 et seq.] commenced in a particular region so warrants, the United States trustee for such region may, subject to the approval of the Attorney General, appoint one or more individuals to serve as standing trustee, or designate one or more assistant United States trustees to serve in cases under such chapter. The United States trustee for such region shall supervise any such individual appointed as standing trustee in the performance of the duties of standing trustee.

(c) Each United States trustee shall be under the general supervision of the Attorney General, who shall provide general coordination and assistance to the United States trustees.

(d) (1) The Attorney General shall prescribe by rule qualifications for membership on the panels established by United States trustees under paragraph (a)(1) of this section, and qualifications for appointment under subsection (b) of this section to serve as standing trustee in cases under chapter 12 or 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1201 et seq. or 1301 et seq.]. The Attorney General may not require that an individual be an attorney in order to qualify for appointment under subsection (b) of this section to serve as standing trustee in cases under chapter 12 or 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1201 et seq. or 1301 et seq.].

(2) A trustee whose appointment under subsection (a)(1) or under subsection (b) is terminated or who ceases to be assigned to cases filed under title 11, United States Code, may obtain judicial review of the final agency decision by commencing an action in the district court of the United States for the district for which the panel to which the trustee is appointed under subsection (a)(1), or in the district court of the United States for the district in which the trustee is appointed under subsection (b) resides, after first exhausting all available administrative remedies, which if the trustee so elects, shall also include an administrative hearing on the record. Unless the trustee elects to have an administrative hearing on the record, the trustee shall be deemed to have exhausted all administrative remedies for purposes of this paragraph if the agency fails to make a final agency decision within 90 days after the trustee requests administrative remedies. The Attorney General shall prescribe procedures to implement this paragraph. The decision of the agency shall be affirmed by the district court unless it is unreasonable and without cause based on the administrative record before the agency.

(1) The Attorney General, after consultation with a United States trustee that has appointed an individual under subsection (b) of this section to serve as standing trustee in cases under chapter 12 or 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1201 et seq. or 1301 et seq.], shall fix--

(A) a maximum annual compensation for such individual consisting of--

(i) an amount not to exceed the highest annual rate of basic pay in effect for level V of the Executive Schedule; and

(ii) the cash value of employment benefits comparable to the employment benefits provided by the United States to individuals who are employed by the United States at the same rate of basic pay to perform similar services during the same period of time; and

(B) a percentage fee not to exceed--

(i) in the case of a debtor who is not a family farmer, ten percent; or

(ii) in the case of a debtor who is a family farmer, the sum of--

(I) not to exceed ten percent of the payments made under the plan of such debtor, with respect to payments in an aggregate amount not to exceed $ 450,000; and

(II) three percent of payments made under the plan of such debtor, with respect to payments made after the aggregate amount of payments made under the plan exceeds $ 450,000;

based on such maximum annual compensation and the actual, necessary expenses incurred by such individual as standing trustee.

(2) Such individual shall collect such percentage fee from all payments received by such individual under plans in the cases under chapter 12 or 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1201 et seq. or 1301 et seq.] for which such individual serves as standing trustee. Such individual shall pay to the United States trustee, and the United States trustee shall deposit in the United States Trustee System Fund--

(A) any amount by which the actual compensation of such individual exceeds 5 per centum upon all payments received under plans in cases under chapter 12 or 13 of title 11 [11 USCS §§ 1201 et seq. or 1301 et seq.] for which such individual serves as standing trustee; and

(B) any amount by which the percentage for all such cases exceeds--

(i) such individual's actual compensation for such cases, as adjusted under subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1); plus

(ii) the actual, necessary expenses incurred by such individual as standing trustee in such cases. Subject to the approval of the Attorney General, any or all of the interest earned from the deposit of payments under plans by such individual may be utilized to pay actual, necessary expenses without regard to the percentage limitation contained in subparagraph (d)(1)(B) of this section.

(3) After first exhausting all available administrative remedies, an individual appointed under subsection (b) may obtain judicial review of final agency action to deny a claim of actual, necessary expenses under this subsection by commencing an action in the district court of the United States for the district where the individual resides. The decision of the agency shall be affirmed by the district court unless it is unreasonable and without cause based upon the administrative record before the agency.

(4) The Attorney General shall prescribe procedures to implement this subsection.

(f) (1) The United States trustee for each district is authorized to contract with auditors to perform audits in cases designated by the United States trustee, in accordance with the procedures established under section 603(a) of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 [note to this section].

(2) (A) The report of each audit referred to in paragraph (1) shall be filed with the court and transmitted to the United States trustee. Each report shall clearly and conspicuously specify any material misstatement of income or expenditures or of assets identified by the person performing the audit. In any case in which a material misstatement of income or expenditures or of assets has been reported, the clerk of the district court (or the clerk of the bankruptcy court if one is certified under section 156(b) of this title [11 USCS § 156(b)]) shall give notice of the misstatement to the creditors in the case.

(B) If a material misstatement of income or expenditures or of assets is reported, the United States trustee shall--

(i) report the material misstatement, if appropriate, to the United States Attorney pursuant to section 3057 of title 18 [18 USCS § 3057]; and

(ii) advisable, take appropriate action, including but not limited to commencing an adversary proceeding to revoke the debtor's discharge pursuant to section 727(d) of title 11 [11 USCS § 727(d)].

Explanatory notes:

The bracketed semicolon has been inserted in subsec. (a)(3)(A)(ii) to indicate the punctuation probably intended by Congress.

Effective date of section:

This section took effect on October 1, 1979, pursuant to § 402(c) of Act Nov. 6, 1978, P.L. 95-598, which appears as 11 USCS prec § 101 note.

Amendments:

1986. Act Oct. 27, 1986 (effective 30 days after enactment on 10/27/86, and applicable as provided by § 302 of such Act, which appears as 28 USCS § 581 note), in subsec. (a), in the introductory matter, substituted "the region for which such United States trustee is appointed" for "his district", in para. (3), substituted "by, whenever the United States trustee considers it to be appropriate--" for the semicolon, and added subparas. (A)-(H), and in para. (5), inserted "and this title, and such duties consistent with title 11 and this title as the Attorney General may prescribe".

"(b) If the number of cases under chapter 13 of title 11 commenced in a particular judicial district so warrant, the United States trustee for such district may, subject to the approval of the Attorney General, appoint one or more individuals to serve as standing trustee, or designate one or more assistant United States trustee, in cases under such chapter. The United States trustee for such district shall supervise any such individual appointed as standing trustee in the performance of the duties of standing trustee.";

"(d) The Attorney General shall prescribe by rule qualifications for membership on the panels established by United States trustees under subsection (a)(1) of this section, and qualifications for appointment under subsection (b) of this section to serve as standing trustee in cases under chapter 13 of title 11. The Attorney General may not require that an individual be an attorney in order to qualify for appointment under subsection (b) of this section to serve as standing trustee in cases under chapter 13 of title 11.";

§ 2412. Costs and fees

(1) Except as otherwise specifically provided by statute, a judgment for costs, as enumerated in section 1920 of this title [28 USCS § 1920], but not including the fees and expenses of attorneys, may be awarded to the prevailing party in any civil action brought by or against the United States or any agency or any official of the United States acting in his or her official capacity in any court having jurisdiction of such action. A judgment for costs when taxed against the United States shall, in an amount established by statute, court rule, or order, be limited to reimbursing in whole or in part the prevailing party for the costs incurred by such party in the litigation.

(2) A judgment for costs, when awarded in favor of the United States in an action brought by the United States, may include an amount equal to the filing fee prescribed under section 1914(a) of this title [28 USCS § 1914(a)]. The preceding sentence shall not be construed as requiring the United States to pay any filing fee.

(b) Unless expressly prohibited by statute, a court may award reasonable fees and expenses of attorneys, in addition to the costs which may be awarded pursuant to subsection (a), to the prevailing party in any civil action brought by or against the United States or any agency or any official of the United States acting in his or her official capacity in any court having jurisdiction of such action. The United States shall be liable for such fees and expenses to the same extent that any other party would be liable under the common law or under the terms of any statute which specifically provides for such an award.

(c) (1) Any judgment against the United States or any agency and any official of the United States acting in his or her official capacity for costs pursuant to subsection (a) shall be paid as provided in sections 2414 and 2517 of this title [28 USCS §§ 2414] and shall be in addition to any relief provided in the judgment.

(2) Any judgment against the United States or any agency and any official of the United States acting in his or her official capacity for fees and expenses of attorneys pursuant to subsection (b) shall be paid as provided in sections 2414 and 2517 of this title [28 USCS §§ 2414 and 2517], except that if the basis for the award is a finding that the United States acted in bad faith, then the award shall be paid by any agency found to have acted in bad faith and shall be in addition to any relief provided in the judgment.

(1) (A) Except as otherwise specifically provided by statute, a court shall award to a prevailing party other than the United States fees and other expenses, in addition to any costs awarded pursuant to subsection (a), incurred by that party in any civil action (other than cases sounding in tort), including proceedings for judicial review of agency action, brought by or against the United States in any court having jurisdiction of that action, unless the court finds that the position of the United States was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust.

(B) A party seeking an award of fees and other expenses shall, within thirty days of final judgment in the action, submit to the court an application for fees and other expenses which shows that the party is a prevailing party and is eligible to receive an award under this subsection, and the amount sought, including an itemized statement from any attorney or expert witness representing or appearing in behalf of the party stating the actual time expended and the rate at which fees and other expenses were computed. The party shall also allege that the position of the United States was not substantially justified. Whether or not the position of the United States was substantially justified shall be determined on the basis of the record (including the record with respect to the action or failure to act by the agency upon which the civil action is based) which is made in the civil action for which fees and other expenses are sought.

(C) The court, in its discretion, may reduce the amount to be awarded pursuant to this subsection, or deny an award, to the extent that the prevailing party during the course of the proceedings engaged in conduct which unduly and unreasonably protracted the final resolution of the matter in controversy.

(D) If, in a civil action brought by the United States or a proceeding for judicial review of an adversary adjudication described in section 504(a)(4) of title 5, the demand by the United States is substantially in excess of the judgment finally obtained by the United States and is unreasonable when compared with such judgment, under the facts and circumstances of the case, the court shall award to the party the fees and other expenses related to defending against the excessive demand, unless the party has committed a willful violation of law or otherwise acted in bad faith, or special circumstances make an award unjust. Fees and expenses awarded under this subparagraph shall be paid only as a consequence of appropriations provided in advance.

(2) For the purposes of this subsection--

(A) "fees and other expenses" includes the reasonable expenses of expert witnesses, the reasonable cost of any study, analysis, engineering report, test, or project which is found by the court to be necessary for the preparation of the party's case, and reasonable attorney fees (The amount of fees awarded under this subsection shall be based upon prevailing market rates for the kind and quality of the services furnished, except that (i) no expert witness shall be compensated at a rate in excess of the highest rate of compensation for expert witnesses paid by the United States; and (ii) attorney fees shall not be awarded in excess of $ 125 per hour unless the court determines that an increase in the cost of living or a special factor, such as the limited availability of qualified attorneys for the proceedings involved, justifies a higher fee.);

(B) "party" means (i) an individual whose net worth did not exceed $ 2,000,000 at the time the civil action was filed, or (ii) any owner of an unincorporated business, or any partnership, corporation, association, unit of local government, or organization, the net worth of which did not exceed $ 7,000,000 at the time the civil action was filed, and which had not more than 500 employees at the time the civil action was filed; except that an organization described in section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 [1986] (26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3)) exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of such Code, or a cooperative association as defined in section 15(a) of the Agricultural Marketing Act (12 U.S.C. 1141j(a)), may be a party regardless of the net worth of such organization or cooperative association or for purposes of subsection (d)(1)(D), a small entity as defined in section 601 of title 5;

(C) "United States" includes any agency and any official of the United States acting in his or her official capacity;

(D) "position of the United States" means, in addition to the position taken by the United States in the civil action, the action or failure to act by the agency upon which the civil action is based; except that fees and expenses may not be awarded to a party for any portion of the litigation in which the party has unreasonably protracted the proceedings;

(E) "civil action brought by or against the United States" includes an appeal by a party, other than the United States, from a decision of a contracting officer rendered pursuant to a disputes clause in a contract with the Government or pursuant to the Contract Disputes Act of 1978;

(F) "court" includes the United States Claims Court [United States Court of Federal Claims] and the United States Court of Appeals for Veterans Claims;

(G) "final judgment" means a judgment that is final and not appealable, and includes an order of settlement;

(H) "prevailing party", in the case of eminent domain proceedings, means a party who obtains a final judgment (other than by settlement), exclusive of interest, the amount of which is at least as close to the highest valuation of the property involved that is attested to at trial on behalf of the property owner as it is to the highest valuation of the property involved that is attested to at trial on behalf of the Government; and

(I) "demand" means the express demand of the United States which led to the adversary adjudication, but shall not include a recitation of the maximum statutory penalty (i) in the complaint, or (ii) elsewhere when accompanied by an express demand for a lesser amount.

(3) In awarding fees and other expenses under this subsection to a prevailing party in any action for judicial review of an adversary adjudication, as defined in subsection (b)(1)(C) of section 504 of title 5, United States Code, or an adversary adjudication subject to the Contract Disputes Act of 1978, the court shall include in that award fees and other expenses to the same extent authorized in subsection (a) of such section, unless the court finds that during such adversary adjudication the position of the United States was substantially justified, or that special circumstances make an award unjust.

(4) Fees and other expenses awarded under this subsection to a party shall be paid by any agency over which the party prevails from any funds made available to the agency by appropriation or otherwise.

(e) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any costs, fees, and other expenses in connection with any proceeding to which section 7430 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 [1986] [26 USCS § 7430] applies (determined without regard to subsections (b) and (f) of such section [26 USCS § 7430(b), (f)]). Nothing in the preceding sentence shall prevent the awarding under subsection (a) of section 2412 of title 28, United States Code, of costs enumerated in section 1920 of such title (as in effect on October 1, 1981).

(f) If the United States appeals an award of costs or fees and other expenses made against the United States under this section and the award is affirmed in whole or in part, interest shall be paid on the amount of the award as affirmed. Such interest shall be computed at the rate determined under section 1961(a) of this title [28 USCS § 1961(a)[, and shall run from the date of the award through the day before the date of the mandate of affirmance.

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Prior law and revision:

Based on title 28, U.S.C., 1940 ed., §§ 258, 931(a) (March 3, 1911, ch 231, § 152, 36 Stat. 1138; Aug. 2, 1946, ch 753, § 410(a), 60 Stat. 843).

Section consolidates the last sentence of section 931(a) of title 28, U.S.C., 1940 ed., with section 258 of said title 28. For other provisions of said section 931(a), see Distribution Table.

Subsection (a) is new. It follows the well-known common-law rule that a sovereign is not liable for costs unless specific provision for such liability is made by law. This is a corollary to the rule that a sovereign cannot be sued without its consent.

Many enactments of Congress relating to fees and costs contain specific exceptions as to the liability of the United States. (See, for example, section 548 of title 28, U.S.C., 1940 ed.) A uniform rule, embodied in this section, will make such specific exceptions unnecessary.

Subsection (b) incorporates section 258 of title 28, U.S.C., 1940 ed.

Subsection (c) incorporates the costs provisions of section 931(a) of title 28, U.S.C., 1940 ed.

STATEMENT OF BASIS FOR APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This matter comes before the Court on appeal from the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, Newport News Division, of a final order denying the Motion to Dismiss "'Voluntary' Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Under 11 U.S.C. § 301 & §303 and for Punitive Damages & Sanctions," filed October 9, 2009 as docket entry #58 by Jonathan A. Loy ("Mr. Loy") in Case No. 09-51379-FJS. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, Newport News Division has jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §158(a).

ISSUES PRESENTED

Did the bankruptcy court properly deny Mr. Loy's motion to dismiss a chapter 7 bankruptcy petition filed by the representative of Mr. Loy's foreign bankruptcy estate?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In an appeal taken from a bankruptcy court order, a district court reviews a bankruptcy court's conclusions of law de novo and its findings of fact for clear error. See In re Merry-Go-Round Enters., Inc., 400 F.3d 219, 224 (4th Cir. 2005).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

As an initial matter, this case has two procedural infirmities. First Mr. Loy has presented an argument to this Court on the construction of chapter 15, title 11, U.S. Code (the "Bankruptcy Code") that he made twice in the bankruptcy court below. Second, seven of the nine arguments he makes are forfeited because he did not make them in the motion that is on appeal. Although neither res judicata or forfeiture alone justifies the dismissal of Mr. Loy's appeal, collectively they do. Because Mr. Loy's chapter 15 argument is res judicata and his other arguments are foreclosed, there is nothing for this Court to review.

On the merits, this is a case about the application of chapter 15 of the United States Bankruptcy Code that "provides effective mechanisms for dealing with cases of cross-border insolvency . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 1501. The voluntary bankruptcy case at issue here was commenced under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code by Jeremiah Anthony O'Sullivan ("English Trustee"), the official receiver and trustee of the property of Jonathan Loy in an English insolvency proceeding. In re Loy, 380 B.R. 154, 158 (Bankr. E.D.Va. 2007) (St. John, J). The English Trustee acted in his capacity as foreign representative of a foreign main proceeding that had been recognized by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Virginia in a separate case. Id. at 163 (recognizing Mr. Loy's English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding).

Since the commencement of the chapter 7 case, Mr. Loy has filed a series of motions seeking dismissal of the case on a variety of theories. Currently before this court on appeal is the bankruptcy court's order denying Mr. Loy's Motion to Dismiss "'Voluntary' Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Under 11 U.S.C. §301 & §303 and for Punitive Damages & Sanctions," filed October 9, 2009. [Dkt. #58]. As set forth below in greater detail, Mr. Loy's motion was properly denied on the merits.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

In this case, Mr. Loy has filed five motions to dismiss the chapter 7 bankruptcy filed by the English Trustee. The bankruptcy court has denied four of those motions; the fifth is still pending below. Mr. Loy appeals the denial of his fourth motion to dismiss, which he filed on October 9, 2009 [Dkt #58] and which the bankruptcy court denied on February 10, 2010 [Dkt. #155]. This is the only order that he has appealed.

Prior to October 2007, Mr. Loy was declared a bankrupt under the laws of England. Loy, 380 B.R. at 158. The English Trustee serves, under English bankruptcy law, as the trustee for Mr.

Loy's English bankruptcy estate. Id. On October 28, 2007, the English Trustee petitioned the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia for an order recognizing Mr. Loy's English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding under 11 U.S.C. §1517(a)(1). Id. Mr. Loy opposed the relief requested by the English Trustee. An evidentiary hearing was conducted. Mr. Loy was provided both notice and opportunity to participate, which he did. Loy, 380 B.R. at 154. On December 18, 2007, the bankruptcy court granted the relief requested by the English Trustee, and entered an order recognizing Mr. Loy's English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding. (Appellant's Des., Item 1, pp. 4-6).[1]

On August 26, 2007, the English Trustee filed, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §301, a voluntary petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code in his capacity as foreign representative of a recognized foreign main proceeding. (Appellant's Des., Item 1). See 11 U.S.C. §1511(a)(2) (permitting foreign representative to commence a case under 11 U.S.C. §301 upon recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding). The case was docketed as No. 09-51379.

On September 4, 2009, Mr. Loy moved to dismiss the case. [Dkt. #19]. On November 18, 2009, the bankruptcy court denied that motion. [Dkt. #90]. On September 17, 2009, Mr. Loy filed a second motion to dismiss, claiming the filing was barred by various statutes of limitation. [Dkt. #30]. Mr. Loy later withdrew this motion, as reflected in the bankruptcy court's order entered January 15, 2010. [Dkt. #122]. On October 1, 2009, Mr. Loy again moved to dismiss the case, citing his failure to obtain pre-petition credit counseling as required by 11 U.S.C. §109(h). [Dkt. #53]. That motion was also denied on November 18, 2009. [Dkt. #91]. Mr. Loy did not appeal any of those decisions.

[1] Appellant's Des. refers to Mr. Loy's designation filed on April 14, 2010 [Dkt. #184]. Citations to the record refer to the bankruptcy court's docket unless otherwise noted.

On October 9, 2009, Mr. Loy filed a fourth motion seeking dismissal of his chapter 7 bankruptcy. [Dkt. #58]. The bankruptcy court denied it on February 10, 2010. [Dkt. #152]. The denial of this motion forms the only basis of Mr. Loy's current appeal. See Notice of Appeal [Dkt# 163].

On October 29, 2009, Mr. Loy filed a fifth motion seeking dismissal of his case. [Dkt. #75]. It is in the context of this fifth motion that Mr. Loy raises, for the first time, most of the arguments he makes to this Court. The October 29th motion remains pending in the bankruptcy court, and has not yet been reduced to a final, appealable order.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

1. The arguments raised in Mr. Loy's current appeal from the February 10 order denying his fourth motion to dismiss are not properly before this Court. In that motion he made one argument based on the construction of section 1511 of the Bankruptcy Code. The bankruptcy court had already rejected that argument on November 18, 2009. Therefore the other arguments he raises to this Court are forfeited. In addition, some are not ripe for consideration, as the bankruptcy court has not yet ruled on them.[2] The following chart illustrates the issues raised by Mr. Loy in his appeal brief and the procedural reasons they are inappropriate for consideration by this Court in this appeal.

[2] Mr. Loy has also raised his due process concerns in a separate action pending before this Court. See Jonathan Loy and Susan J. Loy v. United States of America, Case No. 4:10cv00017-RAJ-TEM (Filed February 17, 2010). On May 26, 2010, the United States moved for dismissal of that Complaint, or, in the alternative, for summary judgment in favor of the United States.

Issue Raised by Mr. Loy	Argued in Motions Denied Nov. 18, 2009?	Argued in Motion On Appeal?	Argued in Oct. 29 Motion Pending Below?	Reason This Court Cannot Review
Under §1511, can a foreign involuntary case be brought as a voluntary case in US Bankruptcy Courts?	Yes	Yes	No	Res Judicata

2. Even if Mr. Loy's arguments are appropriately raised in this appeal, they are without merit. Section 1511 expressly permits the English Trustee to file a voluntary chapter 7 bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. §301 on Mr. Loy's behalf. The plain meaning of section 1511 does not require the English Trustee to have filed an involuntary case under 11 U.S.C. §303. The procedural anomalies that Mr. Loy stresses in his brief are insufficient to override the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. §1511.

Mr. Loy's second core argument, that he has been denied due process, is unsupported by the facts in the record. Mr. Loy was given sufficient due process in the separate chapter 15 bankruptcy proceeding that preceded this case. After full litigation, the bankruptcy court recognized Mr. Loy's English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding. The English Trustee obtained the right to file a petition under 11 U.S.C. §301 upon recognition of Mr. Loy's English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding. No further notice was due.

Mr. Loy's secondary arguments are also without merit. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court properly denied Mr. Loy's motion to dismiss. This Court should either dismiss this case because the issues presented are either res judicata or forfeited. If this Court reaches the merits, the bankruptcy court's order should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. This Appeal Is Not Properly Before this Court Because Mr. Loy Has Had a Full and Fair Opportunity to Litigate Them in a Prior Motion and Did Not Appeal the Order Denying that Motion.

The only issue that is before this Court is whether the bankruptcy court properly denied Mr. Loy's fourth motion to dismiss, filed on October 9, 2010. [Dkt. #58 (motion); Dkt. #152, #155 (original and corrected dismissal orders)]. The history of the case up until October 9 demonstrates that this appeal is improperly before this Court.

Mr. Loy filed his first dismissal motion on September 4, 2009. [Dkt. #19]. The bankruptcy court denied it on November 18, 2009. [Dkt. #90]. His second was filed on September 17, 2009, and later withdrawn in open court. [Dkt. #30, #118]. His third was filed on October 1, 2009 and also denied on November 18, 2009. [Dkt. #53, #91]. After filing the motion to dismiss currently on appeal, he submitted a fifth on October 29. [Dkt. #75]. It remains pending in the bankruptcy court.

Mr. Loy's brief to this Court is a compendium of the arguments he made in the five motions that he filed and argued below. He asks this Court to consider anew arguments the bankruptcy court ruled upon in prior orders that Mr. Loy did not appeal. In addition, he asks this Court to consider arguments that he did not raise in the October 9 motion, which is currently before this Court, some of which are still awaiting a decision in the bankruptcy court. Therefore, his appeal violates at least three basic rules of appellate procedure prohibiting reviewing courts from considering issues that were not properly appealed, that were not argued below, and which have not received final adjudication in a lower court. The procedural infirmities provide this Court with ample grounds to dismiss.

A. This Court should dismiss this case because Mr. Loy raised his argument that the English trustee could not file this case as a voluntary bankruptcy in an earlier motion to dismiss that the bankruptcy court denied on November 18, 2009 and that Mr. Loy did not appeal.

Although Mr. Loy has raised the argument that the English Trustee cannot file this case as a voluntary bankruptcy in three motions in the bankruptcy court, his opportunity to argue that point was triggered on September 4 when he filed his first motion to dismiss. [Dkt. #19]. The bankruptcy court denied that motion on November 18, 2009 and Mr. Loy never appealed it. His later attempt to make the same argument, specifically his October 9 motion now on appeal, was res judicata below.[3] Therefore, he may not raise it now.

When Mr. Loy filed his first motion to dismiss his chapter 7 case on September 4, 2009 he opened a stand-alone contested matter. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014; In re Kempner, 152 B.R. 37 (D.

[3] Under modern terminology, res judicata incorporates two concepts: claim preclusion and issue preclusion (collateral estoppel). "Claim preclusion prevents a party from suing on a claim which has been previously litigated to a final judgment by that party or such party's privies and precludes the assertion by such parties of any legal theory, cause of action, or defense which could have been asserted in that action. Issue preclusion prevents relitigation of issues actually litigated and necessary for the outcome of the prior suit, even if the current action involves different claims." 18 Moore's Federal Practice § 131.10 (italics in original). As both concepts are implicated in this case, so that the general term "res judicata" is used.

Del. 1993). Contested matters are governed by the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. In a contested matter, relief is requested by motion, and reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing must be afforded to the party against whom relief is sought. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(a). In a contested matter, the judge may make findings of fact and conclusions of law. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7052(a)(3) (incorporated under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(c). A judgment is entered in a contested matter, from which an appeal lies. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7054 (incorporated under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(c). An appeal must be filed within 14 days. 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002. Adjudication of the contested matter gave Mr. Loy his opportunity to litigate the question of whether the English Trustee could file a voluntary chapter 7 case. See Hicks, Muse & Co. v. Brandt (In re Healthco Int'l., Inc.), 136 F.3d 45, 53 n.9 (1st Cir. 1998) ("[R]es judicata normally bars subsequent litigation of claim which could have been litigated in earlier contested matter or adversary proceeding.").

It is hornbook law that a litigant is bound by a court's final decision.[4] The doctrine of res judicata forecloses "the relitigation of issues of fact or law that are identical to issues which have been actually determined and necessarily decided in prior litigation in which the party against whom [preclusion] is asserted had a full and fair opportunity to litigate." Sedlack v. Braswell Serv. Gp., 134 F.3d 219, 224 (4th Cir. 1998) (quotation omitted). Res judicata applies in bankruptcy proceedings. First Union Commercial Corp. v. Nelson, Mullins, Riley &

[4] Finality in the bankruptcy context "has traditionally been applied 'in a more pragmatic and less technical way . . . than in other situations.'" A.H. Robins Co., Inc. v. Piccinin, 788 F.2d 994, 1009 (4th Cir. 1986) (quotation omitted). Rather, in bankruptcy an order is final if it "finally dispose[s] of a discrete dispute within a larger case." In re Computer Learning Centers, Inc., 407 F.3d 656, 660 (4th Cir. 2005) (quoting In re Saco Local Dev. Corp., 711 F.2d 441, 444 (1st Cir.1983) (Breyer, J.)). The bankruptcy court's order rejected Mr. Loy's assertion that the English Trustee had to proceed in an involuntary case under section 303 of the Bankruptcy Code. That determination ended a discrete dispute within the larger case.

Scarborough (In re Varat Enters.), 81 F.3d 1310, 1315 (4th Cir. 1996). It exists to prevent a debtor from re-litigating an issue once it has been "actually and necessarily determined by a court having jurisdiction in the case." Turshen v. Chapman, 823 F.2d, 839 (4th Cir. 1987) (affirming bankruptcy court's refusal to hear a debtor's claim for breach of fiduciary duty against the trustee after the bankruptcy court determined that the trustee's conduct did not warrant removal).

Mr. Loy argued in his initial motion to dismiss, filed September 4, 2009, that the English Trustee was committing "blatant fraud . . . by converting an English involuntary bankruptcy in the United Kingdom into an [sic] voluntary bankruptcy in the United States." Sept. 4 Motion at 4, ¶ 14) [Dkt #19] (Appellant's Des., Item 7). He also stated that "[t]he statute [title 11] clearly states that involuntary cases, as in the case of Jonathan Loy, are to be commenced under 11 U.S.C. § 303." Id. at 5, ¶ 17 [Dkt #19]. As relief, Mr. Loy requested that the chapter 7 case be dismissed and that he be granted costs, damages, and punitive damages.

The chapter 7 Trustee and the English Trustee both filed briefs in opposition to Mr. Loy's motion to dismiss. [Dkt #67, #68]. The bankruptcy court held a hearing and denied the motion at a hearing on October 27, 2009. [Dkt. #71]. Mr. Loy noted his objections on November 5, 2009. Mr. Loy had a full and fair opportunity to litigate his claims.

The bankruptcy court entered the order on November 17, 2009, [Dkt. #90], which started Mr. Loy's window of time to appeal. Faragalla v. Access Receivable Mgmt. (In re Faragalla), 422 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir. 2005). Mr. Loy never appealed that order. It is too late for him to do so now. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a); Veltman v. Whetzal, 93 F.3d 517 (8th Cir. 1996) (holding a reviewing court does not have subject matter jurisdiction over an untimely appeal).

In his current appeal, Mr. Loy requests that this Court consider whether a "foreign trustee" can place an individual in voluntary bankruptcy in the United States if that same individual was "forced into involuntary bankruptcy in a foreign proceeding." Compare Appellant Br. at 1, ¶ 2; 9-11, ¶¶ 21-23 with Sept. 4 Motion at 4, ¶14 (arguing that a "Foreign Representative" cannot convert an English involuntary bankruptcy into a voluntary bankruptcy in the United States). He also argues again that an individual cannot be placed in bankruptcy against his will under the provisions of §301 of the Bankruptcy Code. Compare Appellant Br. at 14-15, ¶¶ 34-35 with Sept. 4 Motion at 4, ¶¶ 17-18.

This Court should dismiss this appeal because the issue was res judicata in the single order of November 18 from which Mr. Loy appeals and because Mr. Loy failed to appeal the bankruptcy court's earlier order on the same issue. [Dkt. #90].

B. At a minimum, seven of the nine arguments Mr. Loy makes in his brief are forfeited because he did not raise them below.[5]

In his October 9 motion, the only one before this Court, Mr. Loy made a single argument that the English receiver cannot place him in a voluntary chapter 7 case. In his brief to this Court, he makes nine separate arguments, only two of which pertain to his motion below or the decision of the bankruptcy court on the record. See Hr'g Trans. at 1-6 (Feb. 10, 2010) (Appellee's Des., Item 20, pp. 1-6). Specifically, Mr. Loy raises the following arguments for the first time on appeal:

[5] The transcript of the January 26, 2010 hearing at which Mr. Loy's October 9 motion was argued has not been designated. The United States Trustee will file a motion to have the transcript designated for the purpose full disclosure to the Court. To the extent, however, that Mr. Loy may have argued points at the hearing that he asks this Court to consider, they would not be properly before this Court because they bankruptcy court did not address them on February 10, 2010 when ruling on the October 9 motion. Hr'g Trans. at 1-6 (Feb. 10, 2010) (Appellee's Des., Item 20, pp. 1-6). Arguments not considered by a court are generally not reviewed on appeal. Exxon Shipping Co. v. Baker, 128 S. Ct. 2605, 2618 (2008).

1. Filing of a voluntary petition based on an involuntary foreign case violates UNCITRAL insolvency regulations;

2. The English Trustee violated Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 when he filed a voluntary petition on behalf of Mr. Loy;

3. The voluntary petition breaches the Fifth Amendment;

4. The voluntary petition violates public policy;

5. The voluntary petition violates 11 U.S.C. §109(h);

6. The voluntary petition violates 11 U.S.C. §521; and

7. The forced voluntary petition violates principles of equity.

It is axiomatic that a reviewing court may not consider new arguments raised for the first time on appeal, absent extraordinary circumstances. Singleton v. Wulff, 428 U.S. 106, 120, 96 S.Ct. 2868, 2877 (1976); United States v. One 1971 Mercedes Benz 2-Door Coupe, 542 F.2d 912, 915 (4th Cir. 1976). Mr. Loy's three-page motion on appeal does not mention UNCITRAL, Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011, the Fifth Amendment, public policy, sections 109(h) and 521 of title 11, or make any equitable arguments. Thus, these arguments are waived. First Va. Banks, Inc. v. BP Exploration & Oil Inc., 206 F.3d 404, 407 n.1 (4th Cir. 2000) (declining to consider issues raised for first time on appeal); Dean v. McDow, 299 B.R. 133, 138 (E.D. Va. 2003) (failure to raise non-jurisdictional issue before the bankruptcy court operates as a waiver of the right to have the issue heard on appeal); Edwards v. City of Goldsboro, 178 F.3d 231, 241 n.6 (4th Cir. 1999) (noting that issues not briefed or argued are deemed abandoned).

Mr. Loy's October 9 motion alludes to "credit counseling" and "prescribed procedures," but that is insufficient to preserve his §109 and §521 arguments on appeal. Beaudett v. City of Hampton, 775 F.2d 1274, 1278 (4th Cir. 1985) ("fleeting references" insufficient to preserve questions on appeal) (discussing limits of leniency given to pro se litigants).

Many of Mr. Loy’s arguments on appeal do appear in his October 29 motion [Dkt. #75] The bankruptcy court has addressed some issues raised in that motion but others remain pending below.[6] Mr. Loy’s Notice of Appeal does not refer to his October 29 Motion [Dkt. #75]. Nor could it, as there has been not final judgment on that motion entered below.[7] Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7054 (made applicable by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(c)).

Mr. Loy may not now augment his single-issue motion below with new theories and further-developed arguments. This Court is not an appropriate forum for the debtor to refine his arguments. See Tele-Communications, Inc. v. C.I.R., 104 F.3d 1229, 1233 (10th Cir. 1997) (stating that the appellate court “should not be considered a ‘second shot’ forum . . . where secondary, back-up theories may be mounted for the first time”). Instead, litigants must “‘give it everything they’ve got’ at the trial level” before their arguments may be raised on appeal. Id. (citation omitted). Mr. Loy cannot use one thinly-argued narrow motion as a platform to bring multiple issues to the attention of this Court.

Starting on September 4, 2009, Mr. Loy filed a motion to dismiss, made his best legal case, and had the benefit of a hearing. He cannot simply re-start the process below by filing another motion to dismiss based on the same facts and the same, or slightly refined, legal theories and then appeal that later order to get around jurisdictional deadlines. Mr. Loy's first motion to dismiss was denied on the same arguments raised in his brief on appeal. He failed to appeal the denial of his first motion to dismiss. He cannot re-litigate it in this appeal.

[6] The United States Trustee's response to the Debtor's October 29 motion is contained in the record of this appeal. (Appellee's Des., Item 15).

[7] At the February 10, 2010 hearing in which the Court denied Mr. Loy’s motion that is the subject of this appeal, the Court set Mr. Loy’s October 29 motion for further hearing and directed the Chapter 7 Trustee to file a status report. (Feb. 10, 2010 Transcript) (Appellee’s Des., Item 20, p. 24) (“I’m going to be in Newport News on Friday the 19th, and I will expect a status report at 10:30 as to where we stand. I will not make a final disposition on docket item Number 75 unless – until I have sufficient information to determine whether there is a bankruptcy purpose to be served by continued administration of this case.”).

II. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Denied Mr. Loy's Motion to Dismiss on the Merits Because the Case Was Commenced Properly under 11 U.S.C. §301 by a Foreign Representative in a Recognized Foreign Main Proceeding, Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §1511(a)(2).

As demonstrated above, this appeal should be dismissed because Mr. Loy either did not raise the issues below, or they are still pending, and he was collaterally estopped from arguing that the English Trustee had to file an involuntary case in the October 9 motion that he appealed. Should the Court find otherwise, the United States Trustee explains below why Mr. Loy is also incorrect on the merits.

A. The English Trustee's filing of the voluntary Chapter 7 bankruptcy petition is expressly permitted by 11 U.S.C. §1511(a)(2).

The only argument that Mr. Loy made in the motion that he has appealed to this Court is that the English Trustee improperly commenced Mr. Loy's chapter 7 bankruptcy by filing a voluntary petition. Mr. Loy is incorrect as a matter of law.

As the bankruptcy court found below, the English Trustee filed the petition in his capacity as a foreign representative of a foreign main proceeding recognized by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. See Hr'g Trans. (Feb. 10, 2010) (Appellee's Des., Item 20, pp.3-4); Loy, 380 B.R. at 163 (recognizing Mr. Loy's English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding). The English Trustee filed the petition on behalf of Mr. Loy, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §1511(a)(2), which states: "(a) Upon recognition, a foreign representative may commence – (1) an involuntary case under section 303; or (2) a voluntary case under section 301 or 302, if the foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding." Here, Mr. Loy's foreign proceeding has been recognized as a foreign main proceeding. Accordingly, the plain language of section 1511 permits the English Trustee's filing of this voluntary case, pursuant to section 301.

B. The English Trustee was not required to file an involuntary petition upon recognition of the debtor's English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding.

Section 1511 expressly permits the foreign representative of a recognized foreign main proceeding to commence a voluntary case under 11 U.S.C. §301.[8] Nevertheless, Mr. Loy argues that the bankruptcy court should have dismissed the filing because the English Trustee chose to file a voluntary case under section 301 instead of an involuntary case under section 303. Mr. Loy argues that the English Trustee should have proceeded with a section 303 involuntary case because Mr. Loy's participation in the case is "involuntary" in the literal sense, and because he contends his English bankruptcy was involuntary.

Mr. Loy's argument ignores the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. §1511, and seeks to read additional unwritten requirements into the statute. Nothing in the United States Bankruptcy Code supports this argument. Mr. Loy provides no authority to support it, other than a reference to the UNCITRAL Model Cross-Border Insolvency Law, from which Chapter 15 of the United States Bankruptcy Code was partially derived, and the law of the United Kingdom. Appellant's Br. at 11. Neither the UNCITRAL model law, nor the law of the United Kingdom govern this matter. Section 1511(a) of the United States Bankruptcy Code does, and it is clear. "The plain meaning of legislation should be conclusive, except in the 'rare cases [in which] the literal application of a statute will produce a result demonstrably at odds with the intentions of its drafters.'" United States v. Ron Pair Enters., 489 U.S. 235, 242 (1989) (quotation omitted). Ron Pair requires this Court to apply the 'plain meaning' rule to 11 U.S.C. §1511, unless Mr. Loy can demonstrate that the result is contrary to the result Congress intended. See In re Sunterra Corp. (RCI Tech. Corp. v. Sunterra Corp.), 361 F.3d 257, 269 (4th Cir. 2004) (stating "a federal court must 'determine the meaning of the statute passed by Congress, not whether wisdom or logic suggests that Congress could have done better") (quoting Sigmon Coal Co. v. Apfel, 226 F.3d 291, 308 (4th Cir. 2000), aff'd sub nom., Barnhart v. Sigmon Coal Co., 534 U.S. 438, 122 S.Ct. 941, 151 L.Ed.2d 908 (2002)). Mr. Loy's reliance on foreign and international model laws is insufficient to demonstrate that the plain meaning of section 1511 is other than what Congress intended. The bankruptcy court correctly applied the plain meaning of section 1511 in denying Mr. Loy's motion. The order of the bankruptcy court should be affirmed.

[8] The Debtor concedes this point. Appellant's Br. at 9 ("11 U.S.C. §1511 gives a foreign representative in a 'main proceeding' the option to file under 11 U.S.C. §301 Voluntary cases or §303 Involuntary cases.").

C. Mr. Loy's examples of difficulties he contends arise in this voluntary case are insufficient to override the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. §1511.

Mr. Loy cites a variety of issues that arose in the bankruptcy court below to support his argument that section 1511 should not be read to permit the filing of a voluntary case when the debtor himself is not a volunteer. Appellant's Br. at 12-16. Among his examples, Mr. Loy claims: (1) the filing of the petition violates Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(a) because Mr. Loy did not sign it; (2) Mr. Loy did not obtain pre-petition credit counseling in compliance with 11 U.S.C. §109(h); and (3) Mr. Loy has intentionally failed to comply with the document production and filing requirements set forth in 11 U.S.C. §521. As discussed below, each of these examples, even if appropriately raised on appeal, is insufficient to support dismissal of Mr. Loy's bankruptcy case.

1. The English Trustee's filing of a bankruptcy petition pursuant to his authority under 11 U.S.C. §1511(a)(2) did not violate Fed R. Bankr. P. 9011.

Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011 mandates that documents filed with the bankruptcy court "be signed by at least one attorney of record in the attorney's individual name," or an unrepresented party. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(a). The rule further states: "An unsigned paper shall be stricken unless omission of the signature is corrected promptly after being called to the attention of the attorney or party." Id. Mr. Loy argues that he did not sign the petition filed by the English Trustee, and, therefore, it should be stricken pursuant to Rule 9011(a). Appellant's Br. at 12). Mr. Loy did not file the petition. The English Trustee did. The petition bears the signature of the English Trustee, as foreign representative, and his counsel. Appellant's Des., Item 1. Mr. Loy's signature was not required by Rule 9011(a) because Mr. Loy did not file the document with the bankruptcy court.

2. The bankruptcy court did not err in denying Mr. Loy's motion to dismiss for failure to comply with the credit counseling of 11 U.S.C. §109(h) because Mr. Loy complied with the requirements established by the court.

At the time of filing the petition, the English Trustee filed a motion seeking waiver of the credit counseling requirement contained in 11 U.S.C. §109(h). [Dkt #2]. An order granting the waiver was entered October 29, 2009. [Dkt. #76]. Pursuant to the order, Mr. Loy was required to obtain the appropriate credit counseling on or before September 23, 2009.[9] On September 23, 2009, Mr. Loy did obtain credit counseling, and filed a certificate of credit counseling with the Court. [Dkt. #33].

Mr. Loy now maintains that his failure to obtain credit counseling prior to the filing of the petition warrants dismissal. If there is any doubt about the procedural infirmities that riddled Mr. Loy's appeal, there can be none here. On November 18, 2010, the bankruptcy court itself issued an order declaring Mr. Loy collaterally estopped from making his credit counseling argument. [Dkt. #91, at ¶ 5]. Mr. Loy did not appeal that order. It is doubly barred in the context of this appeal.

[9] The October 29 order memorialized an order from the bench at a September 8, 2010 hearing.

Even if Mr. Loy's §109(h) argument is appropriately raised in this appeal, Mr. Loy's argument is contrary to the facts and his own actions in the bankruptcy court. In fact, Mr. Loy obtained the required credit counseling. Accordingly, the issue is moot. [Dkt. #33].

As a matter of law, Mr. Loy is also incorrect. The term "debtor" as used in chapter 15 has a completely separate meaning than it does in the rest of the Bankruptcy Code. As a result, the restrictions on who may be a debtor under section 109, which mandates credit counseling as a prerequisite to filing, is inapplicable in chapter 15 cases. See In re Tri-Continental Exch., 349 B.R. 627 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 2006) (holding an insurance company could seek to have its insolvency proceeding recognized under chapter 15).

The structure of chapter 15 strongly supports the Tri-Continental analysis. Section 1501(c) contains a short list of entities to which chapter 15 does not apply. These are: entities ineligible for bankruptcy relief under 109(b), with the exception of insurance companies; individuals who reside in the United States and who have debts within the 109(e) limits; and stockbrokers, commodity broker, or an entity subject to the Securities Protector Investment Act. These restrictions parallel those entities that are ineligible from filing bankruptcy cases under section 109. However, section 1501(c) must have a purpose and, in fact, it does. It distinguishes the eligibility requirements for debtors under chapter 15, as opposed to those under the rest of the Bankruptcy Code. One difference is that the requirement of section 109(h) for credit counseling is omitted. To ignore that difference would make section 1501 surplusage.

3. Mr. Loy's refusal to comply with the filing and disclosure requirements of 11 U.S.C. §521 does not support his argument for reversal of the bankruptcy court's order.

Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §521, a debtor in a voluntary case is required to file a variety of documents with the Court to further the administration of his bankruptcy case. Mr. Loy, however, is not a chapter 7 debtor in the traditional sense. The Debtor in this case is not Mr. Loy. It is the English Representative of this proceeding, who is authorized to dispose of Mr. Loy's assets in the United States within the framework of his bankruptcy proceeding in the United Kingdom. As such Mr. Loy's failure to comply with the requirements of 11 U.S.C. §521 is immaterial and cannot trigger automatic dismissal pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §521(i).

If this Court were to disagree about Mr. Loy's status in this case, the issue of compliance with section 521, if required, is not ripe for review. The English Trustee moved for relief from the requirements of section 521 on August 31, 2009. [Dkt. #14]. In his motion, the English Trustee requested a suspension of the section 521 filing deadline, and a status conference before the Court to determine how the filings would be handled going forward. Although a hearing was held on the motion, no order appears in the record. There is no final decision for this Court to review.

4. Mr. Loy's due process rights were not violated by the filing of the voluntary petition.

Mr. Loy argues that commencement of this Chapter 7 bankruptcy pursuant to section 301 violates his due process rights under the Fifth Amendment. Appellant's Br. at 12. Even if Mr. Loy's Fifth Amendment argument is properly raised, it is without merit. As the bankruptcy court noted at the February 10, 2010 hearing: "My recollection is that Mr. Loy waived the constitutional challenge, but nevertheless, the Court finds that on the state of this record, Mr. Loy has been afforded an unenviable amount of notice and an opportunity for hearing" Appellee's Des., Item 20, p. 8.

Mr. Loy initially opposed the English Trustee's October 28, 2007 petition for recognition of a foreign proceeding as a foreign main proceeding under Chapter 15 of the Bankruptcy Code. In re Jonathan A. Loy, Case. No. 07-51040 (Bankr. E.D. Va. filed Oct. 27, 2007). Mr. Loy appeared at numerous hearings and was afforded a full opportunity to oppose the petition for recognition of his English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding. Loy, 380 B.R. at 161.

Nevertheless, Mr. Loy now argues that the commencement of this chapter 7 case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §1511(a)(2) violates his constitutional rights by depriving him and his spouse of "the liberty to use their property without due process of law" and violates the public policy of the United States. (Appellant's Brief at 12-13). The statute is clear, however: "Upon recognition, a foreign representative may commence . . . a voluntary case under section 301 or 302, if the foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding." 11 U.S.C. §1511(a)(2) (emphasis added). The bankruptcy court went through a pain-staking process to determine if Mr. Loy's English bankruptcy was a foreign main proceeding. That afforded Mr. Loy due process. Everything that Mr. Loy complains of is a direct result of the decision, adverse to him, in the chapter 15 recognition litigation.[10] Loy, 380 B.R. at 163. The "harm" he alleges results from operation of the Bankruptcy Code not insufficient due process. See 11 U.S.C. §1520(a) (applying 11 U.S.C. §§361, 362, 363, 549, and 552 to Mr. Loy's property in the United States).

[10] In its order recognizing the English bankruptcy as a foreign main proceeding, the bankruptcy court expressly prohibited Mr. Loy from "transferring, encumbering, or otherwise disposing of any of his non de minimis assets." In addition, recognition permitted the foreign representative to operate Mr. Loy's business and to avoid any transfer of Mr. Loy's property made after the commencement of the Chapter 15 case. 11 U.S.C. § 1520. Mr. Loy has alleged no deprivation of liberty or property that was not already accomplished by the recognition of the English bankruptcy.

Due process has been afforded to Mr. Loy in the form of the Chapter 15 recognition proceedings. The application of the law and the commencement of this case are not in violation of Mr. Loy's due process rights, and accordingly are not "manifestly contrary to the public policy of the United States" such that this Court should refuse to act pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §1506. The bankruptcy court's order should be affirmed.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to dismiss this case or, in the alternative affirm the order of the bankruptcy court denying Mr. Loy's motion to dismiss.

BASIS FOR APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had subject matter jurisdiction to determine a fee award pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1334 and 28 U.S.C. § 157. The review of fees is a matter concerning the administration of the estate and is therefore a "core proceeding" under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A). The bankruptcy court's January 12, 1999, order, entered on January 13, 1999, fully and finally determined the fee award to the appellant Weintraub Genshlea and Sproul ("the Law Firm"), Tab 46, and was therefore a final order. The district court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the bankruptcy court's final order under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a). The district court's order of October 22, 1999, Tab 136, EOR 1336-1351, affirming the bankruptcy court, was also final. Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(d), this Court has jurisdiction over this appeal from the district court's order affirming the bankruptcy court.

II.
ISSUES ON APPEAL AND APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

The Law Firm has raised issues on appeal related to its fee award in the bankruptcy court. The Law Firm has contended: (a) the bankruptcy court applied the wrong statute in reviewing its fees; and (b) the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it made substantial fee reductions.

Absent abuse of discretion or an erroneous application of law, the bankruptcy court's award of fees should not be disturbed. Pitrat v. Reimers (In re Reimers), 972 F.2d 1127, 1129 (9th Cir. 1992); Unsecured Creditors' Comm. v. Puget Sound Plywood (In re Puget Sound Plywood), 924 F.2d 955, 957 (9th Cir. 1991). Since this Court is in "as good a position" as the district court to review the bankruptcy court's decisions, the bankruptcy court's order is reviewed independently. Neben & Starrett v. Chartwell Financial Corporation (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877, 879 (9th Cir. 1995), quoting Sousa v. Miguel (In re United States Trustee), 32 F.3d 1370, 1372 (9th Cir. 1994). The bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error, while its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. Ibid., citing 32 F.3d at 1372. A bankruptcy court's decision about the amount of a fee award is subject to the abuse of discretion standard. Ibid., citing In re Film Ventures Int'l, 75 B.R. 250, 253 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1987).

III.
STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Nature of the Case. This case concerns the authority of the bankruptcy court to reduce the amount of attorneys' fees based upon its finding that services rendered by the Law Firm in taking a weak case to trial were neither necessary nor reasonable.

Course of Proceedings and Disposition. The bankruptcy court's January 12, 1999, order awarding final fees to the Law Firm was appealed to the district court and affirmed on appeal on October 22, 1999. The Law Firm has filed an appeal to this Court.

B. STATEMENT OF FACTS

Background: Employment of the Law Firm. In December of 1997, Robert C. Greeley ("Greeley"), the bankruptcy trustee of Lender Service Bureau ("LSB"), sought the assistance of counsel, the Law Firm, to pursue claims against John Ward ("Ward Litigation"). The underlying theories in the Ward Litigation were: (a) Ward breached his fiduciary duty as an officer, shareholder, and director of LSB and (b) Ward, as an alter ego of LSB's sister company Lender Service Bureau of America ("LSBOA") was liable for LSBOA's debt to LSB. Tab 22, EOR 0250-0251. Ward was one of several defendants in an adversary proceeding which had been commenced by Greeley about eight months before Greeley sought the assistance of Law Firm. Tab 1, EOR 0001-0008.

On January 7, 1998, the bankruptcy court approved Greeley's application to employ the Law Firm. Tab 9 ("the Employment Order"). The Employment Order, standard for the district, provided in pertinent part:

> IT IS ORDERED that Robert C. Greeley, Trustee, is hereby authorized to retain the firm of Weintraub Genshlea & Sproul Law Corporation...as special counsel, subject to the following terms and conditions pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 328(a):
> 1. No compensation is permitted except upon court order following application pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a).
>
> 2. Compensation will be at the 'lodestar rate' applicable at the time that services are rendered in accordance with the Ninth Circuit decision in In re Manoa Fin. Co., 853 F.2d 687 (9th Cir. 1988). No hourly rate referred to in the application papers is approved unless unambiguously so stated in this order or in a subsequent order of this court.

Tab 9, EOR 0052:22 - 0053:3.

First Interim Fee Application. The Ward Litigation proceeded. About a month before trial, the Law Firm applied for a first interim award of fees. The Court awarded $85,000, a portion of the $100,221.50 sought. Exhibit 29, EOR 454-455. The court noted that it was "unable to make the various determinations that are necessary under 11 U.S.C. § 330 for final awards of compensation." Tab 29, EOR 454:19-25.

Trial of the Ward Litigation. In July 1998 the Ward Litigation went to trial. On August 4, 1998, the court rendered findings of fact and conclusions of law on the record, ruling in favor of Ward on all causes of action. Tab 22, EOR 0249-0285.

The court found that Ward had not breached his fiduciary duty to LSB. For the period of time when Ward was a shareholder and director of LSB, i.e., from the formation of LSB until November 30, 1995, the court found no evidence that Ward functioned as a "defacto officer" of LSB. Tab 22, EOR 0272-0273. Nor was there a basis to impose liability under the exceptions to director liability in California Code Section 204. Tab 22, EOR 0273-0276.

For the time period when Ward became an officer of LSB following the untimely death of Amos Blacksea, the court found that Ward had not abdicated his duties. Tab 22, EOR 0277. In fact, the court observed that as trustee Greeley "undertook a similar approach" to the business as Ward did:

> continuing the status quo, including the relationship with LSBOA, while attempting to procure a sale for the company. And Mr. Greeley took over a company with much better books and records than those of the company Mr. Ward had assumed. Mr. Ward's conduct does meet the standard of business judgment.

Tab 22, EOR 0278:3-9.

The court observed that Ward was a "thoroughly credible witness," Tab 22, EOR 0261:3-4. "[P]ersuaded that John Ward acted honorably, with integrity, and discharged his duties to both LSB and LSBAO [sic] with appropriate care," the court noted for the record that Ward's successful defense was not based on a "technicality based on the plaintiff's failure to prove elements of its case." Tab 22, EOR 0283:10-16.

Second Interim Fee Application. On September 8, 1998, just over a month after the conclusion of trial in the Ward Litigation, the Law Firm filed a second interim application for fees and costs seeking an additional $153,583.55, bringing the total incurred to $264,802.78. Tabs 24-30. The Appellees, Priority Posting & Publishing and Chicago Title Company, former members of the Official Creditors Committee ("OCC Members") and the United States Trustee opposed the fees, urging a reduction in fees or holding the Law Firm to a contingency fee arrangement. Tabs 31, 32, and 33.

The OCC Members and the United States Trustee asked the bankruptcy court to consider the following bases to reduce fees: (a) whether or not the Law Firm properly evaluated the Ward Litigation; Tab 31 at EOR 0527, 0530-0531; (b) representations made to the OCC Members and to the United States Trustee about a fee budget and how retention on an hourly basis would be less costly than on a contingency fee basis. Tab 33, EOR 0561-0561; 0566–567; and (c) failure to keep the OCC members informed about a change in their view of the fee budget or the merits of the Ward Litigation. Tab 32, EOR 0536-0537. The Law Firm responded that the fees were reasonable since the expected recovery was $1.5 million with "a substantial prospect of success." Tab 34, EOR 0570.

Memorandum Decision on Second Interim Application. On December 1, 1998, the bankruptcy court issued its memorandum decision on the Law Firm's second interim application for compensation, ("Memorandum Decision"). Tab 42, EOR 0626-0637, incorporating the Ward Litigation findings of fact and conclusions of law. Tab 42, EOR 0630. Of the total requested amount of $264,802.78, the court allowed $106,000. Tab 42, EOR 0635.

From the court's vantage point, "the case against Ward was extremely weak." Tab 42, EOR 0630:7-8. With respect to the first [breach of fiduciary duty as "outside" director] and third [alter ego of LSBOA] claims, "[t]he relevant facts and applicable law provide no support for either [claim]." Tab 42, EOR 0630:10-15. While Ward had "some vulnerability" in the second claim [breach of fiduciary duty as officer], the claim was "not strong." Tab 42, EOR 0631. The court reiterated in detail her assessment of Ward's credibility as a witness in the eight-day trial:

> ...at trial, Ward's explanation of the business decisions he made following Amos Blacksea's death was highly credible and consistent with the company's best interests. His testimony was supported by every other witness with contemporaneous knowledge of the events. Moreover, the decisions made by Ward, such as positioning the company for sale, hiring competent accounting staff, and continuing the relationship with LSBOA, are identical to the decisions made by the Trustee when he was appointed in this case.

The court criticized the Law Firm for taking a weak case to trial:

> By the close of discovery, an objective analysis of the evidence by WGS should have resulted in the conclusion that two of the claims were not worth taking to trial and that the remaining claim was not strong. Taking the case to trial, after only minimal settlement discussions, was not a proper decision, and given the result obtained, cannot provide the basis for a fee award by the simple application of the lodestar approach. Under any analysis, a substantial reduction in fees is warranted, and the question is the amount of that reduction.

Tab 42, EOR 0631:10-18.

The court considered but denied the requests of the opposition to alter the fee arrangement. Opining that there were sufficient circumstances which would satisfy altering the Law Firm's fee arrangement consistent with Section 328 of the Bankruptcy Code, the bankruptcy court declined to impose such an "overly harsh result." Tab 42, EOR 0631-0633.

The bankruptcy court then reviewed the Law Firm's services under Section 330(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. Tab 42, 0633:9-15. Based upon the court's review of the Law Firm's time records and fee applications, the court found that the Law Firm "failed to properly assess the merits of the Ward Litigation throughout its various stages." Tab 42, 0633:9-15.

The court observed:

> If this lawsuit had been close or even stood a fair chance of success, the court would be reluctant to reduce fees based on hindsight. However, in light of the marginal nature of the case against Ward, as shown at trial, the Trustee and his counsel failed to adequately appraise the facts ascertained during discovery, consider the risks of the litigation, or to explore settlement possibilities. WGS had an obligation to advise the Trustee, on behalf of the estate and creditors, of the significant risks and costs faced at trial. Although counsel for former OCC members periodically discussed this litigation with the Trustee and his counsel, he was never advised of any changes to the original predictions for a certain recovery, underestimates on litigation budgets, or the potential liability to Ward for his attorneys' fees. WGS failed in its duty to the creditors in this case, who have been forced to fund this litigation with none of the controls that a client would normally exercise.

Tab 42, EOR 0634:12-27.

In reducing the entire fee request to $106,000, the court construed this amount as compensation for most of the time spent on discovery, research, strategy and settlement discussions. Tab 42, EOR 0635:3-5. The court further stated unequivocally that it could not find the trial expenses were "necessary or beneficial." Tab 42, 0635:5-6.

Pursuant to the Memorandum Decision, the court allowed interim compensation in the amount of $21,000 for the period covered by the second interim application, further providing:

> ...unless Weintraub Genshlea & Sproul seeks additional compensation beyond that awarded on an interim basis, the court will treat the compensation awarded on an interim basis, i.e., $106,000, as a final > award pursuant to 11 U.S.C. section 330(a) without the necessity of further application.

Tab 43, EOR 0638.

Final Application. On December 1, 1998, the same date the Memorandum Decision was filed, the Law Firm filed a final fee application seeking more fees. At this point all fees and costs incurred by the Law Firm totaled $277,193.75. Tab 37, EOR 581; Tab 36 - 41. The OCC members and the United States Trustee filed opposition. Tabs 44 and 45. On January 13, 1999, based upon the stipulation of the parties, the court awarded final fees in the amount of $106,000. Tab 46.

IV.

ARGUMENT

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Law Firm's contention on appeal that it had a court-approved "contract" which insulated its fees from scrutiny under Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code is based upon the Law Firm's confused interpretation of the facts and the law applicable to fee awards under the Bankruptcy Code. The bankruptcy court properly applied Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code in evaluating the services rendered by the Law Firm.

A. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT PROPERLY EVALUATED THE NATURE, EXTENT AND VALUE OF LAW FIRM'S SERVICES.

1. Compensation to professionals in a bankruptcy case is governed by 11 U.S.C. § 330.

Compensation to bankruptcy professionals is governed by 11 U.S.C. § 330, which provides in pertinent part that:

> (a) (1) ...subject to sections 326, 328, and 329, the court may award to...a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103 —
> > (A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by...the attorney ....
> >
> > (3)(A) In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including —
> > ....
> > (C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title; ....

Guided by the plain reading of the applicable statute, the bankruptcy court reviewed the evidence presented at trial in the Ward Litigation and found that the matter should not have been taken to trial. The court methodically and clearly laid out in substantial detail its view of the evidence presented as it pertained to each cause of action. This approach was entirely consistent with what is contemplated under Section 330(a)(3)(A) (C) of the Bankruptcy Code.

B. THE LAW FIRM'S CONTENTION THAT THE ORDER APPROVING ITS EMPLOYMENT WAS A PRE-APPROVED "CONTRACT" WHICH INSULATED ITS SERVICES FROM REVIEW UNDER SECTION 330 IS WHOLLY WITHOUT MERIT.

The Law Firm's primary contention on appeal is that the bankruptcy court erroneously applied Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code when it should have applied Section 328.[1/] The Law Firm argues for the existence of a pre-arranged contract based solely upon references to the "lodestar rate" and to Section 328 contained in their Employment Order. Tab 9. Reading the Employment Order in its entirety, taking into consideration the straightforward analysis contained in the Memorandum Decision, and following the applicable law, this argument fails.

In this case, no issues under Section 328 are implicated. Contrary to the Law Firm's assertion, see Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 9, there has never been a pre-approved contract. The Employment Order simply does not provide what the Law Firm suggests it does. Finally, the Law Firm had no reason to expect treatment under any other statute but Section 330.

[1/] The Law Firm has not consistently argued whether Section 330 is applicable or not. In its brief to the district court, it argued that "the court should have applied a lodestar analysis." Tab 134, EOR 1281, 1285. When questioned by the district court about why Section 330 does not apply, counsel seemed to suggest that under Section 328, the court must evaluate fees under the lodestar and reasonableness standards (standards which apply under section 330). See Tab 135, EOR 1329. Now, in its brief to this Court, it argues again that the error in law made by bankruptcy court was to apply Section 330 instead of Section 328. Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 9.

The Law Firm has made inconsistent arguments to this Court. On one hand, it contends its fees are not reviewable under Section 330. Appellant's Brief, p 9, 10-11. On the other hand, the Law Firm argues that the fees should be reviewed under a "lodestar" analysis. Appellant's Brief, p. 12. An argument that a "lodestar" analysis applies to a review of its fees necessarily admits that Section 330 applies. However, it is necessary to address any vestige of Law Firm's argument on appeal that the bankruptcy court erred in reviewing its fees under Section 330, when it had obtained approval of its employment on a "lodestar" basis.

1. The principle that a bankruptcy court may not alter pre-approved terms and conditions of employment, absent a finding that the terms and conditions were improvident in light of unanticipated developments does not apply to these facts in this case.

The statute and the case law on Section 328 is clear. Once a bankruptcy court has approved terms and conditions of employment, they may be altered only > if such terms and conditions prove to be improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated at the time of the fixing of such terms and conditions.

11 U.S.C. § 328(a).

When, for example, the court approves employment of counsel on a contingency fee basis, it may not grant fees on an "hourly" basis without making findings about unanticipated developments. See Pitrat v. Reimers (In re Reimers), 972 F.2d 1127 (9th Cir. 1992). Although the court has substantial discretion to alter the fee arrangement when justified, the court abuses its discretion if it fails to make specific findings of those improvident circumstances. In re Confections by Sandra, 83 B.R. 729, 733 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1987). The term "unanticipated developments" is "subject to broad interpretation." Id. at 733.

2. The Law Firm did not have a pre-approved contract.

The Employment Order was no different from most employment orders entered in this judicial district. In this district, > [t]he usual request for authority to employ an attorney . . . which is routinely approved, does not seek to impose any particular terms and conditions and leaves the question of compensation until later. Although the papers may recite the attorney's usual billing rate, the actual determination of compensation is left to the standards stated in section 330.

C&P Auto Transport, 94 B.R 682, 685 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1988). Moreover, to invoke the protection embodied in Section 328 against modification of a prior-approved arrangement, the language in the employment order must "expressly and unambiguously state specific terms and conditions." Id. at 685, FN 4.

The Law Firm contends the Employment Order constitutes a pre-approved fee arrangement -- a "contract" -- which immunizes its fees from court scrutiny under Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code. See Appellant's Brief, p. 9.

The Court's order specifically provided that "[n]o compensation is permitted except upon court order following application pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)." Tab 9, EOR 0052:26-27. The meaning of this is clear -- the court was making no guarantees. This counsel, like all counsel, was being told -- from the inception of its representation -- that it would have to come before the court and justify its request for fees based upon the criteria set forth in Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code.

The court's order also specified that "[c]ompensation will be at the 'lodestar rate' applicable at the time that services are rendered in accordance with the Ninth Circuit decision in In re Manoa Fin. Co., 853 F.2d 687 (9th Cir. 1988)." Id. Counsel appears to misapprehend the significance of this section. It merely provides the rate at which any approved compensation will be paid. It does not specify that counsel has a contract to be paid for any work it chose to submit to the court, even work – like that at issue here – which the court specifically concluded was unnecessary and improvidently provided.

The notion that language providing for compensation at the "lodestar rate" transforms a routine employment order -- with no other particular terms and conditions specified -- into a "contract" under which counsel avoids review for reasonableness simply defies logic. Moreover, the assertion is contradicted by specific language in the preceding paragraph of the order:

The Law Firm's argument that its Employment Order constitutes a "contract" or pre-approved fee arrangement which is reviewable under Section 328 alone – and hence not reviewable under Section 330 – was not directly raised before the bankruptcy court. See Tabs 24- 30, 34, 35, 36-40. Having failed to argue this point to the bankruptcy court, this issue is now waived on appeal. See Leibowitz v. County of Orange (In re Leibowitz) 230 B.R. 392, 399(Bankr. 9th Cir. 1999).

3. The Law Firms' adherence to the contention that Section 328 prevents scrutiny under Section 330 is undermined by its own statements acknowledging the contrary.

A complete and objective analysis of the Employment Order should place to rest any question whether the Law Firm's fees were subject to review under Section 330. In addition, the Law Firm cannot seriously assert a subjective belief that its fees were not reviewable under Section 330. Throughout the proceedings, in pleadings filed with the court and in a statement to the court, counsel acknowledged that its fees were subject to scrutiny under Section 330.

For example, counsel declared under penalty or perjury that "Special counsel understands and acknowledges that all compensation is subject to Sections 328, 329, 330 and 331 of the Bankruptcy Code." Tab 5, EOR 0031:9-10.

When the Law Firm first sought employment, counsel affirmatively agreed with the court's admonishment that all fees would be scrutinized "at the end of the day." Tab 32, EOR 0552:11-23.

Finally, fee applications were filed by the Law Firm -- not pursuant Section 328 -- but "pursuant to Section 330." Tab 12, EOR 0068:18-24, EOR 0069:4-7 [First Interim Fee Application]; Tab 25, EOR 0291:18-25, EOR 0292:9-12 [Second Interim Fee Application]; Tab 37, EOR 0580:18-25, EOR 0581:15-17 [Final Fee Application].

C. WHEN THE BANKRUPTCY COURT REDUCED FEES TO AN AMOUNT WHICH COMPENSATED THE LAW FIRM FOR SERVICES UP TO TRIAL, THE COURT PROPERLY EXERCISED ITS DISCRETION.

In making the fee award, the bankruptcy court applied Section 330. The court's analysis in making the fee award was consistent with principles articulated in Ninth Circuit and relevant Seventh Circuit case law on Section 330. As the trier of fact, the court must determine the reasonableness of fees and expenses. In re Kenneth Leventhal & Company, 19 F.3d 1174, 1178 (7th Cir. 1994). Based upon its opinion that the case was too weak to take to trial and that counsel failed to adequately advise the trustee, the court allowed compensation for pre-trial services only. In essence, only those services rendered up to trial satisfied the reasonable and necessary standards of Section 330. In making this determination, the court did not abuse its discretion.

1. A bankruptcy court's determination of the amount of fees must be reviewed under the abuse of discretion standard.

The bankruptcy court's fee awards are upheld unless the court abused its discretion or erroneously applied the law. Unsecured Creditors Committee v. Puget Sound Plywood, 924 F.2d 955, 957 (9th Cir. 1991). Findings of fact are binding unless clearly erroneous. Ibid.

2. The bankruptcy court's reduction of fees under the facts of this case was consistent with the plain reading of 11 U.S.C. § 330.

In the court's Memorandum Decision, Tab 42, EOR 0633, the bankruptcy court followed the plain meaning in Section 330(a)(3)(A)(C) [sic], which provides in pertinent part that:

> in determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded, the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including...whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered...

11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(A)(C)[sic]. The reduction in fees was consistent with the statutory directions given to the bankruptcy court.

3. A fee award based upon a finding that services were not reasonable is consistent with Ninth Circuit law.

The bankruptcy court's analysis of the fees was consistent with Ninth Circuit case law, in particular Unsecured Creditors Committee v. Puget Sound Plywood (In re Puget Sound Plywood), 924 F.2d 955 (9th Cir. 1991)(Bankruptcy court did not abuse discretion by reducing fees of counsel who failed to consider maximum possible recovery). Accord Digesti & Peck v. Kitchen Factors (In re Kitchen Factors), 143 B.R. 560 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1992)(Counsel for trustee had fiduciary relationship to the estate and was required to consider cost-effectiveness of pursuit of litigation; fees submitted for $12,000 in pursuit of $12,000 debt were reduced); In re Taxman Clothing Company, 49 F.3d 310 (7th Cir. 1995)(Counsel for the bankruptcy estate is under a duty to consider the merits of a case at all stages of the case; like the trustee, counsel must exercise care, diligence, and skill not only in the prosecution of the estate's claims, but in deciding "which claims to prosecute, and how far." Id. at 315.) By objectively analyzing the merits of the Ward Litigation and evaluating counsel's decision to proceed to trial with a weak case, the bankruptcy court did not err.

4. Ninth Circuit authority does not require the bankruptcy court to engage in a mechanical calculation of fees based on multiplying actual hours times the hourly rate.

Nor did the bankruptcy court err when it declined to award fees based strictly upon multiplying actual hours expended times hourly rate. The Ninth Circuit has held that the multiplication of hours times hourly rate is merely the beginning point of a fee calculation. Puget Sound Plywood, 924 F.2d at 958. Moreover, calculation of the "lodestar," is the "primary" but not the "exclusive" method for calculating fees, especially in the bankruptcy context. 924 F.2d at 960. Finally, the applicant must show the services were "necessary and reasonable," Id. at 958, and counsel does not have "free reign to run up a tab without considering the maximum probable recovery." Ibid.

In this case, the bankruptcy court held that services rendered up to trial were reasonable and necessary. In doing so, disallowance of fees for services rendered thereafter, i.e. services deemed to be unreasonable, unlikely to benefit the estate and therefore unnecessary, was consistent with the law in this circuit.

5. The bankruptcy court properly exercised discretion and applied the correct law.

In reaching the amount of the fee award, the bankruptcy court: (a) recalled the evidence in the Ward Litigation which was presented in an eight day trial, Tab 42, EOR 0628, 0630-0631, incorporating Tab22, EOR0248-0285; (b) considered the applicable law and the interests at stake, Tab 42, EOR 0628-0629,0631-0634; and (c) made detailed findings of fact and conclusions of law, Tabs 42 and 22. The court supplied reasons at every step in its analysis. The bankruptcy court properly discharged its duties.

D. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S FINDING THAT THE LAW FIRM FAILED TO OBJECTIVELY EVALUATE THE MERITS OF THE WARD LITIGATION WAS NOT CLEARLY ERRONEOUS.

1. The Law Firm must demonstrate that the bankruptcy court's findings of fact, upon which the court reduced its fees, were clearly erroneous.

As the trier of fact, the bankruptcy court's findings of fact and conclusions of law should be accorded considerable deference. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013. When there are two permissible views of the facts, the view chosen by the fact finder cannot be clearly erroneous. Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 574, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d (1985).

The Law Firm has supplied voluminous records from the Ward Litigation to demonstrate that there was evidence to support the claims against Ward. Yet, not all of the evidence has been provided. Furthermore, despite assertions about the "compelling" evidence, the Law Firm has not demonstrated in any persuasive way that the bankruptcy court's findings were clearly erroneous. On the other hand, substantial evidence in the record supports the bankruptcy court's finding that the case against Ward was not strong.

2. There was evidence to support the bankruptcy court's finding that Ward did not breach his fiduciary duty as an "outside" director.

With respect to the first cause of action, that as an "outside director," Ward breached his fiduciary duty by undercapitalizing the corporation, the bankruptcy found that LSB was adequately capitalized. Tab 22, EOR 253. The bankruptcy court found evidence "lacking" to support other grounds for imposing liability as an "outside director." Tab 22, EOR 0273-0276. Furthermore, the court rejected the contention that Mr. Ward was in control of the corporation during this period. Id. at EOR 0273. The testimony was almost uncontroverted: When Amos Blacksea was alive, he was in control. Id. at EOR 253-255. In fact, the Law Firm's own papers acknowledge this fact. Appellant's Opening Brief, Appendix A, p. 9 ("Blacksea really ran LSBOA, just as he ran LSB.") Like the contradiction in the Law Firm's assertions that Ward was both over- controlling yet asleep at the wheel (see Tab 22, EOR 0275), the overwhelming truth about Amos Blacksea's dominance of -- indeed sole control over -- all of LSB's and LSBOA's operations had remarkably escaped the Law Firm's evaluation of the facts.

3. There was evidence to support the bankruptcy court's finding that Ward did not breach his fiduciary duty as "inside" director.

The next cause of action in the Ward Litigation was that Ward breached his duty as "inside" director. In late 1995, following the death of Amos Blacksea, Ward became an officer of LSB. The bankruptcy court found that there was no abdication of duties by Ward. Tab 22, EOR 0277. Although the court recognized, with the benefit of hindsight that Ward could have done things differently, Tab 22, EOR 0277, Ward's approach to handling the company's operations was similar to the chapter 11 trustee's. As the court's detailed recounting of the history of LSB demonstrates, see Tab 22, EOR 0251-0273, by the end of the Ward Litigation, the court understood the history and background of LSB. The court was fully informed when she found that Ward's conduct satisfied the business judgment standard. Tab 22, EOR 0277-0278.

4. There was evidence to support the bankruptcy court's finding that Ward was not an alter ego of LSBOA.

With respect to the third cause of action, the bankruptcy court noted that the alter ego doctrine is an equitable remedy which allows a court to hold shareholders liable for corporate obligations when one is the alter ego of another. Tab 22, EOR 0278. The court discussed the evidence and concluded "John Ward obtained no personal advantage from Lender Service Bureau of America," Tab 22, EOR 0281, further finding:

> The self-dealing that is typically present in cases which find an alter ego relationship is totally absent in this case. There's no inequitable conduct to be remedied in this case. To the extent LSB was harmed by its relationship with LSBOA, it knew exactly what it was doing and it's not at all clear that it was harmed.

Tab 22, EOR 0282.

E. THE LAW FIRM'S CONTENTIONS THAT THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ABUSED ITS DISCRETION ARE NOT SUPPORTED BY THE RECORD.

The Law Firm's various contentions of abuse of discretion by the bankruptcy court have little support in the record and are based upon a misunderstanding or distortion of the record.

1. The Law Firm's complaint that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it "faulted" the Law Firm for making representations about "certain recovery" of $1.5 million in the Ward Litigation is inaccurate.

The Law Firm contends that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by "fault[ing]" WG&S for alleged representations that there was a "certain recovery." Appellant's Brief, p. 3. According to the Law Firm, the "only representations [emphasis in original]," in the record consisted of a letter from the trustee's general counsel, Mark Serlin ("Serlin") who "has no affiliation with WG&S." Appellant's Brief, p. 3.

The Law Firm's attempt to disassociate itself from claims exaggerating the likelihood of success of the Ward Litigation is unconvincing. Contrary to the assertion above, the court did not attribute the term "certain recovery" to the Law Firm. In fact, the court declined to impute to the Law Firm representations of "certain recovery" made by Greeley and Serlin "because the record is not entirely clear what representations were made by WGS, as opposed to Serlin, when WGS was hired..." Tab 42, EOR 0632-0633. Yet, the court found that "the evidence demonstrates that, in the months that followed WGS never backed away from Serlin's rosy picture of the litigation." Tab 42, EOR 0633. The court's criticism of the Law Firm was for Law Firm's failure to fulfill its > obligation to advise the Trustee, on behalf of the estate and creditors, of the significant risks and costs faced at trial. Although counsel for former OCC members periodically discussed this litigation with the Trustee and his counsel, he was never advised of any changes to the original predictions for a certain recovery, underestimates on litigation budgets, or the potential liability to Ward for his attorneys' fees. WGS failed in its duty to the creditors in this case, who have been forced to fund this litigation with none of the controls that a client would normally exercise.

It is not entirely accurate to state that the Law Firm has no affiliation with Serlin, to whom representations of "certain recovery" have been attributed. In the Ward Litigation, the Law Firm was expressly employed as co-counsel with Serlin. Indeed, although the Law Firm has referred to itself as "special counsel," its application sought employment as co-counsel with Serlin. Tab 6, EOR 0030:23-26; Tab 7, EOR 0045-0046; Tab 8, EOR 0048.

The above stated representations were not the only representations which were made about the rosy prospects in the Ward Litigation. Representations of certain recovery were made by Greeley to the United States Trustee. Tab 33, EOR 0566-0567. What else can be inferred by a virtual guarantee that a fee arrangement on an hourly basis would be more economical than on a contingency basis? The suggestion that the Law Firm was unaware of such representations is also not supported by the record. The Law Firm, in fact, received a letter from the Assistant United States Trustee confirming the making of such representations. Tab 33, EOR 0566-00569.

The Law Firm's lead counsel himself offered an optimistic prediction of recovery to the bankruptcy at the outset of employment. At the hearing on the employment application in January 1998, counsel stated to the court: "There's a million and a half dollars at stake, and we fully anticipate winning the case..." Tab 32, EOR 0552:16-18.

2. The Law Firm's assertion that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by "speculating about confidential legal advice to the trustee" has no basis in the record.

The Law Firm unfairly accuses the bankruptcy court of abuse of discretion because it "improperly speculated about the content of confidential attorney-client communications and settlement discussions." Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 15. This baseless accusation refers to one sentence in the Memorandum Decision criticizing the Law Firm for taking the case to trial with "minimal settlement discussions." Tab 42 at EOR 0631.

First, the accusation takes the court's statement out of context. The court was not "speculating" about advice but was concerned about the Law Firm's judgment. The court, in fact, relied upon the Law Firm's own time sheets as evidence of time spent on settlement discussions. As noted in the same Memorandum Decision from which the above quote was taken:

> ...WGS' time sheets reveal a disturbing lack of concern with a broader perspective. During the periods covered by the two interim fee applications, WGS incurred approximately $10,000 in strategy meetings (including the analysis of legal theories), $5,000 on legal research on theories of liability, and only $2,500 in settlement discussion. By contrast, $87,000 was spent on discovery and another $108,000 on trial and trial preparation (which does not include the time spent seeking a jury trial in district court.)

Tab 42, EOR 0634:3-11.

In the Ninth Circuit, counsel for the estate must consider the interests of the estate, including "[t]o what extent may the estate benefit if the services are rendered and what is the likelihood of the disputed issues being resolved successfully?" Unsecured Creditors' Committee v. Puget Sound Plywood, 924 F.2d at 959. The bankruptcy court properly considered whether or not the Law Firm exercised good judgment in evaluating the settlement prospects of the Ward Litigation. The bankruptcy court was properly concerned about proportionality and billing judgment exercised by a fiduciary. In awarding fees in this case, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by considering the strength of the case and counsel's evaluation of the case, including the proportion of time spent by counsel in settlement of the case.

V.

CONCLUSION

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it reduced the fee award of the Law Firm based upon findings that the services rendered by Law Firm in taking a weak case to trial were not necessary to the administration of the case nor were they beneficial at the time the services were rendered. The district court applied the appropriate standard of review when it affirmed the order of the bankruptcy court. Each court properly exercised its discretion. Accordingly, this Court should uphold the bankruptcy court's fee award.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

Pursuant to this Court's Order of May 1, 2009, Appellee the United States Trustee respectfully submits this memorandum in opposition to Appellant Glenn J. Moran's petition for rehearing and suggestion for rehearing en banc.

In 2000, LTV Steel Company, Inc., filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. The United States Trustee exercised its power to appoint a committee to represent the interests of the company's unsecured creditors, see 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1), and the bankruptcy court ultimately issued a Standing Order granting the committee authority to bring a lawsuit against certain officers and directors of LTV, including Moran. When Moran attempted to appeal the Standing Order in district court, the district court found that Moran lacked standing to challenge the Order because he is not a "person aggrieved" by the Order under this Court's bankruptcy appellate-standing doctrine. This Court affirmed on appeal, and Moran now seeks rehearing en banc.

Moran's petition should be denied. Rehearing en banc is appropriate only when the panel's opinion "directly conflicts with Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit precedent" or involves "a precedent-setting error of exceptional public importance." 6th Cir. R. 35(c); see also Fed. R. App. P. 35. Neither of these criteria is present in this case. Although Moran contends that the panel majority's opinion creates an intra-circuit conflict with Hyundai Translead, Inc. v. Jackson Truck & Trailer Repair, Inc. (In re Trailer Source, Inc.), 555 F.3d 231 (6th Cir. 2009), the majority holding in that case plainly has no application to Moran's appeal. Indeed, not even the dissenting judge in this case suggests that the panel majority's reasoning conflicts with any circuit or Supreme Court precedent. Moran also fails to offer any basis for concluding that the panel majority's decision implicates issues of exceptional public importance. Under these circumstances, rehearing en banc is unwarranted.

STATEMENT

Under 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1), when a company initiates chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings, the United States Trustee[1] has authority to appoint a committee of the company's unsecured creditors to "investigate the acts, conduct, assets, liabilities, and financial condition of the debtor, the operation of the debtor's business . . . and any other matter relevant to the case," 11 U.S.C. § 1103(c)(2). This committee "may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue" in the case. 11 U.S.C. § 1109(b).

[1] The United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977). The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has given the United States Trustees authority to "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases through a range of oversight responsibilities, 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3), and provided that the United States Trustees "may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any [bankruptcy] case or proceeding," 11 U.S.C. § 307. See generally Morganstern v. Revco D.S. Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990).

Appellant Glenn Moran is the former Chief Executive Officer of LTV Steel Company, which filed for chapter 11 protection in December 2000. Exercising its power under 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1), the United States Trustee appointed a committee of unsecured creditors, which, among other things, investigated the conduct of LTV's officers and directors to determine whether there were any causes of action that should be pursued against them. The committee ultimately concluded that colorable claims existed against certain officers and directors for breach of fiduciary duty, negligence, and corporate waste, and accordingly filed a motion in bankruptcy court seeking leave to commence and prosecute a lawsuit against those directors and officers, including Moran, on behalf of the LTV bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy court issued a Standing Order granting the motion and, two weeks later, the committee initiated a lawsuit against the directors and officers in district court.

Moran attempted to challenge the Standing Order in district court, but the district court dismissed the appeal, holding, among other things, that Moran lacked standing under this Court's bankruptcy appellate standing doctrine because he is not a "person aggrieved" by the Order.[2] See Moran v. Official Comm. of Admin.

[2] Five other putative defendants also attempted to block the lawsuit, but instead of challenging the Standing Order, they filed motions seeking dissolution of the committee. The bankruptcy court denied their motions, and the district court affirmed. This Court consolidated their appeals with Moran's appeal, and the panel majority concluded that those appellants lacked standing for the same reasons as Moran. Only Claimants, No. 1:05-cv-2285, 2006 WL 3253128 at *5 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 8, 2006). A divided panel of this Court affirmed. Writing for the majority, Judge Gilman explained that under well-established Sixth Circuit precedent, "parties may not appeal a bankruptcy order unless they have a direct financial stake in the order such that it 'diminishes [their] property, increase [their] burdens, or impairs [their] rights.'" Maj. Op. at 5 (quoting Fid. Bank, Nat'l Ass'n v. M.M. Group, Inc., 77 F.3d 880, 882 (6th Cir. 1996)); see also Harker v. Troutman (In re Troutman Enter., Inc.), 286 F.3d 359, 364 (6th Cir. 2002) (explaining that standing in bankruptcy court proceedings is "more limited than Article III standing or the prudential requirements associated therewith"). Although the burden of defending a lawsuit maybe "onerous or unpleasant," Judge Gilman observed, it is not the kind of "direct and immediate harm that makes a party 'aggrieved' so as to confer standing in a bankruptcy appeal.'" Maj. Op. at 6 (citing Fid. Bank, 77 F.3d at 883 for the proposition that being "subject[ed] to the possibility of future litigation" by a bankruptcy order is "insufficient to confer standing").

Moran, however, filed a rehearing petition. The United States Trustee is a party to Bricker v.Official Committee of Administrative Claimants (07-3530) and Babcock v. Official Committee of Administrative Claimants (07-3537). We are filing this brief at this Court's invitation.

In the alternative, Moran argued that he is a "person aggrieved" by the Order because, pursuant to a bylaws indemnity provision, his expenses in defending against the lawsuit will be paid by the estate, and as such, he has an administrative claim against the estate and "an interest . . . in seeing that the estate's assets are distributed appropriately and without waste." Maj. Op. at 8. The panel majority rejected this argument as well. Observing that "simply holding a claim of any type against the estate does not automatically confer appellate standing," id., Judge Gilman explained that it would be "perverse logic" to permit Moran to appeal based on his indemnification while defendants without indemnification — "who would clearly be burdened to a greater extent than Moran because they would have to pay all defense costs and any awards against them from their own pockets" — could not appeal, id. at 9.

Judge Kennedy filed a separate opinion, concurring in part with and dissenting in part from the majority opinion. Judge Kennedy emphasized that she agreed with the majority that "an order that makes a party a defendant in a lawsuit cannot be appealed by that defendant," and that "not all creditors necessarily have appellate standing to challenge an order of the bankruptcy court." Dis. Op. at 12. She disagreed, however, with the majority's conclusion that Moran could not establish standing based on LTV's obligation to indemnify him for attorneys' fees and certain judgments against him. Id. at 13. Judge Kennedy reasoned that because Moran's ability to recover attorneys' fees from the estate could in theory be compromised by the use of estate funds to bring the lawsuit against him, he should have standing to challenge the bankruptcy court's authorization of that lawsuit.

ARGUMENT

Neither of the criteria for obtaining rehearing en banc — a conflict with another decision of this Circuit or the Supreme Court, or an issue of "exceptional public importance" — is present here. Accordingly, Moran's petition should be denied.

1. The panel majority's holding is not inconsistent with the precedent of this Court or the Supreme Court. Specifically, the majority applied the well-established rule that a bankruptcy court authorization of a lawsuit does not make the putative defendant a "person aggrieved" who would have standing to challenge the bankruptcy court order. Maj. Op. at 5-6. Judge Kennedy expressly agreed that the majority applied the correct standard, Dis. Op. at 12 ("To be clear, I agree with the majority that an order that makes a party a defendant in a lawsuit cannot be appealed by that defendant . . . ."), and noted that she had "no qualms with the majority's discussion of a bare defendant's lack of appellate standing," id. Her partial dissent grew out of the majority's application of the standard rule to Moran without, in her view, giving adequate consideration to Moran's dual status as a defendant and a potential administrative claimant,[3] id. at 13-15. At no point did Judge Kennedy suggest that she believed that the panel majority's reasoning strayed from Circuit or Supreme Court precedent. She simply disagreed with the panel majority's application of law to the facts of this case. This Court's rules expressly state that the application of law to facts is not appropriate for en banc review. 6th Cir. R. 35.

Although Moran asserts that the panel's analysis of the "person aggrieved" standard conflicts with the "pronouncements" on the issue by the panel in Hyundai Translead, Inc. v. Jackson Truck & Trailer Repair Inc. (In re Trailer Source, Inc.), 555 F.3d 231 (6th Cir. 2009), see Reh'g Pet. at 12, this argument is misplaced. Hyundai addresses the extent to which a bankruptcy court has the power to grant derivative standing to a creditors committee to bring a claim on behalf of the estate. In considering the scope of derivative standing, the Hyundai panel touched briefly on bankruptcy appellate standing. Hyundai, 555 F.3d at 235-36. The majority held that if one party has standing to appeal from the bankruptcy court to the district court, then the losing party in the district court may appeal to the appellate court, regardless of whether it would have had standing to appeal the initial bankruptcy decision. Id. at 236-37. In a dissenting opinion, Judge Rogers argued that the basic bankruptcy appellate standing rule — that a party must be “aggrieved” by the decision to appeal — applied whether the appeal was from the bankruptcy court to district court or district court to circuit court. Id. at 247. In other words, with respect to bankruptcy appellate standing doctrine, the Hyundai panel ruled on only one question: whether the same standing analysis applies to the first and second levels of appeals. Id. at 236. Both the majority and the dissent in the present case agree that where, as here, the appellant was the losing party in both the bankruptcy court and district court, the Hyundai holding is entirely irrelevant. See Maj. Op. at 7; Dis. Op. at 12.

[3] The Response of the Official Committee of Administrative Claimants correctly explains why Mr. Moran's assertion that he has an administrative claim against the LTV estate is not persuasive. See Claimants' Resp. at 7-9.

Although Moran attempts to create the appearance of a circuit split by suggesting that the panel in this case “adopted Judge Rogers’ dissenting opinion in Hyundai,” Reh’g Pet. at 2, this is plainly a mischaracterization of the Court’s decision. Judge Rogers’s (partially) dissenting opinion in Hyundai begins by explaining his disagreement with the majority’s decision not to apply the Court’s bankruptcy appellate standing doctrine, and then goes on to analyze whether the appellants would have standing if that doctrine were applied. The Hyundai majority never considered, much less refuted, Judge Rogers’ analysis on that point because they believed it was irrelevant under the circumstances of their case. Hyundai, 555 F.3d 231, 237, n.4. In the present case, where bankruptcy appellate standing doctrine indisputably governs the issue of standing, both the panel majority and Judge Kennedy found Judge Rogers’ standing analysis in Hyundai, albeit hypothetical, useful in thinking about Moran's standing to bring this appeal. See Maj. Op. at 7; Dis. Op. at 12. Moran cannot plausibly contend that a discussion of Judge Rogers' opinion in this context results in any "conflicting guidance to district courts," Reh'g Pet. at 1, much less a circuit split.

2. Moran also fails in his attempt to characterize this case as involving an issue of exceptional public importance. Moran's primary argument on this point is that en banc review is necessary "[b]ecause of the exceptional importance of providing guidance to the lower court judges of this Circuit who are now faced with unclear instruction" as to whether the directors and officers of bankrupt companies having standing to appeal bankruptcy court orders authorizing lawsuits against them. Reh'g Pet. at 3. But, as explained above, there is nothing unclear about how this decision and Hyundai affect future cases. Hyundai holds that if one party has standing to appeal from the bankruptcy court to the district court, then the losing party in the district court may appeal to the appellate court, regardless of whether it would have had standing to appeal the initial bankruptcy decision. 555 F.3d at 236-37. The present case holds that when a bankruptcy court authorizes an administrative claimant committee to commence a lawsuit against the officers and directors of a now-bankrupt company, those officers and directors cannot rely on either their putative defendant status or their indemnification rights to establish standing under this Court's bankruptcy appellate standing doctrine. Moran has not and cannot identify any inconsistency in these holdings.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons outlined above, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that this Court deny Moran's petition for rehearing and suggestion for rehearing en banc.

Respectfully submitted,

Daniel M. McDermott

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334(a) and §157(a) and (b) to enter its final order awarding sanctions against the Appellant, Edward C. Lucas, in a case arising under title 11. That order, which is the subject of this appeal, was entered on the docket on August 7, 2009. Mr. Lucas timely filed motions for reconsideration on August 14, 2009 and August 19, 2009, which were both denied on September 14, 2009. Mr. Lucas filed a timely notice of appeal on September 21, 2009, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. §158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether in the absence of any allegation that the bankruptcy court erred in ordering a bankruptcy petition preparer to pay $3000 in statutory damages and fines for violating 11 U.S.C. §110, this Court may remove or reduce the sanctions based on the bankruptcy petition preparer's alleged inability to pay?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's decision to issue sanctions is within its sound discretion, and therefore is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Peppers v. Barry, 873 F.2d 967, 968 (6th Cir. 1989). "Abuse of discretion is defined as a definite and firm conviction that the trial court committed a clear error of judgment." Bowling v. Pfizer, 102 F. 3d 777, 780 (6th Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 906 (1997).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Statutory Background and Overview

A bankruptcy petition preparer is "a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing" in a bankruptcy case. 11 U.S.C. §110(a)(1). A "document for filing" is defined as a "petition or any other document prepared for filing by a debtor in a United States bankruptcy court or a United States district court in connection with a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. §110(a)(2).

Subsections (b) through (g) of section 110 set forth standards of conduct to which bankruptcy petition preparers must adhere. 11 U.S.C. §110(b) - (g). For example, a bankruptcy petition preparer must sign each document prepared for filing in a bankruptcy case and include the preparer's name, address, and, if preparer is an individual, his or her Social Security number. 11 U.S.C. §110(b) - (c). A bankruptcy petition preparer may not execute any document on behalf of the debtor, use the word "legal" in any advertisements or advertise under any category that includes the word "legal" or collect or receive any payment from the debtor for the court fees required for filing the petition. 11 U.S.C. §110(e) - (g). Section 110 also prohibits a bankruptcy petition preparer from offering legal advice. 11 U.S.C. §110(e).

A bankruptcy petition preparer who does not comply with section 110 may be required to pay to the debtor actual damages, statutory damages, and attorneys' fees. 11 U.S.C. §110(i)(1). The bankruptcy petition preparer also may forfeit his fees and he may be fined up to $500 for each failure to comply.[1] 11 U.S.C. §110(h)(3)(B); 11 U.S.C. §110(l)(1).

Section 110 of title 11 was enacted in 1994 to "create standards and penalties pertaining to bankruptcy petition preparers." 140 Cong. Rec. H 10,770 (October 4, 1994). The legislative history of section 110 explains that it was enacted in response to the proliferation of bankruptcy petition preparers who were not employed or supervised by attorneys, many of whom attempted to provide legal advice and legal services to debtors without the necessary legal training and ethics regulation. Id. Such services, Congress noted, might take unfair advantage of people who were ignorant about their rights both in and out of bankruptcy. Id. Section 110 was strengthened in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, which added several subsections relevant to this appeal, including subsection (e) prohibiting bankruptcy petition preparers from giving legal advice and subsection (l) authorizing bankruptcy courts to fine bankruptcy petition preparers up to $500 for each violation of the statute. See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 210, 119 Stat. 23, 60-62 (2005).

II. Statement of Facts

The debtors, Brady and Angela Kendall, filed a voluntary petition under chapter 7 of the United States Bankruptcy Code on March 17, 2009. Voluntary Petition [District Court Docket ("Dkt") #6, Attachment ("Att.") #1].[2] The Debtors utilized the services of a bankruptcy petition preparer, Edward Lucas, of E.L. Investments. Id. at 49, Form B19. Mr. Lucas is the appellant in this appeal.

[1] The fines are paid to the United States Trustee and deposited in the United States Trustee Fund. 11 U.S.C. §110(l)(4)(A).

[2] The record on appeal is comprised of the attachments to the Notice of Appeal from the Bankruptcy Court [Dkt #1] and the attachments to the United States Trustee's Motion to Supplement the Record on Appeal [Dkt #6], which this Court granted on December 18, 2009.

The Kentucky Bar Association letter attached to Appellant's brief and referenced therein involved a separate referral.

14, 2009, the bankruptcy court denied the motions for reconsideration. Order Denying Mot. for Reconsideration [Dkt #1, Att. # 3]. Mr. Lucas filed his notice of appeal to the Sixth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel on September 17, 2009. Notice of Appeal [Dkt # 1]. On October 13, 2009, the United States Trustee elected to remove the appeal to this Court. See BAP – Notice of Election to District Court [Dkt. #1, Att. 6].

On December 1, 2009, Mr. Lucas filed his opening brief in this appeal. In it, he concedes he violated section 110 and that it was appropriate for the bankruptcy court to have sanctioned him under that statute. Appellant's brief at 2 [Dkt # 4]. His appeal seeks only to remove or suspend the statutory damages and statutory fines imposed on him. Id. at 2.

Mr. Lucas asks this Court to vacate or remit the statutory damages and fines imposed by the bankruptcy court pursuant to section 110(i)(1) and section 110(l)(1). This Court should not do so because the bankruptcy court acted well within its discretion in imposing them. Those sanctions were allowed under the statute. They were appropriate given Mr. Lucas's multiple violations of section 110. There is no question that Mr. Lucas violated the statute; he stipulated to the acts in court and concedes that point repeatedly in his brief. Given that, the bankruptcy court was required by statute to award damages in the amount of $2000 and it was well within its discretion to impose a $1000 statutory fine. It should not be reversed for doing so.

The essence of Mr. Lucas's appeal seems to be that, despite the lawfulness of the sanctions order, this Court should mitigate the order's allegedly severe financial impact on Mr. Lucas by reducing, removing, or suspending the statutory damages and fines because he has seen the error of his ways. The statute, however, makes no provision for reduction, removal, or suspension of statutory penalties based on ability to pay, or conditioned on good behavior. Nor is it the role of an appellate court to exercise such discretion.

Mr. Lucas's alleged limited financial means do not constitute a valid reason for vacating or remitting the statutory penalties imposed by the bankruptcy court.

Finally, Mr. Lucas has waived this issue on appeal because he never raised any argument in the bankruptcy court concerning his ability to pay. Therefore, it is too late for him to raise it now. Even if he did not forfeit the issue, there is no evidence in the record to support Mr. Lucas's alleged inability to pay. To the contrary, his counsel represented to the bankruptcy court that they could "afford a $1000 fine." Hr'g Tr. at 41 [Dkt #6, Att. #7].

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion When It Imposed Statutory Penalties on Mr. Lucas for Violating 11 U.S.C. §110.

A. Mr. Lucas Violated the Statute and Stipulated to the Violations.

The bankruptcy court properly sanctioned Mr. Lucas for violating two subsections of 11 U.S.C. §110, subsections (e) and (f). Section 110 sets forth certain standards of conduct that every "bankruptcy petition preparer[]," as that term is defined in 11 U.S.C. §110(a)(1), must satisfy.[8] See 11 U.S.C. §110(b)-(g). There is no doubt that Mr. Lucas is a bankruptcy petition preparer. He signed the Debtors' petition and schedules as their bankruptcy petition preparer. Voluntary Petition at 3, 36, 47-49 [Dkt #6, Att. #1]. Mr.

[8] "'[B]ankruptcy petition preparer' means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing; and []'document for filing' means a petition or any other document prepared for filing by a debtor in a United States bankruptcy court . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1),(2).

Lucas states in his response to the sanctions motion that he "prepared the forms for the Petitioners to file their bankruptcy." Resp. to Sanctions Mot. at 1 [Dkt #6, Att. #3]. The bankruptcy court sanctioned him in his capacity as bankruptcy petition preparer. Sanctions Order [Dkt #1, Att. # 2]. He does not contest that status on appeal.[9]

The bankruptcy court did not err in finding that Mr. Lucas violated section 110(e). Subsection 110(e)(2) prohibits a bankruptcy petition preparer from offering any legal advice to a debtor. It provides:

> (B) The legal advice referred to in subparagraph (A) includes advising the debtor—
> (i) whether –
> (I) to file a petition under this title; or
> (II) commencing a case under chapter 7, 11, 12, or 13 is appropriate;
> (ii) whether the debtor's debts will be discharged in a case under this title;
> (iii) whether the debtor will be able to retain the debtor's home, car, or other property after commencing a case under this title;
> (iv) concerning—
> (I) the tax consequences of a case brought under this title; or
> (II) the dischargeability of tax claims;
> (v) whether the debtor may or should promise to repay debts to a creditor or enter into a reaffirmation agreement with a creditor to reaffirm a debt;
> (vi) concerning how to characterize the nature of the debtor's interests in property or the debtor's debts; or amendment to §110(e)(2) explicitly prohibited actions by bankruptcy petition preparers that had previously been prohibited by state law as the unauthorized practice of law. In re Bernales, 345 B.R. 206, 214-15 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2006). Section 110(e)(2) should be understood as a general prohibition against the practice of law by bankruptcy petition preparers. Id. at 215.

Section 110 prohibits virtually all conduct falling into the category of guidance or advice, effectively restricting bankruptcy petition preparers to providing typing services only. In re Guttierez, 248 B.R. 287, 297-98 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2000). A bankruptcy petition preparer cannot, for example, explain to the debtor how to fill out the bankruptcy forms or schedules, or answer questions about exemptions. Id. at 298. A bankruptcy petition preparer cannot opine on the likelihood of a debtor being able to keep his home in a bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2)(B)(iii). And a bankruptcy petition preparer cannot solicit information from a debtor and then translate that information into completed bankruptcy forms. Frankfort Digital, Svcs. v. Neary (In re Reynoso), 315 B.R. 544, 552 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2004), aff'd, 477 F.3d 111 (9th Cir. 2007).

Mr. Lucas did much more than provide typing services to the Debtors. Mr. Lucas stipulated, and testified, that he advised clients on what exemptions to claim on Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 6, Schedule C.[10] Sanctions Order at 2, Stip. B [Dkt #1, Att. #2]; Hr'g Tr. at 23-25 [Dkt #6, Att. #7]. In addition, one of the Debtors testified that Mr. Lucas advised him that the Debtors might not be able to keep their house in a chapter 13 bankruptcy. Hr'g Tr. at 52-53 [Dkt #6, Att. #7]. The Debtor further testified that he filled out a questionnaire provided by Mr. Lucas to disclose his assets and liabilities. Id. at 45. Mr. Lucas testified that he uses a questionnaire to gather the information he needs from his clients to complete the bankruptcy forms in all the cases he handles. Id. at 55. Based on this conduct, and Appellant's stipulation, the bankruptcy court found Mr. Lucas provided legal advice to debtors in violation of section 110(e). See In re Farness, 244 B.R. 464 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2000) (Providing assistance to debtors by identifying exemptions constitutes the unauthorized practice of law.); 11 U.S.C. §110(e)(2) (providing advice regarding whether the debtor will be able to retain the debtor's home after commencing a case under title 11 constitutes prohibited legal advice); In re Bernales, 345 B.R. at 216 (use of questionnaire to gather information from which to complete bankruptcy petition and associated paperwork constitutes unauthorized practice of law). Because there was substantial evidence supporting that finding, the bankruptcy court did not engage in clear error in making it.

[10] Schedule C is an attachment to a debtor's bankruptcy petition. We have included a copy of the current Schedule C as an addendum to this brief. In Schedule C, a debtor chooses how to apply various available legal exemptions to his property to prevent that property from being liquidated as part of the bankruptcy estate. For each asset for which a debtor claims an exemption, he must describe the asset, choose the legal basis for the exemption to which he believes he is entitled, state the value of the exemption being claimed, and provide the value of asset without the exemption.

Nor did the bankruptcy court err in finding Mr. Lucas violated 11 U.S.C. §110(f) by advertising his services under a category containing the word "legal." Sanctions Order at 2 [Dkt #1, Att. #2]. Mr. Lucas stipulated that his conduct violated section 110(f), which provides that "[a] bankruptcy petition preparer shall not use the word 'legal' or any similar term in any advertisements, or advertise under any category that includes the word 'legal' or any similar term." 11 U.S.C. § 110(f); Sanctions Order at 2, Stip. A [Dkt #1, Att. #2]. Based on that stipulation, the bankruptcy court properly found that Mr. Lucas violated section 110(f).

B. The Bankruptcy Court Was Required by Statute to Order Mr. Lucas to Pay $2000 in Statutory Damages and Properly Exercised Its Discretion in Ordering Him to Pay $1000 in Statutory Fines.

Mr. Lucas is subject to statutory penalties for his failure to comply with Section 110. The statute authorizes three types of monetary penalties. First, the bankruptcy court may order the turnover of fees paid by the debtor. 11 U.S.C. §110(h)(3)(B). Second, the bankruptcy court must award actual and statutory damages to the debtor. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1) ("If a bankruptcy petition preparer violates this section . . . the court shall order the bankruptcy petition preparer to pay to the debtor" actual and statutory damages and reasonable attorneys fees). Third, the bankruptcy court may fine the debtor up to $500 for each violation. 11 U.S.C. §110(l)(1) In this case, the bankruptcy court did all three by ordering Mr. Lucas 1) to return the $300 the Debtors paid him, which Mr. Lucas had already agreed to do; 2) to pay the Debtors $2000 in statutory damages; and 3) to pay $1000 in fines to the United States Trustees Fund. Sanctions Order at 5, Stips. C, D, E [Dkt #1, Att. #2].

In his opening brief, Mr. Lucas does not allege that the bankruptcy court erred in imposing sanctions against him under section 110. Indeed, he concedes that he violated section 110 and that sanctions are warranted. Appellant's Brief at 1-2 [Dkt #4] ("Appellant has had a substantial change of heart in the defense of sanctions imposed upon him by the bankruptcy Court….His narrow appeal is the extent and amount of monetary penalties imposed upon him."). Instead, Mr. Lucas argues that the bankruptcy court had discretion not to award statutory damages or impose statutory fines and that he should not be made to pay the monetary penalties because he is on a fixed income and because he will voluntarily comply with his obligations under the statute.[11] Id. at 7. As explained below, those arguments are unavailing.

1. The Bankruptcy Court Was Required to Award $2000 in Statutory Damages.

Section 110(i) of title 11 provides for a mandatory damages award to the debtor. In re Jarvis, 351 B.R. 894, 898 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2006). Subsection 110(i)(1) provides in relevant part:

> If a bankruptcy petition preparer violates this section . . . the court shall order the bankruptcy petition preparer to pay to the debtor— (A) the debtor's actual damages; (B) the greater of— (i) $2000; or (ii) twice the amount paid by the debtor to the bankruptcy petition preparer for the preparer's services; and (C) reasonable attorneys' fees and costs in moving for damages under this subsection."

(emphasis added). "'Shall' means 'shall'" and is not subject to statutory interpretation. In re Sexton, 397 B.R. 375, 377 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 2008).

The amount of the mandatory damages award is equal to the sum of: 1) the debtor's actual damages, and 2) the greater of $2000 or twice the bankruptcy petition preparer's fee, and 3) any attorney's fees and costs incurred by the debtor in moving for sanctions. 11 U.S.C. §110(i)(1). In this case, there was no evidence presented of actual damages suffered by the Debtors. The Debtors paid Mr. Lucas $300 for his services. Voluntary Petition at pg. 48, Form 280 [Dkt #6, Att. #1]. The greater of $2000 or twice Mr. Lucas's fee is $2000, so the amount of statutory damages is $2000. The Debtors did not incur any attorney's fees with regard to the motion for sanctions because it was filed by the United States Trustee. Hr'g Tr. at 73-74 [Dkt #6, Att. #7]. The sum of the three damages components under section 110(i)(1) is $2000. Therefore, the bankruptcy court was required to award damages to the Debtors under 11 U.S.C. §110(i) in the amount of $2000.

Mr. Lucas contends that the bankruptcy court had discretion to limit the award of statutory damages to the amount of the Debtors' actual damages, which Mr. Lucas alleges are nonexistent.[12] Appellant's Brief at 7 [Dkt #4]. That argument ignores the fact that the statute is written in the conjunctive, rather than the disjunctive. In other words, the statute is cumulative as well as mandatory. In re McGill, No. 06-32029, 2007 WL 1119939 at *7 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. Apr. 13, 2007). See also In re Cleaver, 333 B.R. 430, 434-435 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2005) (finding that statute that included word "and" should be read in the conjunctive). This means in this case that all three elements of section (i) - actual damages, statutory damages, and attorney's fees - are to be included in a damages calculation.

The legislative history supports this plain language reading. It explains that section 110 provides that "if the preparer commits an inappropriate or deceptive act, the debtor is entitled to receive actual damages, plus statutory damages of $2000 or twice the amount paid to the preparer, which ever is greater, plus reasonable attorney's fees and costs of seeking such relief." 140 Cong. Rec. H 10,770 (October 4, 1994) (emphasis added). Thus, the bankruptcy court was required by the statute to award all three types of damages specified in subsection 110(i) (A) – (C); it had no discretion to pick and choose among the three.

[12] Appellant states that under 11 U.S.C. §110(i) damages can be limited to "'the debtor's actual damages; -or- (B) the greater of – (i) $2,000; or (ii) twice the amount paid by the debtor to the bankruptcy petition preparer for the preparer's services…'" Id. However, section 110(i) does not include an "or" between subsections A, B, and C.

2. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Statutory Discretion By Fining Mr. Lucas $500 for Each Violation.

The bankruptcy court was authorized under the statute to fine Mr. Lucas up to $500 for each violation of section 110(b) – (h). 11 U.S.C. §110(l)(1). Section 110(l) provides that "[a] bankruptcy preparer who fails to comply with any provision of subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) (g), or (h) may be fined not more than $500 for each such failure." The bankruptcy court found, and Mr. Lucas stipulated, that Mr. Lucas violated two subsections of section 110 – subsections 110(e) and (f) – by advertising his services under a legal heading and by offering legal advice to his clients. Therefore, the bankruptcy court was entitled to impose a fine of up to $1000 ($500 for each violation), which it did.

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by fining Mr. Lucas the maximum amount permitted by the statute. Mr. Lucas strenuously resisted the statutory limitations on the services he may provide. See Resp. to Mot. for Sanctions [Dkt #6, Att. #3]. Further, Mr. Lucas's violations of section 110 are of a particularly serious nature and could greatly impact a debtor's bankruptcy case. Mr. Lucas did not merely forget to include his social security number on a bankruptcy filing. He provided legal advice to the Debtors that could have affected the chapter that the Debtors chose to file under and the exemptions that they claimed. Hr'g Tr. at 47 and 52 [Dkt #6, Att. #7]. And, by advertising under the heading of legal services, Mr. Lucas likely encouraged debtors to rely on his unlawful legal advice. Such serious violations warrant a meaningful penalty under the statute.

Regardless, Mr. Lucas does not contend in his appeal that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it fined him $500 per violation. See generally Appellant's Brief [Dkt #4]. Rather, he states that he is unable to pay the fines. For the reasons stated below, this argument is without merit.

II. Mr. Lucas's Alleged Inability to Pay Is Not A Sufficient Reason to Vacate or Remit the Statutory Penalties Imposed By the Bankruptcy Court.

Mr. Lucas has forfeited any argument concerning his ability to pay. He argues for the first time on appeal that the monetary sanctions awarded by the bankruptcy court should be removed or suspended because "he has made sincere efforts to conform his actions to the requirements of the law and because severe hardship will result to him if he is required to pay the full amount." Id. at 11. Although Mr. Lucas was represented by counsel at the hearing on the sanctions motion, Mr. Lucas did not raise either of those arguments in the bankruptcy court. Therefore, it is too late for him to raise them now. Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U.S. 552, 556 (1941) (appellate court ordinarily does not give consideration to issues not raised below). Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 514 (1994); See also Garcia v. American Marine Corp., 432 F.2d 6, 8 (5th Cir. 1970) (fact not presented at trial may not be asserted on appeal); Smith v. Central Ariz. Water Conservation Dist., 418 F.3d 1028, 1033, (9th Cir. 2005) (facts not presented to the lower court are not part of the record on appeal).

In addition, in his opening brief, Mr. Lucas does not contend that Section 110 required the bankruptcy court to consider either Mr. Lucas's post-sanction behavior or financial means in determining the appropriate amount of sanctions and he has not identified anything in the language of the statute or the case law interpreting the statute that would support such a requirement. Regardless, a mention of an issue without reasoning and support is insufficient to raise an issue on appeal. Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767, 778 n. 4 (9th Cir. 1996). Therefore, even if the issue had been raised at the bankruptcy court level, it would have been irrelevant to the process of determining the appropriate sanctions, and could not have been properly raised on appeal.

In any event, there is no basis to reverse the lower court on this ground because there is no evidence in the record that Mr. Lucas could not afford the fine imposed by the bankruptcy court. To the contrary, at the hearing, Mr. Lucas' counsel told the bankruptcy court that Mr. Lucas could afford a $1000 fine. Hr'g Tr. at 41 [Dkt #6, Att. #7] ("But we can afford a $1,000 fine…"). Based on that judicial admission, Mr. Lucas is estopped from arguing on appeal that he cannot pay the $1,000 fine.[13] See Karkoukli's, Inc. v. Dohany, 409 F.3d 279, 283 (6th Cir. 2005) (parties bound by statements in briefs and pleadings); U.S. v. Bentson, 947 F.2d 1353, 1356 (9th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 504 U.S. 958 (1992) (statement made by attorney in closing argument constituted binding judicial admission).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered below.

[13] Mr. Lucas's arguments regarding his financial ability to pay the fines, although not relevant to this appeal, may be raised when collection efforts are attempted as, for example, a defense to a motion for a civil contempt order. However, to the United States Trustee's knowledge, no such collection efforts have begun.

No. 05-996

v.

CITIZENS BANK OF MASSACHUSETTS, ET AL.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIRST CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING RESPONDENTS

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The courts below found that petitioner, a debtor in bankruptcy, had made false declarations about his assets and financial affairs in furtherance of a scheme to place his assets beyond the reach of his creditors. Because of petitioner's bad faith conduct, the courts below did not allow petitioner to convert his chapter 7 case to chapter 13. Whether courts may act to deter and sanction a debtor's bad faith conduct in that manner is an issue of substantial importance to the United States.

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of the federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88 (1977). The United States Trustee Program thus "acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency and to protect and preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy system." U.S. Dep't of Justice, United States Trustee Program Strategic Plan FY 2005-2010, at 2 (visited Sept. 28, 2006) <http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/ust_org/StrategicPlanFY2005-2010.pdf>. By statute, "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this Title." 11 U.S.C. 307.

In addition, the United States is the largest creditor in the Nation, and numerous federal agencies, including the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Commerce Department's Economic Development Administration, the Small Business Administration, the Internal Revenue Service, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, frequently appear as creditors in chapter 7 proceedings. Because a bankruptcy estate's assets are typically scarce, the United States has an interest in preventing and deterring chapter 7 debtors from concealing assets that should be turned over to satisfy claims of the United States.

STATEMENT

1. a. A debtor commences a voluntary bankruptcy case by filing a petition in bankruptcy court. 11 U.S.C. 301. Four chapters—7, 11, 12, and 13—are potentially available to an individual debtor, and the debtor is required to elect one by checking the appropriate box on the petition. Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 1.

Within 15 days after filing the petition, the debtor must file under penalty of perjury a schedule of assets and liabilities, a schedule of current income and current expenditures, and a statement of the debtor's financial affairs. 11 U.S.C. 521(1); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(c); Official Form 6 (Schedules), Form 7 (Statement of Financial Affairs)).

b. Individual debtors typically file for relief under chapter 7 or chapter 13. Chapter 7 provides for a liquidation of a debtor's assets in exchange for a discharge of debts. 11 U.S.C. 701-727. Commencement of a chapter 7 case creates an "estate" that includes all of the debtor's interests in property as of the commencement of the case. 11 U.S.C. 541(a). The debtor must surrender all non-exempt estate property to the chapter 7 trustee, who takes custody of estate property, liquidates it, and disburses the proceeds to creditors in accordance with their rights and priorities under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. 507, 521(3) and (4), 704(1), 726.

A chapter 7 debtor is entitled to a discharge of his pre-petition debts unless the debtor is ineligible or the debts are of a type excepted from discharge by the Code. 11 U.S.C. 523, 727(a) and (b). Courts have the authority, however, to dismiss a chapter 7 case "for cause." 11 U.S.C. 707(a). Similarly, notwithstanding disbursement of estate assets to creditors, courts may deny a chapter 7 discharge altogether in specified circumstances, including when the debtor has committed acts of concealment or fraud. 11 U.S.C. 727(a)(2)-(6).

Chapter 13 provides for the adjustment of debts of an individual with regular income. 11 U.S.C. 1301-1330. In contrast to chapter 7, a chapter 13 debtor remains in possession of estate assets and receives a discharge of his debts only after he pays his creditors under a plan confirmed by the court. 11 U.S.C. 1304, 1306(b), 1321-1328.

c. Debtors may convert their cases from one chapter to another. 11 U.S.C. 706(a), 1112(a), 1208(a), 1307(a). As relevant here, Section 706(a) provides that "[t]he debtor may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 11, 12, or 13 of this title at any time, if the case has not been converted under section 1112, 1208, or 1307 of this title." The Code also authorizes a court in a proceeding under chapter 13 to dismiss the case or convert it to a chapter 7 case "for cause." 11 U.S.C. 1307(c).

2. On March 11, 2003, petitioner filed a voluntary bankruptcy petition under chapter 7. In petitioner's schedules of assets, petitioner declared, under penalty of perjury, that (a) his Gloucester, Massachusetts, residence was the only real property interest he held; (b) he was the 100% beneficiary of Bo-Mar Realty Trust, a spendthrift trust that held real property in Maine; (c) the current market value of his interest in the trust was zero; and (d) the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) owed him no tax refunds. Pet. App. 10, 30.

Respondent Mark G. DeGiacomo is the chapter 7 trustee appointed in petitioner's case. Based on the trustee's investigation of petitioner's financial affairs (see 11 U.S.C. 704(4)), the trustee concluded that petitioner had failed to disclose two estate assets in his schedules and statement of financial affairs. First, petitioner had not disclosed that he, within one year before filing his chapter 7 petition, transferred residential real estate in York, Maine, having an unencumbered value of $85,000 to the Bo-Mar Realty Trust for no consideration and designated himself sole beneficiary and his girlfriend sole trustee. J.A. 29a-31a; Pet. App. 12, 30. Petitioner's acknowledged intent in that transaction was to protect the property from the claims of his creditors. Id. at 30. Second, petitioner had failed to disclose that in July 2002, he had filed an amended tax return that sought a tax refund from the IRS. Id. at 26-27, 30; J.A. 30a-31a. The chapter 7 trustee subsequently informed petitioner that the trustee would seek to avoid the transfer of the Maine property to the trust as a fraudulent conveyance. Pet. App. 14; J.A. 30a; see 11 U.S.C. 548. Thereafter, petitioner filed a notice under Section 706(a) seeking to convert his case to chapter 13. J.A. 11a.

The chapter 7 trustee opposed the conversion on the ground that petitioner had acted in bad faith by intentionally failing to disclose his requested federal tax refund and his transfer of the Maine property to the trust seven months before his chapter 7 petition. Pet. App. 30-31; J.A. 13a-18a. Respondent Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, a secured creditor, also opposed conversion on the ground that the debtor had acted in bad faith. Pet. App. 13; J.A. 19a-25a. Petitioner responded that his misstatements and omissions were inadvertent and that he sought to convert his case to chapter 13 because he had acquired additional rental income and gainful employment. Pet. App. 31; J.A. 33a.

3. a. After conducting a hearing on petitioner's request to convert, the bankruptcy court denied conversion on the ground that petitioner's misrepresentation of his financial affairs constituted "bad faith." Pet. App. 15, 31; J.A. 34a-35a; Supp. J.A. 33. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the First Circuit affirmed. Id. at 9-28.

b. The First Circuit affirmed. Pet. App. 29-46. After examining the statutory text of Section 706(a), the court concluded that it could "discern no evidence that the Congress intended to override the presumptive power and responsibility of the bankruptcy court to weed out abuses of the bankruptcy process at any stage in the bankruptcy proceedings." Id. at 33. The court also rejected (id. at 37-38) petitioner's reliance on the Senate Report accompanying Section 706(a), which states that Section 706(a) gives the debtor "the one-time absolute right of conversion" and reflects the policy "that the debtor should always be given the opportunity to repay his debts." S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 94 (1978). The court of appeals explained that those statements, when read in context, did not "negate[] nor undermine[] the overarching principle that the bankruptcy courts are duty bound to take all reasonable steps to preclude debtors from abusing or manipulating the bankruptcy process in order to undermine the essential purposes of the Bankruptcy Code." Pet. App. 38.

The court of appeals further observed that "the Code accords the bankruptcy court discretion to reconvert a chapter 13 case to chapter 7 * * * where the debtor has acted in 'bad faith.'" Pet. App. 39; see 11 U.S.C. 1307(c). The court explained that "it would ill serve general policies aimed at promoting the efficient administration of bankruptcy cases to insist that a bankruptcy court—already confronted with clear evidence of a debtor's bad faith—must indulge in the technical formality of converting the chapter 7 case to chapter 13, knowing full well that eventually the case must be reconverted by reason of that same evidence of bad faith." Pet. App. 39. The court also determined that the record "amply supported" the bankruptcy court's finding that petitioner acted in bad faith. Id. at 41.

c. While petitioner's appeal of the denial of his conversion motion was pending, the chapter 7 trustee recovered the Maine property from the trust in order to liquidate it for the benefit of petitioner's creditors. Marrama v. DeGiacomo (In re Marrama), 316 B.R. 418, 421-422 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2004). Furthermore, Citizens Bank of Massachusetts filed a complaint under 11 U.S.C. 727(a)(2) seeking to deny the debtor a discharge on the grounds that petitioner had engaged in pre-bankruptcy transfers to defraud his creditors. The bankruptcy court granted the denial of a discharge. That order was affirmed by the court of appeals, which concluded that petitioner "transferred valuable assets belonging to him, less than a year before he petitioned for bankruptcy protection, with the actual intent to defraud his creditors." Marrama v. Citizens Bank (In re Marrama), 445 F.3d 518, 524 (1st Cir. 2006).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

A. Courts have the inherent power to respond to a party's misconduct in litigation by entering sanctions such as dismissal of the lawsuit or an award of attorney's fees. Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32 (1991); Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752 (1980); Link v. Wabash R.R., 370 U.S. 626 (1962). Similarly, Congress indicated in Section 105(a) of the Bankruptcy Code that bankruptcy courts may "tak[e] any action or mak[e] any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process." 11 U.S.C. 105(a).

B. Nothing in the text of Section 706(a) strips the bankruptcy court of its inherent authority, reinforced in Section 105(a), to prevent and deter abuses of the bankruptcy system by denying a debtor relief to which he would otherwise be entitled. Section 706(a) provides that the "[t]he debtor may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 11, 12, or 13 of this title at any time" if the case has not been previously converted to chapter 7 under another chapter. 11 U.S.C.

706(a). The statute does not confer an absolute right, and nothing in the statutory text even mentions, much less impairs, the bankruptcy court's inherent discretion to deny relief in the face of a debtor's bad faith—discretion that is explicitly confirmed in Section 105(a).

C. The bankruptcy court's inherent power to deny conversion to chapter 13 is not foreclosed by Section 1307(c), which permits the court to dismiss a chapter 13 case or convert it to chapter 7 for cause (including the debtor's bad faith). To the contrary, that provision only underscores the appropriateness of denying conversion to chapter 13 in circumstances such as this. Congress's express authorization to convert a chapter 13 case into a chapter 7 liquidation indicates that a denial of rights under chapter 13 is a proper sanction for fraud. Section 1307(c) cannot be read to preclude a court from addressing fraud that is evident before the attempted conversion to chapter 13 or to require a conversion just so that the case can be reconverted to chapter 7. Under this Court's precedents, moreover, statutory and procedural sanctions generally do not displace a court's inherent power. Chambers, 501 U.S. at 42-51; Link, 370 U.S. at 630-632.

It would make little sense for the bankruptcy court to convert a case to chapter 13 under Section 706(a) when the court has already determined that the debtor has acted in bad faith such that his case should not proceed under chapter 13. Nor should a bad faith debtor have a right to convert to chapter 13 so that he may propose a plan under that chapter. The Code nowhere confers such a right, because Section 1307(c) allows the court, "for cause," to dismiss the chapter 13 case or convert it to chapter 7 at any time without any prerequisite that the debtor first be permitted to propose a plan.

D. Section 706(a)'s legislative history does not establish that Congress intended to displace the bankruptcy court's power to sanction bad faith debtors. The Senate Report to Section 706(a) states that the provision confers on the debtor "the one-time absolute right of conversion" so that "the debtor should always be given the opportunity to repay his debts." S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 94 (1978). The off-hand reference to the debtor's "absolute" right may simply be a recognition of the fact that the right cannot be waived by agreement. The Report did not address the situation in which the right to convert has been forfeited by fraud, and it would be a mistake to assume that Congress intended to immunize fraud on courts and creditors. A Senate Report is not written and should not be read like legislative text, and petitioner's argument shows the hazards of doing so. In any event, the legislative history, when read in context, reflects an intent to confer rights only on an honest debtor who intends to "repay his debts." Ibid. The statute's history thus does not purport to cabin a court's inherent power to prevent an abuse of process.

E. A bankruptcy court has the discretion to deny conversion when the debtor intentionally misleads the trustee, creditors, or the bankruptcy court as to the debtor's financial affairs. A debtor who comes to the bankruptcy court seeking relief from his debts, but who in bad faith fails to disclose assets that are to be used to pay creditors, commits gross misconduct that threatens both the foundation and the integrity of the bankruptcy process. Because the bankruptcy court found that petitioner's misstatements of his financial affairs were made in bad faith, the court properly denied conversion in order to sanction the debtor and to prevent further abuse of process.

ARGUMENT

BANKRUPTCY COURTS POSSESS INHERENT POWER TO DENY CONVERSIONS WHEN SOUGHT BY BAD FAITH DEBTORS

A. Bankruptcy Courts Possess The Inherent Power To Sanction Bad Faith Conduct

1. This Court's precedents have "recognized the 'well-acknowledged' inherent power of a court to levy sanctions in response to abusive litigation practices." Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752, 765 (1980) (citing Link v. Wabash R.R., 370 U.S. 626, 632 (1962)). "It has long been understood that '[c]ertain implied powers must necessarily result to our Courts of justice from the nature of their institution,' powers 'which cannot be dispensed with in a Court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others.'" Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 43 (1991) (quoting United States v. Hudson, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 32, 34 (1812)). "These powers are 'governed not by rule or statute but by the control necessarily vested in courts to manage their own affairs so as to achieve the orderly and expeditious disposition of cases.'" Ibid. (quoting Link, 370 U.S. at 630-631).

"A primary aspect" of a court's inherent powers is "the ability to fashion an appropriate sanction for conduct which abuses the judicial process." Chambers, 501 U.S. at 44-45. A court thus confronted with a party's bad faith conduct in seeking judicial relief or in litigating his cause of action has the discretion to respond with a variety of sanctions. This Court has recognized that "outright dismissal of a law suit * * * is within the court's discretion" and that "the 'less severe sanction' of an assessment of attorney's fees is undoubtedly within a court's inherent power as well." Id. at 45 (quoting Roadway Express, Inc., 447 U.S. at 765).

A clear expression of congressional intent is required to displace a court's inherent power to sanction bad faith conduct. Chambers, 501 U.S. at 47. Accordingly, although "the exercise of the inherent power of lower federal courts can be limited by statute and rule," this Court will "'not lightly assume that Congress has intended to depart from established principles,' such as the scope of a court's inherent power." Ibid. (quoting Weinberger v. Romero-Barcelo, 456 U.S. 305, 313 (1982)).

2. The Bankruptcy Code, far from displacing the inherent powers of courts, expressly recognizes the bankruptcy court's authority to sanction litigants for abusive litigation practices. The Code states that "[n]o provision of this title providing for the raising of an issue by a party in interest shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action or making any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process." 11 U.S.C. 105(a) (emphasis added); see 132 Cong. Rec. 28,610 (1986) (statement of Sen. Hatch) (Section 105(a) "allows a bankruptcy court to take any action on its own, or to make any necessary determination to prevent an abuse of process and to help expedite a case in a proper and justified manner"). Thus, it is well established that bankruptcy courts have the power to sanction parties or counsel for bad faith conduct in bankruptcy proceedings.[1]

To be sure, Section 105(a) does not empower bankruptcy courts to act contrary to other direct commands of the Code. Cf. Northwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988) ("whatever equitable powers remain in the bankruptcy courts must and can only be exercised within the confines of the Bankruptcy Code"). But it does expressly caution against reading provisions allowing a party to raise an issue as conferring an absolute right that would trump a court's ability to sanction misconduct. More broadly, Section 105(a) reflects Congress's intent not to displace the established power of courts to impose appropriate orders to prevent an abuse of process. Thus, absent an express provision in the Code that limits a court's inherent power, the bankruptcy court retains the discretion to impose appropriate sanctions in response to a litigant's bad faith.

B. The Text Of Section 706(a) Does Not Restrict A Court's Inherent Power To Deny Conversion When Requested By A Bad Faith Debtor

1. Section 706(a) does not expressly address, much less limit, a court's inherent power to sanction bad faith conduct by denying relief to which the debtor would otherwise be entitled. Section 706(a) provides:

> The debtor may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 11, 12, or 13 of this title at any time, if the case has not been converted under section 1112, 1208, or 1307 of this title. Any waiver of the right to convert a case under this subsection is unenforceable.

11 U.S.C. 706(a). As an initial matter, the text is addressed to the debtor, and does not refer to the court's powers at all. By providing that "[t]he debtor may convert" a chapter 7 case to another chapter, Congress indicated its intent that conversion is to be initiated by the debtor, rather than another party or the court. But the language does not confer an absolute right on the debtor and does not direct the court to convert automatically upon the debtor's request.

In any event, the statutory text, at most, gives rise to a presumptive right of the debtor to a one-time conversion; it does not restrict, either expressly or implicitly, the ability of the court to exercise its inherent power to respond to abusive tactics or bad faith by the debtor. Section 706(a) is best understood as giving the right to raise the issue of conversion, but in keeping with the approach expressed in Section 105(a), such a provision should not be read to prevent courts from "taking any action * * * to prevent an abuse of process." 11 U.S.C. 105(a). Nor does Section 706(a) purport to confer rights on bad faith debtors. The statutory language "contains no intimation that the debtor should be accorded protection against his own willful misconduct, such as an intentional abuse of the bankruptcy process." Pet. App. 36.

Relying on this Court's recognition that "[t]he word 'may' customarily connotes discretion," Jama v. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005), petitioner's amicus argues that Section 706(a) vests debtors with unbounded discretion to decide whether to convert, thereby stripping the court of any power to deny relief. National Ass'n of Consumer Bankr. Att'ys (NACBA) Amicus Br. 8-13. The word "may," however, does not remotely rise to the level of a clear indication that Congress intended to restrict a court's inherent power to sanction a party's bad faith conduct by denying statutory relief to which that party would otherwise be entitled. While it is no doubt true that the term "may" suggests discretion, it is equally true that "in a system of laws discretion is rarely without limits." Martin v. Franklin Capital Corp., 126 S. Ct. 704, 710 (2005) (quoting Independent Fed'n of Flight Attendants v. Zipes, 491 U.S. 754, 758 (1989)); see System Fed'n No. 91 v. Wright, 364 U.S. 642, 648 (1961) ("discretion is never without limits"). Considerably more than the mere recognition of a discretionary right would be required to demonstrate that Congress stripped the courts of their inherent authority to deny relief sought in bad faith.[2]

[2] The example proffered by petitioner's amicus (NACBA Amicus Br. 8) serves only to confirm the implausibility of petitioner's interpretation. A neighbor's statement to another that "You may use my rake at any time" may well "grant[] the other neighbor permission to use the rake at the latter's discretion," ibid., but it does not confer unlimited discretion. Surely, for example, the other neighbor is not thereby authorized to grab the rake unceremoniously out of its owner's hands while the latter is raking his yard. Nor is it obvious that the discretion to borrow the rake would survive an intervening misuse of a borrowed shovel.

For similar reasons, petitioner's amicus errs in relying on the fact that Section 706(a) specifies two express preconditions to conversion—(1) absence of a prior conversion and (2) eligibility as a debtor, see 11 U.S.C. 706(d)—but does not expressly impose a good faith requirement. NACBA Amicus Br. 13-16. The expressio unius canon has no application to a requirement that a litigant refrain from bad faith, because that requirement is necessarily implicit whenever a party seeks relief from a court. In other words, because "[a]ll courts have inherent power and duty to prevent abuse of their jurisdiction," "Congress does not have to add to each and every statutory subsection and committee comment thereon the proviso, 'subject to bad faith.'" In re Starkey, 179 B.R. 687, 693 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. 1995).

2. The court of appeals also correctly concluded that Congress' use of the statutory phrase "at any time" in Section 706(a) refers to the time frame in which the debtor may convert; it does not speak to the circumstances under which conversion may occur. At most, that phrase confers an absolute right to convert without regard to time frame, not an absolute right to convert no matter what. Thus, "the debtor may seek to convert at any time during the pendency of the bankruptcy case, or in other words, * * * no artificial time constraints should impede an election to convert." Pet. App. 35. But that temporal phrase "hardly equates to the more broad circumstantial permission which Congress could have conferred, for example, by employing a phrase such as 'regardless of the circumstances.'" Ibid.; accord In re Copper, 426 F.3d 810, 816 (6th Cir. 2005).

Likewise, a court's inherent power to sanction abuse is not affected by the second sentence of Section 706(a), which provides that "[a]ny waiver of the right to convert a case under this subsection is unenforceable." 11 U.S.C. 706(a). "[I]n context this sentence functions strictly as a consumer protection provision against adhesion contracts, whereby a debtor's creditors might be precluded from attempting to prescribe a waiver of the debtor's right to convert to chapter 13 as a non-negotiable condition of its contractual agreements." Pet. App. 35. There is a difference between waiver and forfeiture, see, e.g., Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 458 n.13 (2004), and an anti-waiver provision does not necessarily preclude a party from forfeiting a right through affirmative misconduct or immunize a party from the court's inherent authority to sanction misconduct.[3] [3] Petitioner also argues (Br. 26) that conversion cannot be denied on the basis of a debtor's bad faith because the Bankruptcy Rules do not specifically require motions to convert under Section 706(a) to be treated as contested matters under Rule 9014. As the court of appeals observed, however, the Code contemplates that parties in interest may contest at least some factual pre-conditions to conversion, such as "the absence of any prior conversions to chapter 13, and the debtor's ability to meet the eligibility requirements to file a chapter 13 petition in the first instance." Pet. App. 45. Moreover, the Rules provide that a debtor requesting conversion under Section 706(a) must seek that relief by motion. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(f)(2), 9013. The Rules thus also contemplate that the bankruptcy court will review the matter before ordering relief. In any event, nothing in Rule 9014(c) addresses, much less displaces, a court's inherent power to act, sua sponte or on motion of a party, in the face of a debtor's abuse of the bankruptcy process, nor do the Rules limit the court's ability to hold any hearing that may be necessary in such instances to resolve contested issues of material fact.

C. A Bankruptcy Court's Express Power To Dismiss A Chapter 13 Case Or Convert It To Chapter 7 Does Not Deprive The Court Of Its Inherent Authority To Deny Conversion In The First Instance

1. Section 1307(c) provides that "on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under [chapter 13] to a case under chapter 7 * * * , or may dismiss a case under [chapter 13], whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate, for cause." 11 U.S.C. 1307(c). A debtor's bad faith constitutes cause under Section 1307(c).[4] Petitioner and his amicus argue that because Congress empowers a bankruptcy court to respond to a debtor's bad faith by dismissal of the chapter 13 case or by reconversion of the case to chapter 7, Congress left no room under Section 706(a) for courts to deny conversion in the first instance even when the debtor seeks conversion in bad faith or the court is aware of pre-conversion efforts to defraud the court and creditors. Pet. Br. 24; NACBA Amicus Br. 18-20. That contention lacks merit.

The law is clear that "the inherent power of a court can be invoked even if procedural rules exist which sanction the same conduct." Chambers, 501 U.S. at 49. Thus, in Link, 370 U.S. at 630-632, this Court held that a court had the inherent authority to dismiss a suit sua sponte for lack of prosecution notwithstanding the fact that Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 41(b) appears to require a motion by a party. Similarly, in Chambers, 501 U.S. at 42-50, the Court held that a court's inherent power to impose attorney's fees as a sanction was not foreclosed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11 and 28 U.S.C. 1927, which authorize the imposition of attorney's fees as a sanction in specified circumstances. The Court explained that other mechanisms of sanctioning misconduct, either "taken alone or together, are not substitutes for the inherent power," and accordingly that federal courts are not "forbidden to sanction bad-faith conduct by means of the inherent power simply because that conduct could also be sanctioned under the statute or the Rules." Chambers, 501 U.S. at 46, 50. Thus, "if in the informed discretion of the court, neither the statute nor [procedural rules] are up to the task, the court may safely rely on its inherent power." Id. at 50.

[4] See, e.g., Alt v. United States (In re Alt), 305 F.3d 413, 418-420 (6th Cir. 2002); In re Lilley, 91 F.3d 491, 496 (3d Cir. 1996); Molitor v. Eidson (In re Molitor), 76 F.3d 218, 220 (8th Cir. 1996); Eisen v. Curry (In re Eisen), 14 F.3d 469, 470 (9th Cir. 1994); In re Love, 957 F.2d 1350, 1354 (7th Cir. 1992).

There is no basis for limiting the court's inherent discretion to enter sanctions at the earliest appropriate opportunity, i.e., by denying conversion in the first instance. "[I]t would ill serve general policies aimed at promoting the efficient administration of bankruptcy cases to insist that a bankruptcy court—already confronted with clear evidence of a debtor's bad faith—must indulge in the technical formality of converting the chapter 7 case to chapter 13, knowing full well that eventually the case must be reconverted by reason of that same evidence of bad faith." Pet. App. 39. As the court of appeals of appeals observed, the Code does not require "such pointless spinning of judicial wheels." Ibid. Indeed, far from undermining the authority to deny conversion as a sanction for bad faith, Section 1307(c) underscores the appropriateness of requiring chapter 7 liquidation as a sanction. The fact that Congress expressly contemplated dismissal or conversion of chapter 13 proceedings as a sanction for bad faith conduct should not preclude a court hearing a chapter 7 case from imposing a like sanction for bad faith that precedes an effort to convert to chapter 13.

2. Petitioner and his amicus contend that forcing a court to grant a debtor's motion to convert, even in the face of fraud on the court or other egregious misconduct by the debtor, would serve the purpose of giving the debtor an opportunity to propose a repayment plan under 11 U.S.C. 1322. Pet. Br. 22-26; NACBA Amicus Br. 18-20, 23-24. In a similar vein, petitioner's amicus observes that the bankruptcy court cannot confirm a chapter 13 plan unless unsecured creditors will receive at least as much as they would under chapter 7. Id. at 19-20 (citing 11 U.S.C. 1325(a)(4), 1328(b)(2)). Amicus argues that those provisions, along with the power of the chapter 13 trustee to investigate the debtor's financial affairs, "provide[] powerful assurance that a debtor cannot convert a case to chapter 13 in order to evade his creditors." Id. at 19. Those contentions are flawed in several fundamental respects.

Section 1307(c) contains no requirement that a bankruptcy court must wait for a debtor to propose a repayment plan before the court can exercise its statutory power to dismiss or reconvert the case to chapter 7 upon a finding of a debtor's bad faith. The notion that bankruptcy courts cannot act under Section 1307(c) without a prior proposal by the debtor of a plan also conflicts with Section 105(a), which permits a court to raise, on its own motion, the issue of dismissal or conversion to prevent an abuse of process. 11 U.S.C. 105(a) ("No provision of this title providing for the raising of an issue by a party in interest shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action or making any determination necessary or appropriate * * * to prevent an abuse of process.") (emphasis added).

The bankruptcy court's dismissal and conversion power under Section 1307(c), moreover, defeats the suggestion that Congress intended to confer on a bad faith debtor the right to propose a plan under chapter 13. And there is "neither a theoretical nor a practical reason that Congress would have chosen to treat a first-time motion to convert a chapter 7 case to chapter 13 under subsection 706(a) differently from the filing of a chapter 13 petition in the first instance." Pet. App. 36.

Petitioner's position similarly creates anomalous results that Congress could not have intended, as it would accord preferential treatment to bad faith debtors who initially sought relief under chapter 7, instead of chapter 13. For instance, when confronted with a bad faith debtor who initially files under chapter 13, a court unquestionably has the power to dismiss or convert the case pursuant to Section 1307(c), without waiting for the debtor to file a plan. By contrast, in petitioner's view, a bad faith debtor who initially requests chapter 7 relief but subsequently seeks to convert to chapter 13 is entitled to file a chapter 13 plan without the possibility of intervention by the court to prevent an abuse of process, at least until a plan is filed. Petitioner's proposal is wholly implausible; it finds no support in the Code, and it would frustrate the underlying purpose of the bankruptcy court's power to sanction bad faith conduct, namely, to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy system and deter similar abuses by other debtors.

In any event, there is no guarantee that creditors will be protected once a bad faith debtor converts his case to chapter 13. A debtor who has tried to defraud his creditors in chapter 7 may not mend his ways just because his case converts to chapter 13, particularly because the chapter 7 trustee will have been replaced by a new chapter 13 trustee (who presumably will have less experience with the debtor's past misconduct) and the debtor will have gained control over the assets of the estate. See, e.g., In re Copper, 426 F.3d at 810-816 (debtor lied about assets and, on the eve of trial in which divorce-decree debt would be determined to be non-dischargeable, moved to convert with no intent to pay ex-wife under chapter 13); In re Sully, 223 B.R. 582, 583-586 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1998) (debtor hid settlement of personal injury action from trustee, and once misconduct was discovered, debtor moved to convert under chapter 13 with no intent to pay creditors); Martin v. Cox, 213 B.R. 571, 572-574 (E.D. Ark. 1996) (debtor who, inter alia, falsified documents, failed to list significant assets in petition, made false representations to bankruptcy court, and violated a bankruptcy court's preliminary injunction order attempted to convert to chapter 13 with no intent to propose chapter 13 plan), aff'd, 116 F.3d 480 (8th Cir. 1997) (Table). Indeed, it has been the experience of the United States Trustees that bad faith debtors who convert to chapter 13 on the heels of the chapter 7 trustee's discovery of concealed assets often never file a plan.

Requiring a court to respond to a debtor's bad faith only after the debtor has proposed a chapter 13 plan would thus shift to innocent creditors the risk that a chapter 13 plan will never be proposed or confirmed. And even if a plan is confirmed, there is no assurance that the debtor, who has already once attempted to defraud his creditors, will make payments under the plan.

Similarly, there is no guarantee that creditors would be protected while the case languishes in chapter 13 or even if the case is ultimately converted back to chapter 7. When a chapter 7 case is converted to chapter 13, the chapter 7 trustee no longer has the power to collect and liquidate assets or administer the estate for the benefit of creditors. 11 U.S.C. 348(e). Instead, conversion to chapter 13 permits the debtor to regain control of all estate assets. 11 U.S.C. 1306(b). Petitioner's proposal would thus unjustifiably open the door for bad faith debtors to mishandle or squander their assets in furtherance of a scheme to defraud creditors. See, e.g., In re Wampler, 302 B.R. 601, 606 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2003) (after trustee learned of debtor's recovery of class action settlement, debtor refused to turn over recovery, sought conversion to chapter 13, and placed a large portion of the recovery "in a Certificate of Deposit, thereby diminishing its immediate value due to the penalty for earlier withdrawal"); In re Sully, 223 B.R. at 585 ("Conversion would afford the Debtor the use of the settlement funds, and shift the risk to creditors without any feasible likelihood of repayment."); In re Calder, 93 B.R. 739, 740 (Bankr. D. Utah 1988) (denying conversion to "prevent the debtor from further abuse of the system").

Finally, an approach that would require a court to wait for a chapter 13 plan to be filed before responding to the debtor's bad faith is even less justified for cases governed by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23. For bankruptcy cases filed after October 17, 2005, the bankruptcy court may confirm a chapter 13 plan only if "the action of the debtor in filing the petition was in good faith." § 102(g)(3), 119 Stat. 33 (to be codified at 11 U.S.C. 1325(a)(7)). Although petitioner's case was filed in 2003, before those changes became effective, the regime advanced by petitioner and his amicus would require a bankruptcy court, when confronted with a bad faith debtor's request to convert to chapter 13, to convert and give the debtor the opportunity to file a plan that Congress has categorically determined cannot be confirmed. Nothing in Section 706(a) requires that bizarre result.

D. The Legislative History Of Section 706(a) Does Not Reveal A Congressional Intent To Displace A Court's Inherent Power To Deny Relief To A Bad Faith Debtor

Petitioner asserts (Br. 20-23) that the legislative history of Section 706(a) supports his view that chapter 7 debtors who proceed in bad faith are nonetheless entitled to convert to chapter 13. There is no warrant for petitioner's apparent assumption that statements in congressional committee reports could suffice to override the inherent authority of the federal courts. As discussed, this Court will not "lightly assume" that Congress has limited or narrowed the scope of the inherent power. Chambers, 501 U.S. at 47. In any event, petitioner's interpretation of the legislative history is without merit.

1. The history of Section 706(a) contains no hint that Congress intended to require conversion when sought by a debtor acting in bad faith. The Senate Committee report accompanying Section 706(a) states:

> Subsection (a) of this section gives the debtor the one-time absolute right of conversion of a liquidation case to a reorganization or individual repayment plan > case. If the case has already once been converted from chapter 11 or 13 to chapter 7, then the debtor does not have that right. The policy of the provision is that the debtor should always be given the opportunity to repay his debts, and a waiver of the right to convert a case is unenforceable.

S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 94 (1978); accord H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 380 (1977). Placing emphasis on the words "absolute" and "always" in that passage, petitioner and his amicus argue that Congress intended to render bankruptcy courts powerless to deny a bad faith debtor's attempt to convert a chapter 7 case to another chapter. Pet. Br. 19-23; NACBA Amicus Br. 20-22.

Petitioner and his amicus make the mistake of reading the legislative history as if it were statutory text. But a Senate Report is not written, and should not be read, in that fashion. The Senate Report attempts to explain the operation of Section 706(a), and in doing so makes an off-hand reference to an "absolute right." Whatever the meaning of that phrase were it included in the operative statutory text, it is clear from context that the phrase reflects an effort to explain the text's right to file a conversion motion free from any time bar, so long as the case has not previously been converted. That reading is consistent with the sentencing following the reference to the debtor's "one-time absolute right," as that sentence makes clear that "[i]f the case has already once been converted from chapter 11 or 13 to chapter 7, then the debtor does not have that right." S. Rep. No. 989, supra, at 94. As the court of appeals observed, the reference to the debtor's "absolute" right may also be referring to the fact that "the debtor's right to conversion cannot be waived by contract." Pet. App. 37.

Under any reading of the Code, moreover, the Report's reference to an "absolute" right cannot be understood in the all-encompassing sense urged by petitioner, because conversion is expressly prohibited—and the right thus inoperative—when the debtor is not qualified to be a debtor under the other chapter. 11 U.S.C. 706(d). Nor is it literally true, as petitioner's reading of the Report suggests, that debtors "always" have the opportunity to repay their debts under chapter 13: Section 1307(c) permits the court to dismiss or convert a chapter 13 case for cause, and thus a bad faith debtor has no right whatsoever to repay his debts under chapter 13.

In any event, Section 706(a)'s legislative history does not mention, much less purport to remove, a court's inherent power to sanction and deter abuses of the bankruptcy system. There is no suggestion in the quoted passage above that Congress was addressing a dishonest debtor who was trying to defraud his creditors with no intention of repaying his debts. To the contrary, the passage is obviously referring to the honest debtor, as the overarching intent of Section 706(a) is to confer rights on a debtor who actually intends "to repay his debts." S. Rep. No. 989, supra, at 94 (emphasis added). But "[w]here conversion to [chapter] 13 amounts to an attempt to escape debts rather than to repay them, the reason for the rule ceases." In re Spencer, 137 B.R. 506, 512 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. 1992).

As the court of appeals correctly concluded, "[a] legislative policy aimed at encouraging able debtors to undertake the voluntary repayment of their lawful credit obligations plainly is not served where the bankruptcy court has determined, as a threshold finding of fact, that the debtor is utilizing his subsection 706(a) conversion rights to advance an ongoing scheme to retain his non-exempt assets from bona fide creditors." Pet. App. 39; see In re Wampler, 302 B.R. at 605 ("[T]he statute was intended to give only the honest debtor an opportunity to voluntarily repay his debts * * *. Section 706(a) was not intended as a way for the dishonest debtor to abuse the bankruptcy process, perpetrate a fraud or engage in bad faith behavior."). Section 706(a)'s legislative history thus provides no support for stripping bankruptcy courts of their power to prevent an abuse of process or to sanction and deter bad faith conduct.

E. A Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercises Its Inherent Power When It Denies Conversion Of A Chapter 7 Case Based On The Debtor's Bad Faith

1. A bankruptcy court acts within its discretion in denying a debtor's request to convert to another chapter when the debtor intentionally misrepresents his financial condition in the bankruptcy proceeding. Such misconduct constitutes an egregious abuse of the bankruptcy system, which has always limited relief to the "honest but unfortunate" debtor. Local Loan Co. v. Hunt, 292 U.S. 234, 244-245 (1934) (emphasis added). "[T]he successful functioning of the bankruptcy act hinges both upon the bankrupt's veracity and his willingness to make a full disclosure" of his assets and financial condition. Pet. App. 33 (quoting Boroff v. Tully (In re Tully), 818 F.2d 106, 110 (1st Cir. 1987)); In re Little, 245 B.R. 351, 353-354 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2000) ("Perhaps to a greater degree than any other segment of our justice system, Bankruptcy depends on the integrity of the information supplied by its principal participant, the debtor.").

The importance of honest and full disclosure of a debtor's assets is particularly acute in cases filed under chapter 7. That chapter generally grants the debtor a complete discharge of his pre-petition debts. 11 U.S.C. 727. But the Code explicitly conditions such relief on the debtor's release to creditors of all his pre-petition and non-exempt assets. 11 U.S.C. 725, 726, 727(a). A debtor who files under chapter 7 thus has an incentive to try to conceal assets to obtain the benefit of relief from all of his debts while shielding assets from the prospect of liquidation. Such efforts strike at the structural foundation upon which chapter 7 is premised. Accordingly, a court may properly deny conversion relief to chapter 7 debtors either to prevent further abuse of process or to sanction and deter similar misconduct.

Petitioner contends that permitting courts to respond to debtor's bad faith would not be administrable or provide debtors fair notice of what conduct is permissible because "[w]hat constitutes 'extreme circumstances' is not 'capable of pragmatic and mechanical application.'" Pet. Br. 17 (quoting In re Noll, 172 B.R. 122, 124 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1994)). The bankruptcy court's power under Section 105(a) to act in the face of abuse of process, however, puts debtors on clear notice that the court has discretion to take appropriate action when confronted with misconduct. Section 105(a) likewise necessarily recognizes that bankruptcy courts are fully competent to determine whether a litigant is engaging in an abuse of process. In any event, petitioner has no plausible claim that debtors are unaware of their obligation of complete candor and disclosure in their statement of financial affairs and schedule of assets, as those obligations are expressly set forth in the Code and Rules. 11 U.S.C. 521; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1008 (requiring "[a]ll petitions, lists, schedules, statements and amendments thereto" to be verified or supported by a declaration under penalty of perjury pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1746).

"Bad faith," moreover, is a familiar concept in the law, and bankruptcy courts routinely consider whether a debtor's conduct constitutes bad faith in the course of assessing the existence of "cause" for dismissal or conversion to chapter 7 under 11 U.S.C. 1307(c). See p. 17 & n.4, supra; see 11 U.S.C. 707(a) (authorizing dismissal for cause); 11 U.S.C. 1112(b) (authorizing dismissal or conversion to chapter 7 for cause); 11 U.S.C. 1208(c) (authorizing dismissal for cause). Thus, the bankruptcy courts that have denied conversion relief under Section 706(a) for bad faith have adopted a standard that is substantially similar to the standard applied in determining whether a debtor's bad faith warrants dismissal or conversion to chapter 7 under Section 1307(c). As the court of appeals observed, courts generally consider "the totality of the circumstances," including such factors as "the accuracy of the debtor's financial statements," "any other attempts by the debtor to mislead the bankruptcy court or manipulate the bankruptcy process," and "the debtor's motivation in seeking to convert to chapter 13." Pet. App. 41.

2. The bankruptcy court here properly exercised its discretion to deny conversion of petitioner's case to chapter 13 because of petitioner's bad faith in filing his chapter 7 case. As the court of appeals observed, "[t]he instant case comports in all material respects with the classic profile of playing fast and loose with the bankruptcy process." Pet. App. 42. Before filing for bankruptcy relief, petitioner transferred valuable property in an acknowledged attempt to shield it from his creditors, and he failed to disclose the transfer in filing for bankruptcy. While petitioner was prepared to face liquidation of the estate absent the fraudulently concealed assets, when the trustee discovered the non-disclosure and initiated steps to reclaim the property for the benefit of creditors, petitioner sought to convert the case to chapter 13, presumably not only to oust the chapter 7 trustee, but also to retain petitioner's interest in the concealed property and shield it from liquidation. Ibid.[5]

In refusing to transfer the case from chapter 7, the bankruptcy court properly sanctioned the debtor for his misconduct while preserving the interests of creditors. Because the case remained in chapter 7, the chapter 7 trustee was able to recover petitioner's Maine property and liquidate it for the benefit of creditors. Marrama, 316 B.R. at 421-423. In addition, based upon a finding that petitioner intended to defraud his creditors, petitioner was denied a discharge of his debts under [5] Petitioner challenges the bankruptcy court's factual finding that he acted in bad faith and the court's failure to conduct an evidentiary hearing. Pet. Br. 11, 22, 24. Both the bankruptcy appellate panel and the court of appeals rejected those contentions, Pet. App. 25-27, 41-44, and the petition did not seek this Court's review of those factbound issues. Pet. i. Moreover, as a result of subsequent proceedings in petitioner's chapter 7 case the court of appeals held that petitioner "transferred valuable assets belonging to him, less than a year before he petitioned for bankruptcy protection, with the actual intent to defraud his creditors." Marrama v. Citizens Bank (In re Marrama), 445 F.3d 518, 524 (1st Cir. 2006). It does not appear that petitioner sought further review of that decision, which is now final, so he is precluded from challenging that factual determination.

11 U.S.C. 727. Marrama v. Citizens Bank (In re Marrama), 445 F.3d 518 (1st Cir. 2006).

Denial of a chapter 7 discharge thus enabled petitioner's creditors to obtain estate assets under 11 U.S.C. 726, as well as to pursue any outstanding claims against petitioner post-bankruptcy. By contrast, converting the case to chapter 13 to permit petitioner to propose a plan would expose petitioner's creditors to the possibility of further abuse of the bankruptcy process, and would inevitably delay the proper disposition of the case. See pp. 20-22, supra. The bankruptcy court's denial of conversion to chapter 13 thus protected the rights of petitioner's innocent creditors and enabled the court to ensure the integrity of the bankruptcy process, in keeping with the core purposes of the court's inherent authority.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Whether, consistent with 28 U.S.C. 157 and Article III, a bankruptcy judge may enter final judgment on a bankruptcy estate's compulsory counterclaim against a bankruptcy claimant, even when adjudication of the counterclaim requires resolution of issues that are not implicated by the claim against the estate.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES $ AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING PETITIONER $

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES $

This case presents the question whether Congress has authorized, and may constitutionally authorize a district court to refer to a bankruptcy judge the final adjudication of a compulsory counterclaim by a bankruptcy estate against a creditor who has filed a claim against the estate. The United States has a substantial interest in the outcome of the case because United States trustees—who are Department of Justice officials appointed by the Attorney General—supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. See 28 U.S.C. 581-589a (2006 & Supp. II 2008). See also 11 U.S.C. 307 ("The United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any [bankruptcy] case or proceeding."). The United States also has a substantial interest in this case because, although the court of appeals framed its holding as one of statutory construction, the court's analysis calls into question the scope of Congress's constitutional authority to authorize bankruptcy-judge adjudication of counterclaims filed by the estate. Cf. 28 U.S.C. 2403(a) (authorizing the United States to intervene in "any action, suit, or proceeding in a court of the United States * * * wherein the constitutionality of any Act of Congress affecting the public interest is drawn into question").

STATEMENT

1. Article I of the Constitution assigns to Congress the "Power * * * To establish * * * uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States." U.S. Const. Art. I, § 8, Cl. 4. In exercising its plenary authority to regulate bankruptcy, Congress has given "special attention to the subject of making the bankruptcy laws inexpensive in their administration." Katchen v. Landy, 382 U.S. 323, 328 (1965) (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 1228, 54th Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1896); S. Rep. No. 1916, 75th Cong., 3d Sess. 2 (1938)) (alterations omitted). To that end, it has both created specialized fora for the adjudication of bankruptcy matters and provided that such matters may be resolved summarily without a jury.

a. 1898 Bankruptcy Act, Ch. 541, 30 Stat. 544, vested district courts with original jurisdiction as "courts of bankruptcy," id. § 2, 30 Stat. 545, and empowered them to refer cases in whole or in part to bankruptcy "referees," id. § 22a, 30 Stat. 552. Those referees (later renamed "bankruptcy judges") were appointed by district courts for two-year terms and were removable by those courts for cause. Id. § 34, 30 Stat. 555. They were authorized, with certain exceptions, to "perform such part of the duties * * * as are by this Act conferred on courts of bankruptcy," "subject always to a review by the [district] judge." Id. § 38, 30 Stat. 555.

In 1973, this Court prescribed Bankruptcy Rules pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 2075. See 411 U.S. 995. Rule 102 provided for the automatic referral of all bankruptcy proceedings to a referee, while authorizing the district court to withdraw such a reference "for the convenience of the parties or other cause" on a case-by-case basis. Id. at 1003-1004. The set of proceedings committed to the referee for adjudication in the first instance included "counterclaims against a creditor who files claims against the estate." Northern Pipeline Const. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 99 (1982) (White, J. dissenting); see 1973 Bankr. R. 306(c), 701 & advisory cmte. note. Cf. Katchen, 382 U.S. at 336 n.12 (noting pre-1973 appellate decisions "upholding summary jurisdiction to grant affirmative relief on related counterclaims that would also be defenses to [a creditor's] claim"). Rule 803 stated that "the judgment or order of the referee shall become final" unless appealed. 411 U.S. at 1088. On appeal, the district court was required to "accept the referee's findings of fact unless clearly erroneous." 1973 Bankr. R. 810, 411 U.S. at 1090.

b. The Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-598, 92 Stat. 2549, sought to "substantially expand[]" bankruptcy jurisdiction and to enlarge the role of specialized bankruptcy fora. H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 13 (1977). Under the 1978 Act, the power to enter final judgment in all "civil proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to cases under title 11" was vested in a set of newly created "United States Bankruptcy Courts," which replaced referees. 28 U.S.C. 151(a), 1471(b) and (c) (Supp. IV 1980). Judges of those new bankruptcy courts were appointed for 14-year terms by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. 28 U.S.C. 152 (Supp. IV 1980). Review of bankruptcy-court judgments was solely appellate in nature. 28 U.S.C. 160, 1334 (1976 & Supp. IV 1980).

The constitutionality of the 1978 Act was challenged shortly after its enactment. In Northern Pipeline, a bankrupt debtor attempted to prosecute various state-law claims in bankruptcy court against a company that had never made a claim against the debtor's estate or otherwise appeared in the bankruptcy proceedings. 458 U.S. at 56-57 (plurality opinion). This Court held that the bankruptcy court's exercise of jurisdiction over that suit conflicted with the requirement of Article III, Section 1 that "[t]he judicial Power of the United States shall be vested" in judges who have life tenure and protection from salary reduction. See id. at 88 & n.40 (plurality opinion); id. at 91 (Rehnquist, J., concurring in the judgment).

As this Court subsequently explained, although a majority of the Justices in Northern Pipeline agreed that the 1978 Act was unconstitutional as applied to the suit before it, the "divided Court was unable to agree on the precise scope and nature of Article III's limitations." Thomas v. Union Carbide Agric. Prods. Co., 473 U.S. 568, 584 (1985). "The Court's holding in" Northern Pipeline therefore "establishes only that Congress may not vest in a non-Article III court the power to adjudicate, render final judgment, and issue binding orders in a traditional contract action arising under state law, without consent of the litigants, and subject only to ordinary appellate review." Ibid. Nevertheless, six Justices concluded that the statutory authorization for the bankruptcy court to adjudicate the state-law contract action at issue in the case was not severable from the remainder of the 1978 Act's grant of jurisdiction to bankruptcy courts, and the Court accordingly struck down the entire jurisdictional grant as unconstitutional. Northern Pipeline, 458 U.S. at 88 & n.40, 91-92 (plurality opinion); id. at 91-92 (Rehnquist, J., concurring in the judgment). The Court stayed its judgment for approximately three months to "afford Congress an opportunity to reconstitute the bankruptcy courts or to adopt other valid means of adjudication, without impairing the interim administration of the bankruptcy laws." Id. at 88 (plurality opinion); id. at 92 (Rehnquist, J., concurring in the judgment).

c. The Judicial Conference of the United States, concerned that Congress might not act before the Court's stay expired, requested that the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts (Director) propose a rule for adoption by the courts that would allow for the continued operation of the bankruptcy system consistent with Northern Pipeline. Judicial Conf. of United States, Report of Proceedings 91 (Sept. 1982). The Director responded by circulating a memorandum and proposed rule setting forth "an interim measure, by which district courts may delegate many of their bankruptcy powers to bankruptcy judges." Memorandum from William E. Foley, Director, Administrative Office of the United States Courts (Dec. 3, 1982) (Foley Memorandum), reprinted in Bankruptcy Court Act of 1983: Hearing on H.R. 3 Before the Subcomm. on Monopolies and Commercial Law of the Comm. on the Judiciary, 98th Cong. 1st Sess. 160 (1983)

(1983 Subcomm. Hearing). When Congress ultimately failed to act before this Court's stay expired, a revised version of the Director's proposed rule was adopted, "with minor local variations," by all of the courts of appeals and district courts. Vern Countryman, Scrambling To Define Bankruptcy Jurisdiction: The Chief Justice, the Judicial Conference, and the Legislative Process, 22 Harv. J. Legis. 1, 23 (1985).

The interim rule scaled back the jurisdiction that the 1978 Act had conferred upon bankruptcy judges. Rather than vesting bankruptcy judges with original jurisdiction over "[a]ll cases under Title 11 and all civil proceedings arising under Title 11 or arising in or related to cases under Title 11," the interim rule provided that such matters would be "referred" to bankruptcy judges by the district court. Interim Bankr. R. § (c)(1), reprinted in 1983 Subcomm. Hearing 161-163 (reproduced in the appendix). It additionally specified that such references could be withdrawn in whole or in part by the district court "at any time on its own motion or on timely motion by a party," and that the district court could review de novo a bankruptcy judge's determinations. Id. § (c)(2), (e)(2).

The interim rule also precluded bankruptcy judges from entering final judgment in a class of proceedings that the Director dubbed "Marathon claims" and in the rule were called "related proceedings." Foley Memorandum; Interim Bankr. R. § (d)(3)(B). The rule provided that in such proceedings a bankruptcy judge would simply "submit findings, conclusions, and a proposed judgment or order to the district judge" unless the parties consented to a different allocation of authority between the bankruptcy and district judges. Ibid. In other referred matters, however, a bankruptcy judge could enter final judgment. Id. § (d)(2). The set of proceedings in which bankruptcy courts could exercise that final-judgment authority included, inter alia, "counterclaims by the estate in whatever amount against persons filing claims [against] the estate." Id. § (d)(3)(A).

During the period that it was in effect, the interim rule was uniformly upheld against constitutional challenge by the courts of appeals. Salomon v. Kaiser, 722 F.2d 1574, 1581 (2d Cir. 1983); Braniff Airways, Inc. v. Civil Aeronautics Bd., 700 F.2d 214, 215 (5th Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 463 U.S. 1208 (1983); White Motor Corp. v. Citibank, N.A., 704 F.2d 254, 263 (6th Cir. 1983); Stewart v. Stewart, 741 F.2d 127, 131 (7th Cir. 1984); First Nat'l Bank of Tekamah v. Hansen, 702 F.2d 728, 729 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 463 U.S. 1208 (1983) (per curiam); Lindquist v. Metropolitan Bank, 730 F.2d 1204, 1205 (8th Cir. 1984) (per curiam); Oklahoma Health Servs. Fed. Credit Union v. Webb, 726 F.2d 624, 625 (10th Cir. 1984); In re Colorado Energy Supply, Inc., 728 F.2d 1283, 1284-1285 (10th Cir. 1984); Committee of Unsecured Creditors of F S Commc'ns Corp v. Hyatt Greenville Corp., 760 F.2d 1194, 1198-1199 (11th Cir. 1985).

d. Just over two years after this Court's decision in Northern Pipeline, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-353, 98 Stat. 333, which laid the foundation for the current bankruptcy system. The primary sponsor of the 1984 Act's jurisdictional provisions explained that those provisions were intended to codify the practice under the Judiciary's interim rule:

> The solution offered by my amendment has been at work in the last 18 months under the emergency bankruptcy rule known as the model rule and has > been upheld by five circuit courts of appeal and 24 district courts. It has proven successful. Nothing need be changed. Congressional enactment of the model rule is the purpose of my amendment, and that is all that is necessary.

130 Cong. Rec. 6241 (1984) (statement of Rep. Kastenmeier); see id. at 6242 (statement of Rep. Kindness) ("The Kastenmeier-Kindness amendment is essentially a legislative enactment of the emergency bankruptcy rule, the model rule that has been in effect, under which the bankruptcy courts have been operating. It has been ruled constitutional by five circuits now, every place where the question has been raised. The Supreme Court has passed up the opportunity to review those cases.").

The 1984 Act vests the district courts with original jurisdiction over bankruptcy matters. 28 U.S.C. 1334(a)-(b). It further provides that district courts "may," as under the interim rule, "provide that any or all cases under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11 may be referred to the bankruptcy judges for the district." 28 U.S.C. 157(a). Under the 1984 Act (as under the interim rule), a district court "may withdraw, in whole or in part, any case or proceeding referred under this section, on its own motion or on timely motion of any party, for cause shown." 28 U.S.C. 157(d).

Also like the interim rule, the 1984 Act authorizes bankruptcy judges to enter final judgments in some types of proceedings but not others. In particular, bankruptcy judges may enter final judgments in "all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11," that are referred to them by a district court. 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(1). Bankruptcy courts' judgments in such proceedings are subject to appellate review by district courts, bankruptcy appellate panels, and circuit courts of appeals. See 28 U.S.C. 158. If a particular proceeding "is not a core proceeding but * * * is otherwise related to a case under title 11," however, a bankruptcy judge may not enter final judgment, but may instead submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court for de novo review. 28 U.S.C. 157(c)(1). The 1984 Act states that "[c]ore proceedings include, but are not limited to," various enumerated matters. 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2). Those matters include "counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate." 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(C).

The 1984 Act also altered the manner in which bankruptcy judges are appointed. Those judges are no longer selected by the President (as they were under the 1978 Act), but instead are appointed by the courts of appeals for the circuits in which their judicial districts are located. 28 U.S.C. 152(a)(1). They "serve as judicial officers of the United States district court established under Article III of the Constitution." Ibid.

2. a. In 1996, Vickie Lynn Marshall (referred to interchangeably with the executor of her estate as "petitioner") filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy relief in the Central District of California. Pet. App. 13. By local rule, the district court in the Central District of California "refers to the bankruptcy judges of this district, all cases under Title 11 and all proceedings under Title 11 or arising in or related to a case under Title 11." Gen. Order 266 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 9, 1984).

Petitioner's stepson, E. Pierce Marshall (referred to interchangeably with the executrix of his estate as "respondent"), filed a proof of claim in petitioner's bankruptcy case. Pet. App. 15. As construed by the courts below, that claim sought damages for alleged defamatory statements by petitioner and her attorneys to the effect that respondent had tortiously interfered with petitioner's rights in the estate of her recently deceased husband (respondent's father). Id. at 14-15 & n.11, 274-276. Petitioner answered the adversary complaint by asserting, inter alia, that she could not be held liable for defamation because the relevant statements were true. Id. at 16. Petitioner also filed a counterclaim for "tortious interference with her rights as [her late husband's] spouse." Ibid

The bankruptcy judge presiding over petitioner's Chapter 11 case held a trial. Pet. App. 18. It granted summary judgment for petitioner on respondent's defamation claim. Ibid. The bankruptcy court also found in petitioner's favor on petitioner's counterclaim, determining that respondent had tortiously interfered with petitioner's expectation in her late husband's estate. Ibid. The bankruptcy court determined that it had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 157 to finally adjudicate the counterclaim. Pet. App. 294-296. In December 2000, it entered final judgment for petitioner in the total amount of $474,754,134. Id. at 301.

b. Respondent appealed to the district court. Pet. App. 24. The district court vacated the judgment on the ground that petitioner's tortious-interference counterclaim was not the type of matter on which bankruptcy judges may enter final judgment. Id. at 283. The district court acknowledged that the counterclaim "falls within the literal language of [28 U.S.C.] § 157(b)(2)(C)." Id. at 276. Based largely on perceived constitutional concerns, however, the court concluded that the counterclaim was too far attenuated from respondent's defamation claim to allow for decision by the bankruptcy judge. See id. at 265-283. The district court therefore treated the bankruptcy court's ruling as a proposed judgment subject to the district court's own independent review. Id. at 284; see 28 U.S.C. 157(c)(1).

c. During the pendency of the federal-court proceedings, petitioner and respondent were also participating in Texas probate-court proceedings concerning administration of the estate of petitioner's late husband, respondent's father. Pet. App. 11-13, 20. In the state court, respondent sought a declaration that his father's will and living trust were valid. Id. at 11. Petitioner challenged the validity of those instruments and sought recovery from respondent for tortious interference on essentially the same theory that she pressed in the bankruptcy court. Id. at 11-12.

After the bankruptcy court entered judgment in her favor, petitioner voluntarily dismissed her pending claims in the Texas probate proceedings. Pet. App. 20-21. Petitioner remained a party to the Texas proceedings, however, as a defendant in a declaratory judgment action brought by respondent to determine their respective rights to the decedent's estate. Id. at 21. Following a lengthy trial, the jury found that the will and trust were valid, and that petitioner did not in fact have a legitimate expectation of rights in the decedent's estate. Id. at 22. In December 2001, the Texas probate court entered an amended judgment in favor of respondent on all claims. Id. at 22-23.

d. When the Texas probate court entered that judgment, the district court was in the midst of its independent review of the bankruptcy court's decision on petitioner's tortious-interference counterclaim. Pet. App. 219, 222. Relying on principles of issue preclusion and res judicata, respondent filed a motion for summary judgment, which the district court denied. Id. at 217-234.

The district court proceeded to take additional evidence on petitioner's counterclaim. Pet. App. 25. In March 2002, it issued a lengthy opinion agreeing with the bankruptcy court that respondent had committed tortious interference. Id. at 90-214. It entered judgment in petitioner's favor, awarding a total of $88,585,534.66. Id. at 216.

e. Both parties appealed the district court's decision. Pet. App. 26. The court of appeals vacated the district court's judgment, holding that the probate exception to federal jurisdiction precluded the federal courts from adjudicating the case. Marshall v. Marshall, 392 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2004). This Court reversed and remanded for consideration of additional issues, including the bankruptcy judge's jurisdiction to enter final judgment and respondent's arguments of issue and claim preclusion. Marshall v. Marshall, 547 U.S. 293, 315 (2006).

f. On remand, the court of appeals reversed the district court's judgment and ordered entry of judgment in favor of respondent. Pet. App. 5. The court of appeals concluded that "the Texas probate court's judgment was the earliest final judgment entered on matters relevant to this proceeding," and that "the district court erred when it did not afford preclusive effect to the Texas probate court's determination of relevant legal and factual issues." Id. at 65.

The court of appeals rejected petitioner's argument that the earliest final judgment in the case had in fact been issued by the bankruptcy court rather than by the probate court. In the court of appeals' view, the bankruptcy court had lacked jurisdiction to enter final judgment on petitioner's counterclaim. Pet. App. 55-56. The court of appeals agreed with petitioner "that her claim is a compulsory counterclaim because the 'operative facts underlying her action' are the same as those underlying [respondent's] defamation claim." Id. at 47 (internal quotation marks and alterations omitted). The court concluded, however, that the counterclaim was "not a 'core proceeding arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11' for which the bankruptcy court is empowered to enter a final judgment." Id. at 65 (quoting 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(1)) (brackets omitted).

The court of appeals acknowledged that 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(C) defines the term "core proceedings" to include "counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate." Pet. App. 45. The court held, however, that a bankruptcy judge may enter final judgment only on a claim "that meets Congress' definition of a core proceeding and arises under or arises in title 11." Id. at 43. In support of that conclusion, the court of appeals expressed concern that an "overly broad construction" of the term "core proceeding" would create a potential constitutional infirmity of the sort identified in Northern Pipeline. Id. at 50.

To avoid that perceived constitutional difficulty, the court of appeals adopted a test proposed in an amicus brief, under which "a counterclaim under § 157(b)(2)(C) is properly a 'core' proceeding 'arising in a case under' the Bankruptcy Code only if the counterclaim is so closely related to the proof of claim that the resolution of the counterclaim is necessary to resolve the allowance or disallowance of the claim itself." Pet. App. 50 (brackets omitted). The court concluded that petitioner's counterclaim did not satisfy that test. Id. at 51. The court explained that, "[e]ven if it were shown that the statements made by [petitioner's] attorneys were true," petitioner would be required to make additional showings in order to prevail on her tortious-interference claim. Ibid. The court concluded that, because "[n]othing in [respondent's] defamation claim puts these [additional] factual and legal questions at issue," resolution of the counterclaim was not necessary to adjudicate respondent's claim against the estate, and the counterclaim therefore was not a "core proceeding" under the test the court had adopted. See id. at 51-55.

The court of appeals erred in placing artificial limits on the authority of bankruptcy judges to enter final judgment on counterclaims against creditors who have filed claims against the estate. The 1984 Act continued the longstanding practice of permitting a district court to refer a bankruptcy estate's counterclaim against a creditor to an adjunct for final adjudication. Congress intended to, and did, codify that practice from the Judiciary's interim rule, which in turn approximated the procedures in place under the 1898 Act. That codification was an appropriate exercise of Congress's authority to prescribe uniform laws regulating bankruptcy. Nothing in Article III prohibits Congress from permitting a district judge to place an estate's counterclaim on equal footing with a claim that the creditor himself is pressing in front of the bankruptcy judge, particularly when the counterclaim arises from the same transaction or occurrence.

A. Section 157 of Title 28 divides proceedings that a district court may refer to a bankruptcy judge into two categories: (1) "core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11," and (2) proceedings "otherwise related to a case under title 11." 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(1) and (c)(1). Bankruptcy judges may "hear and determine" (i.e., enter final judgment in) the first category of proceedings, but are allowed only to "submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court" in the second. Ibid. The statute unambiguously places all "counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate" in the first category, by including them in the statutory definition of "core proceedings." 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(C).

That statutory language neither limits the types of counterclaims that may be referred for final adjudication, nor permits courts to engraft their own limits by judicial decision. By creating a subset of "core" proceedings in which a bankruptcy court may not enter final judgment, the court of appeals departed from the plain text of the statute, the decisions of this Court, and the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. Congress incorporated many of the statutory examples of "core proceedings," including counterclaims, from the list of proceedings in which bankruptcy judges could enter final judgment under the Judiciary's interim rule. In enacting the 1984 Act, Congress intended to preserve rather than to reduce the scope of bankruptcy judges' authority under that rule.

B. Congress's express authorization for bankruptcy judges to enter final judgment on estate counterclaims, in accordance with the Judiciary's preexisting practice, was fully consistent with Article III. In delineating the scope of authority that bankruptcy judges may constitutionally exercise, this Court has consistently distinguished between persons who file claims against the estate and those who do not. By invoking the assistance of the bankruptcy court and seeking a portion of the res, respondent subjected himself to the court's authority, and the court could thereafter resolve all contested issues between respondent and the estate.

The bankruptcy court's constitutional authority in this context is particularly clear with respect to compulsory counterclaims. A compulsory counterclaim is by definition sufficiently tied to the initial claim that principles of sound judicial administration require the two to be decided together. Allowing the bankruptcy court to adjudicate a compulsory counterclaim does not substantially expand the bankruptcy judge's authority, and a contrary rule would entail significant delay and inefficiency.

C. In responding to this Court's decision in Northern Pipeline, Congress enacted various measures to ensure that bankruptcy judges function as arms of the Judiciary and independent from the political Branches. Congress installed a panoply of procedural safeguards to protect bankruptcy creditors' rights when it restructured the bankruptcy courts in the 1984 Act—including appointment and removal of bankruptcy judges by the Judiciary, as well as discretionary referral of matters from the district court to the bankruptcy judge.

ARGUMENT

I. $ THE BANKRUPTCY CODE EXPRESSLY AUTHORIZES DISTRICT COURTS TO REFER FINAL DECISION ON ESTATE COUNTERCLAIMS TO BANKRUPTCY JUDGES.

A. The plain text of 28 U.S.C. 157 unambiguously authorizes a bankruptcy judge, pursuant to a referral by the district court, to enter final judgment on any counterclaim brought by the estate against a person who has filed a claim against the estate. Section 157(a) permits district courts to refer to bankruptcy judges "all cases under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11." Section 157(b)(1) permits bankruptcy courts to "hear and determine" (i.e., enter final judgment on) certain of these referred matters, including "all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11." And Section 157(b)(2)(C) defines the term "[c]ore proceedings" to include, without qualification, "counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate."

Congress's unqualified inclusion of estate "counterclaims" in the definition of "core proceedings" identifies such counterclaims as among the matters that bankruptcy courts may finally decide under Section 157(b)(1). See Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 453 (2004) (recognizing that "in cataloging core bankruptcy proceedings" in Section 157(b)(2), "Congress authorized bankruptcy courts to adjudicate" those matters); Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33, 50 (1989) (recognizing that Congress "designated fraudulent conveyance actions 'core proceedings,' which bankruptcy judges may adjudicate and in which they may issue final judgments, if a district court has referred the matter to them") (citations omitted); Marshall v. Marshall, 547 U.S. 293, 303 (2006) (quoting Section 157(b)(1) and explaining that a "bankruptcy court may exercise plenary power only over 'core proceedings,'" as distinct from "noncore matters"). The plain text of the statute does not permit a court, for reasons of constitutional avoidance or otherwise, to "do[] violence" to "the facially unqualified reference to counterclaim jurisdiction" by artificially limiting its scope. Commodities Futures Trading Comm'n v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 842 (1985).

B. The court of appeals concluded (and respondent contends) that a bankruptcy judge's authority to enter final judgment on a particular matter depends on a "two-step approach," under which the bankruptcy court may enter judgment only on "a claim that meets Congress' definition of a core proceeding and arises under or arises in title 11." Pet. App. 43; see Br. in Opp. 34-35. The court's analysis assumes the existence of some "core proceedings" that do not "aris[e] under title 11, or aris[e] in a case under title 11." 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(1). That reading is incorrect.

"It is a fundamental canon of statutory construction that the words of a statute must be read in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme." Davis v. Michigan Dep't of Treasury, 489 U.S. 803, 809 (1989). The 1984 Act does not direct the bankruptcy court to engage in the second step of the "two-step approach" that the court of appeals described; it establishes no standards for determining whether a particular "core proceeding" "aris[es] under title 11, or aris[es] in a case under title 11"; and it provides no guidance as to what the bankruptcy court should do if it concludes that a "core proceeding" does not satisfy that supposed independent prerequisite. In the absence of such provisions, the "two-step approach" mandated by the court below is both procedurally and substantively unworkable.

First, Section 157(b)(3) simply instructs the bankruptcy judge, "on the bankruptcy judge's own motion or on timely motion of a party," to make the binary determination "whether a proceeding [1] is a core proceeding under this subsection or [2] is a proceeding that is otherwise related to a case under title 11." 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(3); see Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7008(a), 7012(b), 9027(a)(1) and (e)(3) (requiring filings simply to state whether a proceeding is "core" or "non-core"). Neither Section 157(b)(3) nor any other provision of the statute directs the bankruptcy judge to make the further determination whether a particular "core" proceeding "aris[es] under title 11, or aris[es] in a case under title 11." Under the court of appeals' "two-step approach," however, that further inquiry is essential to the ultimate determination whether the bankruptcy judge can enter final judgment in any "core proceeding." Had Congress intended bankruptcy judges to undertake that further inquiry, it surely would have directed them to do so.

Second, the statute provides no standards for deciding whether a particular "core" proceeding "aris[es] under title 11, or aris[es] in a case under title 11." That lack of guidance stands in stark contrast with Congress's careful specification in Section 157(b)(2) of 16 different categories of "core" proceedings. To be sure, the statute's definition of "core proceeding" is not fully comprehensive, since Section 157(b)(2) states that "[c]ore proceedings include, but are not limited to," the enumerated categories. Under the court of appeals' approach, however, the Section 157(b)(2) categories will never resolve the question whether the bankruptcy judge can enter judgment on a particular matter. Rather, when a particular matter falls within Section 157(b)(2), the judge will always be required to make the further determination whether that matter "aris[es] under title 11, or aris[es] in a case under title 11"—without any statutory guidance for doing so. That requirement would largely negate Congress's effort in Section 157(b)(2) to clarify the line between those matters that the bankruptcy judge may finally adjudicate and those on which the judge may enter only a recommended disposition.

Third, the statute nowhere describes what authority bankruptcy judges might wield over referred proceedings that are "core" but do not "aris[e] under title 11, or aris[e] in a case under title 11." Section 157 contains only two subsections that tell bankruptcy judges how to dispose of proceedings that are referred to them. Section 157(b)(1) authorizes bankruptcy judges to enter final judgments on "core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11," while Section 157(c)(1) authorizes them to submit proposed findings and conclusions in "a proceeding that is not a core proceeding but that is otherwise related to a case under title 11." Neither of those provisions would encompass a hypothetical "core" proceeding that does not "aris[e] under title 11, or aris[e] in a case under title 11." Congress's failure to specify the scope of the bankruptcy judge's authority in a proceeding of that nature strongly indicates that the statute does not contemplate any such proceedings.

The only interpretation that makes sense of the entire statute, therefore, is that the term "[c]ore proceedings" in Section 157(b)(2) is simply shorthand for the "core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11" that Section 157(b)(1) authorizes bankruptcy courts to "hear and determine." Under that interpretation, the above-described incongruities disappear. To determine their authority over a referred proceeding, bankruptcy judges simply determine whether the proceeding is "core" or whether the proceeding is "otherwise related to a case under title 11" (Section 157(b)(3)). If it is the former, the bankruptcy judge may enter final judgment (Section 157(b)(1)); if it is the latter, the bankruptcy judge may only submit proposed findings and conclusions to the district court (Section 157(c)(1)). Because "counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate" are among the matters designated as "core proceedings" by Section 157(b)(2)(C), they fall within the former category, and bankruptcy judges may enter final judgment on them.

C. The process by which Section 157(b)(2)(C) was developed confirms Congress's intent to allow bankruptcy courts, pursuant to referrals from district courts, to enter final judgment on an estate's counterclaims against bankruptcy claimants. As previously discussed (see pp. 7-8, supra), Congress modeled Section 157 on the interim rule that the Judicial Branch had adopted in the wake of Northern Pipeline. See 130 Cong. Rec. at 6241-6242. That rule, like Section 157, divided proceedings referred to bankruptcy judges into two categories: proceedings in which bankruptcy judges could only submit proposed findings and conclusions, and proceedings in which they could enter final judgment. Compare Interim Bankr. R. §§ (d)(2) and (3), with 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(1) and (c)(1).

More specifically, the interim rule provided that "[i]n related proceedings the bankruptcy judge may not enter a judgment or dispositive order, but shall submit findings, conclusions, and a proposed judgment or order to the district judge, unless the parties to the proceeding consent to entry of the judgment or order by the bankruptcy judge." Interim Bankr. R. § (d)(3)(B). The interim rule stated that "[r]elated proceedings include, but are not limited to, claims brought by the estate against parties who have not filed claims against the estate"—i.e., the sorts of claims that were at issue in Northern Pipeline Const. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., see 458 U.S. 50, 56 (1982) (plurality opinion)—but that "[r]elated proceedings do not include" various enumerated matters. Interim Bankr. R. § (d)(3)(A). Among the matters specifically excluded from the term "related proceedings" were "counterclaims by the estate in whatever amount against persons filing claims [against] the estate." Ibid. With minor variations, Congress incorporated the interim rule's list of matters that were not "related proceedings" into the non-exhaustive list of "core proceedings" set forth in 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2). Compare Interim Bankr. R. § (d)(3)(A), with 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(A), (C), (D), (E), (G), (H), (I), (J), (L), and (N).

Nothing in the 1984 Act's text or history suggests that Congress intended to reduce the range of matters on which bankruptcy courts could enter final judgment under the interim rule. Congress had no reason to believe that the interim rule, which had been proposed and adopted by the Judiciary and had been repeatedly upheld by the courts of appeals, was inconsistent with Northern Pipeline or otherwise violated Article III. See 130 Cong. Rec. at 6241-6242; p. 7, supra. Congress's evident intent was simply to preserve the scope of bankruptcy judges' authority under the interim rule, which broadly permitted referral of counterclaims against bankruptcy claimants to bankruptcy judges for entry of final judgment.

II. $DISTRICT COURTS' REFERRAL OF FINAL DECISION ON COMPULSORY COUNTERCLAIMS TO BANKRUPTCY JUDGES IS FULLY CONSISTENT WITH ARTICLE III OF THE CONSTITUTION.

This Court's precedents "demonstrate * * * that Article III does not confer on litigants an absolute right to the plenary consideration of every nature of claim by an Article III court." Schor, 478 U.S. at 848. Consistent with that principle, neither the court of appeals nor respondent has suggested that a bankruptcy judge's final adjudication of a creditor's claim against a bankruptcy estate violates Article III.[1] And neither the court of appeals nor respondent has questioned the constitutional authority of the federal district court to decide petitioner's state-law counterclaim as part of the bankruptcy case. The narrow constitutional question presented is whether Congress, consistent with Article III, could authorize the bankruptcy judge to enter final judgment on petitioner's counterclaim (subject to appellate review as provided in 28 U.S.C. 158) rather than simply submitting proposed findings and conclusions to the district court. Congress's authorization for the bankruptcy court to enter judgment on that matter, in accordance with the Judiciary's interim-rule procedure, is consistent with this Court's precedents and with principles of sound judicial administration.

A. The court of appeals stated that a literal reading of Section 157(b)(2)(C), as encompassing all estate counterclaims against persons who have filed claims against the estate, "would certainly run afoul of the Court's holding in [Northern Pipeline]." Pet. App. 46. That analysis reflects a misreading of Northern Pipeline. In that case, the Court held that a non-Article III bankruptcy judge could not finally adjudicate a suit filed by the debtor against a defendant who had not filed a claim against the estate. See 458 U.S. at 56 (plurality opinion); id. at 87; id. at 89-91 (Rehnquist, J., concurring in the judgment). But neither the plurality nor the concurring Justices disputed Justice White's statement in dissent that "if Marathon had filed a claim against the bankrupt in this case, the trustee could have filed and the bankruptcy judge could have adjudicated a counterclaim seeking the relief that is involved in these cases." Id. at 100-101. And the Court in Schor subsequently observed that "a significant factor" in Northern Pipeline was "the absence of consent to an initial adjudication before a non-Article III tribunal." 478 U.S. at 849.

[1] Respondent has, however, made the narrower argument that the bankruptcy judge lacked statutory authority to enter final judgment on the particular defamation claim here, on the ground that it is a "personal injury tort" that must be tried in district court under 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(5). Br. in Opp. 42. Respondent makes a similar argument regarding petitioner's tortious-interference counterclaim. Id. at 43. The court of appeals did not address those issues, and they are not within the scope of the questions on which this Court granted certiorari. To the extent that respondent's arguments were preserved below, they could be considered on remand were this Court to reverse the judgment of the court of appeals.

In applying the Seventh Amendment to the bankruptcy context, the Court has sharply distinguished between persons who file claims against the estate and those who do not. In Granfinanciera, the Court explained that, "under the Seventh Amendment, a creditor's right to a jury trial on a bankruptcy trustee's preference claim depends upon whether the creditor has submitted a claim against the estate." 492 U.S. at 58; see Katchen v. Landy, 382 U.S. 323 (1965). The Court subsequently reiterated that a claimant against the estate is not entitled to trial by jury on a voidable-preference counterclaim because "by filing a claim against a bankruptcy estate the creditor triggers the process of 'allowance and disallowance of claims,' thereby subjecting himself to the bankruptcy court's equitable power." Langenkamp v. Culp, 498 U.S. 42, 44 (1990) (per curiam) (quoting Granfinanciera, 492 U.S. at 58).

In two respects, the question presented here differs from the issue discussed by this Court in Granfinanciera and Langenkamp. First, respondent does not assert a Seventh Amendment right to jury trial on petitioner's counterclaim, but rather objects to final adjudication of that counterclaim by a non-Article III judge. But there is no sound reason for a different outcome in the Article III context than in the Seventh Amendment one. Indeed, the Court in Granfinanciera equated the two inquiries, stating that with respect to a legal cause of action, "the question whether the Seventh Amendment permits Congress to assign its adjudication to a tribunal that does not employ juries as factfinders requires the same answer as the question whether Article III allows Congress to assign adjudication of that cause of action to a non-Article III tribunal." 492 U.S. at 53.

Second, whereas Langenkamp, Granfinanciera, and Katchen involved voidable-preference actions, petitioner's tortious-interference counterclaim alleges a different sort of wrong. The court of appeals attached controlling weight to that distinction. Pet. App. 49. The court reasoned that, whereas the bankruptcy court in Katchen was required to resolve the voidable-preference issue in order to determine whether the claimant's own claim against the estate should be allowed, see ibid. (citing Katchen, 382 U.S. at 330), disposition of petitioner's counterclaim would require resolution of additional issues beyond those posed by respondent's defamation claim against the estate, see id. at 55. The court of appeals read Katchen and Northern Pipeline to establish a constitutional rule, which the court imported into its construction of Section 157(b)(2)(C), that a bankruptcy court may enter final judgment on an estate counterclaim "only if the counterclaim is so closely related to the proof of claim that the resolution of the counterclaim is necessary to resolve the allowance or disallowance of the claim itself." Id. at 50.

The court of appeals was correct that the factual and legal overlap between claim and counterclaim was closer in Katchen than in this case. The Katchen Court's rationale for allowing bankruptcy-court adjudication of the estate's counterclaim, however, was not limited to the voidable-preference context. Rather, the Court relied on the broader rule, which it had previously applied to receivership proceedings, that "[b]y presenting their claims [the claimants against the estate] subjected themselves to all the consequences that attach to an appearance." Katchen, 382 U.S. at 335 (quoting Alexander v. Hillman, 296 U.S. 222, 241 (1935)). That principle, the Court explained, "is in harmony with the rule generally followed by courts of equity that having jurisdiction of the parties to controversies brought before them, they will decide all matters in dispute and decree complete relief." Ibid. (quoting Alexander, 296 U.S. at 242). Under that approach, respondent, by submitting a claim against the estate, subjected himself to the bankruptcy court's authority to resolve the estate's counterclaim, even though that process required resolution of issues beyond those implicated by respondent's defamation claim.[2]

[2] The Court in Granfinaciera, after quoting with approval the passage from Katchen discussed above, distinguished the Katchen Court's rationale from the "waiver" theory adopted by this Court in Schor. See 492 U.S. at 59 n.14. The precise nature of that distinction is unclear. It is clear, however, that respondent—like the claimant in Katchen, and unlike the petitioner in Schor—has "laid claim" to a "disputed res" to be administered in the bankruptcy proceedings. Ibid. Katchen's reasoning is therefore fully applicable here.

As in a voidable-preference case, moreover, resolution of petitioner's counterclaim is "part of the claims-allowance process" and is "integral to the restructuring of the debtor-creditor relationship through the bankruptcy court's equity jurisdiction." Langenkamp, 498 U.S. at 44 (emphasis omitted). The trustee's recovery of monetary awards on estate counterclaims furthers the objectives of the Bankruptcy Code by increasing the pool of assets available to creditors. Cf. Alexander, 296 U.S. at 242 (observing, in the receivership context, that "[n]othing is more clearly a part of the subject matter of the main suit than recovery of all that to the res belongs"). To be sure, Northern Pipeline makes clear that the interest in maximizing the estate is not a sufficient basis for requiring a stranger to the bankruptcy to appear as a defendant before a non-Article III tribunal. But once respondent invoked the assistance of the bankruptcy court by filing his own proof of claim, the bankruptcy court was authorized to "decide all matters in dispute" between respondent and the estate and to "decree complete relief." Katchen, 382 U.S. at 335 (quoting Alexander, 296 U.S. at 242).

B. Although Section 157(b)(2)(C) applies by its terms to all "counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate," as this case comes to the Court, the constitutional question presented involves the application of Section 157(b)(2)(C) to a compulsory counterclaim. The court of appeals held that the overlap between respondent's claim and petitioner's counterclaim was sufficient to make the counterclaim compulsory, Pet. App. 47-48, and respondent did not contest that proposition in opposing certiorari.[3]

A compulsory counterclaim, by definition, "arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim." Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(a)(1)(A) (incorporated in relevant part by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7013). The Federal Rules compel a party, on penalty of forfeiture, to raise any such counterclaim in its answer to the primary claim. Ibid. The reason behind that rule is that the court, in adjudicating the primary claim, will be required to address that transaction or occurrence in any event. See, e.g., Southern Constr.

[3] In light of respondent's failure to contest the matter in his brief in opposition, the Court may appropriately decide this case on the assumption that petitioner's counterclaim was "compulsory" within the meaning of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 13(a). See Sup. Ct. R. 15.2. The Court should not decide whether petitioner's counterclaim is in fact compulsory, however, since that issue is outside the questions on which the Court granted certiorari, and the standards for distinguishing between compulsory and permissive counterclaims have practical importance well beyond the application and constitutionality of Section 157(b)(2)(C). Most obviously, the determination that a counterclaim is compulsory means that a defendant's failure to assert it will be treated as a forfeiture. In addition, under the Bankruptcy Code, "[a] governmental unit that has filed a proof of claim in [a bankruptcy] case is deemed to have waived sovereign immunity with respect to a claim against such governmental unit that is property of the estate and that arose out of the same transaction or occurrence out of which the claim of such governmental unit arose." 11 U.S.C. 106(b) (emphasis added). The italicized language closely tracks the text of Federal Rule Civil Procedure 13(a)(1)(A). An unduly broad view of the category of claims and counterclaims that "ar[i]se out of the same transaction or occurrence" might thus effectively expand the range of counterclaims that bankruptcy estates can assert against governmental bodies, in derogation of the canon that sovereign immunity waivers must be "strictly construed." Department of the Army v. Blue Fox, Inc., 525 U.S. 255, 261 (1999) (citation omitted).

Co. v. Pickard, 371 U.S. 57, 60 (1962) (rule "was designed to prevent multiplicity of actions and to achieve resolution in a single lawsuit of all disputes arising out of common matters"); see also 6 Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1409 (3d ed. 2010) (Wright).

As we explain above, Katchen supports the view that, if a creditor invokes the bankruptcy court's assistance by filing a claim against the estate, it thereby subjects itself to the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction over any counterclaims the estate may file. But even if the decision is read more narrowly, the square holding of the case is that, if the overlap between the initial claim and the counterclaim is sufficiently substantial, the bankruptcy judge may adjudicate the counterclaim and may enter affirmative relief against the claimant ordering him to surrender property that rightfully belongs to the estate. See Katchen, 382 U.S. at 335-338. While a compulsory counterclaim need not be a precise mirror image of the primary claim, the text and judicial-economic purposes of the rule dictate that a counterclaim is "compulsory" only when the allegations at the pleading stage overlap significantly enough for joint adjudication to make sense. 6 Wright §§ 1409, 1410. When a creditor invokes "the process of allowance and disallowance of claims," Granfinanciera, 492 U.S. at 58 (quoting Katchen, 382 U.S. at 336), permitting the bankruptcy court to adjudicate a compulsory counterclaim does not substantially expand the bankruptcy judge's power. By contrast, a rule requiring a claim and compulsory counterclaim to be adjudicated separately would entail significant "delay and expense" and would "dismember a scheme which Congress has prescribed." Katchen, 382 U.S. at 339.[4]

C. This case is further distinguishable from Northern Pipeline by virtue of the substantial structural differences between the 1978 and 1984 Bankruptcy Acts. "[T]he constitutionality of a given congressional delegation of adjudicative functions to a non-Article III body must be assessed by reference to the purposes underlying the requirements of Article III"—namely, "to safeguard litigants' 'right to have claims decided before judges who are free from potential domination by other branches of government'" and "to protect 'the role of the independent judiciary within the constitutional scheme of tripartite government.'" Schor, 478 U.S. at 848 (quoting United States v. Will, 449 U.S. 200, 218 (1980), and Thomas v. Union Carbide Agric. Prods. Co., 473 U.S. 568, 583 (1985). Congress's post-Northern Pipeline re-

[4] In Schor, the Court rejected an Article III challenge to the authority of the Commodities Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) to decide state-law counterclaims arising out of the same transaction or occurrence as certain federal reparations claims referred to the CFTC by statute. 478 U.S. 833. The Court recognized that such "counterclaim jurisdiction" was "necessary to make the reparations procedure workable." Id. at 856. It observed that it had previously upheld similar jurisdiction over state-law matters not only in Katchen, but also in an Article III case, Reconstruction Fin. Corp. v. Bankers Trust Co., 318 U.S. 163, 168-171 (1943). Schor, 478 U.S. at 852 (explaining that, in the latter case, the Court "saw no constitutional difficulty in the initial adjudication of a state law claim by a federal agency, subject to judicial review, when that claim was ancillary to a federal law dispute"). The Court concluded "that the congressional authorization of limited CFTC jurisdiction over a narrow class of common law claims as an incident to the CFTC's primary, and unchallenged, adjudicative function does not create a substantial threat to the separation of powers." Id. at 854. Similar reasoning applies here.

As to the first of those constitutional objectives, there is no "potential" for bankruptcy judges to be "dominat[ed] by other branches of government" because bankruptcy judges are insulated from both Congress and the Executive. Under the 1984 Act, bankruptcy judges are "appointed by the court of appeals of the United States for the circuit in which" their judicial district is located. 28 U.S.C. 152(a); compare Northern Pipeline, 458 U.S. at 53 (plurality opinion) (noting that the President appointed bankruptcy judges under the 1978 Act). They "serve as judicial officers of the United States district court established under Article III of the Constitution." 28 U.S.C. 152(a). Although there is no constitutional bar to lowering their pay, the same was true of bankruptcy referees under the 1898 Act, of whom the Northern Pipeline plurality observed that "the primary danger of a threat to the independence * * * came from within, rather than without, the judicial department." 458 U.S. at 80 n.31. And bankruptcy judges are removable only by the circuit judicial council, and only for cause, following a hearing. 28 U.S.C. 152(e).

As to the second goal, there is no threat to "the role of the independent judiciary within the constitutional scheme of tripartite government" because the Judiciary's employment of bankruptcy judges is entirely optional. District courts "may" refer certain bankruptcy-related matters to bankruptcy judges, but they are not required to do so. 28 U.S.C. 157(a); compare Northern Pipeline, 458 U.S. at 54 n.3 ("The ultimate repository of the [1978] Act's broad jurisdictional grant is the bankruptcy courts."); id. at 80 n.31 ("[T]he [1978] bankruptcy courts are independent of the United States district courts.") (internal quotation marks omitted). Article III courts, moreover, exercise appellate jurisdiction over bankruptcy judges' rulings in referred matters, including de novo review of legal issues. 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(1), 158; cf. Paul Bator, The Constitution as Architecture: Legislative and Administrative Courts Under Article III, 65 Ind. L.J. 233, 269 (1989) ("The Constitution gives Congress wide discretion to assign the task of making the initial decision in a case arising under federal law to administrative agencies, but requires judicial review to assure the supremacy of law.").[5] And a district court always retains the authority to "withdraw, in whole or in part, any case or proceeding referred under this section, on its own motion or on timely motion of any party, for cause shown." 28 U.S.C. 157(d). Indeed, the district court in this case initially granted respondent's motion to withdraw the reference of the claim and counterclaim, before vacating the withdrawal and referring the matter back to the bankruptcy judge. See J.A. 123, 129-130.

[5] The statute itself does not prescribe a standard of review. Courts by practice review a bankruptcy judge's legal conclusions de novo, see 10 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 8013.04 (15th ed. 2010), and the current federal rules (like the 1973 rules, see p. 3, supra) provide that findings of fact "shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous," Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013. That latter standard does not violate Article III, because even in cases of private right, "there is no requirement that, in order to maintain the essential attributes of the judicial power, all determinations of fact in constitutional courts shall be made by judges." Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 51 (1932); see Reconstruction Fin. Corp., 318 U.S. at 170 (Article III satisfied even where agency's factfinding "may not be disturbed by a court" if "supported by evidence"); see also Dickinson v. Zurko, 527 U.S. 150, 161-162 (1999) (noting that substantial-evidence review is even more deferential than clear-error review).

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals should be vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings.

APPENDIX 4

1. 28 U.S.C. 157 provides:

Procedures

(a) Each district court may provide that any or all cases under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11 shall be referred to the bankruptcy judges for the district.

(b)(1) Bankruptcy judges may hear and determine all cases under title 11 and all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11, referred under subsection (a) of this section, and may enter appropriate orders and judgments, subject to review under section 158 of this title.

(2) Core proceedings include, but are not limited to—

(A) matters concerning the administration of the estate;

(B) allowance or disallowance of claims against the estate or exemptions from property of the estate, and estimation of claims or interests for the purposes of confirming a plan under chapter 11, 12, or 13 of title 11 but not the liquidation or estimation of contingent or unliquidated personal injury tort or wrongful death claims against the estate for purposes of distribution in a case under title 11;

(C) counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate;

(D) orders in respect to obtaining credit;

(E) orders to turn over property of the estate;

(F) proceedings to determine, avoid, or recover preferences;

(G) motions to terminate, annul, or modify the automatic stay;

(H) proceedings to determine, avoid, or recover fraudulent conveyances;

(I) determinations as to the dischargeability of particular debts;

(J) objections to discharges;

(K) determinations of the validity, extent, or priority of liens;

(L) confirmations of plans;

(M) orders approving the use or lease of property, including the use of cash collateral;

(N) orders approving the sale of property other than property resulting from claims brought by the estate against persons who have not filed claims against the estate;

(O) other proceedings affecting the liquidation of the assets of the estate or the adjustment of the debtor-creditor or the equity security holder relationship, except personal injury tort or wrongful death claims; and

(P) recognition of foreign proceedings and other matters under chapter 15 of title 11.

(3) The bankruptcy judge shall determine, on the judge's own motion or on timely motion of a party, whether a proceeding is a core proceeding under this subsection or is a proceeding that is otherwise related to a case under title 11. A determination that a proceeding is not a core proceeding shall not be made solely on the basis that its resolution may be affected by State law.

(4) Non-core proceedings under section 157(b)(2)(B) of title 28, United States Code, shall not be subject to the mandatory abstention provisions of section 1334(c)(2).

(5) The district court shall order that personal injury tort and wrongful death claims shall be tried in the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending, or in the district court in the district in which the claim arose, as determined by the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending.

(c)(1) A bankruptcy judge may hear a proceeding that is not a core proceeding but that is otherwise related to a case under title 11. In such proceeding, the bankruptcy judge shall submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court, and any final order or judgment shall be entered by the district judge after considering the bankruptcy judge's proposed findings and conclusions and after reviewing de novo those matters to which any party has timely and specifically objected.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the district court, with the consent of all the parties to the proceeding, may refer a proceeding related to a case under title 11 to a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine and to enter appropriate orders and judgments, subject to review under section 158 of this title.

(d) The district court may withdraw, in whole or in part, any case or proceeding referred under this section, on its own motion or on timely motion of any party, for cause shown. The district court shall, on timely motion of a party, so withdraw a proceeding if the court determines that resolution of the proceeding requires consideration of both title 11 and other laws of the United States regulating organizations or activities affecting interstate commerce.

(e) If the right to a jury trial applies in a proceeding that may be heard under this section by a bankruptcy judge, the bankruptcy judge may conduct the jury trial if specially designated to exercise such jurisdiction by the district court and with the express consent of all the parties.

2. The Interim Bankruptcy Court Rule of 1983 provides:

"THE RULE"

ADMINISTRATION OF BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM

(a) Emergency resolution

The purpose of this rule is to supplement existing law and rules in respect to the authority of the bankruptcy judges of this district to act in bankruptcy cases and proceedings until Congress enacts appropriate remedial legislation in response to the Supreme Court's decision in Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., — U.S. —, 102 S. Ct. 2858 (1982), or until March 31, 1984, whichever first occurs.

The judges of the district court find that exceptional circumstances exist. These circumstances include: (1) the unanticipated unconstitutionality of the grant of power to bankruptcy judges in section 241(a) of Public Law 95-598; (2) the clear intent of Congress to refer bankruptcy matters to bankruptcy judges; (3) the specialized expertise necessary to the determination of bankruptcy matters; and (4) the administrative difficulty of the district courts' assuming the existing bankruptcy caseload on short notice.

Therefore, the orderly conduct of the business of the court requires this referral of bankruptcy cases to the bankruptcy judges.

(b) Filing of bankruptcy papers

The bankruptcy court constituted by § 404 of Public Law 95-598 shall continue to be known as the United States Bankruptcy Court of this district. The Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court is hereby designated to maintain all files in bankruptcy cases and adversary proceedings. All papers in cases or proceedings arising under or related to Title eleven shall be filed with the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court regardless of whether the case or proceeding is before a bankruptcy judge or a judge of the district court, except that a judgment by the district judge shall be filed in accordance with Rule 921 of the Bankruptcy Rules.

(c) Reference to bankruptcy judges

(1) All cases under Title eleven and all civil proceedings arising under Title eleven or arising in or related to cases under Title eleven are referred to the bankruptcy judges of this district.

(2) The reference to a bankruptcy judge may be withdrawn by the district court at any time on its own motion or on timely motion by a party. A motion for withdrawal of reference shall not stay any bankruptcy matter pending before a bankruptcy judge unless a specific stay is issued by the district court. If a reference is withdrawn, the district court may retain the entire matter, may refer part of the matter back to the bankruptcy judge, or may refer the entire matter back to the bankruptcy judge with instructions specifying the powers and functions that the bankruptcy judge may exercise. Any matter in which the reference is withdrawn shall be reassigned to a district judge in accordance with the court's usual system for assigning civil cases.

(3) Referred cases and proceedings may be transferred in whole or in part between bankruptcy judges within the district without approval of a district judge.

(d) Powers of bankruptcy judges

(1) The bankruptcy judges may perform in referred bankruptcy cases and proceedings all acts and duties necessary for the handling of those cases and proceedings except that the bankruptcy judges may not conduct:

(A) a proceeding to enjoin a court;

(B) a proceeding to punish a criminal contempt--

(i) not committed in the bankruptcy judge's actual presence; or

(ii) warranting a punishment of imprisonment;

(C) an appeal from a judgment, order, decree, or decision of a United States bankruptcy judge; or

(D) jury trials.

Those matters which may not be performed by a bankruptcy judge shall be transferred to a district judge.

(2) Except as provided in (d)(3), orders and judgments of bankruptcy judges shall be effective upon entry by the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court, unless stayed by the bankruptcy judge or a district judge.

(3)(A) Related proceedings are those civil proceedings that, in the absence of a petition in bankruptcy, could have been brought in a district court or a state court. Related proceedings include, but are not limited to, claims brought by the estate against parties who have not filed claims against the estate. Related proceedings do not include: contested and uncontested matters concerning the administration of the estate; allowance of and objection to claims against the estate; counterclaims by the estate in whatever amount against persons filing claims the estate [sic]; orders in respect to obtaining credit; orders to turn over property of the estate; proceedings to set aside preferences and fraudulent conveyances; proceedings in respect to lifting of the automatic stay; proceedings to determine dischargeability of particular debts; proceedings to object to the discharge; proceedings in respect to the confirmation of plans; orders approving the sale of property where not arising from proceedings resulting from claims brought by the estate against parties who have not filed claims against the estate; and similar matters. A proceeding is not a related proceeding merely because the outcome will be affected by state law.

(B) In related proceedings the bankruptcy judge may not enter a judgment or dispositive order, but shall submit findings, conclusions, and a proposed judgment or order to the district judge, unless the parties to the proceeding consent to entry of the judgment or order by the bankruptcy judge.

(e) District court review

(1) A notice of appeal from a final order or judgment or proposed order or judgment of a bankruptcy judge or an application for leave to appeal an interlocutory order of a bankruptcy judge, shall be filed within 10 days of the date of entry of the judgment or order or of the lodgment of the proposed judgment or order. As modified by section (e)2A and B of this rule, the procedures set forth in Part VIII of the Bankruptcy Rules apply to appeals of bankruptcy judges' judgments and orders and the procedures set forth in Bankruptcy Interim Rule 8004 apply to applications for leave to appeal interlocutory orders of bankruptcy judges. Modification by the district judge or the bankruptcy judge of time for appeal is governed by Rule 802 of the Bankruptcy Rules.

(2)(A) A district judge shall review:

(i) an order or judgment entered under paragraph (d)(2) if a timely notice of appeal has been filed or if a timely application for leave to appeal has been granted;

(ii) an order or judgment entered under paragraph (d)(2) if the bankruptcy judge certifies that circumstances require that the order or judgment be approved by a district judge, whether or not the matter was controverted before the bankruptcy judge or any notice of appeal or application for leave to appeal was filed; and

(iii) a proposed order or judgment lodged under paragraph (d)(3), whether or not any notice of appeal or application for leave to appeal has been filed.

(B) In conducting review, the district judge may hold a hearing and may receive such evidence as appropriate and may accept, reject, or modify, in whole or in part, the order or judgment of the bankruptcy judge, and need give no deference to the findings of the bankruptcy judge. At the conclusion of the review, the district judge shall enter an appropriate order or judgment.

(3) When the bankruptcy judge certifies that circumstances require immediate review by a district judge of any matter subject to review under paragraph (d)(2), the district judge shall review the matter and enter an order or judgment as soon as possible.

(4) It shall be the burden of the parties to raise the issue of whether any proceeding is a related proceeding prior to the time of the entry of the order of judgment of the district judge after review.

(f) Local rules

In proceedings before a bankruptcy judge, the local rules of the bankruptcy court shall apply. In proceedings before a judge of the district court, the local rules of the district court shall apply.

(g) Bankruptcy rules and title IV of Public Law 95-598

Courts of bankruptcy and procedure in bankruptcy shall continue to be governed by Title IV of Public Law 95-598 as amended and by the bankruptcy rules prescribed by the Supreme Court of the United States pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2075 and limited by SEC. 405(d) of the Act, to the extent that such Title and Rules are not inconsistent with the holding of Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., — U.S. —, 102 S. Ct. 2858 (1982).

(h) Effective date and pending cases

This rule shall become effective December 25, 1982, and shall apply to all bankruptcy cases and proceedings not governed by the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 as amended, and filed on or after October 1, 1979. Any bankruptcy matters pending before a bankruptcy judge on December 25, 1982 shall be deemed referred to that judge.

! 28 U.S.C. 1930(a)(6), as amended, requires a "quarterly fee" to be paid in every case pending under chapter 11 based upon disbursements made in the case, without distinction as to the types of disbursements or to whether they have been made pre- or post-confirmation.

√ Background: District court properly rejected attempts to limit fees payable post-confirmation to the minimum amount. When Congress amended section 1930 to include fees on post-confirmation disbursements, it simply extended a debtor's obligation to pay quarterly fees into the post-confirmation period.

JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157. The district court had jurisdiction to hear the United States Trustee's appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a). Appellee (hereinafter "United States Trustee") agrees with Appellant (hereinafter "Maruko") that this Court has appellate jurisdiction.[1]

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

The United States Trustee disagrees with Maruko's statement of the various issues that are properly before this Court. Maruko Brief, at 2-4. As set forth in the district court's order, the bankruptcy court made two critical rulings below: 1) that the application of section 1930(a)(6) to Maruko did not trigger or modify the confirmed plan and was not unconstitutional, and; 2) that the term "disbursement" under section 1930(a)(6) is limited to payments "coming from the bankruptcy estate." EOR, at 01465 (Ex. 57). As a result of these holdings, the bankruptcy court concluded that section 1930(a)(6) could be enforced without any constitutional violations, but it limited Maruko's obligation to pay quarterly fees following plan confirmation. Instead of requiring Maruko to pay a fee based on all disbursements made after the plan was confirmed on February 13, 1994, the bankruptcy court held that Maruko was only obligated to pay $250 per quarter, the minimum amount under § 1930(a)(6). EOR, at 01465 (Ex. 57).

As the district court noted, the United States Trustee appealed the second holding concerning the meaning of the term disbursement, but Maruko filed no cross-appeal. Consequently, the district court properly determined that Maruko's attempt to resurrect issues not preserved by the filing of a proper cross-appeal was untimely and improper. EOR, at 01466 (Ex. 57) citing In re Ranch Ltd. , 146 B.R. 833, 837 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1992) and Frymine v. Paine Webber, Inc., 107 BR. 507, 514 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1989). The district court's decision in this regard is consistent with the law of the Supreme Court and this Circuit. United States v. Bajakjian, 118 S.Ct. 2028, 2032 & 2038 n. 11 (1998)(noting that respondent's failure to cross-appeal precluded consideration of issue not preserved below), aff'g 84 F.3d 334, 337 (9th Cir. 1996)(an appellee seeking a modification of a lower court's judgement must file a cross-appeal). As a consequence, the only issue properly presented before this court is the following:

> Whether the district court erred when it ordered Maruko to pay quarterly fees on all post-confirmation disbursements made by it, according to the schedule for payments set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6)

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This is a dispute over the calculation and collection of post-confirmation quarterly fees in a pending Chapter 11 bankruptcy case. On October 31, 1991, Maruko filed a petition for relief under the reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Maruko paid United States Trustee quarterly fees as required by 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) based upon its disbursements in the chapter 11 proceeding until confirmation of its chapter 11 plan on February 13, 1994. This was consistent with the operative language of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) as it then existed, which required a fee to be paid each quarter in every chapter 11 case until "a plan is confirmed or the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurred first."

On January 26, 1996, Congress amended section 1930(a)(6), deleting the words "until a plan is confirmed or" Section 211 of the Balanced Budget Downpayment Act, I, Pub. L. No. 104-99, 110 Stat. 26, 37-38 (1996) ("Public Law 104-99") (January 26, 1996). The amendment deleted plan confirmation as an event that terminated the fee payment obligation. Thus, Congress extended into the post-confirmation period the obligation to pay quarterly fees in all pending chapter 11 cases based on the amount of disbursements made in the case. In re CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc. -- F3d. --, 1998 WL 348030, *3 (10th Cir. 1998).

In accordance with this statutory change, the United States

Trustee requested Maruko to pay United States Trustee quarterly fees based upon its post-confirmation disbursements from and after January 27, 1996, because the case was still open and pending under chapter 11. In response, on September 17, 1996, Maruko filed a Motion for Determination that Reorganized Debtor has no Obligation for the Payment of Quarterly Fees to the United States Trustee pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §1930(a)(6) as Amended by Section 211 of the Balanced Budget Downpayment Act. EOR, at 0399 (Ex. 7). Subsequently, the Official Committee of Creditors Holding Unsecured Claims ("OCC"), Certain Japanese Co-Owners/Creditors of Maruko, ("Co-Owners"), by and through separate counsel, filed joinders to Maruko's Motion. EOR, at 0442-0457 (Exs. 10 & 11). Extensive briefing ensued, wherein Maruko, the OCC and the Co-Owners raised, and the United States Trustee opposed, various statutory and constitutional arguments against the collection of any post-confirmation fees from Maruko. EOR, at 0458-0550 (Exs. 12-23). In the alternative, Maruko, the OCC and the Co-Owners argued that if any fees were required to be paid, no post-confirmation payments made by reorganized Maruko should be considered in calculating the amount of the quarterly fees due. Under this alternative argument, they asserted that only the minimum fee set forth in section 1930(a)(6) could be charged. See, e.g., EOR, at 0516 (Ex. 21). The hearing on these issues occurred on December 12, 1996 and the bankruptcy court took the matter under submission.

On March 12, 1997, the bankruptcy court (Hon. Louise DeCarl Adler, Chief Judge) filed its Memorandum Decision.[2] EOR, at 0541-0549 (Ex. 24). This decision first held, in pertinent part, that 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6), as amended, did not modify Maruko's confirmed plan, was constitutional and therefore required Maruko to pay post-confirmation quarterly fees from and after January 26, 1996. Second, the bankruptcy court held that the fee was to be calculated based upon disbursements from Maruko's bankruptcy estate. Upon further concluding that Maruko's bankruptcy estate ceased to exist post-confirmation, the court ordered the calculation and payment of the fee at the minimum applicable statutory rate. The bankruptcy court entered an Order in accordance with its Memorandum Decision on April 2, 1997. After unsuccessfully seeking reconsideration, the United States Trustee filed a timely Notice of Appeal of the bankruptcy court's April 2, 1997 Order, as well as an Objection to Jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel. EOR (Exs. 31 & 40). Neither Maruko, nor any other party, filed a Notice of Appeal or Notice of Cross-Appeal concerning the April 2, 1997 Order. EOR, at 1712 (Ex. 62).

In a decision dated February 5, 1998, and subsequently amended on February 24, 1998, the district court (Hon. Judith N. Keep) reversed that portion of the bankruptcy court's decision limiting Maruko's obligation to pay quarterly fees to the minimum amount prescribed by the statute.[3] As discussed above, the district court declined to consider arguments challenging the constitutionality of amended section 1930(a)(6), but did, in the alternative, uphold the government's position on the applicability of the fees and the constitutionality of that application. Only Maruko, seeking to minimize the imposition of the quarterly fees, appealed from the district court's decision. EOR, at 1482 (Ex. 58).

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The plain language of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6), as amended, requires a quarterly fee to be paid in every case pending under chapter 11 based on disbursements that have been made in the case, without distinction as to the types of disbursements or to whether the disbursements have been made pre- or post-confirmation. The majority of bankruptcy and district courts, including the district court below, have rejected attempts to limit fees payable post-confirmation to the minimum amount as being contrary to the plain language of section 1930(a)(6), the intent of Congress and rules of statutory construction, and without cognizable support in the case law interpreting the statute or its legislative history.

Section 1930(a)(6) does not distinguish between pre- and post-confirmation disbursements. Indeed, when Congress amended section 1930 to include fees on post-confirmation disbursements, it simply extended a debtor’s obligation to pay quarterly fees into the post-confirmation period. Rules of statutory construction require that a word be given the same meaning in all contexts within a single statute. Accordingly, the word "disbursements" found in section 1930 must be defined in the same way post-confirmation as it is pre-confirmation. Because pre-confirmation the term "disbursements" has been construed expansively to cover all disbursements of a debtor, logic dictates that post-confirmation "disbursements" also include all disbursements by a debtor. Further, the narrow definition of the term “disbursements” urged by Maruko as being only payments made from the bankruptcy estate will seriously undermine the mechanism that Congress has established to fund the United States Trustee Program.

Although failing to cross-appeal, Maruko seeks to raise several additional issues in its brief. Maruko argues that section 1142 of the Bankruptcy Code limits a bankruptcy court's jurisdiction to enforce payment of post-confirmation quarterly fees. Maruko Brief, at 15-17 This argument is without merit, however, because section 1142 is not jurisdictional. Instead, the grant of jurisdiction to the bankruptcy courts is made pursuant to the Judicial Code, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334 and 157. As both of the courts below correctly recognized, the post-confirmation quarterly fees is a statutory user fee that arises independent of the plan due to the pendency of the bankruptcy case. EOR, at 1466 (Ex. 57). Pursuant to sections 1334 and 157(b)(1) of title 28, the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to compel the debtor to comply with all laws relative to its bankruptcy case. Maruko's arguments to the contrary are simply wrong as a matter of law.

Maruko's argument that the United States Trustee's efforts to collect post-confirmation quarterly fees is an impermissible attempt to modify a confirmed plan is also without merit. The United States Trustee is merely attempting to collect a statutory user fee that arose post-confirmation and is, therefore, not affected by the plan. As the Supreme Court's decision in Holywell v. Smith, 503 U.S. 47, 58-59 (1992) makes clear, the imposition of fees on a debtor's post-confirmation activities cannot be said to conflict with either the reorganization plan or the Bankruptcy Code. Maruko's contention, citing Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211 (1995), that Congress has violated separation of powers principles is also without basis, because payment of the quarterly fee does not require modification of any final judicial order.

ARGUMENT

I. PURSUANT TO 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6), QUARTERLY FEES ARE CALCULATED BASED ON ALL DISBURSEMENTS MADE DURING THE PENDENCY OF A CHAPTER 11 CASE

The district court below noted that it could choose three options in resolving this appeal: "1) uphold the bankruptcy court's interpretation of 'disbursement' under § 1930(a)(6); 2) hold that all disbursements both pre- and post-confirmation are subject to the quarterly fee requirements under that section; or 3) hold that only certain types of disbursements are subject to the quarterly fee." EOR, at 1467-68 (Ex. 57). Applying this Court's decision in St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, Inc., 38 F.2d 1525, 1534 (9th Cir.1994), the district court stated that "[g]iven that Congress amended § 1930(a)(6) to include post-confirmation disbursements, this court finds that quarterly fees should be applied to all of Maruko's post-confirmation payments. This court finds no reason to limit which type of disbursements should be subject to the fee." Thus, the district court correctly chose the second option listed above. For the reasons set forth below, that decision was a correct construction of the plain language of amended section 1930(a)(6) and this Court's decision in St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, and should be affirmed.

A. As Originally Enacted, The Plain Language Of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) Required Quarterly Fees To Be Paid During the Pre-Confirmation Period Based On All Disbursements Made During The Pendency Of A Chapter 11 Bankruptcy Case

On October 27, 1986, the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-554, 100 Stat. 3088 (1986)("1986 Act"). The 1986 Act expanded the pilot United States Trustee Program from 18 judicial districts to a permanent nationwide program. Section 117 of the 1986 Act amended 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a) by, among other things, creating a new quarterly fee for chapter 11 cases. Pursuant to the 1986 Act, a new subsection (6) was added to section 1930(a) following subsections (a)(1) - (5). As originally enacted, section 1930(a)(6) provided as follows:

> (6) In addition to the filing fee paid to the clerk, a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee, for deposit in the Treasury, in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until a plan is confirmed or the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first. The fee shall be $150 for each quarter in which disbursements total less than $15,000; $300 for each quarter in which disbursements total $15,000 or more but less than $150,000; $750 for each quarter in which disbursements total $150,000 or more but less than $300,000; $2,250 for each quarter in which disbursements total $300,000 or more but less that $3,000,000; $3,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $3,000,000 or more. The fee shall be payable on the last day of the calendar month following the calendar quarter for which the fee is owed.

Section 1930(a)(6) is straightforward. It requires payment of a statutory fee on a quarterly basis according to a sliding scale, which is tied to the amount of disbursements made in a case. As originally enacted, the quarterly fee applied in each pending chapter 11 case until a plan of reorganization was confirmed, or the case was converted or dismissed. The word "disbursement" is not, however, defined in the Bankruptcy Code, nor under any provisions of Title 28.

As this Court has previously recognized, however, there is no applicable legislative history concerning the 1986 Act addressing the definition of the word disbursement. St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, Inc., 38 F.2d 1525, 1534 (9th Cir.1994). Because neither the statute, nor its legislative history defines the word disbursement, its meaning must be derived from the plain language of the statute and accepted canons of statutory construction. St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, 38 F.2d at 1534, quoting Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42 (1979) ("[a] fundamental canon of statutory construction is that ... words will be interpreted as taking their ordinary, contemporary, common meaning.").

Applying its ordinary meaning, the Victoria Farms Court addressed the issue of what constitutes a disbursement under section 1930(a)(6) and construed the term “disbursements” very broadly to mean any payment made by or on behalf of the debtor.

Id. The Court reversed the district court's holding that a payment to a secured creditor by an escrow agent from the proceeds of the sale of the secured property did not constitute a disbursement. 38 F.3d at 1534-35. Noting the need to construe the term according to its ordinary meaning, the Court observed that the definition of "disburse" in Webster's Third New International Dictionary, was "to expend . . . pay out." Id. It further observed that the statute drew no distinction between payments to secured and unsecured creditors and that the sparse legislative history on the issue suggested Congress intended an expansive definition. Id. at n.10 and accompanying text. Accordingly, the Court determined that the term disbursements includes all payments made from the property of the debtor’s estate. Id.

Numerous courts have followed the broad construction of the term “disbursement” set forth in St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms during the pre-confirmation period. See, e.g., In re Flatbush Associates, 198 B.R. 75 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1996); In re Hays Builders, Inc., 144 B.R. 778, 780 (Bankr.W.D.Tenn. 1992); In re Wernerstruck, Inc., 130 B.R. 86, 89 (S.D. 1991); In re Ozark Beverage, Inc., 105 B.R. 510, 511-12 (Bankr. E.D. Mo 1989).

It is understandable that the Victoria Farms Court discussed the “property of the estate” in connection with the term disbursements, since the disbursements in that case were all from property of the estate and the real issue before the Court was whether payments made from the proceeds of the sale of secured, versus unsecured, property constituted disbursements under section 1930(a)(6). As the district court below held, Victoria Farms cannot fairly be read as restricting the ordinary meaning of the term disbursements, which includes all payments, to “property of the estate.” The district court noted that Congress simply intended to extend the same fee into the post-confirmation period and did not intend to narrow the definition of disbursements. EOR, at 1470 (Ex. 57), citing In re Sedro-Woolley Lumber Co., Inc., 209 B.R. 987, 989 (Bankr. W.D. Wash.1997) ("To attribute substantive meaning to the phrase 'of the estate' is to impute an intention to the Court which it simply could not have formed in the circumstances as they existed at the time."); In re PJ. Keating Co., 205 B.R. 663, 665 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1997). See also In re A.H. Robbins Co., Inc.,219 B.R. 145, 147 (Bankr. E.D. Va., 1998) (“no cause to distinguish between payments made out of the bankruptcy estate and those derived from another source, because prior to the [1996] Amendment there was simply no other source for United States Trustee fees aside from the bankruptcy estate.”).

The district court further noted that “[w]ithout such an interpretation, the amendment would have little effect, the sliding scale of payments required by § 1930(a)(6) would be moot since post-confirmation payments would not be considered in calculating quarterly fees.” EOR, at 1470 (Ex. 57). Because Victoria Farms plainly held that the term disbursements is to be construed broadly, Maruko’s reliance on the phrase “property of the estate” to limit the definition of disbursements is misplaced.

Further, the legislative history of the 1986 Act indicates that Congress intended the users of the bankruptcy system to pay its incumbent costs. H.R. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 22, 26 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S. Code and Admin. News 5227 (1986): "The United States Trustee Program should not have to be self-funding. It provides a great service to our country's bankruptcy system. However, in this time of budget deficit concerns, self-funding becomes a necessity." United States Trustee v. Prines, 867 F.2d 478, 484(8th Cir. 1989)([t]he purpose of the quarterly fee provision is to ensure the trustee program is 'paid for by the users of the bankruptcy system'..."). Thus, Congress expressly intended that the beneficiaries of the bankruptcy system pay the incumbent costs associated with its benefits. The bankruptcy estate is not a user of a chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization, it is merely the repository of the debtor's property between the filing of the case and confirmation of the plan. It is the debtor that seeks reorganization that is the user of the system and the entity that Congress intended would pay quarterly fees on all disbursements made during the case. Maruko’s focus on the isolated phrase “property of the estate” is, therefore, unduly narrow and incorrect.

B. As the Majority of Reported Cases Have Held, Nothing In The Recent Legislation Extending Quarterly Fee Obligations Into The Post-Confirmation Period Limits The Term "Disbursements" Or Otherwise Supports Maruko’s Attempt To Minimize Its Quarterly Fee Obligations

(1) The January 27, 1996 Amendment To Section 1930(a)(6) Extended Post-Confirmation The Same Quarterly Fee Requirements As Imposed Pre-Confirmation By The 1986 Act

On January 27, 1996, section 1930(a)(6) was amended pursuant to section 211 of the Balanced Budget Downpayment Act, I, Pub. L. No. 104-99, 110 Stat. 26, 37-38 (1996) ("Public Law 104-99"), by striking out the words "a plan is confirmed." The portion of section 1930(a)(6) which was amended (hereinafter "January 1996 Amendment" or "amended section 1930(a)(6)") provides as follows, with the language stricken by Public Law 104-99 redlined in the text:

> In addition to the filing fees paid to the clerk, a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until [~~a plan is confirmed or~~] the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first....

As is evident from the above-quoted text, the only change in the statute was the deletion of the words "a plan is confirmed or" from the text of section 1930(a)(6). The intended effect of this amendment was to extend a debtor's obligation to pay quarterly fees into the post-confirmation period. McLean Square Associates, G.P., 201 B.R. 436, 439 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1996).

Although the legislative history of amended section 1930(a)(6) does not address the meaning of the word disbursement, it does very clearly reflect Congress' intent to extend post-confirmation the same quarterly fee payment made pre-confirmation under the 1986 Act. Both House Report 104-196 and the Joint Explanatory Statement of House Conference Report 104-378 provide that the quarterly fee assessment will simply continue post-confirmation, without discussing any change in the calculation of the fee:

> In addition, under section 111, the conferees agree to include an extension of post-confirmation quarterly fee payments made under Chapter 11 as proposed in both the House and Senate bills and expect that these fees will apply to all pending Chapter 11 cases with confirmed reorganization plans.

H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-378, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (December 4, 1995); 141 Cong. Rec. H13894 (December 4, 1995) (emphasis added).

Consequently, as the weight of authority has held, the only logical inference to be drawn from Congress' failure to discuss a different basis for calculating the quarterly fee post-confirmation is that Congress intended that the fee be calculated on all disbursements post-confirmation, just as it is calculated on all disbursements pre-confirmation. EOR, at 1463, 1466-67

(2) Quarterly Fee Legislation Enacted On September 30, 1996 Demonstrates Congress' Intent To Increase Revenues And To Have Amended Section 1930(a)(6) Construed Broadly

As with the 1986 Act, there is no legislative history accompanying the January 1996 amendment that extended the obligation to pay quarterly fees into the post-confirmation period that directly addresses the meaning of the word "disbursement." The legislative history of the January, 1996 amendment does, however, clearly articulate the reason for this amendment. As explained in the initial House Report from the Committee on Appropriations, which was reported from the House of Representatives on July 19,1995, Congress expressly considered the need to increase quarterly fee revenues by extending the fee into the post-confirmation period. In re Keating Co., 205 B.R. at 664 (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 104-196, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. at 16-17 (1995)).

On September 30, 1996, Additional legislation was enacted following the January, 1996 amendment, on September 30, 1996, to further augment quarterly fee revenues. That legislation was contained in Section 109 ("Section 109") of the General Provisions for the Department of Justice contained in Title I of the Omnibus Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 1997, Public Law 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009, and affected quarterly fees in two ways. First, Section 109(a) amended the schedule of quarterly fee payments set forth in section 1930(a)(6). The schedule was amended by increasing the number of levels of fees from five to ten and by increasing significantly the maximum amount of fees applicable to large cases. For, example, in a case with quarterly disbursements of $3,000,000, the corresponding fee was increased from $5,000 to $8,000.

The second provision related to quarterly fees was set forth in Section 109(d), and provided that “notwithstanding any other provision of law, the fees under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a)(6) shall accrue and be payable from and after January 27, 1996, in all cases (including without limitation, any cases pending as of that date), regardless of confirmation status of their plans . . .” This amendment was enacted in response to bankruptcy court decisions which had held that post-confirmation quarterly fees could not be collected from debtors with plans confirmed prior to the effective date of the January 27, 1996 amendment to section 1930(a)(6). See, e.g., In re Precision Autocraft, Inc., 197 B.R. 901 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1996), rev’d United States Trustee vs. Precision Autocraft, Inc., et. al., 207 B.R. 692 (W.D. Wash. 1997)(reversing Bankruptcy Court based on §109(d) of Public law 104-208).

By enacting this clarifying legislation, Congress underscored its desire to increase quarterly fee revenues and expressly stated its intent that amended section 1930(a)(6) be applied to all pending chapter 11 cases, including those with plans confirmed prior to the effective date of the January 27, 1996 amendment.[6] The narrow construction of the term

[6] The applicable conference report for this legislation expressly provides that the Amendment serves to "clarify that fees collected under post-confirmation status are to be assessed in all pending chapter 11 cases." disbursement urged by Maruko is not only contrary to Congress' plain intent but would also defeat its intent and, therefore, it should be rejected. See, In re Corporate Business Products, Inc., 209 B.R. 951, 954 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1997) ("[i]t is implausible that Congress amended the statute in January of 1996 to make the elaborate sliding scale of fees applicable post confirmation, only to have the minimum fee apply post-confirmation."); In re Hess' Sons, Inc., 218 B.R., at 360 (Bankr. D. Md., 1998) ("as a revenue-generating mechanism, 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) fees are akin to a tax. Tax laws are to be construed in a light most favorable to the taxing authority as a matter of public policy"), citing Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 595 (1983)).

(3) Maruko's Construction Of The Term Disbursement Would Require Two Separate Definitions Of That Term And Is Contrary To The Plain Language Of The Statute

A final flaw in Maruko's analysis is that it necessarily requires differing definitions of the term disbursements for the pre-confirmation and post-confirmation periods. In the period before a reorganization plan is confirmed, courts would be bound by the broad definition of disbursements adopted in the St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms case. In the post-confirmation period, in contrast, Maruko urges that a much narrower definition adopted. Black letter law dictates that such conflicting definitions of identical statutory language be avoided. Northern Plains Resource Council v. EPA, 645 F.2d 1349 (9th Cir. 1981).

The majority of courts have held that all disbursements made by the reorganized debtors constitute disbursements within the meaning of section 1930(a)(6). In re A.H. Robins Company, Inc., 219 B.R. 145, 149 (Bankr E.D. Va. 1998)[7]; In re Maruko, 219 B.R. 567 (S.D. Cal, 1998); In re Hess' Sons, Inc., 218 B.R. 354 (Bankr. D. Md., 1998); In re Boulders on the River, Inc., 218 B.R. 528 (D. Or., 1997); In re Roy Stanley, Inc., 217 B.R. 23 (Bankr. N.D. N.Y. 1997); In re Pars Leasing, 217 B.R. 218, 219-220 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 1997); In re Gates Community Chapel of Rochester, Inc., 212 B.R. 220, 225 (Bankr. W.D. N.Y.1997); In re Corporate Business Products, Inc., 209 B.R. 951 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1997); In re Sedro-Woolley Lumber Co., Inc., 209 B.R. 987 (Bankr. W.D. Wa. 1997); In re Keating, 205 B.R. 663 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1997); In re Bushnell, 1997 WL 70131860 (Bankr. D. Vt. 1997). We urge this Court to do the same.

(4) Maruko's Arguments Concerning Payments Related To The Japanese Co-Owners Is Without Merit

Maruko argues that United States Trustee quarterly fees should not be based upon disbursements made by it to Japanese co-owners from proceeds of the sales pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(h) for two reasons: (1) that the turnover of funds from the "involuntary" sale of the Japanese co-owner's interests do not constitute disbursements because such interests were never property of the debtor's estate and (2) that since Maruko, as the section 363(h) "trustee" could not collect compensation based upon disbursements of co-owner's proceeds, the United States Trustee should not be entitled to use such proceeds in calculating its quarterly fee. These arguments are without merit

The section 363(h) sale was not an "involuntary" sale. The Debtor admits that the Japanese trustees caused Maruko to file for chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in the United States so it could take advantage of the remedy afforded by a section 363(h) sale. Maruko Brief, at 29. Further, the Debtor admits that the Japanese co-owners entered into stipulated judgments allowing the Maruko to sell the properties in this case. Id. Thus, both Maruko and the Japanese co-owners voluntarily consented to the jurisdiction of the United States bankruptcy court with regard to the section 363(h) property sales.

Maruko next argues that because the Japanese co-owner interests were never property of the estate, funds disbursed by the debtor to these co-owners is not subject to the United States Trustee quarterly fee and urges this court to follow the court's erroneous reasoning in the case, In re Meyer, 187 B.R. 650

(Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1995). That case interpreted this Court's decision in St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms[8] as limiting the term "disbursements" to property of the debtor's bankruptcy estate. This Court in St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms never held that a debtor's distribution of non-estate property could not be utilized in the calculation of United States Trustee quarterly fees; to the contrary, in the St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms decision, this Court provided the term "disbursement" with the broadest possible meaning in the factual context of the case by holding that the term meant "all payments". Id. at n. 10. Indeed, as the district court, in reversing the bankruptcy court in this case, correctly held "the St. Angelo court does not limit the language and intent of Congress in amending section 1930(a)(6), but instead provides an expansive definition for "disbursement" that is not limited to the bankruptcy estate context". In re Maruko, 219 B.R. 567, 571(S.D. Ca. 1998). Just as disbursements constitute all payments in the pre-confirmation context, disbursements include all payments of the reorganized debtor in the post-confirmation context. See, e.g., In re A.H. Robins Company, Inc., 219 B.R. 145, 149 (Bankr E.D. Va. 1998)(disbursements to be broadly construed); In re P.J. Keating Inc., 205 B.R. 663, 666-67(Bankr. D. Mass. 1997)(same).

[8] St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, Inc., 38 F.3d 1524(9th Cir. 1994), amended by 46 F. 3d 969(9th Cir. 1995).

Section 1930(a)(6) conditions the payment of United States Trustee quarterly fees only on the existence of a "case" and "disbursements". The payments made by the Maruko to the Japanese co-owners during the course of this case arose out of section 363(h) sales and the payments were made by Maruko in the context of the bankruptcy case. Thus, these payments constitute "disbursements" for the purpose of calculating United States Trustee quarterly fees. United States Trustee v. Prines, 867 F.2d 478, 484(8th Cir. 1989)([t]he purpose of the quarterly fee provision is to ensure the trustee program is 'paid for by the users of the bankruptcy system'...").

Second, Maruko asserts that, as the section 363(h) "trustee", it could not collect compensation based upon disbursements of co-owner's proceeds. It argues, therefore, the United States Trustee should not be entitled to use such proceeds in the calculation of United States Trustee quarterly fees. Maruko then notes that section 363(j) specifically prohibits the Trustee from charging a co-owner with the Trustee's statutory fees because those sales proceeds are held pursuant to a statutory trust created by section 363 of the Bankruptcy Code for the benefit of the co-owners who are not debtors and who never sought the services of the Trustee to effect a sale". Maruko Brief, at 31. Unlike section 363(j) which specifically excludes trustee compensation from being based upon such proceeds, there is no similar limitation on the payment of United States Trustee fees under 28 U.S.C. §1930(a)(6). Had Congress intended such a limitation, it should have provided same.

The limitation upon a trustee's compensation under section 363(j) and the requirement that a debtor pay United States Trustee quarterly fees based upon disbursements under §1930(a)(6) are not dissimilar in effect. Just as a trustee should not be able to profit from disbursements made from the receipt and distribution of non-estate property, a debtor should not be entitled to profit by invoking the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court and oversight of the Office of the United States Trustee without having to pay the appropriate user fee. Maruko admits that it specifically invoked the jurisdiction of the United States courts to utilize the provisions of section 363(h), and these provisions were utilized by it the case and under the oversight the Office of the United States Trustee.[9] Maruko cannot now refuse to pay the user fee which arises as a result of its actions.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT HAS JURISDICTION OVER A CLAIM FOR POST-CONFIRMATION QUARTERLY FEES.

Maruko, citing the now-reversed bankruptcy court's decision in In re Gryphon at the Stone Mansion, Inc., 204 B.R. 460

[9] The United States Trustee notes, analogously, that while a chapter 11 trustee's fees may be capped under section 326, all disbursements by the trustee are to be utilized in calculating United States Trustee fees under 28 U.S.C. §1930(a)(6).

(Bankr..W.D. Pa. 1997), rev’d 216 B.R. 764 (W.D. Pa. 1997) argues that the bankruptcy court lacked jurisdiction over the United States Trustee's claim for post-confirmation quarterly fees. The bankruptcy court in Gryphon held there was no such jurisdiction because it believed that a bankruptcy court's "post-confirmation jurisdiction is limited to ensuring that the terms of the plan are carried out." 204 B.R. at 462. The bankruptcy court misunderstood, as does Maruko, the nature of the jurisdictional inquiry.

The Gryphon bankruptcy court's opinion cited only one statutory provision, 11 U.S.C. § 1142, which does not purport to be a grant of jurisdiction. 204 B.R. at 462. Bankruptcy jurisdiction is defined in 28 U.S.C. § 1334, which is entitled "Bankruptcy cases and proceedings," and is found in Chapter 85 ("District Courts; Jurisdiction") of title 28. That statute provides that "the district courts shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction of all civil proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in or related to cases under title 11. 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b). The grant of jurisdiction in section 1334 encompasses bankruptcy courts by virtue of § 157(a). In re Refrigeration Reclamation Corp., 186 B.R. 78, 80 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1995) ("Title 11 nowhere purports to circumscribe the subject matter jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts in chapter 11 cases."); Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 1142.04[2] (15th ed. rev.

1998) ("[N]either section 1142 nor the terms of a plan confer jurisdiction upon a bankruptcy court. Bankruptcy jurisdiction is governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1334; this is so whether the matter at issue arises before or after confirmation of a plan.").

Thus, as the district court in Gryphon properly recognized in reversing the bankruptcy court, the jurisdictional inquiry must focus on section 1334, and should simply ask whether the proceeding is one "arising in * * * or related to [a] case[] under title 11." 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b). United States Trustee v. Gryphon at the Stone Mansion, Inc., 216 B.R., at 767.[10] As the courts have recognized, "related to" jurisdiction "is the broadest, [and] a court 'need only determine whether a matter is at least related to the bankruptcy.'" Donaldson, 104 F.3d 547, 552 (3d Cir. 1997), quoting In re Marcus Hook Dev. Park, Inc., 943 F.2d 261, 264 (3d Cir. 1991) (internal quotation marks omitted). See also, In re Boulders on the River, Inc., 218 B.R. 528, 542 (D. Or. 1997) (noting the Ninth Circuit's "related to" test is "whether the outcome of the proceeding could have any effect on the estate being administered" and holding that enforcement of a debtor's quarterly fee obligation is sufficiently related the administration of the estate to establish the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court), quoting In re Fietz, 852 F.2d 455, 457 (9th Cir. 1988), quoting Pacor, Inc.

[10] The district court's decision in Gryphon is currently on appeal to the Third Circuit, (Appeal No. 97-3670).

v. Higgings, 743 F.2d 984, 994 (3d Cir. 1984). The claim at issue in this case -- the United States Trustee's demand that Maruko pay the statutorily mandated post-confirmation quarterly fees -- clearly is "related to" the administration of the underlying bankruptcy proceeding, and thus the bankruptcy court properly ordered Maruko to pay post-confirmation fees. In re CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc., --F.3d --, 1998 WL 348030, *3 (10th Cir., June 30, 1998)(holding that enforcement of a the debtors' post-confirmation quarterly fee obligation is sufficiently "related to" the bankruptcy case to confer jurisdiction); In re A.H. Robbins, 219 B.R. at 152 (rejection bankruptcy court's jurisdictional analysis in Gryphon).

III. THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE HAS NOT SOUGHT ANY MODIFICATION OF THE PLAN IN ATTEMPTING TO COLLECT POST-CONFIRMATION QUARTERLY FEES

Maruko also argues that collection of post-confirmation quarterly fees would result in an impermissible modification of the plan pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1127. This argument is without merit and is contrary to the clear weight of authority, including the only Circuit Court to have addressed the issue. See, e.g., In re CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc., -- F.3d --, 1998 WL 348030, *5 (10th Cir., June 30, 1998); In re A.H. Robbins Co, Inc., 219 B.R. 145, 148 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1998); In re Maruko, Inc., 206 B.R.225, 228 (Bankr. S.D. Cal 1997); In re McLean Square Assoc., G.P., 201 B.R. 436 (E.D. Va. 1996). The United States Trustee, by collecting a quarterly fee from the Maruko, is not attempting to modify in any way the treatment of any creditors or parties in interest under the Plan. The United States Trustee has sought only to collect a post-confirmation obligation of the Debtor that arose by operation of Federal bankruptcy law in, and by virtue of, the existence of the Debtor's bankruptcy case. _In re CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc._ -- F.3d --, 1998 WL 348030, *5 (UST fees does not modify plan, but is merely an "administrative expense attendant to an open case"), citing _In re McLean Square Assoc._, 201 B.R. 436, 441 (E.D. Va. 1996). Neither Maruko, nor its creditors (including the Japanese Co-owners) exist in a vacuum. Maruko is subject to the vagaries of the market and is not immune from post-confirmation changes in law. The United States Trustee does not believe that anyone would seriously contend that a post-confirmation change in tax statutes that imposed additional or higher income or sales taxes on a debtor's operation would necessarily result in the modification of its confirmed plan.[11]

[11] The situation can also be analogized to one where a confirmed plan provides for the debtor to file one or more post-confirmation adversary proceedings but which does not provide that the debtor will have to pay any filing fees associated with the adversary proceedings. Like the United States Trustee's quarterly fees, the filing fees payable to the court clerk arise under section 1930 of title 28. For Maruko to argue that it is insulated from having to pay the adversary filing fees because its confirmed plan did not provide for the payment of such fees would be ludicrous. The confirmed plan does not bind the court clerk with respect to fees under section 1930 that arise post-confirmation, just as the plan

Congress' determination to extend the obligation to pay quarterly fees to open cases in which plans have been confirmed is indistinguishable from an increase in taxes. The fact that payment of such fees might make it more difficult for debtor to perform its plan obligations does not mean that the imposition of the fees modifies the plans. It simply means that the plan failed to take into account one of any number of potential roadblocks to the successful completion of the plans.

Maruko relies primarily on the now-reversed bankruptcy court decisions in In re CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc., 199 B.R. 986 (Bankr. D. Utah 1996) and In re Burk Development Co., Inc., 205 B.R. 778 (Bankr. D. La. 1997), as well as the Tenth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel's decision In re Salina Speedway, Inc., 210 B.R. 851 (Bankr. 10th Cir. 1997) in support of its modification argument. However, the bankruptcy court in Burk expressly recognized that Congress could require payment of post-confirmation quarterly fees in confirmed cases without requiring reopening of confirmation orders. Burk Development Co., Inc., 205 B.R., at 788; n. 23. Insofar as Maruko relies on In re Salina Speedway decision, it should be noted that this decision was effectively overruled by the Tenth Circuit. In re CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc. -- F.3d --, 1998 WL 348030, *8 (expressly rejecting holding in In re Salina Speedway). The does not bind the United States Trustee with respect to post-confirmation fees.

Tenth Circuit correctly recognized, as have most courts, that the United States Trustee is not seeking to modify the plan, but is only attempting to collect a debtor’s post-confirmation quarterly fee obligation. The United States Trustee urges this Court to reject Maruko’s arguments to the contrary.

IV. THE IMPOSITION OF POST-CONFIRMATION QUARTERLY FEES AT ISSUE HERE IS NOT AN IMPERMISSIBLE REOPENING BY CONGRESS OF A FINAL JUDGMENT.

Maruko argues further that enforcement of amended section 1930(a)(6) would be unconstitutional as a violation of the doctrine of Separation of Powers, citing Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211 (1995). In that case, the Supreme Court considered the constitutional validity of an amendment to the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 that reopened final, unappealed dismissal judgments. Such a measure, the Court held, impermissibly trenched upon the power of the Judicial Branch to decide cases or controversies. Contrary to Maruko’s argument, that principle is not implicated by Congress's imposition of quarterly fees by amended section 1930(a)(6).

The argument that the fee is inconsistent with the plan is foreclosed by Holywell Corp. v. Smith, 503 U.S. 47, 58-59 (1992). In Holywell, the confirmed plan placed all of the debtor’s property in a trust and appointed a trustee to liquidate the trust assets and distribute the same to creditors of the debtors’ estates; the plan made no provision for the payment of post-confirmation taxes by the trustee or the filing of tax returns. The plan was confirmed by the Court, with no objection from the United States. When the IRS attempted to collect capital gains taxes, the trustee argued, inter alia, that the terms of the confirmed plan, which did not provide for the filing of tax returns or the payment of taxes post-confirmation, were binding on the United States and precluded the imposition of the taxes. 503 U.S. at 50-52.

The Supreme Court flatly rejected the trustee’s argument. The Court noted that the liability to pay the taxes did not accrue until the time for filing the returns, which was after the plan was confirmed in that case. The Court relied on the plain language of section 1141(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, which specifies that the plan is binding on the pre-confirmation claims of “creditors,” and section 101(10) of the Bankruptcy Code, which specifies that a “creditor” is an entity holding various pre-confirmation claims. The Court concluded that the plan could not bind the United States, or any other party, with respect to post-petition claims.

The post-confirmation fees at issue in the present case are no different than the post-confirmation taxes sought by the United States in Holywell. In each case, the liability did not accrue until events occurred post-confirmation. In re CF & I Fabricators of Utah, Inc. -- F.3d --, 1998 WL 348030, *6-7 (rejecting Separation of Powers argument).

V. MARUKO'S EQUITABLE OR POLICY ARGUMENTS CONCERNING THE AMOUNT OF QUARTERLY FEES MUST BE REJECTED

Maruko cites the now-reversed bankruptcy court decision in In re Beechknoll Nursing Homes, Inc., 206 B.R. 888 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1997) rev'd 216 B.R. 925 (S.D. Ohio 1998) for the proposition that quarterly fees should bear some relationship to the administration of cases. This argument is unavailing for several reasons.

First, contrary to the Maruko's argument, nothing in either the statute or its legislative history suggests that Congress intended to link the amount of effort expended by the United States Trustee in a given case with the amount of quarterly fees it pays. To the contrary, the relative ease of basing the quarterly fee on all disbursements indicates that Congress intended a straight forward system that was designed to avoid dragging the courts through a laborious process of deciding how much the United States Trustee should receive in each case.[12] Had Congress wished to create such a linkage, presumably it could have structured post confirmation fees along the lines of professional fees, which are limited according to various criteria. 11 U.S.C. § 330 (court may award only reasonable compensation for actual and necessary services). Congress, however, has established the amount of the quarterly fee obligation relative only to the debtor's disbursements during the pendency of the chapter 11 case, with no other limitations.

Second, the Maruko’s argument disregards the fact that Congress has structured the fee in an equitable fashion and with full knowledge of the impact that it would have on chapter 11 debtors. Modest fees are assessed on a graduated scale according to the amount of disbursements made by a debtor. Congress also has imposed a ceiling so that no debtor would pay more than a fixed maximum in any quarter.

Finally, To the extent that Maruko is arguing equitable or policy considerations, such considerations do not allow a court to set aside the applicable bankruptcy law. Prisbrey v. Noble, 505 F.2d 170 (10th Cir. 1974). While bankruptcy courts apply equitable principles, a fundamental principle of equity is that "equity follows the law." Wedges v. Dixon County, 150 U.S. 182, 192 (1893). Congress has struck what it considers to be an equitable balance. Barring a constitutional infirmity, Congress' decision must be respected. TVA v. Hill, 437 U.S. 153 (1978).

CONCLUSION

The decision of the district court should be affirmed.

I. STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

Sections 157(b)(1) and (2) of Title 28 of the United States Code confer jurisdiction upon bankruptcy courts to hear and determine all core proceedings under title 11 of the United States Code. The motion for resolution of a disputed trustee election under 11 U.S.C. § 702 of the Bankruptcy Code is a core proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A).

On January 15, 2010, the bankruptcy court affirmed the report of the United States Trustee regarding the disputed trustee election and ordered that the interim trustee, James Rigby, serve as the permanent trustee. This was a final order over which this Court has jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (c)(1)(B). See J.P. Morgan Inv. Mgmt., Inc. v. U. S. Trustee (In re Martech USA, Inc.), 188 B.R. 847, 850 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1995), aff'd, 90 F.3d 408 (9th Cir. 1996).

As explained in Section A of the Argument, this appeal should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction because even if Appellants are right about the issue on appeal and this Court recalculates the votes, the numbers in the United States Trustee's report of the disputed election show that the outcome of the election will be the same. Therefore, the Appellants have no personal stake in this appeal.

II. STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Whether this appeal should be dismissed as moot because the numbers in the election report show that even excluding the unsecured claims of the Undersecured Creditors,[1] not enough creditors requested an election to hold a valid election and creditors holding the majority of votes voted for the interim trustee, so he will continue as trustee regardless of how this appeal is resolved.

2. Whether if this Court believes this appeal is not moot, it should affirm because the alleged error did not affect the outcome of the election.

3. Whether Appellants lack standing to appeal the bankruptcy court's order resolving the disputed election because they did not file objections below or ask the bankruptcy court to resolve the disputed election.

4. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by counting the unsecured claims held by the Undersecured Creditors in determining that not enough creditors had requested an election and the interim trustee had received the majority of the votes cast.

III. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This case concerns the election of a chapter 7 trustee. On July 10, 2009, three secured creditors filed an involuntary petition against the debtor, Michael R. Mastro, to which he consented on August 20, 2009. Under 11 U.S.C. § 301, Mr. Rigby was selected to serve as the interim trustee on August 21, 2009. At the section 341 meeting of unsecured creditors held October 28, 2009, Jerome

[1] In this brief, the term "Undersecured Creditors" means those creditors who filed proofs of claims with both secured and unsecured portions.

Shulkin, an attorney representing several creditors, and holding proxies for others requested the election of a permanent chapter 7 trustee. The United States Trustee presided over the election.

Several parties raised general objections at the election. The United States Trustee filed a report of the disputed trustee election with the court showing the proofs of claims filed, the requests received and the votes cast, and providing an analysis of the election results under various scenarios. App., Tab B.[2] Several creditors filed objections to the United States Trustees' report and asked the bankruptcy court to resolve the disputes. App., Tabs C & J. The Appellants, Anthony Petrarca and Art Mazzola, however, did not.

The bankruptcy court held a hearing on December 4, 2009. The bankruptcy court determined that the solicitation of proxies was improper and required the disqualification of the votes voted by proxy. App., Tab A at 6. The bankruptcy court further determined that Undersecured Creditors were entitled to vote the unsecured portion of their claims. Id. at 8. The bankruptcy court concluded that creditors holding at least twenty percent by amount of the claims that could be voted had not requested an election as required to hold a valid election, and even if they had, Mr. Rigby received the majority of the votes. See id. at 9 (approving report of United States Trustee). The bankruptcy court entered its order directing that Mr. Rigby, the interim trustee, would serve as the permanent trustee in the bankruptcy case on January 15, 2010. Id. at 1-3.

The objecting parties did not appeal the decision, but the Appellants timely filed a notice of appeal to this Court on January 29, 2010. App., Tab Q.

IV. STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

Section 702 of title 11 permits creditors holding unsecured claims to elect a trustee of their choosing at the section 341 meeting of creditors. A creditor that holds an allowable, undisputed, fixed, liquidated, unsecured claim that is not entitled to priority may vote for a candidate for trustee as long as that creditor: 1) does not have an interest that is materially adverse to the interest of general unsecured creditors, and 2) is not an insider. 11 U.S.C. § 702(a). However, creditors may elect a trustee only if creditors holding at least twenty percent in amount of the eligible claims request an election. 11 U.S.C. § 702(b). If an election is properly requested, a trustee is elected if creditors holding at least twenty percent in amount of the eligible claims actually vote and one candidate receives a majority of the votes cast. 11 U.S.C. § 702(c). If no trustee is elected, the interim trustee serves as the permanent trustee in the case. 11 U.S.C. § 702(d).

The United States Trustee presides over the trustee election and files a report of the election with the bankruptcy court. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(b) & (d). If the election is disputed, the United States Trustee tabulates the results of the election for each alternative presented by the dispute in its report. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(d). The bankruptcy court will resolve the disputed election if within ten days after the United States Trustee files the election report it receives a motion requesting it to do so. Id. (2009).[3]

V. RELEVANT FACTS

The debtor in this case, Michael R. Mastro, is a large scale real estate developer and investor. Many of his secured creditors held real property as collateral and were undersecured by the time the case was filed. Mr. Mastro reported on his bankruptcy schedules unsecured debt in excess of $240 million and undersecured debt of over $ 100 million. App., Tab B at Ex. 1, p. 7, line 357, columns C & D.

Mr. Rigby, a chapter 7 panel trustee with over 25 years of experience, was selected as the interim trustee. Shortly thereafter, numerous secured creditors filed motions seeking to lift the automatic stay as to the properties securing their claims. After obtaining an extension of time to respond so he could review the relevant properties, Mr. Rigby did not oppose the motions, finding no legal basis for such opposition.[4] See App., Tab O at 2, ¶ 7 & Exhibits at 3-4. Further, Mr. Rigby reported that there was unlikely to be many assets available for distribution to unsecured creditors. See App., Tab F at 3.

Mr. Shulkin and Mr. Driano represented several creditors, friends and relatives of Mr. Mastro, that held relatively small, unsecured claims. Mr. Shulkin proposed Brian Ward, an attorney and former real estate investment fund manager, as a candidate for trustee in the Mastro bankruptcy, and introduced Mr. Ward to a large group of similarly-situated creditors. See App., Tab O at 2-3. Although Mr. Ward had no experience as a bankruptcy trustee, Mr. Shulkin, Mr. Driano and Mr. Ward led the creditors to believe that if Mr. Ward were the trustee, he could obtain a larger distribution for the unsecured creditors than Mr. Rigby. Id.

A trustee election was held at the continued section 341 meeting of creditors on October 28, 2009.[5] Creditors filed over two hundred proofs of unsecured claims prior to the trustee election in the total amount of $180,717,663.32. See App., Tab B at 3 & Ex. 1, column H. No objections were filed to any of those claims prior to the election. At the October 28 meeting, several creditors in attendance requested a trustee be elected. See id. at 7 and Ex. 1, column J. In addition, Mr. Shulkin and Mr. Driano requested an election on behalf of eighty creditors for whom they held proxies. Id. at 7 and Ex. 6.

[4] A creditor is entitled to relief from the automatic stay if the debtor does not have equity in the property and the property is not necessary to an effective reorganization. 11 U.S.C. § 362(d)(2). There was no intent to reorganize in this case.

[5] An election was requested at the initial 341 meeting of creditors, but that meeting was continued after it became clear that many unsecured creditors did not have adequate notice of the first meeting and were not present at that meeting. See App., Tab B at 2.

The United States Trustee presided over the election and recorded the requests made and the votes cast. Mr. Shulkin and Mr. Rigby expressly reserved their right to object to the requests for election and ballots cast in the election. See id. at 1.

The United States Trustee filed a report of the disputed election on November 6, 2009. App., Tab B. The report tabulated the requests made and the votes cast under various scenarios based on the objections raised at the election. In the report, the United States Trustee calculated the pool of eligible claims as $180,717,663.32, by totaling the amount of all proofs of unsecured claims filed with the bankruptcy court or submitted to the United States Trustee prior to the election to which no one had filed a formal objection.[6] Id. at 3. The United States Trustee received valid requests for a trustee election from creditors holding unsecured claims in the amount of $ 18,934,153.89, which equaled 10.5% of the eligible claims.[7] Id. at 2, 7, 11. The report also showed that Mr. Rigby received valid votes in the amount of $ 109,119,623.36 and Mr. Ward received valid votes in the amount of 8,239,101.50.[8] Id. at 13. The report concluded that in the United States Trustee's view, the statutory twenty percent requesting requirement was not met and so no valid election was held. Id. at 14. The report left the ultimate determination to the bankruptcy court, noting that if the bankruptcy court determined that a valid election was held, then Mr. Rigby received the majority of the votes and was elected trustee. Id.

Six creditors filed objections, but Appellants did not. The six creditors objected primarily on two grounds: 1) the requests for election made by proxy were improperly disqualified and 2) the Undersecured Creditors were not eligible to vote their unsecured claims because the amount of those claims could not be determined with certainty and because those creditors had an interest materially adverse to the general unsecured creditors. Therefore, the unsecured claims of the [7] The United States Trustee calculated the total amount of valid requests for an election by starting with the total amount of requests received and subtracting from that amount: 1) the requests by creditors that were not eligible to vote because they had not filed a proof of claim and 2) requests made only by proxies that were solicited in violation of Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2006. Id. at 10-11.

[8] The United States Trustee did not count the requests made or the votes cast by proxy by Mr. Shulkin because the proxies were solicited in violation of Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2006. App., Tab B at 7-11, 12. The United States Trustee also excluded requests made and votes cast by creditors who had not filed proofs of claims prior to the election as required by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003. Id. at 10-11, 13.

Undersecured Creditors could not be counted either for the purpose of calculating whether the requesting requirement had been satisfied or determining which candidate had received the most votes. The six objecting creditors, an Undersecured Creditor and the chapter 7 trustee briefed their positions and submitted the declarations of various witnesses and documentary evidence to the bankruptcy court. App., Tabs C-L, N-P. The United States Trustee also filed a brief. App., Tab M. Appellants filed no briefs and submitted no evidence. No evidence was proffered concerning any specific adverse interest held by any creditor. On December 4, 2009, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on the objections. On January 15, 2010, the bankruptcy court entered an order, overruling the objections, affirming the United States Trustee's report and making Mr. Rigby the permanent trustee. App., Tab A.

The bankruptcy court made several findings in connection with the objections to the report. The court "totally agree[d] ... that the solicitation of proxies in this case was improper and require[d] disqualification of the Shulkin Driano proxies." Id. at 6. Specifically, the court found, notwithstanding their statements to the contrary, that the evidence showed that Mr. Shulkin, Mr. Driano, and Mr. Ward, all attorneys, orally solicited proxies in violation of Rule 2006(d)(4). Id. at 7. And, they failed to timely file the proxy report required by Rule 2006(e). Id. at 8.

The bankruptcy court also ruled the Undersecured Creditors were entitled to vote their unsecured claims. Id. at 8. In addition, the court expressly found that the Undersecured Creditors had no interest materially adverse to the general unsecured creditors. Id. at 8-9.

All of the objecting parties accepted the decision of the bankruptcy court, but Appellants, neither of whom objected below, appealed. Appellants included five issues in the statement of issues filed in this Court, three of which relate to the disqualification of the proxy votes and two of which concern voting by the Undersecured Creditors. See Appellants' Designation of the Record and Statement of Issues. Appellants expressly abandoned the three issues relating to the disqualification of the proxy votes in their opening brief (Opening Brief of Appellants at 5) and argued only that the bankruptcy court erred by counting the votes of the Undersecured Creditors.

VI. APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

Findings of fact are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013; Salazar v. McDonald (In re Salazar), 430 F.3d 992, 994 (9th Cir. 2005). Conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. In re Salazar, 430 F.3d at 994. Mixed questions of law and fact are also reviewed de novo. Murray v. Bammer (In re Bammer), 131 F.3d 788, 792 (9th Cir. 1997) (en banc).

The bankruptcy court's calculation of the percentage of eligible claims requesting an election is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Caudill v. N.C. Machinery, Inc. (In re Am. Eagle Mfg., Inc.), 231 B.R. 320, 328 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1999). See Berg v. Esposito (In re Oxborrow), 913 F.2d 751, 754 (9th Cir. 1990) ("[w]here the bankruptcy judge has exercised some supervisory powers over the election of a trustee his action should be examined to determine whether or not he has abused his discretion"). A court abuses its discretion when it fails to identify the correct legal rule or its application of the correct legal rule is illogical, implausible or without support in inferences that may be drawn from the facts in the record. USAA Fed. Sav. Bank v. Thacker (In re Taylor), No. 08-60033, __ F.3d __, 2010 WL 1006927 at * 4 (9th Cir. Mar. 22, 2010). Under the abuse of discretion standard, this Court should affirm unless it is definitely and firmly convinced that the bankruptcy court committed a clear error of judgment. Alonso v. Summerville (In re Summerville), 361 B.R. 133, 139 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007).

VII. SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Mr. Rigby, a chapter 7 panel trustee with over 25 years of experience was appointed interim trustee in this case. Mr. Rigby has administered this complicated case for the past nine months. His duties have included appraising the debtor's assets, putting together deals designed to maximize the return on those assets, searching for additional estate assets and evaluating creditors' claims. See 11 U.S.C. § 704. Certain creditors sought to elect a different trustee, as is their right. Their candidate, Mr. Ward, has no prior bankruptcy experience. App., Tab O, Exhibits at 6. Those creditors requested a trustee election and an election was held. The United States Trustee recorded the requests made and the votes cast and reported to the bankruptcy court that the election was disputed. The report of the United States Trustee concluded that not enough creditors requested an election to hold a valid election and moreover, the majority of votes were cast for Mr. Rigby, so whether or not a valid election was held, Mr. Rigby should be the permanent trustee. App., Tab B at 14. Some creditors objected to the report, but Appellants did not. After considering the objections, responses, and evidence submitted by the parties, the bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee. App., Tab A at 2-3, 9.

Appellants initially appealed both the inclusion of the Undersecured Creditors' claims and the disqualification of the proxy requests, but expressly abandoned the proxy disqualification issue in their opening brief. Opening Brief of Appellants at 5. As a result of that choice, it is difficult to understand how Appellants can benefit from the resolution of this appeal. The numbers in the report show that even if the claims of the Undersecured Creditors are not counted, not enough creditors requested an election to hold a valid election, and moreover, Mr. Rigby still received more votes than Mr. Ward. So Mr. Rigby becomes the permanent trustee under section 702 regardless of the outcome of this appeal.

Under those circumstances, this Court should dismiss the appeal as moot because Appellants no longer have a stake in the outcome of this appeal, given that Mr. Rigby will be the permanent trustee even if they win.

Federal courts can only decide cases if the plaintiff has suffered an injury in fact, traceable to the challenged action, and likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Nome Eskimo Cmty. v. Babbitt, 67 F.3d 813, 815 (9th Cir. 1995). If any of those elements disappears while the litigation is pending, the case is moot and federal courts lack jurisdiction to hear it. Id. Appellants mooted their appeal when they confined it to the single issue of whether the votes of the Undersecured Creditors should have been counted. Because the numbers show that their candidate would not have been elected trustee even if the bankruptcy court had not counted those votes, their inability to elect their candidate for trustee is not traceable to the alleged error by the bankruptcy court as required for standing. And even if they obtained a favorable decision in this appeal, it would not redress their failure to elect Mr. Ward because under section 702, Mr. Rigby would still be the trustee. Thus, this appeal should be dismissed as moot. Or, if this Court decides the appeal is not moot, it should affirm the bankruptcy court's order because the error alleged by Appellants did not affect the outcome of the elections and was therefore, harmless.

Moreover, Appellants lack standing to pursue this appeal because neither of them filed written objections below to the report of the disputed election and neither participated in the hearing to resolve the disputed election. Attendance and objection generally are prerequisites to fulfilling the "person aggrieved" standard required for appellate standing in this Circuit. Brady v. Andrew (In re Commercial W. Fin. Corp.), 761 F.2d 1329, 1335 (9th Cir. 1985). Although several other parties filed briefs and participated in the hearing regarding the election dispute, Appellants chose not to, so they lack standing to challenge the bankruptcy court's resolution of the election dispute on appeal.

Alternatively, the bankruptcy court did not err when it concluded the Undersecured Creditors could vote. The Undersecured Creditors met the statutory requirements for voting. Appellants do not directly challenge the bankruptcy court's findings that: 1) the claims were adequately liquidated to the extent the value of the collateral had previously been determined, and 2) the Undersecured Creditors did not have an interest adverse to the other unsecured creditors. Instead, Appellants contend that two cases, In re Michelex, Ltd., 195 B.R. 993 (W.D. Mich. 1996) and In re American Eagle Mfg., 231 B.R. 320, which they concede are not controlling precedent (See Opening Brief of Appellants at 12), required the bankruptcy court to exclude the Undersecured Creditors from the trustee election. But those cases do not support disenfranchising the Undersecured Creditors in this case. At best, they suggest that if no proofs of claims are filed, deficiency amounts scheduled by the debtor on secured debts should not be included in calculating the total number of votes that could be cast. More significantly, Michelex unequivocally directs that filed proofs of claims supersede the debtor's schedules when determining who can vote. 195 B.R. at 1008. In this case, the bankruptcy court did not rely on the debtor's schedules, but counted only the unsecured claims held by creditors who had filed proofs of those claims. Counting the Unsecured Creditors claims and allowing them to vote those claims was entirely consistent with the cases cited by Appellants.

VIII. ARGUMENT

A. THE APPEAL SHOULD BE DISMISSED AS MOOT BECAUSE THE NUMBERS IN THE REPORT SHOW THAT EVEN IF THE UNDERSECURED CREDITORS' CLAIMS ARE EXCLUDED, MR. RIGBY WILL STILL BE THE PERMANENT TRUSTEE SO APPELLANTS HAVE NO PERSONAL STAKE IN THIS APPEAL.

Appellants have mooted their appeal by confining it to the single issue of whether the bankruptcy court erred by counting the unsecured claims of the Undersecured Creditors. Appellants' sole contention on appeal is that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by counting the unsecured claims of the Undersecured Creditors when calculating whether enough requests for an election had been made to hold a valid election and which candidate had received the most votes. The numbers in the United States Trustee's report show that those claims did not affect the outcome of the election and Mr. Rigby would still be the permanent trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 702 even if those claims were not counted. Because the resolution of this appeal cannot affect the outcome of the trustee election, it can afford Appellants no meaningful relief, and should be dismissed as moot.

Under 11 U.S.C. § 702(b), creditors that hold at least twenty percent in amount of the unsecured claims must request an election for a valid election to be held. The report of the disputed election adopted by the bankruptcy court, showed that creditors filed proofs of unsecured claims totaling $180,717,663.32. App., Tab B at 3 and Ex. 1 at p. 7, Line 357 of Column H. That figure included $51,498,544.39 in unsecured claims held by creditors that also held secured claims– i.e. Undersecured Creditors. See Id. at 5 and Ex. 4, Line 23 of column H. If the claims held by the Undersecured Creditors were not counted, the unsecured claims would total $180,717,663.32 - $51,498,544.39 or $129,219,118.93. Twenty percent of that amount is $25,843,823.79.

The report further showed, and the bankruptcy court agreed, after excluding the improperly solicited proxy requests, creditors holding unsecured claims in the amount of $18,934,153.89 requested an election.[9] App., Tab B at 10. That amount is less than $25,843,823.79. Therefore, even if the unsecured claims held by Undersecured Creditors are not counted, not enough creditors requested an election to hold a valid election. Moreover, the report showed that Mr. Rigby received valid votes in the amount of $ 109,119,623.36 and Mr. Ward received valid votes in the amount of $ 8,239,101.50. Id. at 13. Excluding the votes cast by the Undersecured Creditors, all which were cast in favor of Mr. Rigby, Mr. Rigby received $109,119,623.36 - $ 51,498,544.39 or $ 57,621,078.97 votes – still far more than the $ 8.2 million received by Mr. Ward.

The mootness doctrine restricts judicial power to the decision of actual, live controversies. Nome Eskimo Cmty., 67 F.3d at 815. Federal courts cannot decide a case unless the plaintiff has suffered an injury in fact, traceable to the challenged action, and likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Id. If any of those elements disappear during the litigation, the case becomes moot and the court has no jurisdiction to decide the case. Id.

The numbers in the report show that Appellants' injury – the selection of Mr. Rigby, rather than Mr. Ward as permanent trustee – is not fairly traceable to the bankruptcy court's decision to allow the Undersecured Creditors to vote because Mr. Ward would not have been elected even if those votes were not counted.[10] See Am. W. Airlines, Inv. v. Nat'l Mediation Bd., 119 F.3d 772, 777

[10] Appellants have alleged no specific injury and requested no specific relief. The United States Trustee can conceive of no other injury to Appellants resulting from the disputed election.

(9th Cir. 1997) (dismissing as moot claim that NMB's determination to count ballot of discharged workers violated statute where outcome of election would have been the same if NMB had not counted those votes), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1021 (1998). Moreover, because Mr. Rigby is entitled to be the trustee under section 702 regardless of the outcome of this appeal based on the numbers, there is no effective relief this Court can provide Appellants. Therefore, this appeal should be dismissed as moot. See Ruiz v. City of Santa Maria, 160 F.3d 543, 549 (9th Cir. 1998) (an action is moot when parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome or when court can grant no effective relief), cert. denied, 527 U.S. 1022 (1999).

B. IF THIS COURT FINDS THIS APPEAL IS NOT MOOT, IT SHOULD AFFIRM THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S ORDER BECAUSE THE ALLEGED ERROR HAD NO EFFECT ON THE OUTCOME OF THE ELECTION.

If this Court finds that it has jurisdiction to decide this appeal, it can affirm without reaching the merits of Appellants' arguments because as explained above, whether or not the claims of the Undersecured Creditors are counted in calculating the universe of claims, not enough requests were received to hold a valid election under 11 U.S.C.§ 702(b). Under 11 U.S.C. § 702(d), the interim trustee, "shall serve" as the permanent trustee unless somebody else is validly elected. In this case, even if the claims of the Undersecured Creditors are excluded as Appellants' argue they should be, and the percent of creditors requesting an election recalculated accordingly, the claims held by the creditors requesting an election still do not meet the twenty percent threshold required to elect a trustee under section 702(b). As explained in section A supra, the report shows that excluding the Undersecured Creditors' claims, creditors holding $129,219,118.93 were eligible to vote.[11] The report further shows that creditors holding claims in the amount of $ 18,934,153.89 – only 14.6% of the total claims – properly requested an election. Id. at 7. So there was no valid election and Mr. Rigby is the permanent trustee. Therefore, this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court's order directing that Mr. Rigby shall serve as the permanent trustee in this case because the alleged error was harmless. See 28 U.S.C. § 2111 (reviewing court should disregard errors that do not affect substantial rights of the parties).

C. APPELLANTS LACK STANDING TO PURSUE THIS APPEAL BECAUSE THEY DID NOT FILE OBJECTIONS BELOW TO THE REPORT OR SEEK RESOLUTION OF THE DISPUTED ELECTION.

This appeal should be dismissed for the additional reason that the Appellants lack standing to pursue it. A person must be aggrieved by an order of the bankruptcy court to have standing to appeal that order. Fondiller v. Robertson (In re Fondiller), 707 F.2d 441, 443 (9th Cir. 1983). A "person aggrieved" is one who is "directly and adversely affected pecuniarily by the order of the bankruptcy court." Id. As a general rule in this Circuit, to fulfill the "person aggrieved," standard, a party is required to have appeared at the hearing before the bankruptcy court and objected to the action proposed to be taken, unless the party was not given notice of the hearing. In re Commercial W. Fin. Corp., 761 F.2d at 1335. Accord In re Ray, 597 F.3d 871 (7th Cir. 2010); Weston v. Mann (In re Weston), 18 F.3d 860, 864 (10th Cir. 1994).

Applying the same standard, the Tenth Circuit specifically held that a creditor lacked standing to appeal a bankruptcy court's order resolving a disputed chapter 7 trustee election because the creditor did not participate in the resolution of the disputed election before the bankruptcy judge. In re Weston, 18 F.3d at 864. In Weston, a group of creditors and the debtor argued against the election of a trustee at the 341 meeting. The United States Trustee filed a report of the disputed election. The creditors supporting the election filed a motion to resolve the dispute and the debtor filed an objection, but the objecting creditors did not file an objection. The bankruptcy judge held a hearing on the disputed election. The debtor appeared and presented his objections, but the objecting creditors did not appear. They also failed initially to appeal the bankruptcy court's order.[12] The [12] The objecting creditors appealed a later order also purporting to resolve the election.

Tenth Circuit held that the objecting creditors, "having chosen not to participate in the resolution of the disputed election before the bankruptcy judge, [had] no standing to appeal the bankruptcy court's resolution of the matter."[13] Id. at 864.

In this case, six parties filed two separate objections, and both the trustee and the United States Trustee filed responses, but neither of the Appellants filed a written objection to the report of the disputed election, asked the bankruptcy court to resolve the dispute or responded to any of the objections that were filed.[14] The bankruptcy court notified Appellants of the briefing schedule and the hearing on the disputed election [Bankr. Ct. Dkt # 562], but Appellants did not participate.[15] Therefore, their choice not to participate below means they do not have standing under the rule articulated in Commercial West to contest the bankruptcy court's [13] The court had previously found that it lacked jurisdiction to consider the merits of the appeal, but cited the appellants' lack of standing as an alternate ground for dismissal. Id. at 863-64.

[14] The Italian Club, Inc., Zacri, Inc., Lucille Schweitzer, Lisa Schweitzer, and Italian Community Hall filed a Motion for Resolution of Disputed Trustee Election and Objection to Trustee's Report of Disputed Election and Pauline Anderson filed the Objection by Pauline Anderson to US Trustee's Report and Brief in Support of Objection. order on appeal.[16]

D. ALTERNATIVELY THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ERR BY COUNTING THE UNSECURED PORTION OF THE UNDERSECURED CREDITORS' CLAIMS BECAUSE SECTION 702(a) PERMITS THOSE CLAIMS TO BE VOTED.

The bankruptcy court did not err by counting the claims of the Undersecured Creditors when calculating the whether the twenty percent requesting threshold had been met or when tallying the votes cast for each candidate. Under section 702(a), a creditor may vote if he holds an allowable, undisputed, fixed, liquidated, unsecured claim that is not entitled to priority distribution, he does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the other general unsecured creditors, and is not an insider. 11 U.S.C. § 702(a).[17] No one contended below that the Undersecured Creditors were insiders or that their unsecured claims were not allowable, undisputed, unsecured or were entitled to priority distribution.[18] Moreover, after taking evidence and hearing oral argument

[16] But see In re Am. Eagle Mfg., 231 B.R. at 328 (finding appellees had standing despite their failure to participate in hearing because local rule requiring appearance at hearing was discretionary); In re Martech, 188 B.R. at 850 (finding standing where party attended meeting of creditors and voted). Neither of those cases addressed the additional standing requirement articulated in Commercial West that a party object and participate in the hearing.

[17] The text of Section 702 is reproduced in the Addendum to this brief.

[18] Appellants can not raise new issues on appeal that were not presented to the bankruptcy court. See Animal Prot. Inst. of Am. v. Hodel, 860 F.2d 920, 927 (9th Cir. 1988) ("Federal appellate courts generally do not consider issues first from the parties regarding their objections, the bankruptcy court rejected the objecting parties' arguments that the amounts of the Undersecured Creditors' unsecured claims could not be determined with certainty and those creditors held an interest materially adverse to the other creditors. The bankruptcy court concluded that the Undersecured Creditors could vote their claims "if the value of the collateral was previously established by appraisal, assessment, or the amount set forth in the debtor's schedules" and it found no adverse interest. App., Tab A at 8-9. Appellants have not challenged any of those findings in their opening brief. Therefore, they have forfeited those arguments. Indep. Towers of Wash. v. Washington, 350 F.3d 925, 929 (9th Cir. 2003); Greenwood v. Fed. Aviation Admin., 28 F.3d 971, 977 (9th Cir. 1994); D.A.R.E. Am. v. Rolling Stone Magazine, 270 F.3d 793, 793 (9th Cir. 2001).

In any event, those findings were correct. The objecting creditors argued below that the alleged uncertainty as to amount meant the claims were not fixed and liquidated. To the contrary, they were both. A claim is fixed to the extent liability has fastened. In re Michelex, Ltd., 195 B.R. at 1007 n. 32. A fixed claim is one that is not contingent. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(5)(A) (defining "claim" as right to payment whether or not such right is . . . liquidated, unliquidated, fixed, contingent, matured, unmatured, disputed, undisputed, legal, equitable, secured, or unsecured . . . ."); In re Michelex, Ltd., 195 B.R. at 1007 n. 32. A debt is fixed if all events giving rise to liability occurred prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition. Fostvedt v. Dow (In re Fostvedt), 823 F.2d 305, 306 (9th Cir. 1987); Nicholes v. Johnny Appleseed of Wash. (In re Nicholes), 184 B.R. 82, 88 (B.A.P 9th Cir. 1995). Debts of a contractual nature are fixed. In re Nicholes, 184 B.R. at 88. The objecting creditors contended below the Undersecured Creditors' claims were not fixed because the unsecured portion of the bifurcated claims could change. However, the term "fixed" has nothing to do with the amount of a claim; it addresses whether liability has attached. The partially secured debts owed to the Undersecured Creditors were contractual and not contingent on any future event as evidenced by their filed proofs of claims and supporting documents; no one has contended otherwise. So those claims were fixed claims as required by section 702(a).

The claims were also liquidated. The Ninth Circuit has defined the term "liquidated," explaining that a debt is liquidated if the amount of the debt can be readily determined. Slack v. Wilshire Ins. Co. (In re Slack), 187 F.3d 1070, 1073 (9th Cir. 1999). A debt that is ascertainable by reference to an agreement or by a simple computation is liquidated. In re Nicholes, 184 B.R. at 89.[19] In this case, [19] Because the term "claim" is coextensive with the term "debt" (Penn. Dep't of Pub. Welfare v. Davenport, 495 U.S. 552, 558 (1990) (superseded by statute on other grounds)), a claim is liquidated to the same extent as a debt.

the Undersecured Creditors could readily calculate the value of their unsecured claims by subtracting the value of the collateral securing the debt (as determined by appraisal, assessment or the debtor's schedules) from the value of their unbifurcated secured claims.[20] The Undersecured Creditors had already calculated and stated the values of their unsecured claims in their proofs of claims before the election. Thus, their unsecured claims were liquidated for the purposes of section 702(a)(1).[21]

Finally, none of the Undersecured Creditors had interests materially adverse to the other unsecured creditors. The phrase "materially adverse" is not defined in the Code. According to the legislative history of section 702, the application of the standard requires a balancing of various factors such as the nature of the [20] The Bankruptcy Code separates an undersecured creditor's claim into two parts. He has a secured claim to the extent of the value of his collateral and he has an unsecured claim for the balance of his claims. 11 U.S.C. § 506(a).

[21] The Bankruptcy Code contemplates different valuations of claims for different purposes. See 11 U.S.C. § 506(a)(1) ("Such value shall be determined in light of the purpose of the valuation . . . ."). The liquidation requirement in section 702(a) ensures that the amount of votes an unsecured creditor is entitled to vote can be ascertained with some degree of certainty. The Undersecured Creditors filed proofs of claims which are prima facie evidence of the amount of the claims. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 3001(f); Lundell v. Anchor Constr. Specialists, Inc., 223 F.3d 1035, 1039 (9th Cir. 2000). Thus, those claims are certain enough in amount to be counted in the trustee election. If the unsecured portion of an undersecured claim changes, the creditor can amend the claim (See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7015) or the trustee can object to the allowance of the claim and the bankruptcy court will determine the amount of the claim. See 11 U.S.C. § 704(a)(5); 11 U.S.C. § 502(b).

adversity. S. Rep. No. 95-989, at 92 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5878, 1978 WL 8531. Courts have used a fact based analysis to determine whether a creditor holds a materially adverse interest to the other creditors under the specific circumstances of the case. In re Poage, 92 B.R. 659, 666 (N.D. Tex. 1988) (rejecting claim of adverse interest where objecting party failed to present sufficient factual basis). The objecting creditors failed below to identify a specific interest such as a preference held by any undersecured creditor that is materially adverse to the other unsecured creditors.[22] The bankruptcy court found that the Undersecured Creditors possessed no materially adverse interest to the general unsecured creditors in this case. App., Tab A at 8-9. Given the dearth of evidence to the contrary, it could reach no other conclusion. Based on those findings, the bankruptcy court correctly determined the Undersecured Creditors were entitled to vote in the trustee election.

Under section 702(b), a trustee cannot be elected unless eligible creditors holding at least twenty percent of eligible claims request an election. 11 U.S.C. §

[22] Appellants' argument that all creditors who hold secured claims have a disqualifying adverse interest should be rejected out of hand. If that was Congress's intent, it would have expressly excluded secured creditors in section 702(a) in the same way it excluded "insiders." See 11 U.S.C. § 702(a)(3). Moreover, because the Undersecured Creditors know that they are likely to receive very little on the unsecured portion of their claims, unlike fully secured creditors, they have every incentive to maximize the return on their collateral and elect a trustee who will maximize the estate assets available for distribution to unsecured creditors.

702(b);[23] In re Oxborrow, 913 F.2d at 753. The purpose of the twenty percent requirement is to ensure that a substantial portion of the unsecured creditors support a trustee election and to discourage election of a trustee by attorneys for creditors. H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 102 (1977), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 6063-6064, 1977 WL 9628.

The universe of eligible claims for the purpose of the twenty percent calculation are those claims "specified in subsection 702(1) . . . that are held by creditors that may vote under subsection 702." 11 U.S.C. § 702(b). Thus, under the plain meaning of the statute, if a creditor may vote his claims under section 702(a), then those claims are counted when determining whether section 702(b)'s twenty percent requesting requirement has been met. As explained above, the Undersecured Creditors were entitled to vote under 702(a) and their unsecured claims were the type described in section 701(a)(1), therefore, it would have been error not to count those claims in calculating whether the twenty percent requesting requirement had been met. 11 U.S.C. § 702(b).

E. THE MICHELEX DECISION IS CONSISTENT WITH THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S REFUSAL TO DISENFRANCHISE THE UNDERSECURED CREDITORS.

Having abandoned all statutory arguments, Appellants rely entirely on In re Michelex, a decision by the bankruptcy court for the Western District of Michigan that they contend supports their position and In re American Eagle Mfg., a decision by a panel of this Court that Appellants allege adopted Michelex. Appellants are wrong as to both contentions. First, Michelex does not hold that undersecured creditors cannot vote in trustee elections. The portion of the opinion on which Appellants rely is inapposite because it considers whether certain scheduled claims should be included initially in the pool of eligible claims without regard to whether proofs of those claims have been filed. It does not specifically address whether undersecured creditors who have filed proofs of their unsecured claims should be included in the universe of eligible claims. See In re Michelex, Ltd., 195 B.R. at 1007. The Michelex court conceded that it was "debatable" whether unsecured claims held by undersecured creditors should be included in the universe of eligible claims solely on the basis of the debtor's schedules, but concluded that Schedule D should not be considered.[24] Id. It unequivocally advised, however, that proofs of claims properly filed before the election supersede the debtor's schedules (id. at 1008), suggesting that claims for which a timely proof of claim was filed should be included without regard to the debtor's schedules. Consistent with Michelex, the bankruptcy court in this case did not consider the Schedule D filed by the debtor. All of the Undersecured Creditors filed proofs of their unsecured claims, so under Michelex, the court properly counted those claims.

---

Similarly, in American Eagle Mfg., a panel of this Court affirmed a bankruptcy court's decision not to include a scheduled unsecured deficiency in the universe of eligible votes after the debtor declined to file a proof of claim. 231 B.R. at 330-31. Nothing in the opinion indicates the bankruptcy court could have excluded the claim, if the creditor had filed a proof of claim. To the contrary, a proof of claim filed by the creditor under penalty of perjury likely would have assuaged the bankruptcy court's concerns that the claim was manufactured by an insider driving the election dispute and the amount of the claim was too nebulous. See id. at 330.

Second, Appellants' contention that the method used in Michelex was "adopted" by a panel of this Court in American Eagle Mfg. is inaccurate. As noted by that panel, there are a number of different ways of calculating the universe of eligible votes and no controlling Ninth Circuit precedent. In re Am. Eagle Mfg., Inc., 231 B.R. at 329. Moreover, a bankruptcy court's calculation of whether the twenty percent requesting requirement is met is reviewed only for abuse of discretion. Id. at 328. Although the panel in American Eagle Mfg. declined to reverse a bankruptcy court that adopted the Michelex approach, it did not hold the method used in Michelex was the only lawful method or even the most appropriate method of calculating the universe of eligible claims. The panel affirmed because the bankruptcy court used a reasonable approach. See In re Am.Eagle Mfg., Inc., 231 B.R. at 333.

In this case, the bankruptcy court did not include any claims in the universe of eligible claims based solely on the debtor's schedules.[25] All of the eligible claims were supported by timely filed proofs of claims. Therefore, to the extent Michelex and American Eagle Mfg. have any bearing on the issue before this Court, the bankruptcy court's decision to include those claims is consistent with the view that filed proofs of claims supersede the debtor's schedules when determining the claims that can be voted in a trustee election.

IX. CONCLUSION

For those reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the bankruptcy court's January 15, 2010 order.

Dated: May 27, 2010 Respectfully submitted,

By: /s/ Thomas A. Buford III

[25] Appellants do not contend the bankruptcy court erred by excluding scheduled claims for which no proofs of claims had been filed from the universe of eligible claims. In any event, including such claims could only expand the universe and reduce the percentage of eligible claims requesting an election.

ADDENDUM

Title 11 - BANKRUPTCY
CHAPTER 7 - LIQUIDATION
SUBCHAPTER I - OFFICERS AND ADMINISTRATION

Sec. 702. Election of trustee

STATUTE:

(a) A creditor may vote for a candidate for trustee only if such creditor -

(1) holds an allowable, undisputed, fixed, liquidated, unsecured claim of a kind entitled to distribution under section 726(a)(2), 726(a)(3), 726(a)(4), 752(a), 766(h), or 766(i) of this title;

(2) does not have an interest materially adverse, other than an equity interest that is not substantial in relation to such creditor's interest as a creditor, to the interest of creditors entitled to such distribution; and

(3) is not an insider.

(b) At the meeting of creditors held under section 341 of this title, creditors may elect one person to serve as trustee in the case if election of a trustee is requested by creditors that may vote under subsection (a) of this section, and that hold at least 20 percent in amount of the claims specified in subsection (a)(1) of this section that are held by creditors that may vote under subsection (a) of this section.

(c) A candidate for trustee is elected trustee if -

(1) creditors holding at least 20 percent in amount of the claims of a kind specified in subsection (a)(1) of this section that are held by creditors that may vote under subsection (a) of this section vote; and

(2) such candidate receives the votes of creditors holding a majority in amount of claims specified in subsection (a)(1) of this section that are held by creditors that vote for a trustee.

(d) If a trustee is not elected under this section, then the interim trustee shall serve as trustee in the case.

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I hereby certify that on May 27, 2010, I filed the foregoing BRIEF OF APPELLEE, UNITED STATES TRUSTEE with the Clerk of the Court for the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit by using the CM/ECF system. I certify that all parties of record to this appeal are represented by CM/ECF users and that service will be accomplished through the CM/ECF system.

Whether, even if the case were not moot and the district court had jurisdiction, the district court abused its discretion in denying plaintiff's request for a writ of prohibition.

MCBRIDE & COLLIER,

Plaintiff-Appellant,

v.

STEPHEN CALLAWAY,

Defendant-Appellee.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA

BRIEF FOR APPELLEE

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This is an action against Judge Stephen V. Callaway in his official capacity as United States Bankruptcy Court Judge for the Western District of Louisiana. R. 1 at 7-8; RE 3-4.[1] Plaintiff's complaint invoked the district court's jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334, 1343, 157 and 1651. Id. Plaintiff challenged two standing orders issued by Judge Callaway on November 30, 2009. On January 25, 2010, the district court denied plaintiff's request for a writ of prohibition with respect to one of the two standing orders. R. 16 at 169-172; RE 52-55.

The court kept the other standing order under advisement. Id. On February 4, 2010, plaintiff filed a notice of appeal from the district court’s order. R. 21, RE 62.

On March 5, 2010, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Louisiana issued a new “Standing Order Regarding ‘No-Look’ Fees and Addendums” in Chapter 13 Cases. Pl. Br., Exh. A. That revised order -- signed by all three judges of the bankruptcy court -- expressly “supersede[d]” and “rescinded” the standing orders challenged here. Id. at 4-5.

On March 9, 2010, the district court explicitly dismissed plaintiff’s case as moot. R. 40, AP RE 1. Plaintiff did not file a notice of appeal from that final judgment. As set forth below, this Court lacks jurisdiction over the present appeal.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. Whether this Court lacks jurisdiction over the present appeal because it is moot.

2. Whether the district court in any event lacked subject matter jurisdiction over plaintiff’s case.

3. Whether, even if the case were not moot and the district court had jurisdiction, the district court abused its discretion in denying plaintiff’s request for a writ of prohibition.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On November 30, 2009, Judge Stephen V. Callaway of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Louisiana entered two standing orders addressing the award of attorney’s fees and expenses to debtors’ counsel in Chapter 13 cases: (1) the “Standing Order Regarding Reimbursement of Fees or Expenses Advanced by Debtor Counsel from Chapter 13 Bankruptcy Estate” (“first standing order”); and (2) the “Standing Order Regarding Utilization of a ‘No Look Fee with Sliding Scale’ for Chapter 13 Cases” (“second standing order”). R. 1, Exh. C & D, RE 17-36. On December 2, 2009, plaintiff McBride & Collier, a law firm that represents debtors in the Western District of Louisiana, filed an action in federal district court against Judge Callaway in his official capacity. R. 1 at 7-8, RE 3-4. Plaintiff sought a writ of prohibition and preliminary injunctive relief against enforcement of the standing orders. Id. at 7, 15-16, RE 3, 11-12. Judge Callaway moved to dismiss plaintiff’s case for lack of jurisdiction. R. 12.

On January 25, 2010, without ruling on the motion to dismiss, the district court denied plaintiff’s request for a writ of prohibition with respect to the first standing order. R. 16, RE 52-55. The court noted that the second standing order remained under advisement. Id. at 4, RE 55. On February 4, 2010, plaintiff filed a notice of appeal from the district court’s January 25, 2010 order. R. 21, RE 62.

On March 5, 2010, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Louisiana issued a new “Standing Order Regarding ‘No-Look’ Fees” in Chapter 13 Cases. Pl. Br. Exh. A. That revised order, which was signed by all three bankruptcy judges in the Western District of Louisiana, including Judge Callaway, expressly “supersede[d]” the standing orders challenged by plaintiff in the present case, and also expressly "rescinded" both of those orders "retroactive to the date of their entry." Id. at 4-5. Accordingly, on March 9, 2010, the district court dismissed plaintiff's case as moot. R. 40, AP RE 1. Plaintiff did not file a notice of appeal from that final order.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory Framework.

Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code provides bankruptcy courts with "discretion to award reasonable compensation to debtors' attorneys in bankruptcy cases." In re Cahill, 428 F.3d 536, 539 (5th Cir. 2005). Pursuant to Section 330(a)(4)(B), a court in a Chapter 13 case "may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4)(B).[2] Section 329 mandates disclosure to the bankruptcy court of any payments by the debtor to attorneys or agreements to pay attorneys "made after one year before the date of the filing of the petition." 11 U.S.C. § 329(a). That section also authorizes the bankruptcy court to "review all attorney compensation and agreements for reasonableness, and to cancel excessive service agreements or order return of payments if they are excessive." Barron v. Countryman, 432 F.3d 590, 595 (5th Cir. 2005).

[2] Individual debtors most commonly file for bankruptcy under Chapter 7 or Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. Under Chapter 13, "a debtor commits to repay some portion of his or her financial obligations" over a specified period "in exchange for retaining nonexempt assets and receiving a broader discharge of debt than is available under chapter 7." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 10 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 97; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 1321–1330.

In reviewing compensation requests, the bankruptcy court considers "the nature, the extent, and the value of [the attorney's] services, taking into account all relevant factors," which include, inter alia, the time spent, the rates charged, and whether the services were necessary and performed "within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the problem, issue, or task addressed." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). "[C]ompensation and reimbursement awarded under section 330(a)" is an allowed administrative expense of a bankruptcy estate. 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(2).

B. Factual Background.

1. The "No-Look" Fee Procedure And The Challenged Standing Orders.

The Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Louisiana has historically used a "no-look" procedure for awarding attorney's fees in Chapter 13 cases, under which attorneys may elect the "no-look" fee rather than filing a formal fee application. Pl. Br. Exh. A at 1. The "no-look" fee is a pre-calculated amount that the court has determined is reasonable attorney compensation for a typical case. Id. Attorneys could also file a formal fee application to seek more compensation, and the court could reduce the "no-look" fee if an attorney's work did not justify the standard "no-look" amount. Id.

On November 30, 2009, the bankruptcy court, per Judge Callaway, entered two standing orders governing the reimbursement of fees and expenses advanced by debtors’ counsel in Chapter 13 cases in the Shreveport and Monroe Divisions. R. 1, Exh. C, D, RE 17-36. The court’s first standing order provided that it would no longer routinely approve the reimbursement of filing, credit counseling and reporting fees advanced by debtor’s counsel as allowed administrative priority expenses under the then-applicable “No Look” Fee Addendum, but rather would allow such reimbursement only after consideration of a post-confirmation Formal Application. R. 1, Exh. C at 23-25, RE 19-21.

The court’s second standing order established a new “No Look” Fee using a sliding-scale formula. R. 1, Exh. D, RE 22-36. As the court explained, the “no-look” fee procedure had recently become subject to abuse, as the compensation received by some attorneys “exceeded the value of their services being performed using the guidelines set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)[.]” Id. at 26, RE 22. The bankruptcy court found that substantial revisions to the then-current “no-look” fee were warranted, and accordingly promulgated a revised “no-look” procedure using sliding-scale compensation. Id. at 27-28, RE 23-24.

The court noted that, under its prior “no look” fee practice, it had allowed reimbursement of filing fees, credit counseling fees and charges for debtors’ credit reports paid by debtors’ counsel, and had considered such fees as administrative expenses of the estate under 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(2). R. 1, Exh. C

22-23, RE 18-19. The court determined, however, that “the advancing of expenses * * * by Chapter 13 debtor’s counsel pre-filing may not entitle Chapter 13 debtor’s counsel to an administrative expense entitled to priority status and that can be reimbursed by the debtor or bankruptcy estate.” Id. at 24, RE 20. The court directed that “should such reimbursement be an allowed administrative priority expense that same must still meet other statutory and jurisprudential requirements which are not presently being met by utilization of the ‘No Look’ Fee[.]” Id. The first standing order thus required debtors’ counsel seeking reimbursement of such expenses to file a post-confirmation Formal Application. Id. at 25, RE 21.

2. District Court Proceedings And The New Standing Order.

On December 2, 2009, plaintiff filed an action in district court against Judge Callaway in his official capacity. R. 1 at 7-8, RE 3-4. Plaintiff sought a writ of prohibition and preliminary injunctive relief against enforcement of the two November 30, 2009 standing orders. Id.; R. 3, RE 41-42. Judge Callaway moved to dismiss plaintiff’s case for lack of jurisdiction on the grounds, inter alia, that plaintiff failed to satisfy the Article III case or controversy requirement, and that Congress had not waived sovereign immunity. R. 12.

On January 25, 2010, without ruling on the motion to dismiss, the district court denied plaintiff’s request for a writ of prohibition with respect to the first standing order. R. 16 at 169-172, RE 52-55. The court ruled that Judge Callaway acted "well within his sound discretion" under the Bankruptcy Code. R. 16 at 171, RE 54. The court noted that the second standing order remained under advisement. Id. at 172, RE 55.

On February 4, 2010, plaintiff filed a notice of appeal from the district court's ruling denying the writ of prohibition with respect to Judge Callaway's first standing order. R. 21, RE 62. The present interlocutory appeal thus involves only one of the two November 2009 standing orders issued by Judge Callaway.

On March 5, 2010, while this appeal was pending, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Louisiana issued a new "Standing Order Regarding 'No-Look' Fees and Addendums" in Chapter 13 Cases. Pl. Br., Exh. A. That revised order was signed by all three bankruptcy judges in the Western District of Louisiana, including Judge Callaway. It expressly "supersedes" both of the standing orders challenged by plaintiff in the present case, and also expressly "rescind[s]" those orders "retroactive to the date of their entry." Id. at 4-5.

Accordingly, on March 9, 2010, the district court dismissed plaintiff's case as moot. R. 40, AP RE 1. Plaintiff did not file a notice of appeal from that final judgment.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Plaintiff seeks a writ of prohibition against a rescinded bankruptcy court order, in the context of a case that has been dismissed as moot, and where, in any event, the district court lacked jurisdiction from the outset. Under these circumstances, plaintiff's appeal must plainly be dismissed on jurisdictional grounds. And, even assuming arguendo that the case were not moot and that the district court had jurisdiction, plaintiff has not established, nor could it establish, entitlement to the extraordinary relief it seeks. This case is meritless in every respect.

1. Plaintiff challenges the district court's refusal to grant a writ of prohibition against enforcement of a standing order that not only has been expressly rescinded, but was also never applied to deny fees or expenses to plaintiff. Because the challenged standing order is no longer in effect, it cannot conceivably cause plaintiff any present or future harm. Plaintiff's action for a writ of prohibition has thus become moot. This basic point is controlling here.

Indeed, the district court recognized that the action had become moot, and, while this interlocutory appeal was pending, entered a final order expressly dismissing plaintiff's case on mootness grounds. Plaintiff has not appealed from that final order. It is thus abundantly clear that this Court cannot fashion any relief that could affect the parties' rights.

2. Even if the appeal were not moot, the district court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over plaintiff's complaint for several reasons: (1) plaintiff failed to present a justiciable case or controversy under Article III; (2) plaintiff lacks standing; and (3) Congress has not waived sovereign immunity. This Court need not reach any of these issues, if, as we urge, the appeal is dismissed as moot.

a. Plaintiff seeks an advisory opinion regarding the legality of a now-defunct standing order of the bankruptcy court. A proper case or controversy could have existed only if, in the context of an actual bankruptcy case, Judge Callaway had denied a request by plaintiff for reimbursement of fees and expenses pursuant to the standing order. No such case or controversy exists or has ever existed here.

b. Plaintiff similarly lacks standing to bring this action. Plaintiff has not shown that it has suffered or will imminently suffer any injury-in-fact. Indeed, plaintiff has not provided examples of any fee requests that it made that were denied under the rescinded standing order.

Plaintiff also failed to establish that the harm alleged in its complaint -- infringement of its First Amendment rights and predicted future monetary losses -- could be caused by, or fairly traceable to, the challenged standing order. The standing order did not limit or regulate plaintiff’s advertising. In addition, since plaintiff filed suit without first seeking reimbursement of fees and expenses in accordance with the order’s requirements, it failed to show that the standing order could cause it any financial harm.

Plaintiff’s claimed injury is also in no way redressable by the relief that it seeks. Plaintiff could not show that it is likely that a writ of prohibition against the standing order would have allowed it to obtain greater compensation in future bankruptcy cases. To the contrary, any such suggestion would have been wholly speculative, because, entirely apart from any standing order, Judge Callaway would have retained the authority and duty under the Bankruptcy Code to apply its provisions governing attorney compensation, and to deny or reduce plaintiff’s reimbursement requests consistent with such provisions. Article III standing precepts thus independently bar this suit, wholly apart from the fact that the case has now become moot.

c. Because plaintiff filed suit against Judge Callaway in his official capacity, this action cannot proceed absent a waiver of sovereign immunity. Although plaintiff invokes several federal statutes in its complaint, none contains the requisite waiver or provides authority for the district court to assert jurisdiction.

3. Even assuming arguendo that the case were not moot and that the district court had jurisdiction, the district court properly denied plaintiff’s request for a writ of prohibition. Again, there is no reason or need for this Court to reach this point, and we include it solely for the sake of completeness.

Courts will issue a writ of prohibition only in extraordinary circumstances to “confine an inferior court to a lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction” where the court has committed “clear and indisputable” error, and plaintiff has no other avenue available to obtain relief. See Kerr v. United States Dist. Ct. for the Northern Dist. of California, 426 U.S. 394, 402-403 (1976). Plaintiff here could not meet this exacting standard. In issuing the challenged standing order, Judge Callaway acted well within his jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Code and consistent with this Court's precedent. Moreover, appeal to the district court would have been readily available under 28 U.S.C. § 158 in any case in which Judge Callaway had applied the standing order to actually deny or reduce a request for fees and expenses. Such an appeal would not only have qualified as another avenue for plaintiff to obtain relief, but would also have provided a vehicle for review without the jurisdictional defects that underlie plaintiff's present action. In sum, there is no basis for any relief here on the merits, even if the fatal jurisdictional obstacles could somehow be overcome.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court determines de novo whether the present appeal has become moot. See Harris v. City of Houston, 151 F.3d 186, 189 (5th Cir. 1998). This Court also reviews de novo whether the district court had subject matter jurisdiction. Stiles v. GTE Southwest, Inc., 128 F.3d 904, 906 (5th Cir. 1999). The district court's denial of a writ of prohibition is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Helstoski v. Meanor, 442 U.S. 500, 506 (1979); In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litigation, 614 F.2d 958, 962 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 888 (1980).

ARGUMENT

I. THIS COURT LACKS JURISDICTION OVER THE PRESENT APPEAL BECAUSE IT IS MOOT.

Under Article III of the Constitution, a plaintiff must allege an actual, ongoing case or controversy. Lewis v.

Continental Bank Corp., 494 U.S. 472, 477 (1990). A case is moot "when the issues presented are no longer 'live' or the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome." Murphy v. Hunt, 455 U.S. 478, 481 (1982) (internal quotations omitted). Moreover, "it is not enough that a dispute was very much alive when suit was filed, * * * [t]he parties must continue to have a personal stake in the outcome of the lawsuit." Lewis, 494 U.S. at 477-78 (internal quotations omitted); Environmental Conserv. Org. v. City of Dallas, 529 F.3d 519, 527 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 129 U.S. 418 (2008). Thus, in an action for prospective relief, there must be "some present harm left to enjoin," for "[o]nce the movant is no longer in harm's way, a motion for an injunction becomes moot." Taylor v. RTC, 56 F.3d 1497, 1502 (D.C. Cir.), amended in part on other grounds, 66 F.3d 1226 (D.C. Cir. 1995).

As this Court has recognized, it is "beyond dispute that a request for injunctive relief generally becomes moot upon the happening of the event sought to be enjoined." Harris, 151 F.3d at 189. Article III limits federal courts "to resolving real and substantial controvers[ies] admitting of specific relief through a decree of conclusive character, as distinguished from an opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of facts." Lewis, 494 U.S. at 477 (internal quotations omitted).

A. The Standing Order That Plaintiff Seeks To Enjoin Has Been Expressly Superseded And Rescinded.

1. On March 5, 2010, the bankruptcy court issued a new standing order governing reimbursement of fees in Chapter 13 cases. That order by its terms “supersede[d]” and “rescinded” the standing order that is the subject of this appeal. Pl. Br. Exh. A. Thus, plaintiff’s request for relief is plainly moot. Plaintiff sought a writ of prohibition against enforcement of a standing order that is now no longer in effect.

There is no “present harm left to enjoin” from the standing order. Nor is there any need for a preliminary injunction or writ of prohibition against enforcement of an order that has been “supersede[d]” by a new Standing Order signed by all three bankruptcy judges of the Western District of Louisiana, and that also has been “rescinded retroactive to the date of [its] entry.” Pl. Br. Exh A at 4. The relief sought here would be wholly ineffective as it would bar enforcement of an order that is no longer in force.

2. While the present interlocutory appeal was pending, the district court also entered a final order expressly dismissing plaintiff’s entire case as moot. March 9, 2010 Order, R. 40 at 320, AP RE 1 (“the captioned matter is hereby Dismissed as Moot. The Clerk is now requested to close this case.”). Plaintiff did not file a notice of appeal from this final order, and the applicable 60-day appeal period has now expired. Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B). Thus, for this reason too, “‘[n]o order of this Court could affect the parties’ rights[.]’” Marilyn T., Inc. v. Evans, 803 F.2d 1383, 1384 (5th Cir. 1986) (quoting Honig v. Students of the California School for the Blind, 471 U.S. 148, 149 (1985)).

In short, not only has the issue of any prospective relief become moot, but plaintiff also has failed to appeal a final order expressly dismissing the entire case as moot. Under these circumstances, this Court should dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction.[3]

B. The Present Case Does Not Fall Within Any Exception To Mootness.

Plaintiff acknowledges that the new March 5, 2010 Standing Order supersedes the challenged standing order issued by Judge Callaway. Pl. Br. 18. Plaintiff contends (Br. 18), however, that the case is not moot because, according to plaintiff, the March 2010 standing order continues to deny reimbursement of advance payments made by debtor's counsel for filing fees, debtor education and credit counseling fees. In support of this contention, plaintiff cites to cases applying the "voluntary cessation" doctrine, but appears to find them inapplicable by arguing that Judge Callaway "has not yet even ceased the same challenged action that is the subject of this appeal." Pl. Br. 19. Plaintiff also argues (Br. 19) that the case is "capable of repetition, yet evading review." Neither of these exceptions to mootness applies.

[3] Plaintiff asserts that this Court has jurisdiction over appeals from "final orders" of the district court. Pl. Br. 1 (citing 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(d) and 1291). But the January 25, 2010 order that plaintiff appeals from is not final because the court took the second standing order under advisement. The district court did not rule on all of plaintiff's claims until it issued its final order on March 9, 2010 dismissing plaintiff's entire case as moot.

1. Plaintiff urges that "'a defendant's voluntary cessation of a challenged practice does not deprive a federal court of its power to determine the legality of the practice.'" Pl. Br. 18 (quoting Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323, 337 (5th Cir. 2004)). The "voluntary cessation" analysis applies only when a defendant voluntarily ceases its challenged conduct and the court is concerned that the defendant may resume its behavior with a consequent impact on the plaintiff. Gates, 376 F.3d at 337; Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Serv. (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 190 (2000).

There is no reasonable expectation here that Judge Callaway will reissue the challenged standing order. Because the challenged standing order has been superseded and rescinded by a new standing order issued not only by Judge Callaway, but also by the other bankruptcy judges in the Western District of Louisiana, there has been no "voluntary cessation." Rather, the case is moot because the challenged judicial order no longer exists, and a new, different standing order issued by three judges -- two of whom are not parties to the instant action -- has superseded it.

Plaintiff argues (Br. 19) that its appeal is not moot because the new March 2010 standing order continues to cause it harm by denying reimbursement of fees and expenses. Cases addressing whether a plaintiff's challenge to legislation becomes moot when the legislation is repealed or amended demonstrate the error in plaintiff's argument. In such cases, "the [Supreme] Court has upheld the general rule that repeal, expiration, or significant amendment to challenged legislation ends the ongoing controversy and renders moot a plaintiff's request for injunctive relief." Federation of Advertising Ind. Representatives, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 326 F.3d 924, 930 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 879 (2003). It is only where "there is evidence that the repeal was not genuine" that the Court has "refused to hold the case moot." Id. In short, "repeal of a contested ordinance moots a plaintiff's injunction request, absent evidence that the City plans to or already has reenacted the challenged law or one substantially similar." Id.; McCorvey v. Hill, 385 F.3d 846, 849 (5th Cir. 2004), cert. denied, 543 U.S. 1154 (2005).

Analogously, rescission of the challenged court order moots plaintiff's request for a writ of prohibition. Contrary to plaintiff's suggestion, the March 2010 standing order that supersedes and rescinds the order at issue here does not save the case from mootness. As an initial matter, even if the new order were exactly the same as the challenged order, this Court could not issue any effective relief because the other two bankruptcy judges who signed the order are not parties to this litigation. Even assuming that the Court had jurisdiction to issue a writ of prohibition under the circumstances of this case, such relief could not apply to non-parties. Indeed, the role of the other two bankruptcy judges in promulgating the March 2010 standing order in and of itself distinguishes the present action from cases in which courts have applied the voluntary cessation exception. Those two judges were necessary parties in issuing the March 2010 standing order. Thus, third parties were jointly responsible with Judge Callaway for the repeal of the challenged standing order. For this reason alone, the voluntary cessation doctrine does not apply here. Chihuahuan Grasslands Alliance v. Kempthorne, 545 F.3d 884, 893 (10th Cir. 2008) (voluntary cessation inapplicable when third parties' actions moot case).

There are other significant differences between the full bankruptcy court's March 2010 Standing Order and Judge Callaway's now-rescinded standing order that also confirm that this case is moot. Although plaintiff states (Br. 18) that the March 2010 Standing Order continues to deny it reimbursement of expenses, the portion of the order that plaintiff quotes belies this assertion. While Judge Callaway's now-defunct order made clear that advanced fees and expenses "may not entitle Chapter 13 debtor's counsel to an administrative expense entitled to priority status and that can be reimbursed by the debtor or bankruptcy estate," and required counsel seeking reimbursement of such fees to file a Formal Application (R. 1, Exh. C at 24-25, RE 20-21), the March 2010 Standing Order expressly recognizes that such fees and expenses "will be considered included in the no-look fee of $2800." Pl. Br. Exh. A at 2. Because the March 2010 Standing Order provides that such fees and expenses are considered included as part of a no-look fee, any legal issues raised in connection with the new order would be distinct from plaintiff's argument in support of a writ of prohibition in the present appeal -- i.e., that fees and expenses advanced by debtors counsel are reimbursable from the bankruptcy estate. Pl. Br. 6.

2. Plaintiff further maintains (Br. 19) that this action falls within the exception to mootness for cases that are “capable of repetition, yet evading review.” But “[t]his exception applies ‘only in exceptional situations . . . where the following two circumstances are simultaneously present: (1) the challenged action is in its duration too short to be fully litigated prior to cessation or expiration, and (2) there is a reasonable expectation that the same complaining party will be subject to the same action again.’” Benavides v. Housing Auth. of the City of San Antonio, 238 F.3d 667, 671 (5th Cir. 2001) (quoting Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 17 (1998)). Plaintiff bears the burden of proving both prongs of the exception. Plaintiff has not met its burden and cannot do so.

Plaintiff has not shown, nor could it show, that its claim will evade review. Plaintiff relies solely on the fact that the challenged standing order was rescinded prior to the conclusion of this litigation. But plaintiff provides no evidence that bankruptcy court standing orders generally remain in effect for short durations of time, nor has plaintiff established that the March 2010 standing order is itself likely to be rescinded before a challenge to its application could be litigated.

Moreover, if the new standing order were applied to plaintiff in the context of an actual bankruptcy case, then there is no reason why a challenge to the order could not be litigated.

Indeed, plaintiff is currently challenging application of the March 2010 standing order in two specific bankruptcy cases that are pending in district court. See White v. Clerk, U.S. Bankr. Court, No. 5:10-cv-00645 (W.D. La.); Dayries v. Clerk, U.S. Bankr. Court, No. 5:10-cv-00646 (W.D. La.). Those cases demonstrate that plaintiff's challenge to the existing scheme will not, in any relevant sense, evade review.[4]

Nor has plaintiff established any "reasonable expectation" that it could be subject to the now-rescinded standing order in the future. To the contrary, Judge Callaway (along with the other two bankruptcy judges in the district) signed the March 2010 standing order, thereby agreeing that the order at issue here would no longer have any effect. As set forth above, unlike the challenged order in the present case, the March 2010 standing order recognizes that fees and expenses advanced by debtors' counsel are considered included in the no-look fee; if the total fees, including amounts advanced, exceed $2800, debtors' counsel may file a formal fee application. Plaintiff alleged here (Br. 12-17) that Judge Callaway's standing order would cause it injury by denying reimbursement for filing fees, fees for debtor education, and credit counseling fees advanced to the debtor. Thus, the March 2010 standing order does not implicate the same claim that plaintiff has asserted in the present appeal, and confirms that plaintiff’s claim is in no meaningful sense “capable of repetition.” This case is plainly moot.

II. THE DISTRICT COURT IN ANY EVENT LACKED SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION OVER PLAINTIFF’S COMPLAINT.

This Court need not proceed further to decide this case, as mootness is dispositive. We note for the sake of completeness, however, that in district court, Judge Callaway moved to dismiss plaintiff’s case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction on numerous grounds, including, inter alia, lack of an Article III case or controversy, no waiver of sovereign immunity, and lack of standing. If this interlocutory appeal were not moot and the district court had not already entered a final order of dismissal from which no appeal has been taken, the case in any event would have to be remanded with instructions to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction.

A. Plaintiff’s Complaint Does Not Satisfy The Article III Case Or Controversy Requirement.

Plaintiff has not challenged application of the pertinent order in any particular bankruptcy case; in fact, Judge Callaway never applied the standing order to deny or reduce any request for fees and expenses by plaintiff. A proper case or controversy would have arisen only if and when, in the context of an actual bankruptcy case, Judge Callaway had denied a fee request by plaintiff pursuant to the standing order. See United States Nat'l Bank of Oregon v. Independent Ins. Agents of America, Inc., 508 U.S. 439, 446 (1993). No such scenario exists here.

In litigation challenging a court's standing order, "the focus must be on application of the standing order, and not its existence as an abstract matter." United States v. Zingsheim, 384 F.3d 867, 870 (7th Cir. 2004). Because plaintiff here challenged the standing order only as an abstract matter, it has failed to allege a case or controversy under Article III, even apart from the fact that the entire matter has now become moot.

B. Plaintiff Lacks Standing.

For similar reasons, plaintiff lacks standing and has lacked standing since the inception of the case. To establish standing under Article III, a plaintiff must show that it has suffered (1) a "concrete and particularized injury" that is actual or imminent; (2) caused by, or fairly traceable to, the defendant's challenged action; and (3) likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61 (1992); Little v. KPMG, LLP, 575 F.3d 533, 540 (5th Cir. 2009). Plaintiff has the burden of proof on all three elements. Id. That burden has not been and cannot be met here.

To have standing, a plaintiff must show "actual injury redressable by the court," which "tends to assure that the legal questions presented to the court will be resolved, not in the rarified atmosphere of a debating society, but in a concrete factual context conducive to a realistic appreciation of the consequences of judicial action." Doe v. Tangipahoa Parish Sch. Dist., 494 F.3d 494, 496 n.2 (5th Cir. 2007) (en banc) (internal quotations omitted). Here, plaintiff cannot establish any of the required elements of Article III standing; rather, it sought a decision from the district court on the validity of Judge Callaway's standing order in the abstract, without any factual context provided by an actual case.

1. Plaintiff has not shown that it has suffered or will imminently suffer any injury-in-fact. Indeed, plaintiff does not provide any concrete examples of denials of any fee requests under the now-rescinded standing order. That is not surprising, since the standing order was not applied to deny plaintiff reimbursement of fees or expenses. As the Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized, "[a]llegations of possible future injury do not satisfy the requirements of Art. III." E.g., Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 158 (1990). Rather, a "threatened injury must be certainly impending to constitute injury in fact." Id. (internal quotations omitted). And plaintiff must demonstrate that "the injury complained of be, if not actual, then at least imminent[.]" Lujan, 504 U.S. at 564 n.2.

Here, plaintiff's alleged injuries were wholly conjectural. No actual instance of harm appeared in plaintiff's complaint. See R. 1 at 7-16, RE 3-12. Rather, plaintiff asserted that the standing order would cause it harm by denying reimbursement of fees advanced to debtors, thereby infringing on its free speech rights by interfering with its ability to advertise its willingness to advance costs to debtors in Chapter 13 bankruptcy cases. Id. at 9-12, RE 5-8. But the standing order did not limit or regulate plaintiff's advertising. Plaintiff's complaint did not cite any language in the standing order in support of its allegation concerning infringement of its right to commercial free speech, nor could it. Tellingly, the argument in plaintiff's opening appellate brief does not mention any alleged infringement of its right to commercial free speech. Pl. Br. 6-20. Plaintiff has thus abandoned any such argument.

Nor has plaintiff shown that the (now-defunct) standing order caused or would cause it any actual financial harm. Instead, plaintiff speculated that, under the terms of the order, its fee awards in Chapter 13 cases would decrease in the future. R. 1 at 10, RE 6. As plaintiff recognizes (Br. 13-14), however, the standing order did "make provision for the filing of an application for fees and expenses in excess of the 'no look' fee in the form of a formal fee application." Thus, plaintiff's estimate of future financial harm from application of the order was always conjecture. Without first attempting and being denied reimbursement under the standing order, plaintiff could not show injury-in-fact sufficient to support Article III standing.

Plaintiff's acknowledgment that it cannot satisfy the "person aggrieved" requirement for establishing appellate standing in bankruptcy cases further demonstrates its failure to adequately show injury-in-fact. See R. 1 at 15, RE 11. Under the "person aggrieved" standard, a private party must be "directly and adversely affected pecuniarily" by a bankruptcy court order to establish standing to appeal. E.g., In re Coho Energy Inc., 395 F.3d 198, 203 (5th Cir. 2004) (internal quotations omitted). In its complaint, plaintiff attempted to justify seeking a writ of prohibition by acknowledging that it was "without an immediate avenue to attack the Standing Orders, given the necessity to be a person directly aggrieved in order to appeal[.]" R. 1 at 15, RE 11 (citing In re LTV Steel Co., Inc., 560 F.3d 449 (6th Cir. 2009) (dismissing appeal of bankruptcy court's Standing Order because appellant did not satisfy "person aggrieved" standard)). Though plaintiff nonetheless claimed that it was "suffering exigent monetary harm," it nowhere identified how the standing order had caused it such harm. R. 1 at 15-16, RE 11-12.

Where, as here, "claimed anticipatory injury has not been shown to be more than uncertain potentiality," federal courts "consistently deny standing." Prestage Farms, Inc. v. Board of Supervisors of Noxubee County, Mississippi, 205 F.3d 265, 268 (5th Cir. 2000). Because plaintiff failed to establish any actual or imminent harm caused by the standing order, its alleged "future injury * * * [was] too conjectural and hypothetical to provide Article III standing." Id. Again, this is all apart from the fact that the case has now irrevocably mooted out.

2. Plaintiff likewise failed to establish that the harm alleged in its complaint -- infringement of its First Amendment rights and predicted future monetary losses -- could be caused by, or fairly traceable to the challenged standing order. As set forth above, the standing order did not restrict plaintiff's advertising, and thus, plaintiff remained (and remains) free to advertise its services in any way it deemed appropriate consistent with the requirements of Bankruptcy Code Sections 526, 527 and 528 (which regulate advertising by debt relief agencies) and applicable legal ethics provisions. Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, 130 S. Ct. 1324, 1333, 1339-40 (2010) (bankruptcy attorneys qualify as "debt relief agencies" under Bankruptcy Code, disclosure requirements applicable to debt relief agencies do not violate First Amendment).

3. Plaintiff's claimed injury was similarly not redressable by the relief that it sought. Plaintiff could not show that it was likely, as opposed to speculative, that a court order invalidating the challenged standing order would allow it to obtain greater compensation in future bankruptcy cases. To the contrary, any such suggestion was always conjectural, because even if plaintiff had obtained a writ of prohibition against enforcement of the challenged standing order, Judge Callaway would have retained the authority and duty under the Bankruptcy Code to apply its provisions governing attorney compensation and reimbursement of costs. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 329, 330. Under such provisions, Judge Callaway would have the authority to reduce fee requests submitted by plaintiff and other debtors' counsel on a case-by-case basis. It is only in a proper appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158, where plaintiff in an actual case had submitted a request for fees and expenses, and the court had denied or reduced the amount requested, that plaintiff might suffer actual financial harm that could be redressed by a court order.

C. There Is No Waiver Of Sovereign Immunity For The Present Action.

Again, this Court need not proceed beyond the mootness point. We add, however, out of an abundance of caution, that the United States cannot be sued absent a congressional waiver of sovereign immunity. United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 33-34 (1992). Such "waivers of the Government's sovereign immunity, to be effective, must be unequivocally expressed." Id. at 33. Because plaintiff sued Judge Callaway in his official capacity as a United States bankruptcy judge, sovereign immunity bars the present action absent the requisite congressional waiver.[5] See Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159, 166 (1985) ("official-capacity suit is, in all respects other than name, to be treated as a suit against the entity"); Williamson v. United States Dept. of Agriculture, 815 F.2d 368, 380-81 (5th Cir. 1987) ("United States and its officers in pursuit of their official duties remain protected by sovereign immunity").

Plaintiff's action is distinguishable from cases in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against a judge or lower court in an ongoing case or controversy between adverse parties. Cf., e.g., In re Occidental Petroleum Corp., 217 F.3d

[5] Plaintiff is not suing Judge Callaway for damages, and, in any event, such a suit would be barred by absolute judicial immunity. E.g., Mireles v. Waco, 502 U.S. 9, 11-12 (1991).

293 (5th Cir. 2000) (corporation petitions for mandamus from district court order requiring production of documents in suit between corporation and employees). In such circumstances, sovereign immunity is not at issue because the underlying lawsuit is not against the judge in his official capacity.[6]

The All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651, does not provide the requisite waiver or even an independent basis for federal jurisdiction. "It is well established that the All Writs Act, by itself, creates no jurisdiction in the district courts." Singh v. Duane Morris LLP, 538 F.3d 334, 341 (5th Cir. 2008) (internal quotations omitted). Rather, the Act "empowers [district courts] only to issue writs in aid of jurisdiction previously acquired on some other independent ground." Id. at 341; Chandler v. Judicial Council of the Tenth Circuit, 398 U.S. 74, 86 (1970). Absent the requisite waiver of sovereign immunity, no such independent ground for jurisdiction exists in this case.[7] [6] In addition, no exception to sovereign immunity would apply here because plaintiff has neither shown nor adequately alleged that Judge Callaway acted ultra vires. See, e.g., Alabama Rural Fire Ins. Co. v. Naylor, 530 F.2d 1221, 1226-27 (5th Cir. 1976) (even if defendant federal officer's actions were legally wrong, exception to sovereign immunity inapplicable where plaintiff failed to establish that actions were outside statutory authority); see infra pp. 33-38 (Judge Callaway acted well within authority under Bankruptcy Code).

[7] The other statutes that plaintiff invoked -- 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334, 1343 and 157 -- also do not waive sovereign immunity or support district court jurisdiction. R. 1 at 7-8, RE 3-4. Section 1334 is inapplicable because plaintiff's action was not filed in connection with a bankruptcy petition, and its cause of action was not created or premised on a provision of the Bankruptcy Code. Matter of Wood, 825 F.2d 90, 92, 96 (5th Cir. 1987). Section 157 merely provides that district courts may refer

III. THE DISTRICT COURT PROPERLY DENIED PLAINTIFF'S REQUEST FOR A WRIT OF PROHIBITION.

Finally, even if this appeal were not moot and even if the district court had jurisdiction, plaintiff still would not be entitled to relief. The sole issue plaintiff raises on appeal is whether it is entitled to a writ of prohibition against enforcement of Judge Callaway's now-rescinded standing order. See Pl. Br. 6. But a writ of prohibition is "reserved for only the most extraordinary cases, or where the error of the district court is clear and indisputable." In re Grand Jury Proceedings in the Matter of Fine, 641 F.2d 199, 201 (5th Cir. 1981). Moreover, a writ of prohibition or other extraordinary remedy under the All Writs Act is available only if plaintiff has established that he lacks any other adequate remedy. Kerr v. United States Dist. Ct. for the Northern Dist. of California, 426 U.S. 394, 402-403 (1976); In re Montes, 677 F.2d 415, 416 (5th Cir. 1982). Plaintiff plainly cannot meet any of these stringent requirements, even apart from the dispositive absence of jurisdiction.

7 cases that fall within their jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1334 to the bankruptcy court; it does not provide any additional basis for district court jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 157(a),(b). And plaintiff's reference to 28 U.S.C. § 1343 fares no better, since "this court has long recognized that suits against the United States under the civil rights statutes [including § 1343] are barred by sovereign immunity." Affiliated Prof. Home Health Care Ag. v. Shalala, 164 F.3d 282, 286 (5th Cir. 1999).

A. There Is No Basis For Seeking Extraordinary Relief To Vacate An Order That Has Already Been Rescinded.

In district court, plaintiff sought a writ of prohibition against enforcement of two standing orders issued by Judge Callaway, only one of which -- the Standing Order Regarding Reimbursement of Fees or Expenses -- is at issue here. Plaintiff asserts (Br. 6) that "McBride & Collier seek[s] a writ of prohibition from this Court to be issued to the Defendant-Appellee vacating his 'Standing Order Regarding Reimbursement of Fees or Expenses Advanced by Debtor Counsel * * *' dated November 30, 2009."[8] As an initial matter, there is absolutely no justification for seeking the extraordinary relief of a writ of prohibition to vacate an order that has already been rescinded. Any order from this Court vacating the November 30, 2009 standing order would have no effect. The challenged standing order has already been retroactively vacated to the date of its issuance, and was, in any event, never applied to deny or reduce any request for fees or expenses by plaintiff. For this reason alone, the district court's denial of the writ of prohibition would have to be affirmed, even assuming arguendo that this Court had jurisdiction to reach the merits.

[8] In the court below, plaintiff also sought a preliminary injunction against enforcement of the standing order. R. 1 at 16, RE 12. As detailed above, in the order from which plaintiff appeals, the district court denied the writ of prohibition, and subsequently, while this appeal was pending, the court dismissed plaintiff's entire case as moot. R. 16 at 169-172, RE 52-55; R. 40 at 320, AP RE 1. Plaintiff does not renew its request for a preliminary injunction before this Court, nor could it given that any request for preliminary relief is entirely moot.

B. Plaintiff May Appeal Any Denial Of Fees Or Expenses In An Actual Bankruptcy Case, And Thus Had An Adequate Remedy If The Standing Order Were Enforced Against It.

Even if the challenged standing order had remained in effect, an adequate legal remedy would have been available to plaintiff. Under 28 U.S.C. § 158, federal district courts have jurisdiction over appeals from bankruptcy court orders entered in bankruptcy “cases and proceedings.” 28 U.S.C. 158(a). If Judge Callaway had actually applied the challenged standing order as a basis for denying or reducing a request for reimbursement of fees and expenses by plaintiff in a pending bankruptcy case, plaintiff would be adversely affected pecuniarily, and thus would presumably qualify as a “person aggrieved” for purposes of appellate standing. See In re Coho Energy, 395 F.3d at 202. An appeal in such circumstances would not only provide an adequate alternative remedy, but would provide a far superior vehicle for challenging the bankruptcy court’s standing order. See Chandler, 398 U.S. at 86 (denying petition for writ of mandamus or prohibition where “other avenues of relief on the merits may yet be open to” petitioner). Only such a direct appeal would provide the court with the necessary factual context in which to evaluate plaintiff’s claims. See id. at 88 (noting that petitioner had failed to pursue other avenues of review, and as a result, had left Court with insufficient record and “a very knotty jurisdictional problem as well”).

The Seventh Circuit’s decision in Zingsheim, supra, is instructive. The court there denied the United States’ mandamus petition to vacate a district court’s standing order governing downward departure motions in sentencing proceedings. 384 F.3d at 869-70. The court held that, “[b]ecause appeal provides an adequate legal remedy for both the defendant and the United States, it is inappropriate to issue an extraordinary writ such as mandamus.” Id. at 870. The court stated that “[m]andamus is doubly inappropriate because the United States does not want us to direct the district judge to carry out any judicial duty in Moore’s prosecution; instead it want us to blot the standing order from the books.” Id.

Similarly, plaintiff here is not seeking a writ of mandamus to direct Judge Callaway to carry out any judicial duty in a bankruptcy case; rather, plaintiff seeks a writ of prohibition to vacate an already-rescinded standing order. In fact, the present case is less appropriate for issuing an extraordinary writ because plaintiff is not seeking relief in the context of a bankruptcy case, whereas in Zingsheim, the United States sought the writ in an actual criminal prosecution. Nonetheless, because in Zingsheim the United States did not “protest any step the district court ha[d] taken with respect to [defendant] Moore,” and its petition for mandamus thus “deals with the [standing] order in the abstract, and not with its consequences,” mandamus relief was deemed unavailable. 384 F.3d at 870.

Here, plaintiff likewise challenges a standing order in the abstract, rather than objecting to a specific application of the order in a particular bankruptcy case. Thus, even assuming arguendo that there were problems with the merits of the bankruptcy court's standing order, the district court correctly declined to issue a writ of prohibition. See Zingsheim, 384 F.3d at 870. As set forth below, however, even if the merits of the now-rescinded standing order were properly at issue, the district court correctly held that Judge Callaway was acting "well within the established boundaries of his authority" under the Bankruptcy Code. R. 16 at 171, RE 54.

C. Plaintiff Has Not Demonstrated "Clear And Indisputable" Error By The Bankruptcy Court.

1. Extraordinary relief under the All Writs Act "has traditionally been used in the federal courts only to confine an inferior court to a lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction or to compel it to exercise its authority when it is its duty to do so." Kerr, 426 U.S. at 402. Moreover, to demonstrate entitlement to a writ of prohibition, plaintiff must show that the bankruptcy court committed "clear and indisputable" error. Id. at 403; In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 641 F.2d at 201. Plaintiff cannot possibly meet these standards here.

In issuing the challenged standing order, Judge Callaway acted consistent with circuit precedent and his authority under the Bankruptcy Code. The Code provides bankruptcy courts with "discretion to award reasonable compensation to debtors' attorneys in bankruptcy cases." In re Cahill, 428 F.3d 536, 539 (5th Cir. 2005). Pursuant to Section 330(a)(4)(B), a bankruptcy court in a Chapter 13 case "may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4)(B). In determining whether a request for compensation is reasonable, the bankruptcy court considers "the nature, the extent, and the value of [the attorney's] services, taking into account all relevant factors," which include, inter alia, the time spent, the rates charged, whether the services were necessary and performed "within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the problem, issue, or task addressed." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3).

Moreover, Section 329 mandates disclosure to the bankruptcy court of any payments by the debtor to attorneys or agreements to pay attorneys "made after one year before the date of the filing of the petition." 11 U.S.C. § 329(a). That section also authorizes the bankruptcy court to "review all attorney compensation and agreements for reasonableness, and to cancel excessive service agreements or order return of payments if they are excessive." Barron v. Countryman, 432 F.3d 590, 595 (5th Cir. 2005). In addition, Section 105(a) of the Bankruptcy Code allows bankruptcy courts to "issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title." 11 U.S.C. § 105(a). These statutory provisions give bankruptcy judges ample authority to carefully examine attorneys' requests for fees and reimbursement, and to reduce or deny requests that they find are excessive.

Circuit precedent also provides a sound basis for Judge Callaway's standing order. This Court has approved the use of general or standing orders that set forth what a bankruptcy court will consider to be a reasonable fee award in a typical Chapter 13 case. Cahill, 428 F.3d at 540. As this Court explained in approving a bankruptcy court's General Order that applied a precalculated lodestar amount to attorney fee awards, "General Order 2004-5 attempts to clarify and streamline bankruptcy courts' review of Chapter 13 attorneys' fee applications, addressing the need for both efficiency and flexibility in handling the large number of Chapter 13 cases that bankruptcy courts in the Southern District of Texas review each year." Id.; see Barron, 432 F.3d at 595-96 (local bankruptcy court rule that allowed fee of $2000 or less without formal application was "commonsense approach to the practicalities of Chapter 13 representation"). Cahill noted that the General Order at issue set forth the precalculated lodestar amount, but also contemplated that courts would "continue to analyze and adjust fee applications on a case-by-case basis[.]" 428 F.3d at 541.

Consistent with these principles, Judge Callaway's standing order set forth general rules on the reimbursement of fees and expenses advanced by debtors' counsel. R. 1 Exh. C at 21-25, RE 17-21. But at the same time, the order expressly allowed for case-by-case examinations of requests for fees and expenses advanced by debtors' counsel through use of a formal application. Id. at 25, RE 21. Thus, the standing order did not entirely preclude such reimbursement; rather, its purpose was to ensure compliance with “statutory and jurisprudential requirements” that the court found were “not presently being met by utilization of the ‘No Look’ Fee[.]” Id. at 24, RE 20.

2. Plaintiff insists (Br. 14) that a writ of prohibition is nonetheless warranted because the standing order “impermissibly denie[d] reimbursement of expenses to McBride & Collier while allowing the same reimbursement of expenses to other attorneys who receive deposits from their clients pre-petition.” Plaintiff alleges (Br. 13) that “all Chapter 13 debtors attorneys are effectively being reimbursed for the advancement of those same costs from property of the estate when those attorneys pay for the court costs, credit counseling fees, and debtor education fees by use of an attorney’s credit card.”

Even assuming the premise of plaintiff’s argument were correct –- that Chapter 13 debtors’ attorneys who require deposits from debtors pre-petition for filing fees but pay such fees themselves by attorney credit cards are essentially advancing such fees to debtors and must seek reimbursement from the bankruptcy estate –- plaintiff has made no showing that the standing order would have applied any differently to such situations. As the order made clear, debtors’ attorneys could not use the “no look fee” if they sought “reimbursement from the bankruptcy estate or the debtor for any sums advanced for filing fees, credit counseling fees, credit reporting fees, or any other fees or expenses advanced[.]” R. 1 Exh. C at 24, RE 20. Thus, if the scenario that plaintiff describes in its brief were the legal equivalent of advancing a fee to a debtor and seeking reimbursement post-petition, then the standing order would have presumably applied.

In any event, plaintiff's argument only underscores why its case should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Due to the posture of the case -- a pre-application challenge to a standing order -- and the fact that the order was in any event rescinded soon after its issuance, there is no record upon which this Court could decide how the standing order would have applied to specific factual scenarios.

Plaintiff's reliance (Br. 9-10) on this Court's decision in Barron, supra, further shows the error in plaintiff's argument. As Barron illustrates, whether debtors retain a legal interest in amounts deposited with their attorneys pre-petition is a complicated question that depends on the facts of individual debtors' agreements with their attorneys. See 432 F.3d at 595-97 (setting forth categories of retainer agreements; examining appellant's retainer agreement and practice to determine which category applies and whether pre-petition fees were property of estate). Indeed, factual circumstances such as filing-fee payment arrangements between debtors and attorneys will vary from case-to-case, and contrary to plaintiff's suggestion, filing fees are not always paid by attorney credit card. See, e.g., Bankruptcy Fee Schedule (U.S. Bankr. Court, W.D. Louisiana), http://www.lawb.uscourts.gov/court/Fees/fees.htm (court "accepts Cash, Credit Card, Money Orders, Bank Cashier’s Checks, Attorney/Firm Checks * * * for payment of filing fees”). Again, because plaintiff filed this action without the benefit of any factual context, its unsupported generalizations regarding Chapter 13 practice do not come close to showing “clear or indisputable” error.

Plaintiff’s argument that Judge Callaway’s standing order was contrary to the weight of legal authority also fails to advance its position. Plaintiff acknowledges (Br. 14) that this Court has “never expressly addressed the issue of reimbursement of bankruptcy filing fees[.]” That admission alone ends the inquiry. Since there is no binding precedent that had required Judge Callaway to allow reimbursement of fees advanced by debtors’ counsel, it could hardly be “clear and indisputable” error for the Judge to have required that attorneys seeking such reimbursement file formal applications for the court’s consideration. And, though plaintiff contends (Br. 15) that the “vast weight of authority holds that filing fees and other related expenses are reimbursable under 11 U.S.C. § 330,” plaintiff admits (Br. 16) that none of the cases it cites “actually address reimbursement of expenses in the context of a Chapter 13 debtors attorney.” Plaintiff also cites (Br. 16) two Chapter 11 cases in which courts denied reimbursement of filing fees. The district court thus correctly held that there was no binding precedent requiring Judge Callaway to reimburse fees advanced by Chapter 13 debtors’ counsel. R. 16 at 171, RE 54.

* * * * *

In sum, plaintiff seeks extraordinary relief under the All Writs Act to enjoin enforcement of a bankruptcy court order that has been expressly rescinded, in the context of a case that has been dismissed as moot, and where the district court lacked subject matter jurisdiction from the outset. And, even if the merits of the now-defunct standing order were properly at issue, the district court correctly ruled that, consistent with circuit precedent, Judge Callaway acted "well within his sound discretion" under the Bankruptcy Code.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should dismiss the present appeal for lack of jurisdiction. Even if jurisdiction existed over the appeal, the district court's denial of the writ of prohibition would have to be upheld.

FEDERAL STATUTES

I. JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

This is an appeal from an order of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Georgia, dated February 4, 2008, which denied the motion seeking reconsideration of the bankruptcy court's Order on Application for Compensation of Diana McDonald, dated January 15, 2008. The bankruptcy court's February 4, 2008, order resolved all issues pertaining to McDonald's motion for reconsideration, and is therefore a final order over which this Court has jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §158(a)(1). See In re Red Carpet Corp. of Panama City Beach, 902 F.2d 883, 890 (11th Cir. 1990). McDonald's Notice of Appeal was filed on February 14, 2008, and is timely with respect to the bankruptcy court's order denying reconsideration.

II. ISSUE PRESENTED

Although McDonald's Statement of Issues Presented appears to seek review of various rulings contained in the bankruptcy court's January 15, 2008, compensation order, McDonald failed to preserve such issues for appeal. Consequently, the sole issue presented by this appeal is whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by denying McDonald's motion for reconsideration on the grounds that such motion improperly sought to relitigate issues already decided in the compensation order.

III. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On February 5, 2007, Derrick Patterson commenced an individual chapter 11 bankruptcy case. (R-1).[1] On February 9, 2007, the bankruptcy court granted Patterson's motion to employ McDonald as counsel to the bankruptcy estate pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §327. (R-9). On May 25, 2007, the bankruptcy court ordered the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee for Patterson's estate (R-101), and on July 23, 2007, the Bankruptcy Court ordered that Patterson's case be converted to a chapter 7 liquidation. (R-140). On July 27, 2007, McDonald filed a certificate of consent withdrawing as Patterson's counsel. (R-151).

On August 27, 2007, McDonald filed an application seeking $13,679.90 in compensation for her services on behalf of the chapter 11 estate. (R-235). McDonald further sought permission to satisfy a portion of her fee through application of a prepetition retainer in the amount of $7,500. The chapter 7 trustee and the United States Trustee each objected to McDonald's fee application. (R-238, 261). In addition, the chapter 7 trustee sought turnover of the $7,500 retainer from McDonald, on the grounds that the Patterson chapter 7 estate was likely to be administratively insolvent and McDonald's claim for fees, even if allowed, was subordinate to the administrative expenses of the chapter 7 estate pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 726(b). (R-238).

[1] Unless otherwise indicated, all references to the record on appeal are to the docket number assigned to the document by the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court.

On October 2, 2007, the bankruptcy court conducted a hearing on McDonald's fee application in which McDonald participated. On January 15, 2008, the bankruptcy court issued an order allowing McDonald's fees in the amount of $1,500 and ordering McDonald to turn over the full amount of the $7,500 retainer to the chapter 7 trustee (the "Compensation Order"). (R-293). In so ordering, the bankruptcy court held that: (i) under federal bankruptcy law, the retainer paid to McDonald remained property of the bankruptcy estate until such time as the fees were both earned and approved by the bankruptcy court; (ii) McDonald had failed to demonstrate that the retainer was a "security retainer" not subject to disgorgement; (iii) even if Patterson had intended to grant McDonald a security retainer, such retainers are not recognized under Georgia law; and (iv) evaluated under a lodestar analysis, the value of McDonald's services to the estate was only $1,500. Id.

On January 25, 2008, McDonald filed a motion for reconsideration of the Compensation Order (the "Reconsideration Motion"). (R-296). The sole issue raised in McDonald's reconsideration motion was whether the bankruptcy court correctly applied its lodestar analysis in determining the amount of McDonald's fee award. McDonald's motion for reconsideration did not raise any arguments concerning the priority of that award, nor did it address the nature of her interest in the retainer.

On February 4, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an order denying the bulk of the Reconsideration Motion (the "Reconsideration Order"). (R-298). Although the bankruptcy court corrected a line of its decision which erroneously recited the amount of McDonald's lodestar award as $1,000 rather than $1,500, the court denied the balance of the motion as an "attempt to relitigate the issues already decided in the Compensation Order." Id.

On February 14, 2008, McDonald filed her notice of appeal. (R-303). McDonald's notice identified the order under appeal as the court's February 4, 2008, Reconsideration Order, and did not make reference to the initial January 15, 2008, Compensation Order.

IV. STANDARD OF REVIEW

The bankruptcy court's denial of the Reconsideration Motion is reviewed for abuse of discretion. See Glass v. Seaboard Coast Line RR. Co., 714 F.2d 1107, 1109 (11th Cir. 1983). To the extent that the Court determines that it has jurisdiction to consider McDonald's other issues on appeal, the bankruptcy court's calculation of a reasonable fee to a bankruptcy professional under 11 U.S.C. § 330 is also reviewed for abuse of discretion, see In re Citation Corp., 493 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2007), while the factual findings of the bankruptcy court otherwise are reviewed for clear error and its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. See In re Chase & Sanborn Corp., 904 F.2d 588, 593 (11th Cir. 1990).

V. ARGUMENT

A. McDonald Cannot Revisit the Issues Decided in the Compensation Order through Her Appeal of the Reconsideration Order.

Although McDonald has sought review of the bankruptcy court's Reconsideration Order, she did not file a notice of appeal with respect to the underlying Compensation Order. Despite this, a considerable portion of McDonald's opening brief appears directed toward issues that were litigated in the Compensation Order but which were never raised in her subsequent Reconsideration Motion. See, e.g., Appellant's Brief at 9-11 (discussing evidentiary findings in Compensation Order), 13-17 (discussing characterization of prepetition retainer).

In requesting that the Court revisit these rulings, McDonald overlooks the limited scope of this Court's review. On an appeal of a reconsideration order, the appellate court "may review the ruling only for abuse of discretion," and the appeal from the denial of reconsideration relief "does not bring up the underlying judgment for review." Browder v. Director, Dept. of Corrections of Illinois, 434 U.S. 257, 263 n.7 (1978). As such, courts have consistently recognized that an appeal of a reconsideration order may not be used to attack the merits of the underlying judgment. See American Bankers Ins. Co. of Fla. v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 198 F.3d 1332, 1338 (11th Cir. 1999); Glass v. Seaboard Coast Line RR. Co., supra, 714 F.2d at 1109; Jackson v. Seaboard Coast Line RR. Co., 678 F.2d 992, 1021 (11th Cir. 1982).

McDonald's failure to file a timely notice of appeal with respect to the underlying Compensation Order creates a jurisdictional defect that prevents this Court from reviewing the substantive rulings of that order. See Whetstone Candy Co. v. Kraft Foods, Inc., 351 F.3d 1067, 1079-80 (11th Cir. 2003) (holding that "[w]here an appellant notices the appeal of a specified judgment only ... this court has no jurisdiction to review other judgments or issues which are not expressly referred to and which are not impliedly intended for appeal") (internal citations omitted). Accordingly, to the extent McDonald seeks to revisit the substantive rulings of the Compensation Order – including, without limitation, the bankruptcy court's rulings regarding the nature of her interest in the retainer – McDonald has failed to preserve those arguments for appeal, and they may not now be considered by this Court.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Declining to Grant McDonald's Motion for Reconsideration

Although McDonald cited no statutory authority in support of her motion for reconsideration, the bankruptcy court appears to have treated her motion as one for an amendment of judgment under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9023 and Fed. R. Civ. P. 59. As the Eleventh Circuit has recognized, "[t]he only grounds for granting [a Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9023] motion are newly-discovered evidence or manifest errors of law or fact." Kellogg v. Schreiber (In re Kellogg), 197 F.3d 1116, 1119 (11th Cir. 1999). By contrast, a motion for reconsideration "is not to serve as a vehicle to relitigate old matters or present the case under a new legal theory ... or to give the moving party another 'bite at the apple' by permitting the arguing of issues and procedures that could and should have been raised prior to judgment." Mincey v. Head, 206 F.3d 1106, 1137 (11th Cir. 2000) (internal citations omitted).

Applying the standard recited in Kellogg, the bankruptcy court denied the bulk of the Reconsideration Motion on the grounds that such motion was "an attempt to relitigate the issues already decided in the Compensation Order." (R-298). The bankruptcy court's determination is supported by the record. The Reconsideration Motion consists almost entirely of a discussion of the various services performed by McDonald in the Patterson bankruptcy case. At no point, however, does the Reconsideration Motion identify any newly-discovered evidence that could not have been presented by McDonald at the hearing on her fee application. Although the Reconsideration Motion appears to take issue with the weight given to certain evidence by the bankruptcy court, as well the bankruptcy court's assessment of the value of McDonald's services, the Reconsideration Motion does not expressly allege any errors of law by the bankruptcy court. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by denying the Reconsideration Motion.

C. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in its Calculation of the Reasonable Value of McDonald's Services

As noted, although the issue of the bankruptcy court's refusal to reconsider the Compensation Order has been preserved for appeal, the underlying rulings of the Compensation Order itself are not within this Court's appellate jurisdiction. Even if McDonald had properly raised the merits of the Compensation Order on appeal, however, there would be no basis for this Court to overturn that order.

A bankruptcy court's fee award under 11 U.S.C. § 330 is entitled to considerable deference, and an appellate court should reverse the bankruptcy court's decision only "if the bankruptcy court applied an incorrect legal standard, failed to follow proper procedures, or made factual findings that were clearly erroneous." In re Citation Corp., supra, 493 F.3d at 1318.

In the proceedings before the bankruptcy court, McDonald bore the burden of proving that her fee request was commensurate with the value of her services. See In re Beverly Mfg. Corp., 841 F.2d 365, 371 (11th Cir. 1988). McDonald's brief does not discuss what evidence, if any, she relied on in attempting to meet this burden. By contrast, the Compensation Order contains the following specific findings in support of the bankruptcy court's conclusion that McDonald's services were not worth more than $1,500:

> Ms. McDonald seeks to charge an excessive amount for many of the services provided. For example, she charges 4.67 hours for preparation of a skeletal petition; 4.33 hours to gather documents; 2.5 hours to prepare and file a motion to withdraw (that was denied). The recitation in the Retainer Agreement of services to be provided evidences less than a full understanding of the services that an attorney for a Chapter 11 Debtor must undertake. Ms. McDonald filed only one, apparently incomplete, operating report for her client. She failed to adequately monitor her client's stewardship of the rental properties' income and expenses, with the result that rents were collected but not used to pay the expenses associated with the properties. When the Debtor finally filed his Statement of Financial Affairs and other schedules . . . it was apparent that monthly expense exceeded income and that the estate was illiquid and not likely capable of successful reorganization. The brief period prior to appointment of the Chapter 11 Trustee that the Debtors acted as debtor-in-possession resulted in severe erosion in the estate's financial condition.

Significantly, McDonald does not dispute any of the foregoing findings of the bankruptcy court. Instead, McDonald's argument appears to be that the bankruptcy court erred by relying on the statements of fact contained in the pleadings of the chapter 7 trustee and the United States Trustee, and by failing to "pinpoint or consider all the facts surrounding Appellant McDonald's representation of Debtor." (Br. 10). McDonald's criticism of the bankruptcy court on this point is difficult to understand, as McDonald's fee application was afforded the notice and hearing required by the Bankruptcy Code, and any evidence favorable to her position could have been presented at that hearing. In any event, McDonald's brief fails to specify what additional evidence, if any, she contends the bankruptcy court improperly failed to consider.

Nor does McDonald appear to allege that the bankruptcy court applied an incorrect legal standard. Indeed, the case identified by McDonald as providing the applicable legal standard for fee awards, Johnson v. Georgia Highway Exp., Inc., 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1974), is the same authority relied on by the bankruptcy court in its discussion of McDonald's fees in the Compensation Order. (R-293 at 5). Instead, McDonald's principal argument on appeal is simply that the bankruptcy court should have included in its opinion a separate discussion of each of the twelve enumerated Johnson factors. McDonald cites to no authority, and the United States Trustee is aware of no authority, suggesting that such a level of detail is necessary in an order under 11 U.S.C. § 330. In any event, the United States Trustee notes that a number of the Johnson factors were directly or indirectly addressed in the bankruptcy court's findings of fact, including (1) the time and labor required; (2) the amount involved and the results obtained; and (3) the experience, reputation, and ability of the attorney. More importantly, McDonald does not identify which, if any, of the remaining factors would have been relevant or helpful to her application had they been discussed in greater detail. As such, McDonald has not demonstrated that the bankruptcy court's calculation of her fees was an abuse of discretion.

D. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Err by Ordering McDonald to Turn over the Retainer to the Estate

Lastly, McDonald cannot demonstrate that the bankruptcy court erred by ordering her to return the full amount of the retainer to the chapter 7 trustee. Significantly, McDonald does not assert that she obtained full title to the retainer upon receipt, but concedes that she held the funds in trust for the estate and that the "[t]he client (or debtor) retains a propriety interest in the retainer." (Br. at 14).[2] In addition, McDonald does not appear to dispute the bankruptcy court's findings that the chapter 7 estate is administratively insolvent and that the chapter 7 administrative claims will be entitled to payment ahead of chapter 11 administrative claims. Rather, McDonald's entire argument against disgorgement is that she holds a security interest in the retainer. (Br. at 15).

McDonald's argument fails for at least two reasons. First, as the bankruptcy court found, even assuming that retainer security interests are permissible under Georgia law, McDonald produced no evidence that such an interest was actually created. Under Georgia law, the question of whether a security interest arises in a particular transaction is determined by looking to the intent of the parties, rather than to the form of the transaction. See Kubota Tractor Corp. v. Citizens & Southern Nat. Bank, 403 S.E.2d 218, 220 (Ga. App. 1991). At no point in her arguments before the bankruptcy court or in her opening brief in this Court did McDonald identify a single piece of documentation to support her claim that Patterson intended to grant her a security interest. On the contrary, as the bankruptcy court observed, McDonald's actions during the bankruptcy case strongly indicate that no security interest was ever intended: McDonald's retention application in the bankruptcy court never disclosed that she was claiming a security interest in the retainer, and the bankruptcy court found nothing in the language of McDonald's retainer agreement that clearly stated an intention to create a security interest. (R-293 at 3). McDonald's brief offers no argument to rebut these factual findings of the bankruptcy court.

Secondly, even if Georgia law permitted McDonald to create a security interest in her pre-petition retainer, such an interest would be unenforceable in bankruptcy under the doctrine of federal preemption. As the Supreme Court has long held, the federal statutory scheme governing the compensation of bankruptcy professionals in bankruptcy cases is a pervasive scheme of regulation that preempts inconsistent state laws. See Brown v. Gerdes, 321 U.S. 178, 183 (1944) (Chandler Act amendments to the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 created "comprehensive supervision over compensation and allowances" under federal law and "provided centralized control" over attorney fees). This is because bankruptcy jurisdiction over professional fees in bankruptcy cases is "paramount and exclusive" and federal provisions governing professional compensation "cause any conflicting [state] procedure to give way." Brown, 321 U.S. at 183 (holding that under the Bankruptcy Act, bankruptcy courts, not state courts, fix compensation for attorneys representing the estate, even in state litigation) (citations omitted).

Through the Bankruptcy Code, Congress has established a comprehensive set of rules which dictate how attorneys may be retained at estate expense, how they are compensated by the estate, how they receive payment from the estate, and (of importance in the present case) what priority their payment receives. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 327, 330, 339, 503, 507. In this case, the enforcement of a state law lien in McDonald's favor would interfere with this comprehensive scheme by altering McDonald's payment priority for post-petition services in relation to other claimants under 11 U.S.C. § 726(b).

Under circumstances similar to the present case, courts have recognized that where pre-petition retainers are used to secure payment of post-petition legal services, any state law security interests in those retainers are preempted by the Bankruptcy Code. Thus, in In re Mahendra, 131 F.3d 750, 756 (8th Cir. 1997), the court held that an attorney's security interest in his retainer, "to the extent it was valid[,] . . . was extinguished on the petition date with respect to any future advances." See also In re CK Liquidation Corp., 343 B.R. 376, 384 (D. Mass. 2006) (holding that application of state lien law to enforce security retainer of debtor's counsel was preempted by Bankruptcy Code); In re 5900 Assocs., Inc., 468 F.3d 326, 329-30 (6th Cir. 2006) (holding that law firm and debtor cannot abrogate bankruptcy court's duty to review fees by entering into a state law contract).

Accordingly, the bankruptcy court did not err in ordering McDonald to return the full amount of the retainer to the chapter 7 trustee.

VI. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully submits that the bankruptcy court's order denying reconsideration of its order setting McDonald's compensation and ordering disgorgement of McDonald's retainer must be affirmed in its entirety.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to decide the United States Trustee's [1] motion to dismiss the bankruptcy case of debtors Joseph McGowan and Laura Kuhn McGowan under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b), and 1334(a). A dismissal of a chapter 7 case for abuse is a final order. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1); Belfance v. Black River Petroleum (In re Hess), 209 B.R. 79, 80 (6th Cir. BAP. 1997). The bankruptcy court entered the order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss on May 3, 2010. The McGowans timely appealed the order of dismissal on May 17, 2010 under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) and 8002(b). This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

financial situation, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B), even though the McGowans' case was not presumed abusive under the "means test" as set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

2. Under § 707(b)(3)(B) did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion in dismissing Joseph and Laura McGowan's chapter 7 case for abuse based on the totality of the circumstances of their financial situation?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews the bankruptcy court's findings of fact for clear error and reviews conclusions of law de novo. Nicholson v. Isaacman (In re Issacman), 26 F.3d. 629, 631(6th Cir. 1994). Whether the court may consider dismissal of a debtors' case under § 707(b)(3)(B) when the debtor's case is not presumed to be an abuse based on the § 707(b)(2) means test is a question of law reviewed de novo. The dismissal of a chapter 7 case for abuse under § 707(b)(3)(B) is an equitable determination reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. See Behlke v. Eisen (In re Behlke), 358 F. 3d 429 (6th Cir. 2004).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Appellants Joseph Thomas McGowan and Laura Kuhn McGowan filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code on September 25, 2009. (Bankruptcy Court Docket No. 1; UST Exhibit. 2).[2] The United States Trustee moved to dismiss the McGowans' case, asserting that it was abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (b)(3)(B). (Docket No. 13). At the evidentiary hearing, conducted on April 20 and 21, 2010, John Weaver, bankruptcy analyst for the United States Trustee, and Joseph McGowan testified. (See Transcript).[3] At the close of the United States Trustee's case, the McGowans orally moved for summary judgment in their favor arguing they had "passed" the means test provisions of § 707(b)(2), precluding dismissal under § 707(b)(3)(B). (Transcript at p. 97-101). The bankruptcy court denied the McGowans' motion. (Transcript at p. 104-105).

On May 3, 2010, after consideration of the evidence,[4] arguments of counsel, and the record, the bankruptcy court granted the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the McGowans' chapter 7 case based upon the totality of their financial circumstances under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). (Docket No. 47).[5] Mr. and Mrs. McGowan filed a notice of appeal on May 17, 2010 along with an election to have this appeal considered by the District Court. (Docket Nos. 53 and 54).

A. Statutory Framework.

1. Overview of Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Relief.

The Bankruptcy Code establishes two primary forms of bankruptcy relief for individual debtors – chapter 7 and chapter 13. Under chapter 7, "an individual debtor receives an immediate unconditional discharge of personal liability for certain debts in exchange for relinquishing his or her nonexempt assets to a bankruptcy trustee for liquidation and distribution to creditors." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 701-727. Under chapter 13, "a debtor commits to repay some portion of his or her financial obligations" over a specified period "in exchange for retaining nonexempt assets and receiving a broader discharge of debt than is available under chapter 7." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; See 11 U.S.C. §§ 701-727.

In chapter 7 cases, creditors may look solely to debtors' pre-bankruptcy, non-exempt assets for payment. See 11 U.S.C. § 541 (limiting property of the estate to debtors' pre-petition assets). Debtors' post-bankruptcy income is not subject to creditor claims. Id. Subject to narrow exceptions, debtors receive a complete discharge of all their pre-petition debts in a chapter 7 case. See 11 U.S.C. § 727(b).[6]

2. Development of § 707(b)'s Two-Part Test for Determining Whether a Case Is Abusive.

Since 1984, Congress has enacted a series of tests to allow courts to dismiss chapter 7 cases, and thereby prevent unjust discharge of pre-petition debts. In 1984, Congress amended chapter 7 to permit dismissal of a chapter 7 bankruptcy case if a court found "substantial abuse." Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-353, § 312, 98 Stat. 333, 335. Two years later, Congress authorized the United States Trustee to seek dismissal of chapter 7 petitions for "substantial abuse." Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-554, § 21, 100 Stat. 3088, 3101.

However, Congress found that these amendments were insufficient to control abuse of chapter 7. Congress identified, among other problems, the "inherent[] vague[ness]" of the "substantial abuse" standard, which led to disagreement in the courts about whether a debtor's ability to repay a significant portion of his or her debts out of future earnings constitutes substantial abuse, meriting dismissal. H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12. Another problem was that the Bankruptcy Code established "a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor," which influenced courts' decisions whether to find substantial abuse. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (2000 suppl. 4); See H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12.

Responding to these perceived shortcomings, Congress held hearings over five years to identify reforms it could adopt "to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 2, 12. The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (the "2005 Act" or "BAPCPA"), S. 256, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, implemented the reforms Congress identified in four ways.

First, Congress repealed the statutory presumption in favor of granting relief to the debtor. Compare 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (1986) with 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (2005).

Second, Congress lowered the standard for dismissal under all subsections of new § 707(b) from "substantial abuse" to mere "abuse." See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) (cases are now dismissed for "abuse"); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) (subjecting cases to dismissal for abuse); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) (providing for dismissal based upon abuse due to bad faith or totality of financial circumstances).

Third, Congress authorized dismissal when a mathematical formula, known as the "means test," yields monthly disposable income that exceeds a statutory threshold. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). The 2005 Act provides specific criteria which, if satisfied, requires a court to presume the existence of abuse, requiring "dismissal [or conversion to chapter 13] based on a chapter 7 debtor' s ability to repay." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 15. To determine if abuse exists, a court first compares the debtor's annualized "current monthly income" to the "median family income" of a similarly-sized family in the debtor's state of residence. If the debtor's current monthly income is below the median, then the presumption of abuse does not arise. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(7); H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 15. When a debtor's current monthly income is above the median and his or her monthly disposable income meets or exceeds the statutory threshold amount, the presumption is triggered, and the debtor's case must be dismissed as abusive (or converted to chapter 13, if the debtor consents), absent an express showing of special circumstances by the debtor. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (2).

Fourth, Congress enacted new § 707(b)(3) to provide for a dismissal for abuse where the presumption of abuse under §707(b)(2) does not arise or is rebutted. This section allows courts to dismiss cases based upon either a debtor's bad faith, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or the totality of a debtor's financial circumstances, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). Even if the presumption of abuse does not arise or is rebutted under § 707(b)(2), this subsection provides a chapter 7 petition should be dismissed for abuse under § 707(b)(3) for bad faith or when "the totality of the circumstances. . .of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A) and (B).

Sections 707(b)(3)(A) and (B) of the 2005 Act represent a significant departure from old § 707(b). If a debtor engages in bad faith, the debtor's case is dismissed under § 707(b)(3)(A). If, instead, the totality of the debtor's financial circumstances including an ability to repay a portion of debt shows abuse, dismissal is mandated by § 707(b)(3)(B).

B. Factual Background.

Appellants Joseph Thomas McGowan and Laura Kuhn McGowan are both employed full time and have three children ages 17, 19, and 21. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 1) The McGowans' gross annual income is $131,360. (UST Ex. 11, page 5; Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 2). Mr. McGowan is a business development manager for Comfort Systems, USA and earns gross wages of $7,280 a month. (Docket No. 1, Schedule I) Mrs. McGowan is employed by St. Ignatius High School as an administrator and earns gross income of $3,660.67 a month. (Docket. No. 1, Schedule I; Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 1).

The McGowans filed their voluntary chapter 7 bankruptcy petition on September 25, 2009 seeking a discharge of their unsecured debts. (Docket No. 1; UST Ex. 2). Their scheduled debts total $780,544.75, including a first mortgage for $510,289, and a second mortgage totaling $31,966.

The McGowans's unsecured debts total $219,523.75, about twice their annual income (Docket No. 1, Schedules D and F; Mem. Op, Addendum, p. 2). This includes balances on 12 credit cards. (Docket No. 1, Schedule F). The McGowans scheduled four separate Chase credit cards, with a combined balance of $52,302. (Docket No. 1, Schedule F). They also have balances on credit cards from Bank of America ($24,471), Capital One ($11,898), American Express ($1,200), Target Bank ($10,147), CitiBank ($14,853), and Dick's Sporting Goods ($4,284). (Docket No.1, Schedule F). Finally, they scheduled two Discover cards with balances of $17,859 and $13,212. (Docket No. 1, Schedule F). In total, the McGowans seek to discharge $149,026 in credit card debt. (Docket No. 1, Schedule F).

The McGowans have interests in property with an aggregate value of $439,085.00, including a 4,300 square foot home valued at $380,000, with four-bedrooms, 3 ½ baths, and a two-car garage, located on roughly 2/3 of an acre in Shaker Heights.[7] (Docket No. 1, p. 39; Docket No. 40, para. 6, Stipulations of Fact; UST Ex. 1 and 11; Transcript at 20). They have interests in 401(k) and 403(b) accounts totaling $31,200. (Docket No.1, Schedules A and B). Their schedules also show a time-share in Epcot and a baby grand piano. (Id.).

Based upon the McGowans' schedule of current income, the parties stipulated that their scheduled net monthly income at the time of their bankruptcy filing totaled $8,302.04. (Docket No. 1, Schedule I; Docket No. 40, para 13; UST Ex. 11, para. 13). The McGowans total monthly expenses as originally filed on Schedule J amounted to $12,007.00, broken down as follows:

Item	Monthly Expense
Mortgage	$2,210
Home maintenance	$220
Food	$600
Clothing	$200
Recreation	$500
Real Estate Taxes	$1,014
College Tuition (son)	$720
College Tuition (daughter)	$1,730
Books	$220
Student Loans	$626
401(k) loan repayment	$433
Miscellaneous personal expenses	$500
Pet Expenses	$100

(Docket No. 1, Schedule J; Docket No. 40, para 14, Stipulations of Fact).

At trial, Mr. McGowan testified the family had tightened their household budget by doing five things:

- Eliminating a gym membership; (Transcript at 152);
- Eliminating a subscription to Golf Magazine and reducing their Plain Dealer subscription; (Transcript at 152);
- Reducing their monthly cell phone cost by $50 to $170; (Transcript at 152);
- Reducing cable and internet costs; (Transcript at 152-53);
- Eliminating membership to the Golf Dome and stopping golf lessons for their 17, 19, and 21-year-old children. (Transcript at 152-53).

On December 7, 2009, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the McGowans' chapter 7 bankruptcy because their income was well above the state median and a number of their scheduled expenses were excessive or impermissible. (Docket No. 13). The McGowans argued in response that 1) they have no disposable income; 2) their scheduled expenses are actually paid regardless of whether or not such expenses are proper; and 3) their financial difficulty did not arise from excessive spending but rather a failed business venture. (Docket No. 16, Objection of Debtors; Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 2).

On April 19, 2010, the day before the scheduled evidentiary hearing, and shortly before they filed the stipulations, the McGowans amended their Schedule J to increase their monthly expenses from $12,007 to $14,089. This included an increase in monthly mortgage payments from $2,210 to $3,371 based on a recalculation of the monthly payment over the 30-year term of the mortgage rather than scheduling the payment option they were using at the time they filed their petition, which "was inadequate to keep up with the accrual of interest." (Appellant Br. at 10-11). They also amended their Statement of Intention to indicate that they would keep their home and reaffirm the debt on their residence. (Docket No. 38, p. 3-5 and 6).[8]

The bankruptcy court conducted an evidentiary hearing on April 20 and 21, 2010. (Docket No. 40). At the close of the United States Trustee's case, the McGowans orally moved for summary judgment requesting a denial of the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, asserting that they had "passed" the means test, and therefore their case could not be dismissed solely upon the ability to repay under § 707(b)(3)(B). (Transcript at 98-100). The bankruptcy court denied the motion for summary judgment at the hearing. (Transcript at 105).

After considering the merits of the United States Trustee's motion, the bankruptcy court concluded the McGowans' bankruptcy filing was an abuse "based on the totality of the circumstances of the debtors' financial situation" under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(b), and it dismissed the McGowans' chapter 7 bankruptcy petition. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 11).

[8] The amendments were filed by the McGowans on April 19, 2010 at 16:54:31. (Docket No. 38). The stipulations between the parties were filed by the McGowans about an hour and fifteen minutes later on April 19, 2010 at 18:13:45. (Docket No.40). The McGowans stipulated to their expenses as originally scheduled, and so it is unclear why they would also amend those same expenses. Since the amendments were filed in the late afternoon the day before the trial, the United States Trustee could only verify their accuracy through examining the McGowans at trial.

The bankruptcy court based its decision on four findings of fact. First, the McGowans had sufficient financial resources to pay back something to their creditors on the $219,523 in credit card and other unsecured debt they owe. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p.10). Second, the bankruptcy court found the McGowans could forego college expenses for their adult children, which would allow them to repay their debts. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 7). Third, it found that the McGowans should not pay their adult children's non-dischargeable, unsecured student loan payments because that amounted to preferential treatment over other general unsecured debts. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 8). Finally, the bankruptcy court noted the last-minute amendment to Schedule J increased the McGowans' expenses by $2,000, in part due to a $1,161 increase in their scheduled mortgage payments. [9] (Mem. Op., Addendum p. 8-9). Given that Mr. McGowan testified that he had not made any mortgage payments since September 2009, the bankruptcy court found there was no need to presume they would need to pay a higher mortgage expense. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 8-9; Transcript at 21).

The bankruptcy court also found the McGowans had not reduced their expenses and that the timing of their amended Schedule J and Statement of Intention was suspect. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 10). The court recounted the McGowans' unwillingness to make the sacrifices required to obtain bankruptcy relief. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 10).

[9] In addition, the McGowans added a second mortgage in the amount of $150 on Amended Schedule J. (Docket No. 38, p. 4 Schedule J).

In particular, the bankruptcy court found that the McGowans:

- Wanted to pay themselves back for the money they borrowed from their retirement account rather than repay their lawful creditors; (See e.g., Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 8);
- Wanted to volunteer to pay over $30,000 a year for their adult children's college tuition, books, and college food expenses, while discharging nearly $150,000 in credit card debt (Mem. Op., Addendum p. 10);[10]
- Wanted to choose the unsecured creditors they would pay by paying back their children's student loans; (Mem. Op., Addendum p. 10);
- Wanted to engage in gamesmanship by filing an Amended Schedule J along with their Amended Statement of Intention on the eve of trial asserting a change of intent indicating they now wanted to keep their home. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 10).[11]

The judge also found other factors warranted dismissal, including their eve of trial amendments indicating they suddenly wanted to keep their home and the fact that the originally scheduled mortgage payment was significantly higher than the applicable IRS housing allowance of $1,080 for a household of five. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 9). It concluded that their stable above-median income, excessive expenses attributable to their mortgage, childrens' college

[10] This breaks down to a $626 monthly student loan payment, $2,490 in direct tuition payments, plus $220 in monthly book payments.

[11] On May 12, 2010 an unopposed motion of the mortgage holder from relief from the bankruptcy stay was granted thereby allowing the mortgage holder to proceed with state court remedies including foreclosure upon the McGowans' home. (Docket No. 51).

related costs, student loan repayments, and retirement payments meant that granting the McGowans a chapter 7 discharge would be an abuse. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 10).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. The bankruptcy court decision dismissing the McGowans' chapter 7 bankruptcy filing under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) for abuse should be affirmed for two reasons. First, it did not err in considering the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss under § 707(b)(3)(B), even though the presumption of abuse did not arise under § 707(b)(2). Second, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it found that granting the McGowans a chapter 7 discharge of their debts would constitute an abuse under the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation.

2. As the McGowans concede, most courts agree that whenever a debtor "passes" the § 707(b)(2) means test, meaning that the presumption of abuse does not arise or is rebutted, their case can still be dismissed under § 707(b)(3), which provides that a bankruptcy court "shall consider" if the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation nevertheless shows abuse. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) (emphasis added). This majority view is not surprising, or wrong, given § 707(b)(3)(B) says exactly that. Since the language of the statute is clear on its face, the McGowans' contrary interpretation relying solely on the legislative history is unpersuasive. The bankruptcy court considered the motion to dismiss consistently with the two-step process prescribed in § 707(b).

3. Nor did the bankruptcy court clearly err in its required § 707(b)(3)(B) analysis. The bankruptcy court applied the factors adopted by the Sixth Circuit in In re Krohn, 886 F. 2d 123 (6th Cir. 1989) that were relevant to totality of the circumstances of the McGowan's financial situation. These included the stability of their employment, amount of their income, and the nature and amount of their expenses. Specifically, the McGowans have a stable income of over $100,000 per year. They live in a ten-room, 4,300 square foot, house on almost 2/3 of an acre in Shaker Heights. They own three cars, a time-share in Florida, and wish to continue to provide generously for their adult children attending college. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding those expenses could be reduced to create disposable income that could be used to repay creditors. Nor did the court act precipitously. Rather, it reviewed the evidence presented over a two-day evidentiary trial. As such, the court below did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the McGowan's chapter 7 case under § 707(b)(3)(B).

ARGUMENT

I. § 707(b)(3) Requires Bankruptcy Courts to Consider Dismissal for Abuse Even if the Debtors "Pass" the Means Test and the Presumption of Abuse Under § 707(b)(2) Does Not Arise or Is Rebutted.

Congress enacted the sweeping bankruptcy reform of 2005 to make sure that debtors would pay back to their creditors everything that they reasonably could. In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 720 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006). The means test, as set forth in § 707(b)(2), plays a central role in achieving that goal. It is not, however, the only change in the 2005 Act designed to identify debtors able to pay back at least some of their debts. Thus it is not the only reform that affects this case. Congress also lowered the standard for dismissal of a chapter 7 case from "substantial abuse" to "abuse." See e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) (stating that cases are dismissed for "abuse"); Morse v. Rudler (In re Rudler), 576 F.3d 37, 40 (1st Cir. 2009) (stating that the 2005 Act "relaxed the standard for dismissing a case as abusive."). In addition, the 2005 Act removed the presumption against abuse in favor of the debtor, further indicating Congress enacted a comprehensive effort to make sure debtors repaid their creditors to the extent possible. See, e.g., supra, p. 6.

In order to implement all these changes, the 2005 Act adopted a two-step process to review chapter 7 consumer cases for abuse. The means test is the first step. Ross-Tousey v. Neary (In re Ross-Tousey), 549 F.3d 1148, 1151 (7th Cir. 2008) ("The purpose of the means test is to distinguish between debtors who can repay a portion of their debts and debtors who cannot."). It limits presumption of abuse to those above-median-income chapter 7 debtors who have disposable income greater than a cut-off amount set in § 707(b)(2).[12] The standard and actual expenses which a debtor may claim are detailed in § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv).

It is undisputed that the McGowans calculated their means test in such a way that their disposable income is lower than the minimum amount for a presumption of abuse. The means test, however, does not determine the outcome of their case. "Permitting a debtor to take the deduction – even where that deduction puts the debtor's current monthly income below the presumptive abuse threshold – does not insulate his case from dismissal." Ross-Tousey, 549 F.3d at 1151. It only establishes that the presumption of abuse does not arise. Id. "The statute should not be construed to give the means test more teeth, by way of interpreting the outcome of the means test to be a conclusion." In re Barnett, No. 06-62414, 2007 WL 4510277, at *4 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Dec. 18, 2007).

(1) After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee..., may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts, or, with the debtor's consent, convert such a case to a case under chapter 11 or 13 of this title if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter....

> (2)(A)(I) In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter, the court shall presume abuse exists if the debtor's current monthly income reduced by the amounts determined under clauses (ii), (iii), and (iv), and multiplied by 60 is not less than the lesser of -

Therefore, if the presumption of abuse does not arise or is rebutted, a court must proceed to the second step of the § 707(b) analysis. A chapter 7 case may still be dismissed based upon either bad faith or the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial circumstances. Section 707(b)(3) provides:

> (II) $10,950.

11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). These amounts were in effect as of the date the McGowans filed their bankruptcy case. Adjustments to the amounts took effect for cases filed on or after April 1, 2010.

> In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter in a case in which the presumption in subparagraph (A)(I) does not arise or is rebutted, the court shall consider -

> > (B) [whether] the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse.

11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) (emphasis added).

Since the language of § 707(b) is unambiguous, this Court should apply the plain meaning of the text. Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 534 (2004). Under § 707(b)(3), a bankruptcy court "shall" consider the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation, eliminating any discretion to skip the second part of the analysis. "[Section] 707(b)(3) is a separate test, meant to provide courts with discretion to deem a case abusive, even if the presumption of abuse does not arise under the means test or is rebutted." United States Trustee v. Hilmes (In re Hilmes), – B.R. – , No. 4:09-CV-732-Y, 2010 WL 3292807, at *10 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 19, 2010); accord 6 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 707.05[3][b] (15th ed. 2009) (stating that a bankruptcy court "must" consider bad faith and totality of the financial circumstances if a presumption of abuse does not arise or has been rebutted). The McGowans' argument that passing the means test precludes further review is also inconsistent with the language of § 707(b)(3), which requires a bankruptcy court to consider the "totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation." Ross-Tousey, 549 F. 3d at 1162 (stating that the 707(b)(3)(B) analysis "can take into consideration a debtor's actual income and expenses").

The McGowans rely primarily on individual statements from the legislative history, rather than the statutory language, to support their theory that "passing" the means test entitled them to a discharge. Their authority has little or no weight. Appellants' Br. at 14-17; Bath Iron Works Corp. v. Director, Office of Workers' Compensation Programs, 506 U.S. 153, 166 (1993) ("[W]hen carefully read, we find the text of the statute unambiguous on the point at issue; accordingly, we give no weight to a single reference by a single Senator during floor debate in the Senate.").

This two-step review also recognizes the difference between a dismissal based upon a presumption of abuse under the means test in § 707(b)(2) and the totality of the financial situation analysis in § 707(b)(3)(B). The first provides a mechanical, objective test based upon six month historical earnings. In re Henebury, 361 B.R. 595, 603 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007) (noting means test is an "easily applied formula for determining" when a case is abusive). In contrast, § 707(b)(3)(B) is a subjective test providing for court consideration of all aspects of the debtor's finances, including current and known future income and expenses. In re Rudler, 576 F.3d 37, 51; Reed v. Anderson (In re Reed), 422 B.R. 214, 233 (C.D. Ca. 2009) (explaining § 707(b)(3) is an individualized test requiring courts to review if granting a chapter 7 discharge is warranted.)

As the McGowans have conceded, the two-step process to review cases for abuse is consistent with the holdings of the vast majority of cases. (Transcript at 100). In re Sullivan is typical: "the plain language of § 707(b)(3) . . . compels a conclusion that a court must consider a debtor's actual debt-paying ability in ruling on a motion to dismiss based on abuse where the presumption does not arise or is rebutted." In re Sullivan, 370 B.R. 314, 321 (Bankr. D. Mont. 2007) (quoting In re Sorrell, 359 B.R. 167 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2007)). See also In re Pak, 343 B.R. 239, 243 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006) ("It would be counterintuitive to construe 'totality of the circumstances' [in § 707(b)(3)] to exclude a consideration of the debtor's ability to pay."); In re

Lenton, 358 B.R. 651, 663 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006). The bankruptcy courts in the Northern District of Ohio agree with this conclusion. In re Barnett, 2007 WL 4510277 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio); In re Edighoffer, 375 B.R. 789 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007); In re Kaminski, 387 B.R. 190 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2008); In re Haar, 360 B.R. 759 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007); In re Mestemaker, 359 B.R. 849 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007); In re Simmons, 357 B.R. 480 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2006) (noting where presumption of abuse does not arise under the § 707(b)(2) ability to repay standard, a § 707(b)(3) totality of the circumstances analysis shall be considered).

Therefore the McGowans are incorrect when they argue that the bankruptcy court should not have reviewed their case for abuse based on the totality of their financial situation, even though they "passed" the means test. Ross-Tousey, 549 F.3d at 1161-62. These two analyses are distinct. The bankruptcy court did not err in conducting an analysis under § 707(b)(3)(B), and its decision should be affirmed.

II. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Dismissing the McGowan's Case under the Totality of the Financial Situation Test of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B).

A. Under the 2005 Act and Sixth Circuit Law, Ability to Pay Creditors Can Be Sufficient Grounds for Dismissing A Chapter 7 Case as Abusive.

In cases where the presumption of abuse does not arise or is rebutted, as here, § 707(b)(3) allows for a dismissal for abuse under two circumstances: upon a finding of "bad faith" under § 707(b)(3)(A) or due to the debtor's financial condition under § 707(b)(3)(B). These subsections are distinct from one another and provide separate and independent grounds for dismissal. In re Ross-Tousey, 549 F. 3d at 1162; In re Booker, 399 B.R. 662, 667 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2009). In the McGowans' case, the United States Trustee sought a dismissal based on their financial condition under § 707(b)(3)(B), and so bad faith, dishonesty, or other misconduct are irrelevant in this case.

In the Sixth Circuit, the leading cases decided under the former "substantial abuse" standard are In re Krohn and In re Behlke, which predicated dismissal either for lack of honesty or want of need, i.e. ability to pay. In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126; In re Behlke, 358 F.3d 433. Their rationale also applies to the current, lower, abuse standard so that bankruptcy courts in this circuit have continued to follow Krohn and Behlke. See e.g., In re Stewart, 383 B.R. 429 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2008); In re Wright, 364 B.R. 640, 643 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007); In re Edighoffer, 375 B.R. 789 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007); In re Mestemaker, 359 B.R. 849 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio, 2007).

Krohn listed several non-exclusive factors used to determine whether a case should be dismissed under the former § 707(b). Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126. The primary factor was a debtor's ability to repay his debts. Id. Other factors included whether the debtor has a stable source of future income, his eligibility for chapter 13 relief, the availability of state law and private negotiations to remedy his finances, and whether his expenses may be reasonably reduced. Id. at 126-27. However, a debtor's clear ability to pay would be sufficient grounds for dismissal in and of itself. Id. at 126; See also Behlke, 358 F.3d at 434-35 (stating that ability to pay standing alone could justify dismissal).

Notwithstanding the clear language of the statute and case law, the McGowans argue that a dismissal based upon the totality of the financial situation test under § 707(b)(3)(B) requires something more than an ability to repay, such as bad faith or some additional type of misconduct. See Appellants' Br. at 20-23. In support, the McGowans rely on the minority view set forth in In re Nockerts, 357 B.R. 497 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2006). However, the Nockerts decision is "of little persuasive value." Barnett, 2006 WL 4510277, at *4.

First, Nockerts was decided under the pre-2005 Act standard for dismissal in the Eastern District of Wisconsin, which was not in accord with Sixth Circuit law. In re Haar, 373 B.R. 493, 499 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007); In re Augenstein, No. 06-13867, 2007 WL 6374910, at *5 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio June 14, 2007). In the Sixth Circuit, ability to pay can be the sole basis for a finding of abuse, whereas the Nockerts court stated that more than ability to pay is required. Compare In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (stating that ability to pay "alone may be sufficient to warrant dismissal") with Nockerts, 357 B.R. at 507 (stating that a case should not be dismissed if the only indicia of abuse is ability to pay).

The McGowans improperly attempt to blur the line between bad faith and financial circumstances in an attempt to resurrect the pre-BAPCPA totality of all the circumstances standard for dismissal. See, e.g., In re Henebury, 361 B.R. 607 (by bifurcating § 707(b)(3)(A) and (B), "the debtor's total financial situation as a measure of ability to pay, and bad faith are separate and sufficient grounds for dismissal. Either ability to pay or bad conduct in connection with the bankruptcy will warrant dismissal for abuse under § 707(b)(3)."). The 2005 Act made these two inquiries – bad faith and financial situation – "distinct." In re Barnett, 2007 WL 4510277, at *3. All that is required for dismissal is strong evidence that the McGowans are able to repay their creditors. Their financial information demonstrates such an ability. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing their case.

B. The Totality of the McGowan's Financial Situation Shows Their Ability to Repay Their Creditors.

In the McGowans' case, the bankruptcy court carefully reviewed their financial circumstances, especially their income and expenses, before determining they could repay their creditors, at least in part, and that therefore their case should be dismissed under § 707(b)(3)(B). (See Mem. Op, Addendum, p. 10 (noting debtors with higher income exceeding $100,000 a year should be able to repay some debt and McGowans earn over $130,000 and have expenses that could be eliminated or significantly reduced)).

1. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that the McGowans' joint annual income of $130,000 and other assets indicate an ability to repay creditors.

The higher a debtor's income, the more likely it is that the case is abusive. In re Wadsworth, 383 B.R. 330, 333 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007) ("Under any measure, a debtor, having a stable annual salary of almost $100,000.00, will be hard pressed to establish that they do not have the ability to pay some of their unsecured debt . . . ."); See also In re Durczynski, 405 B.R. 880 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2009) (finding the Debtors enjoyed a stable annual income in excess of $100,000 and devoted a significant portion of their income on unnecessary expenses); See In re Brenneman, 397 B.R. 866 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2008). The McGowans enjoy a gross income of $130,000 per year. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 2).

The bankruptcy court then considered how much of the McGowans' income could be considered disposable and thus available to their creditors. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 10). "Disposable income is defined as that income received by a debtor which is not reasonably necessary to be expended for the maintenance or support of a debtor or a dependent of the debtor." In re Zuccarell, 373 B.R. 508, 511 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007) (citation omitted); see also In re Srikantia, 417 B.R. 505 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2009). The bankruptcy court was not required to calculate how much disposable income the McGowans could repay their creditors; the evidence simply needed to give it "the firm and distinct feeling that Debtor has, indeed, some disposable income."[13] See In re Edighoffer, 375 B.R. at 799 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007). The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in concluding the McGowans had disposable income. It was enough that the McGowans had stable income exceeding $130,000 a year and planned to keep a house valued at $380,000. See In re Felske, 385 B.R. 649 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2008) (case dismissed where debtors had higher income and assets including house valued at $390,000).

[13] The United States Trustee's witness, Mr. Weaver, testified that based upon the McGowans' originally scheduled expenses, such modifications would leave the McGowans with $3,057.04 of monthly disposable income. (Transcript at 61). Mr. Weaver further testified that based upon the amendments to the scheduled expenses, modifications to the amended expenses would leave the Appellants with $2,783.04 of monthly excess income. (Transcript at 63). The McGowans never refuted this evidence.

2. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that the McGowans' expenses could be reduced to allow them to repay their creditors.

If a bankruptcy court finds that expenses are unnecessary or excessive and may be reduced to create disposable income that could be used to repay creditors, it may dismiss under § 707(b)(3)(B). In determining the reasonableness of a debtor's expenses, the overarching goal is to establish a "fair division of a debtor's future income between his creditors and himself. A debtor should not be permitted to live extravagantly at his creditors' expense. However, it should be up to the debtor to decide how he spends his share once the appropriate allotment has been made." In re Lubinski, No. 07-31230, 2008 WL 2388127, at *6 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio June 6, 2008) (quoting In re Mars, 340 B.R. 844 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2006)).

Abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) may be found when a debtor attempts to continue paying excessive expenses without trying to repay unsecured creditors. In re Harter, 397 B.R. 860 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2008) (debtor with high household income and high expenses subject to dismissal of case). When evaluating a debtor's expenses, a bankruptcy court may consider less expensive alternatives and "make downward adjustments where necessary." In re Felske, 385

B.R. at 655. One benchmark of an allowable expense is one that is "frugal." In re Burge, 377 B.R. 573, 578 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007).

The Court properly scrutinized the McGowans expenses. It did not clearly err in concluding mortgage payments originally scheduled in the amount of $2,210, then increased to $3,371, were excessive, especially since the McGowans had not made any payments since September, 2009. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 9). In re Violanti, 397 B.R. 852 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2008) (finding debtors earning over $100,000 with $2,500 housing expense could repay portion of debt if adjusted budget). It did not commit clear error when it determined that the McGowans' $433 monthly 401k loan repayment should be included as disposable income available to their creditors because it would be unfair to allow them to fund their own retirement while paying their creditors less than a 100% dividend. Behlke, 358 F.3d at 436; In re Glenn, 345 B.R. 831, 836 (Bankr, N.D. Ohio 2006).

A large portion of the McGowans' expenses relate to college costs of their two adult children. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 7). Their desire to help their children obtain college degrees is understandable, but the majority of courts hold that parents may not assist their adult children at the expense of their unsecured creditors. In re Baker, 400 B.R. 594, 598 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2009) ("Educational expenses for adult children are discretionary, and are not expenses that should be foisted upon a debtor's prepetition creditors.") (citation omitted); In re Hess, No. 07-31689, 2007 WL 3028422, at *3 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Oct. 15, 2007) (citing cases); In re Pfahler, No. 07-30044, 2007 WL 2156401, at *2 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio July 26, 2007) (same). The Court properly found college tuition totaling $2,450, books totaling $220, and other school related expenses were not appropriate expenditures for debtors seeking a chapter 7 discharge of debts. (Mem. Op., Addendum, p. 7).

Furthermore, debtors may not pay student loan obligations ahead of other unsecured creditors. In re Hester, 330 B.R. 809, 813 (Bankr. M.D. Florida 2005); In re Wessels, 311 B.R. 851, 855 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 2005); In re Tucker, 150 B.R. 203, 204-05 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1992). Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in deciding that the McGowans should devote the $626 per month they were paying for the children's unsecured student loan debt to repaying their creditors.

The McGowans argue that the facts in their case show they do not have the ability to pay. (Appellants' Br. at 24). They assume, without legal authority, that scheduled actual expenses may not be reviewed for reasonableness or excessiveness by the bankruptcy court. For instance, the McGowans contend monthly mortgage payments, as amended, of $3,371 are a proper expense. Yet they have not made a mortgage payment in more than eight months, and they are currently only obligated to pay $2,210 per month. Id. at 10-11. They rely on the means test calculations to support these mortgage payments. Id. at 24. But means test expense allowances are not relevant under a § 707(b)(3)(B) legal analysis. In re Booker, 399 B.R. 666 (holding that a court's 707(b)(3)(B) analysis is not "bound by the itemization of expenses which the debtors are entitled to deduct from that current monthly income pursuant to § 707(b)(2)"); accord Ross-Tousey, 549 F. 3d at 1161-62; Rudler, 576 F. 3d at 51.

The McGowans have not disputed any of the bankruptcy court's factual findings. They have not contested the legal basis for the bankruptcy court's findings regarding the expenses it found to be excessive or impermissible. (Appellants' Br. at 24-28). Rather, they focus on arguments which are only relevant to a motion to dismiss brought under the means test or on the basis of bad faith under § 707(b)(3)(A). Such arguments are irrelevant in this appeal. The bankruptcy court did not err in rejecting them.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered below granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) and dismissing Mr. and Mrs. McGowans' chapter 7 bankruptcy case.

APPELLANT'S BRIEF ON APPEAL

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

The United States Trustee sought dismissal of this Debtor's chapter 7 case on two alternative grounds, (a) because the Debtor failed § 707(b)(2)'s means test and, (b) presuming the Debtor passed the means test, because the debtor's case merited dismissal under § 707(b)(3)(B)'s totality of the circumstances test. Given this, the issues presented to this Court for determination are whether the court below:

1. erred by ruling as a matter of law that the Debtor could claim an "automobile ownership expense" for debt financing that took the Debtor outside § 707(b)(2)'s statutory means test even though this Debtor had no "automobile ownership expense" because he owned his car debt-free; or, if the Debtor passed the means test,

2. erred by relying upon a statutory presumption against dismissing bankruptcy cases under § 707(b)'s "totality of the circumstances" test when Congress had repealed that statutory presumption in 2005?

Should this Court determine the court below erred on either ground, this Court should reverse and remand for adjudication of the United States Trustee's claims on their merits.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Michigan had jurisdiction over the underlying case, initiated by John D. McIvor, under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b) and 1334(a). This appeal is taken from a final order that the bankruptcy court entered on November 15, 2006, denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss this Debtor's chapter 7 bankruptcy case. The United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on November 22, 2006.[1] This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF APPLICABLE STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

In an appeal taken from a bankruptcy court order, a district court reviews the bankruptcy court's findings of fact under the clearly erroneous standard but reviews de novo the bankruptcy court's conclusions of law. In re Isaacman, 26 F.3d. 629, 631(6th Cir. 1994) (Citing In re Zick, 931

[1] Congress has authorized the United States Attorney General to appoint 21 United States trustees, each to serve in a specific geographic region of the United States. See generally 28 U.S.C. § 581 et seq. (establishing the United States Trustee Program). The United States trustees are senior officials of the Department of Justice. Id. The United States trustees "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within his or her region through the exercise of a range of oversight responsibilities. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3). See generally Morganstern v. Revco D.S. Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990) (explaining that United States trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law.). United States trustees may raise, appear, and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under Title 11. 11 U.S.C. § 307; see also In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d at 499-500 (upholding broad appellate standing of United States trustees).

F.2d 1124, 1126 (6th Cir.1991)). Whether the Bankruptcy court properly allowed the Debtor to deduct an ownership expense under the means test when he had no loan or lease payment is a question of law and is therefore subject to de novo review. Whether the bankruptcy court improperly applied a statutory presumption against dismissing the debtor's case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) that Congress repealed in 2005 is also question of law subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On March 6, 2006, John D. McIvor (the "Debtor") filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code.[2] The United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), asserting that it would be an abuse of chapter 7 to grant the Debtor a discharge.

The bankruptcy court denied the motion. The United States Trustee then timely filed this appeal.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

1. Statutory Background

On October 17, 2005, most provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub.L. 109-8, 119 Stat. 27 (April 20, 2005) (the "BAPCPA") took effect, implementing changes to the Bankruptcy Code. As part of this effort, Congress significantly amended § 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, which governs dismissal of chapter 7 bankruptcy cases. Congress enacted the § 707(b) amendments to curb bankruptcy abuse by, inter alia, dismissing cases filed by chapter 7 debtors seeking to have their debts discharged despite having the ability to repay their creditors. See 151 Cong. Rec. S1856 (Mar. 1, 2005) (statement of Sen. Charles Grassley). Sen.

[2] As used herein, the term "Bankruptcy Code" refers to 11 U.S.C. §§ 101 - 1529, et seq.

Grassley explained that the purpose behind the BAPCPA amendments, "is this simple: if repayment is possible, then [a debtor] will be channeled into chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code which requires people to repay a portion of their debt. . . ." Id.

As it existed prior to BAPCPA, § 707(b) only authorized dismissal based on a finding that allowing the debtor relief constituted a "substantial abuse" of chapter 7. Further, § 707(b) prior to its amendment by BAPCPA required courts to presume that a debtor was entitled to relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 707(b) now authorizes dismissal where the court finds that the granting of relief would be an "abuse" of chapter 7. Moreover, BAPCPA repealed the former presumption in favor of granting a discharge to the debtor in § 707(b) and replaced it with a new presumption: it is now presumed that a case is an "abuse" of chapter 7 if a detailed mathematical formula set out in the statute (the "means test") yields an amount of monthly disposable income that is above a threshold amount specified in the statute.

The means test uses a series of calculations to determine whether the § 707(b)(2) presumption of abuse arises based on the debtor's ability to pay. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A). Specifically, the means test calculates a debtor's current monthly income ("CMI"), as defined in 11 U.S.C. §101(10A), based on the debtor's income for the six calendar months preceding the bankruptcy filing. If the debtor's[3] annualized CMI falls below the applicable state median family income, the safe harbor provision of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(7) applies, and the presumption of abuse will not arise. If the debtor's CMI is above the applicable state median family income, the debtor deducts certain standard and actual expenses to calculate his or her monthly disposable income. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is less than $100 per month (or $6,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does not arise. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is equal to or exceeds $167 per month (or $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse arises. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is between $100 and $167 per month, the presumption of abuse arises if that amount, over 60 months, is sufficient to pay 25% of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured debt.

[3] 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(7) mandates that the CMI of the debtor and the debtor's spouse, regardless whether the spouse is filing bankruptcy, are used to determine whether the safe harbor provision of § 707(b)(7) applies. In this case the debtor is not married.

Each debtor with primarily consumer debts is required to file, in conjunction with their bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs, a Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation, Official Form B22A (the "Means Test Form"). 11 U.S.C. § 521 and § 707(b)(2)(C). In Chapter 7 cases the main purpose of the Means Test Form[4] is to calculate monthly disposable income (ability to pay) following the formula set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), and determine whether the presumption of abuse arises.

If no presumption of abuse arises under § 707(b)(2) based on the means test, or if the presumption is rebutted under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B) by the debtor demonstrating special circumstances that justify income or expense adjustments for which there is no reasonable alternative, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) directs courts to consider whether the case should nonetheless be dismissed as an "abuse" of chapter 7. In particular, the court "shall consider" whether the case was filed in “bad faith,” 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or whether “the totality of the circumstances of the debtor’s financial situation. . . demonstrates abuse,” 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B).

Accordingly, §§ 707(b)(2) and (b)(3) provide distinct and separate bases upon which the court may determine that a chapter 7 case is abusive: first, by presuming the case is an abuse based on the means test, or second, in cases where the presumption does not arise or is rebutted, by finding that the case is an abuse of chapter 7, based upon bad faith or upon the totality of the circumstances of the debtor’s financial situation.

2. Factual Background

On March 6, 2006, the Debtor filed a chapter 7 Petition in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Michigan. B.Ct.Doc. 1. On the Petition, he identified himself as an individual with primarily consumer debts. B.Ct.Doc. 1, pg 1. The Debtor also filed his Means Test Form. B.Ct.Doc. 10. The Debtor’s Means Test Form shows monthly disposable income of $157.66. B.Ct.Doc. 10, Line 50. The Debtor determined that the presumption of abuse did not arise and checked the corresponding box at the top of his Means Test Form. B.Ct.Doc.10, pg. 1.

Relative to his motor vehicle, on line 22 of the Means Test Form, the Debtor included a deduction of $390 for “transportation vehicle operation” expense. This expense amount is taken from the IRS Transportation Standards, Operating Costs and Public Transportation Costs, published by the IRS. On Line 23 of the Means Test Form the Debtor included a deduction of $471 for a “transportation ownership/lease expense” even though he has no ownership or lease payment for his vehicle. This expense amount is taken from the IRS Transportation Standards, Ownership Costs, which are published by the IRS. Thus, the Debtor claimed a total transportation expense for his one vehicle of $861 per month ($471 IRS ownership cost and $390 IRS operating cost).

The United States Trustee recalculated the Debtor's monthly disposable income by eliminating the $471 deduction and instead allowed the Debtor an additional transportation vehicle operating expense of $200 on account of the age of the vehicle (for a total operating expense of $590).[5] The Debtor's monthly disposable income actually totaled $428.66, which when multiplied by 60, substantially exceeds $10,000 and the presumption of abuse therefore arises.

As required by 11 U.S.C. § 521(a), the Debtor also filed, under oath, schedules itemizing his current income ("Schedule I"), his current expenditures ("Schedule J"), and his total unsecured debts ("Schedule F"). B.Ct.Doc. 9. The Debtor's Schedule I listed his total net monthly income as of the Petition date as $3,414.84, B.Ct.Doc. 9, Line 16, and his Schedule J listed total monthly expenditures as $3,206.67. B.Ct.Doc. 9, Line 19. The Debtor attested on Schedule J that he has actual monthly net income of $208.17. B.Ct.Doc., Line 20.c. He scheduled $51,536.01 in unsecured nonpriority claims that are subject to Chapter 7 discharge. B.Ct.Doc. 9, Schedule F.

Within 10 days of the meeting of creditors as required by 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1)(A), the United States Trustee filed his statement indicating that the case was presumed to be an abuse. Within 30 days as required by 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(2), the United States Trustee filed his motion to dismiss the case, based in part upon the presumption in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

[5] The Debtor's vehicle is a 1995 Dodge Ram pick up truck. B.Ct.Doc. 9, Schedule B, Line 25. The United States Trustee allows an additional $200 operating expense under the means test, based on the Internal Revenue Manual which allows such an expense for vehicles six years or older or with more than 75,000 miles. See Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5, (entitled Collecting Process), Chapter 8, § 5.8.5.5.2, Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses, which may be found at the IRS website at http://www/irs/gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html.

In addition to the claim under § 707(b)(2) based upon the presumption of abuse under the means test, the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss also contained a claim under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3), that the bankruptcy filing is an abuse based on the totality of the circumstances of the Debtor's financial situation. Debtor's Schedules I and J demonstrate actual monthly net income of $208.17. Payments of this amount in a Chapter 13 plan would total $12,490 over the 60 month life of the plan, constituting a meaningful repayment to creditors.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The court below erred in denying the Untied States Trustee's motion to dismiss this debtor's bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) and under § 707(b)(3)(B). Under § 707(b)(2), a debtor's case is presumed abusive as a matter of law and must be dismissed absent special circumstances if the debtor fails § 707(b)(2)'s "means test." Here the Debtor would have failed the means test but for the bankruptcy court's legal ruling that the Debtor could claim an "automobile ownership expense" for debt financing even though the debtor had no "automobile ownership expense" because he owned his car debt-free. Whether debtors can take phantom deductions under Congress' 2005 amendment to § 707 is an important question of law that arises relatively frequently in chapter 7 bankruptcy cases. This Court is one of the first appellate courts to consider it.

The bankruptcy court erred as a matter of law by misinterpreting the automobile expense debt financing allowance. In its application of the means test, the bankruptcy court interpreted § 707(b)(2) to allow the Debtor to subtract expenses that he does not incur on a monthly basis. Even though the Debtor does not make monthly payments to purchase or lease a car, the bankruptcy court ruled that in addition to a monthly car operating expense of $390, the Debtor also was entitled to subtract a monthly expense of $471 in calculating his monthly disposable income. This additional "imaginary" expense correspondingly reduced the Debtor's monthly disposable income under the means test. Allowing the Debtor to subtract ownership costs even though he has no applicable vehicle ownership expenses stands the means test on its head, eliminating disposable income otherwise reported on Official Form B22A of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure and available to repay his creditors.

After disallowing an expense in this expense category that the Debtor does not actually incur, the Debtor's monthly disposable income under the means test is $428.66, which is well above the $166.67 threshold amount, and the presumption of abuse arises. This case must therefore be remanded to the bankruptcy court for further evidentiary proceedings on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss in accordance with § 707(b)(2), including allowing the debtor an opportunity to rebut the presumption by demonstrating that special circumstances that justify an income or expense adjustment and for which there is no reasonable alternative exist in this case which militate against dismissal.[6]

In addition, the bankruptcy court erred by determining that the Debtor's filing was not an abuse based on the "totality of the circumstances" under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) because the bankruptcy court improperly applied a presumption in favor of the Debtor that Congress had repealed in 2005. Thus, the bankruptcy court must be reversed and the case remanded to the [6] It is premature to address the merits of a special circumstances rebuttal argument. However, some bankruptcy courts have ruled that extraordinary transportation expenses can constitute special circumstances that justify an expense adjustment that rebuts the presumption of abuse, while other courts would not consider these type of expense adjustments to qualify as special circumstances. Compare In re Pederson, 2006 WL 3000104, at *3-4 (Bankr. bankruptcy court for consideration of the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) based on the totality of the circumstances without application of any presumption in Debtor's favor.

ARGUMENT

I. THIS DEBTOR MAY NOT DEDUCT A MONTHLY CAR LOAN OR LEASE EXPENSE UNDER 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) BECAUSE HE HAS NO MONTHLY LOAN OR LEASE PAYMENT OBLIGATION.

On Line 23 of his Official Form B22A, which is an official form of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, the Debtor claimed an allowance for the IRS Local Standard referred to as vehicle ownership cost, even though he owns his vehicle free and clear of liens. In denying the United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss, the bankruptcy court allowed the Debtor to reduce his current monthly income ("CMI") by the amount of the vehicle ownership expense for one vehicle, $471, even though he does not have a monthly payment obligation associated with the vehicle. Because this holding is contrary to the plain language and legislative intent of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), it must be reversed.

A. The Plain Language of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) Limits the IRS Local Standards, Including the Local Standard referred to as Vehicle Ownership Cost, to Debtors for Whom the Expense is "Applicable".

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service. . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). When the language of a statute is plain, as it is here, "the sole function of the courts – at least where the disposition required by the text is not absurd – is to enforce it according to its terms." e.g., Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 534 (2004). (Citations omitted.) See also In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) (citing United States v. Ron Pair Enterprises, Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 242 (1989) (plain language of the statute controls, unless a literal reading of the statute is contrary to the intention of the drafters).

The plain language of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) specifically provides a two step process for bankruptcy courts to employ before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses. First, the expense itself must be applicable to the debtor. Second, if the expense is applicable to the debtor, then the specified amount for the debtor's locale is selected from the IRS Local Standards.

The Court in In re Wiggs, __ B.R. __, 2006 WL 2246432 (Bankr.N.D.Ill. 2006), examined § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as it applies in the context of § 1325 of the Bankruptcy Code and concluded that an ownership expense for the debtor's vehicle is not allowed when the debtor owns the vehicle free and clear. The Wiggs court determined that the statute is "clear and unambiguous," finding that the "term 'applicable' modifies the amounts specified to limit the expenses to only those that apply." In re Wiggs, 2006 WL 2246432 at *2. Thus, the debtors in Wiggs were not allowed to include the standard ownership expense for transportation ownership when they did not have a payment on the vehicle. Id. at *3. Accord, In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 904 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006).[7] [7] Demonica is relied on by the bankruptcy court in In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414 (Bankr.D.Del. 2006), a case that is quoted at length and relied upon by the bankruptcy court in its November 15, 2006 Order. The Fowler court misconstrues In re Demonica. In fact, In re Demonica like the In re Biggs decision, held that a loan or lease payment was required in order to qualify for the IRS Transportation Ownership Cost expense Standard. The In re Demonica Court allowed the debtor to take an expense adjustment because the debtor in that case established that, he actually made payments on the vehicle at issue, even though he did not have a contractual liability on the vehicle loan. In re Demonica, 345 B.R. at 905.

11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is clear and unambiguous. Reading the text of the provision as requiring a loan or lease payment obligation before vehicle ownership costs are deducted is not absurd. Indeed, by giving equal weight to the term "applicable" as it appears in § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), a plain reading of the statute leads to the conclusion that Congress necessarily restricted each of the categories of expense allowances in that section, including the IRS Local Standards for transportation, to those debtors for whom such expenses apply.[8]

B. The Internal Revenue Service's Application of Its Own Local Standard for Vehicle Acquisition, and Interpretive Case Law, Supports the United States Trustee's Reading of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

To determine whether the expense Standards issued by the IRS are applicable, the most logical resource to consult is the source of the expense Standards, the IRS. On page two of its Collection Financial Standards under the heading "Transportation," the IRS provides as follows:

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs . . . The ownership costs provide maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense ... If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car

[8] The plain meaning of the term "applicable" in § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is bolstered by Congress' decision to use the same limiting language in the immediately following section, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II). That section provides that a debtor's monthly expenses "may include, if applicable, the continuation of actual expenses paid by the debtor . . . for care and support of an elderly, chronically ill, or disabled household member or member of the debtor's immediate family . . . ." (Emphasis added.) This provision explicitly provides that in order to qualify for the care or support expense allowance, the debtor must actually incur an expense for the care or support of a qualifying family or household member. Because the term "applicable" is used in these two consecutive subsections of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), it should be given the same meaning, and both should be read to require that the debtor actually incur the type of expense. See, e.g., U.S. v. Honken, 184 F.3d 961, 969 (8th Cir. 1991), citing Smith v. Sullivan, 982 F.2d 308, 314 (8th Cir. 1992) (when the same words are used in different sections of the law, they are to be given the same meaning). That the IRS transportation ownership cost is a specified standardized amount, $471 for the first car, as opposed to the actual expense amount for care or support does not alter the fact that the term "applicable" in both subsections means that the debtor must still have a monthly expense obligation in order to qualify for the expense.

> payment, or no car, the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

See IRS Collection Standards, available at www.irs.gov/individuals/article/0,,id=96543,00.html. Thus, according to the IRS, if the debtor does not have a loan or lease payment obligation, then the Local Standard referred to as vehicle ownership cost is not "applicable." If the debtor's vehicle is subject to a monthly loan or lease payment obligation, however, then in addition to the vehicle "operating cost" expense, the "ownership cost" is also "applicable," and shall be the dollar amount specified by the IRS. Id.

This application of the means test is supported by the weight of bankruptcy court authority. See, e.g., In re Barraza, 346 B.R. 724, 728-29 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006)(debtor not entitled to standard ownership allowance for vehicle without a loan or lease payment); In re McGuire, 342 B.R. 608, 613-14 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2006)(chapter 13 debtors not permitted standard ownership allowance for vehicle owned free and clear of liens); In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 723-24 (Bankr N.D. Tex. 2006)(same). See also, In re Harris, __ B.R. __, 2006 WL 2933891, 3-4 (Bankr. E.D. Okla. 2006); In re Oliver, 350 B.R. 294, 301 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2006); In re Demonica, 345 B.R. at 895 (Bankr.N.D.Ill. 2006)(standard ownership allowance when debtor makes payment on vehicle even if not liable on note). But see, In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414 (Bankr.D.Del. 2006)(debtors may deduct ownership expenses for a vehicle for which they do not make payments); In re Haley, __ B.R. __, 2006 WL 2987947 (Bankr. D.N.H. 2006)(same); In re Farrar-Johnson, __ B.R. __, 2006 WL 2662709 (Bankr. N.D.Ill. 2006)(debtors entitled to deduct IRS Local Standard for housing even though they had no actual housing expense).

In addition to the IRS Collection Financial Standards themselves, the IRS also publishes guidelines, including the Internal Revenue Manual, that support a reading of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) that requires debtors to have an actual loan or lease payment obligation on a vehicle before the Local Standard referred to as ownership cost "applies." Because the IRS is the source of the Local and National Standards referenced in § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), the manner in which the IRS applies its own expense Standards in tax collection is instructive. See, e.g., Hardacre, 338 B.R. at 726 ("Because the Local Standards are issued by the Internal Revenue Service, it is instructive to refer to publications of that organization for guidance as to the types of 'debt payments' that can reduce allowances under the Local Standards.").

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs[.] If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, only the operating cost portion of the transportation standard is used to figure the allowable transportation expense.

Internal Revenue Service Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html, (emphasis added). In addition, Chapter 8 of the Financial Analysis Handbook clarifies that the ownership expense is allowed only for the "purchase and/or lease of a vehicle." Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5, (entitled Collecting Process), Chapter 8, § 5.8.5.5.2, Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses, at page 12 of 16 which may be found at the IRS website at http://www/irs/gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html.

Recent revisions to the Collection Financial Standards also make clear that the "ownership cost" is calculated by the IRS based on the "five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors." See IRS Collection Financial Standard, supra (at section entitled "Recent Revisions"). As such, the "ownership cost" is intended to account for the reasonable expense of financing a vehicle over five years and is inapplicable if a debtor has no such acquisition financing expense.

Accordingly, the IRS Collection Financial Standards and guidance in applying the expense standards published by the IRS make clear that the "ownership cost" portion of the Local Transportation Standards is intended to apply only in situations where the debtor has a monthly vehicle acquisition financing expense, i.e., has a monthly vehicle lease or loan payment. Cf. McGuire, 342 B.R. at 613. ("Thus, if a debtor is not incurring expenses for the purchase or lease of a vehicle, the debtor cannot claim a vehicle ownership expense under the IRS standards.")

C. Congressional Intent Supports Allowing the IRS Local Standard for Vehicle Ownership Costs Only to Debtors Who Have an Applicable Ownership Expense.

Even if the language of the statute is considered ambiguous, which the United States Trustee disputes, then the United States Trustee's interpretation of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is necessary to give effect to the intent of Congress in enacting the means testing provisions of the BAPCPA. See, e.g., Owner-Operator Independent Driver's Ass'n, Inc. v New Prime, Inc., 192 F.3d 778, 785 (8th Cir. 1999)(while court's principal focus must be on the language of the relevant statute, court cannot ignore the broader perspective and may use legislative history to confirm most plausible construction of statute) (citing Wisconsin Public Intervenor v. Mortier, 501 U.S. 597, 610 (1991)).

In enacting the BAPCPA, Congress implemented the "means test to ensure that those who can afford to repay a portion of their unsecured debts are required to do so. . . . The means test takes into account the petitioner's income, debt burden, and allowable living expenses, which can vary significantly according to the debtor's place of residence and particular circumstances." 151 Cong. Rec. S2470, 2005 WL 562943 *S2470 (March 10, 2005)(emphasis added). The bankruptcy court's holding in this case is inconsistent with the legislative intent of the BAPCPA's means test provisions because the Debtor's "particular circumstances" do not include a monthly expense obligation for financing the acquisition of a vehicle.

Congressional intent to remove judicial discretion regarding whether a debtor with ability to pay should be dismissed from chapter 7, is demonstrated by early committee reports on the bankruptcy reform legislation introduced in 2000.[9] This legislative history provides:

> . . . [It] is intended to both remove unequivocally the bankruptcy court's discretion with regard to whether a debtor with ability to pay should be dismissed frm chapter 7, and to restrict as much as possible reliance upon judicial discretion to determine the debtor's ability to pay. Limited judicial discretion remains to deal with the hardship case, but that discretion is not to be abused by lax enforcement of the standards. . . .

146 Cong. Rec. S11683-11729 at 11700 (section by section explanation of HR 2415), Dec. 7, 2000.

By allowing every debtor who owns a car to take the IRS Transportation "ownership cost" expense in addition to the IRS Transportation "operating cost" expense and not limiting this expense allowance to debtors who really incur monthly vehicle acquisition finance expenses, the bankruptcy court has in fact reserved for itself more judicial discretion. Under the bankruptcy court's interpretation that the debtor's real expenses are irrelevant, many of the abuse motions will be considered under § 707(b)(3), where the court has broader discretion and no presumptions apply.

[9] Because there is very little legislative history pertaining to the BAPCPA itself, legislative history pertaining to its substantially similar predecessor is instructive.

This result frustrates the purpose of the means test as a whole and is exactly the opposite of what Congress intended by adding the bright line means test under the BAPCPA. Id.

For all these reasons, the bankruptcy court's determination that § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) authorizes the Debtor to reduce his CMI for a vehicle ownership expense when the debtor has no ownership or lease payment must be reversed, and the case remanded to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings in accordance with the presumption of abuse that arises in this case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

II. ALTERNATIVELY, THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN RELYING UPON A STATUTORY PRESUMPTION AGAINST DISMISSING THE DEBTOR'S CASE UNDER SECTION 707(b)(3)(B) BECAUSE CONGRESS REPEALED THAT PRESUMPTION IN 2005.

11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) provides that the court may dismiss a chapter 7 case "if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter." In turn, § 707(b)(3) provides that:

> In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter in a case in which the presumption in subparagraph (A)(I) of such paragraph does not arise or is rebutted, the court shall consider-
>
> > (B) the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse.

The United States Trustee's motion to dismiss was based, in part, on § 707(b)(3).

The totality of the circumstances of the Debtor's financial situation in this case indicates the Debtor has at least $208 per month in disposable income based upon Schedules I and J, which is more than the $166.67 per month threshold ability to pay amount set forth in § 707(b)(2). B.Ct.Doc. 16, pg. 3. Thus, the Debtor has the ability to repay his debts and his case should have been dismissed as an abuse of chapter 7 under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). The bankruptcy court decided to the contrary and denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss under § 707(b)(3).

First, at the conclusion of the hearing held on October 11, 2006, the court stated:

> While this case was filed after the enactment of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, the Court finds that the standard for evaluating abuse under 707(b)(3) in the new Act is identical to the standard the court used for determining "substantial abuse" under the old Act. Under the old Act, when the trustee challenged a debtor's bankruptcy pursuant to 707(b) on the grounds of substantial abuse, there was a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor. The court finds that the presumption in favor of the debtor still operates under 707(b)(3). The old case law that I would like to cite in support of that proposition is In re Tefertiller, 104 B.R. 513, which simply states that 707(b) provides that there shall be a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor.

B.Ct.Doc. 36, Transcript of October 11, 2006 Hearing, pg. 57 (Emphasis added).

Later, in the November 15, 2006 Order, the bankruptcy court stated the following:

> While the case was filed after the enactment of [the BAPCPA], the Court finds that the standard for evaluating abuse under § 707(b)(3) of the new act is identical to the standard used for determining "substantial abuse" pre-BAPCPA. Under the old Act, section 707(b) provided a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor.

B.Ct.Doc. 37, Opinion Denying Trustee's Motion to Dismiss, pg. 8, (Citation omitted.). [10]

[10] The bankruptcy court subsequently looked to pre-BAPCPA case law, interpreting "substantial abuse" under the former § 707(b) as set forth in In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123 (6th Cir. 1989), to determine the relevant factors for consideration of a totality of the circumstances based abuse claim under Section 707(b)(3). In Krohn, the Sixth Circuit identified five factors to be used in determining whether a case was a "substantial abuse". Those factors include (1) whether the debtor enjoys a stable source of income; (2) whether the debtor is eligible for chapter 13; (3) whether there are state law remedies that may ease the debtor's financial problems; (4) the degree of relief that may be obtained through private negotiations; and (5) whether the debtor's expenses can be significantly reduced without depriving him of adequate food, clothing, shelter and other necessities. Id. at 126-27.

The BAPCPA amendments to § 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code expressly repealed the presumption applied by the bankruptcy court in this case. Section 102(a) of the BAPCPA, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 27 (April 20, 2005), states:

> (a) IN GENERAL. – Section 707 of Title 11, United States Code, is amended – (2) in subsection (b) -- > (B)....
> (III)....
> (ii) by striking the next to the last sentence.

Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 27. Prior to the BAPCPA, the "next to the last sentence" of § 707(b) read "[t]here shall be a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor."[11] (Emphasis added.) By striking this sentence of § 707(b) Congress completely eliminated this presumption from the consideration of § 707 "abuse", including all cases under § 707(b)(3). See, In re Simmons, __ B.R. __, 2006 WL 3782959, *2 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2006). Because the statutory presumption that existed in favor of the Debtor has been legislatively removed, the bankruptcy court erred in applying that presumption in its analysis of the § 707(b)(3) totality of the circumstances claim in this case. e.g., Stone v. I.N.S., 514 U.S. 386, 397 (1995) ("When Congress acts to amend a statute, we presume it intends its amendment to have real and substantial effect.") (citing Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442

[11] Pre-BAPCPA, § 707(b) read, in its entirety:

> After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States Trustee, but not at the request or suggestion of any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts if it finds that the granting of relief would be a substantial abuse of the provisions of this chapter. There shall be a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor. In making a determination whether to dismiss a case under this section, the court may not take into consideration whether a debtor has made, or continues to make, charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3)) to any qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as that term is defined in section 548(d)(4)).

(Emphasis added).

U.S. 330, 339 (1979) (Court must construe statute to give effect, if possible, to every provision)).

Thus, while the bankruptcy court addressed numerous factors in reaching its conclusion that the case is not an abuse based on the totality of the circumstances, it did so after it applied an impermissible presumption in Debtor's favor. The bankruptcy court applied a presumption that the debtor was entitled to chapter 7 relief which had the effect of establishing that the case was not an abuse under § 707(b)(3). For a discussion of presumptions in the law generally, see Eugene Wedoff, Judicial Discretion to Find Abuse Under § 707(b)(3), Am. Bankr. Inst. J., April 2006, at 50-51. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court must be reversed and this case remanded with instructions that if the debtor rebuts the presumption of abuse that applies under § 707(b)(2), the bankruptcy court analyze the United States Trustee's § 707(b)(3) motion to dismiss based on the totality of the circumstances without any presumption in favor of granting relief to the Debtor.

CONCLUSION

For all of these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the November 15, 2006 Order entered by the bankruptcy court denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, and remand this case to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings.

Respectfully submitted,

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The foreclosure crisis that has gripped this country includes thousands of debtors like the McKains in this case – people who are forced to litigate due to the systematic failures of large mortgage servicers who either could not, or would not, keep accurate records of what the debtors owed and how much of that debt they had paid back. The United States has brought a number of actions and otherwise sought to stop mortgage servicers from filing inaccurate proofs of claim and motions for relief from stay in bankruptcy cases that seek to force debtors to pay amounts that they do not owe to ensure that debtors receive the "fresh start" promised by the bankruptcy system. Ocwen is a major player in this unfortunate situation. In re Ocwen Fed. Bank FSB Mort. Serv. Litig., 314 F. Supp. 2d 1376 (Jud. Pan. Mult. Lit. 2004); In re Batiste, 03-01398, 2009 WL 2849077 at *2 (Bankr. E.D. La. July 14, 2009) (expressing concern that Ocwen was "exhibiting a pattern of attempting to collect discharged debts") (leave to appeal granted, No. 9-5454 (E.D. La filed Oct. 2, 2009).

Bankruptcy courts have various tools to handle abuse of process and improper litigation tactics that occur in cases before them. Section 105 of Title 11 stands out because it allows bankruptcy courts to "prevent" abuse of process. Moreover, the court may act sua sponte, if necessary, rather than depending upon the debtor to have the resources to seek recourse in the judicial system. It is this unambiguous statutory power that provides the most effective legal tool for bankruptcy courts to work with mortgage lenders to re-establish industry standards and to work out procedures for correcting both mistakes in current cases and, more importantly, preventing their reoccurrence for debtors who have yet to enter the system.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This Court has before it an issue of interest to the United States: under what circumstances a bankruptcy court may order injunctive relief under 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) against a party that has abused the bankruptcy system. The United States, through the Department of Justice, supervises the administration of chapter 13 bankruptcy cases in this district. 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589. In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002). The United States has a duty to act as the "enforcer of the bankruptcy laws" with a responsibility to "bring proceedings in the bankruptcy courts" if a "particular action taken or proposed to be taken deviated from the standards established by the . . . bankruptcy code." In re A-1 Trash Pickup, Inc., 802 F.2d 774, 775-76 (4th Cir. 1986) (internal citations omitted) (stating that Congress expects the Department of Justice "to intervene whenever particular actions threaten[ ] an abuse of the bankruptcy system or its procedures.").

Therefore, the United States now addresses the bankruptcy court's authority to enter appropriate orders to remedy abusive conduct in the bankruptcy system by mortgage lenders and requests that this Court affirm the bankruptcy court's injunctive order. The United States submits this brief pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 517 (authorizing Department of Justice to "attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States") and 11 U.S.C. § 307 (authorizing United States Trustee to "raise and . . . appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding" under Title 11).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This is a case about a bankruptcy court's ability to protect itself, and the debtors before it, from further abuse of process by a creditor that has a record of "improperly administering loan[s] or attempting to collect fees and costs to which it is not entitled." In re McKain, No. 08-10411, at 3 (Bankr. E.D. La. May 1, 2009) ("Reasons"). The debtors, Cory and Regina Junior McKain, filed for chapter 13 bankruptcy relief to prevent the foreclosure of their home. A few weeks later, Defendant-Appellant Ocwen Loan Servicing, LLP sent them an invoice. The debtors filed an adversary complaint, alleging that the invoice violated the automatic stay that protected them from efforts to collect debts incurred before they filed their bankruptcy petition. 11 U.S.C. § 362. Ocwen did not appear at the first stay violation hearing. Hr'g Tr. 4:9-15 (July 22, 2008). After the bankruptcy court issued an order for Ocwen to appear, Ex. A [Dkt. #18], it conducted a hearing in which it suggested that Ocwen work with the court to reform its procedures to avoid similar problems in the future. Hr'g Tr. 38:1-9 (July 22, 2008). The bankruptcy court granted a continuance for Ocwen to review its procedures and report back. Id. 39:6-40:25. Instead, Ocwen settled with the debtors. At the hearing to approve the settlement, the bankruptcy court sua sponte imposed remedial action on Ocwen to prevent the errors in the McKain case from occurring again. Hr'g Tr. 6:12-7:15 (Feb. 17, 2009). That order prompted this appeal.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES

Did the bankruptcy court have authority under 11 U.S.C. § 105 to order injunctive relief to prevent future abuse of process by Ocwen?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Appellant misstates the applicable standard of review. This is a core proceeding because it concerns the administration of bankruptcy estates and creditor-debtor relations. 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A) & (O). A district court reviews findings of fact in a bankruptcy court decision for clear error and findings of law de novo. In re Jay, 432 F.3d 323, 325 (5th Cir. 2005). A grant of injunctive relief is reviewed for abuse of discretion. ICEE Distr. Inc. v. J&J Snack Foods Corp., 325 F.3d 586, 594 (5th Cir. 2003).

SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

The United States augments this Court's understanding of the facts as follows.

1. Invoice

The debtors, Cory and Regina McKain, filed for chapter 13 bankruptcy relief on February 29, 2008, when they were facing foreclosure of their home. Ocwen was informed that the debtors had filed the chapter 13 bankruptcy petition on March 4, 2008. Resp. to Mem. of Record at 3 [Dkt. #53]. Nevertheless, it sent the invoice that is at issue in this case on March 17, 2008.

The one-page invoice has several aspects that the McKains alleged violated the automatic stay that protected them from further collection activities for debts incurred before they petitioned for relief under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 362. See Addendum.

- In a box captioned "Details of Amount Due," Ocwen listed charges for principal, interest, and escrow charges for the two months after the McKains filed their petition. However, immediately below those charges, under the same "Details of Amount Due" heading, and under a "Assessed Fees/Expense Outstanding" subheading, Ocwen listed $3,588.05 of fees and charges that had been accrued before the bankruptcy filing and were therefore to be repaid as part of the bankruptcy case. In front of each of these items, the notation "Info Only" appeared. The debtors alleged that the invoice was confusing. Hr'g Tr. 6:14-25.

The invoice listed amounts covered by the debtors' chapter 13 plan under the same heading as post-petition charges to be paid directly to Ocwen. It also contained four pre-printed notices that were also at issue in the underlying adversary proceeding:

- The McKains' home "was in foreclosure;"
- Failure to pay invoiced amounts would be reported to credit bureaus;
- Payments received would be credited according to "your mortgage note," regardless of the terms of the confirmed chapter 13 repayment plan; and
- Instruction to contact Ocwen directly, rather than through counsel, to work out any disagreement over the charges.

At the first hearing at which Ocwen appeared, the bankruptcy court indicated its strong interest in working with Ocwen to revise its procedures to protect it from further adversary complaints. Hr'g Tr. 18:22-19:4 (July 22, 2008) (stating the court wanted to "figure[] out what's going on and how to fix it not only in this case but anything in the future so lenders are not confused about what needs to happen"). In critiquing the invoice itself, the bankruptcy court made the following observations:

Foreclosure Statement: "I think that the language [describing the debtors' home as being in "foreclosure"] can be both misleading as well as upsetting to debtors who receive it, because they believe . . . that bankruptcies stop foreclosures. . . . I don't know why you mention it at all, frankly." Hr'g Tr. 22:20-23:13. (July 22, 2008).

Ambiguous Request for Payment: "I do not object to informational statements. . . . But I think you have to be very careful about how you do that. And I guess in the upper block the details of the amount due, what I think is confusing about this is that these as best I can tell are pre-petition proof of claim charges, and so to the extent that they were going to be disclosed on the statement, it seems to me it would be more appropriate to say the following charges have been included in a proof of claim in your case . . . or something to that effect so that you're making clear that this statement is not requesting payment of those fees and charges." Hr'g Tr. 24:4-16 (7/22/08)

Direct Contact with Ocwen: "The statement on contacting [Ocwen directly] – I would understand why a lender would want to know if there's a problem, but I agree with Mr. Myers [McKains' counsel] that getting . . . debtors to contact a lender about a problem is probably not the best way to handle it." Hr'g Tr. 23:14-23:25 (7/22/08).

Allocation of Payments: "So, just that statement [that Ocwen will allocate payment according to the loan contract] alone on this agreement is troublesome and, frankly, I don't even know why you'd make it at all. I guess in that case don't say anything. It's too complex and in this Court at least you're going to be held to an accounting based on the Bankruptcy Code, the jurisprudence in this courtroom and your own documents. So, that's my comment on that." Hr'g Tr. 30:1-7 (7/22/08).

2. Proof of Claim

On April 3, 2008 Ocwen filed a proof of claim in the McKains' case. The proof of claim was missing supporting documentation for certain fees, such as late fees, non-sufficient fund charge, escrow advances, and foreclosure fees. Claim 10-1, Ex. B (Itemization of Claim). In addition, there were discrepancies between the amounts on the proof of claim and the figures on the account statement that Ocwen sent to the McKains on March 17, 2008. Hr'g Tr. 6:1-13; 10:17-11:19; 13:2-15 (July 22, 2008).

Shortly after the McKains filed their petition in 2008, Ocwen transferred their loan to Greentree Servicing Company. [Dkt. #38]. Although the McKains' attorney pointed out several errors in the original proof of claim, neither Ocwen nor Greentree filed an amended proof of claim, apparently thinking that it was the responsibility of the other party. Ocwen Second Mot. For Leave to Amend at 3, Ex. C [Dkt. #119]. On September 16, 2009, and after this appeal commenced, Ocwen did file an amended proof of claim. [Dkt. #117]. Ocwen withdrew it and filed a second amended claim two days later on September 18, 2009, citing "the need for minor corrections." Second Mot. for Leave at 4 [Dkt. #119]. Ocwen's second amended proof of claim contains the same incomplete documentation as the first, although Ocwen had previously filed more complete set of back-up documentation in response to the bankruptcy court's direct order on October 10, 2008. [Dkt. #53].

3. Settlement

The McKains settled with Ocwen in February 2009. According to the motion filed with its second amended proof of claim, Ocwen paid $3,000 in attorney fees and removed various charges from the McKains' account, reserving the right to charge sheriff's fees were a foreclosure to take place in the future. Second Mot. For Leave, at 2 [Dkt. #119]. As part of the settlement, Ocwen agreed not to charge the McKains $4,980.03 as follows: Sheriff's Commission ($500)[1]; Inspection Fees ($21); two Broker Price Options ($230)[2]; Review of Bankruptcy Plan Fee ($150); Sheriff's Commission ($4,064.03)[3]; Property Inspection ($15).

4. Relief

After the bankruptcy court agreed to approve the settlement, it sua sponte ordered Ocwen to provide each debtor with an annual statement showing how it had processed the loan in the previous year, including an accounting of any additional fees that had accrued. Hr'g Tr. 6:14-7:2 (Feb. 17, 2009); Reasons at 11. In its written order, it also ordered Ocwen to set up separate accounts for each debtor, one to track repayment of debt through the bankruptcy process and another to track mortgage payments that fall due post-petition. [Dkt. #83]; See also Reasons at 9-10.

[1] Because the McKains' property was never foreclosed upon, this fee was never charged to Ocwen. Hr'g Tr. 11:2-11; 32:9-33 (July 22, 2008).

[2] The "info only" statement sent to the McKains listed a $230 fee for "prev property valuation expense." The original proof of claim listed one BPO for $115, backed up with an invoice for that amount, dated January 24, 2007 [sic].

[3] This charge is not included in the first proof of claim or the March 17 invoice.

STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

This case concerns the power of a bankruptcy court to regulate the practice of bankruptcy law before it. The bankruptcy court's equitable powers that are at issue in this case derive from 11 U.S.C. § 105 ("Power of Court"), specifically subsection (a):

> The court may issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title. No provision of this title providing for the raising of an issue by a party in interest shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action or making any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process.

This provision has two parts. The first part allows a bankruptcy court to 1) issue orders, i.e., commands directed to persons and others appearing before it; 2) issue procedures, i.e., rules of court governing how a party may litigate before the court; and 3) to render judgment, i.e., determine rights. These powers can be exercised when "necessary or appropriate" to carry out the provisions of Title 11, a broad grant of authority. United States v. Sutton, 786 F.2d 1305, 1308 (5th Cir. 1986); In re Sadkin, 36 F.3d 473, 479 (5th Cir. 1994) (stating that section 105(a) "provides equitable powers for the bankruptcy court to use at its discretion").

The second part permits a bankruptcy court to take "any action" or make "any determination" that is "necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process." Abuse of process has been defined as "maneuvers or schemes which would have the effect of undermining the integrity of the bankruptcy system." In re Eagle-Picher Indus. Inc., 169 B.R. 135, 138 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1994). This power is only circumscribed to the extent that it cannot be used in contradiction to another provision in the Bankruptcy Code. Marrama v. Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, 549 U.S. 365, 375 (2007). The key word in this subsection of 105 is "prevent," which is a forward-looking concept. Congress gave bankruptcy courts the authority to take prophylactic measures to prevent a party from engaging in future abuse, such as providing account statements to demonstrate the debtors' payments both under a confirmed chapter 13 plan and for ongoing post-petition installments have been properly allocated.

The legislative history of section 105(a) provides support for this broad interpretation. The House Report concerning the 1978 Bankruptcy Code which superceded the Bankruptcy Act, states that section 105(a) was enacted to remove any doubt concerning the power of the new bankruptcy courts. Section 105(a) was enacted "for the sake of continuity from current law and ease of reference, and to cover any powers traditionally exercised by a bankruptcy court that are not encompassed by the All Writs [Act]."[4] H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 316-17 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6273-74.

Section 105 is broader than a bankruptcy court's inherent authority to discipline a party for improper actions taken in bad faith related to the litigation. A bankruptcy court may of course sanction a party for bad faith under 11 U.S.C. § 105. Campbell v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 545 F.3d 348, 356 n.1 (5th Cir. 2008). However, the text of section 105(a) does not mention bad faith, indicating Congress's desire to give bankruptcy courts wide-ranging power to regulate, and protect, their dockets. Congress did create a bad faith requirement in other contexts, however, such as 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1), which allows dismissal of a chapter 7 case if the debtor filed it in "bad faith." Section 105 is more than a codification of the bankruptcy court's inherent power. Section 105 is instead a tool that allows a bankruptcy court to regulate its docket – both prospectively and retrospectively.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT PROPERLY USED ITS POWERS UNDER 11 U.S.C. § 105 TO TAKE REMEDIAL STEPS TO IMPROVE OCWEN'S PROCEDURES FOR SERVICING MORTGAGES.

A. This case involves a simple application of Section 105.

Section 105 of Title 11 is a simple statutory provision designed to give bankruptcy courts the necessary tools to "prevent" abuse by participants in the bankruptcy system. Bessette v. Avco Fin. Serv., Inc., 230 F.3d 439, 444-45 (1st Cir. 2000); see In re Sanchez, 372 B.R. 289, 311-12 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2007). Its application is governed by the text. First, a bankruptcy court must determine that it should act to prevent an abuse of process. In re Eagle-Picher Indus., Inc., 285 F.3d 522, 529 (6th Cir. 2002). Once it has made that determination, the court must craft an order that is reasonably calculated to prevent that abuse. Jove Eng'g Inc. v. IRS, 92 F.3d 1539, 1554 (11th Cir. 1996) (plain meaning of Section 105 encompasses any order whether injunctive, compensatory, or punitive, if necessary to carry out provisions of the Bankruptcy Code). Unlike traditional injunctive relief, a bankruptcy court's power to act derives from the statute. Congress did not require that courts engage in special analysis or balancing tests to determine if the application of 105 powers would be appropriate. See 132 Cong. Rec. 28, 610 (1986) (statement of Sen. Hatch) (section 105(a) "allows a bankruptcy court to take any action on its own, or to make any necessary determination to prevent an abuse of process and to help expedite a case in a proper and justified manner"). Furthermore, in an analogous context, traditional injunctive analysis is "inapplicable to orders issued to protect a court's control of its docket." Baum v. Blue Moon Ventures LLC, 513 F.3d 181, 189 (5th Cir. 2008) (preventing vexatious filings).

Therefore, the issue before this Court is much simpler than suggested in Ocwen's brief. This Court must first determine if the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by determining that 1) Ocwen's behavior in the McKain case, 2) the six other cases in which the bankruptcy court found improper loan servicing by Ocwen, and 3) the fact that Ocwen was litigating 67 claims of mortgage abuse that had been consolidated in the Northern District of Illinois gave it sufficient grounds to anticipate similar abuse of process would continue. Secondly, this Court must determine if the remedy that the bankruptcy court ordered will address that identified problem. If the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in identifying a problem and if its solution is designed to "prevent" further abuse, then this Court should affirm the decision below.

B. Ocwen's servicing of the McKains' loan was an abuse of process.

Ocwen asserts that neither its proof of claim nor any post petition fees were disputed in this case. Ocwen Br. at 2. This is not accurate. First, the McKains' attorney objected to both at the July 22, 2008 hearing. Hr'g Tr. 10:3-11; 11:12-12:12; 13:2-21 (July 22, 2008). Secondly, Ocwen has subsequently admitted that its proof of claim in the McKains' case was inaccurate. In its Second Amended Proof of Claim, it withdrew $791 worth of fees and agreed not to charge the McKains fees for reviewing the proof of claim ($150); sheriff's fees related to the actions taken toward foreclosure before the McKains filed for bankruptcy ($4,064.03); and property inspection fees ($15). [Dkt. #119].

In this case, Ocwen sent the debtors an invoice that stated that "Payments received are to be applied in accordance with your mortgage note. Payments will be first applied to bring you loan contractually current. Any additional funds received will be applied to outstanding fees and advances prior to being applied to principal." March 17, 2009 Invoice (see Addendum). Creditors are bound by the terms of a chapter 13 plan once it is confirmed. 11 U.S.C. § 1327.

The plan specifies how payments will be allocated – not the lender. Cano v. GMAC Mortgage Co. (In re Cano), 08-07019, 2009 WL 2496320, at *17 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Aug. 10, 2009) (stating that a mortgage lender may not divert amounts dedicated to arrearages, principal, or interest without court approval); see Mendoza v. Temple-Inland Mortgage Corp. (In re Mendoza), 111 F.3d 1264, 1268 (5th Cir. 1997) (holding Bankruptcy Code permits modification of a plan to help debtor keep his home).

Moreover, the bankruptcy court acted based on the evidence that similar cases on its docket revealed evidence of Ocwen's systematic abuse. Reasons at 4. The record also reflected multi-district litigation against Ocwen in the Northern District of Illinois in which the plaintiffs' claims are based on "improper loan servicing practices," including charging unauthorized fees, incorrect posting of borrower payments and improper treatment of borrowers in default. Ocwen's Response to Memorandum to the Record (filed Oct. 10, 2008) (describing 67 lawsuits involving 95 loans) [Dkt. #53].

Accordingly, the record gave the court sufficient grounds to anticipate similar abuse of process would continue, and supported the use of section 105 authority to ensure Ocwen provided debtors with necessary information so that they and the court could monitor the crediting of their loan payments, both pre and post petition. The bankruptcy court acted to prevent a documented intended abuse of process – an exercise of power that falls squarely within the plain language of section 105(a). See e.g., In re Sanchez, 372 B.R. at 311 (holding that a bankruptcy court may sanction a creditor for contempt of the order confirming the debtor's repayment plan). The remedial relief ordered in this case allow the bankruptcy court to ensure Ocwen applies payments in accordance with the court's confirmation orders in chapter 13 cases. Jones v. Wells Fargo

Home Mortgage Inc. (In re Jones), No. 06-01093 at 10 (Bankr. E.D. La Oct. 1, 2009) ("Jones Remand") (see Addendum).

C. The bankruptcy court ordered reasonable relief designed to ensure that Ocwen would provide accurate information to debtors and the court going forward.

Section 105 gives a bankruptcy court "broad authority . . . to take any action that is necessary or appropriate 'to prevent an abuse of process.'" Marrama, 549 U.S. at 375 (citing 11 U.S.C. § 1051(a)); see also In re Terrebonne Fuel & Lube, Inc., 108 F.3d 609, 613 (5th Cir. 1997). Furthermore, a bankruptcy court may impose an "appropriate" remedy and is not compelled to choose the most limited remedy available. Rodriguez v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re Rodriguez), 396 B.R. 436, 458 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008). In this case, the bankruptcy court found that Ocwen's system created the potential for inaccurate accounting and unjustified demands for payment. Accordingly, it mandated that Ocwen produce an annual statement for each of its debtors to confirm that Ocwen recorded the debtor's payments and obligations accurately. May 1, 2009 Order Requiring Accounting Procedures [Dkt. #83]. The purpose was to "ensure that Ocwen is not abusing the claims process" and that Ocwen gave "notice of incurred post-petition fees or costs." Reasons at 12. The bankruptcy court acted within its powers when it ordered a remedy that is tailored to protect the bankruptcy system beyond the individual circumstance of the McKain case. See Winnecour v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re Selected Cases), 396 B.R. 138, 144 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2008) (stating that pay-off statements to debtors could "significantly improve the chapter 13 process in this District").

Secondly, the bankruptcy court expressed concerns about the accuracy of Ocwen's proofs of claim, both in the McKain case and other cases tried in the same court. The accounting procedures and statements are designed to improve Ocwen's track record in providing debtors with accurate information in a transparent way. Ocwen argues in its brief that "a bankruptcy court may exercise its equitable authority under section 105 'only as a means to fulfill some specific Code provision.'" Ocwen Br. at 12 (citing Northwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988) (emphasis added in brief text). Even if that reading of the case law were correct, that is precisely what the bankruptcy court did in the McKain case. It exercised its discretion to impose procedural requirements on Ocwen to ensure that its filings in the court would comply with the provisions and rules of the Bankruptcy Code. The order creates a structure to make sure Ocwen files claims that comply with 11 U.S.C. § 501 (filing of proofs of claim); 11 U.S.C. § 1327 (binding creditors to the terms of confirmed plan); and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 3001 (requiring accuracy for proofs of claim). Jones Remand, slip op. at 11. Such an action is in complete harmony with the Code. Contrary to Ocwen's assertion that the bankruptcy court was engaged as a "roving commission to do equity," Ocwen Br. at 3, this is a tailored remedy to a documented problem.

In fact, the remedy that this Court chose to impose on Ocwen is commensurate with the actions of other bankruptcy courts faced with similar creditor abuse. Bankruptcy courts across the country have noted the mortgage servicing industry's continuing failure to comply with the Bankruptcy Code and Rules and have taken action to prevent the harm it causes to the courts, debtors, and other creditors. For example, the Eastern District of Louisiana affirmed the bankruptcy court's order to another mortgage servicer under its section 105 power to conduct an audit and amend proofs of claim. In re Stewart, No. 08-3225, 2009 WL 2448054 (E.D. La. Aug. 7, 2009,) appeal pending, No. 09-30832 (5th Cir. docketed Sept. 14, 2009). To encourage creditor compliance with the Code, a bankruptcy court may also limit a creditor's ability to amend proofs of claim to correct any inaccuracies identified in an objection. In re DePugh, No.

08-37521, 2009 WL 1657473 at *7 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. June 12, 2009) (forbidding amendments to an objected to proof of claim without prior leave of court). The District Court for the District of South Carolina has sanctioned creditors that provide inaccurate information to their counsel. In re Kilgore, 253 B.R. 179 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2000). Finally, an Ohio bankruptcy court has required that a mortgage servicer with a track-record of inaccurate proofs of claim file a supplemental worksheet with each proof of claim to help establish its veracity. McDermott v. Countrywide Home Loans (In re O'Neal), Adv. No. 08-5031, slip op. (Bankr. N.D. Ohio filed July 31, 2009) (appeal pending).

The bankruptcy court below had the authority to take action to compel Ocwen to adhere to the Bankruptcy Code's provisions and rules that apply to creditors and their claims. The bankruptcy court acted based on the evidence before it in this case and the existence of similar cases. Reasons at 4 (six cases similar cases on the court's docket); Ocwen's Response to Memorandum to the Record (filed Oct. 10, 2008) (describing 67 lawsuits involving 95 loans) [Dkt. #53]. This record supported the use of section 105 authority to ensure Ocwen provided debtors with necessary information so that they and the court could monitor the crediting of their loan payments, both pre and post petition. The bankruptcy court thus took action to protect the integrity of the system by stopping the cat and mouse game Ocwen played with debtors by ignoring debtor protections in the Code and only fixing their mistakes when faced with potentially costly litigation. Jones Remand, slip op. at 15 (outlining costs to debtors when forced to litigate against another large mortgage servicer – Wells Fargo – on a case-by-case basis).

D. The bankruptcy court did not need to rely upon its inherent powers to order remedial relief.

The bankruptcy court's Section 105 powers were sufficient authority to order remedial relief. The court did not need to exercise its inherent powers, although it could issue remedial orders under its inherent powers as well as under section 105. See Marrama, 549 U.S. at 375. (describing a bankruptcy court's inherent authority and authority under section 105(a) to prevent an abuse); Chambers v. NASCO Inc., 501 U.S. 32 (1991). "A primary aspect" of such powers is "the ability to fashion an appropriate sanction for conduct which abuses the judicial process." Chambers, 501 U.S. at 44-45. Although Chambers involved a sanction issued by a district court, the Fifth Circuit subsequently recognized that bankruptcy courts also have inherent authority to sanction bad faith conduct. See In re Case, 937 F.2d 1014, 1023 (5th Cir. 1991).

Contrary to Ocwen's assertion, Ocwen Br. at 16, 18, the bankruptcy court did find that Ocwen acted in bad faith. Reasons at 9. However, that finding is not a prerequisite to the remedial action in this case. Here, the bankruptcy court found that Ocwen had repeatedly administered loans improperly or attempted to collect fees and costs to which it was not entitled. Reasons at 3-4 (citing six examples). A bankruptcy court has power to issue injunctive relief under its inherent powers upon a finding of bad faith. As explained above, however, even if Ocwen were correct that it did not act in bad faith, the remedy here is an appropriate exercise of the bankruptcy court's section 105 power. Cf. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) (allowing dismissal of a chapter 7 case if the debtor filed in "bad faith"). Ocwen's arguments regarding section 105 and a bankruptcy court's inherent power are unpersuasive.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT MUST BE ALLOWED TO TAKE ACTION NECESSARY TO PROTECT THE INTEGRITY OF PROCEEDINGS BEFORE IT.

A. The injury to Ocwen is slight compared with the need of the bankruptcy court to regulate practice before it.

Ocwen argues that it will be harmed by the remedy imposed, whereas the McKains will not. Ocwen discusses at great length the Jones cases, arguing that a voluntary arrangement suggested by another mortgage company cannot bind Ocwen. That is not the point. In its Reasons, the bankruptcy court highlighted six other instances in which Ocwen had mishandled mortgages before it within the last seven years, accounting for a 17% proven error rate, which the court speculated could in fact be much higher. Reasons at 5; Ocwen Response to Memo at 4-5 (describing multi-district litigation). [Dkt. #53] The bankruptcy court's earlier efforts to deter Ocwen from improper behavior before it with monetary sanctions had proven ineffective. Reasons at 9. The relief ordered by the bankruptcy court is a reasonable step towards curbing Ocwen's demonstrated pattern of mistakes and lack of transparency with debtors concerning how their mortgages are serviced during bankruptcy.

The issue is the harm to the system as a whole caused by Ocwen's behavior. Although there may be a remedy at law for the McKains, money will not help the bankruptcy court itself, the trustees, the United States trustees, creditors or other debtors forced to deal with Ocwen's cavalier attitude to court filings. The harm caused by Ocwen's actions can be erased by monetary settlements with those debtors who have the stamina and legal assistance to force Ocwen to service their loans correctly. See Ocwen Br. at 20. The bankruptcy court found a pattern of Ocwen attempting to collect money from debtors to which it was not entitled. Reasons at 13. It also noted that Ocwen appears impervious to monetary sanctions as a motivation to change its behavior. Id. The bankruptcy court had authority to defend its interests by compelling Ocwen to produce accurate annual account statements to demonstrate its compliance with the Bankruptcy Code and bankruptcy court orders. Marrama, 549 U.S. at 375.

B. Ocwen cannot be irreparably harmed because it can influence the implementation and duration of the bankruptcy court's remedial relief.

Ocwen cannot be irreparably harmed by being required to adhere to the tenets of the Bankruptcy Code. Mere injuries, however substantial, in terms of money, time and energy expended do not constitute irreparable harm. See In re Stewart, No. 08-3225, 2009 WL 1649731 at *4 (E.D. (concluding that asserted $238,000 cost of compliance with court ordered audit of all open proofs of claim did not demonstrate "that those injuries are irreparable under the law or that they even necessarily result absent a stay given appellant's continuing duty to correct and amend its pleadings"). Furthermore, Ocwen will not be harmed by having to produce documentation for a single bankruptcy court. National loan servicers are already responsible for complying with varying local rules in each court. In fact, Ocwen's existing network of local counsel should be able to handle this additional task, which merely verifies the accounting process that is the core of Ocwen's business.

Ocwen objects to the accounting procedures mandated in the bankruptcy court's order. But they are not a source of harm. If the bankruptcy court's prescription proves unworkable, or if Ocwen finds a more efficient method to achieve the same result, then its remedy is to file a motion to modify the bankruptcy court's order. Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b)(5). Nor is there any reason to think that the court below would not be receptive. At the July 22, 2008 hearing, the court asked repeatedly for Ocwen's input: "It seems reasonable to me, frankly, [instituting statement of accruing additional debt] but I'll leave that to your client [Ocwen] what it wants to do. What I really need from you is some argument, proposal, something about what you want to say about post-petition accruing charges and how you want to do it, okay." Hr'g Tr. 37:11-15 (July 22, 2008). Nor was the bankruptcy court wedded to a particular solution. "Now, to the extent that I disagree, what you're probably going to hear from me, Mr. Balogh, is that I say, "Well, you know, we'll see. I don't know that's good." But, you know, I don't write your policy. You decide – your client decides what the policy is going to be and what it can and can't do and what it thinks is practical and what it thinks isn't." Id. 38:16-22 (July 22, 2008). Finally, the bankruptcy court agreed to a change requested by Wells Fargo, a servicer that had been ordered to follow the same accounting procedures that are at issue in this case. Jones Remand, slip op. at 22.

After seven months, Ocwen had not submitted a proposal to the bankruptcy court, choosing instead to settle with the debtor. At the settlement hearing, Ocwen refused either to accept the bankruptcy court's administrative order setting a procedure for providing post-petition account information or to make a counterproposal. Hr'g Tr. 6:4-13 (Feb. 17, 2009). Only then did the bankruptcy court impose the procedures outlined in its Reasons. Id. 6:14-7:19.

Ocwen's argument that the permanent injunction cannot be changed has no basis in law. To the contrary, Ocwen has a great deal of influence over the implementation, and duration, of the bankruptcy court's remedy. If it can reform its internal systems sufficiently to demonstrate a transparent accounting process and establish a track record of accurate proofs of claim, correspondence with debtors that complies with the Code, and attempts to collect only the money that it is genuinely owed, then it may certainly return to the bankruptcy court and ask that the remedial order be suspended. Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 215 (1997) (court errs when it refuses to modify an injunction in light of changed circumstances); Baum v. Blue Moon Ventures, LLC 513 F.3d 181, 188 (5th Cir. 2008) (court may modify injunction if circumstances change). No party – not Ocwen, the bankruptcy court, or the United States Trustee, is interested in setting up a long-term monitoring process. Rather, the goal is the same as it has always been: for the bankruptcy court to strike a balance between the interests of creditors and debtors so that the former can get paid and the latter receive the "fresh start" promised by the Code.

C. The bankruptcy court's remedial relief serves the public interest.

The United States through the Justice Department's United States Trustee Program acts as the "watchdog" of the public interest in bankruptcy matters. In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F. 2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990). The public interest will be harmed if the bankruptcy court's order is not implemented. The court's order requires Ocwen to provide precise information in annual accounting statements in an accessible format. Without this information, debtors and others will continue to be vulnerable to unwarranted claims and surprise demands for money. When approving an otherwise redundant chapter 13 plan provision, one bankruptcy court stated that the language would "drive home the message to Countrywide that it must adjust its accounting practices to conform with Ms. Winston's [confirmed] plan . . . [and] finally convey the message that while mortgages on primary residences are largely sacrosanct, [mortgage servicers] may not completely frustrate the public interest in having a workable means for debtors to achieve a fresh start to their economic lives." In re Winston, No. 08-11025, 2009 WL 2883158 at *6 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. May 07, 2009).

The remedial injunction forces Ocwen to comply with the Bankruptcy Code and Rules to ensure accurate processing of debtors' loans. It is Ocwen's obligation to submit accurate filings to the bankruptcy court – not the job of debtors, trustees, or the United States Trustee to comb through each document to identify the errors. In re Tran, 369 B.R. 312, 318 (S.D. Tex. 2007) (holding that debtors should not bear the burden of objecting to an inaccurate proof of claim); In re Stewart, 2009 WL 2448054 at *22 (judicial remedies are necessary where proof of claims are deficient). Nor should debtors be forced to battle with Ocwen to correct the inaccuracies they have identified and the bankruptcy court has verified. See In re Batiste, 2009 WL 2849077 at *2 (chronicling Ocwen's seven-month delay and ultimate refusal to draft a post-discharge statement that the debtor's account was in good standing). The public interest is served when the bankruptcy system functions efficiently. Bankruptcy courts can, and should, take action to ensure that the information upon which decisions are made is accurate. In re Stewart, 2009 WL 2448054 at *22 (conducting "audits and attaching account histories to all proofs of claim will still serve the public interest").

III. OCWEN HAS NOT SHOWN THAT THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S REMEDIAL ACTION IS IMPROPER.

The arguments in Ocwen's brief are not novel. Attacks on bankruptcy courts' jurisdiction, authority to issue injunctive relief, and ability to impose remedial orders have been argued – and rejected – in this, and other, courts. See e.g., McDermott v. Countrywide Home Loans (In re O'Neal), Adv. No. 08-5031, slip op. (Bankr. N.D. Ohio filed May 1, 2009) (appeal pending); Walton v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. (In re Sanchez), No. 08-23337, slip op. (S.D. Fla. June 9, 2009). As the implications of the foreclosure crisis become clearer, bankruptcy courts throughout the country have taken action to prevent such abuse in cases on their dockets. In re Prevo, 394 B.R. 847, 848-49 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2008) (recognizing decisions from bankruptcy across the country condemning mortgage companies that "seem to believe that they are excused from complying with the fundamental requirements of the Bankruptcy Code and Rules"). The bankruptcy court here followed the lead of its sister-courts to balance the right of debtors to accuracy and transparency while keeping the burden of mortgage lenders at a minimum. The bankruptcy court's injunctive relief should be affirmed.

A. The bankruptcy court has subject matter jurisdiction because this is a core proceeding.

Ocwen suggests that the bankruptcy court did not have authority to issue a remedial order because the McKains and Ocwen had settled their dispute. That premise is incorrect. See Cooter & Gell v. Hartmarx Corp., 496 U.S. 384, 395 (1990). A court possesses "ever present" jurisdiction to regulate the conduct of parties appearing before it. Red Carpet Studios Div. of Source Advantage, Ltd. v. Sater, 465 F.3d 642, 645 (6th Cir. 2006) (upholding a sanction under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 even though the underlying lawsuit in which the sanction arose had been settled and voluntarily dismissed).

Ocwen's brief does not discuss Title 28 of the United States Code that gives bankruptcy courts broad jurisdiction to hear cases. A matter involving the discipline of a party for misconduct in a bankruptcy case is a core bankruptcy proceeding under 28 U.S.C. § 157 because it concerns the administration of the estate. Southmark Corp. v. Coopers & Lybrand (In re Southmark), 163 F.3d 925, 930 (5th Cir. 1999). A core proceeding is one that "invokes a substantive right provided by title 11 or if it is a proceeding that, by its nature, could arise only in the context of a bankruptcy case." In re Wood, 825 F.2d 90, 97 (5th Cir. 1987). See also 29 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1) ("bankruptcy judges may hear and determine . . . all core proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in a case under title 11"). Ocwen's misconduct in this case consists of sending an invoice to the debtors that arguably violated the automatic stay, a procedure unique to bankruptcy, and filing an inaccurate and undocumented proof of claim, a violation dependent on the existence of a bankruptcy case. The bankruptcy court characterized Ocwen's blanket assertion on a printed invoice form that it could determine how a debtor's payments would be allocated as "troubling to say the least." Reasons at 5. Ocwen's attitude undermines the authority of the bankruptcy court to assure creditors are repaid in accordance with the priorities of the code and debtors can preserve their homes if possible. Mendoza, 111 F.3d at 1269. Because federal bankruptcy law creates the procedures that Ocwen abused in the McKain case and because its misconduct could not occur outside the bankruptcy context, this resulting remedial action satisfies the fundamental definition of a core bankruptcy proceeding. Southmark, 163 F.3d at 930; In re Bradley, 371 B.R. 782, 785 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2007) (summarily concluding that motion for contempt under section 105 is core proceeding).

B. The McKains' Settlement with Ocwen has no connection to the validity of the bankruptcy court's order of remedial relief.

Ocwen attempts to remove itself from the authority of the bankruptcy court by arguing that this case was merely about an alleged violation of the automatic stay, an issue which is now moot due to the settlement between Ocwen and the McKains. Ocwen Br. at 14 (stating that section 362 is the "only Code provision at issue in the parties' dispute over the billing statement"). This misses the point. By filing a proof of claim in any bankruptcy case, a creditor becomes subject to the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. 501. It becomes a party in interest responsible for its conduct before the court and subject to the court's overall authority. It is well-established that a court's power to order remedial action against a party survives the underlying case. See Willy v. Coastal Corp., 503 U.S. 131, 138-39 (1991) (holding that Rule 11 sanctions may be imposed even where there is no subject matter jurisdiction over the merits of the related controversy, as the court's interest in having rules of procedure obeyed does not disappear).

Ocwen is also incorrect that bankruptcy courts only have jurisdiction over actions that could affect the estate. A bankruptcy court always has jurisdiction to enforce debtor rights, such protection under the automatic stay, receipt of accurate proofs of claim and transparent accounting. Cano, 2009 WL 2496320, at *18. Ocwen's actions in this litigation implicated many Code provisions beyond 11 U.S.C. § 362. Its overall track record before the bankruptcy court caused the court to impose this forward-looking remedial relief as authorized under 11 U.S.C. § 105. Reasons at 4; In re Batiste, 2009 WL 2849077 at *3 (stating "Ocwen has consistently shown an inability or refusal to comply with these basis statutory tenets [of the Bankruptcy Code]").

Ocwen's heavy reliance on In re Schwamb is misplaced. In that case, the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to issue an injunction that prohibited a state court action for workmen's compensation reimbursement by an insurance company against Delta Airlines, which had paid a personal injury judgment to the debtor during his chapter 7 bankruptcy case. In re Schwamb, 169 B.R. 601 (E.D. La. 1994). The case fell outside the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction, including its "related to" limited jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 157(c).[5] Id. at 604. The Schwamb court held that the bankruptcy court could not enjoin third-party litigants unless failure to do so would adversely influence the debtor. Id. at 605. Here, Ocwen is a creditor subject to the core jurisdiction of the court in every case in which it files a claim. The two cases are not comparable.

Finally, Ocwen is incorrect that there is no longer a case or controversy. The bankruptcy court is addressing Ocwen's pattern of misbehavior under its section 105 remedial and preventative power. The rectification of one mishandled mortgage does not fix them all. This is a systematic problem. The bankruptcy court took action in tandem with other courts that are no longer willing to let mortgage servicers "nickel and dime" debtors and then look for "absolution" once they fix the problem after they are caught. In re Prevo, 394 B.R. at 848. Ocwen, like its competitors, cannot avoid its responsibilities by mooting out cases after it is proven that it did not service the loan properly. Id. at 849. The bankruptcy court's remedial injunction is a reasonable exercise of its power under 11 U.S.C. § 105 to regulate a mortgage lender before it that also contributes to the solution of a larger national problem.

[5] A bankruptcy court may hear, but not determine, a proceeding that is not a case proceeding but is otherwise related to a bankruptcy case.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons outlined above, the United States respectfully requests that this Court affirm the injunctive remedy that the bankruptcy court below placed on Ocwen.

Respectfully submitted, this 5th day of October, 2009.

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

The issue before this Court on appeal is whether the court below erred in ruling that the debtor, Lynn Meade, was not eligible to claim the IRS Standard vehicle financing expense allowance in calculating her disposable income under the Bankruptcy Code's statutory means test, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) because she owned her car debt-free and thus had no automobile vehicle financing expense.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Texas had jurisdiction under 11 U.S.C. § 157 to decide the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss Ms. Meade's chapter 7 bankruptcy case.[1] This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) to decide Ms. Meade's timely appeal from the bankruptcy court's final order dismissing her bankruptcy case.

STATEMENT OF APPLICABLE STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

Congress explicitly authorized United States Trustees to file dismissal motions like the one the United States Trustee filed in Ms. Meade's case. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) (court may dismiss chapter 7 case "on a motion by the United States trustee."); s*ee also* 11 U.S.C. § 307 (United States Trustees possess standing to raise and be heard on any issue in any bankruptcy case).

U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to claim an expense for vehicle financing where the debtor has no automobile vehicle financing expense is an issue of law subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On September 30, 2006, Ms. Lynn Meade filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code (Record ("R.") at 1). On December 8, 2007, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss her case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) on the ground it would be an abuse of chapter 7 to grant Ms. Meade a discharge of her debts. (R. at 4). The United States Trustee moved to dismiss Ms. Meade's case because her case was presumptively abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). That section creates a statutory presumption that chapter 7 cases merit dismissal when debtors' current monthly income, reduced by allowable expenses, exceeds $166.67 per month. (Id.).

Before the bankruptcy court, the United States Trustee and Ms. Meade agreed that resolution of a single question of law would determine whether Ms. Meade's case was presumptively abusive and subject to dismissal on that ground. (R. at 8). That question was whether Ms. Meade could deduct a monthly expense for vehicle financing even though she had no monthly car loan or lease payment. (Id.) After conducting a hearing, the bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee that Ms. Meade could not deduct a vehicle financing payment she did not have. (R. at 8). The court therefore ruled Ms. Meade's chapter 7 case was abusive under section 707(b)(2), and ordered her case to be dismissed. (Id.) Ms. Meade timely appealed that final order. (R. at 7).

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

1. Statutory Framework - Overview of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)

On October 17, 2005, most provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (the "BAPCPA"), S. 256, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, took effect, implementing significant changes to the Bankruptcy Code. As part of this effort, Congress amended section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, which governs dismissal of chapter 7 bankruptcy cases. Analysis of the means test, as contained within section 707(b)(2), is underpinned by Congress' general goal behind the complete overhaul of section 707(b), ensuring "that those who can afford to repay some portion of their unsecured debts be required to do so…." 151 CONG. REC. S2470 (March 10, 2005).

As it existed prior to BAPCPA, section 707(b) only authorized dismissal based on a finding that allowing the debtor relief constituted a "substantial abuse" of chapter 7. Further, section 707(b) prior to its amendment by BAPCPA required courts to presume that a debtor was entitled to relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 707(b) now authorizes dismissal where the court finds that the granting of relief would be an "abuse" of chapter 7. As amended by the BAPCPA, section 707(b)(2) repealed the former presumption and replaced it with a new presumption: a case is an "abuse" of chapter 7 if a detailed mathematical formula set out in the statute, commonly referred to as the "means test," yields a minimum amount of monthly disposable income.

The means test uses a series of calculations to determine whether the section 707(b)(2) presumption of abuse arises. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A). Specifically, the means test calculates a debtor's current monthly income, as defined under 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A) (hereafter "CMI"), based on the debtor's average income for the six calendar months preceding the month of the bankruptcy filing. If the debtor's CMI is above the applicable state median family income, as is the case here, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A) calculates the debtor's monthly disposable income available to repay creditors by reducing the CMI by certain categories of expenses identified in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv). If a debtor's monthly disposable income, calculated by reducing the CMI by allowed expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) - (iv), is less than $100 per month (or $6,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does not arise. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A).[2] If the debtor's monthly disposable income is equal to or exceeds $167 per month (or $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does arise. Id. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is between $100 and $167 per month (between $6,000 and $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse arises if the disposable income, over 60 months, is sufficient to pay 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured debt. Id.

If the presumption of abuse arises under section 707(b)(2) based on the means test, the debtor may attempt to rebut the presumption under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B) by demonstrating special circumstances that justify income or expense adjustments for which there is no reasonable alternative.

Each debtor with primarily consumer debts is required to file, in conjunction with his or her bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs, a Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation, Official Form 22A of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure ("Form 22A"). 11 U.S.C. § 521 and § 707(b)(2)(C). In chapter 7 cases the main purpose of the Form 22A is to calculate monthly disposable income (ability to pay) following the formula set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), and determine whether the presumption of abuse arises.

[2] Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 104, the dollar amounts set forth in Title 11 and applicable to the threshold amounts for determining when the presumption of abuse arises under the means test were adjusted based on the consumer price index for cases filed on or after April 1, 2007. This case is not subject to the dollar amount adjustments.

2. Factual Background

On September 30, 2006, Ms. Lynn Meade filed a petition seeking relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code along with the required schedules and statements, including a Means Test Form. (R. at 1, 2). Ms. Meade's petition provided that her debts were primarily consumer debts as that term is used in the Code. (R. at 1).[3] Ms. Meade listed $45,963.60 in annual current monthly income on her Means Test Form, which exceeded the applicable median family income of $35,408.00 in Texas for a household of one person. (R. at 2).

Because Ms. Meade's current monthly income exceeded the applicable Texas median, she was required to complete the expense portion of the Means Test Form. Interim Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(b)(4). On her Means Test Form, Ms. Meade claimed monthly expenses of $3,836.33. (R. at 2). When subtracted from her reported current monthly income of $3,830.30 per month, Ms. Meade's Means Test Form showed -$6.03 in monthly disposable income. (Id.) Because the presumption of abuse does not arise if a debtor's monthly disposable income is below $100, the debtor checked the box on the first page of her Means Test Form indicating that the presumption of abuse did not arise. (Id.).

In calculating her expenses, however, Ms Meade deducted $471.00 at Line 23 of her Means Test Form, as a "Local Standards" transportation ownership/lease expense, Vehicle 1. (Id.). Ms. Meade owns one vehicle, a 1996 Subaru Legacy Wagon, but she owns the vehicle free of any monthly car or lease payment. (R. at 1).

Because Ms. Meade did not have a lease or car payment expense, the United States Trustee concluded Ms. Meade could not claim that $471 deduction under 11 U.S.C. §707(b)(2)(A). (R. at 4). Instead, the United States Trustee concluded applicable law allowed [3] On her Schedule F, titled "Creditors Holding Unsecured Claims," the debtor listed general unsecured debts totaling $274,180.00. (R. at 1).

Ms. Meade to take an additional $200 deduction under the IRS Transportation Standards for vehicle operation, because she was operating a vehicle over six years old and/or with reported mileage of 75,000 or more miles with no loan/lease payment obligation. See Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5, Chapter 8, Section 5, at 5.8.5.5.2 (09-01-2005).

Based on this additional operating expense adjustment and a few other minor adjustments, the United States Trustee calculated that Ms. Meade had $303.97 in monthly disposable income under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). (R. at 3, 4).[4] Because $303.97 exceeded the $166.67 threshold necessary to trigger the Bankruptcy Code's statutory presumption of abuse, the United States Trustee filed a statement with the bankruptcy court, as required by 11 U.S.C. 704(b)(1)(A), that the case was presumed to be an abuse. (R. at 9) and then filed a timely motion to dismiss the case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). (R. at 4). The United States Trustee's motion explained that dismissal was appropriate because without the erroneous deduction Ms. Meade's case was presumptively abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) (Id.).

At the hearing on the motion, the court ruled in favor of the United States Trustee, holding that the presumption of abuse did arise and that the debtor had not demonstrated special circumstances to rebut the presumption of abuse. (R. at 8). By order entered March 1, 2007, the bankruptcy court ordered Ms. Meade's chapter 7 bankruptcy case dismissed unless she voluntarily converted it to chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code before March 8, 2007. (R. at 6). Ms. Meade timely filed a notice of appeal from that order on March 3, 2007. (R. at 7).[5] [4] The motion contended that the amount of the expense on Line 32 of the Means Test Form for Other Necessary Expenses: Telecommunications Services should be $75 instead of $150. (R. at 4). In addition, the United States Trustee included a $36 deduction on Line 45, Chapter 13 Administrative Expenses where the debtor had included none. (R. at 4). The debtor did not dispute either adjustment. (R. at 5).

[5] Ms. Meade did not appeal from the court's ruling that she had not demonstrated special circumstances to rebut the presumption of abuse.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court correctly granted the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the debtor's case because the presumption of abuse arose in the case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). The court dismissed the case based on its legal conclusion that Ms. Meade could not deduct a vehicle ownership expense loan or lease payment when she had none.

This ruling was correct for three reasons. First, Ms. Meade could claim only "applicable" expenses under section 707(b)(2), and she had no applicable vehicle ownership expense because she had no car loan and no car lease. By using the word "applicable," Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom the expenses actually apply. Because the vehicle acquisition/financing expense does not apply in Ms. Meade's case, the bankruptcy court correctly held that the she was not eligible to deduct it on her Means Test Form.

Second, construing the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as conditioning eligibility for the IRS Local Standard for vehicle ownership on the debtor having a monthly car payment is consistent with the Internal Revenue Service's longstanding application of this standard. Because the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim vehicle ownership expenses absent a monthly car payment expense, courts should not allow debtors to do so when applying the same Standard for means testing purposes. Indeed, both case law and legislative history underscore that Congress intended that the IRS' application of the Standards be considered in applying these Standards under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

Finally, the bankruptcy court's order comports with sound notions of public policy and a primary purpose of Congress in passing the 2005 amendments to the Bankruptcy Code - including the amendments at issue in this appeal. The 2005 amendments were designed to ensure that debtors would repay their debts when they can. By preventing Ms. Meade from claiming a phantom expense, the court below acted in conformity with that purpose, and ensured that a debtor who has an ability to repay some of her debts will not receive bankruptcy relief without paying what she can.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court's Order Should Be Affirmed Because Ms. Meade Was Not Eligible to Claim the Vehicle Ownership Expense Under the IRS Local Standards, and Therefore, the Expense was Not "Applicable" to Her.

The bankruptcy court order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss Ms. Meade's case as a presumed abuse of chapter 7 should be affirmed because Ms. Meade was not entitled to deduct a vehicle ownership expense on her Means Test Form when she has no vehicle loan or lease payment. Like she did below, Ms. Meade argues on appeal that the plain language of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) mandates that she be allowed vehicle acquisition expenses she does not have. (Appellant's Brief at 4-9). Ms. Meade fails to recognize, however, that the Code only allows debtors to claim "applicable" expenses, and her claimed vehicle ownership expenses are not applicable because she does not have a monthly car payment obligation. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a debtor's monthly expenses "shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The statute specifically provides that before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense itself must first be applicable to the debtor.

The Bankruptcy Code does not define the word "applicable," nor has the United States Trustee identified any Supreme Court decision that provides a definition. Where, as here, a statutory term is undefined, a basic principle of statutory construction provides that courts should give such terms their ordinary meanings. E.g., Smith v. U.S., 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning.") The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean applying or capable of being applied; relevant; suitable; appropriate. Random House Unabridged Dictionary (2006). Accordingly, such a meaning should be imparted to the term "applicable" as it appears in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) absent clear indication that Congress intended to give such term a different meaning. See Thompson v. Goetzmann, 337 F.3d 489, 498 n.20 (5th Cir. 2003) ("dictionaries are a principal source for ascertaining the ordinary meaning of statutory language.").

The bankruptcy court's order is consistent with the word's ordinary, common sense definition. By inserting the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom such expenses are "relevant; suitable; appropriate." Since Ms. Meade did not have vehicle financing expenses, the court below correctly found that they simply did not apply to her. See In re Devilliers, 2007 WL 92504, *6 (Bankr. E.D. La. Jan. 9, 2007) (debtor may claim IRS ownership expense only after "a determination is made as to the type of expenses allowed and applicable to the debtor"); In re Wiggs, 2006 WL 2246432, *2-3 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006) (statute is "clear and unambiguous," and "term 'applicable' modifies the amounts specified to limit the expenses to only those that apply," such that debtors were not allowed ownership expense when they did not have a vehicle payment.).

By using the term “applicable” in this way, a determination of allowable expenses under the means test is a two-step process. The first step is eligibility - i.e, does the debtor qualify for an expense allowance in the category at issue? If so, then the second step is to quantify the expense amount the eligible debtor is allowed by looking at the IRS Standard amounts that are specified for the number of vehicles owned by the debtor and where the debtor lives. See, e.g. In re Carlin, 348 B.R. 795, 798 (Bankr. D. Or. 2006) (“There is nothing absurd in Congress drawing the line for vehicle ownership expense eligibility at those debtors who are making payments on the vehicle.”) Ms. Meade seeks to skip the first step and proceed directly to the second.

The debtor’s interpretation is not consistent with the ordinary reading of the word “applicable,” and her proposed usage would make the word surplusage in the statute. The debtor asserts that the plain language of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows all debtors who simply own a vehicle to claim the ownership expense category (which represents vehicle acquisition financing costs) under the IRS Local Standards. (Appellant’s Brief at 6-9). To reach this conclusion, Ms. Meade suggests that the “better” reading of the word “applicable” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is “expenses applicable to the debtor because of where he lives and how large his household is, it makes no difference whether he ‘actually’ has the expense.” Id., at 8.

Rather than providing a “better” reading, as Ms. Meade suggests, the debtor’s interpretation of the word “applicable” would render that word redundant in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) expressly requires debtors to use the Local Standard “for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief.” If the meaning of “applicable” in that section is also simply a function of where the debtor resides, it would be redundant. It is a fundamental axiom of statutory construction that a court should try to give meaning to the whole statute and not render a portion of the statute as mere surplusage. E.g., Gustafson v. Alloyd Co., 513 U.S. 561, 574 (1995) (Court avoids interpreting statutes in a way that "renders some words altogether redundant."). Although some courts have suggested that "applicable" refers in part to the county in which the debtor resides, see, e.g., In re Wilson, 356 B.R. 114, 119 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006); In re Farrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. 224, 230-31 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006), the bankruptcy court's recognition below that the word "applicable" refers to whether the debtor qualifies for this expense gives meaning to the word without creating redundancy.

Given that Ms. Meade did not have an ownership or lease payment on her car, the IRS Ownership Cost Standard was not applicable to her. By excluding that inapplicable expense, the court below properly determined that the presumption of abuse arose in this case. Accordingly, the order entered below should be affirmed.

II. The Bankruptcy Court's Order Should Be Affirmed Because it is Supported By the Internal Revenue Service's Application of its Own Local Standard for Vehicle Acquisition Costs and Caselaw Analyzing Such Application by the IRS of its Own Standard.

The bankruptcy court's order disallowing a deduction for vehicle financing where Ms. Meade did not have a loan or lease payment on her car is also supported by the Internal Revenue Service's longstanding application of its own Standards. In providing which deductions debtors may take under the means test, Congress specifically stated that debtors are permitted to deduct "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service." (emphasis added). 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

On page two of its Collection Financial Standards under the heading "Transportation" the IRS provides as follows:

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs . . . . The ownership costs provide maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense . . . . If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

See IRS Collection Standards (emphasis added), available at ww.irs.gov/individuals/article/0,,id=96543,00.html; see also Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

The "ownership cost" was specifically calculated by the IRS based on the cost to finance the acquisition of a vehicle, and is not simply a cost associated with owning a car, such as repair or maintenance, as Ms. Meade suggests. (Appellant's Brief at 9.) Under the heading "Recent Revisions" to the Collection Financial Standards posted on the IRS website, the IRS notes that the "ownership cost" Standards are based on the "five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors." See id. As such, the "ownership cost" expense is not applicable if a debtor does not have a monthly expense related to financing a car. See In re Devilliers, --- B.R. ---, 2007 WL 92504, *10 (Bankr. E.D. La. Jan. 9, 2007) (The ownership allowance "is not the equivalent of an allowance for depreciation or an invitation for a debtor to 'save' for the ultimate replacement of an existing vehicle. Instead, the deduction is designed to assist with the acquisition of a vehicle on credit.").

The IRS recognizes that the vehicle "ownership cost" portion of the Local Transportation Standards is intended to apply only in situations where the debtor has a monthly vehicle acquisition financing expense, i.e., has a monthly vehicle lease or loan payment. Accordingly, the Local Standard for vehicle ownership is an expense that is not necessarily "applicable" to every debtor. This stands in stark contrast to the National Standards for food, clothing, and other items, which the IRS allows to all debtors based on their family size and income level "without questioning amounts actually spent." See Offer in Compromise Frequently Asked Questions, published by the Internal Revenue Service on its website at http://www.irs.gov/businesses/small/article/0,,id=108356,00.html#45. "Thus, if a debtor is not incurring expenses for the purchase or lease of a vehicle, the debtor cannot claim a vehicle ownership expense under the IRS standards."[6] In re McGuire, 342 B.R. 608, 613 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2006); see also In re Ceasar, --- B.R. ---, 2007 WL 777821, *5 (Bankr. W.D. La. Mar. 6, 2007) (agreeing with the McGuire line of cases and noting that courts that disagree give too little weight to the critical qualifying word "applicable.").

How the Internal Revenue Service applies the Standards that it developed for its own internal debt collection purposes is relevant and should be considered by courts in applying the same Standards in an analysis under section 707(b)(2). When Congress developed the means test, it "could have started from scratch, and created a system that was rigid but easy to administer, such as how many view workers' compensation or

Instead, Congress "incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code an existing, administrative system that the IRS had long had in place." Id. This incorporation "strongly suggests that courts should look to how the IRS determined those standards; that is, as to how the IRS would have applied them in similar circumstances." Id. at *14.

In stating that the amounts "specified" by the IRS Standards may be deducted from CMI to yield a debtor's disposable income, Congress "essentially read[ ] into the Code not only the actual numbers contained in the IRS Standards, but also the Manual's context for their application." In re Howell, --- B.R. ---, 2007 WL 1237832 at *3 (Bankr. D. Kan. Apr. 26, 2007). Thus, "if guidance is sought on the meaning of the IRS standards that Congress incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code, practical reason would suggest that court should consider the full manner by which the IRS uses these standards." Slusher, --- B.R. ---, 2007 WL 118009 at 14; see also Howell*, 2007 WL 1237832 at *3 ("It is unlikely that Congress intended the Statute to merely import the numbers without their attendant meaning and context"); In re Oliver, 350 B.R. 294, 301 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 2006) (holding that debtor is not entitled to vehicle ownership expense because IRS Financial Analysis Handbook and Internal Revenue Manual limit expense to individuals that have loan or lease payment); In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718, 726 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) (same).

Considering IRS practice in interpreting "applicable expenses in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not negate the section's later allowance of "actual" monthly expenses in the IRS categories of "Other Necessary Expenses," as the debtor claims.

Rather, “a natural reading” of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) indicates that the words “actual” and “applicable” limit the relevant expense deductions in different ways. Slusher, --- B.R. ---, 2007 WL 118009 at *13. For the categories for which the Local Standards apply, debtors may claim the standard expenses for which they are eligible, i.e. those that are “applicable” to the debtor; for the Other Necessary Expenses category, the debtors may claim the “amount they actually spend, i.e. their “actual” monthly expenses. “Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to read, ‘The debtor’s monthly expenses shall be the monthly amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards . . .’ rather than ‘The debtor’s monthly expenses shall be the debtor’s applicable monthly expenses amounts specified under the National and Local Standards.’” Id. (emphasis in original).

Given the IRS’ historic application of its National Standards and Local Standards up to the time of BAPCPA’s enactment, “it would be quite odd if Congress intended to preclude courts from examining the context in which the authoring agency, the IRS, used and employed those standards.” Id. Nothing compels such an odd reading, and the court below correctly found, consistent with IRS practice, that the IRS vehicle Ownership Standards do not apply to this debtor.

III. The Bankruptcy Court’s Order Supports the Major Goals of the 2005 Amendments to the Bankruptcy Code and Will Not Lead to Unfair Distinctions Between Debtors.

The bankruptcy court’s order also comports with Congress’ goals and purpose in implementing bankruptcy reform. Congress amended the Bankruptcy Code in BAPCPA to rectify perceived abuses in the bankruptcy process. “Among the abuses identified by Congress was the easy access to chapter 7 liquidation proceedings by consumer debtors who, if required to file under chapter 13, could afford to pay some dividend to their unsecured creditors." Hardacre, 338 B.R. at 720 citing 151 Cong. Rec. S2459, 2469-70 (March 10, 2005). A "primary goal" of BAPCPA was to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006) citing H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 1 (2005), as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89. In cases such as this one, where the debtor has no loan or lease payment, Congress has established a system which does not provide her an expense deduction for vehicle financing. "Allowing debtors to deduct from their disposable income a fictional ownership allowance would give debtors with unencumbered vehicles a windfall at the expense of their unsecured creditors." Howell, 2007 WL 1237832 at *3.

Ms. Meade suggests that limiting the vehicle ownership expense allowance to debtors with loan or lease payments will unfairly prejudice some debtors. (Appellant's Brief at 9-10). Ms. Meade crafts a scenario where a debtor has only one payment remaining on her vehicle on the date of filing yet still can claim an ownership deduction. Id. However, the debtor in this hypothetical stands a strong likelihood of having her case dismissed as an abuse under section 707(b)(3) based on the totality of the circumstances of this debtor's financial situation. The fact that this hypothetical debtor only has one car payment post-petition is a circumstance that would most likely suggest an ability to pay her unsecured debt at a level that demonstrates abuse. Where the presumption of abuse does not arise under § 707(b)(2), "the court must then consider a debtor's actual income and expenses in determining abuse based on ability to pay under § 707(b)(1) and (3)." In re Mestemaker, 2007 WL 79306 at *5 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Jan. 10, 2007); accord In re Haar, 2007 WL 521221, *2, *9 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Feb. 20, 2007) (section 707(b)(3) is "completely independent from § 707(b)(2)," providing "an independent basis to dismiss a case for abuse").

Ms. Meade's alternative suggestion that allowing debtors to deduct the IRS Transportation Ownership/Lease expense even if they do not have a monthly car payment "would advance one of the underlying purposes of the statute," (Appellant's Brief at 9), conflicts with the primary legislative purpose for BAPCPA. Ms. Meade suggests that Congress "apparently" included reference to the Local and National Standards in section 707(b)(2)(a)(ii)(I) to provide a set of standard expenses that could easily be applied by all courts. (Id.) As set forth above, by mandating the use of the amounts specified in the Standards by the IRS, the expenses in these categories are easy to apply. Moreover, the requirement that a loan or lease payment obligation is a prerequisite to claiming the expense does not make application any more difficult. Further, Congress' main purpose in enacting the amendments was to "ensure that those who can afford to repay some portion of their unsecured debtor be required to do so … ." 151 CONG. REC. S2470 (March 10, 2005). Ms. Meade's reading of the statute conflicts with this stated purpose because it would allow debtors without a monthly vehicle payment to deduct expenses they do not actually incur and obtain an immediate discharge of debts, a portion of which they have an ability to repay.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order granting the motion to dismiss the case entered below.

APPENDIX A

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

No. 07-2405

MILAVETZ, GALLOP & MILAVETZ, P.A.;
ROBERT J. MILAVETZ; BARBARA N. NEVIN;
JOHN DOE; MARY DOE, APPELLEES

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, APPELLANT

COMMERCIAL LAW LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
AMICUS ON BEHALF OF APPELLEE

Submitted: Mar. 11, 2008
Filed: Sept. 4, 2008
(Corrected Sept. 23, 2008)

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES
DISTRICT COURT FOR THE
DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA

Before: BYE, SMITH, and COLLOTON, Circuit Judges.

SMITH, Circuit Judge.

Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A., a law firm that practices bankruptcy law, the firm's president, a bankruptcy attorney within the firm, and two clients[1] who sought bankruptcy advice from the firm brought suit against the United States seeking a declaratory judgment that certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA)—11 U.S.C. §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)—did not apply to attorneys and law firms and are unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs and issued an order declaring that: (1) attorneys in the District of Minnesota were excluded from the definition of a "debt relief agency" as defined by BAPCPA; and (2) the challenged provisions were unconstitutional as applied to attorneys in the District of Minnesota. We affirm in part and reverse in part.

I. Background

On April 20, 2005, BAPCPA was signed into law, amending and adding multiple sections of the Bankruptcy Code ("the Code"). While some of these amendments became effective immediately, the vast majority became effective on October 17, 2005. See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 1501(a), 119 Stat. 23 (2005) ("Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act and the amendments made by this act shall take effect 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act").

[1] The client-plaintiffs sought prebankruptcy advice regarding the incurrence of additional debt prior to filing bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Code precludes a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person from incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Thus, these client-plaintiffs are appearing on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated who desire to exercise their First Amendment rights with attorneys regarding bankruptcy information.

One BAPCPA amendment added a new term, "debt relief agency," which is defined in § 101(12A) of the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A).[2] The amended Code restricts some actions of debt relief agencies, while requiring them to do others. See 11 U.S.C. § 526 ("Restrictions on debt relief agencies"); 11 U.S.C. § 528 ("Requirements for debt relief agencies"). For example, § 526(a)(4) bars a debt relief agency from advising a client "to incur more debt in contemplation" of a bankruptcy filing, 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), while §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure in their bankruptcy-related advertisements directed to the general public declaring: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code[,]' or a substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The plaintiffs sought alternative remedies. First, plaintiffs requested a declaratory judgment that attorneys did not fall within the definition of "debt relief agency." If the court determined that attorneys fell within the definition of debt relief agency, they challenged the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), as applied to attorneys.

II. Discussion

A. Debt Relief Agencies

Initially, we address whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies. If they do not, we will have no need to address the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), which only apply to debt relief agencies. See Holtan v. Black, 838 F.2d

---

[2] Prior to BAPCPA, the term "debt relief agency" did not exist in the Code.

984, 986 n.3 (8th Cir. 1988) ("Federal courts must avoid passing upon constitutional questions unless they are essential to the disposition of the issues before them.") (citing Three Affiliated Tribes v. Wold Engineering, 467 U.S. 138, 157 (1984) ("It is a fundamental rule of judicial restraint, however, that this Court will not reach constitutional questions in advance of necessity of deciding them")).

> The term "debt relief agency" means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include—
> > (A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;
> >
> > (B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;
> >
> > (C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;
> >
> > (D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or

> (E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (emphasis added).

Further, the Code defines the term "bankruptcy assistance" to mean:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

Id. at § 101(4A) (emphasis added).

Additionally, the Code defines the term "assisted person" as "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $164,250."[3] Id. at § 101(3).

The plaintiffs argue that attorneys are not "debt relief agencies" because the definition of debt relief agencies makes no direct reference to attorneys, even though "attorney" is a defined term in the Code, id. at § 101(4),[4] but does include the term "bankruptcy petition pre-

[3] When this suit was commenced, the dollar amount in § 101(3) was $150,000. Subsequently, on April 1, 2007, the amount was adjusted pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 104. The change, however, is inconsequential for purposes of this case.

[4] "The term 'attorney' means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law." 11 U.S.C. § 101(4). This definition makes no reference to "debt relief agencies" or to subsection (12A).

parer" which, by definition, excludes debtor's attorneys and their staff. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1).[5] Plaintiffs contend that the omission of any reference to attorneys or lawyers while specifically including bankruptcy petition preparers shows Congress's intent to exclude attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies. Because the plaintiffs contend that constitutionality issues arise in §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) if attorneys are debt relief agencies, they assert that the doctrine of constitutional avoidance should be used to interpret "debt relief agency" to exclude attorneys and thus avoid the potential constitutional issues.

Conversely, the government argues that attorneys are debt relief agencies because the broadly worded definition of the term plainly includes attorneys, see 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (defining "debt relief agency" as "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment"), and providing legal representation is included in definition of bankruptcy assistance. See id. at 101(4A) ("bankruptcy assistance means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing . . . advice, counsel, . . . or legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title").

[5] "'[B]ankruptcy petition preparer' means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing [by the debtor in connection with his bankruptcy case]." 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1) (emphasis added); see also id. at § 110(a)(2) (defining "document for filing" as used in § 110(a)(1)).

Whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies is an issue of first impression among the Courts of Appeals. Although the plain language of the definition appears to include bankruptcy attorneys and does not appear to be ambiguous, lower "[c]ourts that have addressed the issue of whether attorneys are debt relief agencies have not been unanimous." In re Irons, 379 B.R. 680, 685 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2007) (citing cases). Nevertheless, the majority of courts have held that compensated bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies as that term is defined in the Code. Id. (finding debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency); Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906 (D. Or. 2006) (same); In re Robinson, 368 B.R. 492 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2007) (finding debtor's counsel was debt relief agency); Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19 (N.D. Tex. 2006) (finding that bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies); In re Norman, No. 06-70859, 2006 WL 3053309 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2006) (finding debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency); but see In re Attorneys at Law and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005) (holding that attorneys are not debt relief agencies); In re Reyes, 361 B.R. 276 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007) (finding that attorneys, generally, are not debt relief agencies, but ruling that debtor's counsel in case at bar was not a debt relief agency because service was provided pro bono and thus counsel did not receive valuable consideration in return for the bankruptcy assistance provided).

In this case, the district court acknowledged that the definition of debt relief agency, "at first glance," appeared to include attorneys, but it ultimately relied on the doctrine of constitutional avoidance to conclude that attorneys did not fall within the definition because if they did portions of §§ 526 and 528 would be unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The doctrine of constitutional avoidance dictates that "where an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, the Court will construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such construction is plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988). Thus, if interpreting "debt relief agency" to include attorneys "would raise serious constitutional problems," then we should look for another interpretation "that may fairly be ascribed" to the definition that does not raise these concerns. Id. at 576-77. We will not, however, adopt an alternative interpretation that is "plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 575.

"We review the district court's statutory interpretation de novo." United States v. Mendoza-Gonzalez, 520 F.3d 912, 914 (8th Cir. 2008). To interpret the statute we first "determine whether the language at issue has a plain and unambiguous meaning with regard to the particular dispute in the case." Id. (quoting Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 340 (1997)). "If so, we apply the plain language of the statute." Id. "A mere disagreement among litigants over the meaning of the statute does not prove ambiguity; it usually means that one of the litigants is simply wrong." Bank of Am. Nat'l Trust & Sav. Ass'n v. 203 N. LaSalle St. P'ship, 526 U.S. 434, 461 (1999).

The plain reading of the definition of debt relief agency, and the defined terms that make up that definition, leads us to conclude that attorneys who provide "bankruptcy assistance" to "assisted persons" are unambiguously included in the definition of "debt relief agencies." See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 912 ("[I]t is the plain language of the Act that leads to the conclusion that attorneys are to be included in the definition of 'debt relief agency,'" and "[t]hus, further use of the tools of statutory construction is not necessary"). The statutory language sweeps broadly and clearly covers the legal services provided by attorneys to debtors in bankruptcy unless excluded by another provision.

Congress specifically listed five exclusions from the definition of "debt relief agency," and if it meant to exclude attorneys from that definition it could have explicitly done so. Id.; 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). Moreover, if attorneys were not included in the definition of debt relief agencies, Congress would have had no reason to include § 526(d)(2), which expressly provides that nothing in §§ 526, 527, or 528 (the sections covering debt relief agencies) "shall be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability of a State . . . to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A) and (B). The legislative history provides further indication that attorneys are included in the definition. See H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 4 (April 8, 2005) ("The bill's consumer protections include provisions strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases") (emphasis added).[6]

[6] Additionally, while we recognize that the Supreme Court has stated that "failed legislative proposals are a particularly dangerous ground on which to rest [a statutory interpretation]," Lockhart v. United States, 546 U.S. 142 (2005) (internal quotation marks and brackets

Because attorneys were not specifically excluded from the definition of debt relief agencies, we hold that attorneys that provide "bankruptcy assistance" to "assisted persons" are "debt relief agencies" as that term is defined by the Code. Interpreting the definition of "debt relief agency" to exclude bankruptcy attorneys would be contrary to Congress's intent.

B. Constitutionality of § 526(a)(4)

Having concluded that attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, we now must determine whether the challenged provisions placing restrictions and requirements on debt relief agencies are unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to these types of attorneys.[7] One of the sections challenged by the plaintiffs in this case is § 526(a)(4), which states:

omitted), we note that on March 9, 2005, Senator Feingold proposed amendment No. 93 to Congress which would have excluded attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies, see 151 Cong. Rec. S2306-02, 2316 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 2005) (statement by Sen. Feingold) ("This amendment would exclude lawyers from the provisions dealing with 'debt relief agencies' . . . ."), but the Senate did not address the proposal.

[7] Even though a more narrowly drawn version of § 526(a)(4) would likely be valid as applied to the plaintiffs in this case, our analysis applies to all attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies, not merely the plaintiff-attorneys. See Members of City Council of City of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 798-99 (1984) (explaining that the overbreadth doctrine allows a party to challenge a broadly written statute "even though a more narrowly drawn statute would be valid as applied to the party in the case," as "the statute's very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression") (internal quotations and citation omitted).

(a) A debt relief agency shall not—

> (4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Plaintiffs assert that the prohibition against advising an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy violates the First Amendment. The parties disagree as to the level of scrutiny we apply to the constitutional analysis of this limitation on speech. Plaintiffs claim that we should review the constitutionality of § 526(a)(4) under the strict scrutiny standard as the restriction on attorney advice is content-based. See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994) ("Our precedents thus apply the most exacting scrutiny to regulations that suppress, disadvantage, or impose differential burdens upon speech because of its content"). Under strict scrutiny review, the government has the burden to prove that the constraints on speech are supported by a compelling governmental interest and are narrowly tailored, such that the statutory effect does not prohibit any more speech than is necessary to serve the governmental interest. Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 774-75 (2002).

In contrast, the government argues that § 526(a)(4)'s restrictions are a type of ethical regulation, invoking the more lenient standard outlined in Gentile v. State Bar of Nev., 501 U.S. 1030 (1991). Under the Gentile standard, we would balance the First Amendment rights of the attorneys against the government's legitimate interest in regulating the activity in question—the prohibition of advising assisted persons to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy—and then determine whether the regulations impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." Id. at 1075.

According to the government, § 526(a)(4) should be interpreted as merely preventing an attorney from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to take on more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy when the incurrence of such debt is done with the intent to manipulate the bankruptcy system, engage in abusive conduct, or take unfair advantage of the bankruptcy discharge. However, the plain language of the statute does not permit this narrow interpretation. Rather, § 526(a)(4) broadly prohibits a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy. The statute's blanket prohibition applies even if the additional debt would not be discharged during the bankruptcy proceedings. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Thus, regardless of whether the government's interest in prohibiting the speech was legitimate (Gentile standard) or compelling (strict scrutiny standard), § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies because it is not narrowly tailored, nor narrowly and necessarily limited, to restrict only that speech that the government has an interest in restricting. Instead, § 526(a)(4) prohibits attorneys classified as debt relief agencies from advising any assisted person to incur any additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy; this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent pre-bankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws. Section 526(a)(4), as written, prevents attorneys from fulfilling their duty to clients to give them appropriate and beneficial advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code or other applicable law.[8]

There are certain situations where it would likely be in the assisted person's, and even the creditors', best interest for the assisted person to incur additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. However, under § 526(a)(4)'s plain language an attorney is prohibited from providing this beneficial advice—even if the advice could help the assisted person avoid filing for bankruptcy altogether. For instance, it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments. This could free up additional funds to pay off other debts and avoid the need for filing bankruptcy all together. Hersh, 347 B.R. at 24. Moreover, it may be in the client's best interest to incur additional debt to purchase a reliable automobile before filing for bankruptcy, so that the debtor will have dependable transportation to travel to and from work, which will likely be necessary to maintain the debtor's payments in bankruptcy. Id. Incurring these types of additional secured debt, which would often survive or could be reaffirmed by the debtor, may be in the debtor's best interest without harming the creditors.[9]

[8] Several bankruptcy courts are in agreement with our decision. See Zelotes, 363 B.R. at 667 ("Because § 526(a)(4) is not sufficiently 'narrowly tailored to achieve the desired objective,' it is unconstitutional as applied to bankruptcy attorneys."); Hersh, 347 B.R. at 25 (concluding that § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutional because: "(1) it prevents lawyers from advising clients to take lawful actions; and (2) it extends beyond abuse to prevent advice to take prudent actions," and therefore imposes "limitations on speech beyond what is 'narrow and necessary' "); Olsen, 350 B.R. at 916 ("[S]ection 526(a)(4) is overly restrictive in violation of the First Amendment" even if reviewed under Gentile standard).

Factual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist and may further illustrate why incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy may not be abusive or harmful to creditors. Nonetheless, § 526(a)(4), as written, does not allow attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies to advise assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons)—i.e. clients (or prospective clients) meeting the definition of assisted person—to incur such debt. Thus, § 526(a)(4) is not narrowly tailored nor narrowly and necessarily limited to prevent only that speech which the government has an interest in restricting. Therefore,

> [Section 526(a)(4)'s] prohibition is particularly troubling when it might be completely legal and even desirable for the client to incur such debt. For example, there may be instances where it is advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car on time. There would be no fraud in doing so if the client intended to pay such debt notwithstanding the filing of a contemplated bankruptcy case. For example, the client may intend to keep all payments fully current and to reaffirm such debt once the case is filed.

we hold that § 526(a)(4) is substantially overbroad,[10] and unconstitutional as applied to attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons, as those terms are defined in the Code.

C. Constitutionality of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)

The plaintiffs also challenged the constitutionality of §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B), claiming that the advertising disclosure requirements mandated by those sections violate the First Amendment rights of bankruptcy attorneys through compelled speech. The disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) are supplemented by § 528(a)(3). These sections state:

(a) A debt relief agency shall—

> (3) clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public (whether in general media, seminars or specific mailings, telephonic or electronic messages, or otherwise) that the services or benefits are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title; and

---

[10] See Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 248 F.3d 738, 747 (8th Cir. 2001) ("For us to find a statute unconstitutionally overbroad, its 'overbreadth . . . must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep.' ") (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973)).

> > relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or [sic] a substantially similar statement.

Similarly, § 528(b)(2)(B) states:

> (2) An advertisement, directed to the general public, indicating that the debt relief agency provides assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt shall—
>
> > (B) include the following statement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

11 U.S.C. § 528(b)(2)(B).

As both §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B) require debt relief agencies—which includes attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons—to disclose in their advertising that "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.' or some substantially similar statement," the statutes compel speech that, similar to a restriction on speech, receives constitutional protection under the First Amendment. See Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 714 (1977) ("[T]he right of freedom of thought protected by the First Amendment against state action includes both the right to speak freely and the right to refrain from speaking at all"); Turner Broad. Sys., Inc., 512 U.S. at 642 (stating that "[l]aws that compel speakers to utter or distribute speech bearing a particular message are subject to" constitutional scrutiny).

The government contends that Congress enacted § 528's disclosure requirements to address problems with deceitful or unclear advertising by bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, or other debt relief entities. This position is supported by legislative history. See 151 Cong. Rec. H2063-01, 2066 (daily ed. Apr. 14, 2005) (statement by Rep. Moran) (stating that certain BAPCPA provisions are intended to "[p]revent deceptive and fraudulent advertising practices by debt relief agencies . . ."). But before we can determine whether the government's justification for mandating the disclosures passes constitutional scrutiny, we must first decide the appropriate standard for reviewing the constitutionality of the required disclosures.

We find guidance for this issue from the Court in Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626 (1985). In Zauderer, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a state bar disciplinary regulation requiring attorneys that advertised contingent-fee representation to disclose in their advertisements that clients may still have to bear certain costs even if the case was unsuccessful. Id. at 633. As the regulation only required an attorney to "include in his advertising purely factual and uncontroversial information about the terms under which his services w[ould] be available," and "the extension of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is justified principally by the value to consumers of the information such speech provides, [the attorney's] constitutionally protected interest in not providing any particular factual information in his advertising is minimal."

Id. at 651. The Court "recognize[d] that unjustified or unduly burdensome disclosure requirements might offend the First Amendment by chilling protected commercial speech," but held "that an advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." Id. (emphasis added).

On the other hand, restrictions on non-deceptive advertising are reviewed under intermediate scrutiny. See Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 564 (1980) (ruling that restrictions on commercial speech that is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity must assert a "substantial interest to be achieved by [the] restrictions" and "the restrictions must directly advance the state interest involved"). Under this standard, the limitation must be narrowly drawn. Id. ("[I]f the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restrictions cannot survive").

The district court in this case reviewed § 528's disclosure requirements under the intermediate scrutiny standard, but we conclude that rational basis review is proper. The disclosure requirements here, like those in Zauderer, are intended to avoid potentially deceptive advertising. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651, n.14 (rejecting a more strict analysis of the disclosure requirements at issue in that case, and noting that "the First Amendment interests implicated by disclosure requirements are substantially weaker than those at stake when speech is actually suppressed . . .").

By definition, debt relief agencies provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons) "with respect to a case or proceeding under [the Bankruptcy Code]." 11 U.S.C. §§ 101(4A), (12A). Section 528 generally requires debt relief agencies to disclose on its advertisements of bankruptcy assistance services directed to the general public that their services do in fact relate to bankruptcy and that they assist people in filing for bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 528. As in Zauderer, the plaintiffs' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal." 471 U.S. at 650. Further, the disclosure requirements are reasonably and rationally related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors, as the disclosure requirements are directed precisely at the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services to the general public make clear that their services do in fact involve filing for bankruptcy.[11] related advertising materials directed to the general public. 11 U.S.C. §§ 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The requirement does not prevent those attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies "from conveying information to the public; it . . . only require[s] them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present." Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650. Moreover, if any of these attorneys are concerned that the required disclosures will confuse the public, we note that nothing in the Code prevents them from identifying themselves in their advertisements as both attorneys and debt relief agencies. Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920. Simply put, attorneys that provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, and the disclosure requirements of § 528 only require those attorneys to disclose factually correct statements on their advertising.[12] This does not violate the

Section 528 requires debt relief agencies to disclose: "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.' or a substantially similar statement," in all of their bankruptcy-

[11] Without ruling on the issue, we note that at least one lower court has held that § 528's disclosure requirements are constitutionally valid even under the stricter intermediate scrutiny analysis, as the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from misleading advertising is substantial, the disclosure requirements placed on bankruptcy attorneys directly advances the government's asserted interest, and the disclosure requirements are narrowly drawn to serve the government's interest. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920 (concluding that § 528 "passes constitutional muster" under either rational basis review or intermediate scrutiny review).

[12] We recognize that the broad definitions of debt relief agency, bankruptcy assistance, and assisted persons, might result in certain attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies even though they do not represent debtors in bankruptcy nor help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Code. Nevertheless, these attorneys are still subjected to the disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) when they advertise "bankruptcy assistance services or . . . the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public," 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3), (4), or when they advertise to the general public that they "provide[] assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt." Id. at § 528(b)(2). But because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure to the one suggested by the Code, these attorneys can and should tailor their advertisement disclosure statements to factually represent the "bankruptcy assistance" they provide. These tailored disclosures will meet the requirements of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) as long as they are "substantially similar" to the suggested disclosure, a decision which will require a case-by-case determination. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 919-20 (dismissing plaintiffs' claim that § 528 was uncon-

First Amendment. Id.; see also In re Robinson, 368 B.R. at 500-502 (finding that debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency subject to the strictures of § 528, and that § 528(a)(1)'s requirement for a written contract is constitutional); In re Norman, 2006 WL 3053309 at *4 (finding that debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency and thus must comply with the requirements of § 528(a)(1)).

The challenged sections of § 528 only require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure on certain advertisements. Although less intrusive means may be conceivable to prevent deceptive advertising, § 528's disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from deceptive advertising, and thus the section passes constitutional muster.

III. Conclusion

In sum, attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Bankruptcy Code, and § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutional as applied to these attorneys, but §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) are constitutional. Accordingly, we affirm in part and reverse in part.

stitutional, rejecting argument that attorney who met definition of debt relief agency but did not represent bankruptcy debtors was precluded from § 528's disclosure requirements because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure, which could be tailored to disclose that attorney advised clients about bankruptcy assistance matters but did not represent people in bankruptcy or file bankruptcy petitions, and stating that whether disclosure was "substantially similar" would require case-by-case determination).

COLLOTON, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I concur in all but Part II.B of the opinion of the court. I disagree, however, with the court's holding that 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad in violation of the First Amendment, and I would therefore reverse the district court's decision declaring this statutory provision unconstitutional.

Milavetz, Gallop, & Milavetz, P.A., mounts a facial attack on § 526(a)(4), arguing that the section's potential application to attorneys in hypothetical situations requires that the statute be declared impermissibly overbroad and unconstitutional. This case involves a facial challenge in the First Amendment context, "under which a law may be overturned as impermissibly overbroad because a substantial number of its applications are unconstitutional, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Wash. State Grange v. Wash. State Republican Party, 128 S. Ct. 1184, 1190 n.6 (2008). This "overbreadth doctrine," however, is "strong medicine that is used sparingly and only as a last resort." New York State Club Ass'n, Inc. v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1, 14 (1988) (internal quotations omitted). It should be applied only when there is "a realistic danger that the statute itself will significantly compromise recognized First Amendment protections of parties not before the Court." City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 801 (1984). The Supreme Court recently emphasized that it has "vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute's overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the stat-ute's plainly legitimate sweep." United States v. Williams, 128 S. Ct. 1830, 1838 (2008).[13]

To resolve the constitutional challenge brought by Milavetz, we must first construe the disputed statute. When presented with a constitutional challenge to an Act of Congress, we have not only the power, but the duty, to adopt a narrowing construction that will avoid constitutional difficulties whenever possible. Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 330-31 (1988). In Boos, for example, the Court considered a provision of federal legislation that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." Id. at 329 (internal quotation omitted). The Court observed that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330 (first emphasis added). Nonetheless, citing the "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties by [adopting a narrowing construction] if such a construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute narrowly to permit the dispersal of only congregations that are directed at an embassy, and to allow dispersal "only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present." Id. at 330-31 (internal quotation omitted). Similarly, in United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994), the Court emphasized that "it is incumbent upon" a federal court to read a statute to eliminate constitutional doubts, "so long as such a reading is not plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 78.

[13] The district court purported to consider only an "as-applied" challenge to § 526(a)(4), rather than an overbreadth challenge, and ultimately declared the section "unconstitutional as applied to attorneys." Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, 355 B.R. 758, 766 n.4, 769 (D. Minn. 2006). The majority correctly recognizes that the district court's approach is really an overbreadth analysis, and considers the statute under that framework. See ante, at 9 & n.7, 11, 13 & n.10. The "as applied" method of analysis, by contrast, considers the statute's application to a "particular claimant" based on "harm caused to the litigating party." Turchick v. United States, 561 F.2d 719, 721 n.3 (8th Cir. 1977). "The 'as applied' method vindicates a claimant whose conduct is within the First Amendment but invalidates the challenged statute only to the extent of the impermissible application." Id. (emphasis added). The district court and the majority have declared § 526(a)(4) unconstitutional in all of its applications to all attorneys, and the supporting reasoning is thus consistent with "facial overbreadth analysis." Id. (punctuation omitted).

The challenged provision in this case provides in part that "[a] debt relief agency shall not . . . advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Milavetz argues that according to this provision, a debt relief agency may not advise a client to incur any debt for any purpose when the client is contemplating the filing of a petition for bankruptcy. As such, Milavetz contends that an attorney could be sanctioned for "fulfilling his duty to his client to give legal and appropriate advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code." (Brief of Appellee 30). Even under Milavetz's broad construction of the statute, a facial challenge resting on a "few hypothetical situations," ante, at [14a], is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because "the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge." Vincent, 466 U.S. at 800.

It is unnecessary to resolve whether § 526(a)(4) is impermissibly overbroad when given its broadest reading, however, because the government suggests an acceptable narrowing construction of the statute that would avoid most constitutional difficulties. The government contends that "in contemplation of" filing for bankruptcy is a term of art that denotes an action taken with the intent to abuse the protections of bankruptcy laws. Under this view, the statute should be construed to prohibit only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system.

The text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for a narrowing construction. Particularly given the latitude of federal courts to narrow a text to avoid constitutional difficulties, see Boos, 485 U.S. at 330-31, the words "in contemplation of . . . filing a case" need not create impermissible overbreadth. Rather, we may recognize that the phrase "in contemplation of" has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system. Black's Law Dictionary reflects this understanding, defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "the thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding." Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (emphasis added). American and English authorities construing the bankruptcy laws also support the proposition that the words "in contemplation of" may be understood to require an intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws. In re Pearce, 19 F. Cas. 50, 53 (D. Vt. 1843) (No. 10873) (concluding that an act was done "in contemplation of bankruptcy" if it was done "in anticipation of breaking or failing in his business, of committing an act of bankruptcy, or of being declared bankrupt at his own instance, on the ground of inability to pay his debts, and intending to defeat the general distribution of effects, which takes place under a proceeding in bankruptcy.") (emphasis added); Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 Barn. & Ad. 289, 296, 110 Eng. Rep. 798, 801 (K.B. 1833) (Parke, J.) (interpreting "in contemplation of bankruptcy" to mean that "the payment or delivery must be with intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankruptcy."); Fidgeon v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539, 545-46, 128 Eng. Rep. 800, 802-03 (C.P. 1814) (Gibbs, C.J.) (An act made in contemplation of bankruptcy "must be intended in fraud of the bankrupt laws."); cf. Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U.S. 151, 167 (1851) ("To give to these words, contemplation of bankruptcy, a broad scope, and somewhat loose meaning, would not be in furtherance of the general purpose with which they were introduced."); id. at 169 (relying on English bankruptcy decisions as instructive authority on meaning of the former Bankrupt Act). Our duty to construe the statute to avoid constitutional difficulties counsels that we should look to these authorities for a plausible alternative to the broad construction urged by Milavetz.

The structure of § 526(a)(4) also supports a narrowing construction. The prohibitions of this statute can be enforced only through the civil remedies provided in § 526(c). An attorney who violates § 526(a)(4) can be sanctioned in just three situations: if a debtor sues the attorney for the available remedies—remittal of fees, actual damages, and reasonable attorney's fees and costs; if a state attorney general sues for a resident's actual damages; or if a court finds that the attorney intentionally violated § 526(a)(4), and chooses to "impose an appropriate civil penalty." 11 U.S.C. § 526(c). The remedies for a violation thus emphasize actual damages. But legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all. If an attorney advises a debtor to refinance his home to lower mortgage payments, or to purchase a reliable car to enable him to pay off his debts, see ante, at [13a-14a], then a debtor following that advice would suffer no damage. There is no reason to believe that a client could recover the remittal of attorney's fees or that a court would find a civil penalty "appropriate" as a remedy for legal advice that benefits both the debtor and his creditors. Rather, a debtor is likely to have a remedy against an attorney only in the case of an abusive bankruptcy petition, where the debtor may suffer damages if the petition is dismissed as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1), and where an attorney general or a court has reason to seek or impose sanctions against an abusive debt relief agency. The remedial focus of § 526 thus bolsters the proposition that § 526(a)(4) was aimed only at advice given by a debt relief agency that is designed to abuse the bankruptcy process.

The incorporation of an abusive purpose requirement into § 526(a)(4) is also consonant with the evident purpose of the statute. The government argues, and Milavetz acknowledges, that a principal goal of Congress in passing the statute was to "preclude debtors from taking on more debt knowing that it will later be discharged during bankruptcy." (Brief of Appellee 34). A narrowing construction of § 526(a)(4) is in accord with expressions of desire in the legislative history to address "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals," and

"abusive practices by consumer debtors who, for example, knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 5, 15 (2005) (internal quotation omitted), as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92, 101. Milavetz itself argues that a broad construction of § 526(a)(4) "goes beyond" this congressional purpose, and is "absurd," because it would prevent an attorney from advising a client to take actions that might avoid the need for filing bankruptcy altogether. (Brief of Appellee 34). Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that one party says is absurd, that the other party says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

For these reasons, I would reverse the district court's decision declaring unconstitutional the provision codified at 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA

No. 05-CV-2626 (JMR/FLN)

MILAVETZ, GALLOP & MILAVETZ P.A.,
ROBERT J. MILAVETZ, BARBARA N.
NEVIN, JOHN DOE, AND MARY DOE

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

[Dec. 7, 2006]

ORDER

Plaintiffs ask the Court to declare portions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA") unconstitutional. Defendant, United States of America ("the government") moves to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Defendant's motion is denied; the debt relief agency sections of BAPCPA unconstitutionally impinge on attorneys' First Amendment rights.

I. Background

On April 20, 2005, BAPCPA was signed into law, and became effective on October 17, 2005. Among its terms, BAPCPA defines a new category of bankruptcy service provider called a "debt relief agency." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (2005). The law forbids debt relief agencies from doing certain things, and requires them to do others. This lawsuit challenges a number of these provisions.

BAPCPA bars a debt relief agency from advising a client "to incur more debt in contemplation" of a bankruptcy filing. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). BAPCPA further requires that debt relief agencies' advertisements declare: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code," or a substantially similar statement. 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Plaintiffs are bankruptcy attorneys, their law firm, and two unnamed members of the public. Their attack on the statute is based on the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. They allege BAPCPA's debt relief agency provisions are unconstitutional as applied to them. They, initially, claim BAPCPA's regulation of attorneys' advice violates the First Amendment. Next, they claim BAPCPA's advertising requirements contravene the First Amendment.[1] Ultimately, they contend Congress did not intend the debt relief agency requirements to apply to attorneys. The government moves to dismiss plaintiffs' First Amendment claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of

[1] In a footnote, the government asks whether plaintiffs have standing to bring these claims, since they are in no danger of immediate harm. The government's query is misplaced; plaintiffs claim BAPCPA's debt relief agency sections both stifle and compel their speech, in violation of the U.S. Constitution. First Amendment jurisprudence makes clear that a claim that a law has a potential chilling effect on speech establishes standing. Virginia v. Am. Booksellers Ass'n, 484 U.S. 383, 392 (1988).

Civil Procedure ("Fed. R. Civ. P."). The government's motion is denied.

II. Discussion

A. Motion to Dismiss

A Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss must be denied unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts which would entitle him to relief. See Murphy v. Lancaster, 960 F.2d 746, 748 (8th Cir. 1992). In considering such a motion, the motion, the court construes the complaint, and all of its reasonable inferences, most favorably to plaintiff. Westcott v. City of Omaha, 901 F.2d 1486, 1488 (8th Cir. 1990).

B. Unnamed Plaintiffs

The complaint purports to set out the claims of two unnamed parties: John Doe and Mary Doe. The government denies there is any legal basis for anonymous plaintiffs in this lawsuit. Indeed, Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(a) is explicit: a complaint "shall include the names of all the parties." Notwithstanding Rule 10(a), plaintiffs claim their case falls within a limited realm of cases in which other interests—i.e., privacy and concern about embarrassment—outweigh the public's interest in open disclosure. Plaintiffs are incorrect.

There is a strong presumption against allowing parties to use a pseudonym. See, e.g., Doe v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield United of Wisconsin, 112 F.3d 869, 872 (7th Cir. 1997); Doe v. Frank, 951 F.2d 320, 323-24 (11th Cir. 1992); Southern Methodist Univ. Ass'n of Women Law Students v. Wynne & Jaffe, 599 F.2d 707, 712-13 (5th Cir. 1979). The reasons are obvious and compelling: identification of litigants is recognized as important in a public proceeding. See Blue Cross, 112 F.3d at 872. A party who invokes the judicial powers of the United States invites public scrutiny. "The people have a right to know who is using their courts." Id.

Limited exceptions to the party-publicity rule exist. Case law has recognized three factors which, if present, might support anonymity. They have been found when "(1) plaintiffs seeking anonymity were suing to challenge governmental activity; (2) prosecution of the suit compelled plaintiffs to disclose information 'of the utmost intimacy;' and (3) plaintiffs were compelled to admit their intention to engage in illegal conduct, thereby risking criminal prosecution." Doe v. Stegall, 653 F.2d 180, 185 (5th Cir. 1981) (quoting Wynne & Jaffe, 599 F.2d at 712-13). Although the listed factors are not exhaustive, they provide valuable guidance.

While the first factor is present here, the third is not. Plaintiffs argue their "wish to obtain legal advice from [plaintiff] attorneys . . . about prebankruptcy planning and filing bankruptcy" (1st Am. Compl. ¶ 10) suffices for the second factor. According to the Doe parties, the "financial situations of private citizens [are] clearly a matter of utmost intimacy, especially when they feel the need to seek advice about bankruptcy." (Pl.'s Brief 23).

Certainly, those facing bankruptcy are in financial straits; but that does not resolve the issue. Plaintiffs offer no case law to support their claim that merely seeking bankruptcy or financial advice is the kind of intimate personal information typically protected by the court. Bankruptcy is a public proceeding; the Doe plaintiffs are disclosing no medical information or deeply personal questions surrounding human reproduction or matters of that nature.

The Court finds the bankruptcy-seeking plaintiffs' interest in their financial privacy is outweighed by the public's stronger interest in maintaining open trials. Accordingly, the Doe plaintiffs shall amend their complaint to include their real names within 10 days of the date of this Order, or their claims will be dismissed.

C. Constitutional Challenges

1. Attorney Advice: Section 526(a)(4)

Plaintiffs claim BAPCPA's § 526(a)(4), titled "[r]estrictions on debt relief agencies," has "a chilling effect upon lawyers," in violation of their First Amendment rights. (1st Am. Compl. ¶ 39.) Section [526(a)(4)] states:

> A debt relief agency shall not . . . advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

The parties disagree as to the standard of review applied to the constitutional analysis of this section. Plaintiffs claim the standard of review for a restriction on lawful and truthful attorney advice is strict scrutiny. The government replies that § 526(a)(4)'s restrictions are merely a species of ethical regulation, invoking the more lenient standard outlined in Gentile v. State Bar of Nev., 501 U.S. 1030 (1991). Under Gentile, the Court would balance the First Amendment rights of attorneys against the government's legitimate interest in regulating the activity in question, and then determine whether the regulations impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." Id. at 1075. The Court rejects the government's proposed standard.

The "ethical rule" of which the government speaks appears to exist only in its pleadings; the statute discloses no quasi-religious or ethical principle. The government "cannot foreclose the exercise of constitutional rights by mere labels." See NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 429 (1963). While the section is certainly a rule, nothing in § 526 alludes to ethics. The section is titled "Restrictions on debt relief agencies," and plainly prohibits certain acts. The advice the Section forecloses may be potentially advantageous to creditors, but this does not make it equivalent to ethics either in logic or in law.

When fairly viewed, the Court finds § 526(a)(4) to be a content-based regulation of attorney speech—it restricts attorneys from giving particular information and advice to their clients. Attorneys are forbidden to advise their clients concerning an entire subject—incurring more debt in contemplation of filing for bankruptcy. This is a plain regulation of speech. Beyond this, the forbidden speech trenches on two other important areas of concern.

First, the lawyer's advice to take on certain additional financial obligations in contemplation of bankruptcy may well be in the client's best interest.[2] A law

[2] For example, it may be in the client's interest to obtain or refinance a home mortgage prior to filing bankruptcy, because one who has declared bankruptcy may well be denied a lower interest rate after the filing. If the client gets a lower rate mortgage, the refinanced mortgage may have smaller payments which could forestall, or even prevent the bankruptcy in the first place. Similar arguments can be made concern-

yer's highest duty is to the client, and the statute's forbidden advice may indeed be helpful to the client. Secondly, this statute does not restrict false statements—arguably implicating some "ethical" precept—it forbids truthful and possibly efficacious advice. If this is the government's view of legal ethics, it is a form of ethics unfamiliar to the Court.

As the United States Supreme Court has explained, "[g]overnment action that stifles speech on account of its message, or that requires the utterance of a particular message favored by the Government, contravenes th[e] essential [First Amendment] right[s]" of private citizens. Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 641 (1994). For this reason, "governmental control over the content of messages expressed by private individuals" is unconstitutional except in narrow circumstances. Id.

As the Court finds § 526(a)(4) to be a content-based restriction on protected speech, it is subject to strict scrutiny. Id. Such a restriction can only survive if (1) narrowly tailored to achieve (2) a compelling state interest. United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000). The Court finds the government has failed to meet its burden on the first point—§ 526(a)(4) is not narrowly tailored.

The government suggests § 526(a)(4) advances two compelling interests. First, it asserts an interest in protecting creditors. According to the government, § 526(a)(4)'s prohibition discourages prospective bankrupts from accumulating debt in a particular fashion, ing automobile loans, or incases where a client needs to co-sign undischargeable student loans. See Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 24 (N.D. Tex. 2006).

thus deterring debtors from "gaming" the means test by improperly enlarging pre-existing debt, thereby diluting the assets of the bankruptcy estate otherwise available to creditors. Second, it claims § 526(a)(4) protects debtors from attorneys who might lead them to abusive practices which could ultimately result in a denial of discharge of debts under § 523(a)(2)(c). Finally, the government argues that § 523(a)(2)(c) protects the integrity of the bankruptcy system.

Even if the Court assumes the asserted interests are compelling, the restriction is not narrowly-tailored. The government claims the section is narrowly tailored because "it does not limit more speech than is necessary to accomplish this purpose." (Def.'s Brief 25.) The government is mistaken.

Attorneys have a First Amendment right—let alone an established professional ethical duty—to advise and zealously represent their clients. Legal Serv. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 548-549 (2001). Section 526(a)(4) bars an attorney from advising a client to incur any kind of debt, including legitimate debt, in contemplation of bankruptcy. The lawyer has no duty to assist creditors—who are scarcely without their own resources, and may indeed have contributed to the potential-bankrupt's straits by making credit easy to obtain. The attorney's only duty is to the client, and to the law.

Incurring debt on the eve of bankruptcy can scarcely be considered malum in se. To the contrary, for some individuals incurring further obligations, even those which must be adjusted or set aside in the bankruptcy, may be financially prudent. "For example, there may be instances where it is advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car" before filing for bankruptcy. Erwin Chemerinksy, Constitutional Issues Posed in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, 79 AM. BANKR. L.J. 571, 578 (2005). If a client intends to reaffirm the debt after filing bankruptcy, there is no prejudice to the bankruptcy process. BAPCPA's § 526(a)(4) limitation on speech extends beyond any need to protect the bankruptcy process.[3] A lawyer who represents consumers contemplating bankruptcy bears the duty of zealous representation. Conversely, Congress does not have the power "to effect [a] serious and fundamental restriction on advocacy of attorneys." See Velazquez, 531 U.S. at 534. If upheld, this law would prevent lawyers from adequately and competently advising their clients. As such, it unconstitutionally impinges on expressions protected by the First Amendment of the Constitution.[4]

2. Advertising: Section 528(a)(4), (b)(2)

Plaintiffs challenge BAPCPA's advertising disclosure requirements, claiming § 528 violates their First Amendment rights. This section requires a denominated class, termed "debt relief agencies," to include

[3] Even under the more lenient Gentile standard, § 526(a)(4) fails. Gentile's balancing test allows the law to impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." 501 U.S. 1030, 1075 (1991); see also Hersh, 347 B.R. at 24-25; Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906, 916 (D. Or. 2006); Zelotes v. Martini, 2006 WL 3231423 *4 (D. Conn. 2006).

[4] Plaintiffs further claim § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally vague and overbroad. The United States Supreme Court has expressed a strong preference for as-applied, as opposed to facial, challenges to the constitutionality of federal laws. Sabri v. United States, 541 U.S. 600 (2004). The Court finds this law unconstitutional as applied, and declines to expand its inquiry and consider whether it is also vague and overbroad.

particular, or substantially similar, language in their advertisements. Congress has prescribed that such agencies declare: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Here again, the Court must determine the appropriate standard of review. The choice turns on whether the statute regulates deceptive or truthful advertising. Statutes regulating deceptive commercial speech need only withstand rational basis review. Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the S. Ct. of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 651-52 (1985). But restrictions on non-deceptive advertising must employ means that directly advance a substantial government interest. Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Service Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 566 (1980).

The government argues that BAPCPA regulates deceptive advertising, citing evidence adduced before Congress showing "some bankruptcy lawyers did not mention in their advertisements that their ability to make 'debts disappear' derived from the use of the bankruptcy process." (Def.'s Brief 28.) Plaintiffs respond that, when Congress imposed these requirements on all advertisements of bankruptcy assistance, it mandated a blunderbuss which strikes truthful, as well as false or deceptive advertising. The Court agrees.

With very few exceptions, any party advertising debt relief services must include § 528's statutory statement. The present lawyer-plaintiffs advertise themselves as bankruptcy attorneys in newspapers, telephone directories, television, radio, and the internet. There is no evidence, however, suggesting their bankruptcy assistance advertisements are deceptive in any regard. Even assuming some debt relief agencies advertise an ability to make "debts disappear," there is no showing such a statement is deceptive. Under these circumstances, the Court finds it appropriate to analyze this question by applying intermediate scrutiny. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 641.

The government may only regulate truthful bankruptcy assistance advertisements if: (1) the regulation directly advances (2) a substantial government interest, and is (3) "narrowly drawn." Cent. Hudson, 447 U.S. at 566; Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 641. The Court finds that BAPCPA's § 528 advertising requirements fail to directly advance the government's purported substantial interest and are not narrowly drawn.

The government contends advertising, absent the compulsory statements, may mislead the lay community into thinking debts can be erased without payment or filing for bankruptcy. The government claims §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) protect against consumer deception"by alerting [them] that a lawyer may use bankruptcy as a means to help them." (Def.'s Brief 28.) Setting aside the implausibility of anyone actually believing in a magic wand capable of making debt go away, it is most unlikely that the insertion of the statement "We are a debt relief agency, we help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code" prevents consumer deception; it may well increase it.

The term "debt relief agency" is simply a legislative contrivance. The public is more likely to be confused by an advertisement containing this Congressionally-invented term than one which advertises the services of a bankruptcy attorney.

Beyond this, however, the term "debt relief agency" is almost all-encompassing. It instantly swallows all persons who engage in"bankruptcy assistance," attorneys and non-attorneys alike. Congress's merger of both attorneys and non-attorneys is, itself, likely to confuse the public. There are many non-trivial differences between an attorney's services to his or her clients, and services non-lawyers are permitted to offer. Unlike those who only restructure debt, or perhaps provide bankruptcy forms, attorneys give legal advice and actually represent debtors in bankruptcy proceedings. The requirement that parties so dissimilarly-placed must use the same mandated disclosure statement is likely to cause consumer confusion. In this respect, § 528 fails to directly advance the government's stated interest in clarifying bankruptcy service advertisements.[5]

Section 528's advertising requirement is also not narrowly drawn. The narrowly drawn standard is "something short of a least-restrictive means standard." Bd. of Tr. of the State Univ. of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 477 (1989). A narrowly drawn regulation designed to prevent deception "may be no broader than reasonably necessary to prevent the 'perceived evil.'" In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191, 203 (1992). Section 528's language not only regulates misleading advertisements—those [5] At oral argument, the government's counsel acknowledged areas where the statute is vague. As an example, it appears that the quantum of bankruptcy advice a lawyer offers may require some attorneys to publish the mandated language and others not. The statute makes no distinction between a lawyer who only occasionally has a client facing bankruptcy and those who do so regularly. Quaere: does a 500-person law firm having a single lawyer who regularly does bankruptcy work have to put the disclaimer on every piece of the firm's advertising?

suggesting debts can disappear—it binds all who advertise bankruptcy services. This sweeping regulation goes beyond whatever problem it was designed to address. It broadly regulates absolutely truthful advertisements throughout an entire field of legal practice. The government has failed to show that this restriction on attorneys' commercial speech is justified. As applied to attorneys, this section of BAPCPA fails constitutional scrutiny. Thus, the government cannot prevail on its motion to dismiss.

D. The "Debt Relief Agency" Definition

Plaintiffs ask the Court to find attorneys beyond the scope of a BAPCPA "debt relief agency." According to the statute,

> [t]he term 'debt relief agency' means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110.

11 U.S.C. § 101 (12A). This section, of course, makes no direct reference to either "attorney" or "lawyer." It does include the term "bankruptcy petition preparer," which, by definition, expressly excludes attorneys and their staff. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1) (2006). According to plaintiffs, the omission of any reference to attorneys or lawyers, while including a term which excludes attorneys, shows Congress must have intended to exclude attorneys from the "debt relief agency" definition. They also claim it would be absurd for attorneys to provide a statement telling their clients they have a right to an attorney, and that only attorneys can provide legal advice as required for debt relief agencies under 11 U.S.C. § 527(b).[6]

The government claims the statute includes attorneys because legal representation is included in "bankruptcy assistance," statutorily defined as:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 101(4A).

At first glance, this language might include attorneys. But the glance is deceiving: the statute contains a rule of construction for the term "debt relief agency." The statute provides that nothing in §§ 526, 527, and 528 —those sections imposing requirements on debt relief agencies—shall:

> be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability . . . of a State or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State.

[6] At least one court has found these arguments persuasive, holding that debtor attorneys are not "debt relief agencies." In re Attorneys at Law and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66, 69 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005).

If lawyers are placed within the ambit of § 101 (4A), the placement conflicts with § 526(d)(2)(A). The conflict would exist because states would be deprived of their ability "to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law." If BAPCPA's debt relief agency sections apply to attorneys, it means Congress has taken upon itself the authority to determine the advice attorneys can give their clients and what attorney advertisements must say, thereby infringing on the state's traditional role of regulating attorneys. See Leis v. Flynt, 439 U.S. 438, 442 (1979) ("Since the founding of the Republic, the licensing and regulation of lawyers has been left exclusively to the States.")

This view is supported by the doctrine of constitutional avoidance. This doctrine counsels that, in construing a statute for ambiguity, the Court must opt for a construction which avoids grave constitutional questions. Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568,575 (1988). The Court perceives a clear ambiguity in this statute—on one hand it appears to regulate a lawyer's practice; on the other, such regulation is specifically reserved to the states. As outlined above, these sections would be unconstitutional if applied to attorneys. For these reasons, the Court finds §§ 526, 527 and 528 do not apply to attorneys.

VI. Conclusion

The Court finds BAPCPA sections 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4), (b)(2) are unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. Moreover, the Court finds the debt relief agency provisions of BAPCPA inapplicable to attorneys. Therefore, the government's motion to dismiss [Docket No. 13] is denied.

APPENDIX E

1. 11 U.S.C. 101 provides in pertinent part:

Definitions

In this title the following definitions shall apply:

* * * * *

(3) The term "assisted person" means any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $150,000.

(4) The term "attorney" means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law.

(4A) The term "bankruptcy assistance" means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

* * * * *

(12) The term "debt" means liability on a claim.

(12A) The term "debt relief agency" means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include—

(A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;

(B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;

(C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;

(D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or

(E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

2. 11 U.S.C. 526 provides:

Restrictions on debt relief agencies

(a) A debt relief agency shall not—

(1) fail to perform any service that such agency informed an assisted person or prospective assisted

person it would provide in connection with a case or proceeding under this title;

(2) make any statement, or counsel or advise any assisted person or prospective assisted person to make a statement in a document filed in a case or proceeding under this title, that is untrue and misleading, or that upon the exercise of reasonable care, should have been known by such agency to be untrue or misleading;

(3) misrepresent to any assisted person or prospective assisted person, directly or indirectly, affirmatively or by material omission, with respect to—

(A) the services that such agency will provide to such person; or

(B) the benefits and risks that may result if such person becomes a debtor in a case under this title; or

(4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

(b) Any waiver by any assisted person of any protection or right provided under this section shall not be enforceable against the debtor by any Federal or State court or any other person, but may be enforced against a debt relief agency.

(c)(1) Any contract for bankruptcy assistance between a debt relief agency and an assisted person that does not comply with the material requirements of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall be void and may not be enforced by any Federal or State court or by any other person, other than such assisted person.

(2) Any debt relief agency shall be liable to an assisted person in the amount of any fees or charges in connection with providing bankruptcy assistance to such person that such debt relief agency has received, for actual damages, and for reasonable attorneys' fees and costs if such agency is found, after notice and a hearing, to have—

(A) intentionally or negligently failed to comply with any provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 with respect to a case or proceeding under this title for such assisted person;

(B) provided bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in a case or proceeding under this title that is dismissed or converted to a case under another chapter of this title because of such agency's intentional or negligent failure to file any required document including those specified in section 521; or

(C) intentionally or negligently disregarded the material requirements of this title or the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure applicable to such agency.

(3) In addition to such other remedies as are provided under State law, whenever the chief law enforcement officer of a State, or an official or agency designated by a State, has reason to believe that any person has violated or is violating this section, the State—

(A) may bring an action to enjoin such violation;

(B) may bring an action on behalf of its residents to recover the actual damages of assisted persons arising from such violation, including any liability under paragraph (2); and

(C) in the case of any successful action under subparagraph (A) or (B), shall be awarded the costs of the action and reasonable attorneys'fees as determined by the court.

(4) The district courts of the United States for districts located in the State shall have concurrent jurisdiction of any action under subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (3).

(5) Notwithstanding any other provision of Federal law and in addition to any other remedy provided under Federal or State law, if the court, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States trustee or the debtor, finds that a person intentionally violated this section, or engaged in a clear and consistent pattern or practice of violating this section, the court may—

(A) enjoin the violation of such section; or

(B) impose an appropriate civil penalty against such person.

(d) No provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall—

(1) annul, alter, affect, or exempt any person subject to such sections from complying with any law of any State except to the extent that such law is inconsistent with those sections, and then only to the extent of the inconsistency; or

(2) be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability—

(A) of a State or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or

(B) of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Section 526(a)(4) of Title 11 of the United States Code provides that bankruptcy professionals who qualify as "debt relief agencies" and who are hired by consumer debtors for bankruptcy services may not advise those debtors "to incur more debt in contemplation of" filing a bankruptcy petition. The questions presented are as follows:

1. Whether Section 526(a)(4) precludes only advice to incur more debt with a purpose to abuse the bankruptcy system.

2. Whether Section 526(a)(4), construed with due regard for the principle of constitutional avoidance, violates the First Amendment.

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDINGS

Petitioner is the United States of America. Respondents, who were appellees in the court of appeals, are Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A.; Robert J. Milavetz; Barbara N. Nevin; Ronald Richardson (captioned as John Doe); and Lynette Richardson (captioned as Mary Doe). The district court denied the Doe respondents leave to proceed pseudonymously.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PETITIONER

v.

MILAVETZ, GALLOP & MILAVETZ, P.A., ET AL.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

The Solicitor General, on behalf of the United States of America, respectfully petitions for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit in this case.

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the court of appeals (App., infra, 1a-28a) is reported at 541 F.3d 785. The opinion of the district court denying the government's motion to dismiss (App., infra, 29a-44a) is reported at 355 B.R. 758.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court of appeals was entered on September 4, 2008. A petition for rehearing was denied on December 5, 2008 (App., infra, 47a). On February 20, 2009, Justice Alito extended the time within which to file a petition for a writ of certiorari to and including

April 6, 2009. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The First Amendment to the United States Constitution provides in relevant part that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech." The pertinent statutory provisions are reprinted in an appendix to this petition. App., infra, 48a-53a.

STATEMENT

This case involves a facial First Amendment challenge to 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(4), a provision of the Bankruptcy Code that regulates paid bankruptcy advice. Congress has established certain minimum standards of professional conduct for bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, and other "debt relief agencies" that charge consumer debtors for bankruptcy assistance. Section 526(a)(4) provides, inter alia, that debt relief agencies may not advise clients to incur additional debt "in contemplation of" filing a bankruptcy petition. The district court declared Section 526(a)(4) facially invalid under the First Amendment. A divided panel of the court of appeals affirmed. Shortly thereafter, the Fifth Circuit upheld Section 526(a)(4) against a substantially similar challenge and endorsed the reasoning of the dissenting opinion in this case. Hersh v. United States ex rel. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 743 (2008), petition for cert. pending, No. 08-1174 (filed Mar. 18, 2009).

1. Congress enacted Section 526(a)(4) as part of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act (BAPCPA), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, "a comprehensive package of reform measures" designed "to improve bankruptcy law and practice by restoring personal responsibility and integrity in the bankruptcy system and ensure that the system is fair for both debtors and creditors." H.R. Rep. No. 31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. 1, at 2 (2005) (House Report). Described by the House Report as "the most comprehensive set of [bankruptcy] reforms in more than 25 years," id. at 3, the BAPCPA both modified the substantive standards for bankruptcy relief and adopted new measures intended to curb a variety of abusive practices that Congress concluded had come to pervade the bankruptcy system.

After extensive hearings, Congress determined that misleading and abusive practices by bankruptcy professionals, including attorneys, had become a substantial cause of unnecessary bankruptcy petitions and, in some circumstances, jeopardized debtors' ability to obtain a discharge of their debts. For example, Congress heard evidence that a civil enforcement initiative undertaken by the United States Trustee Program had "consistently identified * * * misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" as among the sources of abuse in the bankruptcy system. House Report 5 (citation omitted). Congress responded by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." Id. at 17.

The BAPCPA added or strengthened several regulations on bankruptcy professionals' conduct. Those regulations are intended to protect the clients and prospective clients of bankruptcy professionals, the creditors of clients who do enter bankruptcy, and the bankruptcy system. The regulations require additional disclosures to clients about their rights and the professional's responsibilities; they protect clients against being overcharged, or charged for services never provided; and they discourage misuse of the bankruptcy system.

See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 110(b)-(h), 526-528, 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). Many of the regulations apply equally to bankruptcy attorneys, to bankruptcy petition preparers who are not attorneys, and to all other professionals who provide bankruptcy assistance to consumer debtors for a fee; those professionals are collectively termed "debt relief agenc[ies]." 11 U.S.C. 101(12A).[1]

Section 526 sets out four basic rules of professional conduct for debt relief agencies. Section 526(a)(1) requires debt relief agencies to perform all promised services. Section 526(a)(2) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising an assisted person to make statements that are untrue or misleading in seeking bankruptcy relief. Section 526(a)(3) precludes debt relief agencies from misrepresenting the services they will provide or the benefits and risks attendant to filing for bankruptcy. And Section 526(a)(4), the provision held unconstitutional below, states:

> A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

[1] The term "bankruptcy assistance" is defined to include providing an "assisted person" with advice, counsel (including "legal representation"), or document preparation or filing assistance "with respect to a case or proceeding under" the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. 101(4A). An "assisted person" is "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts" and whose nonexempt property is worth less than a specified, inflation-adjusted amount, currently $164,250. 11 U.S.C. 101(3); see 11 U.S.C. 104(a); 72 Fed. Reg. 7082 (2007).

The principal remedy for violations of Section 526 is a civil action by the debtor to recover the debtor's "actual damages," including any fees already paid. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2). The statute also authorizes state attorneys general to sue for debtors' actual damages or for injunctive relief to prevent violations. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(3). The bankruptcy court may also impose an injunction or an "appropriate civil monetary penalty" for intentional or recurring violations, either on its own motion or at the request of the United States Trustee or the debtor. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(5).

2. Respondents are a law firm, two of the firm's attorneys, and two prospective clients. App., infra, 1a-2a.[2] They filed this action against the United States, seeking a declaratory judgment that the attorney respondents are not obligated to comply with several of the BAPCPA's provisions regulating debt relief agencies' professional conduct, including the advice limitation in Section 526(a)(4). Respondents contended that licensed attorneys are not "debt relief agencies" within the meaning of the statute even if they provide bankruptcy-related advice to debtors. They also claimed that, to the extent the statute encompasses licensed attorneys, Section 526(a)(4) and other provisions of the BAPCPA violate the First Amendment. Id. at 2a.

The district court denied the government's motion to dismiss, App., infra, 29a-44a, and then granted summary judgment for respondents, id. at 45a. The court held that Section 526(a)(4) and the other challenged provisions violate the First Amendment. Id. at 33a-41a.

[2] The district court denied the prospective clients leave to proceed pseudonymously, App., infra, 31a-33a, and they disclosed their identities in an amended complaint, see 05-CV-2626 Docket entry No. 34, at 3 (D. Minn. Dec. 15, 2006).

The court further held that attorneys do not fall within the statutory definition of "debt relief agency." Id. at 41a-43a.

3. The government appealed, contending in relevant part that attorneys unambiguously fall within the definition of "debt relief agency" and that the district court's constitutional holding was premised on a misreading of Section 526(a)(4). Gov't C.A. Br. 18-41, 49-54. The government explained that the phrase "in contemplation of" bankruptcy is a term of art with a specialized meaning. Based on that established understanding, the government argued, Section 526(a)(4) should be construed to forbid only advice that a client take on new debt on the eve of bankruptcy with the intent of abusing the bankruptcy system. The government further contended that, to the extent the term "in contemplation of" is ambiguous, the doctrine of constitutional avoidance supports the government's narrow reading of the term, which avoids the overbreadth that the district court perceived.

4. The court of appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court unanimously agreed that attorneys may fall within the definition of "debt relief agency," but held by a divided vote that Section 526(a)(4) violates the First Amendment. App., infra, 1a-28a.[3]

a. The court of appeals rejected the government's proposed narrowing construction of Section 526(a)(4). App., infra, 12a. The court concluded that, under the only permissible interpretation of the statute's "plain language," Section 526(a)(4) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising consumer clients "to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy," ibid., and that "this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent prebankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws," id. at 13a.

Based on that broad construction, the court of appeals held that Section 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad.[4] App., infra, 12a-14a. The court explained that advice to take on new debt just before bankruptcy will sometimes be legitimate. As examples, the court observed that "it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments," or to purchase a car to ensure "dependable transportation * * * to and from work." Id. at 13a-14a. And the court stated that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist." Id. at 14a. The court concluded that the First Amendment precludes regulation of such legitimate advice, and it noted its agreement with three district courts that had reached the same conclusion. See id. at 13a & n.8 (citing, inter alia, Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 25 (N.D. Tex. 2006)).

The court of appeals did not identify the precise constitutional standard under which respondents' challenge should be evaluated. Respondents had argued that strict scrutiny should apply, while the government had contended that Section 526(a)(4) is a reasonable regulation of attorneys' professional conduct that is to be reviewed more deferentially under the standard announced in Gentile v. State Bar, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071-1076 (1991). The court acknowledged that the government had a "legitimate interest" in prohibiting advice that would assist debtors in abusing the bankruptcy system by accumulating more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. App., infra, 12a. But the court held that, on its reading of Section 526(a)(4), the statute was insufficiently connected to that legitimate interest and therefore was unconstitutional under either strict scrutiny or the Gentile standard. Id. at 12a-13a.

[4] The court of appeals did not limit its holding to the plaintiffs before it, but stated more generally that the statute was "unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies." App., infra, 12a; see id. at 10a n.7, 15a, 21a; see also id. at 23a n.13 (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Nothing in the court of appeals' statutory and First Amendment analysis, moreover, suggests that the court would reach a different conclusion regarding the statute's application to non-attorney professionals who provide bankruptcy advice.

b. Judge Colloton dissented in relevant part. He explained that, in his view, "[t]he text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for a narrowing construction," under which "the statute should be construed to prohibit only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system." App., infra, 25a. He would have held that the statute, so construed, is constitutional. See id. at 22a, 25a, 28a.

First, Judge Colloton observed that the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" is a term of art that "has been construed * * * to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." App., infra, 25a; see id. at 25a-26a (collecting authorities). Second, Judge Colloton pointed out that the remedies for a violation of Section 526(a)(4) "emphasize actual damages," and he reasoned that a debtor who follows his attorney's bankruptcy advice is unlikely to be harmed as a result unless he is induced to file "an abusive bankruptcy petition, where the debtor may suffer damages if the petition is dismissed as abusive." Id. at 27a (citing 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1)). Third, Judge Colloton pointed to legislative history that showed Congress's desire to address "abusive" practices by bankruptcy professionals and by debtors who "knowingly load up" on debt before filing for bankruptcy. Id. at 27a-28a (quoting House Report 5, 15). The dissent concluded: "Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that [respondents] say[] is absurd, that the [government] says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005." Id. at 28a.

5. The court of appeals denied rehearing en banc by a vote of 6-5. See App., infra, 47a.

6. Thirteen days later, the Fifth Circuit upheld Section 526(a)(4) against a substantially similar First Amendment challenge, reversing one of the district court opinions on which the court of appeals in this case relied. Hersh, 553 F.3d at 752-764; see App., infra, 13a n.8. The court endorsed the reasoning and the authorities in Judge Colloton's dissenting opinion. See 553 F.3d at 750 n.6, 759 n.17.

7. Respondents have filed their own petition for a writ of certiorari, which seeks review of the court of appeals' holding that attorneys may be "debt relief agencies" for purposes of Section 526, as well as its holding (see note 3, supra) that Section 528's disclosure requirements are valid. See Pet. at ii, Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, No. 08-1119 (filed Mar. 5, 2009). The government will address that petition in a separate response.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

A divided panel of the court of appeals has invalidated an Act of Congress, even though the statute can constitutionally be applied to a significant range of conduct. The court failed to give due regard to a narrowing construction that eliminates the perceived constitutional difficulty, and its ruling squarely conflicts with a Fifth Circuit decision that adopted the constitutionally unproblematic construction that the court rejected in this case. The Eighth Circuit's decision also threatens to undermine the important reforms that Congress crafted, after years of study, to reduce the abuse of the bankruptcy system, including abuse encouraged by lawyers. This Court's review is warranted to prevent those harms, to resolve the circuit conflict, and to effectuate Congress's efforts to craft a federal remedy for the provision of abusive bankruptcy advice.

I. THE CIRCUITS ARE IN CONFLICT OVER THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AN ACT OF CONGRESS

The court of appeals' decision in this case squarely conflicts with the Fifth Circuit's resolution of the same statutory and constitutional issues as are presented here. As the Fifth Circuit has recognized, Section 526(a)(4) imposes a modest requirement to refrain from urging a debtor to accumulate eve-of-filing debt that would abuse the bankruptcy system. The court of appeals here imposed its own, much more expansive construction and then struck down the statute, so interpreted, as overbroad. As a result, attorneys in the Eighth Circuit who qualify as "debt relief agencies" are free to urge even the most abusive practices without being subject to the federal sanctions and client-protection measures set out in Section 526(a)(4) and (c).

A. In Hersh v. United States ex rel. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 743 (5th Cir. 2008), petition for cert. pending, No. 08-1174 (filed Mar. 18, 2009), a bankruptcy attorney challenged Section 526(a)(4) on grounds substantially similar to those respondents raised here. Hersh contended that Section 526(a)(4) unambiguously prohibits attorneys from advising clients who are considering bankruptcy to incur any additional debt, and that Section 526(a)(4) so construed is unconstitutionally overbroad. Id. at 747 & n.3, 754, 762. A unanimous Fifth Circuit panel rejected both of these arguments. Id. at 752-764. The Fifth Circuit acknowledged the court of appeals' contrary holding in this case but stated that it "agree[d] with Judge Colloton's dissenting opinion." Id. at 750 n.6.[5]

1. The Fifth Circuit in Hersh agreed with the government that Section 526(a)(4) can be construed in a way that focuses directly on Congress's acknowledged purpose in enacting it: preventing attorneys from encouraging their clients to "load up" on debt to abuse the bankruptcy system. 553 F.3d at 758-761. The court noted that the term "in contemplation of bankruptcy" is often used as a term of art that connotes an intent to abuse the bankruptcy system. Id. at 758 (citing Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (Black's Law Dictionary)). Indeed, a few years before Congress enacted the BAPCPA, the Fifth Circuit itself had described the abusive practice of "incurring card debt in contemplation of bankruptcy" with the term "loading up." Id. at

[5] Like the respondents in this case, Hersh also argued that attorneys cannot be "debt relief agencies" subject to the restrictions imposed by Section 526(a)(4). See 553 F.3d at 751-752. The Fifth Circuit rejected that argument, id. at 752, as the court of appeals unanimously did here, see App., infra, 3a-10a.

758-759 (quoting AT&T Universal Card Servs. v. Mercer (In re Mercer), 246 F.3d 391, 421 n.43 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc)). The Fifth Circuit in Hersh noted that Judge Colloton had adopted the same reasoning in this case, and it cited Judge Colloton's dissenting opinion for additional supporting sources. Id. at 759 & n.17.

The court in Hersh also explained that the structure of Section 526 supported the specialized interpretation described above. See 553 F.3d at 759-760, 761. Like Judge Colloton, see App., infra, 26a-27a, the Fifth Circuit pointed out that violations of Section 526 may be remedied by awarding the debtor actual damages, which strongly suggests that the practices banned are practices that would actually harm the debtor. See 553 F.3d at 760. And the court noted that Section 526(a)(4) was enacted alongside, and placed together with, "three other rules of professional conduct designed to protect debtors." Id. at 761 (citing 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(1)-(3)).

The court in Hersh agreed with Judge Colloton that the legislative history and purpose of the BAPCPA supported its construction of Section 526(a)(4). It explained that numerous elements of the BAPCPA were demonstrably "intended to curb abuse," which the court took as further evidence that "as part of this plan, section 526(a)(4) is only meant to curb abusive practices." 553 F.3d at 761; accord App., infra, 26a-27a (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

2. The Fifth Circuit further explained that, even if its reading of Section 526(a)(4) were not the most natural interpretation of the statute, that reading would be compelled by the doctrine of constitutional avoidance. The court identified numerous cases in which this Court had adopted an arguably countertextual construction in the interest of constitutional avoidance, including Boos

v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312 (1988), on which Judge Colloton had relied significantly, see App., infra, 23a-24a. See 553 F.3d at 756-758. As the Fifth Circuit noted, the avoidance doctrine may even require giving "[a] restrictive meaning [to] what appear to be plain words." Id. at 757 (quoting United States v. Witkovich, 353 U.S. 194, 199 (1957)) (first brackets in original).

The Fifth Circuit acknowledged Hersh's argument, identical to that advanced by respondents and endorsed by the court below, that the text of Section 526(a)(4) is so unambiguous that no narrowing construction is possible. See 553 F.3d at 754. The court concluded, however, that "the language of [the statute] can and should be interpreted only to prohibit attorneys from advising clients to incur debt in contemplation of bankruptcy when doing so would be an abuse or improper manipulation of the bankruptcy system." Id. at 761; see id. at 756. The court explained that, on that reading, "[S]ection 526(a)(4) has no application to good faith advice to engage in conduct that is consistent with a debtor's interest and does not abuse or improperly manipulate the bankruptcy system." Id. at 761.

3. The Fifth Circuit concluded that, if Section 526(a)(4) is construed in this manner, it is not facially unconstitutional. The court explained that a statute is not unconstitutionally overbroad unless the "overbreadth is substantial in relation to the statute's legitimate reach." 553 F.3d at 762 (citing United States v. Williams, 128 S. Ct. 1830, 1838 (2008)). Hersh did not dispute that Congress could validly regulate the sort of advice to engage in abusive conduct that all parties agreed was covered by Section 526(a)(4). See id. at 754-

756.[6] And under the court's narrowing construction, Section 526(a)(4) did not apply to any of Hersh's examples of speech that could not constitutionally be prohibited. Id. at 763. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit found it "clear that the potential for the statute to prohibit protected speech is not by any means substantial in relation to the statute's legitimate reach." Id. at 764.

B. The Fifth Circuit's decision cannot be reconciled with the decision below. The Fifth Circuit adopted the government's proposed construction of Section 526(a)(4), whereas the court below found that construction to be foreclosed by the statutory text. As a result of those divergent statutory interpretations, the Fifth Circuit upheld the statute against a First Amendment challenge, while the court below invalidated Section 526(a)(4) as an unconstitutional infringement on the right of attorneys to provide non-abusive bankruptcy-related advice. And the Eighth Circuit, by a closely divided vote, has declined to reconsider its position en banc. App., infra, 47a.

[6] The Fifth Circuit in Hersh noted various contexts in which the First Amendment permits Congress and the States to regulate that sort of unethical attorney advice. For instance, the First Amendment does not protect speech proposing an illegal transaction, and abusive accumulation of debt may amount to fraud or theft. See 553 F.3d at 755 (citing Village of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 496 (1982)). Further, the government has a sufficiently important interest in the judicial process, including the bankruptcy system, to justify regulation of attorneys' unethical conduct affecting that process. See id. at 755-756 (citing Gentile v. State Bar, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991), and Model Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 1.2(d)). The court in Hersh explained that the abusive accumulation of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy "is akin to committing a fraudulent act," and therefore "Congress can constitutionally prevent attorneys or other debt relief agencies from advising their clients to [commit such an act]." Id. at 756.

The question presented here is a recurring one, as substantially similar challenges to Section 526(a)(4) are also pending in the Second and Ninth Circuits.[7] Review by this Court is warranted to resolve the division in the courts of appeals over the constitutionality of this important federal statute.

II. THE COURT OF APPEALS ERRED IN HOLDING SECTION 526(a)(4) UNCONSTITUTIONALLY OVERBROAD

The court of appeals' decision in this case is erroneous. The court below acknowledged that Congress had a "legitimate interest" in restricting bankruptcy professionals from peddling abusive strategies to individuals who are facing bankruptcy. App., infra, 12a. The government construes the statute to further that interest directly, by prohibiting only advice that would lead to intentional abuse of the bankruptcy system.

The court of appeals did not dispute that Congress could enact such a prohibition without violating the First Amendment. Rather, the court held that Section 526(a)(4) unambiguously sweeps in other attorney advice, unrelated to abuse of the bankruptcy system, and that the statute is therefore fatally overbroad. Both the statutory premise and the constitutional conclusion are flawed. As the text, structure, and purposes of Section 526(a)(4) make clear, Congress forbade only advice to incur new debt for the purpose of abusing the bankruptcy system or defrauding creditors. That prohibition is consistent with the First Amendment.

[7] See Zelotes v. Adams, No. 07-1853 (2d Cir. argued Oct. 10, 2008); Connecticut Bar Ass'n v. United States, No. 08-5901 (2d Cir.) (argument not yet scheduled); Olsen v. Holder, No. 07-35616 (9th Cir.) (argument not yet scheduled).

A. The court of appeals rejected the government's interpretation of Section 526(a)(4) in a single sentence, asserting that the statute's "plain language" precludes any construction other than the unconstitutionally overbroad one. App., infra, 12a. The court did not identify any statutory term that unambiguously compelled such a reading. Rather, without quoting the statutory text, the court stated that "[Section] 526(a)(4) broadly prohibits a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Ibid. But the statute does not use the temporal phrase "when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Rather, the statute forbids advising the client "to incur more debt in contemplation of [bankruptcy]." 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(4) (emphasis added). The difference is significant, as Judge Colloton explained.

The statute's reference to debt incurred "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]" is reasonably read to mean debt incurred with the expectation of using the bankruptcy discharge to avoid full repayment. As Judge Colloton observed, "the phrase 'in contemplation of' has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." App., infra, 25a; see, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary 336 (defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "[t]he thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding") (emphasis added). Indeed, more than a century of "American and English authorities construing the bankruptcy laws also support the proposition that the words 'in contemplation of' may be understood to require an intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws." App., infra, 25a (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); see id. at 25a-26a (citing cases); accord Hersh, 553 F.3d at 758-760. Congress's use of an established term of art may reasonably be understood to incorporate the same meaning that those authorities have given it. See, e.g., Wilkie v. Robbins, 127 S. Ct. 2588, 2605 (2007).

The Eighth Circuit did not rebut the dissent's understanding of prior judicial decisions construing the phrase "in contemplation of" in the bankruptcy context. Nor did the court identify any reason to believe that Congress, in enacting Section 526(a)(4), intended to depart from that prior understanding. Indeed, the court did not respond to the dissent's analysis at all; it simply asserted without explanation that "the plain language of the statute does not permit this narrow interpretation." App., infra, 12a.

The statutory context and structure support the reading of the term "in contemplation of" that was endorsed by the dissent below and adopted by the Fifth Circuit in Hersh. See, e.g., Dolan v. USPS, 546 U.S. 481, 486 (2006) ("A word in a statute may or may not extend to the outer limits of its definitional possibilities. Interpretation of a word or phrase depends upon reading the whole statutory text, considering the purpose and context of the statute, and consulting any precedents or authorities that inform the analysis."). The other three subdivisions of Section 526(a) unambiguously establish rules of professional conduct designed to protect debtors from abusive practices by the attorneys and other debt relief agencies who advise them. See 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(1) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from failing to perform promised services); 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(2) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from advising debtors to make false or misleading statements to obtain bankruptcy relief); 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(3) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from misrepresenting to debtors the risks or benefits of bankruptcy). Section 526(a)(4)'s placement alongside these other restrictions indicates that it is likewise properly read to target unethical communications by bankruptcy professionals—not, as the court below held, all manner of lawful and ethical attorney advice. See Hersh, 553 F.3d at 761.

Furthermore, the principal remedy for violation of each of Section 526's rules of professional conduct is a suit against the attorney (or other debt relief agency) to recover the debtor's "actual damages," as well as restitution of any fees paid by the debtor. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2). Congress's emphasis on the debtor's "actual damages" presupposes that the debtor has been injured by the attorney's conduct. As Judge Colloton noted, "legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all." App., infra, 27a; accord Hersh, 553 F.3d at 759-760.

"In enacting the BAPCPA, Congress was attempting to address common abuses of the bankruptcy system. Congress concluded that there was a pervasive abuse * * * by debtors who incur debt before bankruptcy with the intention of having their debt discharged." Hersh, 553 F.3d at 760 (citing House Report 15). Construing Section 526(a)(4) in a way that focuses precisely on that goal is perfectly consistent with the statutory text, structure, and purpose.

B. Even if the court of appeals' broad reading of the statute were the most natural one, the court erred in adopting an interpretation that resulted in invalidating the statute when a plausible alternative reading is constitutionally unproblematic. Particularly in the context of a First Amendment overbreadth challenge, where the plaintiff's demand is to declare a statute invalid even though it may be legitimately applied in some or many circumstances, the federal courts have not only "the power to adopt narrowing constructions," but "the duty to avoid constitutional difficulties by doing so if such a construction is fairly possible." Boos, 485 U.S. at 330-331; see also, e.g., Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 612 (1973). Indeed, respondents themselves urged the court of appeals to construe another provision, the term "debt relief agency," to avoid the same constitutional overbreadth objection. E.g., Resp. C.A. Br. 17 ("A statute should be interpreted so as to avoid constitutional issues."). The term "debt relief agency," however, has a statutory definition that forecloses respondents' proposed construction. See 11 U.S.C. 101(12A) (defining "debt relief agency" as "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for * * * payment"); App., infra, 6a-10a. By contrast, the phrase "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]" is not defined and can reasonably be read to avoid constitutional problems, particularly in light of its status as a term of art in the bankruptcy context.

This Court has repeatedly applied saving constructions to avoid constitutional difficulties, even without the firm grounding in statutory text and context that the Fifth Circuit's reading of Section 526(a)(4) has. For instance, in Boos, this Court considered a First Amendment overbreadth challenge to a federal statute that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." 485

U.S. at 329. The Court acknowledged that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic * * * because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330. Nevertheless, in accordance with the "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties" when a narrowing "construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute to apply "'only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present'"—a limitation that was unstated in the statute but ensured the validity of the Act. Id. at 330-331 (citation omitted). See also, e.g., Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 689 (2001); Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 576-578 (1988).

Federal courts construe federal statutes to avoid, not invite, constitutional difficulties. E.g., Boos, 485 U.S. at 331. The court of appeals disregarded that important principle when it invalidated Section 526(a)(4) without adverting to the doctrine of constitutional avoidance or explaining why its interpretation of the disputed provision was the only plausible reading.

C. Even if the court of appeals' construction were so clearly required by the text of the statute as to overcome the avoidance doctrine, the court's overbreadth analysis would still be deficient. Because "invalidating a law that in some of its applications is perfectly constitutional * * * has obvious harmful effects," this Court has "vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute's overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Williams, 128 S. Ct. at 1838. The court of appeals failed to adhere to that principle when it struck down Section 526(a)(4) without giving proper weight to the statute's many legitimate applications.

Advice to engage in conduct that amounts to an abuse of the bankruptcy system is plainly subject to congressional regulation. Congress, the state legislatures and state bars, and the federal and state courts routinely require attorneys to abide by professional standards like Section 526(a)(4). Indeed, the conduct that Section 526(a)(4) targets falls squarely within the scope of Rule 1.2(d) of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which prohibits attorneys from advising their clients to engage in fraud. See, e.g., Attorney Grievance Comm'n v. Culver, 849 A.2d 423, 443-444 (Md. 2004) (disciplining an attorney for advising and assisting a client to load up on debt before declaring bankruptcy). Those requirements serve valid and important governmental interests, both in protecting clients from unethical advice and in protecting the judicial process and other litigants from the harm that ensues when clients follow that unethical advice. As the Fifth Circuit noted, the constitutionality of Rule 1.2(d) has never been in doubt. Hersh, 553 F.3d at 756. Section 526(a)(4) regulates the very same conduct.

Section 526(a)(4) therefore may validly be applied to a significant category of unethical attorney advice. Against that legitimate sweep, the court below hypothesized two instances of legitimate, ethical advice to accumulate new debt on the eve of bankruptcy: buying a car and refinancing a mortgage.[8] App., infra, 13a-14a. The court added that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist." Id. at 14a. On that slim and concededly "hypothetical" basis, the majority held the statute unconstitutional as applied to all attorney conduct, including the abusive practices at which Section 526(a)(4) was directly aimed.

[8] The court assumed that merely refinancing an existing mortgage—that is, exchanging one loan for another with the same principal balance but a different interest rate, repayment period, or other terms—would constitute incurring "more debt" within the meaning of the statute. See App., infra, 13a. It is not at all clear that this understanding is correct.

As Judge Colloton correctly pointed out, "a facial challenge resting on a 'few hypothetical situations' * * * is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because 'the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge.'" App., infra, 24a (quoting Members of the City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 800 (1984)). The court of appeals here did no more than posit "some impermissible applications" of Section 526(a)(4). Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. at 800. The court did note this Court's admonition that First Amendment challenges of this sort require substantial overbreadth compared to the statute's valid coverage. App., infra, 15a n.10. But the court merely asserted that "[Section] 526(a)(4) is substantially overbroad," id. at 15a, without ever explaining how its "few hypothetical situations" supported that conclusion.

III. THE QUESTION PRESENTED IS IMPORTANT

As this Court has repeatedly observed, judging the constitutionality of an Act of Congress is "the gravest and most delicate duty that this Court is called upon to perform." Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 64 (1981) (quoting Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142, 148 (1927) (Holmes, J.)). The federal statute at issue here serves an important function in the administration of the Nation's bankruptcy laws, and the circuit conflict over the validity of that statute warrants this Court's review.

"The principal purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to grant a 'fresh start' to the 'honest but unfortunate debtor.'" Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 549 U.S. 365, 367 (2007) (quoting Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 286-287 (1991)). Section 526(a)(4) is an important part of Congress's effort to preserve that focus on the "honest but unfortunate debtor" by curbing abuse of the bankruptcy system, including abuse that comes at the suggestion of a bankruptcy professional. By invalidating Section 526(a)(4), the court of appeals has frustrated that effort, and the conflict between the decision below and the Fifth Circuit's decision in Hersh also undermines Congress's decision "[t]o establish * * * uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States." U.S. Const. Art. I, § 8, Cl. 4 (emphasis added); cf., e.g., Railway Labor Executives' Ass'n v. Gibbons, 455 U.S. 457, 465-466, 471-472 (1982) (discussing the importance the Framers placed on uniform bankruptcy rules).

A. Congress has long been aware that the relief afforded by the bankruptcy laws creates a perverse incentive for debtors to amass additional debt in contemplation of obtaining a discharge. Congress has recognized that such conduct poses a fundamental threat to the Code's twin goals of affording debtors a fresh start while providing an orderly and equitable system of resolving creditors' claims. For example, when Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C), which creates a presumption that certain eve-of-bankruptcy debts are not dischargeable, the accompanying Senate Report emphasized that "[e]xcessive debts incurred within a short period prior to the filing of the petition present a special problem: that of 'loading up' in contemplation of bankruptcy." S. Rep. No. 65, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1983). The report explained that "[a] debtor planning [to] file a petition with the bankruptcy court has a strong economic incentive to incur dischargeable debts for either consumable goods or exempt property," noting that "[i]n many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent." Ibid. As the report concluded, "[n]ot only does this result in direct losses for the creditors that are the victims of the spree, but it also creates a higher absolute level of debt so that all creditors receive less in liquidation. During this period of insolvency preceding the filing of the petition, creditors would not extend credit if they knew the true facts." Ibid. As early as 1973, Congress was informed that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge." Report of the Commission on the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 137, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. I, at 11 (1973).

Congress has accordingly enacted a number of protections against eve-of-bankruptcy attempts to abuse the system's protections. For instance, it authorized bankruptcy courts to dismiss a petition for "substantial abuse," 11 U.S.C. 707(b) (2000), which could include the debtor's purposeful accumulation of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. E.g., Price v. United States Tr. (In re Price), 353 F.3d 1135, 1139-1140 (9th Cir. 2004). It precluded debtors from obtaining a discharge for debts obtained fraudulently. 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(A). And it provided that certain categories of debts are presumed to be fraudulent and nondischargeable if they are incurred on the eve of bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C) (2000).

B. When Congress enacted the BAPCPA in 2005, the House Report expressed concern that those earlier measures had not adequately restricted the ability of debtors to "knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." House Report 15. Accordingly, Congress strengthened each of the aforementioned protections against bankruptcy abuse. See, e.g., BAPCPA § 310, 119 Stat. 84 (11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C)). Most fundamentally, Congress greatly expanded the bankruptcy courts' authority to dismiss petitions for "abuse" of the bankruptcy system, including in cases in which debtors purposefully incur additional debt in contemplation of filing a petition. See BAPCPA § 102, 119 Stat. 27; House Report 48-49. Congress permitted dismissal of a petition based on a less stringent showing of abuse; authorized "any party in interest" to file a motion to dismiss for abuse (except in some cases involving lower-income debtors); repealed the pre-existing presumption in favor of granting the relief sought by the debtor; and specified that bankruptcy courts must consider, in determining whether a petition should be dismissed for abuse when no presumption applies, "whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith" and whether "the totality of the circumstances * * * of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1), (3) and (6); see House Report 49.

Congress also made another significant change, which heightened the importance of the professional-conduct regulations at issue in this case. The "principal consumer bankruptcy reform" in the 2005 legislation was the adoption of a "means testing" mechanism intended to ensure that debtors who have the ability to repay at least some of their debts will do so, through a structured repayment plan entered under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, instead of obtaining a complete discharge under Chapter 7. House Report 48; see id. at 2 (describing means testing as the "heart" of the 2005 Act's reform provisions). See generally 11 U.S.C. 109(b) and (e) (eligibility for Chapter 7 and Chapter 13).

Under the means test, a debtor's petition for complete relief under Chapter 7 is presumed to be abusive if the debtor's current monthly income exceeds his statutorily allowed expenses, including payments for secured debt, by more than a prescribed amount. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i) and (iii). If the court finds a petition to be abusive under this standard, it can dismiss the debtor's case or, with the debtor's consent, convert it to Chapter 13, which involves a repayment plan. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). The means test, however, exacerbates the incentive for debtors to manipulate the system by "loading up" on certain debt in contemplation of filing, because payments on secured debts that qualify under Section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) reduce the amount of the debtor's monthly income counted in the means test, and may therefore allow the debtor to remain eligible for a complete and immediate discharge of unsecured debt under Chapter 7.

C. Congress was accordingly concerned that the introduction of the means test would give attorneys an incentive to counsel their clients to take on additional debt before filing for bankruptcy. As one bankruptcy judge testified, "[t]he more debt that is incurred prior to filing, the more likely the debtor will qualify for chapter 7." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998: Hearing on H.R. 3150 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Admin- istrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., 2d Sess. Pt. I, at 25 (1998) (statement of Judge Randall J. Newsome). Thus, the bankruptcy judge testified that, "[p]erverse as it may seem, I can envision debtor's counsel advising their clients to buy the most expensive car that someone will sell them, and sign on to the biggest payment they can afford (at least until the bankruptcy is filed) as a way of increasing their deductions under [the means test]." Ibid.; see also B9ankruptcy Reform Act of 1999: Hearing on H.R. 833 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Administrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 106th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. II, at 30 (1999) (statement of Judge William Brown). And as discussed above, see p. 3, supra, Congress credited evidence compiled by the United States Trustee Program that "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals [and] problems associated with bankruptcy petition preparers." House Report 5 (quoting Antonia G. Darling & Mark A. Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: The Civil Enforcement Initiative, Am. Bankr. Inst. J., Sept. 2002, at 12).

Section 526(a)(4) is an important component of Congress's effort to prevent such efforts to circumvent of the means test. If a debtor is made financially worse off by following his attorney's unethical advice to incur more debt in an attempt to take advantage of the bankruptcy system, Section 526 provides him a remedy against the attorney, including both a refund of attorney's fees and actual damages. Section 526 also ensures that attorneys will be subject to a concrete sanction for giving such unethical advice; while state bars have a significant role to play in disciplining attorneys for unethical conduct, the additional remedy provided by Section 526 is both more uniform and more certain. Section 526 also facilitates the client's cooperation through its fee-shifting provision, 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2), whereas a state bar must rely on public-spirited complainants.

Section 526(a)(4) thus serves both a compensatory and a deterrent function within Congress's carefully designed framework for reducing well-documented ways of abusing the bankruptcy system. The court of appeals' decision invalidating that important tool raises an important question that is worthy of this Court's review.

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

No. 07-2405

MILAVETZ, GALLOP & MILAVETZ, P.A.;
ROBERT J. MILAVETZ; BARBARA N. NEVIN;

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, APPELLANT

COMMERCIAL LAW LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
AMICUS ON BEHALF OF APPELLEE

Submitted: Mar. 11, 2008
Filed: Sept. 4, 2008
(Corrected Sept. 23, 2008)

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES
DISTRICT COURT FOR THE
DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA

Before: BYE, SMITH, and COLLOTON, Circuit Judges.

SMITH, Circuit Judge.

Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A., a law firm that practices bankruptcy law, the firm's president, a bankruptcy attorney within the firm, and two clients[1] who sought bankruptcy advice from the firm brought suit against the United States seeking a declaratory judgment that certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA)—11 U.S.C. §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)—did not apply to attorneys and law firms and are unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs and issued an order declaring that: (1) attorneys in the District of Minnesota were excluded from the definition of a "debt relief agency" as defined by BAPCPA; and (2) the challenged provisions were unconstitutional as applied to attorneys in the District of Minnesota. We affirm in part and reverse in part.

I. Background

On April 20, 2005, BAPCPA was signed into law, amending and adding multiple sections of the Bankruptcy Code ("the Code"). While some of these amendments became effective immediately, the vast majority became effective on October 17, 2005. See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 1501(a), 119 Stat. 23 (2005) ("Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act and the amendments made by this act shall take effect 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act").

[1] The client-plaintiffs sought prebankruptcy advice regarding the incurrence of additional debt prior to filing bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Code precludes a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person from incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Thus, these client-plaintiffs are appearing on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated who desire to exercise their First Amendment rights with attorneys regarding bankruptcy information.

One BAPCPA amendment added a new term, "debt relief agency," which is defined in § 101(12A) of the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A).[2] The amended Code restricts some actions of debt relief agencies, while requiring them to do others. See 11 U.S.C. § 526 ("Restrictions on debt relief agencies"); 11 U.S.C. § 528 ("Requirements for debt relief agencies"). For example, § 526(a)(4) bars a debt relief agency from advising a client "to incur more debt in contemplation" of a bankruptcy filing, 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), while §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure in their bankruptcy-related advertisements directed to the general public declaring: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code[,]' or a substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The plaintiffs sought alternative remedies. First, plaintiffs requested a declaratory judgment that attorneys did not fall within the definition of "debt relief agency." If the court determined that attorneys fell within the definition of debt relief agency, they challenged the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), as applied to attorneys.

II. Discussion

A. Debt Relief Agencies

Initially, we address whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies. If they do not, we will have no need to address the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), which only apply to debt relief agencies. See Holtan v. Black, 838 F.2d

---

[2] Prior to BAPCPA, the term "debt relief agency" did not exist in the Code.

984, 986 n.3 (8th Cir. 1988) ("Federal courts must avoid passing upon constitutional questions unless they are essential to the disposition of the issues before them.") (citing Three Affiliated Tribes v. Wold Engineering, 467 U.S. 138, 157 (1984) ("It is a fundamental rule of judicial restraint, however, that this Court will not reach constitutional questions in advance of necessity of deciding them")).

> The term "debt relief agency" means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include—
> > (A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;
> >
> > (B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;
> >
> > (C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;
> >
> > (D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or

> (E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (emphasis added).

Further, the Code defines the term "bankruptcy assistance" to mean:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

Id. at § 101(4A) (emphasis added).

Additionally, the Code defines the term "assisted person" as "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $164,250."[3] Id. at § 101(3).

The plaintiffs argue that attorneys are not "debt relief agencies" because the definition of debt relief agencies makes no direct reference to attorneys, even though "attorney" is a defined term in the Code, id. at § 101(4),[4] but does include the term "bankruptcy petition pre-

[3] When this suit was commenced, the dollar amount in § 101(3) was $150,000. Subsequently, on April 1, 2007, the amount was adjusted pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 104. The change, however, is inconsequential for purposes of this case.

[4] "The term 'attorney' means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law." 11 U.S.C. § 101(4). This definition makes no reference to "debt relief agencies" or to subsection (12A).

parer" which, by definition, excludes debtor's attorneys and their staff. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1).[5] Plaintiffs contend that the omission of any reference to attorneys or lawyers while specifically including bankruptcy petition preparers shows Congress's intent to exclude attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies. Because the plaintiffs contend that constitutionality issues arise in §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) if attorneys are debt relief agencies, they assert that the doctrine of constitutional avoidance should be used to interpret "debt relief agency" to exclude attorneys and thus avoid the potential constitutional issues.

Conversely, the government argues that attorneys are debt relief agencies because the broadly worded definition of the term plainly includes attorneys, see 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (defining "debt relief agency" as "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment"), and providing legal representation is included in definition of bankruptcy assistance. See id. at 101(4A) ("bankruptcy assistance means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing . . . advice, counsel, . . . or legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title").

[5] "'[B]ankruptcy petition preparer' means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing [by the debtor in connection with his bankruptcy case]." 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1) (emphasis added); see also id. at § 110(a)(2) (defining "document for filing" as used in § 110(a)(1)).

Whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies is an issue of first impression among the Courts of Appeals. Although the plain language of the definition appears to include bankruptcy attorneys and does not appear to be ambiguous, lower "[c]ourts that have addressed the issue of whether attorneys are debt relief agencies have not been unanimous." In re Irons, 379 B.R. 680, 685 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2007) (citing cases). Nevertheless, the majority of courts have held that compensated bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies as that term is defined in the Code. Id. (finding debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency); Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906 (D. Or. 2006) (same); In re Robinson, 368 B.R. 492 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2007) (finding debtor's counsel was debt relief agency); Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19 (N.D. Tex. 2006) (finding that bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies); In re Norman, No. 06-70859, 2006 WL 3053309 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2006) (finding debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency); but see In re Attorneys at Law and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005) (holding that attorneys are not debt relief agencies); In re Reyes, 361 B.R. 276 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007) (finding that attorneys, generally, are not debt relief agencies, but ruling that debtor's counsel in case at bar was not a debt relief agency because service was provided pro bono and thus counsel did not receive valuable consideration in return for the bankruptcy assistance provided).

In this case, the district court acknowledged that the definition of debt relief agency, "at first glance," appeared to include attorneys, but it ultimately relied on the doctrine of constitutional avoidance to conclude that attorneys did not fall within the definition because if they did portions of §§ 526 and 528 would be unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The doctrine of constitutional avoidance dictates that "where an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, the Court will construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such construction is plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988). Thus, if interpreting "debt relief agency" to include attorneys "would raise serious constitutional problems," then we should look for another interpretation "that may fairly be ascribed" to the definition that does not raise these concerns. Id. at 576-77. We will not, however, adopt an alternative interpretation that is "plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 575.

"We review the district court's statutory interpretation de novo." United States v. Mendoza-Gonzalez, 520 F.3d 912, 914 (8th Cir. 2008). To interpret the statute we first "determine whether the language at issue has a plain and unambiguous meaning with regard to the particular dispute in the case." Id. (quoting Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 340 (1997)). "If so, we apply the plain language of the statute." Id. "A mere disagreement among litigants over the meaning of the statute does not prove ambiguity; it usually means that one of the litigants is simply wrong." Bank of Am. Nat'l Trust & Sav. Ass'n v. 203 N. LaSalle St. P'ship, 526 U.S. 434, 461 (1999).

The plain reading of the definition of debt relief agency, and the defined terms that make up that definition, leads us to conclude that attorneys who provide "bankruptcy assistance" to "assisted persons" are unambiguously included in the definition of "debt relief agencies." See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 912 ("[I]t is the plain language of the Act that leads to the conclusion that attorneys are to be included in the definition of 'debt relief agency,'" and "[t]hus, further use of the tools of statutory construction is not necessary"). The statutory language sweeps broadly and clearly covers the legal services provided by attorneys to debtors in bankruptcy unless excluded by another provision.

Congress specifically listed five exclusions from the definition of "debt relief agency," and if it meant to exclude attorneys from that definition it could have explicitly done so. Id.; 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). Moreover, if attorneys were not included in the definition of debt relief agencies, Congress would have had no reason to include § 526(d)(2), which expressly provides that nothing in §§ 526, 527, or 528 (the sections covering debt relief agencies) "shall be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability of a State . . . to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A) and (B). The legislative history provides further indication that attorneys are included in the definition. See H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 4 (April 8, 2005) ("The bill's consumer protections include provisions strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases") (emphasis added).[6]

[6] Additionally, while we recognize that the Supreme Court has stated that "failed legislative proposals are a particularly dangerous ground on which to rest [a statutory interpretation]," Lockhart v. United States, 546 U.S. 142 (2005) (internal quotation marks and brackets

Because attorneys were not specifically excluded from the definition of debt relief agencies, we hold that attorneys that provide “bankruptcy assistance” to “assisted persons” are “debt relief agencies” as that term is defined by the Code. Interpreting the definition of “debt relief agency” to exclude bankruptcy attorneys would be contrary to Congress’s intent.

B. Constitutionality of § 526(a)(4)

Having concluded that attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, we now must determine whether the challenged provisions placing restrictions and requirements on debt relief agencies are unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to these types of attorneys.[7] One of the sections challenged by the plaintiffs in this case is § 526(a)(4), which states:

omitted), we note that on March 9, 2005, Senator Feingold proposed amendment No. 93 to Congress which would have excluded attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies, see 151 Cong. Rec. S2306-02, 2316 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 2005) (statement by Sen. Feingold) (“This amendment would exclude lawyers from the provisions dealing with ‘debt relief agencies’ . . . .”), but the Senate did not address the proposal.

[7] Even though a more narrowly drawn version of § 526(a)(4) would likely be valid as applied to the plaintiffs in this case, our analysis applies to all attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies, not merely the plaintiff-attorneys. See Members of City Council of City of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 798-99 (1984) (explaining that the overbreadth doctrine allows a party to challenge a broadly written statute “even though a more narrowly drawn statute would be valid as applied to the party in the case,” as “the statute’s very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression”) (internal quotations and citation omitted).

> (4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Plaintiffs assert that the prohibition against advising an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy violates the First Amendment. The parties disagree as to the level of scrutiny we apply to the constitutional analysis of this limitation on speech. Plaintiffs claim that we should review the constitutionality of § 526(a)(4) under the strict scrutiny standard as the restriction on attorney advice is content-based. See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994) ("Our precedents thus apply the most exacting scrutiny to regulations that suppress, disadvantage, or impose differential burdens upon speech because of its content"). Under strict scrutiny review, the government has the burden to prove that the constraints on speech are supported by a compelling governmental interest and are narrowly tailored, such that the statutory effect does not prohibit any more speech than is necessary to serve the governmental interest. Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 774-75 (2002).

In contrast, the government argues that § 526(a)(4)'s restrictions are a type of ethical regulation, invoking the more lenient standard outlined in Gentile v. State Bar of Nev., 501 U.S. 1030 (1991). Under the Gentile standard, we would balance the First Amendment rights of the attorneys against the government's legitimate interest in regulating the activity in question—the prohibition of advising assisted persons to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy—and then determine whether the regulations impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." Id. at 1075.

According to the government, § 526(a)(4) should be interpreted as merely preventing an attorney from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to take on more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy when the incurrence of such debt is done with the intent to manipulate the bankruptcy system, engage in abusive conduct, or take unfair advantage of the bankruptcy discharge. However, the plain language of the statute does not permit this narrow interpretation. Rather, § 526(a)(4) broadly prohibits a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy. The statute's blanket prohibition applies even if the additional debt would not be discharged during the bankruptcy proceedings. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Thus, regardless of whether the government's interest in prohibiting the speech was legitimate (Gentile standard) or compelling (strict scrutiny standard), § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies because it is not narrowly tailored, nor narrowly and necessarily limited, to restrict only that speech that the government has an interest in restricting. Instead, § 526(a)(4) prohibits attorneys classified as debt relief agencies from advising any assisted person to incur any additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy; this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent pre-bankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws. Section 526(a)(4), as written, prevents attorneys from fulfilling their duty to clients to give them appropriate and beneficial advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code or other applicable law.[8]

There are certain situations where it would likely be in the assisted person's, and even the creditors', best interest for the assisted person to incur additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. However, under § 526(a)(4)'s plain language an attorney is prohibited from providing this beneficial advice—even if the advice could help the assisted person avoid filing for bankruptcy altogether. For instance, it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments. This could free up additional funds to pay off other debts and avoid the need for filing bankruptcy all together. Hersh, 347 B.R. at 24. Moreover, it may be in the client's best interest to incur additional debt to purchase a reliable automobile before filing for bankruptcy, so that the debtor will have dependable transportation to travel to and from work, which will likely be necessary to maintain the debtor's payments in bankruptcy. Id. Incurring these types of additional secured debt, which would often survive or could be reaffirmed by the debtor, may be in the debtor's best interest without harming the creditors.[9]

Factual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist and may further illustrate why incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy may not be abusive or harmful to creditors. Nonetheless, § 526(a)(4), as written, does not allow attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies to advise assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons)—i.e. clients (or prospective clients) meeting the definition of assisted person—to incur such debt. Thus, § 526(a)(4) is not narrowly tailored nor narrowly and necessarily limited to prevent only that speech which the government has an interest in restricting. Therefore,

> [Section 526(a)(4)'s] prohibition is particularly troubling when it might be completely legal and even desirable for the client to incur such debt. For example, there may be instances where it is advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car on time. There would be no fraud in doing so if the client intended to pay such debt notwithstanding the filing of a contemplated bankruptcy case. For example, the client may intend to keep all payments fully current and to reaffirm such debt once the case is filed.

we hold that § 526(a)(4) is substantially overbroad,[10] and unconstitutional as applied to attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons, as those terms are defined in the Code.

C. Constitutionality of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)

The plaintiffs also challenged the constitutionality of §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B), claiming that the advertising disclosure requirements mandated by those sections violate the First Amendment rights of bankruptcy attorneys through compelled speech. The disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) are supplemented by § 528(a)(3). These sections state:

> . . .
> > (3) clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public (whether in general media, seminars or specific mailings, telephonic or electronic messages, or otherwise) that the services or benefits are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title; and > > relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or [sic] a substantially similar statement.

[10] See Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 248 F.3d 738, 747 (8th Cir. 2001) ("For us to find a statute unconstitutionally overbroad, its 'overbreadth . . . must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep.' ") (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973)).

Similarly, § 528(b)(2)(B) states:

> (2) An advertisement, directed to the general public, indicating that the debt relief agency provides assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt shall—
>
>
> > (B) include the following statement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

11 U.S.C. § 528(b)(2)(B).

As both §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B) require debt relief agencies—which includes attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons—to disclose in their advertising that "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.' or some substantially similar statement," the statutes compel speech that, similar to a restriction on speech, receives constitutional protection under the First Amendment. See Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 714 (1977) ("[T]he right of freedom of thought protected by the First Amendment against state action includes both the right to speak freely and the right to refrain from speaking at all"); Turner Broad. Sys., Inc., 512 U.S. at 642 (stating that "[l]aws that compel speakers to utter or distribute speech bearing a particular message are subject to" constitutional scrutiny).

The government contends that Congress enacted § 528's disclosure requirements to address problems with deceitful or unclear advertising by bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, or other debt relief entities. This position is supported by legislative history. See 151 Cong. Rec. H2063-01, 2066 (daily ed. Apr. 14, 2005) (statement by Rep. Moran) (stating that certain BAPCPA provisions are intended to "[p]revent deceptive and fraudulent advertising practices by debt relief agencies . . ."). But before we can determine whether the government's justification for mandating the disclosures passes constitutional scrutiny, we must first decide the appropriate standard for reviewing the constitutionality of the required disclosures.

We find guidance for this issue from the Court in Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626 (1985). In Zauderer, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a state bar disciplinary regulation requiring attorneys that advertised contingent-fee representation to disclose in their advertisements that clients may still have to bear certain costs even if the case was unsuccessful. Id. at 633. As the regulation only required an attorney to "include in his advertising purely factual and uncontroversial information about the terms under which his services w[ould] be available," and "the extension of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is justified principally by the value to consumers of the information such speech provides, [the attorney's] constitutionally protected interest in not providing any particular factual information in his advertising is minimal."

Id. at 651. The Court "recognize[d] that unjustified or unduly burdensome disclosure requirements might offend the First Amendment by chilling protected commercial speech," but held "that an advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." Id. (emphasis added).

On the other hand, restrictions on non-deceptive advertising are reviewed under intermediate scrutiny. See Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 564 (1980) (ruling that restrictions on commercial speech that is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity must assert a "substantial interest to be achieved by [the] restrictions" and "the restrictions must directly advance the state interest involved"). Under this standard, the limitation must be narrowly drawn. Id. ("[I]f the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restrictions cannot survive").

The district court in this case reviewed § 528's disclosure requirements under the intermediate scrutiny standard, but we conclude that rational basis review is proper. The disclosure requirements here, like those in Zauderer, are intended to avoid potentially deceptive advertising. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651, n.14 (rejecting a more strict analysis of the disclosure requirements at issue in that case, and noting that "the First Amendment interests implicated by disclosure requirements are substantially weaker than those at stake when speech is actually suppressed . . .").

By definition, debt relief agencies provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons) "with respect to a case or proceeding under [the Bankruptcy Code]." 11 U.S.C. §§ 101(4A), (12A). Section 528 generally requires debt relief agencies to disclose on its advertisements of bankruptcy assistance services directed to the general public that their services do in fact relate to bankruptcy and that they assist people in filing for bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 528. As in Zauderer, the plaintiffs' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal." 471 U.S. at 650. Further, the disclosure requirements are reasonably and rationally related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors, as the disclosure requirements are directed precisely at the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services to the general public make clear that their services do in fact involve filing for bankruptcy.[11] related advertising materials directed to the general public. 11 U.S.C. §§ 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The requirement does not prevent those attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies "from conveying information to the public; it . . . only require[s] them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present." Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650. Moreover, if any of these attorneys are concerned that the required disclosures will confuse the public, we note that nothing in the Code prevents them from identifying themselves in their advertisements as both attorneys and debt relief agencies. Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920. Simply put, attorneys that provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, and the disclosure requirements of § 528 only require those attorneys to disclose factually correct statements on their advertising.[12] This does not violate the

[11] Without ruling on the issue, we note that at least one lower court has held that § 528's disclosure requirements are constitutionally valid even under the stricter intermediate scrutiny analysis, as the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from misleading advertising is substantial, the disclosure requirements placed on bankruptcy attorneys directly advances the government's asserted interest, and the disclosure requirements are narrowly drawn to serve the government's interest. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920 (concluding that § 528 "passes constitutional muster" under either rational basis review or intermediate scrutiny review).

[12] We recognize that the broad definitions of debt relief agency, bankruptcy assistance, and assisted persons, might result in certain attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies even though they do not represent debtors in bankruptcy nor help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Code. Nevertheless, these attorneys are still subjected to the disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) when they advertise "bankruptcy assistance services or . . . the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public," 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3), (4), or when they advertise to the general public that they "provide[] assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt." Id. at § 528(b)(2). But because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure to the one suggested by the Code, these attorneys can and should tailor their advertisement disclosure statements to factually represent the "bankruptcy assistance" they provide. These tailored disclosures will meet the requirements of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) as long as they are "substantially similar" to the suggested disclosure, a decision which will require a case-by-case determination. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 919-20 (dismissing plaintiffs' claim that § 528 was uncon-

First Amendment. Id.; see also In re Robinson, 368 B.R. at 500-502 (finding that debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency subject to the strictures of § 528, and that § 528(a)(1)'s requirement for a written contract is constitutional); In re Norman, 2006 WL 3053309 at *4 (finding that debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency and thus must comply with the requirements of § 528(a)(1)).

The challenged sections of § 528 only require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure on certain advertisements. Although less intrusive means may be conceivable to prevent deceptive advertising, § 528's disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from deceptive advertising, and thus the section passes constitutional muster.

III. Conclusion

In sum, attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Bankruptcy Code, and § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutional as applied to these attorneys, but §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) are constitutional. Accordingly, we affirm in part and reverse in part.

stitutional, rejecting argument that attorney who met definition of debt relief agency but did not represent bankruptcy debtors was precluded from § 528's disclosure requirements because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure, which could be tailored to disclose that attorney advised clients about bankruptcy assistance matters but did not represent people in bankruptcy or file bankruptcy petitions, and stating that whether disclosure was "substantially similar" would require case-by-case determination).

COLLOTON, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I concur in all but Part II.B of the opinion of the court. I disagree, however, with the court's holding that 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad in violation of the First Amendment, and I would therefore reverse the district court's decision declaring this statutory provision unconstitutional.

Milavetz, Gallop, & Milavetz, P.A., mounts a facial attack on § 526(a)(4), arguing that the section's potential application to attorneys in hypothetical situations requires that the statute be declared impermissibly overbroad and unconstitutional. This case involves a facial challenge in the First Amendment context, "under which a law may be overturned as impermissibly overbroad because a substantial number of its applications are unconstitutional, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Wash. State Grange v. Wash. State Republican Party, 128 S. Ct. 1184, 1190 n.6 (2008). This "overbreadth doctrine," however, is "strong medicine that is used sparingly and only as a last resort." New York State Club Ass'n, Inc. v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1, 14 (1988) (internal quotations omitted). It should be applied only when there is "a realistic danger that the statute itself will significantly compromise recognized First Amendment protections of parties not before the Court." City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 801 (1984). The Supreme Court recently emphasized that it has "vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute's overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the stat-

To resolve the constitutional challenge brought by Milavetz, we must first construe the disputed statute. When presented with a constitutional challenge to an Act of Congress, we have not only the power, but the duty, to adopt a narrowing construction that will avoid constitutional difficulties whenever possible. Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 330-31 (1988). In Boos, for example, the Court considered a provision of federal legislation that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." Id. at 329 (internal quotation omitted). The Court observed that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330 (first emphasis added). Nonetheless, citing the "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties by [adopting a narrowing construction] if such a construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute narrowly to permit the dispersal of only congregations that are directed at an embassy, and to allow dispersal "only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present." Id. at 330-31 (internal quotation omitted). Similarly, in United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994), the Court emphasized that "it is incumbent upon" a federal court to read a statute to eliminate constitutional doubts, "so long as such a reading is not plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 78.

[13] The district court purported to consider only an "as-applied" challenge to § 526(a)(4), rather than an overbreadth challenge, and ultimately declared the section "unconstitutional as applied to attorneys." Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, 355 B.R. 758, 766 n.4, 769 (D. Minn. 2006). The majority correctly recognizes that the district court's approach is really an overbreadth analysis, and considers the statute under that framework. See ante, at 9 & n.7, 11, 13 & n.10. The "as applied" method of analysis, by contrast, considers the statute's application to a "particular claimant" based on "harm caused to the litigating party." Turchick v. United States, 561 F.2d 719, 721 n.3 (8th Cir. 1977). "The 'as applied' method vindicates a claimant whose conduct is within the First Amendment but invalidates the challenged statute only to the extent of the impermissible application." Id. (emphasis added). The district court and the majority have declared § 526(a)(4) unconstitutional in all of its applications to all attorneys, and the supporting reasoning is thus consistent with "facial overbreadth analysis." Id. (punctuation omitted).

The challenged provision in this case provides in part that "[a] debt relief agency shall not . . . advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Milavetz argues that according to this provision, a debt relief agency may not advise a client to incur any debt for any purpose when the client is contemplating the filing of a petition for bankruptcy. As such, Milavetz contends that an attorney could be sanctioned for "fulfilling his duty to his client to give legal and appropriate advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code." (Brief of Appellee 30). Even under Milavetz's broad construction of the statute, a facial challenge resting on a "few hypothetical situations," ante, at [14a], is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because "the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge." Vincent, 466 U.S. at 800.

It is unnecessary to resolve whether § 526(a)(4) is impermissibly overbroad when given its broadest reading, however, because the government suggests an acceptable narrowing construction of the statute that would avoid most constitutional difficulties. The government contends that "in contemplation of" filing for bankruptcy is a term of art that denotes an action taken with the intent to abuse the protections of bankruptcy laws. Under this view, the statute should be construed to prohibit only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system.

The text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for a narrowing construction. Particularly given the latitude of federal courts to narrow a text to avoid constitutional difficulties, see Boos, 485 U.S. at 330-31, the words "in contemplation of . . . filing a case" need not create impermissible overbreadth. Rather, we may recognize that the phrase "in contemplation of" has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system. Black's Law Dictionary reflects this understanding, defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "the thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding." Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (emphasis added). American and English authorities construing the bankruptcy laws also support the proposition that the words "in contemplation of" may be understood to require an intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws. In re Pearce, 19 F. Cas. 50, 53 (D. Vt. 1843) (No. 10873) (concluding that an act was done "in contemplation of bankruptcy" if it was done "in anticipation of breaking or failing in his business, of committing an act of bankruptcy, or of being declared bankrupt at his own instance, on the ground of inability to pay his debts, and intending to defeat the general distribution of effects, which takes place under a proceeding in bankruptcy.") (emphasis added); Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 Barn. & Ad. 289, 296, 110 Eng. Rep. 798, 801 (K.B. 1833) (Parke, J.) (interpreting "in contemplation of bankruptcy" to mean that "the payment or delivery must be with intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankruptcy."); Fidgeon v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539, 545-46, 128 Eng. Rep. 800, 802-03 (C.P. 1814) (Gibbs, C.J.) (An act made in contemplation of bankruptcy "must be intended in fraud of the bankrupt laws."); cf. Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U.S. 151, 167 (1851) ("To give to these words, contemplation of bankruptcy, a broad scope, and somewhat loose meaning, would not be in furtherance of the general purpose with which they were introduced."); id. at 169 (relying on English bankruptcy decisions as instructive authority on meaning of the former Bankrupt Act). Our duty to construe the statute to avoid constitutional difficulties counsels that we should look to these authorities for a plausible alternative to the broad construction urged by Milavetz.

The structure of § 526(a)(4) also supports a narrowing construction. The prohibitions of this statute can be enforced only through the civil remedies provided in § 526(c). An attorney who violates § 526(a)(4) can be sanctioned in just three situations: if a debtor sues the attorney for the available remedies—remittal of fees, actual damages, and reasonable attorney's fees and costs; if a state attorney general sues for a resident's actual damages; or if a court finds that the attorney intentionally violated § 526(a)(4), and chooses to "impose an appropriate civil penalty." 11 U.S.C. § 526(c). The remedies for a violation thus emphasize actual damages. But legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all. If an attorney advises a debtor to refinance his home to lower mortgage payments, or to purchase a reliable car to enable him to pay off his debts, see ante, at [13a-14a], then a debtor following that advice would suffer no damage. There is no reason to believe that a client could recover the remittal of attorney's fees or that a court would find a civil penalty "appropriate" as a remedy for legal advice that benefits both the debtor and his creditors. Rather, a debtor is likely to have a remedy against an attorney only in the case of an abusive bankruptcy petition, where the debtor may suffer damages if the petition is dismissed as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1), and where an attorney general or a court has reason to seek or impose sanctions against an abusive debt relief agency. The remedial focus of § 526 thus bolsters the proposition that § 526(a)(4) was aimed only at advice given by a debt relief agency that is designed to abuse the bankruptcy process.

The incorporation of an abusive purpose requirement into § 526(a)(4) is also consonant with the evident purpose of the statute. The government argues, and Milavetz acknowledges, that a principal goal of Congress in passing the statute was to "preclude debtors from taking on more debt knowing that it will later be discharged during bankruptcy." (Brief of Appellee 34). A narrowing construction of § 526(a)(4) is in accord with expressions of desire in the legislative history to address "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals," and

"abusive practices by consumer debtors who, for example, knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 5, 15 (2005) (internal quotation omitted), as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92, 101. Milavetz itself argues that a broad construction of § 526(a)(4) "goes beyond" this congressional purpose, and is "absurd," because it would prevent an attorney from advising a client to take actions that might avoid the need for filing bankruptcy altogether. (Brief of Appellee 34). Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that one party says is absurd, that the other party says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

For these reasons, I would reverse the district court's decision declaring unconstitutional the provision codified at 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

[Dec. 7, 2006]

ORDER

Plaintiffs ask the Court to declare portions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA") unconstitutional. Defendant, United States of America ("the government") moves to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Defendant's motion is denied; the debt relief agency sections of BAPCPA unconstitutionally impinge on attorneys' First Amendment rights.

I. Background

On April 20, 2005, BAPCPA was signed into law, and became effective on October 17, 2005. Among its terms, BAPCPA defines a new category of bankruptcy service provider called a "debt relief agency." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (2005). The law forbids debt relief agencies from doing certain things, and requires them to do others. This lawsuit challenges a number of these provisions.

BAPCPA bars a debt relief agency from advising a client "to incur more debt in contemplation" of a bankruptcy filing. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). BAPCPA further requires that debt relief agencies' advertisements declare: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code," or a substantially similar statement. 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Plaintiffs are bankruptcy attorneys, their law firm, and two unnamed members of the public. Their attack on the statute is based on the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. They allege BAPCPA's debt relief agency provisions are unconstitutional as applied to them. They, initially, claim BAPCPA's regulation of attorneys' advice violates the First Amendment. Next, they claim BAPCPA's advertising requirements contravene the First Amendment.[1] Ultimately, they contend Congress did not intend the debt relief agency requirements to apply to attorneys. The government moves to dismiss plaintiffs' First Amendment claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of

[1] In a footnote, the government asks whether plaintiffs have standing to bring these claims, since they are in no danger of immediate harm. The government's query is misplaced; plaintiffs claim BAPCPA's debt relief agency sections both stifle and compel their speech, in violation of the U.S. Constitution. First Amendment jurisprudence makes clear that a claim that a law has a potential chilling effect on speech establishes standing. Virginia v. Am. Booksellers Ass'n, 484 U.S. 383, 392 (1988).

Civil Procedure ("Fed. R. Civ. P."). The government's motion is denied.

II. Discussion

A. Motion to Dismiss

A Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss must be denied unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts which would entitle him to relief. See Murphy v. Lancaster, 960 F.2d 746, 748 (8th Cir. 1992). In considering such a motion, the motion, the court construes the complaint, and all of its reasonable inferences, most favorably to plaintiff. Westcott v. City of Omaha, 901 F.2d 1486, 1488 (8th Cir. 1990).

B. Unnamed Plaintiffs

The complaint purports to set out the claims of two unnamed parties: John Doe and Mary Doe. The government denies there is any legal basis for anonymous plaintiffs in this lawsuit. Indeed, Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(a) is explicit: a complaint "shall include the names of all the parties." Notwithstanding Rule 10(a), plaintiffs claim their case falls within a limited realm of cases in which other interests—i.e., privacy and concern about embarrassment—outweigh the public's interest in open disclosure. Plaintiffs are incorrect.

There is a strong presumption against allowing parties to use a pseudonym. See, e.g., Doe v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield United of Wisconsin, 112 F.3d 869, 872 (7th Cir. 1997); Doe v. Frank, 951 F.2d 320, 323-24 (11th Cir. 1992); Southern Methodist Univ. Ass'n of Women Law Students v. Wynne & Jaffe, 599 F.2d 707, 712-13 (5th Cir. 1979). The reasons are obvious and compelling: identification of litigants is recognized as important in a public proceeding. See Blue Cross, 112 F.3d at 872. A party who invokes the judicial powers of the United States invites public scrutiny. "The people have a right to know who is using their courts." Id.

Limited exceptions to the party-publicity rule exist. Case law has recognized three factors which, if present, might support anonymity. They have been found when "(1) plaintiffs seeking anonymity were suing to challenge governmental activity; (2) prosecution of the suit compelled plaintiffs to disclose information 'of the utmost intimacy;' and (3) plaintiffs were compelled to admit their intention to engage in illegal conduct, thereby risking criminal prosecution." Doe v. Stegall, 653 F.2d 180, 185 (5th Cir. 1981) (quoting Wynne & Jaffe, 599 F.2d at 712-13). Although the listed factors are not exhaustive, they provide valuable guidance.

While the first factor is present here, the third is not. Plaintiffs argue their "wish to obtain legal advice from [plaintiff] attorneys . . . about prebankruptcy planning and filing bankruptcy" (1st Am. Compl. ¶ 10) suffices for the second factor. According to the Doe parties, the "financial situations of private citizens [are] clearly a matter of utmost intimacy, especially when they feel the need to seek advice about bankruptcy." (Pl.'s Brief 23).

Certainly, those facing bankruptcy are in financial straits; but that does not resolve the issue. Plaintiffs offer no case law to support their claim that merely seeking bankruptcy or financial advice is the kind of intimate personal information typically protected by the court. Bankruptcy is a public proceeding; the Doe plaintiffs are disclosing no medical information or deeply personal questions surrounding human reproduction or matters of that nature.

The Court finds the bankruptcy-seeking plaintiffs' interest in their financial privacy is outweighed by the public's stronger interest in maintaining open trials. Accordingly, the Doe plaintiffs shall amend their complaint to include their real names within 10 days of the date of this Order, or their claims will be dismissed.

C. Constitutional Challenges

1. Attorney Advice: Section 526(a)(4)

Plaintiffs claim BAPCPA's § 526(a)(4), titled "[r]estrictions on debt relief agencies," has "a chilling effect upon lawyers," in violation of their First Amendment rights. (1st Am. Compl. ¶ 39.) Section [526(a)(4)] states:

> A debt relief agency shall not . . . advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

The parties disagree as to the standard of review applied to the constitutional analysis of this section. Plaintiffs claim the standard of review for a restriction on lawful and truthful attorney advice is strict scrutiny. The government replies that § 526(a)(4)'s restrictions are merely a species of ethical regulation, invoking the more lenient standard outlined in Gentile v. State Bar of Nev., 501 U.S. 1030 (1991). Under Gentile, the Court would balance the First Amendment rights of attorneys against the government's legitimate interest in regulating the activity in question, and then determine whether the regulations impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." Id. at 1075. The Court rejects the government's proposed standard.

The "ethical rule" of which the government speaks appears to exist only in its pleadings; the statute discloses no quasi-religious or ethical principle. The government "cannot foreclose the exercise of constitutional rights by mere labels." See NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 429 (1963). While the section is certainly a rule, nothing in § 526 alludes to ethics. The section is titled "Restrictions on debt relief agencies," and plainly prohibits certain acts. The advice the Section forecloses may be potentially advantageous to creditors, but this does not make it equivalent to ethics either in logic or in law.

When fairly viewed, the Court finds § 526(a)(4) to be a content-based regulation of attorney speech—it restricts attorneys from giving particular information and advice to their clients. Attorneys are forbidden to advise their clients concerning an entire subject—incurring more debt in contemplation of filing for bankruptcy. This is a plain regulation of speech. Beyond this, the forbidden speech trenches on two other important areas of concern.

First, the lawyer's advice to take on certain additional financial obligations in contemplation of bankruptcy may well be in the client's best interest.[2] A law

[2] For example, it may be in the client's interest to obtain or refinance a home mortgage prior to filing bankruptcy, because one who has declared bankruptcy may well be denied a lower interest rate after the filing. If the client gets a lower rate mortgage, the refinanced mortgage may have smaller payments which could forestall, or even prevent the bankruptcy in the first place. Similar arguments can be made concern-

yer's highest duty is to the client, and the statute's forbidden advice may indeed be helpful to the client. Secondly, this statute does not restrict false statements—arguably implicating some "ethical" precept—it forbids truthful and possibly efficacious advice. If this is the government's view of legal ethics, it is a form of ethics unfamiliar to the Court.

As the United States Supreme Court has explained, "[g]overnment action that stifles speech on account of its message, or that requires the utterance of a particular message favored by the Government, contravenes th[e] essential [First Amendment] right[s]" of private citizens. Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 641 (1994). For this reason, "governmental control over the content of messages expressed by private individuals" is unconstitutional except in narrow circumstances. Id.

As the Court finds § 526(a)(4) to be a content-based restriction on protected speech, it is subject to strict scrutiny. Id. Such a restriction can only survive if (1) narrowly tailored to achieve (2) a compelling state interest. United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000). The Court finds the government has failed to meet its burden on the first point—§ 526(a)(4) is not narrowly tailored.

The government suggests § 526(a)(4) advances two compelling interests. First, it asserts an interest in protecting creditors. According to the government, § 526(a)(4)'s prohibition discourages prospective bankrupts from accumulating debt in a particular fashion, ing automobile loans, or incases where a client needs to co-sign undischargeable student loans. See Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 24 (N.D. Tex. 2006).

thus deterring debtors from “gaming” the means test by improperly enlarging pre-existing debt, thereby diluting the assets of the bankruptcy estate otherwise available to creditors. Second, it claims § 526(a)(4) protects debtors from attorneys who might lead them to abusive practices which could ultimately result in a denial of discharge of debts under § 523(a)(2)(c). Finally, the government argues that § 523(a)(2)(c) protects the integrity of the bankruptcy system.

Even if the Court assumes the asserted interests are compelling, the restriction is not narrowly-tailored. The government claims the section is narrowly tailored because “it does not limit more speech than is necessary to accomplish this purpose.” (Def.’s Brief 25.) The government is mistaken.

Attorneys have a First Amendment right—let alone an established professional ethical duty—to advise and zealously represent their clients. Legal Serv. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 548-549 (2001). Section 526(a)(4) bars an attorney from advising a client to incur any kind of debt, including legitimate debt, in contemplation of bankruptcy. The lawyer has no duty to assist creditors—who are scarcely without their own resources, and may indeed have contributed to the potential-bankrupt’s straits by making credit easy to obtain. The attorney’s only duty is to the client, and to the law.

Incurring debt on the eve of bankruptcy can scarcely be considered malum in se. To the contrary, for some individuals incurring further obligations, even those which must be adjusted or set aside in the bankruptcy, may be financially prudent. “For example, there may be instances where it is advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car" before filing for bankruptcy. Erwin Chemerinksy, Constitutional Issues Posed in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, 79 AM. BANKR. L.J. 571, 578 (2005). If a client intends to reaffirm the debt after filing bankruptcy, there is no prejudice to the bankruptcy process. BAPCPA's § 526(a)(4) limitation on speech extends beyond any need to protect the bankruptcy process.[3] A lawyer who represents consumers contemplating bankruptcy bears the duty of zealous representation. Conversely, Congress does not have the power "to effect [a] serious and fundamental restriction on advocacy of attorneys." See Velazquez, 531 U.S. at 534. If upheld, this law would prevent lawyers from adequately and competently advising their clients. As such, it unconstitutionally impinges on expressions protected by the First Amendment of the Constitution.[4]

2. Advertising: Section 528(a)(4), (b)(2)

[3] Even under the more lenient Gentile standard, § 526(a)(4) fails. Gentile's balancing test allows the law to impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." 501 U.S. 1030, 1075 (1991); see also Hersh, 347 B.R. at 24-25; Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906, 916 (D. Or. 2006); Zelotes v. Martini, 2006 WL 3231423 *4 (D. Conn. 2006).

[4] Plaintiffs further claim § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally vague and overbroad. The United States Supreme Court has expressed a strong preference for as-applied, as opposed to facial, challenges to the constitutionality of federal laws. Sabri v. United States, 541 U.S. 600 (2004). The Court finds this law unconstitutional as applied, and declines to expand its inquiry and consider whether it is also vague and overbroad.

particular, or substantially similar, language in their advertisements. Congress has prescribed that such agencies declare: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Here again, the Court must determine the appropriate standard of review. The choice turns on whether the statute regulates deceptive or truthful advertising. Statutes regulating deceptive commercial speech need only withstand rational basis review. Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the S. Ct. of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 651-52 (1985). But restrictions on non-deceptive advertising must employ means that directly advance a substantial government interest. Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Service Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 566 (1980).

The government argues that BAPCPA regulates deceptive advertising, citing evidence adduced before Congress showing "some bankruptcy lawyers did not mention in their advertisements that their ability to make 'debts disappear' derived from the use of the bankruptcy process." (Def.'s Brief 28.) Plaintiffs respond that, when Congress imposed these requirements on all advertisements of bankruptcy assistance, it mandated a blunderbuss which strikes truthful, as well as false or deceptive advertising. The Court agrees.

With very few exceptions, any party advertising debt relief services must include § 528's statutory statement. The present lawyer-plaintiffs advertise themselves as bankruptcy attorneys in newspapers, telephone directories, television, radio, and the internet. There is no evidence, however, suggesting their bankruptcy assistance advertisements are deceptive in any regard. Even assuming some debt relief agencies advertise an ability to make "debts disappear," there is no showing such a statement is deceptive. Under these circumstances, the Court finds it appropriate to analyze this question by applying intermediate scrutiny. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 641.

The government may only regulate truthful bankruptcy assistance advertisements if: (1) the regulation directly advances (2) a substantial government interest, and is (3) "narrowly drawn." Cent. Hudson, 447 U.S. at 566; Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 641. The Court finds that BAPCPA's § 528 advertising requirements fail to directly advance the government's purported substantial interest and are not narrowly drawn.

The government contends advertising, absent the compulsory statements, may mislead the lay community into thinking debts can be erased without payment or filing for bankruptcy. The government claims §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) protect against consumer deception"by alerting [them] that a lawyer may use bankruptcy as a means to help them." (Def.'s Brief 28.) Setting aside the implausibility of anyone actually believing in a magic wand capable of making debt go away, it is most unlikely that the insertion of the statement "We are a debt relief agency, we help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code" prevents consumer deception; it may well increase it.

The term "debt relief agency" is simply a legislative contrivance. The public is more likely to be confused by an advertisement containing this Congressionally-invented term than one which advertises the services of a bankruptcy attorney.

Beyond this, however, the term "debt relief agency" is almost all-encompassing. It instantly swallows all persons who engage in"bankruptcy assistance," attorneys and non-attorneys alike. Congress's merger of both attorneys and non-attorneys is, itself, likely to confuse the public. There are many non-trivial differences between an attorney's services to his or her clients, and services non-lawyers are permitted to offer. Unlike those who only restructure debt, or perhaps provide bankruptcy forms, attorneys give legal advice and actually represent debtors in bankruptcy proceedings. The requirement that parties so dissimilarly-placed must use the same mandated disclosure statement is likely to cause consumer confusion. In this respect, § 528 fails to directly advance the government's stated interest in clarifying bankruptcy service advertisements.[5]

Section 528's advertising requirement is also not narrowly drawn. The narrowly drawn standard is "something short of a least-restrictive means standard." Bd. of Tr. of the State Univ. of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 477 (1989). A narrowly drawn regulation designed to prevent deception "may be no broader than reasonably necessary to prevent the 'perceived evil.'" In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191, 203 (1992). Section 528's language not only regulates misleading advertisements—those [5] At oral argument, the government's counsel acknowledged areas where the statute is vague. As an example, it appears that the quantum of bankruptcy advice a lawyer offers may require some attorneys to publish the mandated language and others not. The statute makes no distinction between a lawyer who only occasionally has a client facing bankruptcy and those who do so regularly. Quaere: does a 500-person law firm having a single lawyer who regularly does bankruptcy work have to put the disclaimer on every piece of the firm's advertising?

suggesting debts can disappear—it binds all who advertise bankruptcy services. This sweeping regulation goes beyond whatever problem it was designed to address. It broadly regulates absolutely truthful advertisements throughout an entire field of legal practice. The government has failed to show that this restriction on attorneys' commercial speech is justified. As applied to attorneys, this section of BAPCPA fails constitutional scrutiny. Thus, the government cannot prevail on its motion to dismiss.

D. The "Debt Relief Agency" Definition

Plaintiffs ask the Court to find attorneys beyond the scope of a BAPCPA "debt relief agency." According to the statute,

> [t]he term 'debt relief agency' means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110.

11 U.S.C. § 101 (12A). This section, of course, makes no direct reference to either "attorney" or "lawyer." It does include the term "bankruptcy petition preparer," which, by definition, expressly excludes attorneys and their staff. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1) (2006). According to plaintiffs, the omission of any reference to attorneys or lawyers, while including a term which excludes attorneys, shows Congress must have intended to exclude attorneys from the "debt relief agency" definition. They also claim it would be absurd for attorneys to provide a statement telling their clients they have a right to an attorney, and that only attorneys can provide legal advice as required for debt relief agencies under 11 U.S.C. § 527(b).[6]

The government claims the statute includes attorneys because legal representation is included in "bankruptcy assistance," statutorily defined as:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 101(4A).

At first glance, this language might include attorneys. But the glance is deceiving: the statute contains a rule of construction for the term "debt relief agency." The statute provides that nothing in §§ 526, 527, and 528 —those sections imposing requirements on debt relief agencies—shall:

> be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability . . . of a State or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State.

[6] At least one court has found these arguments persuasive, holding that debtor attorneys are not "debt relief agencies." In re Attorneys at Law and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66, 69 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005).

If lawyers are placed within the ambit of § 101 (4A), the placement conflicts with § 526(d)(2)(A). The conflict would exist because states would be deprived of their ability "to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law." If BAPCPA's debt relief agency sections apply to attorneys, it means Congress has taken upon itself the authority to determine the advice attorneys can give their clients and what attorney advertisements must say, thereby infringing on the state's traditional role of regulating attorneys. See Leis v. Flynt, 439 U.S. 438, 442 (1979) ("Since the founding of the Republic, the licensing and regulation of lawyers has been left exclusively to the States.")

This view is supported by the doctrine of constitutional avoidance. This doctrine counsels that, in construing a statute for ambiguity, the Court must opt for a construction which avoids grave constitutional questions. Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568,575 (1988). The Court perceives a clear ambiguity in this statute—on one hand it appears to regulate a lawyer's practice; on the other, such regulation is specifically reserved to the states. As outlined above, these sections would be unconstitutional if applied to attorneys. For these reasons, the Court finds §§ 526, 527 and 528 do not apply to attorneys.

VI. Conclusion

The Court finds BAPCPA sections 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4), (b)(2) are unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. Moreover, the Court finds the debt relief agency provisions of BAPCPA inapplicable to attorneys. Therefore, the government's motion to dismiss [Docket No. 13] is denied.

1. 11 U.S.C. 101 provides in pertinent part:

Definitions

In this title the following definitions shall apply:

* * * * *

(3) The term “assisted person” means any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $150,000.

(4) The term “attorney” means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law.

(4A) The term “bankruptcy assistance” means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

* * * * *

(12) The term “debt” means liability on a claim.

(12A) The term “debt relief agency” means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bank-

ruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include—

(A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;

(B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;

(C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;

(D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or

(E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

2. 11 U.S.C. 526 provides:

Restrictions on debt relief agencies

(a) A debt relief agency shall not—

(1) fail to perform any service that such agency informed an assisted person or prospective assisted

person it would provide in connection with a case or proceeding under this title;

(2) make any statement, or counsel or advise any assisted person or prospective assisted person to make a statement in a document filed in a case or proceeding under this title, that is untrue and misleading, or that upon the exercise of reasonable care, should have been known by such agency to be untrue or misleading;

(3) misrepresent to any assisted person or prospective assisted person, directly or indirectly, affirmatively or by material omission, with respect to—

(A) the services that such agency will provide to such person; or

(B) the benefits and risks that may result if such person becomes a debtor in a case under this title; or

(4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

(b) Any waiver by any assisted person of any protection or right provided under this section shall not be enforceable against the debtor by any Federal or State court or any other person, but may be enforced against a debt relief agency.

(c)(1) Any contract for bankruptcy assistance between a debt relief agency and an assisted person that does not comply with the material requirements of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall be void and may not be enforced by any Federal or State court or by any other person, other than such assisted person.

(2) Any debt relief agency shall be liable to an assisted person in the amount of any fees or charges in connection with providing bankruptcy assistance to such person that such debt relief agency has received, for actual damages, and for reasonable attorneys' fees and costs if such agency is found, after notice and a hearing, to have—

(A) intentionally or negligently failed to comply with any provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 with respect to a case or proceeding under this title for such assisted person;

(B) provided bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in a case or proceeding under this title that is dismissed or converted to a case under another chapter of this title because of such agency's intentional or negligent failure to file any required document including those specified in section 521; or

(C) intentionally or negligently disregarded the material requirements of this title or the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure applicable to such agency.

(3) In addition to such other remedies as are provided under State law, whenever the chief law enforcement officer of a State, or an official or agency designated by a State, has reason to believe that any person has violated or is violating this section, the State—

(A) may bring an action to enjoin such violation;

(B) may bring an action on behalf of its residents to recover the actual damages of assisted persons arising from such violation, including any liability under paragraph (2); and

(C) in the case of any successful action under subparagraph (A) or (B), shall be awarded the costs of the action and reasonable attorneys'fees as determined by the court.

(4) The district courts of the United States for districts located in the State shall have concurrent jurisdiction of any action under subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (3).

(5) Notwithstanding any other provision of Federal law and in addition to any other remedy provided under Federal or State law, if the court, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States trustee or the debtor, finds that a person intentionally violated this section, or engaged in a clear and consistent pattern or practice of violating this section, the court may—

(A) enjoin the violation of such section; or

(B) impose an appropriate civil penalty against such person.

(d) No provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall—

(1) annul, alter, affect, or exempt any person subject to such sections from complying with any law of any State except to the extent that such law is inconsistent with those sections, and then only to the extent of the inconsistency; or

(2) be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability—

(A) of a State or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or

(B) of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court.

SUMMARY OF THE CASE AND STATEMENT REGARDING ORAL ARGUMENT

This case involves a facial First Amendment challenge to provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23. As part of that Act, Congress established certain minimum standards of professional conduct for "debt relief agencies" — a term defined to include "any person" who provides professional bankruptcy assistance to consumer debtors in exchange for a fee. Among other requirements, Congress provided that debt relief agencies may not advise clients to incur additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition, see 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), and required that debt relief agencies disclose in their advertisements the fact that they assist clients in filing for bankruptcy, see 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The district court held these provisions unconstitutional under the First Amendment, and further held that the term "debt relief agency" does not encompass licensed attorneys.

Because the district court has declared unconstitutional several provisions of an Act of Congress, the United States respectfully requests that the Court allocate 20 minutes per side for oral argument.

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLANT

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

Plaintiffs invoked the jurisdiction of the district court under 28 U.S.C. § 1331. See JA9.[1] The district court entered final judgment in favor of plaintiffs on April 19, 2007. JA46. The United States filed a notice of appeal on June 13, 2007, within the time provided by Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B). JA47. This Court has jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

As part of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005), Congress established minimum standards of professional conduct for bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, and other "debt relief agencies" — anyone who provides professional bankruptcy assistance to consumer debtors in exchange for a fee. Among other requirements, Congress provided that debt relief agencies may not advise clients to incur additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition, see 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), and required that debt relief agencies disclose in their advertisements the fact that they assist clients in filing for bankruptcy, see 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Plaintiffs, who include consumer bankruptcy attorneys, filed this facial challenge alleging that the advice limitations in section 526(a)(4) and the disclosure requirements in section 528 violate the First Amendment. In addition, plaintiffs contended that the statutory term "debt relief agency" does not include attorneys. The district court (Rosenbaum, C.J.) granted summary judgment for plaintiffs, holding that each of the challenged provisions violates the First Amendment, and that attorneys do not fall within the statutory definition.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory Background

1. In the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, Congress enacted "a comprehensive package of reform measures" designed "to improve bankruptcy law and practice by restoring personal responsibility and integrity in the bankruptcy system and ensure that the system is fair for both debtors and creditors." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 2 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89 ("House Report"). Described by Congress as "the most comprehensive set of [bankruptcy] reforms in more than 25 years," id. at 3, the Act both modifies the substantive standards for bankruptcy relief and adopts new measures intended to curb a variety of abusive practices that Congress concluded had come to pervade the bankruptcy system.

As part of this reform package, Congress established certain minimum standards of professional conduct for bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, and other bankruptcy professionals — collectively termed "debt relief agencies" — who provide for-profit services to consumer debtors. The statute defines the term "debt relief agency" to include any person who, for a fee, "provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance" includes any services intended to provide advice, counsel, or document preparation or filing assistance "with respect to a case or proceeding under this title," including in particular "providing legal representation." Id. § 101(4A).[2] professionals, Congress determined, had become a substantial cause of unnecessary bankruptcy petitions and, in some circumstances, jeopardized debtors' ability to obtain a discharge of their debts. For example, Congress heard evidence that a civil enforcement initiative undertaken by the United States Trustee Program had "consistently identified * * * misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" as among the sources of abuse in the bankruptcy system. House Report, at 5 (citation omitted). Congress therefore responded in the 2005 Act by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." Id. at 17.

Misleading and abusive practices by such bankruptcy

2. The new standards enacted by Congress are principally set forth in 11 U.S.C. §§ 707 and 526-528.[3]

Section 707, as amended by the 2005 Act, now requires bankruptcy attorneys to make their own reasonable investigation into the circumstances giving rise to the debtor's petition, including a specific inquiry into the veracity of the debtor's debt and asset schedules. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). The legislation further requires the attorney to certify that, in the attorney's professional judgment, the petition does not constitute an "abuse" under section 707(b). See ibid.

Section 526 lays down four basic rules of professional conduct. Section 526(a)(1) requires debt relief agencies to perform all promised services. Section 526(a)(2) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising an assisted person to make statements that are untrue or misleading in seeking bankruptcy relief. Section 526(a)(3) precludes debt relief agencies from misrepresenting the services they will provide, the benefits that will accrue, or the risks that may be entailed in filing for bankruptcy. Section 526(a)(4), which plaintiffs challenge in this litigation, states:

[3] For the Court's convenience, the pertinent provisions are reproduced in the addendum to this brief.

> A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

Sections 527 and 528 set forth several interrelated disclosure requirements. Section 527 requires debt relief agencies to provide specific notices to clients, including a description of the different types of relief available in the bankruptcy system. Section 528 similarly requires debt relief agencies to provide clients with written contracts that clearly explain the services that will be provided and the fees that will apply. See 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(1)-(2).

In addition, section 528 requires debt relief agencies to "clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement * * * directed to the general public" that the advertised debt-relief services “are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title.” Id. § 528(a)(3). In particular, in any advertisements purporting to offer relief from “credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt,” a debt relief agency must:

> (A) disclose clearly and conspicuously in such advertisement that the assistance may involve bankruptcy relief under this title; and
>
> (B) include the following statement: “We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.” or a substantially similar statement.

Id. § 528(b)(2); see also id. § 528(a)(4).

3. The primary remedy for violations of these sections is a civil action by the debtor to recover the debtor’s “actual damages,” including any fees already paid. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(2). For violations of the professional conduct restrictions in section 526, the statute also permits the relevant state attorney general to file an action for the debtor’s actual damages, see id. § 526(c)(3), and authorizes the bankruptcy court to impose an “appropriate civil monetary penalty” if it determines that the violation was intentional or formed part of a clear and consistent pattern, id. § 526(c)(5).

B. Facts and Prior Proceedings

1. Plaintiffs are two consumer bankruptcy attorneys, their law firm, and two members of the public. See JA8 (complaint).[4] In this civil action against the United States, plaintiffs seek a declaratory judgment that they are not obligated to comply with the advice limitations in section 526(a)(4) or the advertising disclosure requirements in section 528. In their district court papers, plaintiffs contended that attorneys are not "debt relief agencies" within the meaning of the statute. They also claimed that, to the extent the statute encompasses licensed attorneys, sections 526(a)(4), 528(a)(4), and 528(b)(2) violate the First Amendment.

2. The district court invalidated the challenged provisions. See Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz P.A. v. United States, 355 B.R. 758 (D. Minn. 2006) (JA27-43).

a. The district court began by holding that the advice limitations in section 526(a)(4), as applied to attorneys, violate the First Amendment. See id. at 763-66. The court first concluded that section 526(a)(4) is a content-based restriction subject to strict scrutiny, rather than "a species of ethical regulation" subject to "the more lenient standard outlined in [4] The original complaint listed two unnamed plaintiffs (identified as John and Mary Doe) who claimed to be members of the public hoping to obtain bankruptcy-related advice from the attorney plaintiffs. JA8. The district court held that those parties could not use a pseudonym. See Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz P.A. v. United States, 355 B.R. 758, 762-63 (D. Minn. 2006). Plaintiffs later amended their complaint to disclose the names of those parties. See No. 05-2626 (D. Minn.), docket #34.

Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991)." See 355 B.R. at 764. The court explained that the provision could not be understood as a rule of professional conduct because, in the court's view, "the statute discloses no quasi-religious or ethical principle. * * * * While the section is certainly a rule, nothing in § 526 alludes to ethics." Ibid.

Turning to the merits, the district court applied strict scrutiny and held that section 526(a)(4) "unconstitutionally impinges on expressions protected by the First Amendment." Id. at 765. The court did not dispute that section 526(a)(4) is designed to curb fraud and abuse of the bankruptcy system. See ibid. It concluded, however, that the restriction "is not narrowly-tailored," because under the court's interpretation of the statute, section 526(a)(4) "bars an attorney from advising a client to incur any kind of debt, including legitimate debt, in contemplation of bankruptcy." Ibid.[5] [5] In holding section 526(a)(4) unconstitutional, the court relied in part on decisions from district courts in other circuits. Appeals from those decisions are now pending. See Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19 (N.D. Tex. 2006), appeal docketed, Nos. 07-10226 & 07-10265 (5th Cir.); Zelotes v. Martini, 352 B.R. 17 (D. Conn. 2006), appeal docketed sub nom. Zelotes v. Adams, No. 07-1853 (2d Cir.); Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906 (D. Or. 2006), appeal docketed, No. 07-35616 (9th Cir.). Additional challenges to section 526(a)(4) are pending in other district courts. See Conn. Bar Ass'n v. United States, No. 06-729 (D. Conn.); In re Reyes, No. 07-20689 (S.D. Fla.).

b. The district court next invalidated the advertising disclosure requirements in section 528. See id. at 766-67. The court rejected the government's contention that section 528 prevents consumer deception by making clear that advertisements promising to prevent foreclosure, for example, or to make debts "disappear," are in fact advertisements offering assistance in filing for bankruptcy. Id. at 767. The district court expressed skepticism that any such disclosure was necessary, asserting "the implausibility of anyone actually believing in a magic wand capable of making debt go away." Ibid. In the court's view, moreover, the requirement in section 528 that debt relief agencies identify themselves using that "Congressionally-invented term" was unlikely to decrease consumer confusion and "may well increase it," particularly because the term applies to "attorneys and non-attorneys alike." Ibid. The district court thus held section 528 invalid under the First Amendment because it "fails to directly advance the government's stated interest in clarifying bankruptcy service advertisements." Ibid.

c. Finally, after ruling on plaintiffs' constitutional claims, the district court returned to plaintiffs' statutory argument that the term "debt relief agency" does not encompass licensed attorneys. See id. at 767-68. The court recognized that, although the definition of "debt relief agency" does not specifically mention attorneys, it includes any person who provides "bankruptcy assistance," which is defined to include, inter alia, "providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title." See id. at 768.

Nevertheless, the district court ruled that attorneys are not debt relief agencies. Ibid. In so holding, the court relied on the preemption savings clause in section 526(d), which provides that nothing in sections 526 or 528 may "be deemed to limit or curtail the authority * * * of a State * * * to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A). The district court reasoned that, if the term "debt relief agency" encompassed attorneys, it would "conflict[] with § 526(d)(2)(A)," "because states would be deprived of their ability" to establish qualifications for legal practice. 355 B.R. at 768. The district court also stated that its interpretation was supported by the doctrine of constitutional avoidance because, as the court had already held, the challenged provisions "would be unconstitutional if applied to attorneys." Ibid.

3. The district court subsequently granted plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and entered a declaratory judgment that sections 526(a)(4), 528(a)(4), and 528(b)(2) are "unconstitutional, as applied to attorneys in the District of Minnesota." JA44. The district court further declared that "attorneys in the District of Minnesota are excluded from the term 'debt relief agency,' as defined in 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A); as such, Minnesota attorneys are relieved of any duties relating to BAPCPA-defined debt relief agencies imposed by that statute." JA45. This appeal followed.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

In enacting the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Congress sought to curb abuses of the bankruptcy system, both by debtors and by the professionals who represent them. Congress thus "strengthen[ed] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases," H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 17, by enacting a range of new provisions, including the two measures at issue here. Section 526(a)(4) precludes bankruptcy attorneys from encouraging their clients to abuse the protections of the Bankruptcy Code by deliberately accumulating new debt in contemplation of bankruptcy, while section 528 requires bankruptcy attorneys to disclose in their advertisements that the services they offer may in fact involve a petition for bankruptcy. Because the First Amendment does not disable Congress from regulating the professional conduct of bankruptcy attorneys in this manner, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

I. Section 526(a)(4) provides that bankruptcy attorneys and other debt relief agencies may not advise their clients "to incur more debt in contemplation of" filing a petition for bankruptcy relief. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). This requirement is part of a broader effort by Congress in the 2005 legislation to address abuses of the bankruptcy system by debtors who amass additional debt on the eve of bankruptcy in order to take advantage of the Bankruptcy Code's discharge provisions or otherwise manipulate its protections. Among other amendments, the 2005 Act restricts the ability of debtors to discharge such debt, and it expands the authority of bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions for abuse of the bankruptcy system — including in cases in which debtors abuse the Code by taking on additional debt in contemplation of filing a petition. In addition, the 2005 legislation imposes a new duty on bankruptcy attorneys personally to certify that the petitions filed by their clients do not constitute an abuse of the Code, and it authorizes bankruptcy courts to impose sanctions on attorneys for violations of that duty.

Section 526(a)(4) complements these provisions by precluding attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals from encouraging their clients to engage in such abuses. The district court did not suggest that debtors can properly take on additional debt to manipulate the bankruptcy system, or that attorneys are constitutionally entitled to encourage them to do so. Nevertheless, the district court declared section 526(a)(4) unconstitutional on its face because it believed that the provision would also encompass advice to engage in conduct consistent with the Bankruptcy Code and with the client's legitimate interests.

That reading extends section 526(a)(4) far beyond Congress's purpose. In precluding attorneys from urging their clients to take on additional debt "in contemplation of" a bankruptcy filing, Congress was concerned only with debt purposefully accumulated in order to manipulate the bankruptcy system. Neither the language of the statute nor relevant legislative history warrants the district court's assumption that section 526(a)(4) would prevent a lawyer from offering candid advice on the legality of a debtor's proposed course of conduct, or that it would prohibit an attorney from urging a client to take actions consistent with the Bankruptcy Code and the client's best interests. A statute should be construed to avoid, rather than to invite, constitutional difficulties, and the court erred in failing to apply this principle in construing section 526(a)(4).

Moreover, even under the district court's mistakenly broad reading of the statute, there is little dispute that section 526(a)(4) would be constitutionally applied in the category of cases at which the statute is actually aimed. In holding section 526(a)(4) invalid in all its applications to all attorneys in Minnesota, the district court failed to consider whether the assertedly impermissible applications would be substantial when judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep.

II. Section 528 requires bankruptcy attorneys to disclose in their advertisements that the services they offer may in fact involve a petition for bankruptcy. See 11 U.S.C. § 528(b)(2); id. § 528(a)(4). Congress enacted this disclosure requirement in response to evidence of aggressive advertising tactics by attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals who offered enticing promises of relief — preventing foreclosures, stopping repossessions, making debts "disappear," and so on — without revealing that obtaining such relief would involve a petition for bankruptcy.

This limited requirement, which restricts no speech, is tailored to the problem identified by Congress and simply ensures that advertisements for debt relief assistance disclose that the advertiser provides bankruptcy services. In holding the provision invalid, the district court declared that the problem addressed by the legislation did not exist, asserting that it was "implausib[le]" that "anyone [would] actually believ[e] in a magic wand capable of making debt go away." 355 B.R. at 766-67. The court's declaration is without basis and fails even to acknowledge the evidence that prompted Congress's action.

III. After reaching and deciding plaintiffs' constitutional claims, the district court addressed plaintiffs' statutory argument and declared that the term "debt relief agency" does not encompass licensed attorneys. That conclusion is flatly at odds with the statutory language and congressional intent. The standards of professional conduct adopted by Congress in the 2005 legislation — including many provisions not challenged by plaintiffs here — apply to "debt relief agencies." That term is defined to include "any person" who, for a fee, "provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance," in turn, includes "providing information, advice, [or] counsel * * * with respect to a case or proceeding under this title" — including in particular "providing legal representation." Id. § 101(4A).

By its plain terms, therefore, the 2005 Act applies to any person who provides "legal representation" to consumer debtors for a fee — a category that unmistakably includes bankruptcy attorneys. Indeed, as the legislative history makes clear, Congress enacted the "debt relief agency" reforms in response to evidence that specifically identified misconduct by attorneys as a cause of abusive bankruptcy filings. Congress regulated the professional conduct of bankruptcy attorneys as part of its broader effort in the 2005 legislation to curb bankruptcy abuses, and the district court could not properly excise attorneys from the scope of the statute.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews challenges to the constitutionality of a federal statute de novo. See, e.g., United States v. Mugan, 441 F.3d 622, 627 (8th Cir. 2006); United States v. Crawford, 115 F.3d 1397, 1400 (8th Cir. 1997). Issues of statutory interpretation are likewise subject to plenary review. See United States v. Weis, 487 F.3d 1148, 1151 (8th Cir. 2007).

ARGUMENT

I. CONGRESS CONSTITUTIONALLY REGULATED THE CONDUCT OF BANKRUPTCY PROFESSIONALS BY PRECLUDING THEM FROM ENCOURAGING CLIENTS TO ABUSE THE BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM BY TAKING ON ADDITIONAL DEBT IN CONTEMPLATION OF FILING A PETITION.

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 seeks to curb a variety of abusive practices by consumer debtors and their professional representatives. A principal concern of the legislation was to address the recurring problem of debtors' attempting to exploit the Bankruptcy Code's discharge provisions, or otherwise manipulate the bankruptcy system, by purposefully accumulating additional debt prior to filing a petition for relief. Among other reforms, the 2005 Act expanded the authority of the bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions for such abuses and required attorneys affirmatively to certify that no basis exists for deeming their clients' petitions abusive.

Section 526(a)(4) complements these reforms by precluding bankruptcy professionals from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system by taking on additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition. Because the provision is an unexceptional regulation of professional conduct that does not impinge upon the First Amendment rights of attorneys or their clients, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

A. The 2005 Act Addresses Abuses Of The Code By Debtors Who Incur New Debt In Anticipation Of Bankruptcy And By Attorneys Who Encourage Clients To Engage In Such Conduct.

1. Abuses Of The System By Debtors Incurring Additional Debt In Contemplation Of Bankruptcy.

Congress has long been aware that the relief afforded by the bankruptcy laws creates a perverse incentive for debtors to amass additional debt in contemplation of obtaining a discharge. Congress has repeatedly expressed its view that such conduct poses a fundamental threat to the Code's twin goals of affording debtors a fresh start while providing an orderly and equitable system of resolving creditors' claims.

For example, when Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(2)(C), which creates a presumption that certain eve-of-bankruptcy debts are not dischargeable, the accompanying Senate Report emphasized that "[e]xcessive debts incurred within a short period prior to the filing of the petition present a special problem: that of 'loading up' in contemplation of bankruptcy." S. Rep. No. 98-65, at 9 (1983). The report explained that "[a] debtor planning [to] file a petition with the bankruptcy court has a strong economic incentive to incur dischargeable debts for either consumable goods or exempt property," noting that "[i]n many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent." Ibid. As the report concluded, "[n]ot only does this result in direct losses for the creditors that are the victims of the spree, but it also creates a higher absolute level of debt so that all creditors receive less in liquidation. During this period of insolvency preceding the filing of the petition, creditors would not extend credit if they knew the true facts." Ibid. Indeed, as early as 1973, Congress was informed that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge." Report of the Commission of the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, pt. I, at 11 (July 1973).

In adopting the 2005 Act, Congress expressed concern that these earlier measures had not adequately restricted the ability of debtors to "knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 15 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 101 ("House Report"). Accordingly, Congress took a series of new steps in the 2005 Act to combat the problem of debts incurred in contemplation of bankruptcy. Thus, the Act reduced the threshold amounts at which certain types of eve-of-bankruptcy debts, such as cash advances, become presumptively fraudulent and therefore nondischargeable.[6] See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 310, 119 Stat. at 84 (amending 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(2)(C)).

More fundamentally, Congress greatly expanded the authority of the bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions for abuse of the bankruptcy system, including in cases in which debtors abuse the Code by purposefully incurring additional debt in contemplation of filing a petition. Even before the 2005 legislation, a bankruptcy court was authorized to dismiss a petition for "substantial abuse" under former 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1). Moreover, it was established that, under the "substantial abuse" standard, a debtor's purposeful accumulation of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy could justify dismissal. See In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981, 983-84 (8th Cir. 1989) ("substantial abuse" inquiry included, but was not limited to, evidence of bad faith conduct by the debtor); see also, e.g., In re Price, 353 F.3d 1135, 1139-40 (9th Cir. 2004) (describing factors relevant to a finding of substantial abuse, including "[w]hether the debtor has engaged in eve-of-bankruptcy purchases"); In re Charles, 334 B.R. 207, 222 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2005) ("It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case."); In re Rathbun, 309 B.R. 901, 904 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004); In re Aiello, 284 B.R. 756, 761 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2002).[7]

[6] One of the factors that bankruptcy courts consider in determining whether a debt is fraudulent and nondischargeable, moreover, is "[w]hether or not an attorney has been consulted concerning the filing of bankruptcy before the charges were made." In re Eashai, 87 F.3d 1082, 1087 (9th Cir. 1996); see also In re Mercer, 246 F.3d 391, 408 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("whether, prior to card-use, an attorney was consulted about bankruptcy").

In the 2005 Act, Congress reduced the threshold finding required under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) for a bankruptcy court to dismiss a debtor's petition as abusive, from "substantial abuse" to merely "abuse," see House Report at 48, and it repealed the statutory presumption in favor of granting the relief sought by the debtor, see id. at 49; Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 102, 119 Stat. at 27. Congress further made clear that, in determining whether a petition should be dismissed for abuse, a bankruptcy court may [7] As the Supreme Court recently explained in the context of chapter 13 debtors, bad faith pre-petition conduct by the debtor justifies dismissal of the petition because such a debtor "is not a member of the class of 'honest but unfortunate debtor[s]' that the bankruptcy laws were enacted to protect." Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 127 S. Ct. 1105, 1111 (2007) (quoting Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 287 (1991)).

properly consider "whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith" and whether "the totality of the circumstances * * * of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). At the same time, Congress authorized any party in interest — including, for example, unsecured creditors aggrieved by a debtor's eleventh-hour accumulation of new debt — to file a motion for such relief. See id. § 707(b)(1). Under prior law, only the United States Trustee, or the court on its own motion, could seek to dismiss a petition as abusive. See, e.g., In re Walton, 866 F.2d at 982.

2. Abuses Of The System By Lawyers And Other Bankruptcy Professionals.

Congress also responded in the 2005 Act to evidence that attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals often played a critical role in abuse of the bankruptcy system. Citing data collected by the U.S. Trustee Program, the House Report noted that the study "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" and "problems associated with bankruptcy petition preparers." House Report at 5 (quoting Darling & Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: the Civil Enforcement Initiative, 21 Am. Bankr. Inst. J. 12 (Sept. 2002)).

The need to address misconduct by bankruptcy professionals was made particularly urgent by the "principal consumer bankruptcy reform" in the 2005 legislation, which was the adoption of a "means testing" mechanism intended to restrict debtors who have the ability to repay at least some of their debts from obtaining a complete discharge under chapter 7. See House Report at 48; see also id. at 3 (describing means testing as the "heart" of the 2005 Act's reform provisions). Under the new means-testing provision, a debtor's petition for complete relief under chapter 7 is presumed to be abusive if the debtor's income exceeds his unsecured debts by a certain ratio. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A). The effect of the means test is to ensure that debtors who have the ability to repay a portion of their debts are channeled into chapter 13, which provides an opportunity for a structured repayment plan.

As Congress recognized, however, the means test exacerbates the incentive for debtors to manipulate the system by "loading up" on debt in contemplation of filing a petition, because a higher debt ratio can allow an otherwise borderline debtor to avoid the burdens of a chapter 13 repayment plan and obtain a complete and immediate discharge under chapter 7. Concern was expressed at the congressional hearings that attorneys would respond to the means test by counseling their clients to take on additional debt before filing for bankruptcy. As one bankruptcy judge testified, "[t]he more debt that is incurred prior to filing, the more likely the debtor will qualify for chapter 7." Thus, "[p]erverse as it may seem, I can envision debtor's counsel advising their clients to buy the most expensive car that someone will sell them, and sign on to the biggest payment they can afford (at least until the bankruptcy is filed) as a way of increasing their deductions under [the means test]." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998: Part I, Hearing on H.R. 3150 before House Judiciary Comm., 105th Cong. 25 (1998) (testimony of Judge Randall Newsome); see also Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1999 (Part II), Hearing before House Judiciary Comm., 106th Cong. 30 (1999) (testimony of Judge William Brown).

Congress addressed these problems in the 2005 Act by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases" in return for a fee. House Report at 17. Under the amended provisions of the Code, an attorney who represents a consumer debtor in filing a bankruptcy petition must make her own reasonable investigation into the circumstances giving rise to the debtor's petition, including a specific inquiry into the veracity of the debtor’s debt and asset schedules. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). By signing the petition, the attorney personally certifies that she believes the petition is warranted by the facts, that she has no reason to believe the debtor’s schedules are incorrect, and that she has determined that the petition does not constitute an “abuse” under section 707(b). See ibid. Congress thus effectively required bankruptcy attorneys to warrant that their clients’ pre-petition conduct and financial circumstances — including any assumption of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy — do not provide grounds for dismissal of the petition as abuse of the bankruptcy system.

Section 526(a) complements these requirements by precluding attorneys and other “debt relief agencies” from deceiving their clients or advising them to abuse the bankruptcy system. Thus, section 526(a)(2) prohibits attorneys from encouraging clients to make false statements in a bankruptcy proceeding, and section 526(a)(3) bars attorneys from misrepresenting the risks and benefits of seeking bankruptcy relief. Similarly, section 526(a)(4), at issue here, precludes attorneys from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system by taking on additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition.

B. Section 526(a)(4) Constitutionally Restricts Attorneys From Encouraging Clients To Take On Additional Debt In Contemplation of Bankruptcy.

1. The First Amendment Does Not Preclude Restrictions On Attorney Advice To Engage In Improper Conduct.

The district court did not suggest that the First Amendment bars Congress from restricting attorneys from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system. Attorneys, like other professionals, are subject to various restrictions in urging their clients to undertake action. See, e.g., ABA Model Rules of Prof. Conduct R. 1.2(d) ("A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent, but a lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client and may counsel or assist a client to make a good-faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning, or application of the law."); accord Minn. R. Prof. Conduct 1.2(d).

Regulations of professional ethics of this kind do not violate the First Amendment. See Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071-76 (1991) (discussing the standards governing regulation of attorney speech). Although the district court questioned whether section 526(a)(4) is properly regarded as a regulation of professional conduct, Congress clearly understood the regulation in this manner. See House Report at 17 (describing new provisions as "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases"). Indeed, the statute addresses conduct that has been held to fall squarely within the scope of Model Rule 1.2(d). See Attorney Grievance Comm'n of Maryland v. Culver, 381 Md. 241, 275-76 (2004) (attorney violated Rule 1.2(d) by advising a client to obtain credit card loans with the intent that the debt be discharged in bankruptcy).

2. Section 526(a)(4) Should Not Be Construed More Broadly Than Necessary To Achieve Congress's Purpose.

The district court's contrary ruling reflected its understanding that "[s]ection 526(a)(4) bars an attorney from advising a client to incur any kind of debt, including legitimate debt, in contemplation of bankruptcy." 355 B.R. at 765 (emphasis added). The court expressed concern that it might be "'advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car' before filing for bankruptcy. If a client intends to reaffirm the debt after filing bankruptcy, there is no prejudice to the bankruptcy process." Ibid. (internal citation omitted) (quoting Erwin Chemerinksy, Constitutional Issues Posed in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, 79 Am. Bankr. L. J. 571, 578 (2005)). The district court noted that "[i]f the client gets a lower rate mortgage, the refinanced mortgage may have smaller payments which could forestall, or even prevent the bankruptcy in the first place," and that similar arguments might be made as to automobile loans. Id. at 764 n.2 (citing Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 24 (N.D. Tex. 2006), appeal docketed, Nos. 07-10226 & 07-10265 (5th Cir.)). The court thus assumed that section 526(a)(4) would apply to advice by an attorney that is consistent both with the client's interests and with the policies of the Bankruptcy Code.

Reading the statute in this manner expands its scope far beyond Congress's purpose to prevent abuse and manipulation of the bankruptcy system. By providing that a debt relief agency shall not advise a client "to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title," § 526(a)(4) (emphasis added), Congress addressed only advice to a debtor to accumulate additional debt for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system, such as by "loading up" on new debt in order to obtain a more advantageous discharge. Like section 526(a)(2), which precludes attorneys from advising clients to make false statements, section 526(a)(4) thus encompasses advice to engage in abusive conduct.

That interpretation follows from Congress's unmistakable purposes in the 2005 Act. As already discussed, section 526(a)(4) represents only one of many measures in the 2005 Act aimed at preventing abuses of the bankruptcy system by debtors and their professional representatives. Among other significant amendments, Congress enhanced the authority of bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1), expanded the definition of "abuse" to take account of a debtor's bad faith in seeking bankruptcy relief, see id. § 707(b)(3), and specifically required bankruptcy attorneys to investigate the facts underlying a debtor's petition and to certify that no basis exists for dismissing the petition as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). Against this background, it is apparent that Congress intended the phrase "to incur more debt in contemplation of" bankruptcy in section 526(a)(4) to refer to the recognized problem of debtors purposefully accumulating new debt in an effort to abuse the protections of the Bankruptcy Code. Cf. Report of the Commission of the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, pt. I, at 11 (observing that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge" (emphasis added)).

That understanding, moreover, is consistent with Congress's repeated references, in the legislative histories cited above, to debts incurred to manipulate the bankruptcy system as debts incurred "in contemplation of" bankruptcy. See S. Rep. No. 98-65, at 9 ("In many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent." (emphasis added)); see also Consumer Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998, S. Rep. No. 105-253, at 83 (1998) (minority views) ("Clearly, debtors should not incur debts with the intention not to repay them, e.g., if they know that they are going to file for bankruptcy," but "debts incurred within 90 days prior to filing may not have been incurred in contemplation of bankruptcy, and thus the isolation of these debts for special treatment is somewhat arbitrary.").

Section 526(a)(4) therefore has no application to the hypothetical conduct that troubled the district court. An attorney would be free to advise a client to refinance her debts at a lower rate to prevent bankruptcy. 355 B.R. at 764 n.2.[8]

[8] The district court also did not explain its assumption that (continued...)

An attorney could similarly advise a client to refinance a mortgage or buy a new car if the "client intends to reaffirm the debt after filing bankruptcy," id. at 765, assuming the debtor makes all necessary disclosures to the lender. In neither case would the attorney be advising the debtor to incur unnecessary debt for the purpose of abusing the bankruptcy system. Cf. Culver, 381 Md. at 275-76 (attorney violated Rule 1.2(d) by advising a client to obtain credit card loans with the intent that the debt be discharged in bankruptcy).

In other contexts, the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" may assume a broader scope. Cf. Conrad, Rubin & Lesser v. Pender, 289 U.S. 472 (1933) (interpreting bankruptcy provision regarding attorney compensation); Tripp v. Mitschrich, 211 F. 424 (8th Cir. 1914) (same). Plainly, however, the same phrase also has an accepted narrower meaning. See Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "the thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets refinancing an existing debt — that is, exchanging one loan for another with the same principal balance but a different interest rate or repayment period — would constitute incurring "more debt" within the meaning of section 526(a)(4).

in a bankruptcy proceeding"); see also United States v. Fox, 95 U.S. 670, 672 (1877) ("To legislate for the prevention of frauds * * * when committed in contemplation of bankruptcy, would seem to be within the competency of Congress."); In re Mercer, 246 F.3d 391, 421 n.43 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (describing "loading up" as the practice of "incurring card debt in contemplation of bankruptcy"); id. at 421 (referring to "a dishonest but patient debtor who intends to incur card-debt in contemplation of discharge"); In re Charles, 334 B.R. at 222 ("It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case."); cf. 18 U.S.C. § 152(7) (prohibiting the fraudulent transfer or concealment of property "in contemplation of a case under title 11").[9] As the text and purposes of the 2005 Act make clear, it is this narrower sense in which Congress used the phrase in section 526(a)(4).

In any event, the district court erred in adopting the broadest possible reading of the statute without regard to whether it was required by the statutory language and congressional intent. It is fundamental that when "an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems," a federal court must "construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such a construction would be plainly contrary to legislative intent." Planned Parenthood of Mid-Missouri and Eastern Kansas, Inc. v. Dempsey, 167 F.3d 458, 461 (8th Cir. 1999) (quoting Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Fla. Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988)) (internal quotation marks omitted). "The ultimate question is whether the statute "can be construed in such a manner that [it] can be applied * * * without infringing upon constitutionally protected rights." Id. (quoting Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173, 183 (1991)). Thus, "even when First Amendment interests are potentially affected, 'facial overbreadth has not been invoked when a limiting construction has been or could be placed on the challenged statute.'" Citizens for Equal Protection v. Bruning, 455 F.3d 859, 870 (8th Cir. 2006) (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 612 (1973)).

[9] See also Webster's Third New International Dictionary 491 (1993) (defining "contemplation" to mean, inter alia, "the act of intending or considering a future event"); Random House Dictionary Unabridged 438 (2d ed. 1987) ("contemplate" means, inter alia, "to have as a purpose; intend").

The district court departed from this principle in failing to adopt — or even address — readings of section 526(a)(4) that would avoid the constitutional difficulties that it postulated.

3. Section 526(a)(4) Does Not Preclude A Candid Discussion Of Legal Options.

The district court also erred in assuming that section 526(a)(4) would preclude a bankruptcy attorney from engaging in a candid discussion of a client's legal options. See 355 B.R. at 765. Rules governing legal practice commonly distinguish between a circumstance in which an attorney "counsels" — or, in this case, "advises" — a course of conduct, and a case in which an attorney simply discusses various options.

Thus, although the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct provide that "[a] lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent," the same rule also provides that "a lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client and may counsel or assist a client to make a good-faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning, or application of the law." ABA Model Rule 1.2(d); accord Minn. R. Prof. Conduct 1.2(d). The commentary to Model Rule 1.2 underscores the point: "There is a critical distinction between presenting an analysis of legal aspects of questionable conduct and recommending the means by which a crime or fraud might be committed with impunity." ABA Model Rule 1.2, cmt 9. In section 526(a)(4), Congress intended the phrase "advise * * * to incur more debt" in the same sense of affirmative encouragement. Cf. Webster's Third New International Dictionary 32 (1993) (defining "advise" to mean, inter alia, "counsel" or "recommend").

Contrary to the district court's understanding, therefore, section 526(a)(4) does not forbid attorneys from providing "information and advice to their clients" concerning "an entire subject - incurring more debt in contemplation of filing for bankruptcy." 355 B.R. at 764. Like the model rules, section 526(a)(4) reaches only the conduct of an attorney in affirmatively urging ("advis[ing]") a client to pursue a particular course of conduct, without impairing the attorney's ability to offer a candid assessment of the client's legal options. Cf. ABA Model Rule 1.2, cmt 9 (explaining that the prohibition against advising clients to engage in fraud "does not preclude the lawyer from giving an honest opinion about the actual consequences that appear likely to result from a client's conduct").

The restriction in section 526(a)(4) thus parallels that in section 526(a)(2), which provides that a debt relief agency shall not "counsel or advise any assisted person or prospective assisted person to make a statement in a document filed in a case or proceeding under this title, that is untrue and misleading."

Congress's concern in both provisions was not to proscribe ordinary legal advice, but to prevent attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals from becoming the affirmative engines of bankruptcy abuse, thereby both undermining the policies of the Code and jeopardizing their clients' petitions for relief.

4. The Remedies For Violations of Section 526(a)(4) Are Consistent With Its Purpose Of Restricting Encouragement To Engage In Abusive Conduct That Jeopardizes A Client's Interests.

The remedial provisions of the statute underscore the error of the district court's interpretation. Congress's intent in section 526(a)(4) was to protect consumer debtors from active encouragement by their representatives to engage in conduct that abuses the bankruptcy system and may result in the dismissal of their petition or other sanctions. Consistent with that intent, the principal remedy for a violation of section 526(a)(4) is a suit against the attorney to recover the debtor's "actual damages," as well as restitution of any fees paid by the debtor. See id. § 526(c)(2); see also id. § 526(c)(3)(B) (authorizing suits by state attorney general to recover "actual damages" on debtor's behalf). The power of the bankruptcy court to impose an "appropriate civil penalty" is limited to cases of intentional violations and patterns of misconduct. See id. § 526(c)(5). Congress's emphasis in these provisions on the debtor's "actual damages” presupposes that the debtor has been injured by the attorney’s conduct: advice that is in the debtor’s best interests and fully consistent with the Bankruptcy Code does not trigger any remedial provision.

Quite apart from section 526(a)(4), moreover, an attorney faces sanctions under the Bankruptcy Code for actively encouraging a debtor to accumulate additional debt in order to facilitate a bankruptcy filing, because the 2005 Act requires attorneys to certify that the petitions filed by their clients are not abusive. As discussed above, the Act imposed a new duty on every bankruptcy attorney to make a reasonable investigation into the factual basis for the debtor’s petition (including a reasonable inquiry into the veracity of the debtor’s debt and asset schedules) and to certify that, in the attorney’s judgment, the petition will not be subject to dismissal for abuse. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D); see also id. § 707(b)(4)(A)-(B) (authorizing civil monetary penalties against attorneys who make false certifications). At the same time, Congress lowered the standard for dismissing a petition as abusive, and it made clear that a bankruptcy court, in determining whether to grant such a motion, should consider whether the debtor has acted in bad faith. Id. §§ 707(b)(1), 707(b)(3); cf. In re Charles, 334 B.R.

207, 222 (Bankr. S.D. Tex 2005) ("It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case."). Under these circumstances, it is highly unlikely that a bankruptcy attorney could encourage a client to incur unnecessary debts in order to buttress an anticipated bankruptcy filing without violating her obligations under the Code. Section 526(a)(4) addresses the increased risk of dismissal resulting from such unethical attorney advice and provides the debtor with remedies against attorneys who encourage abusive conduct.

C. The District Court Failed To Apply Basic Principles of Overbreadth Analysis.

Even outside the context of ethical rules governing attorneys and other closely regulated professions, a statute may not be invalidated on its face solely because of posited concerns raised by some of its potential applications. As this Court has observed, "[t]he aim of facial overbreadth analysis is to eliminate the deterrent or 'chilling' effect an overbroad law may have on those contemplating conduct protected by the First Amendment," Turchick v. United States, 561 F.2d 719, 721 (8th Cir. 1977), but "the overbreadth doctrine permits the facial invalidation of laws that inhibit the exercise of First Amendment rights" only when "the impermissible applications of the law are substantial when judged in relation to the statute’s plainly legitimate sweep.” Republican Party of Minn., Third Congressional Dist. v. Klobuchar, 381 F.3d 785, 791 (8th Cir. 2004) (quoting City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41, 52 (1999)). See also Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973)) (“[O]verbreadth of a statute must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute’s plainly legitimate sweep.”).

The district court disclaimed any intention of striking down the statute as overbroad, stating that it was, instead, holding it unconstitutional “as applied.” 355 B.R. at 766 n.4. By this, the court apparently meant that it was striking down the statute with respect to all applications to attorneys, but no more.

This characterization misperceives the issue. Even under the district court’s own interpretation of the statute, section 526(a)(4) could constitutionally be applied to prohibit attorneys from urging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system. The district court did not, however, invalidate the statute as applied to the facts of a particular case. Instead, it declared the statute unconstitutional as applied to all attorneys in the District of Minnesota. See JA44, JA46.

The district court's error is highlighted by its invalidation of section 526(a)(4) in its entirety, without addressing that part of the statute that precludes an attorney from advising a client to incur additional debt in order to pay the attorney's own fees. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) ("A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt * * * to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for representing a debtor in a case under this title."). Plaintiffs make no allegation that they have encouraged or plan to encourage clients to take on additional debt in order to pay their own fees, see, e.g., JA8 (complaint); JA22 (Nevin affidavit), and a challenge to that part of the statute was not properly before the district court.

More fundamentally, the district court's willingness to strike down section 526(a)(4) on its face, without addressing this part of the statute, underscores the court's failure to recognize the nature of the issues presented by this facial challenge and its failure to adopt a reading of the statute that avoids constitutional questions to the extent possible.

II. THE ADVERTISING DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS OF SECTION 528 ARE NARROWLY TAILORED TO ADDRESS A PROBLEM SPECIFICALLY DOCUMENTED BY CONGRESS.

The district court's invalidation of the advertising disclosure requirements in 11 U.S.C. § 528 was equally unwarranted. In bankruptcy reform hearings preceding the 2005 legislation, Congress heard evidence of "increasingly aggressive lawyer advertising" that offered to make consumers' debts "disappear," yet failed even to "mention bankruptcy." See Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2003, Hearing on H.R. 975 Before House Judiciary Comm., 108th Cong. 55 (2003).[10] One retailer testified that some of his customers, who were misled by such lawyer advertisements, "did not even understand that they had filed for bankruptcy." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1999 (Part II), Hearing on H.R. 833 Before House Judiciary Comm., 106th Cong. 123 (1999).[11] Indeed, as Congress was aware, the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") had issued a consumer alert in 1997 warning that many debt-relief advertisements offering to "wipe out" consumer debts, or to "stop credit harassment, foreclosures, [and] repossessions," regularly failed to disclose that "such relief may be spelled b-a-n-k-r-u-p-t-c-y." See Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998 (Part III), Hearing on H.R. 3150 Before House Judiciary Comm., 105th Cong. 90, 90-92 (1998) ("FTC Alert").[12] The FTC Alert remains in effect today.[13]

To address these problems, Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 528, which requires debt relief agencies to "clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement * * * directed to the general public" that the advertised services "are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title." Id. § 528(a)(3). In particular, in any advertisements offering bankruptcy assistance services — including any advertisements purporting to offer relief from "credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt" — a debt relief agency must:

> (B) include the following statement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

Id. § 528(b)(2); see also id. § 528(a)(3), (4).

The district court analyzed section 528 under the standards applicable to regulations of commercial speech, which are typically sustained if they are "narrowly drawn" to advance a "substantial government interest." See Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618, 623 (1995); Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 447 U.S. 557 (1980). A still more lenient standard is applicable to regulations that require advertisements to disclose "purely factual and uncontroversial information." Such restrictions are valid if they are "reasonably related" to the government's "interest in preventing deception of consumers" and are not "unduly burdensome." Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 650-52 (1985) (upholding state rule requiring attorney advertisements to disclose that "clients might be liable for significant litigation costs even if their lawsuits were unsuccessful").

The disclosure requirement in section 528 is plainly constitutional under either standard. By definition, debt relief agencies provide services to consumer debtors "with respect to a case or proceeding under [the bankruptcy laws]." See 11 U.S.C. § 101(4A); id. § 101(12A). Section 528 merely requires bankruptcy attorneys to identify themselves truthfully as "debt relief agencies" under the Bankruptcy Code and to disclose that their advertised services do in fact relate to bankruptcy. As in Zauderer, plaintiffs' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal," 471 U.S. at 651, and there is little doubt that the disclosure requirement is reasonably related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors.

The disclosure requirement in section 528 also satisfies the more stringent standard generally governing regulations of commercial speech. See Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906, 920 (D. Or. 2006) (concluding that section 528 "passes constitutional muster" under either the Zauderer or the Central Hudson test). Section 528 does not "burden substantially more speech than necessary" to further the government's legitimate interests. United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418, 430 (1993). Indeed, the statute restricts no speech at all. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 921; see also Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651 (emphasizing that "disclosure requirements trench much more narrowly on an advertiser's interests than do flat prohibitions on speech").

The disclosure requirement in section 528 is directed precisely to the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services make clear that their services in fact involve filing for bankruptcy. This targeted requirement advances a substantial interest in preventing the problem identified by the FTC Alert: deceptive advertisements that promise to "wipe out" debts or prevent foreclosures, but fail to disclose that "such relief may be spelled b-a-n-k-r-u-p-t-c-y." See FTC Alert, 105th Cong. at 92. As the FTC Alert makes clear, such advertisements have the potential to mislead consumers into filing for bankruptcy without adequately considering the implications. See ibid. (warning that "bankruptcy stays on your credit report for 10 years, and can hinder your ability to get credit, a job, insurance, or even a place to live"). It is well within Congress's authority to require reasonable disclosures in attorney advertisements to prevent such deception. See generally Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 384 (1977) (states may require attorney advertisements to include "a warning or disclaimer * * * so as to assure that the consumer is not misled").

In holding section 528 invalid, the district court simply declared that the problem addressed by the legislation does not exist. The court expressed skepticism that advertisements offering "debt relief" but failing to mention bankruptcy could "mislead the lay community," proclaiming it "implausib[le]" that "anyone [would] actually believ[e] in a magic wand capable of making debt go away." 355 B.R. at 766-67. The district court offered no basis for setting aside Congress's determination in this manner. Indeed, the district court failed even to acknowledge the FTC's findings or the hearing testimony before Congress, which amply demonstrate that section 528 "targets a concrete, nonspeculative harm." Florida Bar, 515 U.S. at 629. See also Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 652-53 (explaining that the courts "need not require the State to 'conduct a survey of the * * * public before it [may] determine that the [advertisement] had a tendency to mislead'" (quoting FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 391-92 (1965))).

The district court likewise erred in declaring that the required disclosures under section 528 would not "prevent[] consumer deception" and "may well increase it." 355 B.R. at 767. Deriding the term "debt relief agency" as "simply a legislative contrivance," the court asserted that the mandated disclosure would only tend to confuse the public. See ibid. The district court's conclusion that section 528 would not prevent consumer deception, however, merely reflects its antecedent conclusion that there is no problem to be remedied. The court's further assumption that a federal statute can be invalidated because it requires advertisers truthfully to state their legal status — i.e., that they are "debt relief agencies" under the Bankruptcy Code — is without foundation in law or logic.

Nor does the disclosure requirement violate the First Amendment because it applies to "attorneys and non-attorneys alike." 355 B.R. at 767. The district court believed that the fact that "parties so dissimilarly-placed must use the same mandated disclosure statement is likely to cause consumer confusion." Ibid. Yet it was Congress's judgment that bankruptcy attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals are similarly situated with regard to the deceptive practices targeted by the statute — Congress was not required to adopt different disclosure rules to address the same harm. And in any event, nothing in section 528 precludes attorneys from identifying themselves as attorneys, or from listing the particular legal services they provide. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920 ("[S]ection 528 does not prohibit consumer bankruptcy attorneys from identifying themselves as both bankruptcy attorneys and 'debt relief agencies' in advertisements."); see also Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650 (disclosure requirements do not "prevent attorneys from conveying information to the public," but "only require them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present").

III. THE STATUTE REGULATES THE PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT OF ATTORNEYS AS WELL AS OTHER BANKRUPTCY PROFESSIONALS.

After reaching and deciding plaintiffs' constitutional claims, the district court further held that the statutory term "debt relief agency" does not encompass licensed attorneys. In so holding, the court not only rendered its constitutional holdings superfluous, but also exempted bankruptcy attorneys from nearly all of the professional conduct regulations adopted by Congress in the 2005 legislation, including many provisions not challenged by plaintiffs here. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(1) (requirement to perform all promised services); id. § 527 (requirement to provide written notice of debtor's rights and obligations in bankruptcy); id. § 528(a)(1)-(2) (requirement to prepare a written contract with clear notice of applicable fees).

The district court's conclusion on this score is flatly contrary to the statutory text and congressional intent. Congress defined the term "debt relief agency" to include "any person" who, for a fee, "provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance," in turn, is defined to include "providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing * * * with respect to a case or proceeding under this title," including in particular "appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another" or "providing legal representation." Id. § 101(4A) (emphasis added). By its plain terms, therefore, the statute applies to "any person" who provides "legal representation" to consumer debtors for a fee — a category that unmistakably includes bankruptcy attorneys. See Hersh, 347 B.R. at 22; Olsen, 350 B.R. at 912.

Congress's inclusion of attorneys was not inadvertent. As we have noted, a principal concern of the 2005 legislation was to prevent abuses of the bankruptcy system, not merely by debtors, but also by the professionals who represent them. The House Report accompanying the 2005 Act cited a study that "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals." House Report at 5 (quoting Darling & Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: the Civil Enforcement Initiative, 21 Am. Bankr. Inst. J. 12 (Sept. 2002)). Similarly, in expressing concern that the new means-testing provision would encourage the assumption of additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy, one bankruptcy judge testified before Congress that "[p]erverse as it may seem, I can envision debtor's counsel advising their clients to buy the most expensive car that someone will sell them, and sign on to the biggest payment they can afford (at least until the bankruptcy is filed) as a way of increasing their deductions under [the means test].” 105th Cong. at 25 (testimony of Judge Randall Newsome). And in adopting the advertising disclosure requirements in section 528, Congress heard evidence of “increasingly aggressive lawyer advertising” that offered to make consumers’ debts “disappear” but failed to mention bankruptcy. See 108th Cong. at 55. Congress responded to these concerns by enacting new provisions designed to “strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases” in return for a fee. House Report at 17 (emphasis added).

The district court nevertheless declared that attorneys are exempt from the debt relief agency provisions of the 2005 Act, observing that the statutory definition of “debt relief agency” “makes no direct reference to either ‘attorney' or ‘lawyer.’” 355 B.R. at 768. As already discussed, however, the definition specifically does include “any person” who, for a fee, “provid[es] legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under [the Bankruptcy Code].” 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A); id. § 101(4A). Congress was not obliged to state, in addition, that a rule applicable to any person who provides "legal representation" will apply to attorneys. See generally Heintz v. Jenkins, 514 U.S. 291, 294-95, 298 (1995) (lawyers who engage in debt collection are "debt collectors" under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, even though the statute does not specifically refer to lawyers or the practice of law); Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 787-88 (1975) (noting the "heavy presumption against implicit exemptions," and accordingly refusing to construe the Sherman Act to exempt lawyers).

The district court also mistakenly concluded that reading the statute to encompass attorneys would "conflict" with the preemption savings clause in 11 U.S.C. § 526(d). That section provides that nothing in sections 526 or 528 may "be deemed to limit or curtail the authority * * * of a State * * * to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A). See 355 B.R. at 768. The conflict is illusory. The challenged provisions create substantive standards of conduct for debt relief agencies in the federal bankruptcy system; they do not purport to regulate state bar admission or other "qualifications for the practice of law." Indeed, section 526(d) distinguishes between restrictions on conduct and qualifications for legal practice, expressly preempting state rules of conduct “to the extent” they are inconsistent with the federal debt relief agency requirements, see 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(1), while leaving undisturbed state bar admission requirements, see id. § 526(d)(2)(A).

Finally, the district court wrongly believed that, notwithstanding the plain text of the statute, it could exclude attorneys from the scope of the statute under the rubric of constitutional avoidance. Constitutional avoidance cannot be used to rewrite a statute in a manner contrary to congressional intent. See, e.g., Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 341 (2000) (“[T]he canon of constitutional doubt permits [a court] to avoid such questions only where the savings construction is not ‘plainly contrary to the intent of Congress.’” (quoting Edward J. DeBartolo Corp., 485 U.S. at 575)).

In this case, the district court’s reliance on the canon of avoidance was particularly anomalous because the court had already declared the challenged provisions unconstitutional. As discussed in Part I above, the district court erred in failing to apply the canon of constitutional avoidance when it interpreted section 526(a)(4) far more broadly than either the text or congressional intent required, generating constitutional issues that could properly have been avoided. It likewise erred in invoking the canon of avoidance to remove attorneys from the scope of the professional conduct standards in the 2005 Act, nullifying the statutory language and frustrating Congress's intent.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE APPELLANT

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

In the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, Congress enacted a series of provisions designed to "strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 17. Among them are the measures challenged here, which preclude attorneys from advising their clients to take on additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy, see 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), and require specified disclosures in attorney advertisements, id. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Notwithstanding Congress's belief that it was adopting these provisions to establish stronger "professionalism standards for attorneys," plaintiffs devote much of their brief to arguing that attorneys are exempt from all of the professional conduct regulations established by the 2005 Act. That interpretation founders on the plain language of the statute, which makes the professional conduct regulations in the 2005 Act applicable to "any person" who provides paid "legal representation" to consumer debtors. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(4A); id. § 101(12A).

Plaintiffs fare no better on the merits of their constitutional claims. Section 526(a)(4) prohibits an attorney from advising a debtor "to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." As plaintiffs appear to acknowledge, Congress enacted this provision in recognition of the fact that debtors frequently "load up" with new debt on the eve of bankruptcy in an effort to game the bankruptcy system. Plaintiffs do not suggest that attorney advice to take on new debt for such a purpose is protected by the First Amendment. Instead, they contend that the statute should be struck down because, in plaintiffs' view, the "plain language" of section 526(a)(4) also prohibits advice to engage in entirely legitimate transactions.

That interpretation is neither required by the statutory text nor consistent with Congress's purposes in the 2005 Act. As our opening brief establishes (at 31-33), Congress and the federal courts have often described pre-petition debts amassed for improper purposes as debts incurred "in contemplation of" bankruptcy. _See also_ _Black's Law Dictionary_ 336 (8th ed. 2004) (explaining that the phrase "contemplation of bankruptcy" typically connotes "action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding"). Plaintiffs make no reference to these authorities, nor do they attempt to explain why this Court should adopt the broadest possible reading of the statute in order to sustain their facial challenge.

Finally, plaintiffs press their challenge to the advertising disclosure requirements in 11 U.S.C. § 528. As plaintiffs do not dispute, Congress enacted section 528 in response to evidence of aggressive lawyer advertisements that promised to wipe out debts, halt foreclosures, and prevent repossessions, yet failed even to mention that any such relief would require a petition for bankruptcy. The disclosures provided in section 528 are narrowly drawn to address the problem identified by Congress, and they burden no more speech than necessary to advance the government's substantial interest in preventing consumers from being misled into filing for bankruptcy relief inadvertently or without adequate consideration of the consequences.

Plaintiffs urge the Court to invalidate section 528 on the same ground that the Supreme Court invalidated the provisions of Ohio law at issue in Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 650-52 (1985). See Br. 44, 47. But plaintiffs misread the Court's decision: although the Court in Zauderer struck down some of the Ohio rules in question, it upheld the disclosure requirements analogous to those at issue here. Plaintiffs' facial challenge to section 528 fails for the same reasons.

ARGUMENT

I. CONGRESS ENACTED THE "DEBT RELIEF AGENCY" PROVISIONS OF THE 2005 ACT TO REGULATE ATTORNEYS AS WELL AS OTHER BANKRUPTCY PROFESSIONALS.

1. In enacting the 2005 bankruptcy amendments, Congress was concerned not merely with abuses by debtors, but also with abuses committed by — and at the encouragement of — debtors' professional representatives in the bankruptcy system. See generally Gov. Br. 23-28. Accordingly, as part of "a comprehensive package of reform measures," Congress enacted the "debt relief agency" provisions of the 2005 Act to "strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 2, 17 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89, 103 ("House Report").

Plaintiffs do not attempt to reconcile their arguments with this declaration of congressional intent. Instead, they argue at length that when Congress enacted the "debt relief agency" provisions in 11 U.S.C. §§ 526-528, it did not in fact create "professionalism standards for attorneys," but only regulated "others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases."

That argument founders on the plain language of the statute. Congress defined "debt relief agency" to include "any person" who, for a fee, "provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance," in turn, includes providing "advice" or "counsel" "with respect to a case or proceeding under this title" — including in particular "appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another" or "providing legal representation." Id. § 101(4A) (emphasis added). Plaintiffs cannot plausibly insist that regulations governing persons who provide "legal representation" for a fee exclude the very persons who provide such legal representation.

2. Plaintiffs' arguments to the contrary fail at every turn. They stress, for example, that the definition of debt relief agency "does not explicitly use the terms 'attorney' or 'lawyer.'" Br. 11. But the definition does use the term "bankruptcy assistance," which in turn explicitly includes "legal representation." 11 U.S.C. § 101(4A). Plaintiffs do not explain why Congress would define "bankruptcy assistance" to include "legal representation" if it meant to exclude lawyers from the statute's scope. Nor do plaintiffs make any attempt to distinguish Heintz v. Jenkins, 514 U.S. 291 (1995), in which the Supreme Court held that lawyers who engage in debt collection are "debt collectors" under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, even though the statute does not specifically refer to lawyers or the practice of law. Id. at 294-96; see also Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 786-88 (1975) (refusing to create an implicit exception to the Sherman Act for attorneys).[1]

Similarly mistaken is plaintiffs' reliance on 11 U.S.C. § 527(b), which requires debt relief agencies to inform debtors that in the bankruptcy system "you can represent yourself, you can hire an attorney to represent you, or you can get help in some localities from a bankruptcy petition preparer who is not an attorney." Ibid. Plaintiffs urge that it would be "entirely illogical" to require attorneys to inform clients of their right to hire an attorney. Br. 21. By the plain terms of the statute,

[1] Amicus Commercial Law League of America argues that attorneys should not be deemed "debt relief agencies" lest the 2005 Act be interpreted to apply to attorneys for creditors. Amicus Br. 2-4. This is an entirely new argument, not advanced by plaintiffs in this Court or below, and amicus is not entitled to raise it on their behalf. See Rehrs v. Iams Co., 486 F.3d 353, 358 (8th Cir. 2007); McCleskey v. Zant, 499 U.S. 467, 523 n.10 (1991).

In any event, the argument is baseless. The debt relief agency provisions apply only when an attorney advises an "assisted person." See 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). An "assisted person," in turn, is "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $164,250." Id. § 101(4A). The Code thus plainly contemplates that "debt relief agencies" are persons who advise debtors, not creditors. See House Report at 17 (explaining that the statute provides "professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases" (emphasis added)).

however, the disclosures are mandatory only "to the extent applicable." 11 U.S.C. § 527(b). Moreover, plaintiffs' logic would presumably also exclude bankruptcy petition preparers from the definition of "debt relief agency." But see 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (defining "debt relief agency" to include, inter alia, "any person * * * who is a bankruptcy petition preparer").

Nor is there any merit to plaintiffs' suggestion that, notwithstanding the plain text of the statute, a court may exclude attorneys from the definition of "debt relief agency" under the rubric of constitutional avoidance. Br. 17. As our opening brief describes (at 33-34, 53-54), the avoidance canon permits — indeed, requires — a court to adopt any reasonable construction of a statute that avoids a serious constitutional question; it does not permit a court to disregard an unambiguous expression of congressional intent. Congress enacted the debt relief agency provisions to establish "professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases," House Report at 17 (emphasis added), and plaintiffs cannot properly invoke the doctrine of avoidance to frustrate that intent.[2]

[2] Furthermore, plaintiffs' "avoidance" argument would exempt bankruptcy attorneys not merely from the two provisions whose constitutionality they challenge, but also from the many other professional conduct regulations in the 2005 Act whose validity is undisputed. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(1) (requirement to perform all promised services); id. § 527 (requirement to provide written notice of debtors' rights and obligations in bankruptcy);

3. As a fallback argument, plaintiffs contend that permitting Congress to regulate attorneys would permissibly intrude on the power of the states and violate the Tenth Amendment. See Br. 22-24. This assertion is baseless. It cannot seriously be disputed that Congress may provide rules for the conduct of attorneys practicing in the federal courts, including in the federal bankruptcy courts. See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1927; Fed. R. Civ. P. 11; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011; cf. Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32 (1991). In fact, federal law commonly provides rules of professional conduct for attorneys in regulatory areas that, like bankruptcy, reflect uniquely federal concerns. See, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 7245 (Securities and Exchange Commission); 31 C.F.R. Part 10 (Internal Revenue Service); 37 C.F.R. Part 10 (Patent and Trademark Office).[3]

Plaintiffs' reliance on the preemption savings clause in section 526(d) is misplaced for similar reasons. That section

id. § 528(a)(1)-(2) (requirement to prepare a written contract with clear notice of applicable fees).

[3] In Leis v. Flynt, 439 U.S. 438 (1979), relied upon by plaintiffs, the Supreme Court emphasized the authority of the states to regulate and discipline lawyers in their respective jurisdictions. See Br. 24. The Court in Leis, however, merely rejected a claim that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits state courts from denying pro hac vice admission to attorneys from other states. See 439 U.S. at 441-45. Nothing in Leis casts doubt on the authority of the federal government to regulate attorneys practicing before federal tribunals. See In re Desilets, 291 F.3d 925, 929 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Leis does not hold that state rules govern practice in federal courts.").

provides that nothing in the 2005 Act shall "limit or curtail the authority * * * of a State * * * to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A). As discussed in our opening brief (at 52-53), the 2005 Act does not purport to regulate state bar admission or other "qualifications for the practice of law." The preemption savings clause merely ensures that nothing in the 2005 Act will limit the ability of the states to decide who may become members of their respective bars.

II. CONGRESS CONSTITUTIONALLY PROHIBITED BANKRUPTCY ATTORNEYS FROM ENCOURAGING THEIR CLIENTS TO ABUSE THE BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM BY TAKING ON ADDITIONAL DEBT IN CONTEMPLATION OF FILING A PETITION.

1. As discussed at length in our opening brief, Congress has long been aware that debtors frequently abuse the protections of the Bankruptcy Code by "loading up" with new debt on the eve of bankruptcy. See House Report at 15 (expressing concern over the continued ability of debtors to "knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief"); S. Rep. No. 98-65, at 9 (1983) (noting special problem posed by "'loading up' in contemplation of bankruptcy"); Report of the Commission of the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, pt. I, at 11 (July 1973) (concluding that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge”).

In hearings preceding the 2005 Act, moreover, Congress heard evidence that “misconduct by attorneys and other professionals” had been “consistently identified” by the U.S. Trustee Program as a source of abusive bankruptcy filings. See House Report at 5 (citation omitted). Other witnesses, including bankruptcy judges, informed Congress that these problems were likely to be exacerbated by the new “means testing” provisions in the 2005 legislation, which create an incentive for unethical attorneys to encourage their clients to run up additional debt on the eve of bankruptcy in order to obtain a full discharge of their debts under chapter 7. See generally Gov. Br. at 23-25. It was against this background that Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

None of this is controverted. To the contrary, plaintiffs acknowledge that Congress’s purpose in the 2005 legislation was to “prevent abuses of the bankruptcy system,” including in particular to “preclude debtors from taking on more debt knowing that it will later be discharged in bankruptcy.” Br. 34 (citing House Report, at 1-5). Nor do plaintiffs deny that Congress can properly restrict attorneys from encouraging their clients to commit such abuses: plaintiffs do not suggest that attorneys enjoy a categorical First Amendment privilege to advise their clients to subvert the bankruptcy process. Their contention, instead, is that section 526(a)(4) must be read expansively to encompass not only advice to engage in abusive conduct, but also advice "to incur any debt for any purpose when the client will be filing or is contemplating filing for bankruptcy" — even legitimate debt designed to mitigate or avoid the need for bankruptcy altogether. Br. 30.

2. That gets matters exactly backwards. Plaintiffs are not entitled to insist upon the broadest possible interpretation of section 526(a)(4) in order to secure its invalidation. As plaintiffs themselves recognize elsewhere in their brief, "[w]hen the validity of an Act of Congress is drawn in question, and even if a serious doubt of constitutionality is raised, it is a cardinal principle that [the courts] will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided." Br. 17 (quoting Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932)). Yet plaintiffs make no mention of this principle in defending their sweeping interpretation of section 526(a)(4). If plaintiffs believe that the canon of avoidance may be jettisoned merely because they have raised a First Amendment overbreadth claim, they are mistaken: "Even when First Amendment interests are potentially affected, 'facial overbreadth has not been invoked when a limiting construction has been or could be placed on the challenged statute.'" Citizens for Equal

Protection v. Bruning, 455 F.3d 859, 870 (8th Cir. 2006) (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 612 (1973)).

Plaintiffs' interpretation of section 526(a)(4) is plainly not compelled by the terms of the statute. As we explained in our opening brief (and as plaintiffs do not dispute), Congress and the federal courts have both commonly described pre-petition debts amassed for improper purposes as debts incurred "in contemplation of" bankruptcy. See Gov. Br. 31-33. That use of the phrase reflects settled connotations in the bankruptcy context. See Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (explaining that the phrase "contemplation of bankruptcy" typically connotes "action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding"). See also, e.g., United States v. Fox, 95 U.S. 670, 672 (1877) ("To legislate for the prevention of frauds * * * when committed in contemplation of bankruptcy, would seem to be within the competency of Congress."); In re Mercer, 246 F.3d 391, 421 n.43 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (describing "loading up" as the practice of "incurring card debt in contemplation of bankruptcy"); In re Charles, 334 B.R. 207, 222 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2005) ("It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case."); cf. 18 U.S.C. § 152(7) (prohibiting fraudulent transfer or concealment of assets "in contemplation of a case under title 11").

Plaintiffs address none of these authorities, relying instead on this Court's 1914 decision in Tripp v. Mitschrich, 211 F. 424 (1914). See Br. 33. But that decision undermines plaintiffs' position here. The Court in Tripp interpreted section 60d of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, which granted bankruptcy courts the authority to reexamine transfers of property made by a debtor to an attorney "in contemplation of filing a petition," and to direct that any "excess" payment be returned to the estate for the benefit of creditors. See 211 F. at 426. Like section 526(a)(4), that provision was manifestly directed to the prevention of abuse. Indeed, this Court in Tripp cited with approval the Supreme Court's earlier decision in In re Wood, 210 U.S. 246 (1908), in which the Court explained that Congress enacted section 60d precisely because debtors' pre-petition payments to attorneys are "'capable of abuse.'" 210 U.S. at 251 (quoting Furth v. Stahl, 205 Pa. 439 (1903)); see also id. at 258 (purpose of section 60d was to "prevent the diminution of the estate"). Far from supporting plaintiffs' interpretation, therefore, Tripp underscores Congress's use of the phrase "in contemplation of" bankruptcy to address abusive pre-petition conduct.

Plaintiffs' unbounded construction of section 526(a)(4), moreover, would require the Court to disregard the context in which Congress placed the provision. Section 526(a)(4) is one of four subsections of section 526(a). The other three subsections indisputably provide rules of professional conduct designed to protect debtors from abusive practices by bankruptcy attorneys and other debt relief agencies. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(1) (debt relief agencies must perform all promised services); id. § 526(a)(2) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from advising debtors to make false or misleading statements to obtain bankruptcy relief); id. § 526(a)(3) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from misrepresenting to debtors the services to be provided or the costs or benefits of filing for bankruptcy relief). Against this background, plaintiffs cannot reasonably claim that Congress intended the fourth subsection to prohibit "accurate, truthful, non-fraudulent advice." Br. 29.

Plaintiffs are thus quite wrong to insist that section 526(a)(4) prohibits "routine and prudent pre-bankruptcy planning" that is "not an attempt to circumvent or undermine federal bankruptcy laws." Br. 31. Echoing the district court, for example, plaintiffs contend that the statute "prevents attorneys from recommending that their clients obtain or refinance a home mortgage, apply for a home equity line of credit, or take on an auto loan for a vehicle that is needed to get to work, prior to filing for bankruptcy." Ibid. But as we made clear in our opening brief (at 31-32), section 526(a)(4) has no application to such advice, nor to any other good-faith advice similarly consistent with the policies of the Bankruptcy Code and with the client's best interests. Nor, for the same reason, does section 526(a)(4) prohibit an attorney from advising a client to co-sign a child's student loan, or to borrow money to pay for mandatory credit counseling.[4] Br. 32. Section 526(a)(4) simply prevents attorneys and other professionals from becoming the affirmative engines of bankruptcy abuse.

3. Understood in this manner, there is little doubt that section 526(a)(4) satisfies the First Amendment. As we have noted, even plaintiffs do not contend that they have a First Amendment right to encourage their clients to file abusive bankruptcy petitions, or to load up on new debt prior to bankruptcy with the intent that the debt be discharged. As the Supreme Court made clear in _Gentile_ v. _State Bar of Nevada_, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991), attorneys are not merely agents of their clients but also officers of the courts, and for that reason may be "subject to ethical restrictions on speech to which an ordinary citizen would not be." _Id._ at 1071. The Court in _Gentile_ quoted with approval Justice Stewart's dispositive concurrence in In re Sawyer, 360 U.S. 622 (1959), in which he rejected the notion "that a lawyer can invoke the constitutional right of free speech to immunize himself from even-handed discipline for proven unethical conduct," because "[a] lawyer belongs to a profession with inherited standards of propriety and honor, which experience has shown necessary in a calling dedicated to the accomplishment of justice. * * * Obedience to ethical precepts may require abstention from what in other circumstances might be constitutionally protected speech." Id. at 646-47 (Stewart, J., concurring in judgment); see Gentile, 501 U.S. at 1071. See also Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 460 (1978) (sustaining a restriction on attorney solicitation because the government "bears a special responsibility for maintaining standards among members of the licensed professions"); Goldfarb, 421 U.S. at 792 (the government's interest "in regulating lawyers is especially great since lawyers are essential to the primary governmental function of administering justice, and have historically been 'officers of the courts'").

[4] Indeed, it is unclear that merely co-signing a child's student loan would even constitute incurring "more debt" within the meaning of section 526(a)(4). _Cf._ Gov. Br. 31 n.8 (same, refinancing an existing mortgage). As for credit counseling, plaintiffs identify no reason why the statute should be read to impair debtors' ability to obtain the very counseling that Congress required in the 2005 Act as a condition of chapter 7 relief. _See_ 11 U.S.C. § 109(h). Because such debt is not incurred to defraud creditors or abuse the bankruptcy system, it does not implicate section 526(a)(4).

Plaintiffs insist that section 526(a)(4) does not regulate professional conduct and should not be analyzed under the principles discussed in Gentile. That contention is difficult to fathom. Section 526(a)(4) provides a bankruptcy-specific rule of conduct akin to Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.2(d), which states that an attorney may not "counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent." Accord Minn. R. Prof. Conduct 1.2(d). As we observed in our opening brief, that rule has been applied to precisely the conduct that section 526(a)(4) addresses. See Attorney Grievance Comm'n of Maryland v. Culver, 381 Md. 241, 275-76 (2004) (attorney violated Rule 1.2(d) by advising a client to obtain credit card loans with the intent that the debt be discharged in bankruptcy). Moreover, Congress itself described the "debt relief agency" provisions of the 2005 Act as "professionalism standards for attorneys." See House Report at 17 (describing the new provisions as "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases").[5]

Plaintiffs' attack on section 526(a)(4) as a "content-based constraint[] on free speech," Br. 27, is thus entirely misplaced. Rules of professional conduct for attorneys are necessarily content-based; ethical rules could hardly be otherwise. Model Rule 1.2(d), which precludes attorneys from advising clients to engage in fraud, is no less a content-based restriction on attorney speech. The district court therefore erred in striking down section 526(a)(4) on its face as content-based. Indeed, the district court's facial invalidation of section 526(a)(4) was improper on any ground: as we noted in our opening brief (at 39-41), the statute is undoubtedly constitutional in many of its applications, even on the district court's own broad reading.[6]

[5] Plaintiffs assert that the Gentile rule is inapplicable because section 526(a)(4) "does not allude to ethics." Br. 37. But neither did the Nevada rule at issue in Gentile, yet the Supreme Court had little difficulty recognizing it as a regulation of professional conduct. See 501 U.S. at 1060-62. Even Model Rule 1.2(d) would not qualify as an ethical rule under plaintiffs' test.

Nor is there any merit to plaintiffs' analogy to Legal Services Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001). Br. 38. The statute at issue in that case conditioned the receipt of federal funds on an attorney's agreement not to challenge the validity of state or federal welfare laws. Id. at 538. The provision did not seek to regulate attorney ethics or avoid client abuses. Instead, the statute prevented attorneys from making "all the reasonable and well-grounded arguments necessary for proper resolution of the case." Id. at 545. Section 526(a)(4) does nothing of the kind. To the contrary, it prevents attorneys from jeopardizing their clients' interests through conduct designed to [6] As plaintiffs do not dispute, the district court failed to consider whether "the impermissible applications of the law are substantial when judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Republican Party v. Klobuchar, 381 F.3d 785, 791 (8th Cir. 2004) (quoting Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41, 52 (1999)). In particular, plaintiffs do not attempt to defend the district court's invalidation of section 526(a)(4) in its entirety, without addressing that part of the statute that precludes attorneys from advising clients to incur yet more debt in order to pay their own fees. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Plaintiffs have made no allegations that they intend to engage in such conduct, and a challenge to that provision was not properly before the district court. See Gov. Br. 41.

subvert the bankruptcy system. Because section 526(a)(4) embodies a bankruptcy-specific regulation of professional conduct that does not impinge upon the First Amendment rights of attorneys or their clients, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

III. CONGRESS CONSTITUTIONALLY REQUIRED THE DISCLOSURES IN SECTION 528 TO PREVENT THE DECEPTION OF CONSUMER DEBTORS.

1. As plaintiffs do not dispute, Congress enacted the disclosure requirements in 11 U.S.C. § 528 in response to aggressive lawyer advertisements that promised to wipe out debts, halt foreclosures, and prevent repossessions, yet failed even to mention that any such relief would require a petition for bankruptcy. See generally Gov. Br. 42-43. The same concerns had motivated the Federal Trade Commission in 1997 to issue an official consumer alert (which remains in effect today) warning consumers not to be misled, because "bankruptcy stays on your credit report for 10 years, and can hinder your ability to get credit, a job, insurance, or even a place to live." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998 (Part III), Hearing on H.R. 3150 Before House Judiciary Comm., 105th Cong. 90, 90-92 (1998) ("FTC Alert"). Section 528 thus requires bankruptcy attorneys to identify themselves truthfully as a "debt relief agency" in any advertisement promoting bankruptcy services, and to disclose in such advertisements the fact that they "help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." 11 U.S.C. § 528(b)(2); see also id. § 528(a)(3), (4).

In plaintiffs' view, this modest disclosure requirement unconstitutionally compels attorney speech and burdens advertisements that are "entirely harmless." Br. 47. Rather than require disclosures in advertisements, plaintiffs claim, Congress was required under the First Amendment to relegate misled consumers to their post-hoc remedies, such as "submit[ting] complaints against particular attorneys to the state bar of the offending attorney." Br. 47.

These contentions are flawed in multiple respects. As our opening brief explains (at 44-48), the Supreme Court has repeatedly made clear that attorneys may be required to make reasonable disclosures in their advertisements to prevent consumer deception. See, e.g., Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 650-52 (1985); Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 384 (1977) (states may require attorney advertisements to include "a warning or disclaimer * * * so as to assure that the consumer is not misled"). Plaintiffs make no effort to distinguish these authorities.

The particular disclosure requirement in section 528, moreover, addresses precisely the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that those who advertise bankruptcy-related services disclose that their services in fact involve bankruptcy relief, so that consumers will not be inadvertently misled into filing a petition for bankruptcy. Section 528 does not burden substantially more speech than necessary to accomplish that important end; indeed, it restricts no speech at all. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651 (emphasizing that "disclosure requirements trench much more narrowly on an advertiser's interests than do flat prohibitions on speech"). Whether analyzed under the Zauderer standard for factual disclosures, see 471 U.S. at 650-52, or under the "substantial government interest" test applicable to commercial speech regulations generally, see Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618, 623 (1995), section 528 easily passes constitutional muster.

2. Plaintiffs urge that section 528 is invalid for the same reasons that the Supreme Court struck down the Ohio rule at issue in Zauderer. See Br. 44, 47. But plaintiffs misread the Court's decision. Although the Court in Zauderer struck down certain speech restrictions under Ohio law, it upheld the disclosure requirements analogous to those in section 528. See 471 U.S. at 650-52 (upholding discipline against attorney for failing to disclose in advertisements that "clients might be liable for significant litigation costs even if their lawsuits were unsuccessful"). The Supreme Court emphasized that disclosure requirements do not "prevent attorneys from conveying information to the public," but merely "require[] them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present." Id. at 650. Accordingly, the Court held, "an advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." Id. at 651. That standard is plainly satisfied here.

Plaintiffs also assert that section 528 sweeps more broadly than necessary because it would apply to any advertisement by any attorney who "happens to discuss" bankruptcy "with even a single client." Br. 48. Here again, plaintiffs would expand the statute far beyond the scope established by Congress. By their terms, the disclosure requirements in section 528 apply only to advertisements "of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public," 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3) (emphasis added), including advertisements offering aid with "credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings," and the like, see id. § 528(b)(2). An attorney who merely "happens to discuss" bankruptcy with a client therefore would not be required to make the required disclosures — except to the extent that attorney specifically advertises bankruptcy assistance.

Finally, plaintiffs contend that the disclosures required under section 528 are themselves misleading, asserting that potential clients may be uncertain what the term "debt relief agency" means, or may assume that every attorney who makes the disclosures is equally experienced in bankruptcy law. Br. 49-50. Such speculation is not a proper basis for invalidating an Act of Congress, particularly where Congress has targeted a "concrete, nonspeculative harm," Florida Bar, 515 U.S. at 629, and has not burdened more speech than necessary to accomplish its ends. In any event, nothing in section 528 precludes attorneys from providing more information in their advertisements than the minimum disclosures required by the statute. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650 (disclosure requirements do not "prevent attorneys from conveying information to the public," but "only require them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present").

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

Pursuant to Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure 35 and 40, the United States respectfully asks that the Court grant rehearing of the panel's decision in this case and suggests that the case warrants rehearing en banc.

A divided panel of this Court struck down an Act of Congress as facially invalid under the First Amendment. Section 526(a)(4) of Title 11 provides that bankruptcy attorneys and other persons providing paid bankruptcy assistance to consumer debtors may not advise their clients "to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." The panel majority concluded that this section must be interpreted broadly to encompass even entirely lawful and ethical attorney advice that is consistent with the Bankruptcy Code. For this reason, the majority reasoned, the statute sweeps beyond Congress's legitimate objective of preventing attorneys from encouraging their clients to "load up" on new debt on the eve of bankruptcy in order to abuse the protections of the Bankruptcy Code.

As Judge Colloton explained in his dissenting opinion, the majority's reading creates constitutional difficulties where none need exist. The Act regulates advice "in contemplation of" filing for bankruptcy, a term of art that "has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." Slip op. 21 (Colloton, J., dissenting). Section 526(a)(4) can thus be construed, consistent with the First Amendment, to prohibit "only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system." Id. at 21. As the dissent explained, "[t]he text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for [this] narrowing construction," ibid., and there is no indication that Congress intended the statute to sweep more broadly. And as the dissent stressed, when a federal court is "presented with a constitutional challenge to an Act of Congress, we have not only the power, but the duty, to adopt a narrowing construction that will avoid constitutional difficulties whenever possible." Id. at 20 (citing Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 330-31 (1988)).

The panel majority erred in disregarding principles of constitutional avoidance and construing section 526(a)(4) expansively to encompass all manner of lawful and ethical attorney advice. As the dissent's analysis demonstrates, the statute is amenable to a narrowing construction that is consistent with Congress's intent and avoids all constitutional difficulties, and the majority should have adopted that construction rather than strike down the statute. The facial invalidation of section 526(a)(4) presents an issue of exceptional importance that warrants review by the full Court.

STATEMENT

1. Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, to address a variety of abusive practices by consumer debtors and their professional representatives. A principal concern of the legislation was to address the recurring problem of debtors' attempting to exploit the Bankruptcy Code's discharge provisions, or otherwise manipulate the bankruptcy system, by purposefully amassing new debt prior to filing a petition for relief. Congress expressed concern that earlier measures had not adequately restricted the ability of debtors to "knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 15 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 101 ("House Report"). Accordingly, Congress enacted a variety of new measures to combat the problem of debts incurred in contemplation of bankruptcy, such as reducing the threshold amounts at which certain eve-of-bankruptcy debts become presumptively fraudulent and therefore nondischargeable. See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 310, 119 Stat. at 84 (amending 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(2)(C)).

Congress also responded to evidence that attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals often play a critical role in abuse of the bankruptcy system. Citing a study by the U.S. Trustee Program, Congress noted that the study "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" and "problems associated with bankruptcy petition preparers." House Report at 5 (quoting Darling & Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: the Civil Enforcement Initiative, 21 Am. Bankr. Inst. J. 12 (Sept. 2002)).

Congress addressed these problems by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases" in return for a fee. House Report at 17. Under the amended provisions of the Code, an attorney who represents a consumer debtor in filing a bankruptcy petition must make her own reasonable investigation into the circumstances giving rise to the debtor's petition, including a specific inquiry into the veracity of the debtor's debt and asset schedules. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). By signing the petition, the attorney personally certifies that she believes the petition is warranted by the facts, that she has no reason to believe the debtor's schedules are incorrect, and that she has determined that the petition does not constitute an "abuse" under section 707(b). See ibid. Congress thus effectively required bankruptcy attorneys to warrant that their clients' pre-petition conduct and financial circumstances — including any assumption of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy — do not provide grounds for dismissal of the petition as an abuse of the bankruptcy system. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (authorizing courts to dismiss petitions for abuse); cf. Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 127 S. Ct. 1105, 1111 (2007) (dismissal of bankruptcy petitions for bad-faith pre-petition conduct by the debtor).

Section 526(a) complements these requirements by prohibiting bankruptcy attorneys from misleading their clients or encouraging them to abuse the bankruptcy system. Section 526(a)(1) prohibits attorneys from failing to provide all promised services. Section 526(a)(2) prohibits attorneys from encouraging clients to make false statements in a bankruptcy proceeding. Section 526(a)(3) bars attorneys from misrepresenting the risks and benefits of seeking bankruptcy relief. Finally, section 526(a)(4) precludes attorneys from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system by taking on additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition. Section 526(a)(4) states:

> A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

2. Plaintiffs filed this facial challenge alleging that the advice limitations in section 526(a)(4) violate the First Amendment. In addition, plaintiffs challenged certain advertising disclosure requirements in 11 U.S.C. § 528 and contended that the restrictions are categorically inapplicable to lawyers because, in their view, the statutory term "debt relief agency" does not include attorneys. The district court (Rosenbaum, C.J.) granted summary judgment for plaintiffs, holding that each of the challenged provisions violates the First Amendment and that attorneys do not fall within the statutory definition. See 355 B.R. 758 (D. Minn. 2006).

On the government's appeal, a panel of this Court unanimously concluded that attorneys are encompassed by the term "debt relief agency" and that the advertising requirements do not violate the First Amendment. Slip op. 3-9, 13-18.

The panel divided, however, on the constitutionality of section 526(a)(4). The panel majority concluded that the statute is facially overbroad because, in its view, the Act must be interpreted to prohibit advice "to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy," including "prudent prebankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws." Id. at 10-11. The majority thus held that the Act applies even "where it would likely be in the assisted person's, and even the creditors', best interest for the assisted person to incur additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy." Id. at 11.

As examples, the panel hypothesized that "it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments," and that "it may be in the client's best interest to incur additional debt to purchase a reliable automobile before filing for bankruptcy, so that the debtor will have dependable transportation to travel to and from work." Id. at 11-12. The panel observed that "[i]ncurring these types of additional secured debt, which would often survive or could be reaffirmed by the debtor, may be in the debtor's best interest without harming the creditors." Id. at 12. Because the panel believed that section 526(a)(4) must be construed to prohibit these hypothetical examples of lawful attorney advice, it held the statute unconstitutional on its face. Id. at 13.

Dissenting, Judge Colloton stressed that "[w]hen presented with a constitutional challenge to an Act of Congress, we have not only the power, but the duty, to adopt a narrowing construction that will avoid constitutional difficulties whenever possible." Id. at 20 (citing Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. at 330-31). Observing that the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" is a term of art that has "been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system," id. at 21 (collecting authorities), the dissent explained that the text, structure, and legislative history of the Act all support reading section 526(a)(4) narrowly to prohibit "only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system." Ibid. Such a narrowing construction, the dissent observed, is also consistent with the statute's remedial scheme, which focuses on the debtor's "actual damages" — thus suggesting that Congress did not intend to regulate lawful and appropriate attorney advice. Id. at 22-23 (citing 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)).

Finally, the dissent emphasized that a narrowing construction would conform the statute with Congress's undisputed intent in the 2005 bankruptcy amendments, which was to address "'misconduct by attorneys and other professionals'" and limit "'abusive practices by consumer debtors,'" including in particular the practice of "'load[ing] up'" on debt prior to bankruptcy. Id. at 23 (quoting House Report at 5, 15). The dissent concluded: "Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that one party says is absurd, that the other party says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005." Ibid.

ARGUMENT

In enacting the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Congress addressed the longstanding problem of debtors' "loading up" on new debt prior to filing a petition for bankruptcy relief. Section 526(a)(4) complements these reforms by precluding bankruptcy professionals from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system by deliberately amassing new debt on the eve of bankruptcy. Understood in this manner, the provision is an unexceptional regulation of professional conduct that does not impinge upon the First Amendment rights of attorneys or their clients. See Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071-76 (1991). Indeed, the statute addresses conduct that has been held to fall squarely within the scope of Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.2(d), which prohibits attorneys from advising their clients to engage in fraud. See Attorney Grievance Comm'n of Maryland v. Culver, 381 Md. 241, 275-76 (2004) (attorney violated Rule 1.2(d) by advising a client to obtain credit card loans with the intent that the debt be discharged in bankruptcy).

The panel majority did not doubt that section 526(a)(4) could be constitutionally applied to prohibit this sort of advice. Nor did the majority dispute that Congress’s purpose in the statute was to address such abuses: even plaintiffs do not contend that Congress meant to prohibit bankruptcy attorneys from providing lawful, appropriate advice to debtors. Nevertheless, the panel rejected the government’s interpretation in a single sentence, stating that the “plain language” of section 526(a)(4) precludes any narrowing construction. Slip op. 10. The majority hypothesized two instances — buying a car and refinancing a mortgage[1] — in which an attorney might ethically advise a client to accumulate new debt on the eve of bankruptcy, adding that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist." Id. at 12. On this basis, the majority held the statute unconstitutional on its face.[2]

This analysis is flawed in every respect. First, as the dissent noted, "[e]ven under Milavetz's broad construction of the statute, a facial challenge resting on a 'few hypothetical situations' * * * is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because 'the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge.'" Id. at 20-21 (quoting City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 800 (1984)). The Supreme Court has frequently reiterated this principle in emphasizing the burden that a plaintiff must overcome to establish the facial invalidity of an Act of Congress. See, e.g., United States v.

[1] The panel evidently assumed, without explanation, that merely refinancing an existing mortgage — that is, exchanging one loan for another with the same principal balance but a different interest rate or repayment period — would constitute incurring "more debt" within the meaning of the statute.

[2] The panel observed that several district courts in other circuits have also declared section 526(a)(4) invalid. Slip Op. 11 n.8. Each of those decisions is now on appeal. See Zelotes v. Adams, No. 07-1853 (2d Cir.) (argued Oct. 10, 2008); Hersh v. United States, No. 07-10226 (5th Cir.) (argued April 2, 2008); Olsen v. Mukasey, No. 07-35616 (9th Cir.) (oral argument not yet scheduled). This Court is the only appellate court that has ruled on the validity of the statute.

In any event, as the dissent noted, "[i]t is unnecessary to resolve whether § 526(a)(4) is impermissibly overbroad when given its broadest reading" because the statute can be read narrowly to prohibit only advice to incur new debt for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system. Slip op. 21. As the dissent explained, such a reading is consistent with the text, purpose, and structure of section 526(a)(4), and avoids all constitutional concerns. Id. at 21-23.

Under fundamental principles of constitutional avoidance, the majority erred in rejecting that interpretation in favor of striking down the statute. As the dissent stressed, in considering a constitutional challenge to an Act of Congress, a federal court has "not only the power, but the duty, to adopt a narrowing construction that will avoid constitutional difficulties whenever possible." Id. at 20. Indeed, "even when First Amendment interests are potentially affected, 'facial overbreadth has not been invoked when a limiting construction has been or could be placed on the challenged statute.'" Citizens for Equal Protection v. Bruning, 455 F.3d 859, 870 (8th Cir. 2006) (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 612 (1973)). Thus, in Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312 (1988), the Supreme Court considered a First Amendment facial overbreadth challenge to a federal statute that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." Id. at 329. The Court acknowledged that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330. Nevertheless, in accordance with the "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties" when a narrowing "construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute to apply "only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present" — a requirement nowhere in the statute but necessary to ensure the validity of the Act. Id. at 330-31.

Section 562(a)(4) is plainly open to a construction that effectuates the statutory text, upholds Congress's purposes, and avoids all constitutional concerns. The statute provides that bankruptcy attorneys "shall not * * * advise an assisted person * * * to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." The majority believed this language precludes any narrowing construction. Slip op. 10. But as the dissent observed, "the phrase 'in contemplation of' has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." Id. at 21. See, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "the thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding" (emphasis added)). Indeed, as the dissent demonstrated, this understanding has a long pedigree. Id. at 21-22; see, e.g., In re Pearce, 21 Vt. 611, 19 F. Cas. 50, 53 (D. Vt. 1843) (No. 10873) (an act was done "in contemplation of bankruptcy" if it was done "in anticipation of breaking or failing in his business * * * and intending to defeat the general distribution of effects, which takes place under a proceeding in bankruptcy"); Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 Barn. & Ad. 289, 296, 110 Eng. Rep. 798, 801 (K.B. 1833) (Parke, J.) (interpreting "in contemplation of bankruptcy" to mean that "the payment or delivery must be with intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankruptcy"); Fidgeon v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539, 545-46, 128 Eng. Rep. 800, 802-03 (C.P. 1814) (Gibbs, C.J.) (an act made in contemplation of bankruptcy "must be intended in fraud of the bankrupt laws").

That Congress intended section 526(a)(4) only to prohibit advice to abuse the bankruptcy process is also apparent from the remedy provisions of the statute. As the dissent observed, the principal remedy for a violation of section 526(a)(4) is a suit against the attorney to recover the debtor's "actual damages," as well as restitution of any fees paid by the debtor. Id. at 23 (citing 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)). Congress's emphasis on the debtor's "actual damages" presupposes that the debtor has been injured by the attorney's conduct. But as the dissent noted, "legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all.” Ibid.

The majority’s broad interpretation of section 526(a)(4) also entirely disregards the statutory context. Section 526(a)(4) is one of four subsections of section 526(a). The other three subsections indisputably provide rules of professional conduct designed to protect debtors from abusive practices by their attorneys and other debt relief agencies. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(1) (debt relief agencies must perform all promised services); id. § 526(a)(2) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from advising debtors to make false or misleading statements to obtain bankruptcy relief); id. § 526(a)(3) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from misrepresenting to debtors the costs or benefits of bankruptcy). Construed in pari materia with these provisions, section 526(a)(4) is clearly targeted at advice to engage in abusive conduct — not, as the majority held, all manner of lawful and ethical attorney advice.

The sweeping construction advanced by plaintiffs and adopted by the panel majority is thus in no sense compelled by the statutory text. Nor is it consistent with the purposes of the statute: even plaintiffs acknowledged that “a principal goal of Congress in passing the statute was to ‘preclude debtors from taking on more debt knowing that it will later be discharged during bankruptcy.’” Slip op. 23 (quoting Brief of Appellee 34). As the dissent rightly concluded, there is “no need to adopt a construction that one party says is absurd, that the other party says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005." Ibid.

It is the duty of a federal court to construe federal statutes to avoid, not invite, constitutional difficulties, provided any plausible construction can be found that saves the validity of the statute. As the dissent's analysis demonstrates, this Court can and should adopt such a construction here.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should grant rehearing en banc and sustain the validity of 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Before BYE, SMITH, and COLLOTON, Circuit Judges.

SMITH, Circuit Judge.

Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A., a law firm that practices bankruptcy law, the firm's president, a bankruptcy attorney within the firm, and two clients[1] who sought bankruptcy advice from the firm brought suit against the United States seeking a declaratory judgment that certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA)—11 U.S.C. §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)—did not apply to attorneys and law firms and are unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs and issued an order declaring that: (1) attorneys in the District of Minnesota were excluded from the definition of a "debt relief agency" as defined by BAPCPA; and (2) the challenged provisions were unconstitutional as applied to attorneys in the District of Minnesota. We affirm in part and reverse in part.

I. Background

On April 20, 2005, BAPCPA was signed into law, amending and adding multiple sections of the Bankruptcy Code ("the Code"). While some of these amendments became effective immediately, the vast majority became effective on October 17, 2005. See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 1501(a), 119 Stat. 23 (2005) ("Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act and the amendments made by this act shall take effect 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act").

One BAPCPA amendment added a new term, "debt relief agency," which is defined in § 101(12A) of the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A).[2] The amended Code

[1] The client-plaintiffs sought prebankruptcy advice regarding the incurrence of additional debt prior to filing bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Code precludes a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person from incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Thus, these client-plaintiffs are appearing on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated who desire to exercise their First Amendment rights with attorneys regarding bankruptcy information.

[2] Prior to BAPCPA, the term "debt relief agency" did not exist in the Code.

restricts some actions of debt relief agencies, while requiring them to do others. See 11 U.S.C. § 526 ("Restrictions on debt relief agencies"); 11 U.S.C. § 528 ("Requirements for debt relief agencies"). For example, § 526(a)(4) bars a debt relief agency from advising a client "to incur more debt in contemplation" of a bankruptcy filing, 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), while §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure in their bankruptcy-related advertisements directed to the general public declaring: "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code[,]'or a substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The plaintiffs sought alternative remedies. First, plaintiffs requested a declaratory judgment that attorneys did not fall within the definition of "debt relief agency." If the court determined that attorneys fell within the definition of debt relief agency, they challenged the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), as applied to attorneys.

II. Discussion

A. Debt Relief Agencies

Initially, we address whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies. If they do not, we will have no need to address the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), which only apply to debt relief agencies. See Holtan v. Black, 838 F.2d 984, 986 n.3 (8th Cir. 1988) ("Federal courts must avoid passing upon constitutional questions unless they are essential to the disposition of the issues before them.") (citing Three Affiliated Tribes v. Wold Engineering, 467 U.S. 138, 157 (1984) ("It is a fundamental rule of judicial restraint, however, that this Court will not reach constitutional questions in advance of necessity of deciding them")).

> The term "debt relief agency" means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include–

> (A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;
>
> (B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;
>
> (C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;
>
> (D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or
>
> (E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (emphasis added).

Further, the Code defines the term "bankruptcy assistance" to mean:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

Id. at § 101(4A) (emphasis added).

Additionally, the Code defines the term "assisted person" as "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $164,250."[3] Id. at § 101(3).

The plaintiffs argue that attorneys are not "debt relief agencies" because the definition of debt relief agencies makes no direct reference to attorneys, even though "attorney" is a defined term in the Code, id. at § 101(4),[4] but does include the term "bankruptcy petition preparer" which, by definition, excludes debtor's attorneys and their staff. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1).[5] Plaintiffs contend that the omission of any reference to attorneys or lawyers while specifically including bankruptcy petition preparers shows Congress's intent to exclude attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies. Because the plaintiffs contend that constitutionality issues arise in §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) if attorneys are debt relief agencies, they assert that the doctrine of constitutional avoidance should be used to interpret "debt relief agency" to exclude attorneys and thus avoid the potential constitutional issues.

Conversely, the government argues that attorneys are debt relief agencies because the broadly worded definition of the term plainly includes attorneys, see 11

[3] When this suit was commenced, the dollar amount in § 101(3) was $150,000. Subsequently, on April 1, 2007, the amount was adjusted pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 104. The change, however, is inconsequential for purposes of this case.

[4] "The term 'attorney' means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law." 11 U.S.C. § 101(4). This definition makes no reference to "debt relief agencies" or to subsection (12A).

[5] "'[B]ankruptcy petition preparer' means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing [by the debtor in connection with his bankruptcy case]." 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1) (emphasis added); see also id. at § 110(a)(2) (defining "document for filing" as used in § 110(a)(1)).

U.S.C. § 101(12A) (defining "debt relief agency" as "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment"), and providing legal representation is included in definition of bankruptcy assistance. See id. at 101(4A) ("bankruptcy assistance means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing . . . advice, counsel, . . . or legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title").

Whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies is an issue of first impression among the Courts of Appeals. Although the plain language of the definition appears to include bankruptcy attorneys and does not appear to be ambiguous, lower "[c]ourts that have addressed the issue of whether attorneys are debt relief agencies have not been unanimous." In re Irons, 379 B.R. 680, 685 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2007) (citing cases). Nevertheless, the majority of courts have held that compensated bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies as that term is defined in the Code. Id. (finding debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency); Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906 (D. Or. 2006) (same); In re Robinson, 368 B.R. 492 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2007) (finding debtor's counsel was debt relief agency); Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19 (N.D. Tex. 2006) (finding that bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies); In re Norman, No. 06-70859, 2006 WL 3053309 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2006) (finding debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency); but see In re Attorneys at Law and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005) (holding that attorneys are not debt relief agencies); In re Reyes, 361 B.R. 276 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007) (finding that attorneys, generally, are not debt relief agencies, but ruling that debtor's counsel in case at bar was not a debt relief agency because service was provided pro bono and thus counsel did not receive valuable consideration in return for the bankruptcy assistance provided).

In this case, the district court acknowledged that the definition of debt relief agency, "at first glance," appeared to include attorneys, but it ultimately relied on the doctrine of constitutional avoidance to conclude that attorneys did not fall within the definition because if they did portions of §§ 526 and 528 would be unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The doctrine of constitutional avoidance dictates that "where an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, the Court will construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such construction is plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988). Thus, if interpreting "debt relief agency" to include attorneys "would raise serious constitutional problems," then we should look for another interpretation "that may fairly be ascribed" to the definition that does not raise these concerns. Id. at 576–77. We will not, however, adopt an alternative interpretation that is "plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 575.

"We review the district court's statutory interpretation de novo." United States v. Mendoza-Gonzalez, 520 F.3d 912, 914 (8th Cir. 2008). To interpret the statute we first "determine whether the language at issue has a plain and unambiguous meaning with regard to the particular dispute in the case." Id. (quoting Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 340 (1997)). "If so, we apply the plain language of the statute." Id. "A mere disagreement among litigants over the meaning of the statute does not prove ambiguity; it usually means that one of the litigants is simply wrong." Bank of Am. Nat'l Trust & Sav. Ass'n v. 203 N. LaSalle St. P'ship, 526 U.S. 434, 461 (1999).

The plain reading of the definition of debt relief agency, and the defined terms that make up that definition, leads us to conclude that attorneys who provide "bankruptcy assistance" to "assisted persons" are unambiguously included in the definition of "debt relief agencies." See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 912 ("[I]t is the plain language of the Act that leads to the conclusion that attorneys are to be included in the definition of 'debt relief agency,'" and "[t]hus, further use of the tools of statutory construction is not necessary"). The statutory language sweeps broadly and clearly covers the legal services provided by attorneys to debtors in bankruptcy unless excluded by another provision.

Congress specifically listed five exclusions from the definition of "debt relief agency," and if it meant to exclude attorneys from that definition it could have explicitly done so. Id.; 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). Moreover, if attorneys were not included in the definition of debt relief agencies, Congress would have had no reason to include § 526(d)(2), which expressly provides that nothing in §§ 526, 527, or 528 (the sections covering debt relief agencies) "shall be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability of a State . . . to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A) and (B). The legislative history provides further indication that attorneys are included in the definition. See H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, 109th Cong. 1st Sess. at 4 (April 8, 2005) ("The bill's consumer protections include provisions strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases") (emphasis added).[6]

Because attorneys were not specifically excluded from the definition of debt relief agencies, we hold that attorneys that provide "bankruptcy assistance" to "assisted persons" are "debt relief agencies" as that term is defined by the Code.

[6] Additionally, while we recognize that the Supreme Court has stated that "failed legislative proposals are a particularly dangerous ground on which to rest [a statutory interpretation]," Lockhart v. United States, 546 U.S. 142 (2005) (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted), we note that on March 9, 2005, Senator Feingold proposed amendment No. 93 to Congress which would have excluded attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies, see 151 Cong. Rec. S2306–02, 2316 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 2005) (statement by Sen. Feingold) ("This amendment would exclude lawyers from the provisions dealing with 'debt relief agencies' . . . ."), but the Senate did not address the proposal.

Interpreting the definition of "debt relief agency" to exclude bankruptcy attorneys would be contrary to Congress's intent.

B. Constitutionality of § 526(a)(4)

Having concluded that attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, we now must determine whether the challenged provisions placing restrictions and requirements on debt relief agencies are unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to these types of attorneys.[7] One of the sections challenged by the plaintiffs in this case is § 526(a)(4), which states:

> (a) A debt relief agency shall not–
> . . .
> (4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Plaintiffs assert that the prohibition against advising an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy violates

[7] Even though a more narrowly drawn version of § 526(a)(4) would likely be valid as applied to the plaintiffs in this case, our analysis applies to all attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies, not merely the plaintiff-attorneys. See Members of City Council of City of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 798–99 (1984) (explaining that the overbreadth doctrine allows a party to challenge a broadly written statute "even though a more narrowly drawn statute would be valid as applied to the party in the case," as "the statute's very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression") (internal quotations and citation omitted).

the First Amendment. The parties disagree as to the level of scrutiny we apply to the constitutional analysis of this limitation on speech. Plaintiffs claim that we should review the constitutionality of § 526(a)(4) under the strict scrutiny standard as the restriction on attorney advice is content-based. See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994) ("Our precedents thus apply the most exacting scrutiny to regulations that suppress, disadvantage, or impose differential burdens upon speech because of its content"). Under strict scrutiny review, the government has the burden to prove that the constraints on speech are supported by a compelling governmental interest and are narrowly tailored, such that the statutory effect does not prohibit any more speech than is necessary to serve the governmental interest. Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 774–75 (2002).

In contrast, the government argues that § 526(a)(4)'s restrictions are a type of ethical regulation, invoking the more lenient standard outlined in Gentile v. State Bar of Nev., 501 U.S. 1030 (1991). Under the Gentile standard, we would balance the First Amendment rights of the attorneys against the government's legitimate interest in regulating the activity in question—the prohibition of advising assisted persons to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy—and then determine whether the regulations impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." Id. at 1075.

According to the government, § 526(a)(4) should be interpreted as merely preventing an attorney from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to take on more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy when the incurrence of such debt is done with the intent to manipulate the bankruptcy system, engage in abusive conduct, or take unfair advantage of the bankruptcy discharge. However, the plain language of the statute does not permit this narrow interpretation. Rather, § 526(a)(4) broadly prohibits a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy. The statute's blanket prohibition applies even if the additional debt would not be discharged during the bankruptcy proceedings. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Thus, regardless of whether the government's interest in prohibiting the speech was legitimate (Gentile standard) or compelling (strict scrutiny standard), § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies because it is not narrowly tailored, nor narrowly and necessarily limited, to restrict only that speech that the government has an interest in restricting. Instead, § 526(a)(4) prohibits attorneys classified as debt relief agencies from advising any assisted person to incur any additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy; this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent prebankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws. Section 526(a)(4), as written, prevents attorneys from fulfilling their duty to clients to give them appropriate and beneficial advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code or other applicable law.[8]

There are certain situations where it would likely be in the assisted person's, and even the creditors', best interest for the assisted person to incur additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. However, under § 526(a)(4)'s plain language an attorney is prohibited from providing this beneficial advice—even if the advice could help the assisted person avoid filing for bankruptcy altogether. For instance, it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments. This could free up additional funds to pay off other debts and avoid the need for filing bankruptcy all together. Hersh, 347 B.R. at 24. Moreover, it may be in the client's best interest to incur additional debt to purchase a reliable automobile before filing for bankruptcy, so that the debtor will have dependable transportation to travel to and from work, which will likely be necessary to maintain the debtor's payments in bankruptcy. Id. Incurring these types of additional secured debt, which would often survive or could be reaffirmed by the debtor, may be in the debtor's best interest without harming the creditors.[9]

Factual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist and may further illustrate why incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy may not be abusive or harmful to creditors. Nonetheless, § 526(a)(4), as written, does not allow attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies to advise assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons)—i.e. clients (or prospective clients) meeting the definition of assisted person—to incur such debt. Thus, § 526(a)(4) is not narrowly tailored nor narrowly and necessarily limited to prevent only that speech which the government has an interest in restricting. Therefore, we hold that §

> [Section 526(a)(4)'s] prohibition is particularly troubling when it might be completely legal and even desirable for the client to incur such debt. For example, there may be instances where it is advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car on time. There would be no fraud in doing so if the client intended to pay such debt notwithstanding the filing of a contemplated bankruptcy case. For example, the client may intend to keep all payments fully current and to reaffirm such debt once the case is filed.

526(a)(4) is substantially overbroad,[10] and unconstitutional as applied to attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons, as those terms are defined in the Code.

C. Constitutionality of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)

The plaintiffs also challenged the constitutionality of §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B), claiming that the advertising disclosure requirements mandated by those sections violate the First Amendment rights of bankruptcy attorneys through compelled speech. The disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) are supplemented by § 528(a)(3). These sections state:

> (a) A debt relief agency shall–
> . . .
>
> (3) clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public (whether in general media, seminars or specific mailings, telephonic or electronic messages, or otherwise) that the services or benefits are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title; and
>
> (4) clearly and conspicuously use the following statement in such advertisement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

[10] See Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 248 F.3d 738, 747 (8th Cir. 2001) ("For us to find a statute unconstitutionally overbroad, its 'overbreadth . . . must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep.'") (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973)).

Similarly, § 528(b)(2)(B) states:

> (2) An advertisement, directed to the general public, indicating that the debt relief agency provides assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt shall–
>
> . . .
>
> > (B) include the following statement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

11 U.S.C. § 528(b)(2)(B).

As both §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B) require debt relief agencies—which includes attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons—to disclose in their advertising that "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.' or some substantially similar statement," the statutes compel speech that, similar to a restriction on speech, receives constitutional protection under the First Amendment. See Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 714 (1977) ("[T]he right of freedom of thought protected by the First Amendment against state action includes both the right to speak freely and the right to refrain from speaking at all"); Turner Broad. Sys., Inc., 512 U.S. at 642 (stating that "[l]aws that compel speakers to utter or distribute speech bearing a particular message are subject to" constitutional scrutiny).

The government contends that Congress enacted § 528's disclosure requirements to address problems with deceitful or unclear advertising by bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, or other debt relief entities. This position is supported by legislative history. See 151 Cong. Rec. H2063-01, 2066 (daily ed. Apr. 14, 2005) (statement by Rep. Moran) (stating that certain BAPCPA provisions are intended to "[p]revent deceptive and fraudulent advertising practices by debt relief agencies . . ."). But before we can determine whether the government's justification for mandating the disclosures passes constitutional scrutiny, we must first decide the appropriate standard for reviewing the constitutionality of the required disclosures.

We find guidance for this issue from the Court in Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626 (1985). In Zauderer, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a state bar disciplinary regulation requiring attorneys that advertised contingent-fee representation to disclose in their advertisements that clients may still have to bear certain costs even if the case was unsuccessful. Id. at 633. As the regulation only required an attorney to "include in his advertising purely factual and uncontroversial information about the terms under which his services w[ould] be available," and "the extension of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is justified principally by the value to consumers of the information such speech provides, [the attorney's] constitutionally protected interest in not providing any particular factual information in his advertising is minimal." Id. at 651. The Court "recognize[d] that unjustified or unduly burdensome disclosure requirements might offend the First Amendment by chilling protected commercial speech," but held "that an advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." Id. (emphasis added).

On the other hand, restrictions on non-deceptive advertising are reviewed under intermediate scrutiny. See Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 564 (1980) (ruling that restrictions on commercial speech that is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity must assert a "substantial interest to be achieved by [the] restrictions" and "the restrictions must directly advance the state interest involved"). Under this standard, the limitation must be narrowly drawn. Id. ("[I]f the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restrictions cannot survive").

The district court in this case reviewed § 528's disclosure requirements under the intermediate scrutiny standard, but we conclude that rational basis review is proper. The disclosure requirements here, like those in Zauderer, are intended to avoid potentially deceptive advertising. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651, n.14 (rejecting a more strict analysis of the disclosure requirements at issue in that case, and noting that "the First Amendment interests implicated by disclosure requirements are substantially weaker than those at stake when speech is actually suppressed . . .").

By definition, debt relief agencies provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons) "with respect to a case or proceeding under [the Bankruptcy Code]." 11 U.S.C. §§ 101(4A), (12A). Section 528 generally requires debt relief agencies to disclose on its advertisements of bankruptcy assistance services directed to the general public that their services do in fact relate to bankruptcy and that they assist people in filing for bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 528. As in Zauderer, the plaintiffs' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal." 471 U.S. at 650. Further, the disclosure requirements are reasonably and rationally related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors, as the disclosure requirements are directed precisely at the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services to the general public make clear that their services do in fact involve filing for bankruptcy.[11]

[11] Without ruling on the issue, we note that at least one lower court has held that § 528's disclosure requirements are constitutionally valid even under the stricter intermediate scrutiny analysis, as the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from misleading advertising is substantial, the disclosure requirements placed on bankruptcy attorneys directly advances the government's asserted interest, and the disclosure requirements are narrowly drawn to serve the government's interest. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920 (concluding that § 528 "passes constitutional muster" under either rational basis review or intermediate scrutiny review).

Section 528 requires debt relief agencies to disclose: "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.' or a substantially similar statement," in all of their bankruptcy-related advertising materials directed to the general public. 11 U.S.C. §§ 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The requirement does not prevent those attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies "from conveying information to the public; it . . . only require[s] them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present." Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650. Moreover, if any of these attorneys are concerned that the required disclosures will confuse the public, we note that nothing in the Code prevents them from identifying themselves in their advertisements as both attorneys and debt relief agencies. Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920. Simply put, attorneys that provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, and the disclosure requirements of § 528 only require those attorneys to disclose factually correct statements on their advertising.[12] This does not violate the First Amendment.

[12] We recognize that the broad definitions of debt relief agency, bankruptcy assistance, and assisted persons, might result in certain attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies even though they do not represent debtors in bankruptcy nor help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Code. Nevertheless, these attorneys are still subjected to the disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) when they advertise "bankruptcy assistance services or . . . the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public," 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3),(4), or when they advertise to the general public that they "provide[] assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt." Id. at § 528(b)(2). But because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure to the one suggested by the Code, these attorneys can and should tailor their advertisement disclosure statements to factually represent the "bankruptcy assistance" they provide. These tailored disclosures will meet the requirements of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) as long as they are "substantially similar" to the suggested disclosure, a decision which will require a case-by-case determination. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 919–20 (dismissing plaintiffs' claim that § 528 was unconstitutional, rejecting argument that attorney who met definition of debt relief agency but did not represent bankruptcy debtors was precluded from § 528's disclosure requirements because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure,

Id.; see also In re Robinson, 368 B.R. at 500–502 (finding that debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency subject to the strictures of § 528, and that § 528(a)(1)'s requirement for a written contract is constitutional); In re Norman, 2006 WL 3053309 at *4 (finding that debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency and thus must comply with the requirements of § 528(a)(1)).

The challenged sections of § 528 only require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure on certain advertisements. Although less intrusive means may be conceivable to prevent deceptive advertising, § 528's disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from deceptive advertising, and thus the section passes constitutional muster.

III. Conclusion

In sum, attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Bankruptcy Code, and § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutional as applied to these attorneys, but §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) are constitutional. Accordingly, we affirm in part and reverse in part.

COLLOTON, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I concur in all but Part II.B of the opinion of the court. I disagree, however, with the court's holding that 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad in violation of the First Amendment, and I would therefore reverse the district court's decision declaring this statutory provision unconstitutional.

which could be tailored to disclose that attorney advised clients about bankruptcy assistance matters but did not represent people in bankruptcy or file bankruptcy petitions, and stating that whether disclosure was "substantially similar" would require case-by-case determination).

Milavetz, Gallop, & Milavetz, P.A., mounts a facial attack on § 526(a)(4), arguing that the section's potential application to attorneys in hypothetical situations requires that the statute be declared impermissibly overbroad and unconstitutional. This case involves a facial challenge in the First Amendment context, "under which a law may be overturned as impermissibly overbroad because a substantial number of its applications are unconstitutional, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Wash. State Grange v. Wash. State Republican Party, 128 S. Ct. 1184, 1190 n.6 (2008). This "overbreadth doctrine," however, is "strong medicine that is used sparingly and only as a last resort." New York State Club Ass'n, Inc. v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1, 14 (1988) (internal quotations omitted). It should be applied only when there is "a realistic danger that the statute itself will significantly compromise recognized First Amendment protections of parties not before the Court." City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 801 (1984). The Supreme Court recently emphasized that it has "vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute's overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." United States v. Williams, 128 S. Ct. 1830, 1838 (2008).[13]

[13] The district court purported to consider only an "as-applied" challenge to § 526(a)(4), rather than an overbreadth challenge, and ultimately declared the section "unconstitutional as applied to attorneys." Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, 355 B.R. 758, 766 n.4, 769 (D. Minn. 2006). The majority correctly recognizes that the district court's approach is really an overbreadth analysis, and considers the statute under that framework. See ante, at 9 & n.7, 11, 13 & n.10. The "as applied" method of analysis, by contrast, considers the statute's application to a "particular claimant" based on "harm caused to the litigating party." Turchick v. United States, 561 F.2d 719, 721 n.3 (8th Cir. 1977). "The 'as applied' method vindicates a claimant whose conduct is within the First Amendment but invalidates the challenged statute only to the extent of the impermissible application." Id. (emphasis added). The district court and the majority have declared § 526(a)(4) unconstitutional in all of its applications to all attorneys, and the supporting reasoning is thus consistent with "facial overbreadth analysis." Id. (punctuation omitted).

To resolve the constitutional challenge brought by Milavetz, we must first construe the disputed statute. When presented with a constitutional challenge to an Act of Congress, we have not only the power, but the duty, to adopt a narrowing construction that will avoid constitutional difficulties whenever possible. Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 330-31 (1988). In Boos, for example, the Court considered a provision of federal legislation that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." Id. at 329 (internal quotation omitted). The Court observed that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330 (first emphasis added). Nonetheless, citing the "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties by [adopting a narrowing construction] if such a construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute narrowly to permit the dispersal of only congregations that are directed at an embassy, and to allow dispersal "only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present." Id. at 330-31 (internal quotation omitted). Similarly, in United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994), the Court emphasized that "it is incumbent upon" a federal court to read a statute to eliminate constitutional doubts, "so long as such a reading is not plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 78.

The challenged provision in this case provides in part that "[a] debt relief agency shall not . . . advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Milavetz argues that according to this provision, a debt relief agency may not advise a client to incur any debt for any purpose when the client is contemplating the filing of a petition for bankruptcy. As such, Milavetz contends that an attorney could be sanctioned for "fulfilling his duty to his client to give legal and appropriate advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code." (Brief of Appellee 30). Even under Milavetz's broad construction of the statute, a facial challenge resting on a "few hypothetical situations," ante, at 12, is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because "the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge." Vincent, 466 U.S. at 800.

It is unnecessary to resolve whether § 526(a)(4) is impermissibly overbroad when given its broadest reading, however, because the government suggests an acceptable narrowing construction of the statute that would avoid most constitutional difficulties. The government contends that "in contemplation of" filing for bankruptcy is a term of art that denotes an action taken with the intent to abuse the protections of bankruptcy laws. Under this view, the statute should be construed to prohibit only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system.

The text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for a narrowing construction. Particularly given the latitude of federal courts to narrow a text to avoid constitutional difficulties, see Boos, 485 U.S. at 330-31, the words "in contemplation of . . . filing a case" need not create impermissible overbreadth. Rather, we may recognize that the phrase "in contemplation of" has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system. Black's Law Dictionary reflects this understanding, defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "the thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding." Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (emphasis added). American and English authorities construing the bankruptcy laws also support the proposition that the words "in contemplation of" may be understood to require an intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws. In re Pearce, 19 F. Cas. 50, 53 (D. Vt. 1843) (No. 10873) (concluding that an act was done "in contemplation of bankruptcy" if it was done "in anticipation of breaking or failing in his business, of committing an act of bankruptcy, or of being declared bankrupt at his own instance, on the ground of inability to pay his debts, and intending to defeat the general distribution of effects, which takes place under a proceeding in bankruptcy.") (emphasis added); Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 Barn. & Ad. 289, 296, 110 Eng. Rep. 798, 801 (K.B. 1833) (Parke, J.) (interpreting "in contemplation of bankruptcy" to mean that "the payment or delivery must be with intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankruptcy."); Fidgeon v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539, 545-46, 128 Eng. Rep. 800, 802-03 (C.P. 1814) (Gibbs, C.J.) (An act made in contemplation of bankruptcy "must be intended in fraud of the bankrupt laws."); cf. Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U.S. 151, 167 (1851) ("To give to these words, contemplation of bankruptcy, a broad scope, and somewhat loose meaning, would not be in furtherance of the general purpose with which they were introduced."); id. at 169 (relying on English bankruptcy decisions as instructive authority on meaning of the former Bankrupt Act). Our duty to construe the statute to avoid constitutional difficulties counsels that we should look to these authorities for a plausible alternative to the broad construction urged by Milavetz.

The structure of § 526(a)(4) also supports a narrowing construction. The prohibitions of this statute can be enforced only through the civil remedies provided in § 526(c). An attorney who violates § 526(a)(4) can be sanctioned in just three situations: if a debtor sues the attorney for the available remedies – remittal of fees, actual damages, and reasonable attorney's fees and costs; if a state attorney general sues for a resident's actual damages; or if a court finds that the attorney intentionally violated § 526(a)(4), and chooses to "impose an appropriate civil penalty." 11 U.S.C. § 526(c). The remedies for a violation thus emphasize actual damages. But legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all. If an attorney advises a debtor to refinance his home to lower mortgage payments, or to purchase a reliable car to enable him to pay off his debts, see ante, at 11-12, then a debtor following that advice would suffer no damage. There is no reason to believe that a client could recover the remittal of attorney's fees or that a court would find a civil penalty "appropriate" as a remedy for legal advice that benefits both the debtor and his creditors. Rather, a debtor is likely to have a remedy against an attorney only in the case of an abusive bankruptcy petition, where the debtor may suffer damages if the petition is dismissed as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1), and where an attorney general or a court has reason to seek or impose sanctions against an abusive debt relief agency. The remedial focus of § 526 thus bolsters the proposition that § 526(a)(4) was aimed only at advice given by a debt relief agency that is designed to abuse the bankruptcy process.

The incorporation of an abusive purpose requirement into § 526(a)(4) is also consonant with the evident purpose of the statute. The government argues, and Milavetz acknowledges, that a principal goal of Congress in passing the statute was to "preclude debtors from taking on more debt knowing that it will later be discharged during bankruptcy." (Brief of Appellee 34). A narrowing construction of § 526(a)(4) is in accord with expressions of desire in the legislative history to address "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals," and "abusive practices by consumer debtors who, for example, knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt.1, at 5, 15 (2005) (internal quotation omitted), as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92, 101. Milavetz itself argues that a broad construction of § 526(a)(4) "goes beyond" this congressional purpose, and is "absurd," because it would prevent an attorney from advising a client to take actions that might avoid the need for filing bankruptcy altogether. (Brief of Appellee 34). Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that one party says is absurd, that the other party says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

For these reasons, I would reverse the district court's decision declaring unconstitutional the provision codified at 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Section 526(a)(4) of Title 11 of the United States Code provides that bankruptcy professionals who qualify as "debt relief agencies" and who are hired by consumer debtors for bankruptcy services may not advise those debtors "to incur more debt in contemplation of" filing a bankruptcy petition. The questions presented are as follows:

1. Whether Section 526(a)(4) precludes only advice to incur more debt with a purpose to abuse the bankruptcy system.

2. Whether Section 526(a)(4), construed with due regard for the principle of constitutional avoidance, violates the First Amendment.

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDINGS

Petitioner is the United States of America. Respondents, who were appellees in the court of appeals, are Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A.; Robert J. Milavetz; Barbara N. Nevin; Ronald Richardson (captioned as John Doe); and Lynette Richardson (captioned as Mary Doe). The district court denied the Doe respondents leave to proceed pseudonymously.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

The Solicitor General, on behalf of the United States of America, respectfully petitions for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit in this case.

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the court of appeals (App., infra, 1a-28a) is reported at 541 F.3d 785. The opinion of the district court denying the government's motion to dismiss (App., infra, 29a-44a) is reported at 355 B.R. 758.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court of appeals was entered on September 4, 2008. A petition for rehearing was denied on December 5, 2008 (App., infra, 47a). On February 20, 2009, Justice Alito extended the time within which to file a petition for a writ of certiorari to and including

April 6, 2009. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The First Amendment to the United States Constitution provides in relevant part that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech." The pertinent statutory provisions are reprinted in an appendix to this petition. App., infra, 48a-53a.

STATEMENT

This case involves a facial First Amendment challenge to 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(4), a provision of the Bankruptcy Code that regulates paid bankruptcy advice. Congress has established certain minimum standards of professional conduct for bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, and other "debt relief agencies" that charge consumer debtors for bankruptcy assistance. Section 526(a)(4) provides, inter alia, that debt relief agencies may not advise clients to incur additional debt "in contemplation of" filing a bankruptcy petition. The district court declared Section 526(a)(4) facially invalid under the First Amendment. A divided panel of the court of appeals affirmed. Shortly thereafter, the Fifth Circuit upheld Section 526(a)(4) against a substantially similar challenge and endorsed the reasoning of the dissenting opinion in this case. Hersh v. United States ex rel. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 743 (2008), petition for cert. pending, No. 08-1174 (filed Mar. 18, 2009).

1. Congress enacted Section 526(a)(4) as part of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act (BAPCPA), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, "a comprehensive package of reform measures" designed "to improve bankruptcy law and practice by restoring personal responsibility and integrity in the bankruptcy system and ensure that the system is fair for both debtors and creditors." H.R. Rep. No. 31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. 1, at 2 (2005) (House Report). Described by the House Report as "the most comprehensive set of [bankruptcy] reforms in more than 25 years," id. at 3, the BAPCPA both modified the substantive standards for bankruptcy relief and adopted new measures intended to curb a variety of abusive practices that Congress concluded had come to pervade the bankruptcy system.

After extensive hearings, Congress determined that misleading and abusive practices by bankruptcy professionals, including attorneys, had become a substantial cause of unnecessary bankruptcy petitions and, in some circumstances, jeopardized debtors' ability to obtain a discharge of their debts. For example, Congress heard evidence that a civil enforcement initiative undertaken by the United States Trustee Program had "consistently identified * * * misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" as among the sources of abuse in the bankruptcy system. House Report 5 (citation omitted). Congress responded by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." Id. at 17.

The BAPCPA added or strengthened several regulations on bankruptcy professionals' conduct. Those regulations are intended to protect the clients and prospective clients of bankruptcy professionals, the creditors of clients who do enter bankruptcy, and the bankruptcy system. The regulations require additional disclosures to clients about their rights and the professional's responsibilities; they protect clients against being overcharged, or charged for services never provided; and they discourage misuse of the bankruptcy system.

See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 110(b)-(h), 526-528, 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). Many of the regulations apply equally to bankruptcy attorneys, to bankruptcy petition preparers who are not attorneys, and to all other professionals who provide bankruptcy assistance to consumer debtors for a fee; those professionals are collectively termed "debt relief agenc[ies]." 11 U.S.C. 101(12A).[1]

Section 526 sets out four basic rules of professional conduct for debt relief agencies. Section 526(a)(1) requires debt relief agencies to perform all promised services. Section 526(a)(2) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising an assisted person to make statements that are untrue or misleading in seeking bankruptcy relief. Section 526(a)(3) precludes debt relief agencies from misrepresenting the services they will provide or the benefits and risks attendant to filing for bankruptcy. And Section 526(a)(4), the provision held unconstitutional below, states:

> A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

[1] The term "bankruptcy assistance" is defined to include providing an "assisted person" with advice, counsel (including "legal representation"), or document preparation or filing assistance "with respect to a case or proceeding under" the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. 101(4A). An "assisted person" is "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts" and whose nonexempt property is worth less than a specified, inflation-adjusted amount, currently $164,250. 11 U.S.C. 101(3); see 11 U.S.C. 104(a); 72 Fed. Reg. 7082 (2007).

The principal remedy for violations of Section 526 is a civil action by the debtor to recover the debtor's "actual damages," including any fees already paid. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2). The statute also authorizes state attorneys general to sue for debtors' actual damages or for injunctive relief to prevent violations. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(3). The bankruptcy court may also impose an injunction or an "appropriate civil monetary penalty" for intentional or recurring violations, either on its own motion or at the request of the United States Trustee or the debtor. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(5).

2. Respondents are a law firm, two of the firm's attorneys, and two prospective clients. App., infra, 1a-2a.[2] They filed this action against the United States, seeking a declaratory judgment that the attorney respondents are not obligated to comply with several of the BAPCPA's provisions regulating debt relief agencies' professional conduct, including the advice limitation in Section 526(a)(4). Respondents contended that licensed attorneys are not "debt relief agencies" within the meaning of the statute even if they provide bankruptcy-related advice to debtors. They also claimed that, to the extent the statute encompasses licensed attorneys, Section 526(a)(4) and other provisions of the BAPCPA violate the First Amendment. Id. at 2a.

The district court denied the government's motion to dismiss, App., infra, 29a-44a, and then granted summary judgment for respondents, id. at 45a. The court held that Section 526(a)(4) and the other challenged provisions violate the First Amendment. Id. at 33a-41a.

[2] The district court denied the prospective clients leave to proceed pseudonymously, App., infra, 31a-33a, and they disclosed their identities in an amended complaint, see 05-CV-2626 Docket entry No. 34, at 3 (D. Minn. Dec. 15, 2006).

The court further held that attorneys do not fall within the statutory definition of "debt relief agency." Id. at 41a-43a.

3. The government appealed, contending in relevant part that attorneys unambiguously fall within the definition of "debt relief agency" and that the district court's constitutional holding was premised on a misreading of Section 526(a)(4). Gov't C.A. Br. 18-41, 49-54. The government explained that the phrase "in contemplation of" bankruptcy is a term of art with a specialized meaning. Based on that established understanding, the government argued, Section 526(a)(4) should be construed to forbid only advice that a client take on new debt on the eve of bankruptcy with the intent of abusing the bankruptcy system. The government further contended that, to the extent the term "in contemplation of" is ambiguous, the doctrine of constitutional avoidance supports the government's narrow reading of the term, which avoids the overbreadth that the district court perceived.

4. The court of appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court unanimously agreed that attorneys may fall within the definition of "debt relief agency," but held by a divided vote that Section 526(a)(4) violates the First Amendment. App., infra, 1a-28a.[3]

a. The court of appeals rejected the government's proposed narrowing construction of Section 526(a)(4). App., infra, 12a. The court concluded that, under the only permissible interpretation of the statute's "plain language," Section 526(a)(4) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising consumer clients "to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy," ibid., and that "this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent prebankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws," id. at 13a.

Based on that broad construction, the court of appeals held that Section 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad.[4] App., infra, 12a-14a. The court explained that advice to take on new debt just before bankruptcy will sometimes be legitimate. As examples, the court observed that "it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments," or to purchase a car to ensure "dependable transportation * * * to and from work." Id. at 13a-14a. And the court stated that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist." Id. at 14a. The court concluded that the First Amendment precludes regulation of such legitimate advice, and it noted its agreement with three district courts that had reached the same conclusion. See id. at 13a & n.8 (citing, inter alia, Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 25 (N.D. Tex. 2006)).

The court of appeals did not identify the precise constitutional standard under which respondents' challenge should be evaluated. Respondents had argued that

[4] The court of appeals did not limit its holding to the plaintiffs before it, but stated more generally that the statute was "unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies." App., infra, 12a; see id. at 10a n.7, 15a, 21a; see also id. at 23a n.13 (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Nothing in the court of appeals' statutory and First Amendment analysis, moreover, suggests that the court would reach a different conclusion regarding the statute's application to non-attorney professionals who provide bankruptcy advice.

strict scrutiny should apply, while the government had contended that Section 526(a)(4) is a reasonable regulation of attorneys' professional conduct that is to be reviewed more deferentially under the standard announced in Gentile v. State Bar, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071-1076 (1991). The court acknowledged that the government had a "legitimate interest" in prohibiting advice that would assist debtors in abusing the bankruptcy system by accumulating more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. App., infra, 12a. But the court held that, on its reading of Section 526(a)(4), the statute was insufficiently connected to that legitimate interest and therefore was unconstitutional under either strict scrutiny or the Gentile standard. Id. at 12a-13a.

b. Judge Colloton dissented in relevant part. He explained that, in his view, "[t]he text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for a narrowing construction," under which "the statute should be construed to prohibit only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system." App., infra, 25a. He would have held that the statute, so construed, is constitutional. See id. at 22a, 25a, 28a.

First, Judge Colloton observed that the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" is a term of art that "has been construed * * * to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." App., infra, 25a; see id. at 25a-26a (collecting authorities). Second, Judge Colloton pointed out that the remedies for a violation of Section 526(a)(4) "emphasize actual damages," and he reasoned that a debtor who follows his attorney's bankruptcy advice is unlikely to be harmed as a result unless he is induced to file "an abusive bankruptcy petition, where the debtor may suffer damages if the petition is dismissed as abusive." Id. at 27a (citing 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1)). Third, Judge Colloton pointed to legislative history that showed Congress's desire to address "abusive" practices by bankruptcy professionals and by debtors who "knowingly load up" on debt before filing for bankruptcy. Id. at 27a-28a (quoting House Report 5, 15). The dissent concluded: "Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that [respondents] say[] is absurd, that the [government] says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005." Id. at 28a.

5. The court of appeals denied rehearing en banc by a vote of 6-5. See App., infra, 47a.

6. Thirteen days later, the Fifth Circuit upheld Section 526(a)(4) against a substantially similar First Amendment challenge, reversing one of the district court opinions on which the court of appeals in this case relied. Hersh, 553 F.3d at 752-764; see App., infra, 13a n.8. The court endorsed the reasoning and the authorities in Judge Colloton's dissenting opinion. See 553 F.3d at 750 n.6, 759 n.17.

7. Respondents have filed their own petition for a writ of certiorari, which seeks review of the court of appeals' holding that attorneys may be "debt relief agencies" for purposes of Section 526, as well as its holding (see note 3, supra) that Section 528's disclosure requirements are valid. See Pet. at ii, Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, No. 08-1119 (filed Mar. 5, 2009). The government will address that petition in a separate response.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

A divided panel of the court of appeals has invalidated an Act of Congress, even though the statute can constitutionally be applied to a significant range of conduct. The court failed to give due regard to a narrowing construction that eliminates the perceived constitutional difficulty, and its ruling squarely conflicts with a Fifth Circuit decision that adopted the constitutionally unproblematic construction that the court rejected in this case. The Eighth Circuit's decision also threatens to undermine the important reforms that Congress crafted, after years of study, to reduce the abuse of the bankruptcy system, including abuse encouraged by lawyers. This Court's review is warranted to prevent those harms, to resolve the circuit conflict, and to effectuate Congress's efforts to craft a federal remedy for the provision of abusive bankruptcy advice.

I. THE CIRCUITS ARE IN CONFLICT OVER THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AN ACT OF CONGRESS

The court of appeals' decision in this case squarely conflicts with the Fifth Circuit's resolution of the same statutory and constitutional issues as are presented here. As the Fifth Circuit has recognized, Section 526(a)(4) imposes a modest requirement to refrain from urging a debtor to accumulate eve-of-filing debt that would abuse the bankruptcy system. The court of appeals here imposed its own, much more expansive construction and then struck down the statute, so interpreted, as overbroad. As a result, attorneys in the Eighth Circuit who qualify as "debt relief agencies" are free to urge even the most abusive practices without being subject to the federal sanctions and client-protection measures set out in Section 526(a)(4) and (c).

A. In Hersh v. United States ex rel. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 743 (5th Cir. 2008), petition for cert. pending, No. 08-1174 (filed Mar. 18, 2009), a bankruptcy attorney challenged Section 526(a)(4) on grounds substantially similar to those respondents raised here. Hersh contended that Section 526(a)(4) unambiguously prohibits attorneys from advising clients who are considering bankruptcy to incur any additional debt, and that Section 526(a)(4) so construed is unconstitutionally overbroad. Id. at 747 & n.3, 754, 762. A unanimous Fifth Circuit panel rejected both of these arguments. Id. at 752-764. The Fifth Circuit acknowledged the court of appeals' contrary holding in this case but stated that it "agree[d] with Judge Colloton's dissenting opinion." Id. at 750 n.6.[5]

1. The Fifth Circuit in Hersh agreed with the government that Section 526(a)(4) can be construed in a way that focuses directly on Congress's acknowledged purpose in enacting it: preventing attorneys from encouraging their clients to "load up" on debt to abuse the bankruptcy system. 553 F.3d at 758-761. The court noted that the term "in contemplation of bankruptcy" is often used as a term of art that connotes an intent to abuse the bankruptcy system. Id. at 758 (citing Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (Black's Law Dictionary)). Indeed, a few years before Congress enacted the BAPCPA, the Fifth Circuit itself had described the abusive practice of "incurring card debt in contemplation of bankruptcy" with the term "loading up." Id. at

[5] Like the respondents in this case, Hersh also argued that attorneys cannot be "debt relief agencies" subject to the restrictions imposed by Section 526(a)(4). See 553 F.3d at 751-752. The Fifth Circuit rejected that argument, id. at 752, as the court of appeals unanimously did here, see App., infra, 3a-10a.

758-759 (quoting AT&T Universal Card Servs. v. Mercer (In re Mercer), 246 F.3d 391, 421 n.43 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc)). The Fifth Circuit in Hersh noted that Judge Colloton had adopted the same reasoning in this case, and it cited Judge Colloton's dissenting opinion for additional supporting sources. Id. at 759 & n.17.

The court in Hersh also explained that the structure of Section 526 supported the specialized interpretation described above. See 553 F.3d at 759-760, 761. Like Judge Colloton, see App., infra, 26a-27a, the Fifth Circuit pointed out that violations of Section 526 may be remedied by awarding the debtor actual damages, which strongly suggests that the practices banned are practices that would actually harm the debtor. See 553 F.3d at 760. And the court noted that Section 526(a)(4) was enacted alongside, and placed together with, "three other rules of professional conduct designed to protect debtors." Id. at 761 (citing 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(1)-(3)).

The court in Hersh agreed with Judge Colloton that the legislative history and purpose of the BAPCPA supported its construction of Section 526(a)(4). It explained that numerous elements of the BAPCPA were demonstrably "intended to curb abuse," which the court took as further evidence that "as part of this plan, section 526(a)(4) is only meant to curb abusive practices." 553 F.3d at 761; accord App., infra, 26a-27a (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

2. The Fifth Circuit further explained that, even if its reading of Section 526(a)(4) were not the most natural interpretation of the statute, that reading would be compelled by the doctrine of constitutional avoidance. The court identified numerous cases in which this Court had adopted an arguably countertextual construction in the interest of constitutional avoidance, including Boos

v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312 (1988), on which Judge Colloton had relied significantly, see App., infra, 23a-24a. See 553 F.3d at 756-758. As the Fifth Circuit noted, the avoidance doctrine may even require giving "[a] restrictive meaning [to] what appear to be plain words." Id. at 757 (quoting United States v. Witkovich, 353 U.S. 194, 199 (1957)) (first brackets in original).

The Fifth Circuit acknowledged Hersh's argument, identical to that advanced by respondents and endorsed by the court below, that the text of Section 526(a)(4) is so unambiguous that no narrowing construction is possible. See 553 F.3d at 754. The court concluded, however, that "the language of [the statute] can and should be interpreted only to prohibit attorneys from advising clients to incur debt in contemplation of bankruptcy when doing so would be an abuse or improper manipulation of the bankruptcy system." Id. at 761; see id. at 756. The court explained that, on that reading, "[S]ection 526(a)(4) has no application to good faith advice to engage in conduct that is consistent with a debtor's interest and does not abuse or improperly manipulate the bankruptcy system." Id. at 761.

3. The Fifth Circuit concluded that, if Section 526(a)(4) is construed in this manner, it is not facially unconstitutional. The court explained that a statute is not unconstitutionally overbroad unless the "overbreadth is substantial in relation to the statute's legitimate reach." 553 F.3d at 762 (citing United States v. Williams, 128 S. Ct. 1830, 1838 (2008)). Hersh did not dispute that Congress could validly regulate the sort of advice to engage in abusive conduct that all parties agreed was covered by Section 526(a)(4). See id. at 754-

756.[6] And under the court's narrowing construction, Section 526(a)(4) did not apply to any of Hersh's examples of speech that could not constitutionally be prohibited. Id. at 763. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit found it "clear that the potential for the statute to prohibit protected speech is not by any means substantial in relation to the statute's legitimate reach." Id. at 764.

B. The Fifth Circuit's decision cannot be reconciled with the decision below. The Fifth Circuit adopted the government's proposed construction of Section 526(a)(4), whereas the court below found that construction to be foreclosed by the statutory text. As a result of those divergent statutory interpretations, the Fifth Circuit upheld the statute against a First Amendment challenge, while the court below invalidated Section 526(a)(4) as an unconstitutional infringement on the right of attorneys to provide non-abusive bankruptcy-related advice. And the Eighth Circuit, by a closely divided vote, has declined to reconsider its position en banc. App., infra, 47a.

[6] The Fifth Circuit in Hersh noted various contexts in which the First Amendment permits Congress and the States to regulate that sort of unethical attorney advice. For instance, the First Amendment does not protect speech proposing an illegal transaction, and abusive accumulation of debt may amount to fraud or theft. See 553 F.3d at 755 (citing Village of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 496 (1982)). Further, the government has a sufficiently important interest in the judicial process, including the bankruptcy system, to justify regulation of attorneys' unethical conduct affecting that process. See id. at 755-756 (citing Gentile v. State Bar, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991), and Model Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 1.2(d)). The court in Hersh explained that the abusive accumulation of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy "is akin to committing a fraudulent act," and therefore "Congress can constitutionally prevent attorneys or other debt relief agencies from advising their clients to [commit such an act]." Id. at 756.

The question presented here is a recurring one, as substantially similar challenges to Section 526(a)(4) are also pending in the Second and Ninth Circuits.[7] Review by this Court is warranted to resolve the division in the courts of appeals over the constitutionality of this important federal statute.

II. THE COURT OF APPEALS ERRED IN HOLDING SECTION 526(a)(4) UNCONSTITUTIONALLY OVERBROAD

The court of appeals' decision in this case is erroneous. The court below acknowledged that Congress had a "legitimate interest" in restricting bankruptcy professionals from peddling abusive strategies to individuals who are facing bankruptcy. App., infra, 12a. The government construes the statute to further that interest directly, by prohibiting only advice that would lead to intentional abuse of the bankruptcy system.

The court of appeals did not dispute that Congress could enact such a prohibition without violating the First Amendment. Rather, the court held that Section 526(a)(4) unambiguously sweeps in other attorney advice, unrelated to abuse of the bankruptcy system, and that the statute is therefore fatally overbroad. Both the statutory premise and the constitutional conclusion are flawed. As the text, structure, and purposes of Section 526(a)(4) make clear, Congress forbade only advice to incur new debt for the purpose of abusing the bankruptcy system or defrauding creditors. That prohibition is consistent with the First Amendment.

[7] See Zelotes v. Adams, No. 07-1853 (2d Cir. argued Oct. 10, 2008); Connecticut Bar Ass'n v. United States, No. 08-5901 (2d Cir.) (argument not yet scheduled); Olsen v. Holder, No. 07-35616 (9th Cir.) (argument not yet scheduled).

A. The court of appeals rejected the government's interpretation of Section 526(a)(4) in a single sentence, asserting that the statute's "plain language" precludes any construction other than the unconstitutionally overbroad one. App., infra, 12a. The court did not identify any statutory term that unambiguously compelled such a reading. Rather, without quoting the statutory text, the court stated that "[Section] 526(a)(4) broadly prohibits a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Ibid. But the statute does not use the temporal phrase "when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Rather, the statute forbids advising the client "to incur more debt in contemplation of [bankruptcy]." 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(4) (emphasis added). The difference is significant, as Judge Colloton explained.

The statute's reference to debt incurred "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]" is reasonably read to mean debt incurred with the expectation of using the bankruptcy discharge to avoid full repayment. As Judge Colloton observed, "the phrase 'in contemplation of' has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." App., infra, 25a; see, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary 336 (defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "[t]he thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding") (emphasis added). Indeed, more than a century of "American and English authorities construing the bankruptcy laws also support the proposition that the words 'in contemplation of' may be understood to require an intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws." App., infra, 25a (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); see id. at 25a-26a (citing cases); accord Hersh, 553 F.3d at 758-760. Congress's use of an established term of art may reasonably be understood to incorporate the same meaning that those authorities have given it. See, e.g., Wilkie v. Robbins, 127 S. Ct. 2588, 2605 (2007).

The Eighth Circuit did not rebut the dissent's understanding of prior judicial decisions construing the phrase "in contemplation of" in the bankruptcy context. Nor did the court identify any reason to believe that Congress, in enacting Section 526(a)(4), intended to depart from that prior understanding. Indeed, the court did not respond to the dissent's analysis at all; it simply asserted without explanation that "the plain language of the statute does not permit this narrow interpretation." App., infra, 12a.

The statutory context and structure support the reading of the term "in contemplation of" that was endorsed by the dissent below and adopted by the Fifth Circuit in Hersh. See, e.g., Dolan v. USPS, 546 U.S. 481, 486 (2006) ("A word in a statute may or may not extend to the outer limits of its definitional possibilities. Interpretation of a word or phrase depends upon reading the whole statutory text, considering the purpose and context of the statute, and consulting any precedents or authorities that inform the analysis."). The other three subdivisions of Section 526(a) unambiguously establish rules of professional conduct designed to protect debtors from abusive practices by the attorneys and other debt relief agencies who advise them. See 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(1) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from failing to perform promised services); 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(2) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from advising debtors to make false or misleading statements to obtain bankruptcy relief); 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(3) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from misrepresenting to debtors the risks or benefits of bankruptcy). Section 526(a)(4)'s placement alongside these other restrictions indicates that it is likewise properly read to target unethical communications by bankruptcy professionals—not, as the court below held, all manner of lawful and ethical attorney advice. See Hersh, 553 F.3d at 761.

Furthermore, the principal remedy for violation of each of Section 526's rules of professional conduct is a suit against the attorney (or other debt relief agency) to recover the debtor's "actual damages," as well as restitution of any fees paid by the debtor. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2). Congress's emphasis on the debtor's "actual damages" presupposes that the debtor has been injured by the attorney's conduct. As Judge Colloton noted, "legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all." App., infra, 27a; accord Hersh, 553 F.3d at 759-760.

"In enacting the BAPCPA, Congress was attempting to address common abuses of the bankruptcy system. Congress concluded that there was a pervasive abuse * * * by debtors who incur debt before bankruptcy with the intention of having their debt discharged." Hersh, 553 F.3d at 760 (citing House Report 15). Construing Section 526(a)(4) in a way that focuses precisely on that goal is perfectly consistent with the statutory text, structure, and purpose.

B. Even if the court of appeals' broad reading of the statute were the most natural one, the court erred in adopting an interpretation that resulted in invalidating the statute when a plausible alternative reading is constitutionally unproblematic. Particularly in the context of a First Amendment overbreadth challenge, where the plaintiff's demand is to declare a statute invalid even though it may be legitimately applied in some or many circumstances, the federal courts have not only "the power to adopt narrowing constructions," but "the duty to avoid constitutional difficulties by doing so if such a construction is fairly possible." Boos, 485 U.S. at 330-331; see also, e.g., Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 612 (1973). Indeed, respondents themselves urged the court of appeals to construe another provision, the term "debt relief agency," to avoid the same constitutional overbreadth objection. E.g., Resp. C.A. Br. 17 ("A statute should be interpreted so as to avoid constitutional issues."). The term "debt relief agency," however, has a statutory definition that forecloses respondents' proposed construction. See 11 U.S.C. 101(12A) (defining "debt relief agency" as "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for * * * payment"); App., infra, 6a-10a. By contrast, the phrase "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]" is not defined and can reasonably be read to avoid constitutional problems, particularly in light of its status as a term of art in the bankruptcy context.

This Court has repeatedly applied saving constructions to avoid constitutional difficulties, even without the firm grounding in statutory text and context that the Fifth Circuit's reading of Section 526(a)(4) has. For instance, in Boos, this Court considered a First Amendment overbreadth challenge to a federal statute that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." 485

U.S. at 329. The Court acknowledged that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic * * * because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330. Nevertheless, in accordance with the "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties" when a narrowing "construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute to apply "'only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present'"—a limitation that was unstated in the statute but ensured the validity of the Act. Id. at 330-331 (citation omitted). See also, e.g., Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 689 (2001); Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 576-578 (1988).

Federal courts construe federal statutes to avoid, not invite, constitutional difficulties. E.g., Boos, 485 U.S. at 331. The court of appeals disregarded that important principle when it invalidated Section 526(a)(4) without adverting to the doctrine of constitutional avoidance or explaining why its interpretation of the disputed provision was the only plausible reading.

C. Even if the court of appeals' construction were so clearly required by the text of the statute as to overcome the avoidance doctrine, the court's overbreadth analysis would still be deficient. Because "invalidating a law that in some of its applications is perfectly constitutional * * * has obvious harmful effects," this Court has "vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute's overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Williams, 128 S. Ct. at 1838. The court of appeals failed to adhere to that principle when it struck down Section 526(a)(4) without giving proper weight to the statute's many legitimate applications.

Advice to engage in conduct that amounts to an abuse of the bankruptcy system is plainly subject to congressional regulation. Congress, the state legislatures and state bars, and the federal and state courts routinely require attorneys to abide by professional standards like Section 526(a)(4). Indeed, the conduct that Section 526(a)(4) targets falls squarely within the scope of Rule 1.2(d) of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which prohibits attorneys from advising their clients to engage in fraud. See, e.g., Attorney Grievance Comm'n v. Culver, 849 A.2d 423, 443-444 (Md. 2004) (disciplining an attorney for advising and assisting a client to load up on debt before declaring bankruptcy). Those requirements serve valid and important governmental interests, both in protecting clients from unethical advice and in protecting the judicial process and other litigants from the harm that ensues when clients follow that unethical advice. As the Fifth Circuit noted, the constitutionality of Rule 1.2(d) has never been in doubt. Hersh, 553 F.3d at 756. Section 526(a)(4) regulates the very same conduct.

Section 526(a)(4) therefore may validly be applied to a significant category of unethical attorney advice. Against that legitimate sweep, the court below hypothesized two instances of legitimate, ethical advice to accumulate new debt on the eve of bankruptcy: buying a car and refinancing a mortgage.[8] App., infra, 13a-14a. The court added that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist." Id. at 14a. On that slim and concededly "hypothetical" basis, the majority held the statute unconstitutional as applied to all attorney conduct, including the abusive practices at which Section 526(a)(4) was directly aimed.

[8] The court assumed that merely refinancing an existing mortgage—that is, exchanging one loan for another with the same principal balance but a different interest rate, repayment period, or other terms—would constitute incurring "more debt" within the meaning of the statute. See App., infra, 13a. It is not at all clear that this understanding is correct.

As Judge Colloton correctly pointed out, "a facial challenge resting on a 'few hypothetical situations' * * * is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because 'the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge.'" App., infra, 24a (quoting Members of the City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 800 (1984)). The court of appeals here did no more than posit "some impermissible applications" of Section 526(a)(4). Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. at 800. The court did note this Court's admonition that First Amendment challenges of this sort require substantial overbreadth compared to the statute's valid coverage. App., infra, 15a n.10. But the court merely asserted that "[Section] 526(a)(4) is substantially overbroad," id. at 15a, without ever explaining how its "few hypothetical situations" supported that conclusion.

III. THE QUESTION PRESENTED IS IMPORTANT

As this Court has repeatedly observed, judging the constitutionality of an Act of Congress is "the gravest and most delicate duty that this Court is called upon to perform." Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 64 (1981) (quoting Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142, 148 (1927) (Holmes, J.)). The federal statute at issue here serves an important function in the administration of the Nation's bankruptcy laws, and the circuit conflict over the validity of that statute warrants this Court's review.

"The principal purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to grant a 'fresh start' to the 'honest but unfortunate debtor.'" Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 549 U.S. 365, 367 (2007) (quoting Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 286-287 (1991)). Section 526(a)(4) is an important part of Congress's effort to preserve that focus on the "honest but unfortunate debtor" by curbing abuse of the bankruptcy system, including abuse that comes at the suggestion of a bankruptcy professional. By invalidating Section 526(a)(4), the court of appeals has frustrated that effort, and the conflict between the decision below and the Fifth Circuit's decision in Hersh also undermines Congress's decision "[t]o establish * * * uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States." U.S. Const. Art. I, § 8, Cl. 4 (emphasis added); cf., e.g., Railway Labor Executives' Ass'n v. Gibbons, 455 U.S. 457, 465-466, 471-472 (1982) (discussing the importance the Framers placed on uniform bankruptcy rules).

A. Congress has long been aware that the relief afforded by the bankruptcy laws creates a perverse incentive for debtors to amass additional debt in contemplation of obtaining a discharge. Congress has recognized that such conduct poses a fundamental threat to the Code's twin goals of affording debtors a fresh start while providing an orderly and equitable system of resolving creditors' claims. For example, when Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C), which creates a presumption that certain eve-of-bankruptcy debts are not dischargeable, the accompanying Senate Report emphasized that "[e]xcessive debts incurred within a short period prior to the filing of the petition present a special problem: that of 'loading up' in contemplation of bankruptcy." S. Rep. No. 65, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1983). The report explained that "[a] debtor planning [to] file a petition with the bankruptcy court has a strong economic incentive to incur dischargeable debts for either consumable goods or exempt property," noting that "[i]n many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent." Ibid. As the report concluded, "[n]ot only does this result in direct losses for the creditors that are the victims of the spree, but it also creates a higher absolute level of debt so that all creditors receive less in liquidation. During this period of insolvency preceding the filing of the petition, creditors would not extend credit if they knew the true facts." Ibid. As early as 1973, Congress was informed that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge." Report of the Commission on the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 137, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. I, at 11 (1973).

Congress has accordingly enacted a number of protections against eve-of-bankruptcy attempts to abuse the system's protections. For instance, it authorized bankruptcy courts to dismiss a petition for "substantial abuse," 11 U.S.C. 707(b) (2000), which could include the debtor's purposeful accumulation of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. E.g., Price v. United States Tr. (In re Price), 353 F.3d 1135, 1139-1140 (9th Cir. 2004). It precluded debtors from obtaining a discharge for debts obtained fraudulently. 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(A). And it provided that certain categories of debts are presumed to be fraudulent and nondischargeable if they are incurred on the eve of bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C) (2000).

B. When Congress enacted the BAPCPA in 2005, the House Report expressed concern that those earlier measures had not adequately restricted the ability of debtors to "knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." House Report 15. Accordingly, Congress strengthened each of the aforementioned protections against bankruptcy abuse. See, e.g., BAPCPA § 310, 119 Stat. 84 (11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C)). Most fundamentally, Congress greatly expanded the bankruptcy courts' authority to dismiss petitions for "abuse" of the bankruptcy system, including in cases in which debtors purposefully incur additional debt in contemplation of filing a petition. See BAPCPA § 102, 119 Stat. 27; House Report 48-49. Congress permitted dismissal of a petition based on a less stringent showing of abuse; authorized "any party in interest" to file a motion to dismiss for abuse (except in some cases involving lower-income debtors); repealed the pre-existing presumption in favor of granting the relief sought by the debtor; and specified that bankruptcy courts must consider, in determining whether a petition should be dismissed for abuse when no presumption applies, "whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith" and whether "the totality of the circumstances * * * of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1), (3) and (6); see House Report 49.

Congress also made another significant change, which heightened the importance of the professional-conduct regulations at issue in this case. The "principal consumer bankruptcy reform" in the 2005 legislation was the adoption of a "means testing" mechanism intended to ensure that debtors who have the ability to repay at least some of their debts will do so, through a structured repayment plan entered under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, instead of obtaining a complete discharge under Chapter 7. House Report 48; see id. at 2 (describing means testing as the "heart" of the 2005 Act's reform provisions). See generally 11 U.S.C. 109(b) and (e) (eligibility for Chapter 7 and Chapter 13).

Under the means test, a debtor's petition for complete relief under Chapter 7 is presumed to be abusive if the debtor's current monthly income exceeds his statutorily allowed expenses, including payments for secured debt, by more than a prescribed amount. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i) and (iii). If the court finds a petition to be abusive under this standard, it can dismiss the debtor's case or, with the debtor's consent, convert it to Chapter 13, which involves a repayment plan. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). The means test, however, exacerbates the incentive for debtors to manipulate the system by "loading up" on certain debt in contemplation of filing, because payments on secured debts that qualify under Section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) reduce the amount of the debtor's monthly income counted in the means test, and may therefore allow the debtor to remain eligible for a complete and immediate discharge of unsecured debt under Chapter 7.

C. Congress was accordingly concerned that the introduction of the means test would give attorneys an incentive to counsel their clients to take on additional debt before filing for bankruptcy. As one bankruptcy judge testified, "[t]he more debt that is incurred prior to filing, the more likely the debtor will qualify for chapter 7." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998: Hearing on H.R. 3150 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Admin- istrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., 2d Sess. Pt. I, at 25 (1998) (statement of Judge Randall J. Newsome). Thus, the bankruptcy judge testified that, "[p]erverse as it may seem, I can envision debtor's counsel advising their clients to buy the most expensive car that someone will sell them, and sign on to the biggest payment they can afford (at least until the bankruptcy is filed) as a way of increasing their deductions under [the means test]." Ibid.; see also B9ankruptcy Reform Act of 1999: Hearing on H.R. 833 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Administrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 106th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. II, at 30 (1999) (statement of Judge William Brown). And as discussed above, see p. 3, supra, Congress credited evidence compiled by the United States Trustee Program that "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals [and] problems associated with bankruptcy petition preparers." House Report 5 (quoting Antonia G. Darling & Mark A. Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: The Civil Enforcement Initiative, Am. Bankr. Inst. J., Sept. 2002, at 12).

Section 526(a)(4) is an important component of Congress's effort to prevent such efforts to circumvent of the means test. If a debtor is made financially worse off by following his attorney's unethical advice to incur more debt in an attempt to take advantage of the bankruptcy system, Section 526 provides him a remedy against the attorney, including both a refund of attorney's fees and actual damages. Section 526 also ensures that attorneys will be subject to a concrete sanction for giving such unethical advice; while state bars have a significant role to play in disciplining attorneys for unethical conduct, the additional remedy provided by Section 526 is both more uniform and more certain. Section 526 also facilitates the client's cooperation through its fee-shifting provision, 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2), whereas a state bar must rely on public-spirited complainants.

Section 526(a)(4) thus serves both a compensatory and a deterrent function within Congress's carefully designed framework for reducing well-documented ways of abusing the bankruptcy system. The court of appeals' decision invalidating that important tool raises an important question that is worthy of this Court's review.

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS
FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

No. 07-2405

MILAVETZ, GALLOP & MILAVETZ, P.A.;
ROBERT J. MILAVETZ; BARBARA N. NEVIN;

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, APPELLANT

COMMERCIAL LAW LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
AMICUS ON BEHALF OF APPELLEE

Submitted: Mar. 11, 2008
Filed: Sept. 4, 2008
(Corrected Sept. 23, 2008)

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES
DISTRICT COURT FOR THE
DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA

Before: BYE, SMITH, and COLLOTON, Circuit Judges.

SMITH, Circuit Judge.

Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A., a law firm that practices bankruptcy law, the firm's president, a bankruptcy attorney within the firm, and two clients[1] who sought bankruptcy advice from the firm brought suit against the United States seeking a declaratory judgment that certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA)—11 U.S.C. §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)—did not apply to attorneys and law firms and are unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs and issued an order declaring that: (1) attorneys in the District of Minnesota were excluded from the definition of a "debt relief agency" as defined by BAPCPA; and (2) the challenged provisions were unconstitutional as applied to attorneys in the District of Minnesota. We affirm in part and reverse in part.

I. Background

On April 20, 2005, BAPCPA was signed into law, amending and adding multiple sections of the Bankruptcy Code ("the Code"). While some of these amendments became effective immediately, the vast majority became effective on October 17, 2005. See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 1501(a), 119 Stat. 23 (2005) ("Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act and the amendments made by this act shall take effect 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act").

[1] The client-plaintiffs sought prebankruptcy advice regarding the incurrence of additional debt prior to filing bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Code precludes a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person from incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Thus, these client-plaintiffs are appearing on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated who desire to exercise their First Amendment rights with attorneys regarding bankruptcy information.

One BAPCPA amendment added a new term, "debt relief agency," which is defined in § 101(12A) of the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A).[2] The amended Code restricts some actions of debt relief agencies, while requiring them to do others. See 11 U.S.C. § 526 ("Restrictions on debt relief agencies"); 11 U.S.C. § 528 ("Requirements for debt relief agencies"). For example, § 526(a)(4) bars a debt relief agency from advising a client "to incur more debt in contemplation" of a bankruptcy filing, 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), while §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure in their bankruptcy-related advertisements directed to the general public declaring: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code[,]' or a substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The plaintiffs sought alternative remedies. First, plaintiffs requested a declaratory judgment that attorneys did not fall within the definition of "debt relief agency." If the court determined that attorneys fell within the definition of debt relief agency, they challenged the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), as applied to attorneys.

II. Discussion

A. Debt Relief Agencies

Initially, we address whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies. If they do not, we will have no need to address the constitutionality of §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2), which only apply to debt relief agencies. See Holtan v. Black, 838 F.2d

[2] Prior to BAPCPA, the term "debt relief agency" did not exist in the Code.

984, 986 n.3 (8th Cir. 1988) ("Federal courts must avoid passing upon constitutional questions unless they are essential to the disposition of the issues before them.") (citing Three Affiliated Tribes v. Wold Engineering, 467 U.S. 138, 157 (1984) ("It is a fundamental rule of judicial restraint, however, that this Court will not reach constitutional questions in advance of necessity of deciding them")).

> The term "debt relief agency" means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include—
> > (A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;
> >
> > (B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;
> >
> > (C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;
> >
> > (D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or

> (E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (emphasis added).

Further, the Code defines the term "bankruptcy assistance" to mean:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

Id. at § 101(4A) (emphasis added).

Additionally, the Code defines the term "assisted person" as "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $164,250."[3] Id. at § 101(3).

The plaintiffs argue that attorneys are not "debt relief agencies" because the definition of debt relief agencies makes no direct reference to attorneys, even though "attorney" is a defined term in the Code, id. at § 101(4),[4] but does include the term "bankruptcy petition pre-

[3] When this suit was commenced, the dollar amount in § 101(3) was $150,000. Subsequently, on April 1, 2007, the amount was adjusted pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 104. The change, however, is inconsequential for purposes of this case.

[4] "The term 'attorney' means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law." 11 U.S.C. § 101(4). This definition makes no reference to "debt relief agencies" or to subsection (12A).

parer" which, by definition, excludes debtor's attorneys and their staff. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1).[5] Plaintiffs contend that the omission of any reference to attorneys or lawyers while specifically including bankruptcy petition preparers shows Congress's intent to exclude attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies. Because the plaintiffs contend that constitutionality issues arise in §§ 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) if attorneys are debt relief agencies, they assert that the doctrine of constitutional avoidance should be used to interpret "debt relief agency" to exclude attorneys and thus avoid the potential constitutional issues.

Conversely, the government argues that attorneys are debt relief agencies because the broadly worded definition of the term plainly includes attorneys, see 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (defining "debt relief agency" as "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment"), and providing legal representation is included in definition of bankruptcy assistance. See id. at 101(4A) ("bankruptcy assistance means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing . . . advice, counsel, . . . or legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title").

[5] "'[B]ankruptcy petition preparer' means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing [by the debtor in connection with his bankruptcy case]." 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1) (emphasis added); see also id. at § 110(a)(2) (defining "document for filing" as used in § 110(a)(1)).

Whether attorneys fall within the Code's definition of debt relief agencies is an issue of first impression among the Courts of Appeals. Although the plain language of the definition appears to include bankruptcy attorneys and does not appear to be ambiguous, lower "[c]ourts that have addressed the issue of whether attorneys are debt relief agencies have not been unanimous." In re Irons, 379 B.R. 680, 685 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2007) (citing cases). Nevertheless, the majority of courts have held that compensated bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies as that term is defined in the Code. Id. (finding debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency); Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906 (D. Or. 2006) (same); In re Robinson, 368 B.R. 492 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2007) (finding debtor's counsel was debt relief agency); Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19 (N.D. Tex. 2006) (finding that bankruptcy attorneys are debt relief agencies); In re Norman, No. 06-70859, 2006 WL 3053309 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2006) (finding debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency); but see In re Attorneys at Law and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005) (holding that attorneys are not debt relief agencies); In re Reyes, 361 B.R. 276 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007) (finding that attorneys, generally, are not debt relief agencies, but ruling that debtor's counsel in case at bar was not a debt relief agency because service was provided pro bono and thus counsel did not receive valuable consideration in return for the bankruptcy assistance provided).

In this case, the district court acknowledged that the definition of debt relief agency, "at first glance," appeared to include attorneys, but it ultimately relied on the doctrine of constitutional avoidance to conclude that attorneys did not fall within the definition because if they did portions of §§ 526 and 528 would be unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. The doctrine of constitutional avoidance dictates that "where an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, the Court will construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such construction is plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988). Thus, if interpreting "debt relief agency" to include attorneys "would raise serious constitutional problems," then we should look for another interpretation "that may fairly be ascribed" to the definition that does not raise these concerns. Id. at 576-77. We will not, however, adopt an alternative interpretation that is "plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 575.

"We review the district court's statutory interpretation de novo." United States v. Mendoza-Gonzalez, 520 F.3d 912, 914 (8th Cir. 2008). To interpret the statute we first "determine whether the language at issue has a plain and unambiguous meaning with regard to the particular dispute in the case." Id. (quoting Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 340 (1997)). "If so, we apply the plain language of the statute." Id. "A mere disagreement among litigants over the meaning of the statute does not prove ambiguity; it usually means that one of the litigants is simply wrong." Bank of Am. Nat'l Trust & Sav. Ass'n v. 203 N. LaSalle St. P'ship, 526 U.S. 434, 461 (1999).

The plain reading of the definition of debt relief agency, and the defined terms that make up that definition, leads us to conclude that attorneys who provide "bankruptcy assistance" to "assisted persons" are unambiguously included in the definition of "debt relief agencies." See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 912 ("[I]t is the plain language of the Act that leads to the conclusion that attorneys are to be included in the definition of 'debt relief agency,'" and "[t]hus, further use of the tools of statutory construction is not necessary"). The statutory language sweeps broadly and clearly covers the legal services provided by attorneys to debtors in bankruptcy unless excluded by another provision.

Congress specifically listed five exclusions from the definition of "debt relief agency," and if it meant to exclude attorneys from that definition it could have explicitly done so. Id.; 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). Moreover, if attorneys were not included in the definition of debt relief agencies, Congress would have had no reason to include § 526(d)(2), which expressly provides that nothing in §§ 526, 527, or 528 (the sections covering debt relief agencies) "shall be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability of a State . . . to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court." 11 U.S.C. § 526(d)(2)(A) and (B). The legislative history provides further indication that attorneys are included in the definition. See H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 4 (April 8, 2005) ("The bill's consumer protections include provisions strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases") (emphasis added).[6]

[6] Additionally, while we recognize that the Supreme Court has stated that "failed legislative proposals are a particularly dangerous ground on which to rest [a statutory interpretation]," Lockhart v. United States, 546 U.S. 142 (2005) (internal quotation marks and brackets

Because attorneys were not specifically excluded from the definition of debt relief agencies, we hold that attorneys that provide "bankruptcy assistance" to "assisted persons" are "debt relief agencies" as that term is defined by the Code. Interpreting the definition of "debt relief agency" to exclude bankruptcy attorneys would be contrary to Congress's intent.

B. Constitutionality of § 526(a)(4)

Having concluded that attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, we now must determine whether the challenged provisions placing restrictions and requirements on debt relief agencies are unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to these types of attorneys.[7] One of the sections challenged by the plaintiffs in this case is § 526(a)(4), which states:

omitted), we note that on March 9, 2005, Senator Feingold proposed amendment No. 93 to Congress which would have excluded attorneys from the definition of debt relief agencies, see 151 Cong. Rec. S2306-02, 2316 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 2005) (statement by Sen. Feingold) ("This amendment would exclude lawyers from the provisions dealing with 'debt relief agencies' . . . ."), but the Senate did not address the proposal.

[7] Even though a more narrowly drawn version of § 526(a)(4) would likely be valid as applied to the plaintiffs in this case, our analysis applies to all attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies, not merely the plaintiff-attorneys. See Members of City Council of City of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 798-99 (1984) (explaining that the overbreadth doctrine allows a party to challenge a broadly written statute "even though a more narrowly drawn statute would be valid as applied to the party in the case," as "the statute's very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression") (internal quotations and citation omitted).

> (4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Plaintiffs assert that the prohibition against advising an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy violates the First Amendment. The parties disagree as to the level of scrutiny we apply to the constitutional analysis of this limitation on speech. Plaintiffs claim that we should review the constitutionality of § 526(a)(4) under the strict scrutiny standard as the restriction on attorney advice is content-based. See Turner Broad. Sys., Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 642 (1994) ("Our precedents thus apply the most exacting scrutiny to regulations that suppress, disadvantage, or impose differential burdens upon speech because of its content"). Under strict scrutiny review, the government has the burden to prove that the constraints on speech are supported by a compelling governmental interest and are narrowly tailored, such that the statutory effect does not prohibit any more speech than is necessary to serve the governmental interest. Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765, 774-75 (2002).

In contrast, the government argues that § 526(a)(4)'s restrictions are a type of ethical regulation, invoking the more lenient standard outlined in Gentile v. State Bar of Nev., 501 U.S. 1030 (1991). Under the Gentile standard, we would balance the First Amendment rights of the attorneys against the government's legitimate interest in regulating the activity in question—the prohibition of advising assisted persons to incur more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy—and then determine whether the regulations impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." Id. at 1075.

According to the government, § 526(a)(4) should be interpreted as merely preventing an attorney from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to take on more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy when the incurrence of such debt is done with the intent to manipulate the bankruptcy system, engage in abusive conduct, or take unfair advantage of the bankruptcy discharge. However, the plain language of the statute does not permit this narrow interpretation. Rather, § 526(a)(4) broadly prohibits a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy. The statute's blanket prohibition applies even if the additional debt would not be discharged during the bankruptcy proceedings. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Thus, regardless of whether the government's interest in prohibiting the speech was legitimate (Gentile standard) or compelling (strict scrutiny standard), § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies because it is not narrowly tailored, nor narrowly and necessarily limited, to restrict only that speech that the government has an interest in restricting. Instead, § 526(a)(4) prohibits attorneys classified as debt relief agencies from advising any assisted person to incur any additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy; this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent pre-bankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws. Section 526(a)(4), as written, prevents attorneys from fulfilling their duty to clients to give them appropriate and beneficial advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code or other applicable law.[8]

There are certain situations where it would likely be in the assisted person's, and even the creditors', best interest for the assisted person to incur additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. However, under § 526(a)(4)'s plain language an attorney is prohibited from providing this beneficial advice—even if the advice could help the assisted person avoid filing for bankruptcy altogether. For instance, it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments. This could free up additional funds to pay off other debts and avoid the need for filing bankruptcy all together. Hersh, 347 B.R. at 24. Moreover, it may be in the client's best interest to incur additional debt to purchase a reliable automobile before filing for bankruptcy, so that the debtor will have dependable transportation to travel to and from work, which will likely be necessary to maintain the debtor's payments in bankruptcy. Id. Incurring these types of additional secured debt, which would often survive or could be reaffirmed by the debtor, may be in the debtor's best interest without harming the creditors.[9]

[8] Several bankruptcy courts are in agreement with our decision. See Zelotes, 363 B.R. at 667 ("Because § 526(a)(4) is not sufficiently 'narrowly tailored to achieve the desired objective,' it is unconstitutional as applied to bankruptcy attorneys."); Hersh, 347 B.R. at 25 (concluding that § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutional because: "(1) it prevents lawyers from advising clients to take lawful actions; and (2) it extends beyond abuse to prevent advice to take prudent actions," and therefore imposes "limitations on speech beyond what is 'narrow and necessary' "); Olsen, 350 B.R. at 916 ("[S]ection 526(a)(4) is overly restrictive in violation of the First Amendment" even if reviewed under Gentile standard).

Factual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist and may further illustrate why incurring additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy may not be abusive or harmful to creditors. Nonetheless, § 526(a)(4), as written, does not allow attorneys falling within the definition of debt relief agencies to advise assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons)—i.e. clients (or prospective clients) meeting the definition of assisted person—to incur such debt. Thus, § 526(a)(4) is not narrowly tailored nor narrowly and necessarily limited to prevent only that speech which the government has an interest in restricting. Therefore,

> [Section 526(a)(4)'s] prohibition is particularly troubling when it might be completely legal and even desirable for the client to incur such debt. For example, there may be instances where it is advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car on time. There would be no fraud in doing so if the client intended to pay such debt notwithstanding the filing of a contemplated bankruptcy case. For example, the client may intend to keep all payments fully current and to reaffirm such debt once the case is filed.

we hold that § 526(a)(4) is substantially overbroad,[10] and unconstitutional as applied to attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons, as those terms are defined in the Code.

C. Constitutionality of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)

The plaintiffs also challenged the constitutionality of §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B), claiming that the advertising disclosure requirements mandated by those sections violate the First Amendment rights of bankruptcy attorneys through compelled speech. The disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) are supplemented by § 528(a)(3). These sections state:

(a) A debt relief agency shall—

> (3) clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public (whether in general media, seminars or specific mailings, telephonic or electronic messages, or otherwise) that the services or benefits are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title; and
> (4) clearly and conspicuously use the following statement in such advertisement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy

---

[10] See Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 248 F.3d 738, 747 (8th Cir. 2001) ("For us to find a statute unconstitutionally overbroad, its 'overbreadth . . . must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep.' ") (quoting Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973)).

> > relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or [sic] a substantially similar statement.

11 U.S.C. § 528 (a)(3), (4).

Similarly, § 528(b)(2)(B) states:

> (2) An advertisement, directed to the general public, indicating that the debt relief agency provides assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt shall—
>
> . . .
>
> > (B) include the following statement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

11 U.S.C. § 528(b)(2)(B).

As both §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B) require debt relief agencies—which includes attorneys providing bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons—to disclose in their advertising that "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.' or some substantially similar statement," the statutes compel speech that, similar to a restriction on speech, receives constitutional protection under the First Amendment. See Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705, 714 (1977) ("[T]he right of freedom of thought protected by the First Amendment against state action includes both the right to speak freely and the right to refrain from speaking at all"); Turner Broad. Sys., Inc., 512 U.S. at 642 (stating that "[l]aws that compel speakers to utter or distribute speech bearing a particular message are subject to" constitutional scrutiny).

The government contends that Congress enacted § 528's disclosure requirements to address problems with deceitful or unclear advertising by bankruptcy attorneys, bankruptcy petition preparers, or other debt relief entities. This position is supported by legislative history. See 151 Cong. Rec. H2063-01, 2066 (daily ed. Apr. 14, 2005) (statement by Rep. Moran) (stating that certain BAPCPA provisions are intended to "[p]revent deceptive and fraudulent advertising practices by debt relief agencies . . ."). But before we can determine whether the government's justification for mandating the disclosures passes constitutional scrutiny, we must first decide the appropriate standard for reviewing the constitutionality of the required disclosures.

We find guidance for this issue from the Court in Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626 (1985). In Zauderer, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a state bar disciplinary regulation requiring attorneys that advertised contingent-fee representation to disclose in their advertisements that clients may still have to bear certain costs even if the case was unsuccessful. Id. at 633. As the regulation only required an attorney to "include in his advertising purely factual and uncontroversial information about the terms under which his services w[ould] be available," and "the extension of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is justified principally by the value to consumers of the information such speech provides, [the attorney's] constitutionally protected interest in not providing any particular factual information in his advertising is minimal."

Id. at 651. The Court "recognize[d] that unjustified or unduly burdensome disclosure requirements might offend the First Amendment by chilling protected commercial speech," but held "that an advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." Id. (emphasis added).

On the other hand, restrictions on non-deceptive advertising are reviewed under intermediate scrutiny. See Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 564 (1980) (ruling that restrictions on commercial speech that is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity must assert a "substantial interest to be achieved by [the] restrictions" and "the restrictions must directly advance the state interest involved"). Under this standard, the limitation must be narrowly drawn. Id. ("[I]f the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restrictions cannot survive").

The district court in this case reviewed § 528's disclosure requirements under the intermediate scrutiny standard, but we conclude that rational basis review is proper. The disclosure requirements here, like those in Zauderer, are intended to avoid potentially deceptive advertising. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651, n.14 (rejecting a more strict analysis of the disclosure requirements at issue in that case, and noting that "the First Amendment interests implicated by disclosure requirements are substantially weaker than those at stake when speech is actually suppressed . . .").

By definition, debt relief agencies provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons (or prospective assisted persons) "with respect to a case or proceeding under [the Bankruptcy Code]." 11 U.S.C. §§ 101(4A), (12A). Section 528 generally requires debt relief agencies to disclose on its advertisements of bankruptcy assistance services directed to the general public that their services do in fact relate to bankruptcy and that they assist people in filing for bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 528. As in Zauderer, the plaintiffs' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal." 471 U.S. at 650. Further, the disclosure requirements are reasonably and rationally related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors, as the disclosure requirements are directed precisely at the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services to the general public make clear that their services do in fact involve filing for bankruptcy.[11]

Section 528 requires debt relief agencies to disclose: "'We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.' or a substantially similar statement," in all of their bankruptcy-

[11] Without ruling on the issue, we note that at least one lower court has held that § 528's disclosure requirements are constitutionally valid even under the stricter intermediate scrutiny analysis, as the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from misleading advertising is substantial, the disclosure requirements placed on bankruptcy attorneys directly advances the government's asserted interest, and the disclosure requirements are narrowly drawn to serve the government's interest. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920 (concluding that § 528 "passes constitutional muster" under either rational basis review or intermediate scrutiny review).

related advertising materials directed to the general public. 11 U.S.C. §§ 528(a)(4), (b)(2). The requirement does not prevent those attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies "from conveying information to the public; it . . . only require[s] them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present." Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650. Moreover, if any of these attorneys are concerned that the required disclosures will confuse the public, we note that nothing in the Code prevents them from identifying themselves in their advertisements as both attorneys and debt relief agencies. Olsen, 350 B.R. at 920. Simply put, attorneys that provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Code, and the disclosure requirements of § 528 only require those attorneys to disclose factually correct statements on their advertising.[12] This does not violate the

[12] We recognize that the broad definitions of debt relief agency, bankruptcy assistance, and assisted persons, might result in certain attorneys meeting the definition of debt relief agencies even though they do not represent debtors in bankruptcy nor help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Code. Nevertheless, these attorneys are still subjected to the disclosure requirements of § 528(a)(4) when they advertise "bankruptcy assistance services or . . . the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public," 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(3), (4), or when they advertise to the general public that they "provide[] assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt." Id. at § 528(b)(2). But because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure to the one suggested by the Code, these attorneys can and should tailor their advertisement disclosure statements to factually represent the "bankruptcy assistance" they provide. These tailored disclosures will meet the requirements of § 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) as long as they are "substantially similar" to the suggested disclosure, a decision which will require a case-by-case determination. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 919-20 (dismissing plaintiffs' claim that § 528 was uncon-

First Amendment. Id.; see also In re Robinson, 368 B.R. at 500-502 (finding that debtor's counsel was a debt relief agency subject to the strictures of § 528, and that § 528(a)(1)'s requirement for a written contract is constitutional); In re Norman, 2006 WL 3053309 at *4 (finding that debtor's counsel qualified as a debt relief agency and thus must comply with the requirements of § 528(a)(1)).

The challenged sections of § 528 only require debt relief agencies to include a disclosure on certain advertisements. Although less intrusive means may be conceivable to prevent deceptive advertising, § 528's disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the government's interest in protecting consumer debtors from deceptive advertising, and thus the section passes constitutional muster.

III. Conclusion

In sum, attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons are debt relief agencies under the Bankruptcy Code, and § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutional as applied to these attorneys, but §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) are constitutional. Accordingly, we affirm in part and reverse in part.

stitutional, rejecting argument that attorney who met definition of debt relief agency but did not represent bankruptcy debtors was precluded from § 528's disclosure requirements because § 528 permits a "substantially similar" disclosure, which could be tailored to disclose that attorney advised clients about bankruptcy assistance matters but did not represent people in bankruptcy or file bankruptcy petitions, and stating that whether disclosure was "substantially similar" would require case-by-case determination).

COLLOTON, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I concur in all but Part II.B of the opinion of the court. I disagree, however, with the court's holding that 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad in violation of the First Amendment, and I would therefore reverse the district court's decision declaring this statutory provision unconstitutional.

Milavetz, Gallop, & Milavetz, P.A., mounts a facial attack on § 526(a)(4), arguing that the section's potential application to attorneys in hypothetical situations requires that the statute be declared impermissibly overbroad and unconstitutional. This case involves a facial challenge in the First Amendment context, "under which a law may be overturned as impermissibly overbroad because a substantial number of its applications are unconstitutional, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Wash. State Grange v. Wash. State Republican Party, 128 S. Ct. 1184, 1190 n.6 (2008). This "overbreadth doctrine," however, is "strong medicine that is used sparingly and only as a last resort." New York State Club Ass'n, Inc. v. City of New York, 487 U.S. 1, 14 (1988) (internal quotations omitted). It should be applied only when there is "a realistic danger that the statute itself will significantly compromise recognized First Amendment protections of parties not before the Court." City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 801 (1984). The Supreme Court recently emphasized that it has "vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute's overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the stat-

ute's plainly legitimate sweep." United States v. Williams, 128 S. Ct. 1830, 1838 (2008).[13]

To resolve the constitutional challenge brought by Milavetz, we must first construe the disputed statute. When presented with a constitutional challenge to an Act of Congress, we have not only the power, but the duty, to adopt a narrowing construction that will avoid constitutional difficulties whenever possible. Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 330-31 (1988). In Boos, for example, the Court considered a provision of federal legislation that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." Id. at 329 (internal quotation omitted). The Court observed that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330 (first emphasis added). Nonetheless, citing the "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties by [adopting a narrowing construction] if such a construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute narrowly to permit the dispersal of only congregations that are directed at an embassy, and to allow dispersal "only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present." Id. at 330-31 (internal quotation omitted). Similarly, in United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64 (1994), the Court emphasized that "it is incumbent upon" a federal court to read a statute to eliminate constitutional doubts, "so long as such a reading is not plainly contrary to the intent of Congress." Id. at 78.

[13] The district court purported to consider only an "as-applied" challenge to § 526(a)(4), rather than an overbreadth challenge, and ultimately declared the section "unconstitutional as applied to attorneys." Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, 355 B.R. 758, 766 n.4, 769 (D. Minn. 2006). The majority correctly recognizes that the district court's approach is really an overbreadth analysis, and considers the statute under that framework. See ante, at 9 & n.7, 11, 13 & n.10. The "as applied" method of analysis, by contrast, considers the statute's application to a "particular claimant" based on "harm caused to the litigating party." Turchick v. United States, 561 F.2d 719, 721 n.3 (8th Cir. 1977). "The 'as applied' method vindicates a claimant whose conduct is within the First Amendment but invalidates the challenged statute only to the extent of the impermissible application." Id. (emphasis added). The district court and the majority have declared § 526(a)(4) unconstitutional in all of its applications to all attorneys, and the supporting reasoning is thus consistent with "facial overbreadth analysis." Id. (punctuation omitted).

The challenged provision in this case provides in part that "[a] debt relief agency shall not . . . advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Milavetz argues that according to this provision, a debt relief agency may not advise a client to incur any debt for any purpose when the client is contemplating the filing of a petition for bankruptcy. As such, Milavetz contends that an attorney could be sanctioned for "fulfilling his duty to his client to give legal and appropriate advice not otherwise prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code." (Brief of Appellee 30). Even under Milavetz's broad construction of the statute, a facial challenge resting on a "few hypothetical situations," ante, at [14a], is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because "the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge." Vincent, 466 U.S. at 800.

It is unnecessary to resolve whether § 526(a)(4) is impermissibly overbroad when given its broadest reading, however, because the government suggests an acceptable narrowing construction of the statute that would avoid most constitutional difficulties. The government contends that "in contemplation of" filing for bankruptcy is a term of art that denotes an action taken with the intent to abuse the protections of bankruptcy laws. Under this view, the statute should be construed to prohibit only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system.

The text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for a narrowing construction. Particularly given the latitude of federal courts to narrow a text to avoid constitutional difficulties, see Boos, 485 U.S. at 330-31, the words "in contemplation of . . . filing a case" need not create impermissible overbreadth. Rather, we may recognize that the phrase "in contemplation of" has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system. Black's Law Dictionary reflects this understanding, defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "the thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding." Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (emphasis added). American and English authorities construing the bankruptcy laws also support the proposition that the words "in contemplation of" may be understood to require an intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws. In re Pearce, 19 F. Cas. 50, 53 (D. Vt. 1843) (No. 10873) (concluding that an act was done "in contemplation of bankruptcy" if it was done "in anticipation of breaking or failing in his business, of committing an act of bankruptcy, or of being declared bankrupt at his own instance, on the ground of inability to pay his debts, and intending to defeat the general distribution of effects, which takes place under a proceeding in bankruptcy.") (emphasis added); Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 Barn. & Ad. 289, 296, 110 Eng. Rep. 798, 801 (K.B. 1833) (Parke, J.) (interpreting "in contemplation of bankruptcy" to mean that "the payment or delivery must be with intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankruptcy."); Fidgeon v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539, 545-46, 128 Eng. Rep. 800, 802-03 (C.P. 1814) (Gibbs, C.J.) (An act made in contemplation of bankruptcy "must be intended in fraud of the bankrupt laws."); cf. Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U.S. 151, 167 (1851) ("To give to these words, contemplation of bankruptcy, a broad scope, and somewhat loose meaning, would not be in furtherance of the general purpose with which they were introduced."); id. at 169 (relying on English bankruptcy decisions as instructive authority on meaning of the former Bankrupt Act). Our duty to construe the statute to avoid constitutional difficulties counsels that we should look to these authorities for a plausible alternative to the broad construction urged by Milavetz.

The structure of § 526(a)(4) also supports a narrowing construction. The prohibitions of this statute can be enforced only through the civil remedies provided in § 526(c). An attorney who violates § 526(a)(4) can be sanctioned in just three situations: if a debtor sues the attorney for the available remedies—remittal of fees, actual damages, and reasonable attorney's fees and costs; if a state attorney general sues for a resident's actual damages; or if a court finds that the attorney intentionally violated § 526(a)(4), and chooses to "impose an appropriate civil penalty." 11 U.S.C. § 526(c). The remedies for a violation thus emphasize actual damages. But legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all. If an attorney advises a debtor to refinance his home to lower mortgage payments, or to purchase a reliable car to enable him to pay off his debts, see ante, at [13a-14a], then a debtor following that advice would suffer no damage. There is no reason to believe that a client could recover the remittal of attorney's fees or that a court would find a civil penalty "appropriate" as a remedy for legal advice that benefits both the debtor and his creditors. Rather, a debtor is likely to have a remedy against an attorney only in the case of an abusive bankruptcy petition, where the debtor may suffer damages if the petition is dismissed as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1), and where an attorney general or a court has reason to seek or impose sanctions against an abusive debt relief agency. The remedial focus of § 526 thus bolsters the proposition that § 526(a)(4) was aimed only at advice given by a debt relief agency that is designed to abuse the bankruptcy process.

The incorporation of an abusive purpose requirement into § 526(a)(4) is also consonant with the evident purpose of the statute. The government argues, and Milavetz acknowledges, that a principal goal of Congress in passing the statute was to "preclude debtors from taking on more debt knowing that it will later be discharged during bankruptcy." (Brief of Appellee 34). A narrowing construction of § 526(a)(4) is in accord with expressions of desire in the legislative history to address "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals," and

"abusive practices by consumer debtors who, for example, knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 5, 15 (2005) (internal quotation omitted), as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92, 101. Milavetz itself argues that a broad construction of § 526(a)(4) "goes beyond" this congressional purpose, and is "absurd," because it would prevent an attorney from advising a client to take actions that might avoid the need for filing bankruptcy altogether. (Brief of Appellee 34). Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that one party says is absurd, that the other party says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

For these reasons, I would reverse the district court's decision declaring unconstitutional the provision codified at 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

APPENDIX B

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA

No. 05-CV-2626 (JMR/FLN)

MILAVETZ, GALLOP & MILAVETZ P.A.,
ROBERT J. MILAVETZ, BARBARA N.

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

[Dec. 7, 2006]

ORDER

Plaintiffs ask the Court to declare portions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA") unconstitutional. Defendant, United States of America ("the government") moves to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Defendant's motion is denied; the debt relief agency sections of BAPCPA unconstitutionally impinge on attorneys' First Amendment rights.

I. Background

On April 20, 2005, BAPCPA was signed into law, and became effective on October 17, 2005. Among its terms, BAPCPA defines a new category of bankruptcy service provider called a "debt relief agency." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (2005). The law forbids debt relief agencies from doing certain things, and requires them to do others. This lawsuit challenges a number of these provisions.

BAPCPA bars a debt relief agency from advising a client "to incur more debt in contemplation" of a bankruptcy filing. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). BAPCPA further requires that debt relief agencies' advertisements declare: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code," or a substantially similar statement. 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Plaintiffs are bankruptcy attorneys, their law firm, and two unnamed members of the public. Their attack on the statute is based on the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. They allege BAPCPA's debt relief agency provisions are unconstitutional as applied to them. They, initially, claim BAPCPA's regulation of attorneys' advice violates the First Amendment. Next, they claim BAPCPA's advertising requirements contravene the First Amendment.[1] Ultimately, they contend Congress did not intend the debt relief agency requirements to apply to attorneys. The government moves to dismiss plaintiffs' First Amendment claims pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of

[1] In a footnote, the government asks whether plaintiffs have standing to bring these claims, since they are in no danger of immediate harm. The government's query is misplaced; plaintiffs claim BAPCPA's debt relief agency sections both stifle and compel their speech, in violation of the U.S. Constitution. First Amendment jurisprudence makes clear that a claim that a law has a potential chilling effect on speech establishes standing. Virginia v. Am. Booksellers Ass'n, 484 U.S. 383, 392 (1988).

Civil Procedure ("Fed. R. Civ. P."). The government's motion is denied.

II. Discussion

A. Motion to Dismiss

A Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss must be denied unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts which would entitle him to relief. See Murphy v. Lancaster, 960 F.2d 746, 748 (8th Cir. 1992). In considering such a motion, the motion, the court construes the complaint, and all of its reasonable inferences, most favorably to plaintiff. Westcott v. City of Omaha, 901 F.2d 1486, 1488 (8th Cir. 1990).

B. Unnamed Plaintiffs

The complaint purports to set out the claims of two unnamed parties: John Doe and Mary Doe. The government denies there is any legal basis for anonymous plaintiffs in this lawsuit. Indeed, Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(a) is explicit: a complaint "shall include the names of all the parties." Notwithstanding Rule 10(a), plaintiffs claim their case falls within a limited realm of cases in which other interests—i.e., privacy and concern about embarrassment—outweigh the public's interest in open disclosure. Plaintiffs are incorrect.

There is a strong presumption against allowing parties to use a pseudonym. See, e.g., Doe v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield United of Wisconsin, 112 F.3d 869, 872 (7th Cir. 1997); Doe v. Frank, 951 F.2d 320, 323-24 (11th Cir. 1992); Southern Methodist Univ. Ass'n of Women Law Students v. Wynne & Jaffe, 599 F.2d 707, 712-13 (5th Cir. 1979). The reasons are obvious and compelling: identification of litigants is recognized as important in a public proceeding. See Blue Cross, 112 F.3d at 872. A party who invokes the judicial powers of the United States invites public scrutiny. "The people have a right to know who is using their courts." Id.

Limited exceptions to the party-publicity rule exist. Case law has recognized three factors which, if present, might support anonymity. They have been found when "(1) plaintiffs seeking anonymity were suing to challenge governmental activity; (2) prosecution of the suit compelled plaintiffs to disclose information 'of the utmost intimacy;' and (3) plaintiffs were compelled to admit their intention to engage in illegal conduct, thereby risking criminal prosecution." Doe v. Stegall, 653 F.2d 180, 185 (5th Cir. 1981) (quoting Wynne & Jaffe, 599 F.2d at 712-13). Although the listed factors are not exhaustive, they provide valuable guidance.

While the first factor is present here, the third is not. Plaintiffs argue their "wish to obtain legal advice from [plaintiff] attorneys . . . about prebankruptcy planning and filing bankruptcy" (1st Am. Compl. ¶ 10) suffices for the second factor. According to the Doe parties, the "financial situations of private citizens [are] clearly a matter of utmost intimacy, especially when they feel the need to seek advice about bankruptcy." (Pl.'s Brief 23).

Certainly, those facing bankruptcy are in financial straits; but that does not resolve the issue. Plaintiffs offer no case law to support their claim that merely seeking bankruptcy or financial advice is the kind of intimate personal information typically protected by the court. Bankruptcy is a public proceeding; the Doe plaintiffs are disclosing no medical information or deeply personal questions surrounding human reproduction or matters of that nature.

The Court finds the bankruptcy-seeking plaintiffs' interest in their financial privacy is outweighed by the public's stronger interest in maintaining open trials. Accordingly, the Doe plaintiffs shall amend their complaint to include their real names within 10 days of the date of this Order, or their claims will be dismissed.

C. Constitutional Challenges

1. Attorney Advice: Section 526(a)(4)

Plaintiffs claim BAPCPA's § 526(a)(4), titled "[r]estrictions on debt relief agencies," has "a chilling effect upon lawyers," in violation of their First Amendment rights. (1st Am. Compl. ¶ 39.) Section [526(a)(4)] states:

> A debt relief agency shall not . . . advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

The parties disagree as to the standard of review applied to the constitutional analysis of this section. Plaintiffs claim the standard of review for a restriction on lawful and truthful attorney advice is strict scrutiny. The government replies that § 526(a)(4)'s restrictions are merely a species of ethical regulation, invoking the more lenient standard outlined in Gentile v. State Bar of Nev., 501 U.S. 1030 (1991). Under Gentile, the Court would balance the First Amendment rights of attorneys against the government's legitimate interest in regulating the activity in question, and then determine whether the regulations impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." Id. at 1075. The Court rejects the government's proposed standard.

The "ethical rule" of which the government speaks appears to exist only in its pleadings; the statute discloses no quasi-religious or ethical principle. The government "cannot foreclose the exercise of constitutional rights by mere labels." See NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 429 (1963). While the section is certainly a rule, nothing in § 526 alludes to ethics. The section is titled "Restrictions on debt relief agencies," and plainly prohibits certain acts. The advice the Section forecloses may be potentially advantageous to creditors, but this does not make it equivalent to ethics either in logic or in law.

When fairly viewed, the Court finds § 526(a)(4) to be a content-based regulation of attorney speech—it restricts attorneys from giving particular information and advice to their clients. Attorneys are forbidden to advise their clients concerning an entire subject—incurring more debt in contemplation of filing for bankruptcy. This is a plain regulation of speech. Beyond this, the forbidden speech trenches on two other important areas of concern.

First, the lawyer's advice to take on certain additional financial obligations in contemplation of bankruptcy may well be in the client's best interest.[2] A law

[2] For example, it may be in the client's interest to obtain or refinance a home mortgage prior to filing bankruptcy, because one who has declared bankruptcy may well be denied a lower interest rate after the filing. If the client gets a lower rate mortgage, the refinanced mortgage may have smaller payments which could forestall, or even prevent the bankruptcy in the first place. Similar arguments can be made concern-

yer's highest duty is to the client, and the statute's forbidden advice may indeed be helpful to the client. Secondly, this statute does not restrict false statements—arguably implicating some "ethical" precept—it forbids truthful and possibly efficacious advice. If this is the government's view of legal ethics, it is a form of ethics unfamiliar to the Court.

As the United States Supreme Court has explained, "[g]overnment action that stifles speech on account of its message, or that requires the utterance of a particular message favored by the Government, contravenes th[e] essential [First Amendment] right[s]" of private citizens. Turner Broad. Sys. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 641 (1994). For this reason, "governmental control over the content of messages expressed by private individuals" is unconstitutional except in narrow circumstances. Id.

As the Court finds § 526(a)(4) to be a content-based restriction on protected speech, it is subject to strict scrutiny. Id. Such a restriction can only survive if (1) narrowly tailored to achieve (2) a compelling state interest. United States v. Playboy Entm't Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000). The Court finds the government has failed to meet its burden on the first point—§ 526(a)(4) is not narrowly tailored.

The government suggests § 526(a)(4) advances two compelling interests. First, it asserts an interest in protecting creditors. According to the government, § 526(a)(4)'s prohibition discourages prospective bankrupts from accumulating debt in a particular fashion, ing automobile loans, or incases where a client needs to co-sign undischargeable student loans. See Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 24 (N.D. Tex. 2006).

thus deterring debtors from "gaming" the means test by improperly enlarging pre-existing debt, thereby diluting the assets of the bankruptcy estate otherwise available to creditors. Second, it claims § 526(a)(4) protects debtors from attorneys who might lead them to abusive practices which could ultimately result in a denial of discharge of debts under § 523(a)(2)(c). Finally, the government argues that § 523(a)(2)(c) protects the integrity of the bankruptcy system.

Even if the Court assumes the asserted interests are compelling, the restriction is not narrowly-tailored. The government claims the section is narrowly tailored because "it does not limit more speech than is necessary to accomplish this purpose." (Def.'s Brief 25.) The government is mistaken.

Attorneys have a First Amendment right—let alone an established professional ethical duty—to advise and zealously represent their clients. Legal Serv. Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 548-549 (2001). Section 526(a)(4) bars an attorney from advising a client to incur any kind of debt, including legitimate debt, in contemplation of bankruptcy. The lawyer has no duty to assist creditors—who are scarcely without their own resources, and may indeed have contributed to the potential-bankrupt's straits by making credit easy to obtain. The attorney's only duty is to the client, and to the law.

Incurring debt on the eve of bankruptcy can scarcely be considered malum in se. To the contrary, for some individuals incurring further obligations, even those which must be adjusted or set aside in the bankruptcy, may be financially prudent. "For example, there may be instances where it is advisable for a client to obtain a mortgage, to refinance an existing mortgage to obtain a lower interest rate, or to buy a new car" before filing for bankruptcy. Erwin Chemerinksy, Constitutional Issues Posed in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, 79 AM. BANKR. L.J. 571, 578 (2005). If a client intends to reaffirm the debt after filing bankruptcy, there is no prejudice to the bankruptcy process. BAPCPA's § 526(a)(4) limitation on speech extends beyond any need to protect the bankruptcy process.[3] A lawyer who represents consumers contemplating bankruptcy bears the duty of zealous representation. Conversely, Congress does not have the power "to effect [a] serious and fundamental restriction on advocacy of attorneys." See Velazquez, 531 U.S. at 534. If upheld, this law would prevent lawyers from adequately and competently advising their clients. As such, it unconstitutionally impinges on expressions protected by the First Amendment of the Constitution.[4]

2. Advertising: Section 528(a)(4), (b)(2)

Plaintiffs challenge BAPCPA's advertising disclosure requirements, claiming § 528 violates their First Amendment rights. This section requires a denominated class, termed "debt relief agencies," to include

---

[3] Even under the more lenient Gentile standard, § 526(a)(4) fails. Gentile's balancing test allows the law to impose "only narrow and necessary limitations on lawyers' speech." 501 U.S. 1030, 1075 (1991); see also Hersh, 347 B.R. at 24-25; Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906, 916 (D. Or. 2006); Zelotes v. Martini, 2006 WL 3231423 *4 (D. Conn. 2006).

[4] Plaintiffs further claim § 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally vague and overbroad. The United States Supreme Court has expressed a strong preference for as-applied, as opposed to facial, challenges to the constitutionality of federal laws. Sabri v. United States, 541 U.S. 600 (2004). The Court finds this law unconstitutional as applied, and declines to expand its inquiry and consider whether it is also vague and overbroad.

particular, or substantially similar, language in their advertisements. Congress has prescribed that such agencies declare: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(4), (b)(2).

Here again, the Court must determine the appropriate standard of review. The choice turns on whether the statute regulates deceptive or truthful advertising. Statutes regulating deceptive commercial speech need only withstand rational basis review. Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the S. Ct. of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626, 651-52 (1985). But restrictions on non-deceptive advertising must employ means that directly advance a substantial government interest. Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Service Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 557, 566 (1980).

The government argues that BAPCPA regulates deceptive advertising, citing evidence adduced before Congress showing "some bankruptcy lawyers did not mention in their advertisements that their ability to make 'debts disappear' derived from the use of the bankruptcy process." (Def.'s Brief 28.) Plaintiffs respond that, when Congress imposed these requirements on all advertisements of bankruptcy assistance, it mandated a blunderbuss which strikes truthful, as well as false or deceptive advertising. The Court agrees.

With very few exceptions, any party advertising debt relief services must include § 528's statutory statement. The present lawyer-plaintiffs advertise themselves as bankruptcy attorneys in newspapers, telephone directories, television, radio, and the internet. There is no evidence, however, suggesting their bankruptcy assistance advertisements are deceptive in any regard. Even assuming some debt relief agencies advertise an ability to make "debts disappear," there is no showing such a statement is deceptive. Under these circumstances, the Court finds it appropriate to analyze this question by applying intermediate scrutiny. See Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 641.

The government may only regulate truthful bankruptcy assistance advertisements if: (1) the regulation directly advances (2) a substantial government interest, and is (3) "narrowly drawn." Cent. Hudson, 447 U.S. at 566; Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 641. The Court finds that BAPCPA's § 528 advertising requirements fail to directly advance the government's purported substantial interest and are not narrowly drawn.

The government contends advertising, absent the compulsory statements, may mislead the lay community into thinking debts can be erased without payment or filing for bankruptcy. The government claims §§ 528(a)(4) and (b)(2) protect against consumer deception"by alerting [them] that a lawyer may use bankruptcy as a means to help them." (Def.'s Brief 28.) Setting aside the implausibility of anyone actually believing in a magic wand capable of making debt go away, it is most unlikely that the insertion of the statement "We are a debt relief agency, we help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code" prevents consumer deception; it may well increase it.

The term "debt relief agency" is simply a legislative contrivance. The public is more likely to be confused by an advertisement containing this Congressionally-invented term than one which advertises the services of a bankruptcy attorney.

Beyond this, however, the term "debt relief agency" is almost all-encompassing. It instantly swallows all persons who engage in"bankruptcy assistance," attorneys and non-attorneys alike. Congress's merger of both attorneys and non-attorneys is, itself, likely to confuse the public. There are many non-trivial differences between an attorney's services to his or her clients, and services non-lawyers are permitted to offer. Unlike those who only restructure debt, or perhaps provide bankruptcy forms, attorneys give legal advice and actually represent debtors in bankruptcy proceedings. The requirement that parties so dissimilarly-placed must use the same mandated disclosure statement is likely to cause consumer confusion. In this respect, § 528 fails to directly advance the government's stated interest in clarifying bankruptcy service advertisements.[5]

Section 528's advertising requirement is also not narrowly drawn. The narrowly drawn standard is "something short of a least-restrictive means standard." Bd. of Tr. of the State Univ. of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469, 477 (1989). A narrowly drawn regulation designed to prevent deception "may be no broader than reasonably necessary to prevent the 'perceived evil.'" In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191, 203 (1992). Section 528's language not only regulates misleading advertisements—those [5] At oral argument, the government's counsel acknowledged areas where the statute is vague. As an example, it appears that the quantum of bankruptcy advice a lawyer offers may require some attorneys to publish the mandated language and others not. The statute makes no distinction between a lawyer who only occasionally has a client facing bankruptcy and those who do so regularly. Quaere: does a 500-person law firm having a single lawyer who regularly does bankruptcy work have to put the disclaimer on every piece of the firm's advertising?

suggesting debts can disappear—it binds all who advertise bankruptcy services. This sweeping regulation goes beyond whatever problem it was designed to address. It broadly regulates absolutely truthful advertisements throughout an entire field of legal practice. The government has failed to show that this restriction on attorneys' commercial speech is justified. As applied to attorneys, this section of BAPCPA fails constitutional scrutiny. Thus, the government cannot prevail on its motion to dismiss.

D. The "Debt Relief Agency" Definition

Plaintiffs ask the Court to find attorneys beyond the scope of a BAPCPA "debt relief agency." According to the statute,

> [t]he term 'debt relief agency' means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110.

11 U.S.C. § 101 (12A). This section, of course, makes no direct reference to either "attorney" or "lawyer." It does include the term "bankruptcy petition preparer," which, by definition, expressly excludes attorneys and their staff. See 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1) (2006). According to plaintiffs, the omission of any reference to attorneys or lawyers, while including a term which excludes attorneys, shows Congress must have intended to exclude attorneys from the "debt relief agency" definition. They also claim it would be absurd for attorneys to provide a statement telling their clients they have a right to an attorney, and that only attorneys can provide legal advice as required for debt relief agencies under 11 U.S.C. § 527(b).[6]

The government claims the statute includes attorneys because legal representation is included in "bankruptcy assistance," statutorily defined as:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 101(4A).

At first glance, this language might include attorneys. But the glance is deceiving: the statute contains a rule of construction for the term "debt relief agency." The statute provides that nothing in §§ 526, 527, and 528 —those sections imposing requirements on debt relief agencies—shall:

> be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability . . . of a State or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State.

[6] At least one court has found these arguments persuasive, holding that debtor attorneys are not "debt relief agencies." In re Attorneys at Law and Debt Relief Agencies, 332 B.R. 66, 69 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2005).

If lawyers are placed within the ambit of § 101 (4A), the placement conflicts with § 526(d)(2)(A). The conflict would exist because states would be deprived of their ability "to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law." If BAPCPA's debt relief agency sections apply to attorneys, it means Congress has taken upon itself the authority to determine the advice attorneys can give their clients and what attorney advertisements must say, thereby infringing on the state's traditional role of regulating attorneys. See Leis v. Flynt, 439 U.S. 438, 442 (1979) ("Since the founding of the Republic, the licensing and regulation of lawyers has been left exclusively to the States.")

This view is supported by the doctrine of constitutional avoidance. This doctrine counsels that, in construing a statute for ambiguity, the Court must opt for a construction which avoids grave constitutional questions. Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568,575 (1988). The Court perceives a clear ambiguity in this statute—on one hand it appears to regulate a lawyer's practice; on the other, such regulation is specifically reserved to the states. As outlined above, these sections would be unconstitutional if applied to attorneys. For these reasons, the Court finds §§ 526, 527 and 528 do not apply to attorneys.

VI. Conclusion

The Court finds BAPCPA sections 526(a)(4) and 528(a)(4), (b)(2) are unconstitutional as applied to attorneys. Moreover, the Court finds the debt relief agency provisions of BAPCPA inapplicable to attorneys. Therefore, the government's motion to dismiss [Docket No. 13] is denied.

APPENDIX E

1. 11 U.S.C. 101 provides in pertinent part:

Definitions

In this title the following definitions shall apply:

* * * * *

(3) The term “assisted person” means any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $150,000.

(4) The term “attorney” means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law.

(4A) The term “bankruptcy assistance” means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

* * * * *

(12) The term “debt” means liability on a claim.

(12A) The term “debt relief agency” means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bank-

ruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include—

(A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;

(B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;

(C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;

(D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or

(E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

* * * * *

2. 11 U.S.C. 526 provides:

Restrictions on debt relief agencies

(a) A debt relief agency shall not—

(1) fail to perform any service that such agency informed an assisted person or prospective assisted

person it would provide in connection with a case or proceeding under this title;

(2) make any statement, or counsel or advise any assisted person or prospective assisted person to make a statement in a document filed in a case or proceeding under this title, that is untrue and misleading, or that upon the exercise of reasonable care, should have been known by such agency to be untrue or misleading;

(3) misrepresent to any assisted person or prospective assisted person, directly or indirectly, affirmatively or by material omission, with respect to—

(A) the services that such agency will provide to such person; or

(B) the benefits and risks that may result if such person becomes a debtor in a case under this title; or

(4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

(b) Any waiver by any assisted person of any protection or right provided under this section shall not be enforceable against the debtor by any Federal or State court or any other person, but may be enforced against a debt relief agency.

(c)(1) Any contract for bankruptcy assistance between a debt relief agency and an assisted person that does not comply with the material requirements of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall be void and may not be enforced by any Federal or State court or by any other person, other than such assisted person.

(2) Any debt relief agency shall be liable to an assisted person in the amount of any fees or charges in connection with providing bankruptcy assistance to such person that such debt relief agency has received, for actual damages, and for reasonable attorneys' fees and costs if such agency is found, after notice and a hearing, to have—

> (A) intentionally or negligently failed to comply with any provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 with respect to a case or proceeding under this title for such assisted person;
>
> (B) provided bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in a case or proceeding under this title that is dismissed or converted to a case under another chapter of this title because of such agency's intentional or negligent failure to file any required document including those specified in section 521; or
> (C) intentionally or negligently disregarded the material requirements of this title or the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure applicable to such agency.

(3) In addition to such other remedies as are provided under State law, whenever the chief law enforcement officer of a State, or an official or agency designated by a State, has reason to believe that any person has violated or is violating this section, the State—

> (A) may bring an action to enjoin such violation;

(B) may bring an action on behalf of its residents to recover the actual damages of assisted persons arising from such violation, including any liability under paragraph (2); and

(C) in the case of any successful action under subparagraph (A) or (B), shall be awarded the costs of the action and reasonable attorneys'fees as determined by the court.

(4) The district courts of the United States for districts located in the State shall have concurrent jurisdiction of any action under subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (3).

(5) Notwithstanding any other provision of Federal law and in addition to any other remedy provided under Federal or State law, if the court, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States trustee or the debtor, finds that a person intentionally violated this section, or engaged in a clear and consistent pattern or practice of violating this section, the court may—

(A) enjoin the violation of such section; or

(B) impose an appropriate civil penalty against such person.

(d) No provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall—

(1) annul, alter, affect, or exempt any person subject to such sections from complying with any law of any State except to the extent that such law is inconsistent with those sections, and then only to the extent of the inconsistency; or

(2) be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability—

(A) of a State or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or

(B) of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

In the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, Congress enacted regulations governing the professional conduct of any "debt relief agency," a term that Congress defined to include "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance" to a consumer debtor for valuable consideration, with enumerated exceptions. 11 U.S.C. 101(12A). Section 526(a)(4) of Title 11 provides that a "debt relief agency" may not advise a debtor "to incur more debt in contemplation of" filing a bankruptcy petition. Section 528 of Title 11 requires "debt relief agencies" to include certain disclosures in advertisements to the public of bankruptcy-related services. The questions presented are as follows:

1. Whether an attorney who provides bankruptcy assistance to a consumer debtor in return for valuable consideration, and who does not fall within one of the listed exceptions, is a "debt relief agency" under the Bankruptcy Code.
2. Whether Section 526(a)(4) precludes only advice to incur more debt with a purpose to abuse the bankruptcy system.
3. Whether Section 526(a)(4), construed with due regard for the principle of constitutional avoidance, violates the First Amendment.
4. Whether the advertising-disclosure requirements of Section 528 violate the First Amendment.

FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the court of appeals (Pet. App. 1a-28a) is reported at 541 F.3d 785.[1] The opinion of the district court denying the government's motion to dismiss (Pet. App. 29a-44a) is reported at 355 B.R. 758.

---

[1] Unless otherwise noted, all references to "Pet. App." are to the appendix to the government's petition in No. 08-1225.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court of appeals was entered on September 4, 2008. A petition for rehearing was denied on December 5, 2008 (Pet. App. 47a). The petition for a writ of certiorari in No. 08-1119 was filed on March 5, 2009. On February 20, 2009, Justice Alito extended the government's time within which to file a petition for a writ of certiorari to and including April 6, 2009, and the petition in No. 08-1225 was filed on April 3, 2009. The petitions for writs of certiorari were granted on June 8, 2009. The jurisdiction of this Court rests on 28 U.S.C. 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The First Amendment provides, in relevant part, that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech." The pertinent statutory provisions are reprinted in the appendix to this brief. App., infra, 1a-14a.

STATEMENT

This case involves a pre-enforcement challenge under the First Amendment to provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA or 2005 Act), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23. The 2005 Act established certain minimum standards of professional conduct for "debt relief agencies." The district court held that two of those provisions violate the First Amendment and that the statutory term "debt relief agency" does not encompass licensed attorneys. Pet. App. 29a-44a.

The court of appeals reversed in part. The court held that attorneys may be "debt relief agencies" under the 2005 Act, and it upheld the statute's advertising-disclosure requirements. Pet. App. 3a-10a, 15a-21a. By a divided vote, however, the court held that the statutory provision restricting debt relief agencies from advising their clients to take on new debt "in contemplation of" bankruptcy violates the First Amendment. Id. at 10a-15a; see id. at 22a-28a (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

1. The 2005 Act was "a comprehensive package of reform measures" designed "to improve bankruptcy law and practice by restoring personal responsibility and integrity in the bankruptcy system and ensure that the system is fair for both debtors and creditors." H.R. Rep. No. 31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. 1, at 2 (2005) (House Report). Described by the House Committee as "the most comprehensive set of [bankruptcy] reforms in more than 25 years," id. at 3, the 2005 Act both modified the substantive standards for bankruptcy relief and adopted new measures intended to curb a variety of abusive practices that Congress concluded had come to pervade the bankruptcy system.

After extensive hearings, Congress determined that misleading and abusive practices by bankruptcy professionals, including attorneys, had become a substantial cause of unnecessary bankruptcy petitions and had sometimes jeopardized debtors' ability to obtain a discharge of their debts. For example, Congress heard evidence that a civil enforcement initiative undertaken by the United States Trustee Program had "consistently identified * * * misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" as among the sources of abuse in the bankruptcy system. House Report 5 (citation omitted). Congress responded to that evidence by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." Id. at 17.

The 2005 Act added or enhanced a variety of regulations on bankruptcy professionals' conduct. Those regulations are intended to protect the clients and prospective clients of bankruptcy professionals, the creditors of clients who do enter bankruptcy, and the bankruptcy system. The regulations require additional disclosures to clients about their rights and the professional's responsibilities; they protect clients against being overcharged, or charged for services never provided; and they discourage misuse of the bankruptcy system. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 110(b)-(h), 526-528, 707(b)(4)(C)-(D).

Many of the regulations apply to "debt relief agenc[ies]" generally. Under the Bankruptcy Code's definition, "any person" becomes a debt relief agency by providing "any bankruptcy assistance" for a fee to a consumer debtor, known as an "assisted person."[2] 11 U.S.C. 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance" includes, inter alia, "advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title." 11 U.S.C. 101(4A).[3]

Section 526 of Title 11 sets out four basic rules of professional conduct for debt relief agencies, each of which protects clients against specific unethical practices. Section 526(a)(1) requires debt relief agencies to perform all promised services. Section 526(a)(2) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising assisted persons to make statements that are untrue or misleading in seeking bankruptcy relief. Section 526(a)(3) precludes debt relief agencies from misrepresenting the services they will provide or the benefits and risks attendant to filing for bankruptcy. And Section 526(a)(4), the provision held unconstitutional below, states:

[2] An "assisted person" is "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than" an inflation-adjusted sum, currently $164,250. 11 U.S.C. 101(3); see 11 U.S.C. 104(a); 72 Fed. Reg. 7082 (2007).

[3] The 2005 Act establishes five specific exceptions to the definition of "debt relief agency" for in-house preparers, tax-exempt nonprofits, creditors, banks, and copyright owners. 11 U.S.C. 101(12A)(A)-(E).

> A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. 526(a)(4).

Section 528 includes several disclosure requirements that apply when a debt relief agency advertises its services to the general public. First, advertisements that promote either "bankruptcy assistance services" or "the benefits of bankruptcy" must make clear that the services or benefits "are with respect to bankruptcy relief under [the Bankruptcy Code]." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(3); see 11 U.S.C. 528(b)(1) (defining what advertisements are covered). Second, advertisements that promote "assistance with respect to" certain consumer debt or credit problems must disclose that the assistance "may involve" filing for bankruptcy relief. 11 U.S.C. 528(b)(2)(A). Third, advertisements in either of these two categories must also include either a specified disclaimer—"We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code."—"or a substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B).[4]

The principal remedy for violations of Sections 526 and 528 is a civil action by the debtor to recover his "actual damages," including any fees already paid. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2). For violations of Section 526, the statute also authorizes state attorneys general to sue for debtors' actual damages or for injunctive relief to prevent violations. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(3). For intentional or recurring violations of that provision, the bankruptcy court may also impose an injunction or "an appropriate civil penalty," either on its own motion or at the request of the United States Trustee or the debtor. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(5).

2. Petitioners are a law firm, two of the firm's attorneys, and two prospective clients. J.A. 37a-38a. They filed this action against the United States, seeking a declaratory judgment that the attorney respondents are not obligated to comply with several of the BAPCPA's provisions regulating debt relief agencies' professional conduct, including Section 526(a)(4) and the advertising-disclosure provisions of Section 528. Petitioners contended that licensed attorneys are not "debt relief agenc[ies]" within the meaning of the statute, even if they provide bankruptcy-related advice to debtors. They also argued that, to the extent the statute encompasses licensed attorneys, the challenged provisions violate the First Amendment. Pet. App. 2a.

[4] Section 528 also requires disclosure to an "assisted person" once a debt relief agency begins to provide that person with "bankruptcy assistance services." The debt relief agency must execute a written contract with the client that explains what services the debt relief agency will provide and what fees the client will have to pay. 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(1) and (2).

The district court denied the government's motion to dismiss, Pet. App. 29a-44a, and then granted summary judgment for petitioners, id. at 45a. The district court held that Section 526(a)(4) and the advertising-disclosure requirements of Section 528 violate the First Amendment. Id. at 33a-41a. The court further held, apparently in the alternative, that attorneys do not fall within the statutory definition of "debt relief agency." Id. at 41a-43a.

3. The government appealed, contending that attorneys unambiguously fall within the definition of "debt relief agency" and that the district court's constitutional holdings were premised on a misreading of the statute. In particular, the government explained that the phrase "in contemplation of" bankruptcy in Section 526(a)(4) has a long historical pedigree in bankruptcy law: in this context, the phrase is properly construed to forbid only advice encouraging a client to take on new debt on the eve of bankruptcy with the intent of abusing the bankruptcy system. The government further contended that, to the extent the term "in contemplation of" is ambiguous, the doctrine of constitutional avoidance supports the government's narrow reading of the term, which avoids the overbreadth that the district court perceived.

4. The court of appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court unanimously held that attorneys may fall within the definition of "debt relief agency," and it reversed the district court's invalidation of the advertising disclosure requirements in Section 528. The court held by a divided vote, however, that Section 526(a)(4) as applied to attorneys violates the First Amendment. See Pet. App. 1a-28a.

a. The court of appeals first concluded that attorneys for consumer debtors may fall within the definition of "debt relief agency." Pet. App. 3a-10a. The court noted that Congress had specifically defined both "debt relief agency" and several terms used in the definition of "debt relief agency." Id. at 4a-5a. Those definitions "sweep[] broadly," the court concluded, "and clearly cover[] the legal services provided by attorneys to debtors in bankruptcy unless excluded by another provision." Id. at 9a. The court noted that Congress had adopted five specific exceptions to the definition of "debt relief agency," none of which covered petitioners. Ibid. The court of appeals also concluded that constitutional-avoidance considerations could not justify petitioners' reading of the term "debt relief agency" because that reading was foreclosed by the statute's plain language. Id. at 8a.

b. The court of appeals rejected petitioners' constitutional challenge to Section 528's disclaimer requirements. Pet. App. 15a-21a. The court concluded that, because Section 528 regulates potentially misleading commercial advertising by imposing disclosure requirements, it is not subject to any of the forms of heightened scrutiny that apply to restrictions on commercial speech. Id. at 18a (citing Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the Supreme Court, 471 U.S. 626, 651 n.14 (1985)). Applying the Zauderer standard, the court held that Section 528 is "directed precisely at the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services to the general public make clear that their services do in fact involve filing for bankruptcy." Id. at 19a. The court noted that the statements contained in the required disclaimer are "factually correct" because attorneys subject to the requirement are "debt relief agenc[ies]" as the Code uses that term. Id. at 20a. The court of appeals also observed that, because the statute permits the substitution of a "substantially similar" disclaimer, any attorney who does not actually assist with bankruptcy filings can "tailor" the disclosure statement to assuage any concern about its accuracy. Id. at 20a n.12.

c. The court of appeals further held, over Judge Colloton's dissent, that Section 526(a)(4) violates the First Amendment. Pet. App. 10a-15a; see id. at 22a-28a (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The court rejected the government's proposed narrowing construction of the statute. The court concluded that, under what the majority described as the only permissible interpretation of the statute's "plain language," Section 526(a)(4) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising consumer clients "to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Id. at 12a. The court stated that "this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent prebankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws." Id. at 13a.

Based on that broad construction, the court of appeals held that Section 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad. Pet. App. 12a-15a. The court explained that advice to take on new debt just before bankruptcy will sometimes be legitimate. As examples, the court observed that "it may be in the assisted person's best interest to refinance a home mortgage in contemplation of bankruptcy to lower the mortgage payments," or to purchase a car to ensure "dependable transportation * * * to and from work." Id. at 13a-14a. The court further posited that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist." Id. at 14a. The court concluded that the First Amendment prohibits regulation of such legitimate advice and that Section 526(a)(4) is therefore "unconstitutional as applied to attorneys who provide bankruptcy assistance to assisted persons." Id. at 15a.[5]

d. Judge Colloton dissented in relevant part. Pet. App. 22a-28a. He explained that, in his view, "[t]he text, structure, and legislative history of § 526(a)(4) provide adequate support for a narrowing construction," under which "the statute should be construed to prohibit only advice that a client engage in conduct for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system." Id. at 25a. Judge Colloton concluded that Section 526(a)(4), so construed, is constitutional. See id. at 22a, 25a, 28a.

First, Judge Colloton observed that the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" is a term with a long history and "has been construed * * * to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." Pet. App. 25a; see id. at 25a-26a (collecting authorities). Second, Judge Colloton pointed out that the remedies for a violation of Section 526(a)(4) "emphasize actual damages," and he reasoned that a debtor who follows his attorney's bankruptcy advice is unlikely to be harmed as a result unless he is induced to file "an abusive bankruptcy petition, where the debtor may suffer damages if the petition is dismissed as abusive." Id. at 27a (citing 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1)). Third, he identified legislative history reflecting Congress's desire to address "abusive" practices by bankruptcy professionals and by debtors who "knowingly load up" on debt before filing for bankruptcy. Id. at 27a-28a (quoting House Report 5, 15). Judge Colloton concluded: "Given our duty to construe an Act of Congress in a manner that eliminates constitutional doubts, there is no need to adopt a construction that [petitioners] say[] is absurd, that the [government] says was unintended by Congress, and that sweeps in salutary legal activity that would be a strange target for a statute entitled the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005." Id. at 28a.

[5] The court of appeals did not identify the precise constitutional standard under which petitioners' challenge should be evaluated. Petitioners had argued that strict scrutiny should apply, while the government had contended that Section 526(a)(4) is a reasonable regulation of attorneys' professional conduct that is to be reviewed more deferentially under the standard announced in Gentile v. State Bar, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071-1076 (1991). The court acknowledged that the government had a "legitimate interest" in prohibiting advice that would assist debtors in abusing the bankruptcy system. Pet. App. 12a. But the court held that, on its reading of Section 526(a)(4), the statute was insufficiently connected to that interest and therefore was unconstitutional under either strict scrutiny or the Gentile standard. Id. at 12a-13a.

5. The court of appeals denied the government's petition for rehearing en banc by a vote of 6-5. See Pet. App. 47a.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I. Attorneys are not exempt from the definition of "debt relief agency" under the Bankruptcy Code. The definition encompasses "any person" who provides specified services to specified clients, subject to five specific exceptions. None of those exceptions includes attorneys, either expressly or by implication. 11 U.S.C. 101(12A). Attorneys therefore are debt relief agencies if they provide the specified clients with the specified services, known as "bankruptcy assistance." Ibid. Indeed, "bankruptcy assistance" is expressly defined to include certain services that can only be performed by lawyers, such as providing "legal representation" or "appearing in a [bankruptcy] case" on behalf of a consumer debtor. 11 U.S.C. 101(4A). That language would be surplusage if attorneys were categorically ineligible to be debt relief agencies. And the legislative history confirms that Congress was targeting abusive conduct by attorneys in bankruptcy cases.

Petitioners contend, on various theories, that their reading must prevail in the absence of an express reference to "attorneys" in the statute. But the statute's application to attorneys is clear. In light of the broad statutory definition of "debt relief agency" and the unmistakable inclusion of legal services within the scope of "bankruptcy assistance," the absence of the term "attorney" from the definitions is immaterial. When a person provides the services specified, he falls within the coverage of the statute, regardless of whether he possesses a law license. Nor, contrary to petitioners' arguments, does this natural reading of the statute create any absurd results.

In any event, there is no reason to adopt a clear statement rule, as petitioners suggest, in interpreting the term "debt relief agency." Congress's regulation of debt relief agencies does not infringe on any traditional power of the States; federal laws, agencies, and courts (including this Court) have long regulated the conduct of attorneys and other professionals within federal spheres of interest, such as bankruptcy. And the doctrine of constitutional avoidance provides no reason to adopt petitioners' proposed construction of the statute. That construction itself would not fully cure the constitutional problem petitioners perceive, and it would exempt attorneys from a variety of client-protection measures to which there is no constitutional objection. The Court therefore should reject petitioners' proposed interpretation even if it finds that the statute does not plainly cover lawyers.

II. Section 526(a)(4) is not unconstitutionally overbroad. The court of appeals' decision to the contrary rested on its view that the statute prohibits advice "to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Pet. App. 12a (emphasis omitted). But the statute does not use the temporal term "when" at all; rather, it uses the phrase "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]," a phrase that has long been read to incorporate an element of intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws. Read in accordance with that long history, Section 526(a)(4) prohibits only advice to take on debt with an intent to abuse the bankruptcy laws, such as advice to charge a vacation, concert tickets, or some similar purchase to a credit card, knowing that the purchaser will enjoy the full benefit of the purchase and then shed most or all of the debt in bankruptcy.

The structure and legislative history of the statute confirm that Congress regulated only abusive bankruptcy advice. The problem that Congress sought to combat was the phenomenon of "loading up" on debt with the intent of gaining relief through bankruptcy. That purpose is manifest in the other provisions Congress adopted to limit eligibility for a complete discharge under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code; indeed, those provisions create incentives to take on more debt to affect the eligibility determination. Section 526(a)(4) is properly read as a reasonable and targeted way of combating those incentives. Surrounding provisions of the statute, which specify other rules of professional conduct and provide remedies for clients injured by the unethical advice, confirm the correctness of this reading.

The court of appeals rejected this construction in a single terse reference to the "plain language" of the statute. Pet. App. 12a. Petitioners likewise insist that Section 526(a)(4) should be read more broadly—unconstitutionally broadly. But petitioners must establish not only that their reading of Section 526(a)(4) is the better one (which they cannot), but that it is the only plausible one. In light of the long history of the key phrase that Congress used and the history and structure of the statute, petitioners cannot rebut "the reasonable presumption that Congress did not intend the alternative which raises serious constitutional doubts." E.g., Hawaii v. Office of Hawaiian Affairs, 129 S. Ct. 1436, 1445 (2009) (citation omitted).

Adopting the correct interpretation of Section 526(a)(4) eliminates the overbreadth that the court of appeals perceived. By narrowly prohibiting attorneys from advising clients to commit acts that are criminal, fraudulent, or (at a minimum) abusive of the federal judicial system, Section 526(a)(4) parallels a long-accepted principle of legal ethics that has been enshrined in state law for decades. This Court has established that attorneys in judicial proceedings may be "subject to ethical restrictions on speech to which an ordinary citizen would not be." Gentile v. State Bar, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071 (1991). Attorneys representing clients at the bar of a federal bankruptcy court owe a professional obligation to the tribunal not to counsel their clients to take action that directly subverts the bankruptcy system. The First Amendment does not excuse attorneys from that obligation, nor does it prevent Congress from providing federally enforceable remedies for clients harmed by their attorneys' breach of that obligation.

III. The court of appeals correctly upheld the advertising-disclosure requirements of Section 528. Disclosure requirements applied to commercial speech receive more deferential scrutiny than do restrictions on the content of commercial advertising. As this Court has squarely held, a requirement that attorney advertising include specified factual disclosures need only be "reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the Supreme Court, 471 U.S. 626, 651 (1985). Petitioners' reliance on cases involving forced political speech and outright restrictions on truthful commercial speech therefore is unavailing: Zauderer sets out the controlling standard here.

The advertising-disclosure requirements readily satisfy that standard. Congress documented the problem it sought to combat: misleading attorney advertisements that offered to provide relief from debt, a halt to foreclosure, and the like, without adequately disclosing that obtaining these forms of relief requires filing for bankruptcy and suffering the attendant consequences. Congress was entitled to determine that such advertisements are misleading unless they properly disclose that the benefits touted entail a bankruptcy filing.

Petitioners contend that the two-sentence disclaimer specified in the statute is misleading and, therefore, unconstitutional. But petitioners principally object to including the phrase "debt relief agency," a statutorily defined term whose natural and legal meanings encompass consumer bankruptcy attorneys. Requiring debt relief agencies to identify themselves as such is entirely accurate and proper. Petitioners may well desire to call themselves "attorneys" in their advertising, but nothing in Section 528 precludes them from doing so, or from providing any additional information they wish. Indeed, Congress also specified that debt relief agencies may vary the text of the prescribed disclosure and use any "substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B). Accordingly, Section 528 is constitutional on its face.

Petitioners also argue, for the first time in this litigation, that their advertising is not misleading and does not require any disclaimer. But petitioners' past advertisements are not in the record, nor are their plans for future advertising. This late-raised as-applied challenge therefore provides no basis to disturb the judgment of the court of appeals.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BAPCPA'S "DEBT RELIEF AGENCY" PROVISIONS ENCOMPASS ATTORNEYS AS WELL AS OTHER BANKRUPTCY PROFESSIONALS

Petitioners contend (Br. 12-35) that the BAPCPA's "debt relief agency" regulations do not apply to licensed attorneys. As the court of appeals recognized, that argument is foreclosed by the plain language of the statute. Pet. App. 3a-10a; accord Hersh v. United States ex rel. Mukasey, 553 F.3d 743, 749-752 (5th Cir. 2008) (same), petition for cert. pending, No. 08-1174 (filed Mar. 18, 2009).

A. Attorneys Who Provide "Legal Representation" Or Other "Bankruptcy Assistance" To Consumer Debtors Are "Debt Relief Agencies"

1. Attorneys who provide paid legal representation to consumer debtors in bankruptcy proceedings are "debt relief agencies" under a straightforward reading of the pertinent statutory definitions. See Burgess v.

United States, 128 S. Ct. 1572, 1577 (2008) ("Statutory definitions control the meaning of statutory words . . . in the usual case.") (quoting Lawson v. Suwannee Fruit & S.S. Co., 336 U.S. 198, 201 (1949)). Subject to five enumerated exceptions that make no reference to attorneys, Congress defined the term "debt relief agency" to include "any person" who, for a fee, "provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. 101(12A). "Assisted person[s]" include consumer debtors. 11 U.S.C. 101(4A); see note 2, supra. "Bankruptcy assistance" means:

> any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

11 U.S.C. 101(4A) (emphases added). The term "debt relief agency" thus encompasses "any person" who "advi[ses]," "counsel[s]," "appear[s] in a [bankruptcy] case or proceeding on behalf of," or provides "legal representation with respect to a [bankruptcy] case" to, a consumer debtor in exchange for a fee.

Bankruptcy attorneys fall within that definition when they perform one or more of the specified services for the specified type of client. "[A]ny person" is a capacious term that encompasses any attorney. See Ali v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 128 S. Ct. 831, 832 (2008) ("any" is naturally read to have an expansive meaning); 11 U.S.C. 101(41) (broad definition of "person"). And the services defined as bankruptcy assistance are often provided by lawyers. Indeed, because only attorneys can provide "legal representation" or "appear[] in a [bankruptcy] case" on behalf of a consumer debtor, see, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 110(e)(2)(A) (bankruptcy petition preparers may not provide legal advice), petitioners' reading of the term "debt relief agency" would render those aspects of the statutory definition superfluous.[6] That alone is a sufficient reason to reject petitioners' construction. See, e.g., TRW Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19, 31 (2001); Kawaauhau v. Geiger, 523 U.S. 57, 62 (1998).

In light of those unambiguous textual indicia, the absence of the word "attorney" from the definition of "debt relief agency" is immaterial. A debt relief agency is defined by the services it performs and the clients for whom it performs them, and "any person" who performs those services may qualify. See 11 U.S.C. 101(4A) and (12A), 110(a). Analogously, the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act does not specifically refer to lawyers or the practice of law, but it defines a "debt collector" as "any person" who engages in the debt collection business, 15 U.S.C. 1692a(6), and this Court has held that attorneys are debt collectors "whenever they meet the general 'debt collector' definition." Heintz v. Jenkins, 514 U.S. 291, 295 (1995). Indeed, the Court in Heintz held that any reading of the term "debt collector" that would exempt lawyers per se was "outside the range of reasonable interpretations of the [statute's] express language." Id. at 298. Accord, e.g., Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 787-788 (1975) (noting the "heavy presumption against implicit exemptions," and accordingly refusing to construe the Sherman Act to exempt lawyers). To construe the BAPCPA term "debt relief agency" to exclude lawyers would be even more unwarranted, because that term is defined by reference to services some of which only lawyers can perform.

[6] One amicus brief suggests that the phrase "legal representation" refers to the "unauthorized practice of law" by non-attorneys such as bankruptcy petition preparers. NACBA Br. 34. That is an unnatural reading: a person becomes a "debt relief agency" by providing "legal representation" (or other "bankruptcy assistance") only if he is not already a debt relief agency by virtue of being a bankruptcy petition preparer. See 11 U.S.C. 101(12A). Thus, the reference to "legal representation" (or other "bankruptcy assistance") is relevant only to persons other than bankruptcy petition preparers, such as attorneys. See 11 U.S.C. 110(a)(1) (attorneys are not bankruptcy petition preparers). Moreover, bankruptcy petition preparers are already prohibited from offering "legal advice" or signing documents on behalf of any debtor; those prohibitions, and the bankruptcy court's authority to enforce them, are altogether separate from the "debt relief agency" provisions. See 11 U.S.C. 110(e)(2), (i), (j) and (k).

2. The BAPCPA's definition of "debt relief agency" is subject to five exceptions, none of which mentions attorneys, and none of which encompasses attorneys as a class. Rather, the exceptions apply to employees of regulated entities, tax-exempt nonprofits, creditors, banks, and copyright owners. See 11 U.S.C. 101(12A)(A)-(E). As the court of appeals observed, Congress's decision to include five carefully tailored exceptions from the definition of "debt relief agency" but not to make an exception for attorneys strongly implies that no such exception was intended. Pet. App. 9a; see Hersh, 553 F.3d at 751; accord, e.g., NLRB v. Town & Country Elec., Inc., 516 U.S. 85, 90-91 (1995).

Petitioners contend (Br. 19-23) that two of the exemptions implicitly suggest that the term "debt relief agency" does not encompass attorneys. Neither exemption can bear the weight petitioners place on it. The exclusion of "any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides [bankruptcy] assistance," 11 U.S.C. 101(12A)(A), ensures that a regulated attorney's administrative assistant or process server is not separately required to comply with the notice and disclosure provisions of the statute.[7] The exclusion for creditors, which applies only "to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor," 11 U.S.C. 101(12A)(C), makes clear that an attorney acting solely in her capacity as a creditor of the debtor (e.g., a divorce lawyer to whom the debtor owes fees) is not required to comply with the debt relief agency provisions of the Act. That exemption says nothing about whether attorneys are covered when they provide bankruptcy assistance.

3. The relevant legislative history confirms the plain meaning of the statutory text. The abuses of the bankruptcy system that Congress sought to address in the 2005 Act included abuses committed by—and at the encouragement of—debtors' professional representatives.

[7] Petitioners note (Br. 19-20) that the exemption for "an officer, director, employee, or agent" does not exempt a partner; they assert that lawyers often practice in partnerships; and they argue that, if law firms were covered by the "debt relief agency" definition, Congress would necessarily have included "partners" in the list of exempted employees. But the absence of an exemption for partners does not suggest that partnerships are excluded from the term "any person," because principals (such as partners) differ from employees, agents, officers, and directors in relevant respects. A law firm (or other business entity) is itself a debt relief agency if its attorneys or other personnel provide the specified services to consumer debtors under the firm's name, and as a matter of partnership law that designation may well have consequences for the partners. It is therefore unsurprising that Congress did not exempt principals who have the title "partner." In any event, petitioners' premise is flawed: law firms are often organized as corporations or other non-partnership entities, and indeed, the petitioner firm is a corporation, not a partnership. J.A. 37a.

The House Report cited a study by the United States Trustee Program that "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals." House Report 5 (quoting Antonia G. Darling & Mark A. Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: The Civil Enforcement Initiative, Am. Bankr. Inst. J., Sept. 2002, at 12 (Darling & Redmiles)). Similarly, in adopting the advertising disclosure requirements in 11 U.S.C. 528, Congress heard evidence of "increasingly aggressive lawyer advertising" that offered to make consumers' "debts disappear," but failed to explain that such relief would require a petition for bankruptcy having significant consequences for the debtor's ability to obtain credit in the future. Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2003, and the Need for Bankruptcy Reform: Hearing on H.R. 975 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Administrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 108th Cong., 1st Sess. 55 (2003) (2003 Hearings) (statement of Dean Sheaffer, National Retail Federation). Congress responded by enacting the debt relief agency provisions of the 2005 Act to "strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." House Report 17 (emphasis added).

B. Construing The Term "Debt Relief Agency" To Encompass Attorneys Does Not Lead To Absurd Results

Petitioners contend (Br. 24) that treating attorneys as debt relief agencies would lead to "absurd" results. For the most part, the supposed absurdities repackage petitioners' claims of unconstitutionality, see id. at 24, 28, and may be rejected for the same reasons, see pp. 27, 28-46, 64-68, infra. In addition, however, petitioners argue that an attorney who represents small creditors in bankruptcy cases could be deemed a "debt relief agency" on the theory that a creditor with debts consumer of his own may be an "assisted person." A "debt relief agency" must include in its public advertising the sentence "We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code," or "a substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(4). Petitioners contend (Br. 24) that if an attorney represents a client who appears as a creditor in a bankruptcy proceeding but whose own unrelated consumer debts bring the client within the statutory definition of "assisted person," the attorney's public advertising must state that he "help[s] people file for bankruptcy relief," even if the attorney does not actually provide such assistance and the statement is consequently untrue.

The premise of petitioners' argument is mistaken. A creditor in a bankruptcy proceeding is not an "assisted person" within the most natural reading of that statutory term, even if the creditor owes debts of his own. An "assisted person" is "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than" an inflation-adjusted sum, currently $164,250. 11 U.S.C. 101(3); see note 2, supra. Nothing in the bankruptcy laws depends on whether a creditor's own debts are "primarily * * * consumer debts," or on the value of a creditor's "nonexempt property." Indeed, the very concept of "exempt" property presupposes a bankruptcy filing by the person whose assets are at issue. See 11 U.S.C. 522(b) (describing the property that "an individual debtor may exempt from [the] property of the estate") (emphasis added). The natural inference is that the term "assisted person" is limited to debtors in actual or potential bankruptcy proceedings and does not encompass creditors in such proceedings who happen to owe unrelated debts.[8]

In any event, petitioners do not suggest that the BAPCPA's "debt relief agency" provisions will produce absurd results as applied to petitioners themselves or to bankruptcy lawyers generally—only that the provisions cannot sensibly be applied to bankruptcy attorneys who represent creditors exclusively. And if the term "assisted person" is read to encompass certain creditors in bankruptcy proceedings, construing the term "debt relief agency" to exclude lawyers will not eliminate the anomalous consequences that petitioners identify, because non-attorneys who assist such creditors in bankruptcy cases and advertise their services are also required to make the disclosure mandated by Section 528(a)(4). For those reasons too, the absurdities petitioners purport to fear are best avoided not by reading attorneys out of the term "debt relief agency," but by construing the term "assisted person," in accordance with Congress's evident intent, as limited to debtors in actual or potential bankruptcy proceedings.

[8] Additional evidence in the statute confirms that creditors are not "assisted persons." Section 527, for example, requires debt relief agencies to provide "assisted persons" with information relevant only to debtors, see 11 U.S.C. 527(b), and expressly cross-references provisions applicable only to debtors, see, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 527(a)(1) (instructing debt relief agencies to provide assisted persons with the "notice required under section 342(b)(1)," a provision that applies only to "individual[s]" who "commence[] * * * a case under this title"). Likewise, the written-contract provisions of Section 528 provide that a contract must be signed within five days "after the first date on which such agency provides any bankruptcy assistance services to an assisted person, but prior to such assisted person's petition under this title being filed." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(1) (emphasis added). The legislative history confirms that common-sense understanding. See House Report 17 (explaining that Congress enacted the debt-relief-agency provisions of BAPCPA to "strengthen[] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases").

C. The Application Of The BAPCPA To Attorney Conduct Does Not Intrude On Any Traditional State Prerogative

Petitioners suggest (Br. 33-34) that construing the term "debt relief agency" to encompass attorneys would "displace" the role of States in an area they have traditionally regulated. Petitioners contend on that basis (Br. 35) that this Court should require a clear statement of intent to cover attorneys, and that the BAPCPA's definition of "debt relief agency" does not contain the requisite clear statement because it "does not even mention the word 'attorney.'" Those arguments are misconceived.

First, construing the term "debt relief agency" to encompass lawyers does not bar the States from regulating attorney conduct performed in connection with actual or potential bankruptcy proceedings. To the contrary, state law that is not inconsistent with the BAPCPA is expressly saved from preemption. 11 U.S.C. 526(d)(1). A statute allowing concurrent regulation of attorney conduct does not raise any concern that might call for a clear-statement rule.

Second, the BAPCPA's regulation of bankruptcy attorneys is of a piece with a long history of federal regulation of lawyers who practice before federal tribunals or in areas of uniquely federal concern. E.g., 11 U.S.C. 105(a) (recognizing bankruptcy courts' authority to "tak[e] any action or mak[e] any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process"); 11 U.S.C. 329 (requiring bankruptcy lawyers to surrender certain unreasonable fees); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c); see 28 U.S.C. 1927; Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(c); Fed. R. App. P. 46(c); Sup. Ct. R. 8.1; see also Goldsmith v. United States Bd. of Tax Appeals, 270 U.S. 117, 121-123 (1926) (upholding an Article I tribunal's authority to admit lawyers and accountants to practice and prescribe qualifications for admission); 15 U.S.C. 7245 (providing for the Securities and Exchange Commission to issue "minimum standards of professional conduct for attorneys appearing and practicing before the Commission"); 31 C.F.R. 10.20 et seq. (rules for practice before the Internal Revenue Service); 37 C.F.R. 10.20 et seq. (Patent and Trademark Office Code of Professional Responsibility). See generally Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752, 766 (1980) ("The power of a court over members of its bar is at least as great as its authority over litigants."). Federal rules of practice in an area of direct federal interest can even preempt state unauthorized-practice laws, see Sperry v. Florida ex rel. Florida Bar, 373 U.S. 379, 400 n.43, 403 (1963), a step Congress did not deem necessary here, see 11 U.S.C. 526(d)(2)(A). Bankruptcy is a subject of particular federal concern, see U.S. Const. Art. I, § 8, Cl. 4, and there is nothing improper or unusual in Congress's decision in BAPCPA to regulate attorney conduct that threatens the integrity of the bankruptcy system.

Third, even if a clear-statement requirement applied in this setting, it would be satisfied here. Section 101(4A)'s inclusion of "legal representation" as a service that triggers debt-relief-agency status eliminates any reasonable doubt that attorneys are covered, even though that definitional provision does not contain the term "attorney" or "lawyer." A clear-statement rule is not a magic-words requirement; the requisite clear statement may even come from reading multiple provisions together, so long as the meaning is unambiguous. See BFP v. RTC, 511 U.S. 531, 546 (1994) ("The Bankruptcy Code can of course override by implication when the implication is unambiguous."); cf. Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 76 (2000).

D. The Canon Of Constitutional Avoidance Provides No Basis For Construing The Term "Debt Relief Agency" To Exclude Attorneys

Petitioners further contend that the Court should construe the term "debt relief agency" to exclude attorneys in order to avoid constitutional difficulties. Petitioners correctly state (Br. 31) the general proposition that the avoidance canon permits—indeed, requires—a court to adopt any permissible construction of a statute that avoids a serious constitutional question. See generally pp. 43-46, infra. That principle, however, provides no sound basis for departing from the BAPCPA's explicit definition of "debt relief agency."

First, by referring to "legal representation" and other services specific to attorneys, Congress has foreclosed petitioners' purported saving construction, which would render those terms superfluous. See pp. 17-18, supra. The avoidance canon is a tool for choosing among permissible constructions; it is not a basis for adopting a construction that the statute unambiguously precludes. See, e.g., HUD v. Rucker, 535 U.S. 125, 134-135 (2002); Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 341 (2000). The text of the statute and its "legislative history and purpose," CFTC v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 841 (1986), make clear that the term "debt relief agency" encompasses lawyers who perform the relevant bankruptcy-related services.

Second, construing the term to exclude attorneys would not avoid the constitutional questions. Petitioners' constitutional challenges go to the statute's substantive requirements, not directly to the inclusion of attorneys. On petitioners' theory, for example, Section 528(b)(2) is unconstitutional as applied to bankruptcy petition preparers as well, because "no person" would voluntarily refer to himself as a "debt relief agency" in his advertising. Pet. Br. 88. Adopting petitioners' reading of "debt relief agency" therefore would not avoid the constitutional questions that petitioners identify; it would postpone them only until a non-attorney plaintiff filed a similar suit.

Third, petitioners' construction would undermine the efficacy of other statutory provisions whose constitutionality is not in question. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(1) (debt relief agencies may not fail to perform services they promised to undertake); 11 U.S.C. 527(a)(2) (debt relief agencies must provide their clients with certain admonitions about the requirements of the bankruptcy process). Application of those requirements to attorneys raises no serious constitutional concern. But petitioners' interpretation of the 2005 Act would make all BAPCPA regulation of "debt relief agencies" inapplicable to lawyers. That would disserve Congress's intent to establish "professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases." House Report 17 (emphasis added).

II. SECTION 526(a)(4) IS NOT UNCONSTITUTIONALLY OVERBROAD

The court of appeals erred in holding that Section 526(a)(4) violates the First Amendment. The court interpreted Section 526(a)(4) to prohibit attorneys from advising debtors to incur "any" additional debt prior to bankruptcy. Pet. App. 13a. In the court's view, "this prohibition would include advice constituting prudent prebankruptcy planning that is not an attempt to circumvent, abuse, or undermine the bankruptcy laws." Ibid. In so holding, the court rejected the government's proposed narrowing construction of Section 526(a)(4) in a single sentence, asserting that the statute's "plain language" precludes any construction other than an unconstitutionally overbroad one. Id. at 12a.

Both the court's statutory premise and its constitutional conclusion are flawed. "The first step in overbreadth analysis is to construe the challenged statute; it is impossible to determine whether a statute reaches too far without first knowing what the statute covers." United States v. Williams, 128 S. Ct. 1830, 1838 (2008). As the text, structure, and purposes of Section 526(a)(4) demonstrate, Congress forbade only advice to incur new debt for the purpose of abusing the bankruptcy system or defrauding creditors. The First Amendment does not prevent Congress from regulating the professional conduct of bankruptcy attorneys in this manner. Because Section 526(a)(4) may reasonably be read in a manner that preserves its constitutional validity, the judgment of the court of appeals should be reversed.

A. Section 526(a)(4) Regulates Advice To Incur New Debt For The Purpose Of Abusing The Bankruptcy Code Or Defrauding Creditors

1. The court of appeals ignored the historical meaning of the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy"

a. The court of appeals concluded that Section 526(a)(4) "broadly prohibits a debt relief agency from advising an assisted person (or prospective assisted person) to incur any additional debt when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Pet. App. 12a (emphasis omitted). Section 526(a)(4), however, does not use the temporal language "when the assisted person is contemplating bankruptcy." Rather, the statute forbids attorneys from advising clients "to incur more debt in contemplation of [bankruptcy]." 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(4) (emphasis added). As Judge Colloton observed, "the phrase 'in contemplation of' has been construed in the bankruptcy context to mean actions taken with the intent to abuse the protections of the bankruptcy system." Pet. App. 25a; see Hersh, 553 F.3d at 758 (Congress's use of the phrase "in contemplation of" bankruptcy "suggests that the statute is directed at situations in which a debtor intends to abuse the bankruptcy system").

Black's Law Dictionary, for example, defines "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "[t]he thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding." Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (emphasis added). That understanding of the term goes back more than a century and a half, to both American and English authorities examining whether particular transfers made just before bankruptcy were in fact made "in contemplation of bankruptcy." See Black's Law Dictionary 257 (2d ed. 1910) (citing cases). Those authorities read the phrase as incorporating an element of intent to frustrate the bankruptcy law, not simply an awareness that a bankruptcy was impending.

Members of Congress have used the term "in contemplation of bankruptcy" in the same manner. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 65, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1983) (1983 Senate Report) (describing the problem of "[e]xcessive debts incurred within a short period prior to the filing of the petition" as " 'loading up' in contemplation of bankruptcy"); ibid. ("In many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent."); Report of the Commission on the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 137, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. I, at 11 (1973) (Bankruptcy Commission Report) ("[T]he most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge.").

b. Of the cases treating "in contemplation of bankruptcy" as incorporating an element of abusive purpose, most have involved preferential transfers—i.e., payments made on the eve of bankruptcy to one or more favored creditors. Such transfers are generally contrary to the bankruptcy-law principle that all similarly situated creditors should share proportionately in the bankrupt's remaining assets. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 547(b). Some early bankruptcy statutes in this country and in England provided that transfers "in contemplation of bankruptcy" were void. Interpreting those statutes, several courts held that they required proof of intent to violate the bankruptcy laws' framework for protecting creditors—i.e., an "intention of giving a preference in contemplation of bankruptcy." Jones v. Howland, 49 Mass. (8 Met.) 377, 386 (1844); accord In re Pearce, 19 F. Cas. 50, 53 (D. Vt. 1843) (No. 10,873) (concluding that an act was done "in contemplation of bankruptcy" if a person did it "in anticipation of breaking or failing in his business, of committing an act of bankruptcy, or of being declared bankrupt at his own instance, on the ground of inability to pay his debts, and intending to defeat the general distribution of effects, which takes place under a proceeding in bankruptcy.") (emphasis added); see also Paulding v. Chrome Steel Co., 94 N.Y. 334, 338, 340-341 (1894) (interpreting state law that voided transfers "in contemplation of the insolvency of [the] company").

As the court explained in Jones, the indispensable element under those statutes was the debtor's "design" or "view to give [the transferee] a preference over the general creditors." 49 Mass. (8 Met.) at 385, 386. The court drew on English decisions establishing that principle. See id. at 384 (construing "'the meaning of those words' (in contemplation of bankruptcy)" as requiring an "'intent to defeat the general distribution of effects which takes place under a commission of bankrupt'") (quoting Morgan v. Brundrett, 5 Barn. & Ad. 289, 296, 110 Eng. Rep. 798, 801 (K.B. 1833) (Parke, J.)); id. at 385 (an act made in contemplation of bankruptcy "must be intended in fraud of the bankrupt laws") (quoting Fidgeon v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539, 545-546, 128 Eng. Rep. 800, 802-803 (C.P. 1814) (Gibbs, C.J.)).

In many of the above cases, the debtor had made a payment to a favored creditor on the eve of bankruptcy, and the question was whether he had done so with the abusive purpose of preventing the equal distribution of assets that the bankruptcy system seeks to achieve. Section 526(a)(4), conversely, is directed at the amassment of additional debt (rather than the distribution of the debtor's existing assets) on the eve of bankruptcy. In both instances, the debtor intends to disfavor a subset of creditors by taking advantage of the bankruptcy system.[9]

c. In light of that history, Congress's use of the phrase "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]" suggests a focus on the accumulation of debt with intent to abuse the bankruptcy system or defeat the bankruptcy laws. For example, advising a debtor to obtain unsecured credit on the eve of bankruptcy and then to dissipate it on purchases (e.g., a vacation or lavish banquet) that do not become part of the bankruptcy estate, knowing that the bankruptcy discharge will allow her to avoid repayment of the debt, is an abuse of the bankruptcy system.

[9] Petitioners assert (Br. 60-61) that this Court gave a different reading to the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" in Conrad, Rubin & Lesser v. Pender, 289 U.S. 472 (1933), but in fact, that case, too, involved a statute intended to combat abuse of the bankruptcy system, and the Court interpreted the statute in accord with that purpose. Congress had granted bankruptcy courts the authority to reexamine transfers of property made to a debtor's attorney "in contemplation of the filing of a petition," and to direct that any "excess" payment be returned to the estate for the benefit of creditors—a means of combating the same sort of preferential conveyances as in the cases discussed above. 11 U.S.C. 96(d) (1928). The debtor's attorney objected to turning over an excessive eve-of-bankruptcy payment, and the only question before the Court was whether, "as [a] matter of law," the payment was precluded from being "in contemplation of bankruptcy" because the debtor was pursuing other options in addition to bankruptcy. 289 U.S. at 478-479. The Court saw no such limitation and confirmed the factual finding that the debtor had been contemplating bankruptcy when it had made the excessive payment to its attorneys. See ibid. Thus, even if the Court could be said to have construed the statutory term comprehensively, rather than merely to have rejected artificial limitations on it, its holding is consistent with the discussion above, because the Court sustained recouping the payment as abusive. Moreover, in that case the Court did not construe the statute in light of the doctrine of constitutional avoidance or hold that its construction was the only reasonable one.

Cf. Attorney Grievance Comm'n v. Culver, 849 A.2d 423, 443-444 (Md. 2004) (attorney violated state ethics rules by urging a client to obtain new credit cards and new cash advances with the intent of discharging the debt in bankruptcy). Similarly, advising a debtor to take on additional debt as a way of circumventing the Bankruptcy Code's means testing mechanism is an attempt to defeat the bankruptcy laws. As discussed more fully below, eligibility for a Chapter 7 discharge often turns on a means test that examines the amount by which the debtor's income exceeds his statutorily allowed expenses, including expenses for secured debt. See pp. 35-37, infra. If a client is presumed ineligible under this means test, an unscrupulous attorney who advises the client to take on additional debt as a way of becoming eligible for a complete discharge under Chapter 7 is abusing the bankruptcy system. Section 526(a)(4) prohibits an attorney or other debt relief agency from advising debtors to engage in such manipulative conduct.

2. The legislative history of Section 526(a)(4), and its place in the larger statutory scheme, confirm that it targets abusive practices and does not broadly encompass all advice to incur new debt at a time when bankruptcy is imminent

a. Congress has long been aware that the relief afforded by the bankruptcy laws creates a perverse incentive for debtors to amass additional debt with the expectation of obtaining a discharge. Congress has also recognized that this practice poses a fundamental threat to the Bankruptcy Code's twin goals of affording debtors a fresh start while providing an orderly and equitable system of resolving creditors' claims.

As early as 1973, Congress was informed that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge." Bankruptcy Commission Report 11. A decade later, Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C) (1988), which created a presumption that certain eve-of-bankruptcy debts are not dischargeable. The accompanying Senate Report emphasized that "[e]xcessive debts incurred within a short period prior to the filing of the petition present a special problem: that of 'loading up' in contemplation of bankruptcy." 1983 Senate Report 9. The report explained that "[a] debtor planning [to] file a petition with the bankruptcy court has a strong economic incentive to incur dischargeable debts for either consumable goods or exempt property," noting that "[i]n many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent." Ibid. As the report concluded, "[n]ot only does this result in direct losses for the creditors that are the victims of the spree, but it also creates a higher absolute level of debt so that all creditors receive less in liquidation. During this period of insolvency preceding the filing of the petition, creditors would not extend credit if they knew the true facts." Ibid.

Congress has enacted a number of protections against eve-of-bankruptcy attempts to abuse the system's protections. Even before the 2005 Act, Congress authorized bankruptcy courts to dismiss a petition for "substantial abuse," 11 U.S.C. 707(b) (2000), which could include the debtor's purposeful accumulation of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. E.g., Price v. United States Tr. (In re Price), 353 F.3d 1135, 1139-1140 (9th Cir. 2004). Congress also precluded debtors from obtaining a discharge for debts arising from the fraudulent acquisition of money or credit, 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(A) (2000), and as noted above, it provided that certain categories of debts are presumed nondischargeable if they are incurred on the eve of bankruptcy, 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C) (2000).

b. When Congress enacted the BAPCPA in 2005, the House Committee expressed concern that those earlier measures had not adequately restricted the ability of debtors to "knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." House Report 15. Accordingly, Congress strengthened each of the aforementioned protections against bankruptcy abuse. See, e.g., BAPCPA § 310, 119 Stat. 84 (11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(C)). In particular, Congress greatly expanded the bankruptcy courts' authority to dismiss petitions or deny relief for "abuse" of the bankruptcy system, including in cases in which debtors purposefully incur additional debt in contemplation of filing a petition. See BAPCPA § 102, 119 Stat. 27 (11 U.S. 707(b)); House Report 48-49. Among other reforms, Congress permitted dismissal of a petition based on a less stringent showing of abuse, see § 102(a)(2)(B)(i)(III), 119 Stat. 27 (11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1)); authorized "any party in interest" to file a motion to dismiss for abuse (except in some cases involving lower-income debtors), see 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1) and (6); and repealed the pre-existing presumption in favor of granting the relief sought by the debtor, see 11 U.S.C. 707(b) (2000). See generally House Report 49.

Congress also made another significant change that underscored the need for direct regulation of attorneys who practice in the federal bankruptcy system. The "principal consumer bankruptcy reform" in the 2005 Act was the adoption of a "means testing" mechanism intended to ensure that debtors who have the ability to repay at least some of their debts will do so, through a structured repayment plan entered under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, instead of obtaining a complete discharge under Chapter 7. House Report 48; see id. at 2 (describing means testing as the "heart" of the 2005 Act's reform provisions). See generally 11 U.S.C. 109(b) and (e) (eligibility for Chapter 7 and Chapter 13).

Under the means test, a debtor's petition for complete relief under Chapter 7 is presumed to be abusive if the debtor's current monthly income exceeds his statutorily allowed expenses, including payments for secured debt, by more than a prescribed amount. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i) and (iii).[10] If the court finds a petition to be abusive under this standard, it can dismiss the debtor's case or, with the debtor's consent, convert it to Chapter 13, which involves a repayment plan. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). The means test, however, exacerbates the incentive for debtors to manipulate the system by "loading up" on certain debt in contemplation of filing, because payments on secured debts that qualify under Section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) offset the debtor's monthly income under the formula. Increasing the amount of such payments may therefore reduce the difference between the debtor's income and his allowable expenses, and thus

[10] If the presumption does not apply, or if it is rebutted, the petition may still be dismissed for abuse: in those circumstances, the 2005 Act directed that bankruptcy courts consider "whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith" and whether "the totality of the circumstances * * * of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(3).

allow the debtor to remain eligible for a complete and immediate discharge of unsecured debt under Chapter 7.

Congress was accordingly concerned that the introduction of the means test would give attorneys an incentive to counsel their clients to take on additional debt before filing for bankruptcy. As one bankruptcy judge testified, "[t]he more debt that is incurred prior to filing, the more likely the debtor will qualify for chapter 7." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998: Hearing on H.R. 3150 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Administrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 105th Cong., 2d Sess. Pt. I, at 25 (1998) (1998 Hearings) (statement of Judge Randall J. Newsome). Thus, the bankruptcy judge testified that, "[p]erverse as it may seem, I can envision debtor's counsel advising their clients to buy the most expensive car that someone will sell them, and sign on to the biggest payment they can afford (at least until the bankruptcy is filed) as a way of increasing their deductions under [the means test]." Ibid.; see also Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1999: Hearing on H.R. 833 Before the Subcomm. on Commercial and Administrative Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 106th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. II, at 30 (1999) (1999 Hearings) (statement of Judge William Brown). And as discussed above, see p. 21, supra, Congress credited evidence compiled by the United States Trustee Program that "consistently identified," among the sources of bankruptcy abuse, "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals [and] problems associated with bankruptcy petition preparers." House Report 5 (quoting Darling & Redmiles 12).

c. Congress responded to these concerns by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases" in return for a fee. House Report 17. Under the amended provisions of the Code, an attorney who represents a consumer debtor in filing a bankruptcy petition must make her own reasonable investigation into the circumstances giving rise to the debtor's petition, including a specific inquiry into the veracity of the debtor's debt and asset schedules. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). By signing the petition, the attorney personally certifies that the debtor's petition "is well grounded in fact," 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(4)(C)(ii)(I); that the attorney has "no knowledge * * * that the information in the schedules filed with such petition is incorrect," 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(4)(D); and that the debtor's petition "does not constitute an abuse" under Section 707(b), 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(4)(C)(ii)(II). Congress thus effectively required bankruptcy attorneys to warrant that their clients' prepetition conduct and financial circumstances—including any assumption of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy—do not provide grounds for dismissal of the petition as an abuse of the bankruptcy system.

As the foregoing discussion demonstrates, Congress enacted the BAPCPA to protect creditors and the bankruptcy system from abusive eve-of-bankruptcy conduct. That overall statutory focus reinforces the conclusion that the phrase "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]" in Section 526(a)(4) should be construed, in accordance with its historically accepted meaning, as limited to advice that debtors incur additional debt to abuse the bankruptcy system or defeat the administration of the bankruptcy laws. See Davis v. Michigan Dep't of the Treasury, 489 U.S. 803, 809 (1989) ("It is a fundamental canon of statutory construction that the words of a statute must be read in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme.").

d. Section 526(a)(4) is one of four subsections of Section 526(a). The other three subsections establish rules of professional conduct that are clearly designed to protect debtors from abusive practices by their attorneys and other debt relief agencies. See 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(1) (requiring debt relief agencies to perform all promised services); 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(2) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from advising debtors to make false or misleading statements to obtain bankruptcy relief); 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(3) (prohibiting debt relief agencies from misrepresenting to debtors the costs or benefits of bankruptcy). The placement of Section 526(a)(4) as the fourth item in this list strongly implies that Congress likewise intended that provision to target abusive conduct by debt relief agencies.[11]

The BAPCPA's remedial provisions similarly belie petitioners' contention that Section 526(a)(4) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising debtors to incur additional debt in circumstances where such conduct would be lawful and prudent. As the Fifth Circuit observed, the principal remedy for a violation of Section 526(a)(4) is a suit against the attorney to recover the debtor's "actual damages," as well as restitution of any fees paid by the debtor. Hersh, 553 F.3d at 759-760 (citing 11 U.S.C. 526(c)). "Congress's emphasis on actual damages for violations of section 526(a)(4) strongly suggests that Congress viewed that section as aimed at advice to debtors which if followed would have a significant risk of [11] Similarly, Section 526(c) establishes a malpractice remedy against any debt relief agency whose "intentional or negligent failure to file any required document" causes the client to suffer dismissal or conversion of her bankruptcy case. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2)(B).

harming the debtor." Id. at 760. By contrast, "legal and appropriate advice that would be protected by the First Amendment, yet prohibited by a broad reading of § 526(a)(4), should cause no damage at all." Pet. App. 27a (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). "The remedial focus of § 526 thus bolsters the proposition that § 526(a)(4) was aimed only at advice given by a debt relief agency that is designed to abuse the bankruptcy process." Ibid.[12]

3. A federal rule of professional conduct in this setting serves an important function

Amici NACBA et al. assert (Br. 18-20) that reading Section 526(a)(4) as an ethical rule of this nature would render the provision "superfluous," because the Bankruptcy Code already penalizes debtors when they engage in abusive bankruptcy conduct and attorneys are already subject to state-law ethical obligations. That reasoning is flawed.

To be sure, the client who takes the attorney's unethical advice may well suffer adverse consequences under bankruptcy law, including having her petition dismissed. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2) and (3). Congress determined, however, that when such a consequence results from an attorney's misconduct, remedies should lie against the attorney—including compensation for the client. See 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2)(A). Invalidation of Section 526(a)(4) [12] Amici NACBA et al. observe (Br. 22) that Section 526(c)(3) permits not only recovery of actual damages, but also disgorgement of fees, when a client can establish that a debt relief agency has "intentionally or negligently failed to comply with any provision of [Section 526]." But even though actual damages are not required in every case, Section 526's emphasis on private enforcement of the statute, by the clients themselves, serves to confirm that Congress expected that violations would harm clients.

would render that remedy unavailable with respect to a significant category of improper attorney advice.

Although an attorney who engages in the conduct that Section 526(a)(4) prohibits may be subject to discipline by a state bar, providing a federal remedy under the Bankruptcy Code serves important purposes. First, the Code creates a uniform nationwide standard, appropriate to bankruptcy practice. Second, the Code gives a client a private right of action against an unethical attorney who has violated Section 526(a)(4), and it encourages such actions in the public interest by providing for fee-shifting. 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2). State bar rules rarely if ever are privately enforceable. Third, the Code permits the federal court to enjoin an attorney from violating Section 526 again in any State or district, 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(3)(A) and (5)(A), whereas an unethical practitioner who has been sanctioned under the law of one jurisdiction may continue to provide unethical advice in another. Indeed, a practitioner in a particular bankruptcy court may not even be licensed by that State's bar. See, e.g., Rittenhouse v. Delta Home Improvement, Inc. (In re Desilets), 291 F.3d 925, 930-931 (6th Cir. 2002).

4. Section 526(a)(4) does not cover petitioners' examples of appropriate debt counseling or the provision of information concerning a client's legal options

For the reasons set forth above, Section 526(a)(4) does not cover the hypothetical scenarios that troubled the court of appeals. See Pet. App. 13a-14a (postulating two situations in which "it would likely be in the assisted person's, and even the creditors', best interest for the assisted person to incur additional debt" before bankruptcy, and speculating that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist").

Contrary to the court's interpretation, an attorney would be free to advise a client to refinance her home mortgage at a lower rate to prevent bankruptcy, provided all appropriate disclosures were made to the lender.[13] See id. at 13a. Likewise, an attorney could lawfully advise a client to incur "additional secured debt" to purchase a reliable automobile and thereby ensure her ability to get to work, assuming again that appropriate disclosures were made. See id. at 14a. In neither case would the attorney be advising the debtor to incur unnecessary debt for the purpose of abusing the bankruptcy system. See Hersh, 553 F.3d at 761. The similar examples cited by petitioners (Br. 48-53) are outside the scope of the statute for the same reason.

Petitioners also suggest (Br. 41) that Section 526(a)(4) unconstitutionally prohibits attorneys from "participat[ing] in a discussion with the client weighing the pros and cons of a client's pending decision to incur more debt." That contention reflects a misreading of the statutory text, even assuming it refers only to discussions of "loading up" on debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. Section 526(a)(4) does not bar discussions about incurring new debt (however abusive the transaction might be), but only affirmative advice "to incur more debt in contemplation of" filing a petition for bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. 526(a)(4) (emphasis added).[14] [13] The court of appeals did not explain its apparent assumption that refinancing an existing debt—that is, exchanging one loan for another with the same principal balance but a different interest rate or repayment period—would constitute incurring "more debt" within the meaning of Section 526(a)(4).

[14] The statute unambiguously requires affirmative encouragement to incur more debt, although that encouragement might be communicated in a variety of ways (both direct and indirect).

Rules governing legal practice commonly distinguish between discussion of options and affirmative advice or encouragement. For example, while the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct provide that "[a] lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent," the same rule states that "a lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client and may counsel or assist a client to make a good faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning or application of the law." Model Rules of Prof'l Conduct R. 1.2(d). The commentary to Model Rule 1.2 underscores the point: "There is a critical distinction between presenting an analysis of legal aspects of questionable conduct and recommending the means by which a crime or fraud might be committed with impunity." Id. R. 1.2, cmt. 9. Section 526(a)(4)'s use of the phrase "advise * * * to incur more debt" captures the same distinction between discussion and affirmative encouragement. Cf. Webster's Third New International Dictionary 32 (1993) (defining "advise" to mean, inter alia, "counsel" or "recommend").

B. The Court of Appeals Disregarded Basic Principles Of Constitutional Avoidance

To the extent that the proper interpretation of Section 526(a)(4) is open to question, the court of appeals was not justified in adopting the broadest possible interpretation of the provision and then declaring it unconstitutional as so construed. Federal courts construe federal statutes to avoid, not invite, constitutional difficulties. Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 331 (1988). Particularly in the context of a First Amendment overbreadth challenge, where the plaintiff contends that a statute is invalid even though it may be legitimately applied in some or many circumstances, the federal courts have not only "the power to adopt narrowing constructions," but "the duty to avoid constitutional difficulties by doing so if such a construction is fairly possible." Id. at 330-331 (emphasis added); see also, e.g., Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 613 (1973) ("Facial overbreadth has not been invoked when a limiting construction has been or could be placed on the challenged statute.").[15] In this case, however, the court of appeals held Section 526(a)(4) unconstitutional without adverting to the doctrine of constitutional avoidance or explaining why its broad interpretation of Section 526(a)(4) was the only available reading of the statute. See, e.g., Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988) ("[E]very reasonable construction must be resorted to, in order to save a statute from unconstitutionality.") (emphasis added; citation omitted).

This Court has repeatedly applied saving constructions to avoid invalidating Acts of Congress far less amenable to a narrowing interpretation. In Boos, the Court considered a First Amendment overbreadth challenge to a statute that made it unlawful "to congregate within 500 feet of any [embassy, legation, or consulate] and [15] Petitioners argue (Br. 31-35) that the Court should construe the term "debt relief agency" to avoid the same constitutional overbreadth objection. As discussed at pp. 26-27, supra, however, petitioners' proposed construction is foreclosed by the statutory definition of the term "debt relief agency," and it would seriously undermine numerous regulations of debt relief agencies that are unquestionably constitutional. By contrast, the phrase "in contemplation of [bankruptcy]" is not defined and can reasonably be read to avoid constitutional problems, particularly in light of the interpretation that phrase has historically been given in the bankruptcy context.

refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police." 485 U.S. at 329 (citation omitted). The Court acknowledged that "[s]tanding alone, this text is problematic * * * because it applies to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason." Id. at 330. Nevertheless, citing the federal courts' "duty to avoid constitutional difficulties" when a narrowing "construction is fairly possible," the Court construed the statute to apply "'only when the police reasonably believe that a threat to the security or peace of the embassy is present'"—a limitation unstated in the statutory text but necessary to ensure the validity of the Act. Id. at 330-331 (citation omitted). See also, e.g., Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 689 (2001); Edward J. DeBartolo Corp., 485 U.S. at 576-578. Here, the interpretation of Section 526(a)(4) that was advanced by the government and endorsed by the dissent below, and that the Fifth Circuit adopted in Hersh, see 553 F.3d at 754, is consistent with the text of that provision and with the BAPCPA's overall structure and purposes. The court of appeals erred in refusing to adopt it.

Petitioners contend (Br. 64-66) that adopting a narrowing construction, instead of reading the statute to its broadest extent (and then striking it down as overbroad), would create a problem of "vagueness" and would therefore "chill" lawful advice. As explained above, however, the government's construction of Section 526(a)(4) as limited to a particular set of abusive practices is firmly tethered to the text, history, and purpose of the statute. See pp. 28-40, supra. The impropriety of those practices is already well-established, and even if it were not, any attorney signing a bankruptcy petition must already certify that the petition "does not constitute an abuse under [11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1)]." 11

U.S.C. 707(b)(4)(C)(ii)(II). That certification requires familiarity with longstanding precedent interpreting the Bankruptcy Code's references to "abuse" and "substantial abuse." See, e.g., Price, 353 F.3d at 1139-1140.[16] Thus, attorneys are already required to be on notice of the practices that are treated as abusive under the Bankruptcy Code; Section 526(a)(4) simply bars attorneys from encouraging their clients to commit one such abusive practice.

C. Section 526(a)(4) Is Consistent With The First Amendment

If Section 526(a)(4) is given the limiting construction described above, the provision easily satisfies the First Amendment. The advice that Section 526(a)(4) covers is subject to reasonable regulation in the service of the government's valid interests in protecting the bankruptcy system and its participants from unethical conduct.

1. A licensed attorney's ethical obligations to the bench and the profession sometimes require her to exercise a degree of restraint in what she advocates and how. "'Membership in the bar is a privilege burdened with conditions,' to use the oft-repeated statement of Cardozo, J." Gentile v. State Bar, 501 U.S. 1030, 1066 (1991) (quoting In re Rouss, 221 N.Y. 81, 84 (1917), cert.

[16] Indeed, amici NACBA et al. acknowledge (Br. 19) the substantial commonality between the required certification and the conduct that Section 526(a)(4) prohibits on the government's reading. Contrary to amici's contentions, however, the government's reading does not make Section 526(a)(4) superfluous: the certification provides some protection against abusive filings, whereas Section 526(a)(4) specifically prohibits a certain type of unethical advice that may or may not lead to an abusive filing. Section 526(a)(4) also prescribes different, more client-protective remedies. Compare 11 U.S.C. 526(c)(2), with 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(4)(B).

denied, 146 U.S. 661 (1918)). As the Court held in Gentile, attorneys are not merely self-interested actors and agents of their clients, but also licensed officers of the courts. For that reason, attorneys may be "subject to ethical restrictions on speech to which an ordinary citizen would not be." Id. at 1071; see Goldfarb, 421 U.S. at 792 (the government's interest "in regulating lawyers is especially great since lawyers are essential to the primary governmental function of administering justice, and have historically been 'officers of the courts'"). "This does not mean, of course, that lawyers forfeit their First Amendment rights, only that a less demanding standard applies." Gentile, 501 U.S. at 1082 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

In articulating those principles, the Court in Gentile broke no new ground. Rather, the Court explained that five Justices in In re Sawyer, 360 U.S. 622 (1959), had agreed that "lawyers in pending cases were subject to ethical restrictions on speech to which an ordinary citizen would not be." Gentile, 501 U.S. at 1071. Justice Stewart's controlling concurrence in Sawyer rejected the notion "that a lawyer can invoke the constitutional right of free speech to immunize himself from even-handed discipline for proven unethical conduct," because "[a] lawyer belongs to a profession with inherited standards of propriety and honor, which experience has shown necessary in a calling dedicated to the accomplishment of justice." 360 U.S. at 646 (Stewart, J., concurring in the result). Justice Stewart concluded that "[o]bedience to ethical precepts may require abstention from what in other circumstances might be constitutionally protected speech." Id. at 646-647. Four other Members of the Court agreed. See id. at 666-669 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). See also Ohralik v. Ohio

State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447, 460 (1978) (sustaining a restriction on attorney solicitation because the government "bears a special responsibility for maintaining standards among members of the licensed professions"); In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412, 422 (1978); Cohen v. Hurley, 366 U.S. 117, 124 (1961) ("[L]awyers must operate * * * as assistants to the court in search of a just solution to disputes.").

2. Respondents are incorrect in contending (Br. 66-67) that Section 526(a)(4), in its application to respondents' provision of legal advice, is subject to strict scrutiny rather than to the Gentile standard. There is no basis on which to distinguish bar members' obligations when practicing in bankruptcy court, or when counseling debtors who are considering the initiation of bankruptcy proceedings, from Gentile's obligations as a practitioner in the Nevada trial court. Bankruptcy is a judicial function performed by judicial officers appointed and supervised by the Article III judiciary. A bankruptcy petition both invokes the "core * * * federal bankruptcy power" to undertake "the restructuring of debtor-creditor relations," and also potentially brings related adversary proceedings within the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction. Northern Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 71 (1982) (plurality opinion). And bankruptcy courts generally have the same implicit powers as other federal courts to admit and discipline attorneys and otherwise enforce "submission to their lawful mandates," Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 43 (1991) (quoting Anderson v. Dunn, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 204, 227 (1821)). See, e.g., Price v. Lehtinen (In re Lehtinen), 564 F.3d 1052, 1058 (9th Cir. 2009), petition for cert. pending, No. 09-113 (filed July 24, 2009); Jones v. Bank of Santa Fe (In re Courtesy Inns, Ltd.), 40 F.3d 1084, 1089 (10th Cir. 1994); see also Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 549 U.S. 365, 375-376 (2007).

An attorney who advises or otherwise assists in an abuse of the bankruptcy system breaches his obligations to the tribunal and to the judicial system. The fairness and public reputation of bankruptcy proceedings are directly harmed when the bankruptcy discharge is misused to gain an improper benefit at an unsecured creditor's expense, or when the standards of eligibility for the discharge are gamed by taking on new and unnecessary debt on the eve of bankruptcy. Cf. Marrama, 549 U.S. at 375 (bankruptcy court's authority "'to prevent an abuse of process'" is "surely adequate" to order a halt to "action prejudicial to creditors") (quoting 11 U.S.C. 105(a)).

Contrary to petitioners' contention (Br. 75-76), the principles announced in Gentile are not limited to attorney conduct in connection with criminal litigation. Although Gentile's unethical conduct included public statements about a pending criminal matter, the ethical rule he violated related to any "adjudicative proceeding," 501 U.S. at 1033 (opinion of Kennedy, J.) (quoting Nev. Sup. Ct. R. 177(1)), and the Court's opinion drew on cases from the civil as well as criminal context, see id. at 1071, 1073-1074. The considerations that were held to justify the ethical rule there—preventing improper considerations from influencing the outcome of the proceeding or tainting the venire—were not limited to criminal trials or to trial-level proceedings. See id. at 1075; cf. Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 129 S. Ct. 2252, 2259 (2009).

Petitioners' reliance (Br. 35-36, 43) on Legal Services Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001), is misplaced. The statute at issue in Velazquez conditioned the receipt of federal funds on an attorney's agreement not to challenge the validity of state or federal welfare laws. Id. at 538. The provision did not purport to regulate attorney ethics or avoid client abuses, but rather prevented attorneys from making "all the reasonable and well-grounded arguments necessary for proper resolution of the case." Id. at 545. Section 526(a)(4), by contrast, prevents attorneys from subverting the bankruptcy process and jeopardizing their clients' interests by encouraging abuses of the Bankruptcy Code.

3. Section 526(a)(4) is constitutional under the Gentile standard. As the Fifth Circuit explained in Hersh, Section 526(a)(4) provides a bankruptcy-specific analogue to Rule 1.2(d) of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which states that an attorney may not "counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is illegal or fraudulent." 553 F.3d at 756 (citation omitted). Versions of that rule are in effect throughout the Nation, including in petitioners' home State. Rule 1.2(d) has never been challenged under the First Amendment, much less held to violate it. Ibid.[17] Indeed, the court of appeals acknowledged that Section 526(a)(4) is supported by a legitimate government interest; the court's conclusion that the statute was nonetheless unconstitutional depended on its adoption of petitioners' overly broad reading of the statute's scope. See Pet. App. 12a.

[17] Culver illustrates the application of Rule 1.2(d) to the kind of advice that Section 526(a)(4) prohibits. In Culver, the client expressed concern about taking on more debt. Attorney Culver not only "advised her to obtain more credit cards and take cash advances on the cards to pay his fees," but also "explained that she would not have to repay that money because he would represent her to have the debts discharged in bankruptcy." 889 A.2d at 429 (emphasis added). He even gave her an application for a credit card. Id. at 444. The state court unanimously concluded that because the client could not repay the debt and "the bankruptcy discussions were in the context of present intent to avoid repaying the debt," Culver had committed a fraudulent act in violation of Rule 1.2(d). Ibid.

Amicus American Bar Association (ABA) suggests (Br. 10-11 & n.15) that Section 526(a)(4) is infirm because Congress has not barred debtors from assuming more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy. That argument lacks merit, for several reasons. First, in some cases covered by Section 526(a)(4), the client's conduct will itself be illegal. See, e.g., Hersh, 553 F.3d at 755 ("Taking out loans without intending to repay them may also be considered theft under state law."); see also 18 U.S.C. 157 (bankruptcy fraud statute); 1 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 7.07[1][a] at 7-121 (Dec. 1996) (Collier) ("Misrepresenting one's financial status, presumably to profit by inducing others to extend goods or services on credit, seems to qualify."). In those cases, the attorney unquestionably has no First Amendment right to advise the client to engage in that conduct. Neither an attorney nor any other individual has a constitutional right to participate in the commission of a crime. Offers to engage in unlawful activity "enjoy no First Amendment protection." Williams, 128 S. Ct. at 1841; see also Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376, 388-389 (1973) (same rule applies to unlawful activity that is not criminally proscribed). An attorney's recommendation that a client incur additional debt in order to defraud creditors is not constitutionally protected "abstract advocacy of illegality"; it is "speech * * * that is intended to induce or commence illegal activities." Id. at 1842; see also Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447-448 (1969) (per curiam).

In other cases, the client may not be susceptible to prosecution because he lacks the requisite intent. Cf. Culver, 849 A.2d at 429. Even in that situation, however, the government has a strong interest in preventing the rendering of professional advice that could lead to the subversion of the bankruptcy system. Cf. Roadway Express, 447 U.S. at 765 (relying on the "well-acknowledged inherent power of a court" to remedy and prevent "abusive litigation practices") (citation omitted). That is especially so in a context like this one, in which the sole reason why the client is not guilty of a crime may well be that he has relied on advice from counsel to undertake a particular course of action, which itself may be sufficient to defeat the intent element. See 1 Collier ¶ 7.07[1][d] at 7-130 (June 2004) (advice of counsel may be a defense to bankruptcy fraud). The ABA's position would insulate attorneys from liability by virtue of their very success in insulating their clients. That double-fisted protection for abusive bankruptcy practices cannot be constitutionally required.

Attorneys have long been subject to discipline, or to malpractice liability, for recommending courses of action that are unethical even if not illegal (or tortious). For instance, an attorney may be disciplined for involvement in concealing assets, even if the concealment does not satisfy all of the elements of an unlawful fraudulent conveyance. In re Kenyon, 491 S.E.2d 252, 254 (S.C. 1997) ("We do not have to find fraudulent conveyances—only fraudulent or dishonest conduct."); accord In re Conduct of Hockett, 734 P.2d 877, 882-883 (Or. 1987).

The authority to impose discipline for unethical conduct is on particularly strong ground where, as here, the attorney's improper advice affects not only the client, but the judicial system to which the attorney owes a professional obligation. See Gentile, 501 U.S. at 1075-1076 (describing the "substantial state interest" in "protect[ing] the integrity and fairness of a State's judicial system" against prejudicial conduct by "officers of the court," who "have a duty to protect its integrity"). Thus, for example, attorneys may be sanctioned for advising their clients to engage in various unethical conduct (such as hiring a lawyer strategically to force a judge's recusal) that the client may lawfully undertake but that is prejudicial to the administration of the legal system. See McCuin v. Texas Power & Light Co., 714 F.2d 1255, 1264-1266 (5th Cir. 1983) ("Lawyers are not permitted to do everything for a client that he would stoop to do himself had he but their knowledge."); Grievance Adm'r v. Fried, 570 N.W.2d 262, 264, 267 (Mich. 1997). The same principle applies here: rules of professional conduct "may demand some adherence to the precepts of [the judicial] system in regulating [attorneys'] speech as well as their conduct" when that speech, if acted upon, directly undermines that system. Gentile, 501 U.S. at 1074.[18]

D. The Court Of Appeals Failed To Apply Basic Principles Of Overbreadth Analysis

Because "invalidating a law that in some of its applications is perfectly constitutional * * * has obvious harmful effects," this Court has "vigorously enforced the requirement that a statute's overbreadth be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the stat-

---

[18] The same First Amendment standard logically applies to the work of bankruptcy petition preparers, who owe equivalent professional obligations to the tribunal that will adjudicate the petitions they prepare. See 11 U.S.C. 110(h)-(k) (providing for discipline of bankruptcy petition preparers).

ute's plainly legitimate sweep." Williams, 128 S. Ct. at 1838. The court of appeals failed to adhere to that principle when it struck down Section 526(a)(4) as applied to attorneys without giving proper weight to the statute's admittedly legitimate applications.

As shown above, Section 526(a)(4) may validly be applied to a significant category of unethical attorney advice. Against that legitimate sweep, the court below hypothesized two instances of legitimate, ethical advice to accumulate new debt on the eve of bankruptcy: buying a car and refinancing a mortgage. Pet. App. 13a-14a. The court speculated that "[f]actual scenarios other than these few hypothetical situations no doubt exist." Id. at 14a. On that slim and concededly "hypothetical" basis, the majority held the statute unconstitutional as applied to all attorney conduct, including the abusive practices at which Section 526(a)(4) was directly aimed.

That approach was misconceived. As explained above, Section 526(a)(4) as properly construed does not cover the hypothetical examples discussed by the court. See pp. 41-42, supra. But even if some situations could be hypothesized in which Section 526(a)(4) prohibits attorney speech without a constitutionally adequate justification, that is no basis for invalidating all applications of the provision to attorneys, as the court of appeals did here. As Judge Colloton observed, "a facial challenge resting on a 'few hypothetical situations' * * * is unlikely to justify invalidating a statute in all of its applications, because 'the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge.'" Pet. App. 24a (quoting Members of the City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 800 (1984)). That correct understanding of overbreadth analysis precludes invalidation of Section 526(a)(4).

III. THE COURT OF APPEALS CORRECTLY REJECTED PETITIONERS' CHALLENGE TO THE ADVERTISING-DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS OF 11 U.S.C. 528

Petitioners' challenge to the advertising-disclosure requirements of 11 U.S.C. 528 is likewise without merit. Those requirements apply only to publicly disseminated offers to perform bankruptcy-related services for a fee; they impose no restriction on what advertisers may say; and they mandate the inclusion of only a brief disclaimer whose substance is factually accurate and whose precise wording may be varied as needed. Applying the First Amendment standard that governs commercial advertising disclaimers, the court of appeals correctly concluded that Section 528's modest disclosure requirements are "reasonably and rationally related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors." Pet. App. 19a.

A. Disclosure Requirements In Commercial Advertising Must Bear A "Reasonable Relationship" To A Valid State Interest

1. Attorney advertisements are quintessential commercial speech. See, e.g., Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618, 623 (1995) (Went For It); Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748, 773 n.25 (1976). While this Court has invalidated categorical bans on advertisements of legal services, Bates v. State Bar, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), it has recognized that attorney advertising and other forms of solicitation may be regulated without triggering the requirements of strict scrutiny. See, e.g., Went For It, 515 U.S. at 623-624. In addition, the Court has drawn a sharp distinction between commercial-speech regulations that preclude an advertiser from communicating a truthful commercial message, see, e.g., Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co., 514 U.S. 476 (1995); Edenfield v. Fane, 507 U.S. 761 (1993), and disclosure requirements, which simply mandate the inclusion of additional information that helps to prevent deception of the public. The Court has held that disclosure requirements are subject to more deferential scrutiny than are outright restrictions on advertising content. See Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of the Supreme Court, 471 U.S. 626, 650-652 (1985); see also In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191, 201 (1982); Bates, 433 U.S. at 384 (States may require attorney advertisements to include a "warning or disclaimer * * * so as to assure that the consumer is not misled").

That distinction is particularly significant in the context of advertising to promote legal advice and related services, such as bankruptcy assistance, because of the difficulty consumers have in evaluating both the promotion and the provision of these services. The Court has recognized this difficulty on numerous occasions. "[B]ecause the public lacks sophistication concerning legal services, misstatements that might be overlooked or deemed unimportant in other advertising may be found quite inappropriate in legal advertising." Bates, 433 U.S. at 383; see Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy, 425 U.S. at 773 n.25 (noting that lawyers "do not dispense standardized products" but "render professional services of almost infinite variety and nature, with the consequent enhanced possibility for confusion and deception if they were to undertake certain kinds of advertising"). Disclosure requirements are an important part of the solution to the problem. Even when striking down outright restrictions on advertising, the Court has emphasized that the government "retains the power to correct omissions that have the effect of presenting an inaccurate picture." Bates, 433 U.S. at 375. Under the First Amendment, "the preferred remedy is more disclosure, rather than less." Ibid.

Because of the lesser burden imposed by disclosure provisions, this Court has prescribed a standard of review less searching than the intermediate-scrutiny analysis it has applied to content prohibitions in the attorney-advertising context. The leading decision is Zauderer, which involved an Ohio attorney disciplined for violating a variety of bar rules related to advertising. The Court upheld a disclosure requirement analogous to Section 528, see 471 U.S. at 650-652, even as it struck down several other bar rules that affirmatively restricted speech, see id. at 632-633, 639.

Ohio required attorneys who advertise their willingness to represent clients for a contingency fee to include a statement concerning whether the fee arrangement would require the client to pay court costs even in the event of a loss. The Court specifically rejected the argument that the State was required to demonstrate that Zauderer's "advertisement, absent the required disclosure, would be false or deceptive," that "the disclosure requirement directly advances the relevant governmental interest," or that the requirement "constitutes the least restrictive means of doing so." 471 U.S. at 650. Such arguments, the Court explained, "overlook[] material differences between disclosure requirements and outright prohibitions on speech." Ibid. The Court further explained that, "in virtually all [its] commercial speech decisions" up to that point, it had "emphasized that because disclosure requirements trench much more narrowly on an advertiser's interests than do flat prohibitions on speech, 'warning[s] or disclaimer[s] might be appropriately required . . . in order to dissipate the possibility of consumer confusion or deception.'" Id. at 651 (quoting R.M.J., 455 U.S. at 201).

Accordingly, the Court in Zauderer held that disclosure requirements applicable to attorney advertising need only be "reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." 471 U.S. at 651; accord id. at 656 (Brennan, J., concurring in part, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) (agreeing, "[w]ith some qualifications," that "a State may impose commercial-advertising disclosure requirements" that satisfy that reasonable-relationship standard). The Court concluded that the challenged state bar rule "easily pass[ed] muster under this standard" because "[t]he State's position"—that contingent-fee advertising is deceptive if it does not clarify the client's liability for costs—was "reasonable enough to support [the disclosure] requirement." Id. at 652-653.

2. Petitioners fundamentally misconceive these governing principles. For example, petitioners compare (Br. 76-77) the disclosure requirements of Section 528 to the kind of forced political speech at issue in Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977) ("Live Free or Die" motto), and West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) (Pledge of Allegiance). "[T]he interests at stake in this case," however, are simply "not of the same order." Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650-651. As in Zauderer, Congress in enacting Section 528 did not seek "to 'prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion,'" but merely prescribed what disclaimers will ensure that a particular class of "commercial advertising" is not misleading. Id. at 651 (quoting Barnette, 319 U.S. at 642). In the latter context, the Court explained, "an advertiser's rights are adequately protected as long as disclosure requirements are reasonably related to the State's interest in preventing deception of consumers." Ibid.[19]

Petitioners are likewise mistaken in contending (Br. 90-94) that Section 528 must be analyzed under the framework of intermediate scrutiny set out in Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 557 (1980). This Court rejected the identical argument in Zauderer. Although the Court applied the Central Hudson standard in analyzing and invalidating Ohio's affirmative restrictions on attorney advertisements (such as the State's prohibition on the use of even truthful, nonmisleading illustrations), Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 632-633, 639, the Court specifically declined to analyze the disclosure requirement under the same principles, explaining that there are "material differences between disclosure requirements and outright prohibitions on speech," id. at 650. The Court further explained that "the First Amendment interests implicated by disclosure requirements are substantially weaker than those at stake when speech is actually suppressed." Id. at 652 n.14. The court of appeals in this case was therefore correct in analyzing Section 528 under the disclosure principles discussed in Zauderer rather than under Central Hudson. See Pet. App. 18a.[20]

[19] Petitioners (Br. 77, 79, 83) and amici NACBA et al. (Br. 27-28) are similarly wrong in relying on Riley v. National Federation of the Blind of North Carolina, Inc., 487 U.S. 781 (1988). The Court in Riley struck down a disclosure requirement outside the context of commercial advertising, while reiterating that "[p]urely commercial speech is more susceptible to compelled disclosure requirements." Id. at 796 & n.9 (citing Zauderer, supra).

B. Section 528 Is A Reasonable Means Of Combating A Documented Risk Of Consumer Deception

Section 528 is a reasonable response to the problem Congress identified: advertising that promotes debt-relief services without disclosing that those services entail a bankruptcy filing and its attendant consequences. By using either the statutory disclaimer or a permissible alternative ("a substantially similar statement") in their public advertising, debt relief agencies make clear the nature of the services they are offering. Under the governing Zauderer standard, Section 528 is constitutional.

1. Section 528 responded to "increasingly aggressive lawyer advertising"

In hearings preceding the 2005 Act, Congress heard evidence of "increasingly aggressive lawyer advertising"

[20] In any event, Section 528 would survive First Amendment scrutiny even under the Central Hudson standard. See Pet. App. 19a n.11 (citing Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906, 920 (D. Or. 2006), appeal pending, No. 07-35616 (9th Cir. filed July 24, 2007)). Section 528 "targets a concrete, nonspeculative harm." Went For It, 515 U.S. at 629. Indeed, as the court of appeals recognized, the statute is "directed precisely at the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services to the general public make clear that their services do in fact involve filing for bankruptcy." Pet. App. 19a. The requirement of a two-line disclosure does not "burden substantially more speech than necessary to further the government's legitimate interests." United States v. Edge Broad. Co., 509 U.S. 418, 430 (1993). Indeed, as already noted, the statute restricts no speech at all, but merely requires the disclosure of factually correct information. See Olsen, 350 B.R. at 921. As this Court observed in Zauderer, petitioners' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal." 471 U.S. at 651.

for bankruptcy services that offered to make consumers' debts "disappear" but failed even to "mention bankruptcy." 2003 Hearings 55. One retailer testified that some of his customers had been misled by such attorney advertisements and "d[id] not even understand that they ha[d] filed for bankruptcy." 1999 Hearings 123 (statement of Michael Moore, National Retail Federation). In 1997, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) warned that many debt-relief advertisements offering to "[w]ipe out" consumer debts, or to "[s]top credit harassment, foreclosures, [and] repossessions," regularly fail to disclose that such "relief may be spelled b-a-n-k-r-u-p-t-c-y." 1998 Hearings Pt. III, at 90-92. The FTC observed that such advertisements have the potential to mislead consumers into filing for bankruptcy without knowledge or appreciation of the consequences. See id. at 92 (warning that "bankruptcy stays on your credit report for 10 years, and can hinder your ability to get credit, a job, insurance, or even a place to live").[21]

The legislative record contains sample advertisements that gave Congress ample reason for concern. Print advertisements for law firms included such large-print headlines as "Stop Worrying About Your Bills For The New Year" and "ATTENTION: TOO MUCH DEBT?!" 1998 Hearings Pt. III, at 93, 94. Such advertisements prominently asserted that the law firm could "Consolidate and Lower Your Bills" or that "Federal Law Provides For: (A) Consolidation (one low monthly payment) (B) Liquidation (eliminate debts)." Ibid. References to the form of relief from debt that the firms would pursue were oblique at best, such as a star footnote referring to "U.S. Bankruptcy law," id. at 94, and a statement that the "forms of consolidation" include "court-assisted consolidation, like Chapter 13 bankruptcy," id. at 93.

[21] An updated version of the 1997 FTC alert was issued in 2008 and remains in effect today. See Division of Consumer & Bus. Educ., FTC, FTC Consumer Alert: Advertisements Promising Debt Relief May Be Offering Bankruptcy (May 2008) <http://www.ftc.gov/bcp/edu/pubs/consumer/alerts/alt015.shtm>.

Despite a legislative record extending over at least three hearings and several years, petitioners assert (Br. 92) that Congress did not identify a "substantial" interest in protecting the targets of such advertisements because the evidence did not "actually demonstrate that any consumer has been, in fact, deceived by this advertising." This Court held in Zauderer, however, that such a showing is not required: "When the possibility of deception is as self-evident as it is in this case, we need not require the [government] to 'conduct a survey of the . . . public before it [may] determine that the [advertisement] had a tendency to mislead.'" 471 U.S. at 652-653 (quoting FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 391-392 (1965)) (alterations in original); cf. Hersh, 553 F.3d at 766 (noting that "the government has a compelling interest in ensuring that those who enter bankruptcy know what it entails") (citing House Report 4). The evidence in the legislative record was sufficient for Congress reasonably to conclude that advertisements promising debt relief while downplaying the role of bankruptcy are inherently misleading. Cf. Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 653.

2. Section 528 addresses the identified problem directly and flexibly

In enacting Section 528, Congress responded directly to the deceptive practices that the FTC and others had identified. Section 528 requires debt relief agencies to "disclose in any advertisement of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public" that the advertised services "are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(3). In particular, if a debt relief agency's public advertisement offers "bankruptcy assistance services" (ibid.), or "indicat[es] that the debt relief agency provides assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt" (11 U.S.C. 528(b)(2)), the advertisement must include either the statutorily approved statement ("We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code.") or a "substantially similar statement." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B).

The solution that Congress devised—a two-line statement that identifies an attorney or other covered person as a "debt relief agency" under governing law and explains that the offered services include "help[ing] people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code"—"is reasonably and rationally related to the government's interest in preventing the deception of consumer debtors." Pet. App. 19a. Indeed, as the court of appeals explained, Section 528 is "directed precisely at the problem targeted by Congress: ensuring that persons who advertise bankruptcy-related services to the general public make clear that their services do in fact involve filing for bankruptcy." Ibid. Section 528 performs the modest but important function of enabling consumers to recognize advertisements promoting bankruptcy services for what they really are.

3. The Section 528 disclosures are factual in nature and are not misleading

The disclosure requirements imposed by Section 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B) apply only to persons who are "debt relief agenc[ies]" within the meaning of the BAPCPA. See 11 U.S.C. 528(a) and (b)(2). The disclosures that those provisions specify—i.e., "We are a debt relief agency" and "We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code"—are factually accurate and create no potential danger that potential customers will be misled as to the functions that the advertiser performs. As in Zauderer, petitioners' "constitutionally protected interest in not providing [such] factual information in [their] advertising is minimal." 471 U.S. at 651.

a. Section 528(a)(4)'s disclosure requirements apply only to persons who are "debt relief agenc[ies]" within the meaning of Section 101(12A). As applied to such persons, the statement "We are a debt relief agency" is by definition an accurate description of the advertiser's legal status. As a matter of ordinary English usage, moreover, the term "debt relief agency" accurately describes the persons subject to the disclosure requirement. Under the BAPCPA, that term is limited to persons who provide "bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person" or who act as "bankruptcy petition preparer[s]." 11 U.S.C. 101(12A); see 11 U.S.C. 101(4A) (definition of "bankruptcy assistance"). Persons who perform those functions are naturally understood to provide "debt relief." And they are "agencies" in the accepted sense in which that word is used to describe service-oriented businesses—e.g., travel agencies, advertising agencies, employment agencies, modeling agencies, and public relations agencies.[22]

Petitioners urge (Br. 88) that consumer bankruptcy attorneys "are entitled to call themselves 'attorneys' in their advertising." As the court of appeals recognized, however, nothing in the BAPCPA prevents them from doing so. See Pet. App. 20a ("[N]othing in the Code prevents [petitioners] from identifying themselves in their advertisements as both attorneys and debt relief agencies."). In enacting Section 528, Congress has not "prevent[ed] attorneys from conveying information to the public; it has only required them to provide somewhat more information than they might otherwise be inclined to present." Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 650.

Relying on R.M.J., supra, petitioners argue (Br. 88) that Section 528 is nonetheless invalid because "attorneys should not be compelled to use any label * * * other than one of their own choosing that is accurate and not deceptive." R.M.J., however, involved a prohibition on attorneys' using any phrase other than those on an approved list to describe their legal practice. 455 U.S. at 194-196. Here, by contrast, petitioners are free to advertise their practice in any manner they please, provided they also comply with the basic disclosure requirements in Section 528.[23]

[22] Amici NACBA et al. contend (Br. 26), based on a declaration submitted in other litigation by an NACBA member, that potential clients have expressed concern that a "debt relief agency" might be thought a government agency. As the record in that case shows, the author of that declaration bears considerable responsibility for the problem he encountered, as he advertised on his website that he has been "designated as a Federal Debt Relief Agency by an Act of Congress and the President of the United States." C.A. App. at 62, Connecticut Bar Ass'n v. United States, No. 08-4797-cv (2d Cir. argued Sept. 24, 2009).

b. Petitioners do not dispute the accuracy of the second half of the statutory disclaimer, i.e., that the person sponsoring the advertisement "help[s] people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." See Pet. Br. 87 (asserting that petitioners already mention bankruptcy in their advertising). Rather, they contend that the statement is required even in contexts in which it does not serve the core congressional purpose; they speculate, for example, that some law firms will be debt relief agencies by virtue of representing debtors, but will also wish to advertise to creditors that they perform services listed in Section 528(b)(2). But even as applied to that hypothetical and presumably narrow class, the required disclaimer is not misleading, much less inaccurate.[24] In these circumstances, it simply provides some extraneous information.

Petitioner's argument suggests, at most, that Section 528's purposes could have been achieved had Congress defined somewhat more narrowly the category of advertisements for which the specified disclosures are required. But as the Court held in Zauderer, the standard of review in this context is not whether the statute is narrowly tailored, but only whether it is "reasonably related to the State's interest"—here (as in Zauderer) the interest in preventing deception of consumers. See 471 U.S. at 651 n.14 ("reject[ing] [the] contention that [the Court] should subject disclosure requirements to a strict 'least restrictive means' analysis," because disclosure requirements are themselves less restrictive than other regulations); see also Went For It, 515 U.S. at 632 ("[T]he 'least restrictive means' test has no role in the commercial speech context.").

[23] Petitioners have not asserted that the requirement to include the short disclaimer in their advertising is burdensome for reasons other than the content of the disclaimer. Cf. Ibanez v. Florida Dep't of Bus. & Prof'l Regulation, 512 U.S. 136, 146-147 & n.11 (1994) (disclaimer required to accompany the term "specialist" was so unduly detailed that no one would use it on a business card or letterhead, thus effectively prohibiting the use of the term "specialist" in those contexts).

[24] The record does not reflect that petitioners themselves advertise any legal services beyond representing debtors in bankruptcy. See J.A. 38a-39a.

Moreover, Congress had valid reasons for making the disclosure requirement contingent on the content of the advertisement rather than on the advertiser's own characterization of the target audience. Advertisements frequently tout more than one service, see, e.g., 1998 Hearings Pt. III, at 95 (advertisement for bankruptcy, divorce, and personal injury representation), and the advertiser has only limited ability to choose or predict in advance who will see its communications. Congress reasonably concluded that advertisements offering "assistance with respect to * * * mortgage foreclosures [or] eviction proceedings," 11 U.S.C. 528(b)(2), may well implicate the same interests as advertisements promoting debt relief, because consumers desperate to stave off foreclosure or eviction may be attracted by the automatic stay of proceedings that a bankruptcy filing triggers. See 1998 Hearings Pt. III, at 92 (FTC alert noting that ads may promote the ability to "'STOP credit harassment [or] foreclosures'" or to "'Keep Your Property.'"). In any event, law firms and other entities that do not provide bankruptcy assistance services to assisted persons for compensation are not "debt relief agenc[ies]" and therefore are not covered by Section 528; that threshold eligibility determination will rule out many of petitioners' hypothetical applications to creditors' counsel.[25]

4. By its terms, Section 528 permits debt relief agencies to alter the wording of the required disclosures

Quibbles over the fit between the statutory disclaimer language and particular hypothetical situations are ultimately not relevant in this pre-enforcement challenge, which asserts that Section 528's disclaimer requirements are unconstitutional as applied to all attorneys. And if the statutory disclosures inaccurately describe the services that a particular debt relief agency performs, Section 528 establishes a mechanism by which the inaccuracy can be avoided. Any "substantially similar statement" may be substituted for the language set out in the statute. 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B). Thus, if a particular debt relief agency engages in the type of public advertising that triggers the disclosure requirements (see 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(3) and (b)(2)), but nevertheless avoids ever "help[ing] people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code," that debt relief agency presumably could tailor the disclaimer that it would include in its advertisements. The statutory option to customize the disclaimer further ameliorates any concern about the requirement's potential applications to hypothetical outlier cases.

[25] As explained above, a creditor is not an "assisted person," and representing creditors does not make an attorney a "debt relief agency." See pp. 22-24, supra. The assertion by amici NACBA et al. (Br. 28-30) that the disclaimer is "affirmatively false" rests on the misreading of "assisted person" as including creditors.

C. Petitioners Cannot Avoid Section 528's Disclosure Requirements By Asserting That Their Own Advertising Is Not Deceptive

Petitioners contend (Br. 87) that Section 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B) are unconstitutional as applied to their own advertising because that advertising is not deceptive and therefore does not raise the concerns that prompted Congress to act.[26] That assertion has no support in the record. Petitioners brought this action as a pre-enforcement challenge to Section 528, and they did not submit any past or future advertisements into evidence. Neither their petition for a writ of certiorari nor their brief in the court of appeals advanced the theory that they are entitled to an as-applied exemption from Section 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B) based on the non-deceptive content of their own prior advertising. See Pet. 22-30; Pet. C.A. Br. 41-50.

In any event, the Court in Zauderer specifically rejected the contention that the disclosure requirement challenged in that case would be unconstitutional unless the particular "advertisement, absent the required disclosure, would be false or deceptive." 471 U.S. at 650. To combat the deceptive practices of attorneys who promote the benefits of bankruptcy relief without the necessary explanation, Congress required all debt relief agencies who engage in specified forms of public advertising to comply with the basic disclosure requirements of Section 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B). That legislative judgment

[26] Petitioners assert that they "do not state in their advertisements that they can 'wipe out' unpaid bills, make debts 'disappear,' or 'stop credit harassment, foreclosures, or repossessions' without mentioning that these things are accomplished through bankruptcy," and that their advertisements "specifically mention 'bankruptcy' multiple times." Br. 87 (emphasis added).

is both reasonable and consistent with the First Amendment.[27]

The as-applied challenge that petitioners belatedly assert is especially ill-conceived because Section 528 allows regulated parties to substitute a "substantially similar statement" for the statement that the advertiser "help[s] people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." 11 U.S.C. 528(a)(4) and (b)(2)(B). See p. 68, supra. If the references to bankruptcy in petitioners' advertisements are suitably prominent (unlike, for example, the use of a star footnote in the advertisement appearing in the legislative history, see p. 62, supra), then petitioners may be able to satisfy Section 528's requirements with only modest changes to their advertising, or even none at all. Petitioners' new as-applied challenge logically depends on the proposition that their own advertisements contain references to bankruptcy that are clear enough to satisfy Congress's concerns, but are not "substantially similar" to the statement that petitioners "help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." Petitioners have not suggested what such advertisements would look like, let alone shown that their own advertisements fall within this hypothetical category. And they assuredly have not shown how adopting the Section 528 formulation or "a substantially similar statement" would meaningfully curtail their ability to advertise their services. This Court therefore should uphold the statutory disclosure requirements.

[27] This Court also granted certiorari on the question whether Section 528 violates the Due Process Clause. 08-1119 Pet. ii. Petitioners have not separately argued that issue and have accordingly abandoned it.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals should be reversed as to Section 526(a)(4) and in all other respects affirmed.

Respectfully submitted.

STATUTORY APPENDIX

1. 11 U.S.C. 101 provides in pertinent part:

Definitions

In this title the following definitions shall apply:

* * * * *

(3) The term "assisted person" means any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $150,000.

(4) The term "attorney" means attorney, professional law association, corporation, or partnership, authorized under applicable law to practice law.

(4A) The term "bankruptcy assistance" means any goods or services sold or otherwise provided to an assisted person with the express or implied purpose of providing information, advice, counsel, document preparation, or filing, or attendance at a creditors' meeting or appearing in a case or proceeding on behalf of another or providing legal representation with respect to a case or proceeding under this title.

* * * * *

(12) The term "debt" means liability on a claim.

(12A) The term "debt relief agency" means any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in return for the payment of money or other valuable consideration, or who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110, but does not include—

(A) any person who is an officer, director, employee, or agent of a person who provides such assistance or of the bankruptcy petition preparer;

(B) a nonprofit organization that is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986;

(C) a creditor of such assisted person, to the extent that the creditor is assisting such assisted person to restructure any debt owed by such assisted person to the creditor;

(D) a depository institution (as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) or any Federal credit union or State credit union (as those terms are defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act), or any affiliate or subsidiary of such depository institution or credit union; or

(E) an author, publisher, distributor, or seller of works subject to copyright protection under title 17, when acting in such capacity.

* * * * *

2. 11 U.S.C. 110 provides in pertinent part:

Penalty for persons who negligently or fraudulently prepare bankruptcy petitions

(a) In this section—

(1) "bankruptcy petition preparer" means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing; and

(2) "document for filing" means a petition or any other document prepared for filing by a debtor in a United States bankruptcy court or a United States district court in connection with a case under this title.

* * * * *

(e)(1) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall not execute any document on behalf of a debtor.

(2)(A) A bankruptcy petition preparer may not offer a potential bankruptcy debtor any legal advice, including any legal advice described in subparagraph (B).

(B) The legal advice referred to in subparagraph (A) includes advising the debtor—

(i) whether—

(I) to file a petition under this title; or

(II) commencing a case under chapter 7, 11, 12, or 13 is appropriate;

(ii) whether the debtor's debts will be discharged in a case under this title;

(iii) whether the debtor will be able to retain the debtor's home, car, or other property after commencing a case under this title;

(iv) concerning—

(I) the tax consequences of a case brought under this title; or

(II) the dischargeability of tax claims;

(v) whether the debtor may or should promise to repay debts to a creditor or enter into a reaffirmation agreement with a creditor to reaffirm a debt;

(vi) concerning how to characterize the nature of the debtor's interests in property or the debtor's debts; or

(vii) concerning bankruptcy procedures and rights.

* * * * *

3. 11 U.S.C. 526 provides:

Restrictions on debt relief agencies

(a) A debt relief agency shall not—

(1) fail to perform any service that such agency informed an assisted person or prospective assisted person it would provide in connection with a case or proceeding under this title;

(2) make any statement, or counsel or advise any assisted person or prospective assisted person to make a statement in a document filed in a case or proceeding under this title, that is untrue and misleading, or that upon the exercise of reasonable care, should have been known by such agency to be untrue or misleading;

(3) misrepresent to any assisted person or prospective assisted person, directly or indirectly, affirmatively or by material omission, with respect to—

(A) the services that such agency will provide to such person; or

(B) the benefits and risks that may result if such person becomes a debtor in a case under this title; or

(4) advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

(b) Any waiver by any assisted person of any protection or right provided under this section shall not be enforceable against the debtor by any Federal or State court or any other person, but may be enforced against a debt relief agency.

(c)(1) Any contract for bankruptcy assistance between a debt relief agency and an assisted person that does not comply with the material requirements of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall be void and may not be enforced by any Federal or State court or by any other person, other than such assisted person.

(2) Any debt relief agency shall be liable to an assisted person in the amount of any fees or charges in connection with providing bankruptcy assistance to such person that such debt relief agency has received, for actual damages, and for reasonable attorneys' fees and costs if such agency is found, after notice and a hearing, to have—

(A) intentionally or negligently failed to comply with any provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 with respect to a case or proceeding under this title for such assisted person;

(B) provided bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person in a case or proceeding under this title that is dismissed or converted to a case under another chapter of this title because of such agency's intentional or negligent failure to file any required document including those specified in section 521; or

(C) intentionally or negligently disregarded the material requirements of this title or the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure applicable to such agency.

(3) In addition to such other remedies as are provided under State law, whenever the chief law enforcement officer of a State, or an official or agency designated by a State, has reason to believe that any person has violated or is violating this section, the State—

(A) may bring an action to enjoin such violation;

(B) may bring an action on behalf of its residents to recover the actual damages of assisted persons arising from such violation, including any liability under paragraph (2); and

(C) in the case of any successful action under subparagraph (A) or (B), shall be awarded the costs of the action and reasonable attorneys' fees as determined by the court.

(4) The district courts of the United States for districts located in the State shall have concurrent jurisdiction of any action under subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (3).

(5) Notwithstanding any other provision of Federal law and in addition to any other remedy provided under

Federal or State law, if the court, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States trustee or the debtor, finds that a person intentionally violated this section, or engaged in a clear and consistent pattern or practice of violating this section, the court may—

(A) enjoin the violation of such section; or

(B) impose an appropriate civil penalty against such person.

(d) No provision of this section, section 527, or section 528 shall—

(1) annul, alter, affect, or exempt any person subject to such sections from complying with any law of any State except to the extent that such law is inconsistent with those sections, and then only to the extent of the inconsistency; or

(2) be deemed to limit or curtail the authority or ability—

(A) of a State or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, to determine and enforce qualifications for the practice of law under the laws of that State; or

(B) of a Federal court to determine and enforce the qualifications for the practice of law before that court.

4. 11 U.S.C. 528 provides:

Requirements for debt relief agencies

(a) A debt relief agency shall—

(1) not later than 5 business days after the first date on which such agency provides any bankruptcy assistance services to an assisted person, but prior to such assisted person's petition under this title being filed, execute a written contract with such assisted person that explains clearly and conspicuously—

(A) the services such agency will provide to such assisted person; and

(B) the fees or charges for such services, and the terms of payment;

(2) provide the assisted person with a copy of the fully executed and completed contract;

(3) clearly and conspicuously disclose in any advertisement of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public (whether in general media, seminars or specific mailings, telephonic or electronic messages, or otherwise) that the services or benefits are with respect to bankruptcy relief under this title; and

(4) clearly and conspicuously use the following statement in such advertisement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

(b)(1) An advertisement of bankruptcy assistance services or of the benefits of bankruptcy directed to the general public includes—

(A) descriptions of bankruptcy assistance in connection with a chapter 13 plan whether or not chapter 13 is specifically mentioned in such advertisement; and

(B) statements such as "federally supervised repayment plan" or "Federal debt restructuring help" or other similar statements that could lead a reasonable consumer to believe that debt counseling was being offered when in fact the services were directed to providing bankruptcy assistance with a chapter 13 plan or other form of bankruptcy relief under this title.

(2) An advertisement, directed to the general public, indicating that the debt relief agency provides assistance with respect to credit defaults, mortgage foreclosures, eviction proceedings, excessive debt, debt collection pressure, or inability to pay any consumer debt shall—

(A) disclose clearly and conspicuously in such advertisement that the assistance may involve bankruptcy relief under this title; and

(B) include the following statement: "We are a debt relief agency. We help people file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code." or a substantially similar statement.

5. 11 U.S.C. 707 provides in pertinent part:

Dismissal of a case or conversion to a case under chapter 11 or 13

* * * * *

(b)(1) After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee, trustee (or bankruptcy administrator, if any), or any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts, or, with the debtor's consent, convert such a case to a case under chapter 11 or 13 of this title, if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter. In making a determination whether to dismiss a case under this section, the court may not take into consideration whether a debtor has made, or continues to make, charitable contributions (that meet the definition of "charitable contribution" under section 548(d)(3)) to any qualified religious or charitable entity or organization (as that term is defined in section 548(d)(4)).

(2)(A)(i) In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter, the court shall presume abuse exists if the debtor's current monthly income reduced by the amounts determined under clauses (ii), (iii), and (iv), and multiplied by 60 is not less than the lesser of—

(I) 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured claims in the case, or $6,000, whichever is greater; or

(II) $10,000.

(ii)(I) The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief, for the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case, if the spouse is not otherwise a dependent. Such expenses shall include reasonably necessary health insurance, disability insurance, and health savings account expenses for the debtor, the spouse of the debtor, or the dependents of the debtor. Notwithstanding any other provision of this clause, the monthly expenses of the debtor shall not include any payments for debts. In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses shall include the debtor's reasonably necessary expenses incurred to maintain the safety of the debtor and the family of the debtor from family violence as identified under section 309 of the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act, or other applicable Federal law. The expenses included in the debtor's monthly expenses described in the preceding sentence shall be kept confidential by the court. In addition, if it is demonstrated that it is reasonable and necessary, the debtor's monthly expenses may also include an additional allowance for food and clothing of up to 5 percent of the food and clothing categories as specified by the National Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service.

(II) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include, if applicable, the continuation of actual expenses paid by the debtor that are reasonable and necessary for care and support of an elderly, chronically ill, or disabled household member or member of the debtor's immediate family (including parents, grandparents, siblings, children, and grandchildren of the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case who is not a dependent) and who is unable to pay for such reasonable and necessary expenses.

(III) In addition, for a debtor eligible for chapter 13, the debtor's monthly expenses may include the actual administrative expenses of administering a chapter 13 plan for the district in which the debtor resides, up to an amount of 10 percent of the projected plan payments, as determined under schedules issued by the Executive Office for United States Trustees.

(IV) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include the actual expenses for each dependent child less than 18 years of age, not to exceed $1,500 per year per child, to attend a private or public elementary or secondary school if the debtor provides documentation of such expenses and a detailed explanation of why such expenses are reasonable and necessary, and why such expenses are not already accounted for in the National Standards, Local Standards, or Other Necessary Expenses referred to in subclause (I).

(V) In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses may include an allowance for housing and utilities, in excess of the allowance specified by the Local Standards for housing and utilities issued by the Internal Revenue Service, based on the actual expenses for home energy costs if the debtor provides documentation of such actual expenses and demonstrates that such actual expenses are reasonable and necessary.

(iii) The debtor's average monthly payments on account of secured debts shall be calculated as the sum of—

(I) the total of all amounts scheduled as contractually due to secured creditors in each month of the 60 months following the date of the petition; and

(II) any additional payments to secured creditors necessary for the debtor, in filing a plan under chapter 13 of this title, to maintain possession of the debtor's primary residence, motor vehicle, or other property necessary for the support of the debtor and the debtor's dependents, that serves as collateral for secured debts;

divided by 60.

(iv) The debtor's expenses for payment of all priority claims (including priority child support and alimony claims) shall be calculated as the total amount of debts entitled to priority, divided by 60.

(B)(i) In any proceeding brought under this subsection, the presumption of abuse may only be rebutted by demonstrating special circumstances, such as a serious medical condition or a call or order to active duty in the Armed Forces, to the extent such special circumstances that justify additional expenses or adjustments of current monthly income for which there is no reasonable alternative.

* * * * *

(3) In considering under paragraph (1) whether the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter in a case in which the presumption in subparagraph (A)(i) of such paragraph does not arise or is rebutted, the court shall consider—

(A) whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith; or

(B) the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse.

I. INTRODUCTION AND STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This is an appeal filed by chapter 7 debtor Milford Connecticut Associates, L.P. (the "Debtor), Success-Treuhand GmbH ("ST"), an equity security holder of the Debtor, and Petillo Enterprises ("Petillo"), an unsecured creditor of the Debtor (collectively, the "Appellants").[1] The Appellants appeal a final order of the bankruptcy court, entered on June 17, 2008, that converted the Debtor's chapter 11 case to a case under chapter 7, for cause, under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) (the "Conversion Order"). [RA, Exhibit 2, at 16.] The Conversion Order granted the United States Trustee's Amended Motion and Memorandum of Law in Support of Her Motions for Orders Either Converting the Debtor's Chapter 11 Case to One under Chapter 11 or Directing the Appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee (the "Conversion Motion"). [RA, Exhibit 6, at 126.]

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over the Conversion Motion under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b)(2)(A) and 1334. The Conversion Order is a final order under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). See In re Firstcent Shopping Center, Inc., 141 B.R. 546, 550 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) (order converting a bankruptcy case is a final appealable order). See also In re Pegasus Agency, Inc., 101 F.3d 882, 885 (2d Cir. 1996) (a bankruptcy court order is final if it "completely resolve[s] all of the issues pertaining to a discrete claim, including issues as to the proper relief") (citations omitted). On June 27, 2008, the Debtor filed a timely Notice of Appeal.[2] [RA, Exhibit 1, at 1.] This Court, therefore, has jurisdiction to hear the appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

II. STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED[3]

A. Whether the bankruptcy court clearly erred in finding that there was cause, under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), to dismiss or convert the Debtor's chapter 11 case to a case under chapter 7; and

B. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it converted the Debtor's chapter 11 case to a case under chapter 7.

III. STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

The bankruptcy court's finding that there was cause to convert or dismiss a case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) is reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard. *Cedar Shore Resort, Inc. v. A bankruptcy court's decision to convert or to dismiss a chapter 11 case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) is reviewed for abuse of discretion. See C-TC 9th Avenue Partnership, 113 F.3d at 1312 (applying the abuse of discretion standard in an appeal of a decision dismissing a chapter 11 case under Section 1112(b)). See also In re Tiana Queen Motel, Inc., 749 F.2d 146, 151 (2d Cir. 1984) (court's decision to convert rather than dismiss under Section 1112(b) was not an abuse of discretion) and Cedar Shore Resort, 235 F.3d at 379 (the decision to convert or dismiss will only be reversed if the bankruptcy court abused its discretion). A court's ruling is not an abuse of discretion unless it is based "on an erroneous view of the law or on a clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence." *Cooter & Gell v. IV. STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. The Debtor

The Debtor is a limited partnership organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 18.] The Debtor's partners are ST and United States Land Resources ("United") (collectively, the "Equity Security Holders"). [RA, Exhibit 15, at 216, Question No.

21.a.] Lawrence Berger ("Mr. Berger") is the president of United. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 221.] Each Equity Security Holder owns a fifty percent interest in the Debtor. [RA, Exhibit 15, at 216, Question No. 21.a.]

The Debtor's sole asset is a parcel of commercial real property located at 265 Gate Lane, Milford, Connecticut (the "Real Property"). [RA, Exhibit 12, at 179.] The Debtor purchased the Real Property in 1986. [RA, Exhibit 11, at 179.] At the time the Debtor purchased the Real Property, there were two lessees, Owens-Illinois ("Owens") and Diversified Hospitality ("Diversified"). [RA, Exhibit 4, at 17, Lines 15-18, and Exhibit 12, at 179.] After Owens and Diversified vacated the premises, the Debtor leased the Real Property to Koenig Corporation ("Koenig"). [RA, Exhibit 12, at 179-180.] Koenig, however, filed bankruptcy and vacated the Real Property in the early 1990s. [RA, Exhibit 12, at 180.] Since that time, the Real Property has been vacant and has generated no cash flow. [RA, Exhibit 12, at 180, and Exhibit 4, at 74, Lines 19-25, and 75, Lines 1-10.] The Real Property, which the Debtor values at $10 million, is encumbered by a mortgage held by Paradigm CF Corporation, f.k.a. Mercury Capital Corporation ("Paradigm") in the approximate amount of $5.6 million and a tax lien of up to $1.6 million held by the City of Milford, Connecticut ("Milford"). [RA, Exhibit 8, at 149, and Exhibit 4, at 120, Lines 10-19.]

B. The 1999 Case

On March 29, 1999, the Debtor filed a voluntary chapter 11 petition (Case No. 99-31119) in the Bankruptcy Court for the District of Connecticut (the "1999 Case"). [RA, Exhibit 24, at 415, ECF Doc. No. 1.] The Debtor filed the 1999 Case to resolve a tax lien recorded on the Real Property, which Milford had transferred to Connecticut Freezer, Inc. ("CFI"). [RA, Exhibit 12, at 181.]

On June 29, 1999, the Debtor filed a disclosure statement (the “1999 Disclosure Statement”) and a plan of reorganization (the “1999 Plan”). [RA, Exhibit 24, at 419, ECF Doc. Nos. 37 and 38.] The 1999 Plan provided that United would contribute funds to the Debtor to rehabilitate the Real Property and to make initial payments to creditors under the Plan. [RA, Exhibit 25, at 437, § IV, and Exhibit 26, at 439, § VI.] The 1999 Plan also provided that once the rehabilitation was complete, the Debtor would lease the Real Property and use the rental income to complete the balance of payments under the Plan. [Id.] The bankruptcy court approved the 1999 Disclosure Statement on August 4, 1999. [RA, Exhibit 24, at 420, ECF Doc. No. 53.] After a trial on confirmation, the bankruptcy court entered an order confirming the 1999 Plan on December 22, 1999. [RA, Exhibit 24, at 425, ECF Doc. No. 90.] Under the terms of the 1999 Plan, United satisfied the claims of CFI and other creditors, but the Debtor did not complete the rehabilitation of the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 12, at 181, and Exhibit 4, at 75, Lines 11-16.]

Two months after confirmation, in February 2000, Paradigm loaned the Debtor $3 million and took a first lien on the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 12, at 180-181.] The Debtor has been delinquent in its obligations to Paradigm since 2000. [RA, Exhibit 12, at 181.] On May 30, 2003, the bankruptcy court entered a final decree and then closed the 1999 Case on July 1, 2003, after more than four years. [RA, Exhibit 24, at 428, ECF Doc. No. 116.]

C. The 2004 Case

Seven months after the 1999 Case closed, on February 6, 2004 (the “Petition Date”), the Debtor filed a new chapter 11 case in the Bankruptcy Court for the District of Connecticut (Case

No. 04-30511) (the “2004 Case”). [RA, Exhibit 23, at 375, ECF Doc. No. 1.] The Debtor filed the 2004 Case to stay a foreclosure judgment in favor of Paradigm entered in the Connecticut Superior Court. [RA, Exhibit 8, at 149.]

1. Assets and Liabilities

The Debtor filed its bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs on June 22, 2004, more than three months late.[4] [RA, Exhibit 23, at 377, ECF Doc. No. 30.] On Schedule A, the Debtor valued the Real Property at $10 million. [RA, Exhibit 11, at 8.] The valuation was premised upon the future development of the Real Property as a shopping center and the impending approval by Lowe’s of an adjacent property as a site for a new store that the Debtor claimed would make the Real Property desirable to national retailers. [RA, Exhibit 12, at 182.] In 2005, the bankruptcy court determined that the fair market value of the Real Property was $6.2 million, after hearing expert appraisal testimony during a hearing on Paradigm’s motion for relief from the automatic stay. [RA, Exhibit 13, at 204.] In 2008, an appraisal commissioned by Paradigm set the value of the Real Property at $7.8 million based on its condition at the time. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 111, Lines 11-15.] In 2008, the Debtor’s appraiser estimated that the value of the Real Property was $9.2 million. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 97, Lines 17-19.]

[4] Under 11 U.S.C. § 521(a)(1) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(c), debtors must file their schedules and statement of financial affairs “with the petition or within fifteen days thereafter” unless the bankruptcy court orders an extension of the deadline. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(c). The Debtor did not file its schedules and statement of financial affairs on the Petition Date. On February 27, 2004, the bankruptcy court entered an order extending the deadline for the Debtor to file its schedules and statement of financial affairs to March 8, 2004. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 376, ECF Doc. No. 17.] The Debtor did not file them on this date, nor did it seek any further extensions of the deadline. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 376-377.]

On Schedule D, the Debtor listed two secured creditors with claims totaling $4.4 million, including Paradigm ($4.3 million) and Retail Stores Credit Corp. ($100,000). [RA, Exhibit 14, at 209.] By 2008, Paradigm's secured claim had grown to more than $5.6 million. [RA, Exhibit 8, at 149.] On Schedule E, the Debtor scheduled a priority tax claim in the amount of $162,601 owed to Milford for real property taxes. [RA, Exhibit 15, at 211.] Milford filed proofs of claim in 2008 and asserted a secured claim totaling $408,080.26 and a separate unclassified claim for $1,057,016.96. [RA, Exhibit 28, at 444 and 446.] On Schedule F, the Debtor listed nine general unsecured creditors with claims totaling $3,594,020. [RA, Exhibit 15, at 212.] The largest claimant was United, with a claim of $3.5 million. [RA, Exhibit 15 at 212.] Scheduled non-insider general unsecured claims totaled $94,000. [RA, Exhibit 15, at 212.]

2. Monthly Operating Reports ("MORs")

During the pendency of the 2004 Case, the Debtor consistently filed untimely and incomplete MORs.[5] Eight months after the Petition Date, on October 4, 2004, the Debtor filed MORs for February through August 2004. [RA, Exhibit 22, at 371, and Exhibit 23, at 378, ECF Doc. No. 37.] A year later, on November 9, 2005, the Debtor filed MORs for August 2004 through September 2005. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 269, and Exhibit 23, at 390, ECF Doc. No. 187.] On April 3, 2007, the Debtor filed MORs for October 2005 through March 2007. [RA, Exhibit 20, at 266, and Exhibit 23, at 397, ECF Doc. No. 187.] On January 17, 2008, the Debtor filed MORs for April through December 2007. [RA, Exhibit 18, at 243, and Exhibit 23, at 397, ECF

[5] Under the United States Trustee's Operating Guidelines and Reporting Requirements for Debtors in Possession and Trustees (the "Operating Guidelines"), debtors in possession must file MORs, signed under penalty of perjury, by the twentieth of the month following the reporting period. See Operating Guidelines, at 4, ¶ 9, attached as Appendix A.

Doc. No. 192.] On April 7, 2008, the Debtor filed MORs for January and February 2008. [RA, Exhibit 17, at 231, and Exhibit 23, at 404, ECF Doc. No. 233.] On May 21, 2008, the Debtor filed MORs for March and April 2008. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 218, and Exhibit 23, at 406, ECF Doc. No. 247.]

According to the MORs and Mr. Berger's testimony, the Debtor had no cash or bank accounts. [RA, Exhibits 16-21, and Exhibit 4, at 62, Lines 1-8.] The MORs and Mr. Berger also disclosed that United paid the Debtor's expenses during the 2004 Case, and the payments were reflected in the schedules of the cash disbursements included in the MORs.[6] [RA, Exhibits 16-21, and Exhibit 4, at 60, Lines 18-25, and 61, Lines 1-7.] The MORs, however, did not consistently follow the proper format or contain all of the financial information required by the Operating Guidelines.[7] The MORs generally disclosed only the value of the Real Property, cash disbursements, loans payable to United and pre-petition liabilities. [RA, Exhibits 16-21.] From October 1, 2005 through March 31, 2007, the Debtor filed only unsworn spreadsheets setting forth United's quarterly disbursements on behalf of the Debtor. [RA, Exhibit 20, at 268.] None of the MORs disclosed unpaid accrued post-petition liabilities, except as to United, as the Operating Guidelines require. [RA, Exhibits 16-21.] In the MOR for November 2007, the Debtor first admitted that it owed post-petition real property taxes to Milford, [RA, Exhibit 18, at

[6] During the pendency of the 2004 Case, United paid the Debtor's insurance, United States Trustee quarterly fees, professional fees, travel expenses and miscellaneous expenses for Mr. Berger. [RA, Exhibits 16-21.]

[7] Under the Operating Guidelines, MORs must contain, among other things, a statement of cash receipts and disbursements, an accrual based income and expense statement, a balance sheet, a schedule of post-petition liabilities, and a schedule post-petition taxes payable. See Operating Guidelines, at 4-5, ¶ 9, and RA, Exhibits 16-20.

262], but in none them did the Debtor disclose the amount of the delinquency. [RA, Exhibits 16-20.] The MORs disclosed no payments whatsoever to Milford until April 2008 when the bankruptcy court ordered the Debtor to cure the post-petition delinquency as a condition of continuing the hearing on the Conversion Motion (the "Continuance Order").[8] [RA, Exhibit 5, at 124, and Exhibit 16, at 229.]

3. Quarterly Fees

Throughout the 2004 Case, the Debtor was untimely in its payment of its quarterly fee obligations.[9] The Debtor's first quarterly fee payment was due on April 30, 2004. The Debtor did not make this payment of $250.00, which was the minimum payment at the time, until April 2005. [RA, Exhibit 21, at 329.] During the ensuing sixteen quarters, the Debtor paid the required fee late eight times. [RA, Exhibit 20, at 268, Exhibit 19, at 263, and Exhibit 16, at 229.]

4. Chapter 11 Plan Confirmation

On June 24, 2005, Paradigm filed a disclosure statement (the "Paradigm Disclosure Statement") and a creditor's plan of reorganization (the "Paradigm Plan"). [RA, Exhibit 23, at 379, ECF Doc. Nos. 46-47.] The Paradigm Plan provided for the immediate sale of the Real Property to satisfy the claims of creditors. [RA, Exhibit 8, at 149.]

---

[8] The bankruptcy court entered the Continuance Order on April 23, 2008. [RA, Exhibit 5. at 124-125.] As a condition to granting the Debtor's motion for a continuance of the hearing on the Conversion Motion, the bankruptcy court ordered the Debtor to pay Milford all taxes that were due on January 31, 2008, plus $10,000, and to begin monthly payments to Paradigm in the amount of $34,026.19. [RA, Exhibit 5 at 124-125.]

[9] All chapter 11 debtors are required to pay quarterly fees to the United States Trustee, based on their quarterly cash disbursements, within thirty days of the close of each calendar quarter. A copy of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) is attached as Appendix B.

On August 31, 2005, the United States Trustee filed a motion to convert the 2004 Case to a case under chapter 7 (the “First Conversion Motion”) because the Debtor had failed to file MORs or to propose a plan of reorganization. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 381, ECF Doc. No. 69.] On September 9, 2005, the United States Trustee filed a motion for an order directing the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee (the “Chapter 11 Trustee Motion”). [RA, Exhibit 23, at 382, ECF Doc. No. 72.] The First Conversion Motion and the Chapter 11 Trustee Motion are collectively referred to as the “UST Motions.”

On September 12, 2005, the Debtor filed a disclosure statement (the “2004 Disclosure Statement”) and a plan of reorganization (the “2004 Plan”). [RA, Exhibit 23, at 383, ECF Doc. Nos. 78-79.] The 2004 Plan provided for the sale of the Real Property within thirty months of confirmation of the 2004 Plan. [RA, Exhibit 11, at 171.] On October 6, 2005, the bankruptcy court approved the Paradigm Disclosure Statement, as amended on October 3, 2005, and the 2004 Disclosure Statement, as amended on October 3, 2005. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 386, ECF Doc. No. 106.] On October 7, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an amended order approving both disclosure statements and setting a date for the hearing on confirmation. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 387, ECF Doc. No. 107.] On November 10, 2005, the bankruptcy court held an evidentiary hearing on the competing plans and the UST Motions. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 390, November 10, 2005 Docket Entry.]

5. Paradigm’s Appeal of the First Confirmation Order

On November 21, 2005, the bankruptcy court denied confirmation of the Paradigm Plan and confirmed the 2004 Plan (the “First Confirmation Order”). [RA, Exhibit 10, at 162-163.] The bankruptcy court did not decide the UST Motions. [Id.]

Paradigm filed a notice of appeal of the First Confirmation Order on November 29, 2005. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 390, ECF Doc. No. 133.] On December 7, 2005, the Debtor filed a notice of cross appeal. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 391, ECF Doc. No. 140.] Paradigm filed a motion for a stay pending appeal on December 1, 2005 (the "Motion for Stay Pending Appeal"). [RA, Exhibit 23, at 391, ECF Doc. No. 137.] On December 21, 2005, the bankruptcy court entered a stipulated order regarding the Motion for Stay Pending Appeal (the "Stipulated Stay Order"). [RA, Exhibit 9, at 159-160.] The bankruptcy court granted the stay but provided that:

> The Debtor is fully authorized as debtor-in-possession to market, negotiate, sell, lease and/or option [the Real Property] during the pendency of [Paradigm's] appeal, fully binding the Debtor subject only to Court approval pursuant to the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 363 and all other applicable provisions of the Bankruptcy Code and the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure and [Paradigm's] rights to object. Further, [Paradigm] shall not solicit offers for the Real Property nor negotiate with potential buyers for the Real Property, and if [Paradigm] receives any offers or communications from potential buyers, [Paradigm] will direct them to the Debtor during the pendency of the appeal.

[RA, Exhibit 9, at 160.]

On appeal, Paradigm argued, among other things, that the bankruptcy court erred when it determined that the 2004 Plan was feasible, under 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(3), proposed in good faith, under 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(11), complied with the best interests of creditors test of 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(7), and did not unfairly discriminate against Paradigm under 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b)(1). [RA, Exhibit 8, at 150.] In the cross appeal, the Debtor argued that the Paradigm Plan was not confirmable. [RA, Exhibit 8, at 150-151.]

6. The First Appeal Decision

On October 20, 2006, the District Court for the District of Connecticut vacated the First Confirmation Order and remanded the case to the bankruptcy court. See Mercury Capital

Corporation v. Milford Connecticut Associates, LP, 354 B.R. 1, 4 (D. Conn. 2006) (the "First Appeal Decision"). [RA, Exhibit 8, at 144.] The district court found that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the 2004 Plan was feasible. [RA, Exhibit 8, at 153-154.] However, it remanded two issues to the bankruptcy court for further consideration: (a) whether the 2004 Plan should include a provision explicitly requiring United to fund the 2004 Plan in light of United's history of failing to meet the Debtor's financial obligations and (b) whether the separate classification of the claims of Paradigm and Milford violated 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b)(1). [RA, Exhibit 8, at 158.]

7. The Denial of Confirmation of the 2004 Plan on Remand

Upon remand and after a hearing, the bankruptcy court denied confirmation of the 2004 Plan on March 10, 2008 (the "Order Denying Confirmation"). [RA, Exhibit 7, at 141.] The bankruptcy court undertook a "fresh analysis" of the 2004 Plan under the confirmation standards of 11 U.S.C. § 1129. [RA, Exhibit 7, at 142.] The bankruptcy court "determine[d] on remand, and in light of the track record of the Debtor, that the [2004 Plan] is not feasible under the standards of 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(11)." [RA, Exhibit 7, at 143.] The bankruptcy court noted that the "centerpiece of the [2004 Plan] was an exclusive 30-month marketing window for the Real Property," but that the Debtor had not engaged in any meaningful attempts to market the Real Property during the twenty-seven months since confirmation of the 2004 Plan, and "has utterly failed to advantage itself of the generous sale opportunity" provided under the 2004 Plan. [RA, Exhibit 7, at 140 and 142.] In fact, the Debtor had argued that it needed additional time to rehabilitate and refinance or sell the Real Property under the 2004 Plan. [RA, Exhibit 7, at 142.] The bankruptcy court found that the Debtor could not establish that the 2004 Plan "offers a reasonable assurance of success" because the Debtor had admitted that it could not consummate the 2004 Plan within the required time frame and that it required additional time to effectuate the 2004 Plan.[10] [RA, Exhibit 7, at 142-143.]

The Debtor filed a notice of appeal of the Order Denying Confirmation, a motion for leave to appeal and a motion for a stay pending appeal on March 20, 2008.[11] [RA, Exhibit 23, at 399, ECF Doc. No. 208-210.] On May 7, 2008, the bankruptcy court denied the motion for a stay pending appeal. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 405, ECF Doc. No. 244.] On May 16, 2008, the district court denied leave to appeal. [RA, Exhibit 22, at 405, ECF Doc. No. 246.]

8. Conversion of the 2004 Case to a Case under Chapter 7

On May 2, 2008, the United States Trustee filed the Conversion Motion. [RA, Exhibit 6, at 126.] After a contested hearing at which the bankruptcy court heard testimony from Mr. Berger and appraisers for both the Debtor and Paradigm, the bankruptcy court issued a decision converting the Debtor's chapter 11 case to a case under chapter 7 (the "Conversion Decision") on June 17, 2008. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 17, Exhibit 4, at 28-123, and Exhibit 23, at 406, ECF Doc. No. 251.]

[10] The bankruptcy court noted that at a status conference on confirmation of the 2004 Plan on remand, held on March 4, 2008, the Debtor had requested thirty additional months to effectuate the 2005 Plan. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 20, n.3.] At the hearing on the Conversion Motion, however, the Debtor asserted that it would be able to consummate the 2004 Plan in eighteen months. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 66, Lines 6-9.]

[11] An order denying confirmation of a chapter 11 plan of reorganization is an interlocutory order. See Flor v. BOT Financial Corp. (In re Flor), 79 F.3d 281, 283 (2d Cir. 1996). An order denying confirmation of a plan becomes a final order only after the bankruptcy court has converted or dismissed the case or confirmed a modified plan. In re Broken Bow Ranch, 33 F.3d 1005, 1005 (8th Cir. 1994).

The bankruptcy court found, based on evidence presented at the contested hearing on the Conversion Motion and on the entire record of the 2004 Case, that:

1. The Debtor filed its schedules and statement of financial affairs over four months late. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22.]

2. The Debtor did not propose a plan of reorganization for over nineteen months. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22.]

3. The Debtor made its quarterly fee payments late. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22.]

4. "[The Debtor] has been chronically and severely late in filing required Monthly Operating Reports," and the form of the MORs often did not conform with the Operating Guidelines for MORs. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22.]

5. The appraisals submitted by the Debtor and Paradigm showed that there was a sufficient equity cushion to satisfy Paradigm's secured claim. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 23.]

6. The Debtor made no payments to Paradigm during the case and it made no payments to Milford toward accrued and accruing real property taxes. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 23.]

7. Mr. Berger testified credibly that "in the marketplace outside of bankruptcy, the Debtor's protracted and insular approach to the marketing and development of the Real Property was a prudent and commercially reasonable course of conduct." [RA, Exhibit 3, at 23.] The bankruptcy court also noted that:

> this position neglects the fact that in the "real world" the Debtor would long ago have had to account for and accept the non-bankruptcy consequences of the financial arrangements it made with its creditors – most notably, [Paradigm]. Indeed, the very reason the Debtor entered into the "bankruptcy world" was to avoid the consequences of its "real world" obligations – most notably, an impending foreclosure of the Real Property by [Paradigm]. In essence, the Debtor wants all the benefits of chapter 11 without accepting the concomitant constraints.

[RA, Exhibit 3, at 26.] (Emphasis in original.)

8. Mr. Berger's testimony demonstrated that the Debtor intended to "park" the Real Property in bankruptcy until it had determined that market conditions were optimal. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 25.]

9. In light of the 1999 Case, the Real Property "has been languishing in bankruptcy for nearly a full decade without a good faith effort toward reorganization." [RA, Exhibit 3, at 25, n.8.]

In sum, the bankruptcy court concluded that the Debtor "seriously neglected its reporting and other administrative responsibilities as a chapter 11 debtor-in-possession." [RA, Exhibit 3, at 24.] The bankruptcy court further found that the deficiencies were compounded by the Debtor's "utter and complete disregard of its responsibilities as a bankruptcy fiduciary," [RA, Exhibit 3, at 25], and that the Debtor had accepted the benefits of bankruptcy but failed to meet its obligations of full disclosure and expeditious administration. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 26-27.] These failures, the bankruptcy court held, constituted "more than ample cause," under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), to convert the chapter 11 case to a case under chapter 7, "to place the administration of the Debtor's estate in the hands of an independent fiduciary charged with . . . liquidating that estate with due expedition." [RA, Exhibit 3, at 24.]

On June 17, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered the Conversion Order. [RA, Exhibit 2, at 16, and Exhibit 23, at 406, ECF Doc. No. 252.] On June 17, 2008 Richard Belford was appointed as interim trustee and thereafter qualified as the permanent trustee under 11 U.S.C. §

702 (the “Trustee”).[12] [RA, Exhibit 23, at 406, ECF Doc. No. 252.]

The Debtor filed a notice of appeal of the Conversion Order on June 27, 2008 and an amended notice of appeal on June 30, 2008. [RA, Exhibit 1, at 1 and 4, and Exhibit 23, at 407, ECF Doc. Nos. 258 and 263.] ST and Petillo filed notices of appeal on June 30, 2008. [RA, Exhibit 1, at 7 and 13, Exhibit 23, at 407, ECF Doc. Nos. 259 and 262, and 408, ECF Doc. No. 264.] The Debtor did not seek a stay pending appeal. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 407-413.]

V. SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it determined that there was cause, under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), to convert or dismiss the 2004 Case. There is substantial evidence in the record to support the bankruptcy court’s findings that the Debtor breached its fiduciary duties of expeditious administration and disclosure. The record shows that, for nearly ten years, through two chapter 11 cases, the Debtor allowed the Real Property, its sole asset, to remain vacant, despite promises to develop the Real Property as a shopping center to satisfy the claims of its creditors. During the 2004 Case, the Debtor took no meaningful steps to develop and sell or refinance the Real Property to effectuate the 2004 Plan, and compounding this unreasonable delay was the Debtor’s blatant disregard of its administrative obligations as a chapter 11 debtor.

[12] On August 14, 2008, Petillo and another creditor, Cummings & Lockwood (“CL”), made a request to the United States Trustee for an election of a trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 702. The United States Trustee held the election on September 15, 2008 but could not appoint the elected trustee due to an election controversy (the “Election Controversy”). Under Fed. R. Bank. P. 2003(d)(2), the United States Trustee filed a Report of Election Controversy with the bankruptcy court on October 24, 2008, [RA, Exhibit 23, at 412, ECF Doc. No. 299], and on November 3, 2008, Petillo and CL filed a motion to resolve the Election Controversy (the “Election Motion”). [Id., ECF Doc. No. 300.]. On December 8, 2008, just prior to the hearing on the Election Controversy, Petillo and CL withdrew the Election Motion and CL withdrew its claim. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 413, Doc. Nos. 307-308.] Therefore, by operation of 11 U.S.C. § 702(d), Richard Belford became the permanent trustee.

During this time, steadily increasing unpaid taxes diminished the value of the Real Property to creditors. The record also shows that the Debtor failed to file timely, complete and accurate MORs during the four years that the 2004 Case was pending, which was a breach of the Debtor's fiduciary duty of full, open and honest disclosure of its financial affairs. After finding cause under Section 1112(b) based on substantial evidence in the record, the bankruptcy court properly exercised its discretion when it ordered conversion of the 2004 Case to a case under chapter 7 rather than ordering dismissal or the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. This Court should, therefore, affirm the Conversion Order.

VI. ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it converted the debtor's case to a case under chapter 7 under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). Section 1112(b) of the Bankruptcy Code provides in part:

> (b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, on request of a party in interest or the United States Trustee . . ., and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title or may dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate, for cause, including –
>
> > (1) continuing loss to or diminution of the estate and absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation;
> > (2) inability to effectuate a plan;
> >
> > (3) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors; [and]
> >
> > ****
> >
> > (10) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28.

11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)(1), (2), (3) and (10) (1994).[13]

[13] In 2005, Congress amended Section 1112(b) when it enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act ("BAPCPA"). Amended Section 1112(b) applies to cases filed after the statute's effective date of October 17, 2005 (the "Effective Date").

Section 1112(b) requires a two-step analysis. In re Hampton Hotel Investors, L.P., 270 B.R. 346, 358 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2001) (citing Rollex Corp. v. Associated Materials (In re Superior Siding and Window, Inc.), 14 F.3d 240, 242 (4th Cir. 1994)). First, the bankruptcy court must determine whether there is "cause" to convert or dismiss. Id. at 359. In addition to the specific examples set forth in Section 1112(b), "cause" may also include unenumerated examples. See C-TC 9th Avenue Partnership, 113 F.2d at 1311 (examples of cause enumerated in Section 1112(b) are not exhaustive and the court should consider other factors as they arise) (citation omitted). After the bankruptcy court finds cause, it then must decide, in its discretion, whether it is in the best interests of creditors and the bankruptcy estate to dismiss the case or to convert it to a case under chapter 7. Hampton Hotel Investors, 270 B.R. at 359.

A. Cause Existed under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) to Convert the Debtor's Case to a Case Under Chapter 7 Because the Debtor Breached Its Fiduciary Duties.

The Bankruptcy Code imposes fiduciary duties on chapter 11 debtors. Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985). See also In re Adelphia Communications, 544 F.3d 420, 424 (2d Cir. 2008) (the debtor in possession is the bankruptcy estate's fiduciary). A debtor's failure to fulfill its fiduciary duties as a debtor in possession constitutes cause under Section 1112(b). In re Telemark Mgt. Co., 41 B.R. 501, 507 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 1989) (citation omitted). See also Matter of E. Paul Kovacs and Co., Inc., 16 B.R. 203, 205 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1981) (breach of fiduciary duties is an unenumerated example of cause to convert or dismiss a case under Section 1112(b)).

See, e.g., In re Ryan, 380 B.R. 275, 276 (Bankr. S. D. Fla. 2007) (BAPCPA expressly provides that its provisions apply to cases filed after the Effective Date). Because the 2004 Case was filed prior to the Effective Date, the 1994 version of Section 1112(b) governs.

Outside of bankruptcy, a company's fiduciary duties run to its shareholders. In re Integrated Resources, Inc., 147 B.R. 650, 658 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). A company's relationship to its creditors "is governed by principles of commercial law and the marketplace, where no fiduciary obligations are, in the usual instance, owed." In re Herberman, 122 B.R. 273, 282, n.12 (Bankr. W. D. Tex. 1990).

"However, the fiduciary's obligations in bankruptcy and the standards upon which they are measured are not the same, for all types of transactions, as those applied outside of bankruptcy." In re Schipper, 109 B.R. 832, 836 (Bankr. N. D. Ill. 1989), aff'd, 112 B.R. 917 (N. D. Ill. 1990), aff'd, 933 F.2d 513 (1991). In bankruptcy, the debtor must "further the diverse interests of the debtor, creditors and equity holders, alike." Integrated Resources, 147 B.R. at 658 (quoting In re Lionel Corp., 772 F.2d 1063, 1071 (2d Cir. 1983)). Chapter 11 debtors have an "obligation to treat all parties, not merely the shareholders, fairly." Weintraub, 471 U.S. at 356. "[A] fiduciary - the debtor in possession - is proscribed from acting solely in its self interest to the exclusion of the other interests which the debtor in possession has the fiduciary obligation to protect." In re SunCruz Casinos, 298 B.R. 821, 830 (Bankr. S. D. Fla. 2003) (citation omitted). See also In re Herberman, 122 B.R. at 282 (fiduciary duties in bankruptcy impose limitations on business decisions). See also State of Illinois, Department of Revenue v. Schechter, 195 B.R. 380, 384 (N. D. Ill. 1996) (chapter 11 trustee has a fiduciary duty to operate the debtor's business to maximize the value of the estate). Thus, the business discretion of a debtor in possession is limited by the fiduciary duties that arise in chapter 11. See Herberman, 122 B.R. at 280 (in chapter 11, the debtor's business discretion must be exercised for the benefit of the bankruptcy estate, not the debtor itself).

1. The Debtor Breached Its Duty of Expeditious Administration.

While in chapter 11, a debtor in possession has a fiduciary duty to expeditiously administer the bankruptcy estate for the benefit of creditors. In re Van Brunt, 46 B.R. 29, 30 (Bankr. D. Wis. 1984). Cause, therefore, exists under Section 1112(b) where the debtor has failed to expeditiously administer the estate. Id.

> Debtors should not continue in control of their businesses under the umbrella of the reorganization court beyond the point at which reorganization no longer remains a realistic undertaking, unless liquidation would proceed more expeditiously and less expensively under the control of the debtor . . . . [Where] there is nothing in the record . . . to suggest that is that the debtor-in-possession is either better able or more motivated to proceed promptly with an efficient liquidation than is an experienced fiduciary whose commitment is to the promotion of parity among interested parties rather than to self-interest [conversion to chapter 7 is warranted].

In re Wright Airlines, Inc., 51 B.R. 96, 99 (Bankr. N. D. Ohio 1985) (quoting In re L. S. good & Co., 8 B.R. 315, 318 (Bankr. N. D. W. Va. 1980). Debtors in possession may not "utilize chapter 11 to prolong control of an insolvent enterprise where no benefit to the public or creditors is plausible." In re Hi-Toc Development Corp., 159 B.R. 691, 693 (S.D.N.Y. 1993). See also In re Halpern, 229 B.R. 67, 75 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1999) (case would be dismissed where debtor was given ample opportunity to sell estate's real property but did not do so; risk of further delay fell disproportionately on creditors who were not compensated for the added risk).

a. The Debtor Acknowledged at Trial that Any Development of the Real Property Was Uncertain Because It Was Conditioned on a Number of Events Occurring Over a Lengthy Period of Time.

At the hearing on the Conversion Motion, Mr. Berger testified that to sell the Real Property at the Debtor's optimal price, the Debtor would have to develop the Real Property as a shopping center. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 55, Lines 17-25, 56, Lines 1-25, 57, Lines 1-19, 81, Line 25, and 82, Lines 1-10.] To build a shopping center, Mr. Berger testified, the Debtor would have to change the zoning of the Real Property from industrial to commercial use, which would take up to eight months to complete. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 71, Lines 22-25, 108, Lines 1-25, and 109, Lines 1-8.]

Mr. Berger also testified that the Debtor would have to enter into a long-term lease agreement with a national retailer that would anchor the shopping center. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 36, Lines 1-9 and 18-25.] According to Mr. Berger, signing a national retail tenant is a long process, requiring multiple contacts and communications with prospective lessees. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 41, Lines 11-25, and 42, Lines 1-6.] Mr. Berger testified that the profitability of the Lowe's store in the neighboring parcel had to be established before any national retailer would make a firm commitment to build a store on the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 37, Lines 20-25, 38, Lines 1-5, and 43, Lines 4-13.] Mr. Berger could not predict exactly how long it would take for Lowe's to become sufficiently profitable to attract tenants to the Real Property, but he estimated that it could take as little as four months or as long as a year. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 33, Lines 16-18, 37, Lines 20-25, 38, Lines 1-5, 46, Lines 4-13, and 47, Lines 1-19.] He testified that, after the success of Lowe's had been established, it would take many months for a retailer to make a decision whether to lease space for a store on the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 41, Lines 11-25, and 42, Lines 1-6.] Mr. Berger noted that "[t]hat doesn't happen in a week or a month, or even four or five months. That's a process that takes time." [RA, Exhibit 4, at 41, Line 25, and 42, Lines 1-7.] Then, it would take an additional two or three months for the Debtor and the retailer to negotiate and sign a lease. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 47, Lines 20-25, and 48, Lines 1-15.]

Once the Debtor had signed an agreement with a national tenant, it would then have to obtain financing to build the store or sell the Real Property to another developer. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 48, Lines 4-15, and 49, Lines 17-24.] According to Mr. Berger, the Debtor would not be able to obtain financing to begin the development or find a buyer for the Real Property until a national retailer had entered into a lease of the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 81, Lines 9-24.]

b. The Debtor Failed to Take Any Meaningful Steps to Complete the Development Plans for the Real Property during the 2004 Case.

Mr. Berger's testimony also shows that, during the 2004 Case, the Debtor did nothing to complete its development plans for the Real Property to effectuate the 2004 Plan. The Debtor did not attempt to rezone the Real Property for retail use. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 71, Lines 21-25, and 72, Lines 1-8.] As of May 22, 2008, the date of the hearing on the Conversion Motion, the Debtor had not even applied to Milford for a change in the zoning designation of the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 71, Lines 21-25, and 72, Lines 1-8.] Milford's approval of the zoning change was not assured and the process would take up to eight months to complete. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 107, Lines 17-25, 112, Lines 24-25, and 113, Lines 4-11.]

Moreover, the Debtor did not make any serious efforts to interest national retailers in the development of the Real Property. During the 2004 Case, the Debtor did little more than contact potential national tenants. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 36, Lines 1-9 and 18-25, 42 Lines 20-25, and 43, Lines 1-3.] When the bankruptcy court asked Mr. Berger what else, if anything, the Debtor had done to further the development of the Real Property, Mr. Berger answered, "there's really nothing else to do." [RA, Exhibit 4, 52, Lines 9-19.]

The Debtor did not retain a broker in the 2004 Case to seek tenants for the Real Property,[14] although a broker, who is not licensed in Connecticut (the "Broker"), was allegedly contacting national retailers on behalf of the Debtor. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 54, Lines 7-18, 70, Lines 20-25, and 71, Lines 1-12.] Mr. Berger admitted that the Broker had had little success interesting national retailers in the Real Property, even though he had been contacting them for at least two years. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 82, Lines 23-25, and 83, Lines 1-9.] The Broker was unsuccessful, according to Mr. Berger, because "the circumstances haven't been right until now." [RA, Exhibit 4, at 83, Lines 5-9.] As he testified, "the tenant will come, particularly if Lowe's does well." [RA, Exhibit 4, at 55, Lines 1-6.]

The Debtor's only other step was to talk with adjacent property owners, including a developer named Ceruzzi ("Mr. Ceruzzi"), who was a potential purchaser of the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 72, Lines 9-14, 75, Lines 17-25, and 76, Lines 1-8.] Mr. Berger admitted, however, that his last contact with Mr. Ceruzzi had been at least a year prior to the hearing on the Conversion Motion and he was unsure of the nature and timing of the Broker's contacts with Mr. Ceruzzi. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 72, Lines 9-24, and 73, Lines 1-8.]

c. The Debtor's Promises to Complete the Development Under the 2004 Plan Were Unrealistic at Best and Illusory at Worst.

Mr. Berger's testimony and the record of the 2004 Case show that the Debtor's promises to develop and sell or refinance the Real Property within the timetable set forth in the 2004 Plan were unrealistic at best and illusory at worst. At the hearing on confirmation of the 2004 Plan in November 2005, Mr. Berger had assured the bankruptcy court that the Debtor would be able to develop and sell or refinance the Real Property within thirty months. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 79, Lines 6-12, and Exhibit 29, at 453, Lines 12-25, and 454, Lines 1-9.] At that time, the Debtor asserted that Lowe's mere agreement in 2005 to build a store on the neighboring property would facilitate the Debtor's rehabilitation of the Real Property and ensure the viability of the 2004 Plan. [RA, Exhibit 12, at 182, § II, and Exhibit 29, at 453, Lines 12-25, and 454, Lines 1-9.] The Debtor, however, did not rehabilitate, sell or refinance the Real Property within thirty months. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 86, Lines 17-23.] In 2008, Mr. Berger testified that the Debtor required an additional eighteen months to develop the Real Property because the success of the Lowe's store, which had opened two months before the hearing on the Conversion Motion, had to be established before any national retailers would even consider entering into a long term lease of the Real Property. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 33, Lines 16-17, 37, Lines 20-25, 38, Lines 1-5, 43, Lines 4-13, and 66, Lines 6-9.]

[14] Under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a), debtors in possession must obtain an order of the bankruptcy court before they retain professionals, such as attorneys, accountants and brokers.

Mr. Berger blamed the Debtor's failure to develop the Real Property during the 2004 Case on the lack of retail development in the area and the uncertainty surrounding Lowe's profitability. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 33, Lines 7-17, 43, Lines 4-13, 49, Lines 17-25, 51, Lines 23-25, 52, Lines 1-8, and 55, Lines 1-6.] The Debtor also blamed the appeal of the First Confirmation Order, which it claimed chilled interest in the Real Property. See Appellant's Brief, at 15, n.5. However, the Stipulated Stay Order explicitly authorized the Debtor "to market, negotiate, sell, lease and/or option the [Real Property]" during the pendency of the appeal and that any transaction that the Debtor consummated would be "fully binding the Debtor subject only to Court approval pursuant to the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 363 and all other applicable provisions of the Bankruptcy Code and the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure." [RA,

Exhibit 9, at 160.] Nonetheless, the Debtor continued its pattern of inaction and did not take any steps to begin to rehabilitate or to market the Real Property in the year that the appeal of the First Confirmation Order was pending. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 67, Lines 21-25, and 68, Lines 1-17.]

The record also shows that the Debtor would not have been able to complete its plans during the additional eighteen-month period that Mr. Berger claimed was sufficient. Based on the testimony of the Debtor's appraiser at the hearing on the Conversion Motion, it would take up eight months to obtain a zoning change. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 107, Lines 17-25.] According to Mr. Berger, the profitability of Lowe's would not be known for up to a year. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 33, Lines 16-18, 37, Lines 20-25, 38, Lines 1-5, 46, Lines 2-25, and 47, Lines 1-19.] It would take more than five months after that for a retailer to make a decision regarding the Real Property and several more months for the Debtor and a retailer to negotiate a lease. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 41, Lines 11-25, and 42, Lines 1-6.] Only after the Debtor had a signed lease, after over two years or more, would the Debtor be in a position to attempt to sell the Real Property or to obtain a loan to complete the development. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 81, Lines 9-24.]

d. The Debtor's Inaction Was Not Reasonable.

The Debtor argued that its inaction was reasonable because it was meant to maximize the return to its unsecured creditors and the Equity Security Holders. See Appellant's Brief, at 20. According to the Debtor, selling the Real Property before it was developed would be a breach of its fiduciary duties to its unsecured creditors and the Equity Security Holders. Id. However, the record shows that the Debtor's inaction diminished the value of the Real Property. For example, the Debtor's admitted failure to pay real property taxes both pre- and post-petition diminished the equity in the Real Property by up to $1.6 million. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 69, Lines 17-25, and 70, Lines 1-9.]

The Debtor's inaction also resulted in missed opportunities to maximize the value of the Real Property during a robust commercial real estate market. Mr. Berger admitted at the hearing on the Conversion Motion that "the retail world thinks we're going to have a recession, and they are going a little slower than they would have gone six months or a year ago when things were booming in the commercial real estate market." [RA, Exhibit 4, at 53, Lines 10-12.] He also admitted that "you've just gone through what I think is the spike for the foreseeable future of the run up in the value of the [Real Property]." [RA, Exhibit 4, at 56, Lines 20-22.]

As Paradigm's appraiser testified,

> [a]s far as the economy, I think its not news when I say that we're in an economic slowdown, and the economic slowdown affects the retail market in particular. . . . Most retailers are on the fence. . . . They may not be closing stores. They're definitely thinking twice about opening a new store."

[RA, Exhibit 4, at 116, Line 25, and 117, Lines 1-12.]

The Debtor argued that the bankruptcy court's decision to convert was inconsistent with its finding that Mr. Berger credibly testified that "in the marketplace outside of bankruptcy, the Debtor's protracted and insular approach to the marketing and development of the Real Property was a prudent and commercially reasonable course of conduct." [RA, Exhibit 3, at 23.] See Appellant's Brief, at 16. The Debtor ignored, however, the bankruptcy court's caveat that

> [t]his position neglects the fact that in the "real world" the Debtor would long ago have had to account for and accept the non-bankruptcy consequences of the financial arrangements it made with its creditors – most notably, [Paradigm]. Indeed, the very reason the Debtor entered into the "bankruptcy world" was to avoid the consequences of its "real world" obligations – most notably, an impending foreclosure of the Real Property by [Paradigm]. In essence, the Debtor wants all the benefits of Chapter 11 without accepting the concomitant constraints.

[RA, Exhibit 3, at 26.]

In sum, the record shows that the Debtor failed to take basic steps to rehabilitate and sell or refinance the Real Property to effectuate the 2004 Plan. The Debtor did not even begin the process of rezoning the Real Property, which is a condition precedent to any development as a shopping center, much less enter into serious negotiations with national retailers or seek a buyer or lender. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 71, Lines 21-25, and 72, Lines 1-8.] In chapter 11, where creditors are generally stayed, under 11 U.S.C. § 362[15], from exercising their remedies, the debtor's duties run "to the estate as a whole, and not to one group." *Weintrau*b, 471 U.S. at 355-356. It was, therefore, not reasonable for the Debtor to wait to develop the Real Property until it considered conditions optimal for the Equity Security Holders, while its creditors went unpaid for four years.

The Debtor has done nothing but blame outside forces – the appeal of the First Confirmation Order, the lack of retail development in the area, and the uncertainty surrounding the Lowe's store, for example – for its failure to expeditiously administer the 2004 Case. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 33, Lines 7-17, 43, Lines 4-13, 49, Lines 17-25, 51, Lines 23-25, 52, Lines 1-8, and 55, Lines 1-6.] The bankruptcy court, therefore, did not clearly err when it found that the Debtor breached its duty of expeditious administration by failing to make a good faith effort toward reorganization. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 25.]

e. The Debtor Admitted That it Was Delinquent on Post-Petition Real Property Taxes and that It Had Made No Payments to Paradigm.[16]

The Debtor's duty of expeditious administration also requires the Debtor to timely pay post-petition tax obligations, and a breach of that duty warrants conversion or dismissal under Section 1112(b). See Matter of Whitehurst, 198 B.R. 981, 984 (Bankr. N. D. Ala. 1996) (failure to pay post-petition taxes is a breach of fiduciary duty warranting conversion or dismissal). See also Matter of Santiago Vela, 87 B.R. 229, 232 (Bankr. D. P.R. 1988) (debtor's failure to remain current on post-petition Federal taxes constituted unreasonable delay under Section 1112(b)). Likewise, the debtor's delay in carrying out its administrative responsibilities demonstrates cause to convert or dismiss a case under Section 1112(b). Hampton Hotel Investors, 270 B.R. at 358.

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found that the Debtor had failed to pay post-petition real property taxes or to make any payments to Paradigm during the 2004 Case. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 23.] Mr. Berger admitted that the Debtor was delinquent on its post-petition real property taxes and that the Debtor had made no tax payments to Milford since it filed the chapter 11 case in 2004, except for $10,000 paid in the few months prior to the hearing on the Conversion Motion under the Continuance Order. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 69, Lines 17-25, and 70, Lines 5-14.] Mr. Berger was unsure of the exact delinquency but estimated that post-petition accrued taxes totaled between $400,000 to $500,000, based on an estimated yearly tax bill of [16] The failure to pay taxes also constitutes a breach of the Debtor's duty to protect and preserve property. See In re Smart World Technologies, LLC, 423 F.3d 166, 176 (2d Cir. 2005) (debtor has a fiduciary duty to maximize the value of the estate).

$120,000.[17] [RA, Exhibit 4, at 69, Line 3-8, and 70, Lines 1-4.] Mr. Berger also admitted that the Debtor had made no payments to Paradigm since 2000 except for the funds paid in April 2008 and thereafter under the Continuance Order. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 70, Lines 10-14.]

f. The Debtor Failed to Timely Carry Out Its Administrative Duties.

The record also supports the bankruptcy court's finding that the Debtor neglected its administrative duties. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22 and 24.] There is no dispute, and the Debtor admits, that it filed its schedules and statement of financial affairs more than four months late, as the bankruptcy court found. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22, and Exhibit 23, at 377, ECF Doc. No. 30.] See also Appellant's Brief, at 12.

The Debtor argued, without factual support or legal authority, that this delay was harmless because no creditors were prejudiced. See Appellant's Brief, at 12-13. The Debtor, however, had an absolute duty to timely complete and file its schedules and statement of financial affairs. See In re Russell, 392 B.R. 315, 358 (Bankr. E. D. Tenn. 2008) ("This duty is crucial to the working of the bankruptcy system"). See also In re Haverland, 150 B.R. 768, 771-772 (Bankr. S. D. Cal. 1993) (compliance with the duty to complete schedules truthfully is essential to the efficient and expeditious administration of the bankruptcy case).

Because of the Debtor's delay, the United States Trustee was forced to continue the Section 341 meeting of creditors, which was originally set for March 8, 2004, five times. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 375, ECF Doc. No. 6, 376, March 8, 2004, April 12, 2004, April 24, 2004, and May 10, 2004 Docket Entries, and 377, June 7, 2004 Docket Entry.] The Debtor's delay in filing its schedules and statement of financial affairs for five months deprived the United States Trustee and creditors of the opportunity to examine the Debtor under oath within the first twenty to forty days of the 2004 Case as required by the Bankruptcy Code and the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. See 11 U.S.C. § 343 (the debtor shall appear and submit to examination under oath at the meeting of creditors under Section 341(a)) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(a) (the Section 341(a) meeting "shall be held no fewer than twenty and no more than forty days after the petition date").

Likewise, the MORs, executed by Mr. Berger under penalty of perjury, show that the bankruptcy court did not err when it found that the Debtor was consistently untimely in meeting its quarterly fee obligations. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22, Exhibit 16, at 229, Exhibit 19, at 263, and .Exhibit 20, at 268.] Instead of meeting its quarterly fee obligations within thirty days of the close of each calendar quarter, the Debtor made sporadic and untimely payments. [RA, Exhibit 16, at 229, Exhibit 19, at 263, and Exhibit 20, at 268.] The record also reflects that the Debtor did not file a disclosure statement and plan until nineteen months after the Petition Date and only after Paradigm had filed the Paradigm Disclosure Statement and the Paradigm Plan and the United States Trustee had filed the UST Motions. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22, Exhibit 23, at 379, ECF Doc. Nos. 46-47, 381, ECF Doc. No. 69, 382, ECF Doc. No. 72, and 383, ECF Doc. Nos. 78-79.] The bankruptcy court's findings of fact with respect to the Debtor's delay in administration of the 2004 Case have ample support in the record and were not, therefore, clearly erroneous.

2. The Debtor Breached Its Duty of Disclosure.

Debtors in possession have a duty to provide open, honest and straightforward disclosure of their financial affairs to the bankruptcy court and creditors. In re Marvel Entertainment, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 474 (3d Cir. 1998). See also In re Sal Caruso Cheese, Inc., 107 B.R. 808, 817 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 1989) (debtors have a duty of honest and open disclosure of financial information). The filing of MORs is "very high on the list of fiduciary obligations imposed upon a debtor in possession." Matter of Berryhill, 127 B.R. 427, 433 (Bankr. N. D. Ind. 1991).

> Timely and accurate financial disclosure is the life blood of the chapter 11 process. Monthly Operating Reports are much more than busy work imposed upon a chapter 11 debtor for no reason other than to require it to do something. They are the means by which creditors can monitor the debtors post-petition operations.

Id. at 433.

For this reason, the untimely submission of MORs constitutes cause to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 case under Section 1112(b). Whitehurst, 198 B.R. at 983 n.11. *See also In re Braue*r, 80 B.R. 903, 905 (N. D. Ill.1987) (failure to file financial reports warrants conversion or dismissal). See also In re Cloisters of Brevard, Inc., 117 B.R. 722, 723 (Bankr. M. D. Fla. 1990) (the untimely submission of MORs is a breach of fiduciary duty). The bankruptcy court should not allow a pattern of untimely filing of MORs; otherwise, the debtor "could always conveniently argue that all operating reports had been filed." Whitehurst, 198 B.R. at 984. "Neither the court nor creditors should have to coerce or implore the debtor into fulfilling the obligations imposed upon it." Id. See also In re Roma Group, 165 B.R. 779, 780 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) (the failure to file MORs, "whether based on inability to do so or otherwise, undermines the Chapter 11 process and constitutes cause for dismissal or conversion of Chapter 11 proceedings"). See also In re All Denominational New Church, 268 B.R. 536, 538 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2001) (failure to file MORs undermines the bankruptcy process and warrants conversion or dismissal under Section 1112(b)) (citing First National Bank v. Kerr (In re Kerr), 908 F.2d 400, 404 (8th Cir. 1990)).

The Debtor argued that there is no precedent for conversion under the facts of the 2004 Case and that the cases cited by the bankruptcy court in the Conversion Decision do not provide authority for a finding of cause and conversion under Section 1112(b).[18] See Appellant's Brief, at 16-17. However, both cases cited by the bankruptcy court properly state the law regarding a debtor's duty of disclosure and the consequences of a breach of that duty. In re Momentum Mfg. Corp, 25 F.3d 1132, 1136 (2d Cir. 1994) sets forth the principle that "[f]ull and fair disclosure is required during the entire reorganization process; it begins . . . on day one with the filing of the chapter 11 petition." (citation and internal quotation marks omitted.) In In re Tornheim, 181 B.R. 161, 164 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1995), the bankruptcy court specifically held that cause existed under Section 1112(b) where the debtors had breached their duty of disclosure by failing to file MORs. Contrary to the Debtor's argument, there is substantial authority holding that debtors have a duty of disclosure and that a breach of that duty constitutes cause under Section 1112(b).

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found that the Debtor breached its duty of disclosure. The record shows the Debtor's pervasive pattern of disregard of its obligation to file MORs. The Debtor filed the 2004 Case on February 6, 2004. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 375, ECF Doc. No. 1.] Yet, the Debtor did not file any MORs until October 10, 2004. [ER, Exhibit 23, at [18] Ironically, the Debtor has cited no cases in support of its argument that the bankruptcy court clearly erred in finding cause under Section 1112(b). The cases the Debtor cited involved facts and legal issues that have no relevance to Section 1112(b). See In re Pinnacle Brands, Inc., 259 B.R. 46 (Bankr. D. Del. 2001) (debtor properly declined to assume and assign a contract where assumption and assignment would benefit a creditor to the detriment of the estate). See also Appellant's Brief, at 19-20. See also In re DN Associates, 3 F.3d 512, 516 (1st Cir. 1993), where the court approved a fee application of debtor's counsel where the work benefitted both creditors and equity security holders). See also Appellant's Brief, at 19, n.5.

378, ECF Doc. No. 37.] After that, the Debtor filed no more MORs until November 9, 2005, when it filed MORs for thirteen months. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 390, ECF Doc. No. 128.] Sixteen months later, on April 3, 2007, the Debtor filed MORs for October 2005 through March 2007. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 397, ECF Doc. No. 187.] Then, another nine months elapsed, when, on January 18, 2008, the Debtor filed MORs for April through December 2007. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 397, ECF Doc. No. 192.] On April 7, 2008, the Debtor filed MORs for January and February 2008. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 404, ECF Doc. No. 233.] Finally, on May 21, 2008, the Debtor filed MORs for March and April 2008. [RA, Exhibit 23, at 406, ECF Doc. No. 247.]

The Debtor admits that it filed its MORs untimely but argues that untimely filing is not grounds for conversion because “there is no claim, evidence or finding that the MORs were inaccurate in any way or how any party in interest was prejudiced by the late filing.” See Appellant’s Brief, at 13. In fact, as the bankruptcy court found, the MORs did not follow the format set forth in the Operating Guidelines. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 22.] As a result, the Debtor failed to disclose essential financial information to creditors, the United States Trustee and the bankruptcy court. See Operating Guidelines, at 4, ¶ 9, and RA, Exhibits 16-22.

The record shows that the MORs were incomplete. The Debtor generally filed the form of MOR in use during the time of the 2004 Case. [RA, Exhibits 16, 17, 18, 19, and 21.] The MORs, however, contained only a statement of cash receipts and disbursements showing amounts contributed by United and an accounting of the Debtor’s post-petition debt to United arising from the contributions. [RA, Exhibit 16-22.] In the October 2005 through March 2007 MORs, the Debtor abandoned the proper format altogether and filed only unsworn spread sheets listing United’s quarterly disbursements on behalf of the Debtor. [RA, Exhibit 20, at 268.]

The record also shows that the MORs were inaccurate. The Debtor's schedules of post-petition liabilities showed no accrued real property tax debt even though the Debtor admitted that it had accrued delinquent post-petition real property tax obligations in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. [RA, Exhibit 18, at 262.] By failing to file complete, accurate and timely MORs, the Debtor failed to keep creditors, the United States Trustee and the bankruptcy court apprised of its true financial condition, including that it owed delinquent post-petition real property taxes of between $400,000 to $500,000. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 69, Lines 3-8, and 70, Lines 1-4.] The bankruptcy court, therefore, did not clearly err when it found that the Debtor breached the duty of disclosure by failing to file timely and complete MORs over the four years that the 2004 Case was pending in chapter 11.

B. Converting the 2004 Case to a Case Under Chapter 7 Was in the Best Interest of Creditors and the Bankruptcy Estate.

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it converted the 2004 Case to a case under chapter 7. Once the bankruptcy court determined that there was cause under Section 1112(b), it had broad discretion to dismiss or to convert the 2004 Case to chapter 7. See, e.g. In re AdBrite Corp., 290 B.R. 209, 215 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003) (once the movant has established cause, the bankruptcy court has broad discretion to convert or dismiss the case). See also Hampton Hotel Investors, 274 B.R. at 359 (it is within the discretion of the bankruptcy court to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 case under Section 1112(b)). The bankruptcy court "must exercised its sound judgment in reaching a determination and must ascertain that the decision is in the best interest of creditors." In re Gonic Realty Trust, 909 F.2d 624, 626-627 (1st Cir.1990). It is not required to give exhaustive reasons for its decision. Matter of Koerner, 800 F.2d 1358, 1368 (5th Cir. 1986); accord Gonic Realty, 909 F.2d at 627. Conversion, rather than dismissal, is appropriate where the debtor breached its fiduciary duties as a chapter 11 debtor. Hampton Hotel Investors, 274 B.R. at 359.

The Debtor argued that the bankruptcy court "elevated the interest of one creditor, Paradigm, for a quick sale over the interest of the entire estate" to the detriment of unsecured creditors and the Equity Security Holders. See Appellant's Brief, at 20. The Debtor does not cite any facts or findings in support of this contention, and there is no indication in the record that the bankruptcy court converted the case solely for the benefit of Paradigm. In fact, as amply demonstrated in this brief, the bankruptcy court explicitly converted the 2004 Case because the Debtor's breach of fiduciary duties warranted placing "the administration of the estate in the hands of an independent fiduciary." [RA, Exhibit 3, at 24.]

Nonetheless, in a single asset real estate case like the 2004 Case, conversion is appropriate "where the debtor is oblivious to the fiduciary duties imposed upon it in dealing with property of the estate," even if the secured creditor is fully secured. E. Paul Kovacs, 16 B.R. at 205-206. See also In re Albany Partners, Ltd., 749 F.2d 670, 674 (11th Cir. 1984) (court properly exercised its discretion under Section 1112(b) in dismissing a case where the debtor used chapter 11 to frustrate the legitimate efforts of secured creditors to enforce their rights).

The Debtor also argued that the bankruptcy court should have ordered the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee, under 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(2), rather than converting the 2004 Case to a case under chapter 7. See Appellant's Brief, at 30. The Debtor asserted that Petillo and ST would have preferred a chapter 11 trustee and that a chapter 11 trustee would have been able to operate the Debtor's business and propose an orderly plan to sell the Real Property. Id. A chapter 7 trustee, the Debtor argued, "has no authority to manage the Property, pay for insurance and effectuate an orderly sale plan" because "his mandate is to liquidate assets as quickly as possible." Id.

Section 1104(a)(2) provides that:

> (a) The bankruptcy court shall order the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee . . . .
> (2) if such appointment is in the interests of creditors, any equity security holders, and other interests of the estate . . .

11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(2).

Ordering the appointment of a trustee under Section 1104(a)(2) is within the discretion of the bankruptcy court. In re Deena Packaging Industries, 29 B.R. 705, 706 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1983). In determining whether the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee is in the best interests of creditors, the bankruptcy court must consider "the protection of the public interests, the interests of creditors . . . and the facilitation of a reorganization that will benefit both." In re 1031 Tax Group, LLC, 374 B.R. 78, 91 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007) (citation omitted).

The Debtor's argument is flawed for several reasons. First, the Debtor cited no cases that hold that certain creditors' mere desire for a chapter 11 trustee warrants granting relief under Section 1104(a)(2). See Appellant's Brief, at 30. On the contrary, no single factor is dispositive in the bankruptcy court's exercise of its discretion to order the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. The standard is flexible and the bankruptcy court must consider "the practical realities and necessities" in the exercise of its broad discretion. In re Euro-American Lodging Corp., 365 B.R. 421, 428-429 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007). Cf. In re Superior Siding and Window, Inc., 14 F.3d 240, 244 (4th Cir. 1994) (in determining the best interests of creditors and the estate under Section 1112(b), the bankruptcy court must consider the impact of its decision on the interests of all creditors; it is not based upon "tallying the votes of the unsecured creditors and yielding to the majority interest”).

Second, chapter 11 trustees are generally appointed to preserve the debtor’s going concern value for the benefit of creditors. See In re Curlew Valley Associates, 14 B.R. 506, 512 (Bankr. D. Utah 1981) (chapter 11 trustees may operate the debtor’s business to preserve its going concern value). See also U. S. ex rel. Harrison v. Estate of Deutscher, 115 B.R. 592, 597 (M. D. Tenn. 1990) (a chapter 11 trustee’s “operation of the business is the rule”). Here, the Debtor was not operating when it was in chapter 11, and the Debtor has, in fact, not had any cash flow since the early 1990s. [RA, Exhibit 4, at 74, Lines 19-25, and 75, Lines 1-10, Exhibit 12, at 181, and Exhibit 25, at 433-444.] Thus, there was no business for a chapter 11 trustee to operate, no going concern value to protect, and no benefit to creditors or the estate in allowing the Debtor to remain in chapter 11 with a trustee in control.

Third, a chapter 7 trustee’s main duty is not simply to “liquidate assets as quickly as possible,” as the Debtor asserted. See Appellant’s Brief, at 30. The fiduciary duties of a chapter 7 trustee run to both creditors and equity security holders and require the trustee to maximize the value of the estate. Germain v. Connecticut National Bank, 988 F.2d 1323, 1330 n.8 (2d Cir. 1993). See also In re Fournier, 169 B.R. 282, 284-285 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1994) (chapter 7 trustee’s primary role is to diligently and expeditiously maximize distributions to creditors). See also Weintraub, 471 U.S. at 355 (trustee’s duties run to creditors and shareholders).

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in converting the case to chapter 7 rather than ordering dismissal or the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee. The bankruptcy court properly applied the law and its factual findings were not clearly erroneous. The bankruptcy court first found that there was cause, under Section 1112(b), based on the entire record which demonstrated the Debtor's breach of fiduciary duties. [RA, Exhibit 3, at 24.] Then, the bankruptcy court, in its discretion, ordered conversion, rather than dismissal or the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee, "to place the administration of the Debtor's estate in the hands of an independent fiduciary charged with . . . liquidating that estate with due expedition." [RA, Exhibit 3, at 24.] See also Hampton Hotel Investors, 270 B.R. at 358-359 (Section 1112(b) requires a two step process – the determination of cause, and then a decision to convert or dismiss, whichever is in the best interests of creditors and the estate).

VII. CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the Court affirm the Conversion Order.

OPERATING GUIDELINES AND REPORTING REQUIREMENTS FOR DEBTORS IN POSSESSION AND TRUSTEES

(Revised 2/1/08)

Title 28, §586(a)(3) of the United States Code directs the United States Trustee to supervise the administration of all Chapter 11 cases. To comply with this charge, the United States Trustee for Region 2 has established the Operating Guidelines and Reporting Requirements for Chapter 11 debtors and trustees. Chapter 11 debtors, trustees and their attorneys must notify the United States Trustee of significant matters affecting their case. The United States Trustee must be served with copies of all papers filed in the case, except as otherwise directed by the Court or the United States Trustee.

Timely compliance with each of the following requirements is essential. Failure to comply may result in a motion to dismiss or convert this case to liquidation under Chapter 7, for the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee or examiner, or for imposition of sanctions. If you believe that the requirements should be waived or varied in your case, you should immediately submit a written request to the appropriate Field Office of the United States Trustee. Contact information may be obtained from the United States Trustee website, http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/r02/. If you are represented by counsel, please contact your attorney with questions regarding this material.

GUIDELINES AND OPERATING REQUIREMENTS

1. List of Creditors. When the petition is filed, a list of the debtor's twenty (20) largest unsecured creditors, excluding insiders, must be filed with the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court. The complete name, address, e-mail address, telephone number, fax number and name of contact of each creditor must be supplied .

2. Initial Debtor Interviews. In chapter 11 cases, the United States Trustee generally requires the debtor and its counsel to meet with a member of the staff of the United States Trustee at an initial debtor interview prior to the Section 341 meeting of creditors. The purpose of the meeting is to discuss the debtor's particular financial situation, its operating framework under Chapter 11, and the requirements of the United States Trustee.

At the meeting, the debtor is required to furnish the following documentation and such other information as requested. If no initial debtor interview is scheduled, such materials must be provided to the United States Trustee within fifteen days of the petition filing.[1]

[1] If the debtor is a "small business debtor" these documents must be filed along with the petition. 11 (continued...)

-Copies of the debtor's last two filed income tax returns, including all applicable schedules.
-Copy of the most recently issued or prepared financial statements (inclusive of balance sheet, income statement, and statement of cash flows).
- A schedule of aged accounts receivable.
-Specimen (voided) checks that verify the opening of "debtor in possession" bank accounts (see "Bank Accounts"), and a listing of the authorized signatories (not the signature card).
-Proof that all applicable insurance is in place (see “Insurance”).
- A listing of all disbursements for the ninety days prior to the filing, which may take the form of a check register for an individual.
-Copies of all licenses and/or permits (including licenses to intellectual property and certificates evidencing ownership of intellectual property).
-Copies of all written policies given to customers regarding the sale of personally identifiable information.

3. Meeting of Creditors. A meeting of creditors will be held by the United States Trustee within 20 to 40 days after the filing of a voluntary petition. The debtor and debtor's attorney are required to appear. All creditors and other parties in interest are notified of the meeting by the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court. The debtor(s) will be examined under oath by the representative of the United States Trustee, creditors, and other parties in interest in attendance pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 341 and 343, and Fed. R. Bankr. P. Rule 2003(b).

4. Books and Records. Debtor’s books and records (i.e. general ledger accounts) must be closed as of the petition date and new books and records opened. The old books and records must be retained and be available to the United States Trustee.

5. Bank Accounts. All pre-petition bank accounts controlled by the debtor must be closed immediately upon the filing of the petition, and the debtor shall immediately open new debtor-in-possession operating, payroll, and tax accounts at a United States Trustee Authorized Depository. A list of approved depositories is available on the United States Trustee Website, www.usdoj.gov/ust/r02/ In addition, individual debtors engaged in business as sole proprietors should open a separate debtor-in-possession account for payment of personal living expenses. All business revenues must be deposited into the general operating account, with amounts needed to fund the other accounts being transferred to those accounts as necessary. Deposits, other than transfers from the operating accounts, should not be made directly to the payroll or tax accounts. Any deviation from the three required Debtor In Possession Accounts must be approved by the United States Trustee prior to the Initial Debtor Interview.

Disbursements other than by numbered check are prohibited. Counter checks are prohibited. Requests to use, create or maintain petty cash accounts must be submitted to the United States Trustee in writing.

U.S.C. §1116

The checks for each account must bear the case name, case number, the words "Debtor-In-Possession", and the type of account (operating, payroll or tax) imprinted on the face of each check, in substantially the following form:

ABC, Inc.
Debtor-in-Possession, 08-XXXXX
OPERATING ACCOUNT
123 Main Street
New York, NY 10004

____________________, *20*______

*Pay to the Order of*______________________________ *$*____________ ____ Dollars

00XXX-XXX-00-XXXXX 000XXX-XX00

Within fifteen days of filing the petition, the debtor must provide the United States Trustee with a sworn statement describing all pre-petition accounts by depository name, account number and account name, verifying that each such pre-petition account has been closed. A form that complies with this requirement can be obtained from the United States Trustee Website, www.usdoj.gov/ust/r02/. Additionally, proof of closing old accounts and opening new accounts must be provided.

6. Insurance. Within fifteen days of filing the petition, the debtor must provide the United States Trustee with proof of the insurance coverage required by these guidelines. The proof must disclose, at a minimum, the effective date and the termination date of coverage; the type and limits of coverage provided, and the identity of all loss payees. Binders dated after the filing of the petition must be accompanied by paid receipts. Debtor should instruct its insurance companies to list the United States Trustee as a Certificate Holder. Upon expiration or other termination of any coverage, the debtor shall immediately provide the United States Trustee with adequate proof of replacement coverage. Debtor shall maintain at least the following coverage, where appropriate:

a. General comprehensive liability
b. Property (personal & theft)
c. Casualty and theft
d. Workers' compensation
e. Vehicle
f. Product Liability
g. Flood insurance
h. Directors and Officers Liability
i. Professional malpractice
j. Other coverage customary or prudent in the debtor's business, or required by law.
k. Proof of Renewal of Insurance during pendency of the case.

7. Physical Inventory. Within thirty (30) days of filing the petition, debtor, if requested by the United States Trustee, shall provide the United States Trustee with a physical inventory as of the petition date. The inventory shall be itemized and indicate cost values. For purpose of this reporting requirement, "inventory" is defined as all goods in possession of the debtor intended for sale to customers. It includes finished goods and unfinished goods. It does not include fixed assets owned by the debtor.

8. Rental Property Records. Debtors who own commercial or residential rental property shall provide the United States Trustee with a rent roll as of the petition date within fifteen (15) days from the filing of the petition. The rent roll shall consist of (1) a description of each property owned, (2) rental price of each unit, (3) security or other deposits held, (4) occupancy and payment status of each unit, (5) name, address, and phone number of the management company, if any, and (6) the monthly management fee.

9. Monthly Operating Reports. Debtor must electronically file an original monthly operating report with the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court, and serve a copy upon the United States Trustee.[2] A copy should also be provided to the creditors committee, if one has been appointed in the case. Notwithstanding local ECF requirements, the United States Trustee will not accept service of the operating reports via electronic transmission.

The monthly operating reports must be prepared using the forms provided herein. These forms are also located on our website at http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/r02. Compliance with Local Rules and filing procedures in each jurisdiction is required. The debtor is also required to attach to the monthly operating report a photocopy of each month's bank statements. If bank statements are not available at the time the monthly operating report is filed, they should be submitted separately, as soon as the debtor-in-possession receives them. A bank reconciliation should be prepared and attached to the operating report.

The monthly operating report is based on a calendar month (e.g. January 1 - January 31), and all reports must be filed by the 20th day of the month following the reporting period.[3] Such reports shall disclose all transactions of the calendar month immediately preceding the due date. The first report shall include all transactions for the period of the first month the debtor is in bankruptcy. It is recognized that in almost all cases, this first report will only be for a partial month. The partial month report should not be combined with that of the first full month.

Debtors have a continuing obligation to file monthly operating reports until the court approves and confirms the Plan of Reorganization. After confirmation, debtors are required to file a Post-Confirmation Operating Report. The Post-Confirmation Operating Report includes, among other things, all payments made under the Plan of Reorganization and payments made in the ordinary course of doing business. The reports must be filed until the courts enters a Final Decree, dismisses the case, or converts the case to another chapter in bankruptcy. The original report must be electronically filed with the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court, and a copy served upon the United States Trustee. The report must be

[2] In districts with ECF, the signature filed with the Court should be submitted in the manner required by the Court. The copy served on the United States Trustee must contain the actual signature of the preparer.

[3] Reports for the Rochester and Buffalo Divisions of the Western District of New York are due on the 15th day of the month, as are reports for the Southern District of New York.

filed by the 20th day of the month following the reporting period.[4] The Post-Confirmation Operating Reports may be obtained from the local office in the Region.

10. Taxes. Upon payment of each payroll, debtor shall transfer from the operating account to the debtor's tax account sufficient funds to pay any liability associated with the payroll. Taxes shall be paid from the tax account accompanied by appropriate tax deposit coupons. State and local taxes shall also be paid from the tax account. Sales and use taxes shall be deposited to the tax account at least weekly. All tax returns and reports must be timely filed and accompanied by payment in full of any liability. A copy of each return and verification of payment of taxes due must be served on the United States Trustee with the monthly operating report.

11. Employment of Principals and Professionals. Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §327 and Fed. R. Bank R. P. 2014, the debtor or trustee must apply for an order of the Court approving the employment of professionals, unless local rules otherwise direct. A copy of any application to employ or compensate a professional (including, but not limited to, lawyers, accountants, financial advisors, appraisers, auctioneers, real estate agents/brokers, and consultants) must be served upon the United States Trustee. Applications to employ such persons must be filed, and an order approving such employment must be entered, prior to any services being rendered to the debtor.

Each applicant's affidavit must disclose any relationship or contact applicant has with the debtor, any creditor, party in interest, their attorneys and accountants, and employees of the United States Trustee. A general statement that the applicant is disinterested and does not represent an interest adverse to the estate is not sufficient.

No later than the date of the first meeting of creditors, the debtor shall provide the following information regarding employment and compensation of its principals: name and position of the individual; detailed description of the duties and responsibilities; reasons why employment of the individual is necessary for successful reorganization; details of the compensation sought; details of any other benefits or consideration to be received, including but not limited to use of vehicles, housing, expense reimbursement, insurance, and pension or profit sharing; and, each individual's salary and benefit history for the year immediately preceding the filing of the petition.

12. Pre-Petition Financial Statements. Within fifteen (15) days of the petition filing, debtor shall provide the United States Trustee with copies of the debtor's most recent audited and unaudited financial statements.

13. Federal Income Tax Returns. Within fifteen (15) days of the petition filing, debtor shall provide the United States Trustee with copies of the debtor's federal income tax returns for the two years prior to the filing.

[4] Exception – Southern District of New York Local Rule: Pursuant to Local Bankruptcy Rule 3021-1(c) of the Southern District of New York, Debtors have to file post-confirmation status reports with the Court every January 15th, April 15th, July 15th, and October 15th until a final decree has been entered.

14. Change of Address. The debtor must notify the United States Trustee, in writing within 10 days, of any change of address or telephone number of the debtor. The debtor must also file with the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court a change of address form.

15. United States Trustee Quarterly Fees. Debtors in Chapter 11 cases must pay a quarterly fee to the United States Trustee Program for each calendar quarter, or portion thereof, between the date of filing the petition and the date the court enters a final decree closing the case, dismisses the case or converts the case to another chapter in bankruptcy. The quarterly fee is calculated by totaling the debtor's disbursements as reported on the Monthly Operating Reports for the three-month calendar quarter, according to the following chart. The quarterly fee amount will be estimated if disbursements for all of the months of a calendar quarter that the case is open have not been reported to the United States Trustee. The estimated fee is based on, a) reported disbursement history, b) initial financial data submitted when the case was filed, or c) an estimation done by the United States Trustee office. If you calculated the fee to be less than the estimated quarterly fee, you must submit the reports supporting your estimation to the United States Trustee. A minimum fee of $325.00 is due even if there are no disbursements during a calendar quarter. There is no proration of the fee.

TOTAL QUARTERLY DISBURSEMENTS	QUARTERLY FEE
$0 to $14,999.99	$325.00
$15,000 to $74,999.99	$650.00
$75,000 to $149,999.99	$975.00
$150,000 to $224,999.99	$1,625.00
$225,000 to $299,999.99	$1,950.00
$300,000 to $999,999.99	$4,875.00
$1,000,000 to $1,999,999.99	$6,500.00
$2,000,000 to $2,999,999.99	$9,750.00
$3,000,000 to $4,999,999.99	$10,400.00
$5,000,000 to $14,999,999.99	$13,000.00
$15,000,000 to $29,999,999.99	$20,000.00
$30,000,000 or more	$30,000.00

Quarterly fees are due no later than one month following the end of each calendar quarter. Failure to pay quarterly fees may result in the conversion or dismissal of the case. Payment of that quarter's fees and any past due fees and interest, if applicable, must be made before the effective date of a confirmed Plan of Reorganization and quarterly fees will continue to accrue until entry of the final decree, or until the case is converted or dismissed. Failure to pay these fees may result in a motion by the United States Trustee to convert the case to a Chapter 7 case.

The debtor will receive a bill or statement from the Executive Office for the United States Trustees, Washington, D.C., for each calendar quarter, prior to the payment due date. A check for the quarterly fee, made payable to "United States Trustee", should be mailed with the tear-off portion of the statement form to:

United States Trustee Payment Center
P.O. Box 70937
Charlotte, NC 28272-0937

The address shown above is a lockbox at a bank. It may NOT be used for service of process, correspondence or any purpose other than payment of quarterly fees. Any other correspondence or documents sent to the lockbox other than the payment form will be destroyed.

The debtor is responsible for timely payment of the quarterly fee. Failure to receive a bill from the Executive Office for the United States Trustees does not excuse the debtor from timely payment.

Failure to pay the quarterly fee is cause for conversion or dismissal of the chapter 11 case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)(4)(K) (for cases filed on or after October 17, 2005) or 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(10) (for cases filed before October 17, 2005).

16. Interest Assessment on Unpaid Quarterly Fees. Pursuant to 31 U.S.C. §3717, the United States Trustee Program will begin assessing interest on unpaid Chapter 11 quarterly fees charged in accordance with 28 U.S.C. §1930(a) effective October 1, 2007. Interest assessed on past due amounts first appeared on the October 2007 statements. The interest rate assessed is the rate in effect as determined by the Treasury Department at the time your account becomes past due. If payment of the full principal amount past due is received within thirty (30) days of the date of the notice of initial interest assessment, the interest assessed will be waived.

17. Quarterly Fees After Confirmation of Plan. Quarterly fees continue to accrue after the Plan of Reorganization has been confirmed. After confirmation, the debtor is required to file Post-Confirmation Operating Reports, and to continue to pay quarterly fees following subject to the same payment guidelines outlined in Paragraph 15 and 16 above until a Final Decree is entered by the court or the case is dismissed or converted to another chapter.

18. Additional Notice Requirements. The United States Trustee must be advised immediately of any significant change in debtor's business. Significant changes include, but are not limited to, casualty or theft losses, changes in insurance coverage, or allegations of violations of laws, ordinances, or regulations, including but not limited to the failure to pay taxes, which could affect the continued operation of the debtor's business.

19. Waiver of Modification of Reporting Requirements. The reporting requirements of the United States Trustee's office may be waived or modified only after a request in writing demonstrating sufficient cause for the requested action, and specifying what alternative is to be provided (i.e., the form and detail) for reporting on that estate. No waiver or modification shall be effective unless in writing and signed by the United States Trustee or an authorized delegate.

20. Disclosure of Intent to use Taxpayer Identifying Number. Pursuant to the Debt Collection Improvements Act of 1996, Public Law 104-134, Title III, §31001(i)(3)(A), 110 Stat. 1321-365, codified at 31 U.S.C. §3701, the United States Trustee intends to use the debtor's Taxpayer Identifying Number (TIN) as reported by the debtor or debtor's counsel in connection with the chapter 11 bankruptcy proceeding for the purpose of collecting and reporting on any delinquent debt, including chapter 11 quarterly fees and interest, if applicable, that are owed to the United States Trustee.

The United States Trustee will provide the debtor's TIN to the Department of Treasury for its use in attempting to collect overdue debts. Treasury may take the following steps: (1) submit the debt to the Internal Revenue Service Offset Program so that the amount owed may be deducted from any payment made by the federal government to the debtor, including but not limited to tax refunds; (2) report the delinquency to credit reporting agencies; (3) send collection notices to the debtor; (4) engage private collection agencies to collect the debt and (5) engage the United States Attorney's office to sue for collection. Collection costs will be added to the total amount of the debt.

AMENDMENTS TO OPERATING REQUIREMENTS and
SOLICITATION OF COMMENTS AND SUGGESTIONS

The United States Trustee reserves the right to revise, modify or amend these guidelines and requirements from time to time, and as is appropriate in an individual case. Comments or suggestions regarding these guidelines or other policies and procedures of the Office of The United States Trustee are sought and appreciated and should be directed to the United States Trustee for Region 2 at the address shown below:

TITLE 28 > PART V > CHAPTER 123 > § 1930

§ 1930. Bankruptcy fees

(a) The parties commencing a case under title 11 shall pay to the clerk of the district court or the clerk of the bankruptcy court, if one has been certified pursuant to section 156 (b) of this title, the following filing fees:

(1) For a case commenced under—

(A) chapter 7 of title 11, $245, and

(B) chapter 13 of title 11, $235.

(2) For a case commenced under chapter 9 of title 11, equal to the fee specified in paragraph (3) for filing a case under chapter 11 of title 11. The amount by which the fee payable under this paragraph exceeds $300 shall be deposited in the fund established under section 1931 of this title.

(3) For a case commenced under chapter 11 of title 11 that does not concern a railroad, as defined in section 101 of title 11, $1,000.

(4) For a case commenced under chapter 11 of title 11 concerning a railroad, as so defined, $1,000.

(5) For a case commenced under chapter 12 of title 11, $200.

(6) In addition to the filing fee paid to the clerk, a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee, for deposit in the Treasury, in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first. The fee shall be $250 for each quarter in which disbursements total less than $15,000; $500 for each quarter in which disbursements total $15,000 or more but less than $75,000; $750 for each quarter in which disbursements total $75,000 or more but less than $150,000; $1,250 for each quarter in which disbursements total $150,000 or more but less than $225,000; $1,500 for each quarter in which disbursements total $225,000 or more but less than $300,000; $3,750 for each quarter in which disbursements total $300,000 or more but less than $1,000,000; $5,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $1,000,000 or more but less than $2,000,000; $7,500 for each quarter in which disbursements total $2,000,000 or more but less than $3,000,000; $8,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $3,000,000 or more but less than $5,000,000; $10,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $5,000,000 or more. The fee shall be payable on the last day of the calendar month following the calendar quarter for which the fee is owed.

(7) In districts that are not part of a United States trustee region as defined in section 581 of this title, the Judicial Conference of the United States may require the debtor in a case under chapter 11 of title 11 to pay fees equal to those

[FILED SEPARATELY TO PRESERVE CODES]

BRIEF OF INTERVENOR, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The United States of America, as intervenor pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2403, hereby files this brief in support of the constitutionality of 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1). In accordance with Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8010(a)(2), the United States adopts appellant's statement of the basis of appellate jurisdiction.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

1. Whether year-to-date data from a pay stub subsequent to a missing pay stub constitutes "other evidence of payment received . . . by the debtor from any employer" within the meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv)?

2. Whether 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1)'s provision for "automatic" dismissal on the 46th day of the case gives rise to an unconstitutional deprivation of property without due process?[1]

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The United States adopts appellant's statement of the case. For convenience, however, the United States summarizes the essential facts and describes the opinion below here.

I. Background

Brandon L. Miller ("Debtor") and his wife filed a joint petition for bankruptcy protection under chapter 13 on January 24, 2007. Section 521(a)(1) of title 11 requires the debtor to file certain documents with the bankruptcy court. Specifically, § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv) requires the debtor to file "copies of all payment advices or other evidence of payment received within 60 days before the date of the filing of the petition, by the debtor from any employer of the debtor." 11 U.S.C. § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv).

---

[1] Appellant cites as his second issue whether the court below erred in raising compliance with § 521's filing provisions sua sponte. Appellant did not challenge the court's authority to raise such issues in the proceedings below. See Appendix ("APP") 67-76. The BAP ordinarily will not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal. In re Black, 292 B.R. 693, 699 (10th Cir. BAP 2003). Moreover, it is established that bankruptcy courts have the power to raise issues sua sponte. See, e.g., Hayes v. Production Credit Ass'n, 955 F.2d 49, 1992 WL 26785 *7-8 (10th Cir. 1992) (Table); see also 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) ("No provision of this title . . . shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action . . . .").

Debtor timely filed three pay stubs from his employer for the four pay periods occurring in the 60-day period prior to the petition date. APP 95. Debtor was missing, and did not file, the pay stub for the third such pay period. Id. For the third pay period Debtor filed a calculation of the data missing from the pay stub, drawn from the year-to-date information on the fourth pay stub. Id.

At a May 2, 2007, confirmation hearing, the bankruptcy court, sua sponte, questioned whether Debtor's case was not "automatically dismissed" on the 46th day following the petition due to Debtor's failure to file the missing pay stub, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1). Id. Section 521(i)(1) provides:

> Subject to paragraphs (2) and (4) and notwithstanding section 707(a),[[2]] if an individual debtor in a voluntary case under chapter 7 or 13 fails to file all of the information required under subsection (a)(1) within 45 days after the date of the filing of the petition, the case shall be automatically dismissed effective on the 46th day after the date of the filing of the petition.

11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1). Subparagraph (2) permits any party in interest to seek a dismissal order where the time set forth in § 521(i)(1) has expired. 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(2). Subparagraph (4) permits a trustee to move the court, before the time set forth in § 521(i)(1) has expired, to decline to dismiss the case if the debtor attempted in good faith to comply with § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv) and if administration of the case would be in the best interest of creditors. 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(4).

The Debtor and Trustee agreed below that the year-to-date calculation satisfied the requirements of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv). APP 71, 89. Debtor also argued, however, that to the extent the calculation was not sufficient, the "automatic dismissal" provision of 11 U.S.C. § 521(i) does not afford due process as required by the United States Constitution. APP 72; U.S. Const. amend. V.

II. Decision Below

On July 12, 2007, the bankruptcy court ruled that a calculation using year-to-date data does not satisfy the requirements of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv) and that, as a result, Debtor's chapter 13 petition was "automatically dismissed" on the 46th day following the petition date (March 11, 2007). APP 106. The court ruled further that § 521(i)(1)'s dismissal provision is constitutional. APP 104-05.

Specifically, the court held that a calculation based on year-to-date information from another pay stub does not constitute "other evidence of payment received" within the meaning of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv). The court disagreed with other reported decisions on the issue, all of which hold that a calculation based on year-to-date information is sufficient, stating that "they do not analyze the language of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv)" but "either implicitly or explicitly invok[e] equitable considerations to reach arguably just results." APP 99. Parsing the statute, the court concluded that the phrase "received . . . by the debtor from any employer of the debtor" modifies not only the word "payment" but the entire object "payment advices or other evidence of payment." APP 100. The court concluded that a calculation by a lawyer cannot constitute "other evidence of payment" because it is not "received" directly from an employer. APP 101. The court bolstered her reading by pointing out that using a calculation may lead to error; if the pay stub contains errors or if the deductions from gross income vary, the net income calculation may be incorrect. Id. The court offered, however, that a calculation or replacement payment advice obtained from the employer may suffice; alternatively, the debtor may seek an extension of time to provide the required evidence under § 521(i)(3) or may ask the trustee to move to administer the case despite the defective filing under § 521(i)(4). Id., n. 18.

The court also found § 521(i)(1) to be constitutional. Interpreting Debtor's argument as both a facial and as-applied challenge, the court first rejected Debtor's facial challenge. The court noted that a facial challenge requires a constitutionally recognized deprivation of life, liberty or property in a manner that affords inadequate procedural safeguards. APP 103. The court held that the Debtor lost no cognizable property interest when his petition was dismissed because the "nation's bankruptcy laws are a matter of legislative largesse and do not provide debtors with constitutionally protected interests in the mere continued existence of a bankruptcy case." Id. The court held also that, to the extent Debtor had a cognizable interest in the non-dismissal of his bankruptcy case, the Bankruptcy Code itself provides all the notice that is constitutionally due in that it shows clearly the consequences for non-filing of required information. APP 104. The court noted further that the Code permits the Debtor to petition the court for an extension, seek guidance from the court regarding compliance, and challenge any erroneous determination. Id.

With respect to Debtor's as-applied challenge, the court construed the challenge to argue only that a dismissal by the clerk, without an order from the court, would be unconstitutional. The court agreed that the power to dismiss a petition, even pursuant to § 521(i)(1)'s "automatic" dismissal provision, rests solely with the court. APP 105. The court also noted that the dismissal decision was made by the court in this case, and concluded that Debtor had "no basis for an as-applied challenge to § 521(i)(1) . . . ." Id.

ARGUMENT

I. THIS PANEL NEED NOT ADDRESS THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF § 521(i) BECAUSE THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN HOLDING THAT A CALCULATION BASED ON YEAR-TO-DATE INFORMATION ON A PAY STUB IS NOT "OTHER EVIDENCE OF PAYMENT" WITHIN THE MEANING OF § 521(a).

The United States has intervened herein to support the constitutionality of § 521(i). Debtor's constitutional challenge may be avoided because the bankruptcy court erred in holding that a calculation extrapolated from year-to-date information on another pay stub is not "other evidence of payment" within the meaning of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv). See Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic & Inst'l Rights, 547 U.S. 47, 56 (2006) ("[W]hether a statute is constitutional fairly includes the question of what that statute says.")

Broken into component phrases, § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv) requires filing of:

- copies of
- all payment advices or other evidence of payment
- received
- within 60 days before the date of the filing of the petition
- by the debtor from any employer of the debtor

The court held that "received ... by the debtor from any employer of the debtor" modifies "payment advices or other evidence of payment" and that, therefore, only evidence that the debtor receives directly from an employer fulfills the debtor's duties under the statute. APP 100. According to the "rule of the last antecedent," both phrases following "received" are most logically read to modify the word "payment." Barnhart v. Thomas, 540 U.S. 20, 26-27 (2003).[3]

[3] The Supreme Court explained that "the grammatical 'rule of the last antecedent,'" provides that "a limiting clause or phrase . . . should ordinarily be read as modifying only the noun or phrase that it immediately follows." Id. (citing 2A N. Singer, Sutherland on Statutory Construction § 47.33, p. 369 (6th rev. ed. 2000)).

Congress was concerned about the payments the debtor received in the 60-day period prior to the petition date. Nothing in the Code indicates that "evidence" should be read differently from its ordinary meaning, as governed by the Federal Rules of Evidence, or that a court could not consider evidence of payment such as deposit slips or bank statements, which are not received from an employer.

Moreover, even under the court's reading, the calculation derived from year-to-date information could be construed as having been received from an employer. The calculation itself is not evidence - it is merely math. The evidence in the calculation is the year-to-date information, which was received from the employer via the subsequent pay stub.

In addition, the court failed to consider fully the language of the statute in construing § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv) and concluding that she was required to dismiss Debtor's case. APP 101 ("There is simply no room for 'substantial compliance' or similar equitable theories; either the required documents are filed or they are not.") Section 521(a)(1)(B) provides: "(a) The debtor shall – (1) file – (A) a list of creditors; and (B) unless the court orders otherwise --" the payment advices, among other things. The prefatory phrase "unless the court orders otherwise" has a plain meaning – that the court has the power to order otherwise. Although Congress set forth no particular standard against which such an order would be measured (e.g., substantial compliance), it is reasonable to assume that the court has some power to grant relief consistent with, and in furtherance of, other provisions of the Code. See, e.g., In re Brickey, 363 B.R. 59, 63-64 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2007) (recognizing limits on the court's ability to "order otherwise"); cf. In re Jackson, 348 B.R. 487, 497-500 (Bankr. S.D. Iowa 2006) (court may "order otherwise" if dismissal would “foster rather than prevent an abuse of process”).

The Court also speculated that a calculation using year-to-date information is likely to lead to error. Section 521(a)(1)(B)(iv) is most reasonably interpreted to require the Debtor to submit the evidence that he or she has received and, if misplaced, can reasonably obtain. See In re Tay-Kwamya, 367 B.R. 422, 425 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2007) (§ 521 “only requires the filing of documents which actually exist.”) Such evidence must be weighed, like any other evidence, to the extent that it is reliable and probative. Although a calculation may be more prone to error than a pay stub itself, in a chapter 13 case such as this, the trustee, creditors and the court are free to take that into consideration in the confirmation process when deciding whether the debtor’s proposed payments suffice. See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2). Moreover, pay stubs themselves are not immune from error.

All other bankruptcy courts having addressed the adequacy of calculations based on year-to-date information for purposes of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv) have held them to be sufficient. See In re Wojda, 371 B.R. 656, 659-60 (Bankr. W.D.N.Y. 2007); In re Reynolds, 370 B.R. 393, 396-97 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. June 5, 2007); Tay-Kwamya, 367 B.R. at 425-26; In re Luders, 356 B.R. 671, 673 (Bankr. W.D. Va. 2006); see also In re Svigel, slip copy, 2007 WL 1747117 *2 (10th Cir. BAP Jun. 18, 2007) (holding that bankruptcy court erred in failing to consider whether a year-to-date calculation constituted “other evidence of payment” for purposes of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv)). Here, the court did not hold that the calculation submitted was unreliable or inaccurate; rather, she held that the case was dismissed automatically because such calculation, regardless of its reliability, did not meet the requirements of the statute as a matter of law. In this, the court erred.

II. DEBTOR’S CONSTITUTIONAL CHALLENGE ENTITLES HIM TO NO RELIEF.

A. THE AUTOMATIC DISMISSAL PROVISION OF § 521(i)(1) IS NOT UNCONSTITUTIONAL ON ITS FACE.

The court interpreted Debtor's submissions to include both facial and as-applied challenges to § 521(i) under the due process clause of the United States Constitution. U.S. CONST. amend. V.[4] With respect to the facial challenge, the court noted correctly that the Debtor must show two things – the existence of a constitutionally protected property interest and an absence of adequate process before deprivation of such interest. APP 103. The court concluded that the Debtor lacked a constitutionally protected interest in not having his petition dismissed, quoting Supreme Court precedent for the proposition that there is "no constitutional right to obtain a discharge . . . ." Id. (quoting United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434, 446 (1973)). For present purposes, we assume that the debtor has a protected interest in avoiding dismissal of his case. Although Congress was not required to create a bankruptcy regime, it has done so and we assume that Congress intended its procedures to satisfy minimal standards of due process.[5] [4] Debtor mistakenly invoked the fourteenth amendment (action by the states), rather than the fifth (action by the federal government).

[5] "A plaintiff has a property interest in those things to which [he or] she has 'a legitimate claim of entitlement.'" Richman v. Straley, 48 F.3d 1139, 1143 (10th Cir. 1995) (quoting Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 577 (1972)). If such interest rises to the level of a constitutional right, the deprivation of such interest will be subject to a strict constitutional test; if such interest does not rise to the level of a constitutional right, a deprivation of such interest must, nevertheless, meet a more "lenient" constitutional standard. See In re Stewart, 175 F.3d 796, 811 (10th Cir. 1999). In Stewart, the Tenth Circuit noted that "[b]ankruptcy laws regulating economic activity do not involve constitutionally protected conduct" and "discharge in bankruptcy is not a constitutional right but is only a civil remedy afforded by statute . . . ." Id. However, the Stewart court nonetheless reviewed whether a certain provision of the Code was unconstitutionally vague or violated the equal protection clause, applying "less rigorous constitutional standards." Id. Here, although the right to file a bankruptcy petition arises from the Bankruptcy Code and not from the Constitution itself, the Debtor nevertheless may have a property interest to the extent that the Bankruptcy Code affords him a right to relief. Other courts having addressed the issue hold that due process affords a debtor some procedural protection before his or her petition is dismissed. See, e.g., Sheets v. Livy, 97 F.2d 674, 675 (4th

The court correctly rejected debtor's facial challenge to § 521. APP 104. A statute may be held unconstitutional on its face only if "no set of circumstances exists under which the Act would be valid." United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987). Here, there are adequate procedural safeguards in place to satisfy due process. The bankruptcy court concluded that § 521 "itself provides a clear directive that certain documents must be filed within 45 days after the petition date . . . . It is unclear how much more notice could be provided than to engrain [sic] the deadline in the statute itself." APP 104. The court also noted that the Code affords debtors other avenues for relief from dismissal, including petitioning the court regarding compliance with their filing requirements, seeking an extension to file, and challenging any decision they deem erroneous. Id..

Due process requires only that the applicable procedures "are reasonable and give the aggrieved party adequate notice and an opportunity to meaningfully participate." Santana v. City of Tulsa, 359 F.3d 1241, 1244 (10th Cir. 2004); see also Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 546 (1985). Under § 521(a), the Debtor is required to file certain information, including "payment advices," "unless the court orders otherwise." 11 U.S.C. § 521(a)(1)(B). This suggests that a Debtor can move for a declaration that the information filed constitutes "other evidence of payment" within the meaning of § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv). See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9013. In addition, the Debtor can move, before the 45 day period expires, for additional time to file the necessary papers. 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(3). Moreover, if the court dismisses the case sua sponte, the Debtor can move for relief from the dismissal order on the ground that it was entered inappropriately. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9024. The Debtor is further protected in that, if a party in interest moves for dismissal under § 521(i)(2), Rule 9013 requires such motion to be served on the debtor. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9013. The local rules also afford the Debtor due process. Under the court's standing orders, the clerk's authority is limited to dismissal pursuant to specified local rules, none of which addresses the debtor's failure to produce documents required under § 521. See Standing Order #2, U.S. Bankr. Court for the District of Utah, Rule 5003-1 [Exhibit A]. Moreover, dismissal by the clerk only follows the debtor's failure to respond to a motion to dismiss or a notice of failure to comply served on the debtor by the trustee. Id.; see also Standing Order #1, U.S. Bankr. Court for the District of Utah, Rule 2083-1 [Exhibit B].

The case In re Tennant, 318 B.R. 860 (9th Cir. BAP 2004), also is instructive. In Tennant, the bankruptcy court dismissed a chapter 13 petition sua sponte, pursuant to its general powers under 11 U.S.C. § 105(a), after the debtor failed to file a statement of financial affairs within 15 days of the petition date. Id. at 863-64. The court noted that "the concept of procedural due process requires a notice and an opportunity to be heard." Id. at 870. The court also noted that the term "after notice and a hearing," as defined in the code, at 11 U.S.C. § 102(1),[6] is a "flexible" concept and "depends on what is appropriate in the particular circumstance." Id. The Tennant court concluded:

> A dismissal without notice and an opportunity to be heard would not be appropriate where substantive issues are to be determined, but if a case involves only very narrow procedural aspects, a court can dismiss a Chapter 13 case without further notice and a hearing if the debtor was provided 'with notice of the requirements to be met.'

[6] Section 102(1) provides that notice and a hearing means "such notice as is appropriate in the particular circumstances, and such opportunity for a hearing as is appropriate in the particular circumstances . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 102(1).

Id. (quoting In re Meints, 222 B.R. 870, 872 (D. Neb. 1998)). Likewise, here, the Code itself gave the Debtor ample notice of the requirements to be met.

Debtor's facial challenge to § 521 fails because the statute and applicable rules afford notice and multiple opportunities to be heard. The Debtor cannot show that the statute would be unconstitutional in its application in every case. Salerno, 481 U.S. at 745.

B. DEBTOR LACKS STANDING TO BRING AN AS-APPLIED CHALLENGE BECAUSE THE HARM OF WHICH HE COMPLAINS IS HYPOTHETICAL.

The Debtor does not question Congress' right to limit his access to the bankruptcy courts. He challenges the applicable procedures, arguing that his case should not be dismissed without notice and a hearing. The Supreme Court has opined that "[a]s a general rule, if there is no constitutional defect in the application of the statute to a litigant, he does not have standing to argue that it would be unconstitutional if applied to third parties in hypothetical situations." County Court v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140, 154-55 (1979); see also Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 610-611 (1973); United States v. Mendes, 912 F.2d 434, 440 (10th Cir. 1990). The Debtor here seeks a declaration of unconstitutionality based on a hypothetical situation – that a case could be "automatically dismissed" without notice or a hearing by the clerk's entry, in violation of due process. The Debtor ignores, however, that he himself had notice, in the form of discussion at his confirmation hearing as well as a written scheduling order from the court, and an opportunity to be heard, of which he took full advantage by filing two briefs. Below, the Debtor did not suggest that the process made available to him was defective in any way. APP 72-75. The Debtor thus lacks standing to raise a constitutional challenge based on how § 521(i) might hypothetically be applied to someone else. Allen, 442 U.S. at 154-55; Mendes, 912 F.2d at 440.

The Debtor now complains that the court's raising of the issue sua sponte at confirmation and setting a briefing schedule was inadequate because "[i]t is conceivable that, given notice that compliance with § 521(a)(1) was at issue, Appellant may have been able to present testimony or other evidence that would support his position that he had supplied other evidence of payment." Appellant's brief at 26. The obvious flaw in this argument is that, by the time the court raised the issue at confirmation, the time to comply with § 521(a)(1) had long passed. What the Debtor submitted under § 521(a)(1) was a matter of record and undisputed. Moreover, Debtor did not ask the court to continue the confirmation hearing and to leave the record open for further evidence. Finally, the Debtor fails to adduce any evidence that he would have presented had the issue arisen prior to confirmation. That the Debtor could "conceivably," or hypothetically, have done so if such evidence existed is irrelevant to whether the Debtor was afforded due process in this case. Allen, 442 U.S. at 154-55; Mendes, 912 F.2d at 440.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States respectfully requests that the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel uphold the constitutionality of 11 U.S.C. § 521(i)(1), or avoid the constitutional question by holding that a calculation using year-to-date information, if otherwise reliable, satisfies the requirements set forth in § 521(a)(1)(B)(iv).

STATEMENT OF REASONS FOR ORAL ARGUMENT

Oral argument is appropriate in this appeal because it presents both an issue of statutory interpretation which is a matter of first impression to the panel and raises a constitutional challenge to a new provision of the Bankruptcy Code.

FOR THE DISTRICT OF DELAWARE

BRIEF FOR APPELLEE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a) and (b) to hear the underlying case, a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 1101, et seq. See also 28 U.S.C. §§ 151, 1334(a). On September 9, 2003, the bankruptcy court entered an order directing the United States Trustee to appoint a Chapter 11 trustee to oversee the bankruptcy proceeding. Appendix ("A") 7. The bankruptcy court's directive constituted a final and immediately appealable order. See In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 470 (3d Cir. 1998).

On September 15, 2003, the debtor United States Mineral Products Company ("U.S. Mineral" or "debtor") filed a timely notice of appeal from that order to the district court. A1445-47; see Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). Appellant James P. Verhalen ("Verhalen") filed a timely notice of appeal to the district court on September 18, 2003. A1565-67. The district court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a). On January 16, 2004, the district court affirmed the appointment of the trustee. A9, A16. The debtor subsequently filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court from the district court's decision on February 10, 2004. A1-3. Verhalen filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court on February 11, 2004. A4-6. This Court has jurisdiction to hear the appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

(1) Whether the bankruptcy court properly adhered to the procedural scheme of 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a) by directing the appointment of a trustee after notice, a hearing, and upon the request of a party in interest.

(2) Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in determining that the appointment of a trustee was in the interests of the parties.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

United States Mineral Products Company, a former manufacturer of asbestos-containing products, filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 1101, et seq., on July 23, 2001. See A11, A474; Bankr. Case No. 01-02471, Doc. No. 1. After two years of negotiations, the debtor failed to propose a plan of reorganization that was acceptable to all creditors.

After a hearing in August 2003, the bankruptcy court concluded, in light of the "acrimony" among the parties, that they would be unable to formulate a plan of reorganization absent the intervention of a Chapter 11 trustee. A1403-04. The court therefore directed the appointment of a trustee pursuant to the interests-of-the-parties test of 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(2). A1403. The district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision, stating that the "distrust and animosity" among the parties justified the appointment of a trustee. A15-16. The debtor and Verhalen subsequently appealed.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

I. Statutory Background

A. Appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee

When a debtor files for bankruptcy under Chapter 11, see 11 U.S.C. § 1101, et seq., all of its assets are transferred to a new legal entity: the estate. See 11 U.S.C. 541(a); In re O'Dowd, 233 F.3d 197, 202 (3d Cir. 2000). At that time, the debtor becomes the "debtor-in-possession" and is responsible for administering the estate. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a).

The debtor, as a "debtor-in-possession," serves as a fiduciary to the creditors of the estate. In re United Healthcare System, Inc., 200 F.3d 170, 177 n.9 (3d Cir. 1999). In that fiduciary role, the debtor must "refrain from acting in a manner which could damage the estate, or hinder a successful reorganization." Marvel, 140 F.3d at 471 (quoting Petit v. New England Mortgage Services, Inc., 182 B.R. 64, 69 (D. Me. 1995)). Thus, the debtor must provide "[o]pen, honest and straightforward disclosure to the Court and creditors." Id. at 474 (internal quotation marks omitted). In addition, the debtor has an obligation to "protect and conserve property in its possession for the benefit of creditors." Ibid. (In re Ionosphere Clubs, Inc., 113 B.R. 164, 169 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990)).[1]

Although the Code provides the debtor with this opportunity to operate the bankruptcy estate, section 1104(a) of the Bankruptcy Code states that the debtor should be replaced by a Chapter 11 trustee in certain circumstances. The provision states that "[a]t any time after the commencement of the case but before confirmation of a plan, on request of a party in interest or the United States

[1] The filing of the Chapter 11 petition similarly changes the role of the debtor's management. Before bankruptcy, the debtor's management is a fiduciary to the corporation and the shareholders. After filing the petition, the management serving as the debtor-in-possession is a fiduciary to the estate as well as its creditors. See Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985).

trustee, and after notice and a hearing, the [bankruptcy] court shall order the appointment of a trustee":

> (1) for cause, including fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, or gross mismanagement of the affairs of the debtor by current management, either before or after the commencement of the case, or similar cause, but not including the number of holders of securities of the debtor or the amount of assets or liabilities of the debtor; or
>
> (2) if such appointment is in the interests of creditors, any equity security holders, and other interests of the estate, without regard to the number of holders of securities of the debtor or the amount of assets or liabilities of the debtor.

11 U.S.C. § 1104(a).

If the bankruptcy court concludes that either of the above standards has been satisfied, the court will direct the United States Trustee[2] to appoint, subject to the court's approval, a "disinterested person" to serve as the Chapter 11 trustee. 11 U.S.C. § 1104(d).

B. Section 524(g) Injunction for Asbestos Claims

One provision of the Bankruptcy Code specifically addresses bankruptcies involving asbestos claims. See Pub. L. 103-394, § 111(a), 108 Stat. 4106 (codified at 11 U.S.C. § 524(g) & (h)).

[2] United States Trustees are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-89; In re Columbia Gas Systems, Inc., 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994) (noting that United States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 109 (1977)).

As Congress recognized, asbestos-related health problems have a long latency period; the effects of exposure to asbestos can remain hidden for as many as thirty years. H.R. Rep. No. 103-835 at 40 (1994). As a result, it can be difficult for asbestos companies in bankruptcy to be certain of resolving all (or even most) of the potential tort claims against them. See ibid. Thus, as part of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, Congress provided a procedural mechanism through which a debtor corporation can resolve all asbestos-related tort claims, including potential future claims. See Pub. L. 103-394, § 111(a); H.R. Rep. No. 103-835 at 40-41.

Section 524(g) allows debtor asbestos companies to create a special trust out of which all present and future tort claims will be paid. See 11 U.S.C. § 524(g)(1)(B), (2)(B)(i); H.R. Rep. No. 103-835 at 41. The trust must satisfy strict procedural requirements, including obtaining the approval of 75% of a specially created class of asbestos creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 524(g)(2)(B)(ii)(IV)(bb); H.R. Rep. No. 103-835 at 41. The trust must also provide "reasonable assurance" that it will pay present and future claims "in substantially the same manner." 11 U.S.C. § 524(g)(2)(B)(ii)(V). If the trust satisfies the statutory mandates, then a court can issue an injunction requiring any present or future asbestos tort claimants to seek compensation via the trust, and not from the debtor or any company that later acquires the debtor's assets. See 11 U.S.C. § 524(g)(1), (3)(A).

As a result, a third-party entity can purchase the assets of the debtor, without also taking on the debtor's potential future asbestos-related liability. See 11 U.S.C. § 524(g)(3)(A)(ii).

II. Facts Of This Case

A. The Bankruptcy Proceedings

1. On July 23, 2001, U.S. Mineral filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 11. See A11, A474; Bankr. Case No. 01-02471, Doc. No. 1. U.S. Mineral is a closely-held business. See A10. James Verhalen (the other appellant in the present action) owns outright a majority of the company's stock and controls a substantial portion of the remaining shares. See A11; Bankr. Case No. 01-02471, Doc. No. 165 (schedules filed by debtor on September 5, 2001) (Part 13: List of Equity Security Shareholders).

U.S. Mineral, which manufactures and sells spray-applied fire resistive material, insulation and acoustical products to the construction industry, see A10, A511, was in most respects a financially stable company when it filed the Chapter 11 petition, see A11. However, the company was facing mounting tort lawsuits, arising out of its manufacture and sale of asbestos-containing products between 1954 and 1972. See A11. U.S. Mineral sought protection under Chapter 11 primarily to resolve these asbestos claims. See ibid.

U.S. Mineral's bankruptcy case was a "rather modest" one. A11. According to the debtor, the company had a market value of $13.4 million. See A620, A1374. The company's liabilities consisted of approximately $3 million in trade debt and around $10 million in liquidated asbestos claims. See A11.

On August 8, 2001, the United States Trustee appointed two committees to represent the major creditor interests in the case: an Official Committee of General Unsecured Creditors ("Trade Committee") and an Official Committee of Asbestos Claimants ("Asbestos Committee"). Bankr. Case No. 01-02471, Doc. Nos. 80, 81; see 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1) (noting the authority of the United States Trustee to appoint creditors' committees). Later, on October 28, 2002, the bankruptcy court appointed a Legal Representative to look out for the interests of "future unknown asbestos claimants[.]" A58.

2. The debtor, the only party with the authority to file a reorganization plan,[3] had difficulty proposing a plan that was acceptable to all parties. On August 1, 2002, more than one year after the petition was filed, U.S. Mineral reported to the bankruptcy court that its negotiations with the asbestos creditors had reached an "impasse," A36, and asked the court to appoint a mediator. See A34-39. The bankruptcy court appointed a mediator on October 11, 2002. A43. However, even after mediation, U.S. Mineral failed to propose a plan that gained the assent of the other parties. See, e.g., A343 (statement of the Asbestos Committee at a February 27, 2003 hearing, predicting "very difficult waters ahead" in the negotiations); A449 (statement of U.S. Mineral at a May 1, 2003 hearing that it was "obvious" there would be no confirmed plan by July 23, 2003); A732 (statement by the Legal Representative at a July 31, 2003 hearing that mediation had reached an "impasse").

[3] The Bankruptcy Code provided the debtor with an exclusive right to file a plan during the first 120 days of the bankruptcy case. See 11 U.S.C. § 1121(b). Later, the bankruptcy court repeatedly granted U.S. Mineral's requests for extensions of its "exclusivity" period, see, e.g., A264-65, A332-33, A334-36, A369-71, A439-41, A466-68, A480-82, despite the Asbestos Committee's "continuing objection to exclusivity," A508; see A279-91, A533-39.

One major point of dispute among the parties was the proper market value of the debtor. An expert retained by the Asbestos Committee opined that U.S. Mineral was worth between $20 and $42 million. See A49. By contrast, Curtis Securities ("Curtis"), an investment banking firm retained by the debtor, estimated that the "fair market value" of U.S. Mineral was $13.4 million. A620.

3. At a May 29, 2003 hearing, the debtor stated that the protracted bankruptcy proceedings were taking a serious financial toll on the company. The debtor asserted that its professional fees (for attorneys, accountants, investment bankers, and other specialists) had "exceeded $2 million." A476.[4] The debtor

[4] Under the Bankruptcy Code, a debtor's estate must pay the fees of the professionals retained by the debtor, see 11 U.S.C. §§ 327, 330(a), as well as those retained by creditors' committees, see 11 U.S.C. §§ 330(a), 1103. See 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(2). As suggested that, if professional fees continued to accrue at the same rate, it would lose another $1 million by March 2004. See ibid. The company was not readily able to shoulder these costs because of an economic downturn in the construction industry. See A475-76 (noting that the debtor's revenues had fallen by as much as 25 and 36 percent in certain areas).

The bankruptcy court stated that it did not "know really what to do" to help the debtor minimize its professional fees other than to "push hard" to get the case "out of Chapter 11 and into a confirmed plan." A479. The court found, in light of the relatively small nature of the company, that the parties should be able to reach plan confirmation by the end of October. See A475. The court announced that its "goal" was "to get this case into a confirmed plan" by the end of the year, and he informed the parties that he would "start shoving awful hard in the next couple of months if this thing doesn't start to move." A478.

4. The events of the subsequent months did not, however, serve to reduce tensions among the parties. In Summer 2003, the parties discovered that the debtor had failed to list a number of creditors and claims on its original schedules of assets and administrative expenses, these fees have first claim to the estate's assets. See 11 U.S.C. § 507(a)(1).

liabilities, including a potential $1 million claim held by the Wausau Insurance Companies. See A743-44, A822.[5]

At a July 31, 2003 hearing, the debtor's counsel stated that U.S. Mineral's management had failed to inform their bankruptcy attorney about the potential $1 million liability, see A744, because they "didn't think [Wausau] had a valid claim," A743. The bankruptcy court made clear that the debtor was required to report this creditor, regardless of the management's analysis of the worthiness of the claim. See A743-44. The court directed the debtor to amend its schedules of assets and liabilities to include this creditor along with any other potential claimants that were previously omitted. A707, A743-44.

5. At the July 31, 2003 hearing, the bankruptcy court once again expressed its dissatisfaction with the parties' continued failure to formulate a consensual reorganization plan. The court did not want to fall back on the "wholly objectionable alternative of having competing plans" that would inevitably lead to considerable additional litigation. A741. Therefore, the court indicated that, if the debtor could not "come up with a consensual plan by the end of August," the court would "appoint a Chapter 11

[5] Wausau had previously obtained an approximately $6.5 million judgment against U.S. Mineral. See A833. U.S. Mineral paid all but $950,000 of that judgment. See A743, A833. The dispute later went to arbitration, and the arbitrator ordered U.S. Mineral to pay a little over $1 million (the remaining $950,000 plus approximately $100,000 in defense costs). See A833, A1685.

Trustee" who could sell the company's assets and prepare a reorganization plan. A741.

6. On August 25, 2003, U.S. Mineral proposed a reorganization plan. See A1171-88. The plan stated that the company's existing equity holders (such as Verhalen) would not receive anything from the reorganization. See A1175, A1210 (stating that "Old Common Stock shall be canceled and each holder thereof . . . shall receive nothing").

The plan envisioned the creation of an Asbestos Trust, which would "assume all liabilities and obligations" of the debtor with respect to asbestos-related claims. A1207 ("Plan Overview"). The Asbestos Trust would be partly funded with $22 million in insurance proceeds. A1208.[6] The rest of the funds for the Trust would come from an auction of the company. Ibid.

U.S. Mineral had previously made clear that its management (which included Verhalen)[7] would participate in the auction and might repurchase the company. See A731, A1385. The debtor nominated Curtis, the investment banking firm that had estimated the debtor's market value at $13.4 million, to conduct the auction. See A610-15, 1373-75.

[6] The company had separate insurance coverage for its non-asbestos claims. See A1381.

[7] At the time, Verhalen was the company's Chairman and Chief Executive Officer. See Bankr. Case No. 01-02471, Doc. No. 1707, Appendix A (Verhalen Employment Agreement).

The debtor's reorganization plan provided that the funds from the auction would be used first to pay non-asbestos creditors, such as members of the Trade Committee. See A1207 ("Plan Overview"). The plan stated that the trade creditors would be paid in full. See A1172, A1174. The "remaining proceeds" from the auction would be transferred to the Asbestos Trust. A1207.

The plan also contained provisions for enjoining future asbestos litigation against the debtor or any company that purchased its assets at auction. See A1181-83. The plan provided that, if a sufficient number of creditors agreed to the reorganization proposal, the bankruptcy court could issue an injunction pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 524(g). See A1181-83, A1237-38. Alternatively, if the parties could not agree on a plan, and the debtor was forced to resort to the "cramdown" provisions of the Bankruptcy Code,[8] the plan presumed that the bankruptcy court could

[8] The so-called "cramdown" process permits a debtor to impose a reorganization plan on a dissenting class of creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b); Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association v. 203 North LaSalle Street Partnership, 526 U.S. 434, 441 (1999). In order for a debtor to effectuate a "cramdown," its plan must satisfy most of the requirements of other confirmed plans, see 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a), such as being accepted by at least one class of impaired creditors, see 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(10); LaSalle, 526 U.S. at 441. In addition, the plan must be "fair and equitable" to the dissenting class of creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b); see also 11 U.S.C. § 1129(b)(2)(B) (stating that, to be "fair and equitable" to a class of unsecured creditors, the plan must provide the holder of each claim in the dissenting class with full value, or the plan must not provide any value to holders of claims with a lower priority than the dissenting class).

issue a similar injunction pursuant to its "broad equitable powers" under 11 U.S.C. § 105(a). A1237.

7. At the subsequent hearing on August 27, 2003, the asbestos creditors identified what they viewed as the flaws in the debtor's reorganization plan. The Legal Representative first observed that the plan would not guarantee an injunction pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 524(g). The Representative asserted that, absent a section 524(g) injunction, it was "questionable" whether any prospective buyer could purchase the debtor's assets free and clear of future asbestos claims. A1384. The Representative reasoned that bidders at the auction would "necessarily reduce the amount that they would be willing to pay based upon the specter of successor liability." A1384. As a result of this low bidding, the auction would not provide the maximum value to the asbestos creditors. See A1384-85.

The Legal Representative was also concerned that the auction would be run by Curtis, the debtor's investment banking firm. See A1385. The Representative noted that the debtor's management would be a bidder in the auction, and suggested that other potential bidders might question Curtis's "independen[ce]." Ibid. The Representative stated that, "[u]nder those circumstances, we would not be surprised if no one bid." Ibid. The Asbestos Committee "concur[red]" with the Legal Representative's assessment of the situation. A1386.

8. After listening to the parties' objections, the bankruptcy court denied U.S. Mineral's motion to appoint Curtis to supervise the debtor's proposed auction. See A1402-03. The court observed that this proposal "might have been an excellent way to proceed" six months or one year earlier before Curtis Securities had provided an appraisal of the debtor. Ibid. However, in August 2003, the motion was "ill-advised." A1403. The court noted the intense "acrimony" that had developed among the parties by August 2003, and stated that the appointment of Curtis would "just . . . lead to more problems." Ibid.

9. At the August 27, 2003 hearing, the parties shared their views on the wisdom of appointing a Chapter 11 trustee. The Asbestos Committee contended that a Chapter 11 trustee could "resolve the disputes among the different parties by filing his own plan," and declared definitively that it "support[ed] the appointment of a Trustee[.]" A1389; see A1392 ("[A] Trustee, not burdened by somebody controlling him and free to make the right decisions about maximizing value in this case . . . would serve us all, and I would ask Your Honor to return where we left on July 31, recognizing we have failed to reach agreement, and to do what is necessary to protect the estate, rather than a particular party."). In its pleadings, the Committee similarly declared that the bankruptcy court "should authorize the appointment of a disinterested trustee to take charge of this reorganization effort." A805.

U.S. Mineral, by contrast, strongly opposed the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee. See A1375 ("implor[ing]" the bankruptcy court "not to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee in this case"). The debtor asserted first that, once a trustee was appointed, each party would be able to file its own reorganization plan, thereby unnecessarily "confus[ing]" its assorted creditors. Ibid.[9] U.S. Mineral further argued that a Chapter 11 trustee would not benefit the estate because any trustee would be "very expensive[.]" Ibid. (asserting that "[i]n addition to his fees, the Trustee would have a retinue of professionals, attorneys, accountants, investment bankers and others").

During the August 2003 proceeding, the debtor announced that its professional fees totaled more than $4 million. A1381. The burden created by these fees led the debtor to describe itself as a "wasting asset[.]" Ibid. The Trade Committee similarly stated that it was "extremely distressed" about these "extraordinary" administrative costs that had put the debtor on the "verge of demise." A1393.

[9] Likewise, the Trade Committee opposed the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee, in part because the Committee envisioned a proliferation of plans that would "create still further litigation[.]" A1396.

The United States Trustee agreed that the debtor's financial position was indeed troubling. See A1401-02. The United States Trustee suggested that the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee might help alleviate that problem. See A1402.[10] The United States Trustee expressed its view that the debtor's substantial professional fees were largely attributable to the "constant bickering" among the parties and their "inability . . . to come to some resolution[.]" A1401-02. The United States Trustee advised the Court that a Chapter 11 trustee, at least if he had the parties' "confidence," could "get people to the table" and help the parties resolve the case, thereby substantially reducing future expenditures. A1402.

10. On September 9, 2003, the bankruptcy court issued an order directing the United States Trustee to appoint a Chapter 11 trustee for the estate. A7. As the court explained at the August 2003 hearing, the court concluded that the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee was "in the interest of creditors under Section 1104(a)(2)." A1403. Noting that the debtor's principal Verhalen was a "potential creditor" of the company, the court expressed concern about the "the acrimony . . . between the creditor-bodies and [this] principal[.]" Ibid. The bankruptcy court found that, due to the acrimony among the parties, "a neutral third person [was] . . . absolutely essential to maximize the value of this estate and to construct a plan that's acceptable to creditors." A1403-04.

[10] The United States Trustee declined at the August 2003 hearing to take a firm position on the propriety of appointing a Chapter 11 trustee, A1400, but nonetheless attempted to aid the proceedings by commenting on the relevant considerations, see A1400-02.

In addition, the court found that "the debtor's late filing of amended schedule[s] listing numerous additional creditors is troublesome and raises the question regarding the credibility of the debtor." A1404. The court stated that simply because "these creditors may be paid off from insurance proceedings" or "the debtor didn't think they needed to list them" was "no excuse" for failing to include all creditors on the initial schedules of assets and liabilities. Ibid. The court observed: "We wouldn't tolerate that in a consumer debtor, and certainly aren't going to tolerate it in a business as sophisticated as this one[.]" Ibid.

The bankruptcy court based its appointment of a trustee solely on the interest-of-the-parties test in section 1104(a)(2). See A7, A1403-04. The court did not purport to find "cause" for a trustee under section 1104(a)(1). See ibid.

11. On September 15, 2003, U.S. Mineral appealed the bankruptcy court's order, A1445-47, and moved to stay the appointment of a trustee pending its appeal to the district court. See A1460-74. Verhalen also appealed the bankruptcy court's decision, A1565-67, and joined the debtor's stay motion, see A1609-15. The bankruptcy court denied the stay request, A1698, observing that "the tenor of this case has steadily deteriorated to the point where the parties are merely unable to work constructively with one another." A1697. A Chapter 11 trustee was needed to break this "impasse," A1696, and move the parties toward a final reorganization plan. See A1697-98.

B. The District Court's Decision

The district court affirmed the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee. See A9-16. The court first found that the parties clearly had "notice and a hearing" prior to the trustee appointment. A15. The bankruptcy court at the July 2003 hearing had "put the parties on notice" that it planned to appoint a Chapter 11 trustee if they failed to formulate a consensual plan by the end of August. A12.

The district court also determined that the bankruptcy court's ruling satisfied the interests-of-the-parties standard of section 1104(a)(2). The court found that "the distrust and animosity between the parties and their unwillingness or inability to cooperate" on almost every issue "constitute[d] substantial justification for the appointment of a neutral officer to bring resolution to the case." A15. The court added that "[t]he fact that the bankruptcy court sua sponte suggested such a resolution" demonstrated "responsible judicial oversight, not an abuse of discretion." A16.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. In directing the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee, the bankruptcy court clearly adhered to the procedural scheme established by the Bankruptcy Code. First, the court provided ample notice to the parties by announcing at the July 2003 hearing that it planned to appoint a trustee if the parties failed to develop a consensual reorganization plan. Second, the parties had ample opportunity for a hearing in late August 2003, when the court listened to arguments on the trustee issue. While the debtor "implore[d]" the court not to appoint a trustee, A1375, the Asbestos Committee urged the court to make the appointment, stating that such a neutral third party could "resolve" the parties' multiple "disputes," A1389; see A1391-92. The bankruptcy court thereby satisfied the statutory requirements for notice and a hearing, and, in so doing, clearly provided the parties with due process.

Finally, the bankruptcy court ordered the appointment of a trustee after the Asbestos Committee specifically requested such relief. Because the bankruptcy court acted "on request of a party in interest," 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a), this Court need not consider whether a bankruptcy court could, in certain circumstances, appoint a trustee sua sponte.

2. The bankruptcy court plainly exercised sound discretion in directing the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee. After two years of protracted bankruptcy proceedings, the debtor's business seemed to be on the "verge of demise," A1393, largely due to the debtor's expenditure of $4 million on bankruptcy-related professional fees, A1381. The parties thus needed for the reorganization proceeding to come to a close. Yet, due to the intense acrimony among the parties, they were unable to agree on a reorganization plan.

The events of the Summer 2003 only increased the tensions among the parties. The asbestos creditors were unhappy with the debtor's proposed reorganization plan because it failed to adhere to the statutory scheme in 11 U.S.C. § 524(g) for addressing future asbestos claims. The asbestos creditors were also displeased by the debtor's nomination of its own investment banking firm to conduct an auction of the company's assets, particularly since the company's existing management would be among the bidders. Finally, the creditors' distrust and animosity grew further when the debtor revealed that for two years it had failed to report a creditor with a $1 million claim.

In light of the acrimony among the parties, and the dwindling resources of the debtor's estate, the bankruptcy court properly found that it was in the parties' interests – indeed, that it was "absolutely essential" – to appoint a "neutral third person" who could construct an "acceptable" reorganization plan and thereby "maximize the value of this estate[.]" A1403-04. The bankruptcy court thus had ample reason to direct the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee pursuant to the interests-of-the-parties test of section 1104(a)(2).

In applying the “flexible” standard of section 1104(a)(2), Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474, the bankruptcy court was not required to find that the debtor had intentionally engaged in wrongdoing. An analysis of fault on the part of the debtor would have been required only if the bankruptcy court had purported to find “cause” for a trustee pursuant to section 1104(a)(1). Section 1104(a)(2) demanded instead that the bankruptcy court look to the “practical realities and necessities” of the case. Ionosphere Clubs, 113 B.R. at 168 (internal quotation marks omitted). Because of the “level of acrimony” in this case, the appointment of a trustee was the “only way” to “ensure that reorganization [would] proceed.” In re Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474 (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, in the context of this case, the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee was clearly a sound exercise of discretion.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews the decision of the bankruptcy court according to the same standard as the district court. In re Kiwi International Air Lines, Inc., 344 F.3d 311, 316 (3d Cir. 2003). This Court examines the bankruptcy court’s factual findings for clear error and conducts plenary review of its legal determinations. Ibid. This Court reviews the bankruptcy court’s ultimate decision to order the appointment a trustee for abuse of discretion. In re Sharon Steel Corp., 871 F.2d 1217, 1225 (3d Cir. 1989).

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Adhered To The Procedural Scheme Established By The Bankruptcy Code In Directing The Appointment Of A Chapter 11 Trustee.

The bankruptcy court, in ordering the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee, clearly complied with the procedural provisions of section 1104(a). The provision states that a bankruptcy court should order such an appointment "after notice and a hearing" and upon the "request of a party in interest or the United States trustee[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a). The court provided the parties with ample notice of the possible trustee appointment at the July 2003 hearing; it held a hearing addressing the issue in August 2003; and it ordered the appointment of a trustee only after receiving a specific "request" for such an appointment from the Asbestos Committee. Thus, the appellants' procedural challenges cannot be sustained.

A. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Ordered the Appointment of a Trustee On the Request of a Party in Interest.

The bankruptcy court directed the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee only after the Asbestos Committee requested such decisive action. At the August 2003 hearing, the Asbestos Committee made clear that it "support[ed] the appointment of a Trustee[.]" A1389. Indeed, the Committee "ask[ed]" the court to appoint such a neutral third-party, who could "cut through" the parties' multiple disputes and "make the right decisions about maximizing value in this case." A1391-92; see also A805 (pleading filed by the Asbestos Committee stating that the bankruptcy court "should authorize the appointment of a disinterested trustee to take charge of this reorganization effort"). Because the bankruptcy court ordered the appointment of a trustee "on request of a party in interest," 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a), this Court need not decide whether a bankruptcy court might have the authority to direct such an appointment sua sponte.

Verhalen, however, appears to assume that a party can "request" the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee only by filing a formal motion, see Brief of Appellant Verhalen at 12, 18-21. Nothing in the statute mandates such a limitation.

Because the Bankruptcy Code does not define the term "request," see 11 U.S.C. § 101, this Court gives the word "its ordinary, plain and generally accepted meaning," Shell Oil Co. v. Federal Power Commission, 334 F.2d 1002, 1010-11 (3d Cir. 1964). A "request" is defined as "the act of asking for something," i.e., "the expression of a desire or wish[.]" Webster's New International Dictionary 1929 (1981). The Asbestos Committee thus clearly made a "request" when it "ask[ed]" the bankruptcy court to order the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee. As a result, when the bankruptcy court directed the trustee appointment, it was acting upon the "request" of the Asbestos Committee.

It is immaterial that the bankruptcy court itself initially suggested the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee at the July 2003 hearing, see A741. The Bankruptcy Code does not limit a bankruptcy court's discretion to make suggestions to the parties. Indeed, given the acrimony among the parties, the bankruptcy court's suggestion for a Chapter 11 trustee was, as the district court cogently observed, "responsible judicial oversight, not an abuse of discretion," A16.

Nor does it matter that the bankruptcy court characterized its decision as granting its "own motion" for a Chapter 11 trustee, A1404. Regardless of the terminology used by the bankruptcy court, when it directed the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee, it was properly acting "on request of a party in interest," 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a); cf. MOL, Inc. v. Peoples Republic of Bangladesh, 736 F.2d 1326, 1329 (9th Cir. 1984) ("The true nature of the action . . . does not depend on terminology."). As a result, this Court need not decide whether a bankruptcy court could, in certain circumstances, order the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee sua sponte.

B. The Debtor and Verhalen Were Clearly on Notice of the Possible Trustee Appointment and Had Ample Opportunity for a Hearing.

The bankruptcy court, in ordering the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee, clearly complied with the Bankruptcy Code's flexible standard for "notice and a hearing," 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a). The Code provides that the phrase "after notice and a hearing" requires only "such notice as is appropriate in the particular circumstances, and such opportunity for a hearing as is appropriate in the particular circumstances[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 102(1)(A). The bankruptcy court's actions more than satisfied this standard.

As the district court observed, the bankruptcy court "put the parties on notice," A12, at the July 2003 hearing that it was inclined to appoint a Chapter 11 trustee if the parties could not agree upon a reorganization plan by the end of August. And, at the August 2003 hearing, the parties clearly litigated the trustee issue. The debtor "implore[d]" the bankruptcy court "not to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee," arguing that such an appointment would lead to a "confus[ing]" number of reorganization proposals, and would be unduly costly. A1375. The Asbestos Committee, by contrast, "support[ed]" the appointment of a neutral Chapter 11 trustee, A1389, who could "cut through" the countless disagreements among the parties and "make the right decisions about maximizing value in this case[.]" A1391-92. The United States Trustee asserted that a Chapter 11 trustee might be able to "get people to the table," and resolve a reorganization proceeding that had been mired in "constant bickering[.]" A1401-02. The August 2003 proceeding thus plainly satisfied the "hearing" requirement of section 1104(a).

C. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision Clearly Accorded With Due Process Requirements.

Because the bankruptcy court adhered to the notice and hearing provisions of section 1104(a), the court's decision plainly complied with constitutional due process requirements. See Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 542 (1985) (due process requires that a party be given notice and an opportunity for a hearing).

Verhalen, in challenging the trustee appointment on due process grounds, appears to concede that the parties had notice prior to the bankruptcy court's August 2003 decision. See Brief of Appellant Verhalen at 23. Indeed, during the district court proceeding on the trustee issue, Verhalen admitted that he was put on "notice" by the bankruptcy court's July 2003 announcement that the court might appoint a trustee. See A1882-83 (counsel for Verhalen stating that the bankruptcy court's July 2003 comment was "the first notice that Verhalen received that the issue of a Trustee was on the table"). Because Verhalen was on notice of the trustee issue, he also had ample opportunity to present evidence and argument on the matter at the August 2003 hearing. See In re Lowenschuss, 171 F.3d 673, 685-86 (9th Cir. 1999) (concluding that, because the debtor received notice of a party's request for a Chapter 11 trustee, the debtor had adequate opportunity for a hearing).

However, Verhalen contends that due process principles required the bankruptcy court to provide the parties with notice and a hearing prior to the court's July 2003 statement that it might in the future appoint a trustee. This contention is specious. Verhalen attempts to characterize the bankruptcy court's July 2003 comment (that it planned to appoint a trustee if the parties failed to agree on a reorganization plan) as a "ruling[.]" Brief of Appellant Verhalen at 23. However, the court's contingent statement was clearly not a final determination on the appointment issue, and therefore did not require notice or a hearing, see 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a); see also Herwins v. City of Revere, 163 F.3d 15, 18 (1st Cir. 1998) ("Due process normally requires notice and opportunity for some kind of hearing prior to a final deprivation of liberty or property.") (internal citations and quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added); Propert v. District of Columbia, 948 F.2d 1327, 1331 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (same).

U.S. Mineral contends that the notice and hearing provided by the bankruptcy court were insufficient because the court did not, prior to rendering its August 2003 decision, announce the specific grounds for its decision. See Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 16-17. The debtor thus argues that it had "no opportunity," id. at 16, to rebut the evidence relied upon by the bankruptcy court. This due process argument is meritless.

First, the debtor suggests that it lacked an opportunity to rebut the bankruptcy court's "allegation" that Verhalen was a creditor of U.S. Mineral. Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 18. However, the bankruptcy court made no such allegation. Instead, the court observed that Verhalen was a "potential creditor" of the estate, A1403.[11] In any event, the bankruptcy court's central [11] Of course, as the debtor observes, Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 18 n.4, Verhalen now appears to be an actual creditor of finding was not this "potential creditor" issue. Instead, the court was primarily concerned that, because of Verhalen's acrimonious relationship with the asbestos creditors, he would have difficulty leading the parties toward a consensual reorganization plan. See A1403-04 (noting that "the acrimony . . . between the creditor bodies and the [debtor's] principal" made it "absolutely essential" for the court to appoint "a neutral third person" who could "construct a plan that's acceptable to creditors").

Second, with respect to the issue of "acrimony," the debtor itself acknowledged the acrimonious nature of the parties' negotiations. Indeed, at the August 2003 hearing, the debtor argued in favor of its auction plan in part by referring to the "contentious" negotiations among the parties. A1380. The debtor asserted that an auction was necessary because these strained negotiations had prevented the parties from settling on a market value for the debtor. See ibid. Given U.S. Mineral's acknowledgment of – indeed, reliance on – the acrimonious nature of the parties' relationship, the debtor can hardly complain that the the estate. On February 13, 2004, the Chapter 11 trustee moved to reject Verhalen's employment agreement with the company. Bankr. Case No. 01-02471, Doc. No. 1707. On March 22, 2004, the bankruptcy court granted the trustee's motion. Bankr. Case No. 01-02471, Doc. No. 1787. The debtor asserts that this action "will cause Mr. Verhalen to file a proof of claim for rejection damages," thereby rendering him a "creditor of the estate." Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 18 n.4.

bankruptcy court relied the same fact in directing the appointment of a trustee.[12]

Third, with respect to the debtor's two-year delay in reporting certain creditors, the debtor not only had an opportunity but did in fact argue that this omission was an "honest mistake," Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 18. At the July 2003 hearing, the debtor's counsel asserted that the debtor's management had failed to inform him about Wausau's $1 million claim, not because the managers were intentionally hiding anything, but because they "didn't think [Wausau] had a valid claim," A743.

Finally, U.S. Mineral asserts that the bankruptcy court, in deciding the trustee issue, was required to rely solely on evidence presented at the August 27, 2003 hearing, and could not look to the entire record in the case. Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 17-19. The debtor attempts to rely on In re Indian Palms Associates, Ltd., 61 F.3d 197 (3d Cir. 1995), but that decision provides no support for the debtor's contention.

In Indian Palms, a bank that held the first mortgage on the debtor's main asset requested relief from the automatic stay.

[12] The debtor suggests that the bankruptcy court, in deciding the trustee issue, could not take into account the acrimony among the parties, unless the court found that the debtor was the cause of the acrimony or had otherwise engaged in "wrongdoing." Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 19, 27. As discussed infra, the debtor's argument rests on a fundamental misinterpretation of section 1104(a)(2)'s interests-of-the-parties test. The debtor incorrectly assumes that section 1104(a)(2) requires the bankruptcy court to find some sort of malfeasance on the part of the debtor.

Indian Palms, 61 F.3d at 199. The bankruptcy court agreed to lift the stay, but the district court reversed. See ibid. On appeal to this Court, the bank argued in part that the district court had improperly admitted documents that were part of the bankruptcy proceeding, but that had not been specifically presented to the bankruptcy court during the hearing on the stay matter. See id. at 203. This Court noted that, if the hearing on the bank's motion for relief from the stay were deemed an "independent" adversary proceeding, the bankruptcy court and appellate courts reviewing its decision could not rely on documents from the underlying bankruptcy case (unless consideration of the documents could be justified under the doctrine of judicial notice). Id. at 204. The Court found, however, that the proceeding for relief from the stay was "sufficiently associated with the general administration of the debtor's estate" that the "relevant record" included the entire bankruptcy proceeding. Id. at 204-05.

This Court's reasoning in Indian Palms makes clear that when the bankruptcy court considers an issue directly related to the administration of the estate (such as authorizing the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee), the "relevant record" must include the entire bankruptcy proceeding. Thus, the bankruptcy court was not required to rely solely on evidence presented at the August 2003 hearing.

Indeed, U.S. Mineral concedes that "this Court has recognized that the entire bankruptcy proceeding may constitute the 'record' of the case[.]" Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 20. The debtor, however, attempts to demonstrate that an exception to this general rule applies in this case. The debtor relies on this Court's statement that a party "should be given a fair opportunity to rebut and put into perspective the evidence admitted against its position." Indian Palms, 61 F.3d at 205. As discussed, the debtor was indeed provided with such a "fair opportunity." Thus, there was no due process violation.[13]

II. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised Its Discretion In Concluding That The Intervention Of A Trustee Was In The Interests Of The Parties.

The record before the bankruptcy court amply supported the court's decision to appoint a Chapter 11 trustee pursuant to the interests-of-the-parties test of 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(2). As this [13] The debtor also quotes this Court's statement that "[i]t is understood, for example, that the facts relating to the merits of the case will be decided on the basis of evidence admitted into the trial record." Indian Palms, 61 F.3d at 205 (emphasis in original). According to U.S. Mineral, this statement demonstrates that the bankruptcy court could not rely on the entire bankruptcy record "to make a finding relating to the merits" of the trustee appointment. Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 20 (emphasis in original). However, this Court appears to have been simply explaining how the principle it had just announced – that a party should have a "fair opportunity" to rebut adverse evidence – generally plays out in the trial context. See Indian Palms, 61 F.3d at 205 (citing Andrews v. Bechtel Power Corp., 780 F.2d 124, 142 (1st Cir. 1984), in which a plaintiff unsuccessfully argued at an employment discrimination trial that the district court should take judicial notice of evidence presented in a request for class certification). This Court did not hold that a bankruptcy court, in adjudicating a matter that directly impacts the general interests of the parties and the estate (such as the trustee appointment in this case), cannot consider facts and evidence from the entire bankruptcy proceeding.

Court has emphasized, section 1104(a)(2) "'envisions a flexible standard,'" Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474 (quoting Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1226), that provides the bankruptcy court with considerable discretion in determining the propriety of a trustee appointment, see ibid.; Ionosphere Clubs, 113 B.R. at 168 (stating that "[w]ith respect to whether a trustee should be appointed under Code § 1104(a)(2), courts eschew rigid absolutes and look [ ] to the practical realities and necessities" of a particular case) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, although the appointment of a trustee is the "'exception, rather than the rule,'" and must be based on clear and convincing evidence, Marvel, 140 F.3d at 471 (quoting Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1225), this Court has recognized that the bankruptcy court is best positioned to determine whether that standard has been satisfied. For that reason, this Court affirms the bankruptcy court's decision to direct the appointment of a trustee, unless the decision amounts to an abuse of discretion. Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d 1225-26. Under the facts of this case, the appointment of a trustee plainly was not an abuse of discretion.

A. The Acrimony Among the Parties Amply Justified the Appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee in This Case.

The acrimony among the parties, particularly when viewed in light of the mounting economic pressures faced by the debtor, amply justified the bankruptcy court's decision to direct the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee. See Marvel, 140 F.3d at 472-75 (concluding that acrimony among parties to a bankruptcy proceeding can justify the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee). Due to the parties' "constant bickering," A1401, negotiations were often at an "impasse," A36 (statement of debtor); A732 (comment of Legal Representative), rendering it extremely unlikely the parties would be able to agree on a reorganization plan before the estate's assets were dissipated by administrative fees.

The debtor was (in its own words) becoming a "wasting asset," A1381, as it depleted more and more of its resources to pay the attorneys, accountants, investment bankers, and other specialists involved in the bankruptcy proceeding. By the time the bankruptcy court decided the trustee issue in August 2003, the debtor had spent $4 million on these professional fees, A1381, a sum that represented a massive expense for a debtor with an asserted market value of only $13.4 million, see A620, A1374. This considerable depletion of the debtor's assets was clearly not serving the "interests" of the creditors or the estate.[14]

Indeed, the Trade Committee stated at the August 2003 hearing that it was "extremely distressed" about the "extraordinary" administrative costs that had put the debtor on the "verge of demise[.]" A1393. Thus, although the Trade Committee did not support the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee, see A1393-94, these comments demonstrate that the Committee was likely to benefit from any action that sped the reorganization process and thereby reduced the financial burden on the debtor.

[14] Although section 1104(a)(2) states that a court can also take into account the interests of "any equity security holders," the debtor's prior equity holders apparently did not have a financial stake in the reorganization. See A1175, A1210 (debtor's reorganization plan stating that "Old Common Stock shall be canceled and each holder thereof . . . shall receive nothing").

As the bankruptcy court observed as early as May 2003, the only clear way to minimize the debtor's bankruptcy-related expenditures, and thereby preserve the estate, was to "push hard" to get the case "out of Chapter 11 and into a confirmed plan." A479. Yet the parties proved intransigent. The acrimony among the parties kept negotiations at a standstill.

Unfortunately, the events of the Summer 2003 further added to the tensions among the parties. The asbestos creditors were upset by the selection of Curtis, the debtor's investment banking firm, to run the debtor's proposed auction. The creditors, noting that the debtor's management planned to bid at the auction, suggested that other potential bidders might assume that Curtis was working on behalf of management and therefore be "scared away" from participating in the auction. A1385. Whether or not the nomination of Curtis was intended to (or even was likely to) deter competition and thereby help U.S. Mineral's old equity owners repurchase the company, the debtor could not have supposed that this nomination would enhance its credibility with the asbestos creditors. The choice to hire the investment banking firm that had provided a hotly-contested estimate of the company's market value was only likely to fuel the existing acrimony among the parties.

The debtor's failure to include a guarantee for a section 524(g) injunction in its reorganization plan further suggested to the asbestos creditors that the debtor was not acting in their best interests. As the Legal Representative observed, see A1384, without such an injunction, no prospective buyer could be certain of purchasing the debtor's assets free and clear of future asbestos claims, and would discount its auction bid accordingly. Thus, the debtor's proposed auction did not appear calculated to produce the maximum return for creditors.[15]

In addition, the debtor's belated admission of a potential $1 million claim against it did not instill confidence or trust among the parties. Even if that two-year omission was in fact an

[15] U.S. Mineral argues, see Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 34-35, that the bankruptcy court could provide similar injunctive relief via section 363(f). See 11 U.S.C. § 363(f) (providing five circumstances under which estate property can be sold "free and clear" of other interests in the property). The debtor relies on In re Trans World Airlines, Inc., 322 F.3d 283 (3d Cir. 2003), which held that a bankruptcy court could use section 363(f) to enjoin former employees of a bankrupt airline from bringing their employment-related claims against the purchaser of the airline, id. at 285, 289-91.

Trans World Airlines, however, does not suggest that a bankruptcy court could use section 363(f) to enjoin future claims. As Congress recognized in enacting section 524(g), because future (and as yet unknown) asbestos claimants cannot participate in a bankruptcy proceeding, and therefore "by definition[] do not have their own voice," H.R. Rep. No. 103-835 at 40, those claimants can be subject to an injunction only if it is issued pursuant to "high" procedural and substantive standards, id. at 41. A garden-variety section 363(f) injunction would not satisfy those standards. For the same reason, it is highly unlikely that, absent such procedural and substantive protections, a bankruptcy court could bind future claimants by issuing an injunction pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 105(a), as the debtor's reorganization plan proposed, see A1237.

"honest mistake," Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 18, that omission was bound to undermine the debtor's "credibility," A1404, in any future negotiations with the asbestos creditors. Cf. Petit, 182 B.R. at 69 ("Open, honest and straightforward disclosure to the Court and creditors is intrinsic to the entire reorganization process.") (internal quotation marks omitted).

In light of the continuing depletion of the debtor's assets, it was clearly in the interests of the parties to formulate and confirm a reorganization plan as quickly as possible. However, given the distrust and acrimony among the parties, no such reorganization was likely to take place absent the intervention of a neutral Chapter 11 trustee. In these circumstances, the bankruptcy court's decision to appoint a Chapter 11 trustee demonstrated "responsible judicial oversight, not an abuse of discretion," A16; see Marvel, 140 F.3d at 475 (noting that, when the parties are "sharply divided on many issues, and are presently incapable of resolving them," the court can exercise its discretion to direct the appointment of a trustee) (internal quotation marks omitted); Petit, 182 B.R. at 70 (concluding that, when the "antagonism and animosity" among the parties "reache[s] a particular intensity . . . which is complicating efforts to 'reorganize' the Debtor," the "appointment of a trustee may be the only way that the bankruptcy court can ensure that reorganization will proceed").

B. The Interests-of-the-Parties Test of Section 1104(a)(2) Does Not Require a Finding of Wrongdoing on the Part of the Debtor.

The debtor contends that a bankruptcy court cannot direct the appointment of a trustee "merely" because of "acrimony" that renders the parties unable to agree on a plan. Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 26. Instead, the debtor insists, there must be clear and convincing evidence that any "acrimony, distrust and delay" are attributable to the improper actions of the debtor. Id. at 27.

The debtor's contention that a bankruptcy court must have evidence of wrongdoing on the part of the debtor, see Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 26-33, conflates the two parts of section 1104(a). Section 1104(a)(1) focuses on the misconduct of the debtor. That provision "mandat[es]" the appointment of a trustee upon "a specific finding of cause," Marvel, 140 F.3d 474, i.e., that the debtor is guilty of fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, gross mismanagement, or similar improprieties. See 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1). The bankruptcy court in this case, however, relied solely upon the interest-of-the-parties test of section 1104(a)(2), which involves more "flexible" considerations, Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474, and "allows appointment of a trustee even when no 'cause' exists." Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1226.

Thus, a court must find debtor misconduct only if the court directs the appointment of a trustee pursuant to section 1104(a)(1). It is therefore not surprising that, in almost every case cited by the appellants as demonstrating the need for a finding of "blameworthy" or "egregious" conduct, Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 31 n.7, 33; Brief of Appellant Verhalen at 31, the bankruptcy court found "cause" for a trustee under section 1104(a)(1). See, e.g., Marvel, 140 F.3d at 473-75 (concluding that both sections 1104(a)(1) and (a)(2) justified the appointment of a trustee); In re Cajun Electric Power Coop., Inc., 74 F.3d 599, 600 (5th Cir. 1996) (adopting on rehearing the opinion of the dissent at 69 F.3d 746, 751 (5th Cir. 1995)) (relying solely on section 1104(a)(1)); Bellevue Place Associates v. Caisse Centrale des Banques Populaires, 1994 WL 687474 at *6 (N.D. Ill. 1994) (affirming the appointment of a trustee under both sections 1104(a)(1) and (a)(2)); In re V. Savino Oil & Heating Co., 99 BR. 518, 527 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1989) (finding "cause" for a trustee under section 1104(a)(1)); In re The Bible Speaks, 74 B.R. 511, 512 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1987) (concluding that "both grounds" exist for appointing a trustee).

The sole case relied upon by the debtor involving only section 1104(a)(2) is Petit v. New England Mortgage Services, Inc., 182 B.R. 64 (D. Me. 1995). In Petit, the court found evidence raising the "specter" that the debtor had given preferential transfers to certain creditors. Id. at 70. The court indicated that, although this evidence did not necessarily demonstrate that the debtor had committed fraud or other misconduct under section 1104(a)(1), the evidence supported the appointment of a trustee under section 1104(a)(2). See ibid.

The Petit court then offered another justification for the appointment of a trustee pursuant to section 1104(a)(2). The court stated that, because of the "antagonism and animosity" among the parties, the appointment of a trustee appeared to be the "only way" to "ensure that reorganization [would] proceed." Petit, 182 B.R. at 70. The court did not suggest that this justification for a trustee depended on the "specter" of the debtor's wrongdoing. Instead, like the bankruptcy court in the present case, the Petit court stressed the fact that the parties' intense "antagonism and animosity" were hindering reorganization efforts. See also Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474-75 (focusing on this aspect of Petit). Thus, Petit is fully consistent with the bankruptcy court's decision to direct the appointment of a trustee under section 1104(a)(2).[16]

Most significantly, this Court's reasoning in In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463 (3d Cir. 1998),

[16] Nor is the bankruptcy court's determination undermined by In re G-I Holdings, Inc., 295 B.R. 502 (D. N.J. 2003). The bankruptcy court in G-I Holdings acknowledged that acrimony can constitute a basis for appointing a trustee, but concluded that the conflict among the parties in that case had not reached the requisite level of intensity. See id. at 511. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court found insufficient evidence that "a trustee's control would augment the success of the debtor's reorganization or facilitate that reorganization effort[.]" Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted). The district court's conclusion in G-I Holdings that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in declining the request for a trustee merely underscores that such a decision "must be made on a case-by-case basis." Id. at 507.

substantially undermines the debtor's assertion that section 1104(a)(2) requires a finding of fault. U.S. Mineral contends that, to justify a trustee appointment based on "acrimony," the bankruptcy court must find that such acrimony was "caused by actions of the debtor." Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 27. However, in Marvel, this Court made clear that such a finding of fault is relevant only to a determination of "cause" under section 1104(a)(1). See Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474 (concluding that the district court had properly exercised its discretion "in appointing a trustee under § 1104(a)(1) because of the [debtor-in-possession's] contribution to the acrimony with [the relevant] creditors").

By contrast, in concluding that the acrimony among the parties also justified the appointment of a trustee under section 1104(a)(2), the Marvel Court did not mention any fault or wrongdoing on the part of the debtor. See Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474-75. Instead, this Court focused on more practical considerations, noting the district court's finding that "the selection of a plan, whatever its details, [was] in the best interests of all parties, and the best way to achieve that result [was] to appoint a trustee." Id. at 474 (internal quotation marks omitted). The district court had determined that the "sharp[] divi[sions]," id. at 475 (internal quotation marks omitted), among the parties were unduly hindering this needed reorganization. See id. at 474-75. As a result, the case required the intervention of a neutral third-party. See ibid. This Court concluded that, under those circumstances, the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee was a "proper exercise of discretion under the flexible § 1104(a)(2) standard." Id. at 474.[17]

Thus, the interests-of-the-parties test created by section 1104(a)(2), and relied upon by the bankruptcy court, does not require a court to assign blame to a particular party. Instead, the "'flexible standard'" of that provision gives a court the "discretion" to appoint a trustee "'when to do so would serve the parties' and estate's interests.'" Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474 (quoting Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1226); see also Sharon Steel, 871 F.2d at 1226 ("Subsection (a)(2) allows appointment of a trustee even when no 'cause' exists."). As this Court made clear in Marvel, when the "level of acrimony" becomes so acute that the parties cannot resolve their disagreements, the bankruptcy court may, in its discretion, conclude that the "'only way'" to "'ensure that reorganization will proceed'" is to direct the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee. Marvel, 140 F.3d at 474 (quoting Petit, 182

[17] There is no reason to be concerned that this Court's decision in Marvel, which permits the appointment of a trustee upon a finding of "acrimony," will allow creditors to "force the appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee by withholding consent to a reasonable plan offer," Brief of Appellant U.S. Mineral at 33. See Marvel, 140 F.3d at 473 (rejecting an identical argument in the section 1104(a)(1) context). Clearly, if creditors are in fact intentionally "withholding consent" to a "reasonable" plan offer, it would not be in the parties' interests for the court to grant the creditors' request for a Chapter 11 trustee. Thus, the bankruptcy court would exercise its sound discretion to refuse the request.

B.R. at 70). Thus, under section 1104(a)(2), the bankruptcy court orders the trustee’s appointment, not to penalize any party for particular wrongdoing, but instead to help all parties move toward a successful reorganization.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court, upholding the decision of the bankruptcy court, should be affirmed.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), which confers jurisdiction on the district courts of the United States to hear appeals "from final judgments, orders, and decrees" of bankruptcy judges. The bankruptcy court's order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss or convert the debtors' case for abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) was entered on March 15, 2010.

An order denying a section 707(b) motion to dismiss is a final, appealable order. See Morse v. Rudler (In re Rudler), 576 F.3d 37, 43 (1st Cir. 2009); Ross-Tousey v. Neary (In re Ross-Tousey), 549 F.3d 1148, 1153 (7th Cir. 2008); U.S. Trustee v. Cortez (In re Cortez), 457 F.3d 448, 453-54 (5th Cir. 2006); Stuart v. Koch (In re Koch), 109 F.3d 1285, 1287 (8th Cir. 1997); but see Barben v. Donovan (In re Donovan), 532 F.3d 1134, 1137 (11th Cir. 2008) (holding that an order denying a motion to dismiss a Chapter 7 case for substantial abuse, under the earlier version of section 707(b), was not appealable).

The United States Trustee's notice of appeal was timely filed under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on March 25, 2010.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

This appeal raises two separate and independent issues concerning whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it determined that the debtors did not have primarily consumer debts under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b).

1. Did the bankruptcy court err when it refused to consider evidence on an element of proof in the case: whether the debtors had "primarily consumer debts" under section 707(b); and

2. Did the bankruptcy court err when it held that meaning of the term "debt" under section 707(b) included amounts that a creditor may not assert against the debtor due to the statutory limitation on damages for lost future rent under 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6)?

If this Court agrees with the United States Trustee on either question, then this Court should reverse the order of the bankruptcy court entered below.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews a bankruptcy court's findings of fact for clear error and conclusions of law de novo. Behlke v. U.S. Trustee (In re Behlke), 358 F.3d 429, 433 (6th Cir. 2004). Questions of statutory interpretation are also reviewed de novo. West v. AK Steel Corp., 484 F.3d 395, 402 (6th Cir. 2007). Clear error exists "when factual findings were induced by an erroneous view not supported by substantial evidence or made without properly taking into account substantial evidence to the contrary." Indmar Prod. Co. v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 444 F.3d 771, 778 (6th Cir. 2006).

Whether a lower court "failed to consider or accord proper weight or significance to relevant evidence" is a question of law reviewed de novo. Id.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Statutory framework

A. Dismissal or conversion of a bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. § 707

The "principal purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to grant a fresh start to the honest but unfortunate debtor." Marrama v. Citizens Bank of Mass., 549 U.S. 365, 367 (2007). Most typically, individual debtors choose between two forms of relief under the Bankruptcy Code: chapter 7 and chapter 13. In a chapter 7 case, the debtor receives an immediate discharge of debt in exchange for the liquidation of all non-exempt assets. See 11 U.S.C. § 701, et seq. In a chapter 13 case, the debtor retains non-exempt assets, but must repay creditors over a period of time. See 11 U.S.C. § 1301, et seq.

Chapter 7 treats consumer debtors differently from business debtors. The original version of section 707 only permitted dismissal "for cause," but in 1984 Congress amended section 707 to add a second, separate basis for dismissal of a chapter 7 case — section 707(b), which permitted dismissal if the bankruptcy court found that granting a chapter 7 discharge to a debtor with primarily consumer debts would constitute "substantial abuse." Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-353, § 312, 98 Stat. 355, 381 (1984). Congress enacted this amendment "as part of a package of consumer credit amendments" in response to "concerns that some debtors who could easily pay their creditors might resort to chapter 7 to avoid their obligations." H.R. Rep. 109-31 (2005) at 10, reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92. Thus, for over 25 years, the Bankruptcy Code has required that the debtor have "primarily consumer debts" in order to be subject to dismissal for abuse under section 707(b).

In 2005, Congress found that this amendment was insufficient to control abuse of chapter 7. Congress believed that the utility of section 707(b) was limited for several reasons, including confusion about what would permit the court to dismiss under the "substantial abuse" standard and "a presumption that favors granting a debtor a discharge." H.R. Rep. 109-31 at 12. In light of "a generally consistent upward trend" in consumer bankruptcy cases and the belief that bankruptcy relief was "too readily available" and "used as a first resort, rather than a last resort," Congress concluded that reforms were necessary. Id. at 4. In particular, Congress was concerned about "the pursuit of Chapter 7 liquidations instead of Chapter 13 debt repayment plans by consumer debtors who could afford to repay some of their debts." Morse v. Rudler (In re Rudler), 576 F.3d 37, 40 (1st Cir. 2009).

Congress therefore enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, in order "to correct perceived abuses of the bankruptcy system." Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. U.S., 130 S. Ct. 1324 (2010). Specifically, BAPCPA implemented "needs-based reforms" to shift debtors "into chapter 13 . . . as opposed to chapter 7." H.R. Rep. 109-31 at 12. "The heart of the bill's consumer bankruptcy reforms . . . is intended to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." Id. at 2. As described by the Sixth Circuit, "Congress enacted the BAPCPA in order to require above-median income debtors to make more funds available for the payment of unsecured creditors." Schultz v. U.S., 529 F.3d 343, 347 (6th Cir. 2008).

Congress substantially revised section 707(b) under BAPCPA. Id. As amended, section 707(b) now states "[a]fter notice and a hearing, the court . . . may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts . . . if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1).

Congress reversed the presumption in favor of granting consumer debtors a discharge in bankruptcy, reduced the requirement for dismissal from substantial abuse to mere abuse, and provided three tests for finding abuse: means testing, bad faith, and totality of the circumstances. Schultz, 529 F.3d at 347. The "centerpiece" of these reforms is the section 707(b)(2) means test, which requires debtors with primarily consumer debts "to demonstrate financial eligibility to avoid the presumption that their bankruptcy filing is an abuse of the bankruptcy proceedings." Id. In addition, under section 707(b)(3), if the presumption of abuse is avoided, abuse may still be found if the debtor has acted in bad faith or if the totality of the debtor's financial circumstances demonstrates an ability to repay creditors. Id. And instead of just dismissal, the court could convert a chapter 7 case to one under chapter 13. Eisen v. Thompson, 370 B.R. 762, 773 (N.D. Ohio 2007) (stating that BAPCPA "signaled a sea change in the bankruptcy world . . . [n]ow, any debtor who is likely to have the ability to repay even a small portion of his or her debts . . . will have to participate in a partial repayment plan under Chapter 13.").

Congress has established a special series of procedures in order to discover and prevent consumer debtors from abusing the availability of a chapter 7 discharge. The United States Trustee is required to convene and preside at a meeting of creditors where the debtor may be examined. 11 U.S.C. § 341. In a chapter 7 case, this meeting must occur no fewer than 21 days and no later than 40 days after the case has been filed. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2003(a). "[T]he meeting also serves to ensure that the debtor has a basic understanding of particular parts of the Bankruptcy Code." 3 COLLIER ON BANKRUPTCY § 341.01 (2010); see 11 U.S.C. § 341(d) (listing the information to be provided to a chapter 7 debtor).

When an individual seeks relief under chapter 7, the United States Trustee is required to review all materials filed by the debtor, and within 10 days of the section 341 meeting, file a statement as to whether a presumption of abuse arises under the section 707(b)(2) means test. 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1). Within 30 days of filing the statement required by section 704(b)(1), if a presumption of abuse arises, the United States Trustee is required to file (1) a motion to dismiss or convert under section 707(b)(2) or (2) a statement explaining the reason for declining to do so. 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(2); see Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(e) (implementing the timing requirements of section 704(b)(2)). But if a debtor is not correctly identified as a consumer debtor, then they are never subjected to the means test and may not be subject to dismissal under section 707(b)(3)(A) for bad faith or section 707(b)(3)(B) for the ability to repay creditors.

B. Limitations on claims under 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6)

Section 502(b)(6) of title 11 "limits a lessor's claim to actual past damages for unpaid rent due under the lease, plus a maximum of one year or 15% (not to exceed three years) for the loss of future rent." Vause v. Capital Poly Bag, Inc. (In re Vause), 886 F.2d 794, 799 (6th Cir. 1989). By enacting section 502(b)(6), "Congress intended to compensate landlords for their actual damages while placing a limit on large future, speculative damages which would displace other creditors' claims." Id. at 801-02.

C. Eligibility for chapter 13 relief under 11 U.S.C. § 109(e)

Only "an individual with regular income that owes, on the date of the filing of the petition, noncontingent, liquidated" unsecured and secured debts below the specified statutory maximum may be a chapter 13 debtor. 11 U.S.C. § 109(e). "[T]he eligibility requirements of section 109(e) create a gateway into the bankruptcy process, not an ongoing limitation on the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts." Glance v. Carroll (In re Glance), 487 F.3d 317, 321 (6th Cir. 2007).

The Sixth Circuit determines section 109(e) eligibility in the same way that the amount in controversy is determined for the purpose of diversity jurisdiction. Comprehensive Accounting Corp. v. Pearson (In re Pearson), 773 F.2d 751, 757 (6th Cir. 1985). That approach is well settled and not in dispute. "Generally, the amount claimed by the plaintiff in the complaint rules, as long as claimed in good faith." Charvat v. GVN Mich., Inc., 561 F.3d 623, 628 (6th Cir. 2009). "Dismissal is proper, however, if the amount alleged in the complaint was never recoverable in the first instance." Id. If "from the face of the pleadings, it is apparent, to a legal certainty, that the plaintiff cannot recover the amount claimed . . . the suit will be dismissed." Id.

II. Statement of the facts

Prior to the initiation of their chapter 7 bankruptcy case, John Mohr and his wife Shelley Staddon ("the Mohrs") were the sole owners of a HobbyTown USA franchise, which they operated through a limited liability company named Staddon-Mohr LLC. Docket Entry Number 1 at 39. The business closed in December 2008. Id. From January 2007 until June 1, 2008, Mr. Mohr earned just over $32,000 in income from the HobbyTown franchise. Id. at 34. Starting in October 2008, Mr. Mohr began to do consulting work. Id. As reported in their bankruptcy schedules, Mr. Mohr earns $48,000 per year as a government contracts consultant and Ms. Staddon earns $71,680 per year as a teacher for a local school district, where she has been continuously employed for the past six years. Id. at 30. The Mohrs' scheduled gross income is almost $120,000 per year and their monthly take-home pay is $7,400.66. Id. This is 168% of the median income for a family of four in Ohio. U.S. CENSUS BUREAU, STATE MEDIAN FAMILY INCOME BY FAMILY SIZE (2008), available at http://www.justice.gov/ust/eo/bapcpa/20081001/bci_data/median_income_table.htm.

When the Mohrs filed for bankruptcy they had a balance of $356,644.31 outstanding on their first mortgage, which they listed as a consumer debt. Id. at 16. The Mohrs have approximately $58,243.80 in consumer credit card debt, $32,670.80 (56%) of which was incurred in the two years prior to their bankruptcy case. Id. at 20, 22. The Mohrs also owe a total of $26,046.67 on their student loans. Id. at 26. All together, the Mohrs owe a total of $440,934.78 in consumer debts. Id. at 16, 20-26.

The Mohrs also have business debts, which arise from three sources. The first source is a $55,000 balance on a SBA loan, which is secured by their home. Id. at 16. The second source is approximately $74,282.34 in outstanding accounts payable and business taxes for the HobbyTown franchise. Id. at 19-27.

The third source of business debt relates to a claim for breach of contract that arose when the HobbyTown franchise broke its long-term commercial lease with the lessor, Don Wright Realty. See Claims Register Entry Number 7. Mr. Mohr was a guarantor on the commercial lease for the HobbyTown franchise. Id. The Mohrs' bankruptcy schedules listed the liability on the claim as the balance left due on the entirety of the lease, in the amount of $340,000. Doc. No. 1 at 22. Therefore, the Mohrs scheduled $469,282.34 in business debts.

Don Wright Realty's claim, as amended in order to reflect the section 502(b)(6) limitation on damages for loss of future rent, is at most valued at $86,840.96.[1] Claim No. 7. Accordingly, the maximum amount that the Mohrs may owe on the HobbyTown franchise's scheduled business debts is $216,123.30, which is less than the Mohrs' $440,934.78 in consumer debts.[2]

III. Statement of the proceedings below

On January 31, 2009, the Mohrs commenced their case by filing a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. Doc. No. 1. On the cover page of their petition, the Mohrs designated the nature of their debts as "primarily business debts." Id. at 1.

The United States Trustee believed that the value of Don Wright Realty's claim was substantially less than the amount the Mohrs had listed in their bankruptcy schedules for two reasons. First, because the Mohrs were only one month behind on the lease, had not rejected their lease when they filed for bankruptcy, and had not yet incurred $340,000 in actual liability. Transcript at 44. Second, because the maximum value of Don Wright Realty's claim for future

[1] A question about whether the claim should be valued at $79,750.08 or $86,840.96 was raised during the proceedings. Doc. No. 49 at 6. But there appears to be no factual dispute that the claim should be valued at any amount greater than $86,840.96.

[2] The Mohrs scheduled a business debt for sales tax in the amount of $5,570.90 on their petition. Doc. No. 1 at 18. The State of Ohio filed a proof of claim for sales tax in the amount of $90,484.16. Claim No. 10. But even including the full value of the amount claimed, the Mohrs' business debts would be $301,036.56, which is still less than the $440,934.78 in consumer debts.

damages was limited by section 502(b)(6), and the Mohrs could not owe a debt greater than the statutory cap on damages. Id. at 38.

On June 1, 2009, the United States Trustee timely filed a motion to dismiss the Mohrs' case for abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707, listing three reasons.[3] Doc. No. 41. First, for cause under section 707(a), because the Mohrs' caused an unreasonable and consequential delay in the administration of their bankruptcy case by improperly asserting that they were business debtors. Id. at 2, 4. Second, for bad faith under section 707(b)(3)(A), because the Mohrs failed to adequately support their contention that the nature of their debts were "primarily business." Id. at 5. Third, based upon the totality of the circumstances under section 707(b)(3)(B), because the Mohrs would have up to $2,400 per month in discretionary income to repay their creditors up to $144,000 over the life of a five-year chapter 13 repayment plan after making reasonable adjustments to their housing costs. Id. at 5; tr. at 48.

In response, the Mohrs argued that the limitations on claims under section 502(b)(6) did not apply when determining the value and nature of the claims for a motion to dismiss under [3] The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases in this district. 28 U.S.C. § 581(a)(9). "The United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this title but may not file a plan pursuant to section 1121(c) of this title." 11 U.S.C. § 307. Courts have repeatedly held that the United States Trustee has standing under section 307 to appear and be heard on any issue in any bankruptcy case, despite the lack of pecuniary interest in the outcome. See Morgenstern v. Revco D.S., Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990); see also United Artists Theater Co. v. Walton (In re United Artists Theater Co.), 315 F.3d 217, 225 (3d Cir. 2003); Stanley v. McCormick (In re Donovan Corp.), 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) ("The United States trustee may . . . intervene and appear at any level of the proceedings from the bankruptcy court on . . . as either a party or an amicus."); Scott v. U.S. Trustee, 133 F.3d 917 (4th Cir. 1997).

section 707, and therefore they were not subject to dismissal under any part of section 707 because they properly designated themselves as business debtors. Doc. No. 61 at 2-3.

On September 3, 2009, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. Tr. at 4. At the hearing, the court primarily discussed two issues: (1) if section 502(b)(6) should be applied when determining if the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts under section 707(b) and (2) if the Mohrs' failure to apply section 502(b)(6) when scheduling the value of Don Wright Realty's claim could be included as a basis for dismissal under section 707(a). Id. at 28.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the bankruptcy court authorized further briefing on the scope of the inquiry the court should make on debt characterization issues. Id. at 73. The court explained "[i]t is also very difficult to determine how far one goes in a preliminary determination, whether it be for the purposes of Chapter 13 eligibility or whether it's for the purposes of determining whether someone is subject to the 707(b) . . . tests." Id. at 76.

On March 15, 2010, the bankruptcy court issued its written opinion. Doc. No. 94 ("Opinion"). First, the court held that whether the Mohrs have primarily consumer or business debts should be determined by the amounts the Mohrs listed in their bankruptcy schedules as of the date the petition was filed, rather than the evidence presented at the hearing. Id. at 8. The court, relying on section 109(e) case law, reasoned that Congress intended section 707(b) motions to require "keeping the focus on the Debtors' scheduled debts to minimize litigation over threshold inquiries and maximize efficiency." Id. at 6-7. Therefore, the court would only conduct an independent review of the truth of those facts when "prompted by any indicia that his or her calculation is not in good faith or is not an accurate measure of the debt." Id. at 8.[4] "At that point, the court will entertain evidence presented by a trustee or other parties in interest contradicting the debtor's schedules to the extent the evidence sheds light on a debt as it exists on the petition filing date." Id.

Second, the bankruptcy court held that section 502(b)(6) could not be applied when scheduling debts and calculating whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts. Id. at 10. The court reasoned that because the "cap is only activated by optional and unpredictable post-petition bankruptcy events . . . it is not appropriately applied" when estimating the value of a debt prior to a formal objection to a proof of claim. Id. at 10. The court believed there was "no clear place to schedule the section 502(b)(6) cap" and capping the debt would not be appropriate because creditors "would be left without an accurate calculation of the full accelerated lease debt as it was owed under the terms of the agreement on the petition filing date." Id.

Accordingly, the bankruptcy court found that the Mohrs have primarily business debts, based upon the amounts they had scheduled in their petition. Id. at 12. The court denied the United States Trustee's motion for relief under section 707(b) because the abuse provisions did not apply to the Mohrs' conduct, and section 707(a) because the Mohrs had "properly listed the full lease debt in their schedules," and without this evidence the Mohrs' ability to repay was insufficient to support dismissal. Id. at 12, 15.

[4] Although the court does not define the phrase "accurate measure," the opinion indicates that this refers to the mathematical computation of the liability, without consideration of extrinsic factors such as statutory limitations or mitigation. See Op. at 8, fn. 8.

On March 15, 2010, the bankruptcy court entered a separate order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. Doc. No. 93. On March 25, 2010, the United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal. Doc. No. 97.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

In this case, the United States Trustee sought dismissal of the Mohrs' chapter 7 bankruptcy case for abuse because the Mohrs have the ability to repay their creditors up to $2,400 per month without financial hardship. The bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion, holding that the Mohrs were not subject to dismissal for abuse because it found that the Mohrs did not have primarily consumer debts. This finding was dependent upon the valuation of a single, contingent debt. The court reasoned that the Mohrs were allowed to value a contingent debt at its hypothetical maximum value, rather than the amount that the Mohrs were actually liable to pay. The court was wrong because the value of a debt should be determined by the facts and applicable legal principles, not the whim of a debtor.

According to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), a bankruptcy court may dismiss or convert a case filed by an individual debtor if two conditions are met: (1) if the individual debtor has primarily consumer debts and (2) if the granting of relief would be an abuse of chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. This case turns on the dollar value of a single debt — a claim for damages based on lost future rent arising from the Mohrs' breach of a real estate lease — for the purpose of determining whether an individual has primarily consumer debts. The Mohrs valued the debt at $340,000. The United States Trustee valued the debt at no greater than $86,840.96. If the Mohrs are correct, they have primarily business debts and are not subject to dismissal under section 707(b). If the United States Trustee is correct, the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts.

The bankruptcy court accepted the Mohrs' valuation for two separate and independent reasons. First, the court concluded that section 707(b) required the court to accept the Mohrs' value as presumptively true because they put the amount in their bankruptcy schedules, and would not let the United States Trustee provide evidence to establish that the Mohrs only owed a fraction of the amount listed in their bankruptcy schedules.

Second, the court ruled that the statutory limitation on damages for lost future rent under 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6) did not affect the valuation of the debt, rejecting the United States Trustee's argument that the value of a debt based on a claim for damages could only include the amount of damages that could actually be asserted against a debtor.

This Court should reverse the decision of the bankruptcy court on both grounds. First, whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts is an element of the United States Trustee's cause of action under section 707(b), and moving parties are allowed to introduce evidence in order to establish elements of proof. There was no basis under section 707(b), the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, or the Federal Rules of Evidence to presume that the Mohrs' number was factually correct and prevent the United States Trustee from offering evidence to the contrary.

Second, the amount of debt that the Mohrs owe on the claim for damages, as the term debt is used in section 707(b), is at most $86,840.96 because section 502(b)(6) limits the Mohrs' liability on the claim to no more than $86,840.96. The Sixth Circuit has ruled that the value of a debt is determined by the extent of a debtor's liability on a claim, and the value of a contingent liability, such as damages for lost future rent, is determined by the net present value of the liability: the value of the contingency discounted by the probability that it will become real. The presence of section 502(b)(6) establishes that the likelihood of the Mohrs being liable for no more than $86,840.96 is almost certain and that the likelihood of the Mohrs being liable for the full amount of $340,000 is virtually nil.

But even if this Court agrees with only one of the United States Trustee's arguments, this Court should still reverse the decision of the bankruptcy court. If this Court agrees with the first argument, but not the second, then the United States Trustee may show that the Mohrs only incurred liability based upon a missed rent payment and therefore the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts. If this Court agrees with the second argument, but not the first, then the United States Trustee may show that the value of the Mohrs' liability was limited by law and therefore the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts.

ARGUMENT

I. The bankruptcy court erred when it refused to consider evidence showing that the Mohrs' business debts are considerably less than the amount the Mohrs scheduled in their bankruptcy petition

The bankruptcy court made two errors when it refused to consider the United States Trustee's evidence that the Mohrs' valuation of Don Wright Realty's claim was incorrect. First, the court erroneously interpreted section 707(b) as requiring presumptive reliance upon a debtor's bankruptcy schedules as of the date the petition was filed — a presumption that trumps actual evidence. Second, the court erroneously refused to consider evidence on a contested question of fact. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it found that the Mohrs have primarily business debts because it had no basis in law or fact for the decision.

A. The plain language of section 707(b) requires proof that a debtor have primarily consumer debts, not proof that a debtor failed to schedule the value of debts in good faith

A claim for relief under section 707(b) presents no basis to deviate from normal judicial rules and procedures. The purpose of section 707(b) is to discern the truth of a debtor's circumstances, as Congress enacted section 707(b) in order to "deny Chapter 7 relief to the dishonest or non-needy debtor." Behlke v. U.S. Trustee (In re Behlke), 358 F.3d 429, 434 (6th Cir. 2004) (citing In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123, 126 (6th Cir. 1989)). The requirement that debtors have primarily consumer debts is the lynchpin of a statutory scheme that brings individual debtors into a system of increased oversight in order to ascertain whether the consumer debtor is "honest, in the sense that his relationship with his creditors has been marked by essentially honorable and undeceptive dealings, and whether he is "needy" in the sense that his financial predicament warrants the discharge of his debts in exchange for liquidation of his assets." Id. The correct classification of a debtor as a consumer debtor under the statute is essential to its proper function because it changes the legal implications of a case.

1. A bankruptcy court is required to apply ordinary trial rules and procedures in a contested matter

The prosecution of a motion to dismiss under section 707(b) is a garden variety contested matter. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(f). Under Rule 9014, the ordinary principles of trial apply in a contested matter, even though much of the pre-trial procedure is truncated in the interests of time and simplicity. Khachikyan v. Hahn (In re Khachikyan), 335 B.R. 121, 125-126 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2005).

The rule governing this section 707(b) contested matter, Rule 9014(c), provides that Rules 7026 and 7028-36 “shall apply.” Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(c). Those 7000 series rules make discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure applicable to contested matters. And under Rule 9017, the Federal Rules of Evidence apply to bankruptcy proceedings. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9017. Finally, Rule 9014(d) mandates “[t]estimony” “shall be taken” to resolve “all disputed material factual issues” in contested matters. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(d).

Therefore, the Bankruptcy Rules required the bankruptcy court to take evidence on the material issue of whether the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts and to do so in the same manner as a normal adversarial proceeding. Khachikyan, 335 B.R. at 125-26. The court’s failure to do so violated the Bankruptcy Rules and was an error of law.

The ordinary rules and procedures of adjudication govern the threshold calculations in a contested matter the same as in any other disputed issue. A statutory threshold requirement, i.e., a circumstance element in a statutory cause of action, is a substantive element of the movant’s claim for relief. Arbaugh v. Y&H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 515-16 (2006). In Arbaugh, the Supreme Court considered whether the statutory requirement that an employer must have 15 employees in order to be liable under Title VII for employment discrimination was “a substantive ingredient of a Title VII claim for relief.” Id. at 503. The Supreme Court held that it was, stating “the threshold number of employees for application of Title VII is an element of a plaintiff’s claim for relief.” Id. at 515-16.

There is a well established process for prosecuting a claim for relief. The “ordinary default rule” is that the moving party has the burden to prove their claims. Schaffer ex rel. Schaffer v. Weast, 546 U.S. 49, 56 (2005). The preponderance of the evidence standard is the presumptive standard of proof in a civil action, unless the statute indicates otherwise or "particularly important individual interests or rights are at stake." Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 286 (1991). And the preponderance of the evidence standard is what other bankruptcy courts have applied when determining whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts. See In re Srikantia, 417 B.R. 505, 509 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2009); In re Reavis, No. 06-11721, 2007 WL 2219519, at *5 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. July 30, 2007). This process should have been applied below.

2. The bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 707(b) cannot be reconciled with the text, legislative history, and statutory context

But in this case, the bankruptcy court announced a novel procedure that substantially obstructs the proper function of section 707(b) by undermining the ability of the United States Trustee to identify individuals as consumer debtors. Whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts is a question of fact that requires a bankruptcy court to determine if the aggregate amount of consumer debt exceeds 50% of the debtor's total debt. In re Hlavin, 394 B.R. 441, 447 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2008). But the court believed that the question of whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts should be presumptively determined by the information stated in the debtors' bankruptcy schedules. Neither the text of the statute, the legislative history, nor the statutory context support the court's interpretation of section 707(b).

That a factual requirement may be threshold to the substantive analysis for abuse under sections 707(b)(2) and (3) does not make its truthful determination any less important. The plain language of section 707(b) only requires that an individual debtor have primarily consumer debts in order to be subject to dismissal for abuse. See § 707(b)(1). There is nothing in the text of the statute to suggest that the debtor's good or bad faith should control the determination of whether the debts in question are primarily consumer or business in nature.

"If the language of the statute is clear, then the inquiry is complete, and the court should look no further." Brilliance Audio, Inc. v. Haights Cross Commc'ns, Inc., 474 F.3d 365, 371 (6th Cir. 2007). Nevertheless, the bankruptcy court looked beyond the statute's plain meaning and premised its decision upon policy considerations that "favor preventing threshold inquiries from dominating or unduly delaying the case." Op. at 5-6 (citing §704(b)(2)).

The legislative history of section 707(b), which the bankruptcy court failed to consult, does not support the court's conclusion. Congress enacted BAPCPA because it was concerned about consumer debtors that were turning to chapter 7 in order to avoid their financial obligations. H.R. Rep. 109-32 at 10. Congress explicitly stated "the heart of the bill's consumer bankruptcy reforms . . . is intended to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." Id. at 2.

Furthermore, the statutory context demonstrates that the primary purpose of BAPCPA and the revised section 707(b) is to identify and prevent abusive conduct. Had Congress wished to provide any kind of factual presumption in favor of the debtor or restriction on the factual inquiry premised upon the good faith of the debtor, it could have done so — as it did before the recent removal of the presumption in favor of granting the debtor a discharge. See Schultz v. U.S., 529 F.3d 343, 347 (6th Cir. 2008) (describing the changes to section 707(b)). It makes little sense to infer that the limitations period under section 704(b)(2) suggests reliance upon the debtor when section 707(b) is silent and all other evidence indicates an intent to place debtors under greater scrutiny than ever before. See Burns v. United States, 501 U.S. 129, 136 (1991)

("An inference drawn from congressional silence certainly cannot be credited when it is contrary to all other textual and contextual evidence of congressional intent.").

B. A court may not rely on a debtor's good faith to the exclusion of other evidence as a basis for deciding a contested question of fact Under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9014, a bankruptcy court must "make findings of fact and conclusions of law before entering an order that has the status of a judgment." Khachikyan, 335 B.R. at 126-27. When there is a disputed issue of material fact, Rule 9014(d) requires the court to take evidence and hear testimony in a trial. Id. During these proceedings, the bankruptcy court must apply the Federal Rules of Evidence. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9017.

Factual determinations must be based on evidence. Indmar Prod. Co. v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 444 F.3d 771, 778 (6th Cir. 2006). It is erroneous for a court to make a factual determination "without properly taking into account substantial evidence to the contrary." Id.

The bankruptcy court did not properly take into account the United States Trustee's substantial evidence to the contrary when it found that the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts. If the court wished to exclude the United States Trustee's evidence because of concern for "unduly delaying the case," it could have conducted an analysis under Federal Rule of Evidence 403. See U.S. v. Smithers, 212 F.3d 306, 316 (6th Cir. 2000). It did not.

Instead, the bankruptcy court explained that it did not need to consider any evidence besides a debtor's bankruptcy schedules, except in unusual circumstances, because "a debtor does not have unbridled authority to manipulate the scheduling of debt or how it is used in threshold calculations." Op. at 8. The court reasoned that it could rely upon the Mohrs' good faith efforts when scheduling their debts because "a debtor must accurately calculate" the debt in question or face objections. Id. The court would need to engage in an independent review of the facts only if "prompted by any indicia that his or her calculation is not in good faith or is not an accurate measure of the debt." Id.

The bankruptcy court's theory does not justify the court's decision to bury its head in the sand and ignore contrary evidence in the record in order to avoid making a routine factual determination on a disputed issue, as required under Rule 9014(d). Khachikyan, 335 B.R. at 126-27. Even if a debtor does not have "unbridled authority to manipulate the scheduling of debt," it does not mean that the information listed is factually or legally correct. A debtor's good faith does not mean that the debtor (1) accurately listed the amount of debt and (2) applied the correct legal rules to classify the debt. A debtor's good faith does not render contradictory evidence superfluous. A debtor's good faith does not mean that facts should go untested.

Because the bankruptcy court failed to comply with Rule 9014(d) and refused to take into account the substantial evidence in the record to the contrary, its finding that the Mohrs have primarily business debts is erroneous and should be reversed. Indmar, 444 F.3d at 778.

C. Section 109(e) is irrelevant to the determination of whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts under section 707(b)

The bankruptcy court substantially relied upon the Sixth Circuit case law governing how to calculate a debtor's eligibility for chapter 13 bankruptcy relief under section 109(e) when deciding how to calculate whether the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts under section 707(b). Op. at 5. The court believed that the interests motivating the speedy resolution of eligibility issues under section 109(e) — avoiding litigation on the value of a debt in order to determine the authority of a court to litigate the value of the same debt later in the proceedings — equally applied to litigating whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts in order to litigate the question of abuse. Id. at 5-6.

But how questions of eligibility are resolved under section 109(e) should not inform a motion to dismiss under section 707(b) because the statutes contain different textual limitations and serve different purposes. And even if a comparison was appropriate, the bankruptcy court fundamentally misunderstood the section 109(e) jurisprudence when it rendered its decision.

1. Substantial differences in statutory text and purpose render any comparison between section 109(e) and section 707(b) inapposite

Although the debt eligibility requirements of section 109(e) and whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts are both threshold issues, they are not threshold in the same context. The interests that may motivate an expedited determination of the debtor's ability to proceed in chapter 13 under section 109(e) in order to reach the merits of a case do not apply to a motion to dismiss under section 707(b), where the determination of whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts is the first part of a two-step analysis on the merits of the United States Trustee's claim for relief.

Section 109(e) establishes when an individual may initiate bankruptcy proceedings under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. Comprehensive Accounting Corp. v. Pearson (In re Pearson), 773 F.2d 751, 754 (6th Cir. 1985); see Glance v. Carroll (In re Glance), 487 F.3d 317, 321 (6th Cir. 2007) (describing section 109(e) as "a gateway into the bankruptcy process.").

According to Pearson, because section 109(e) is structured as an independent limitation on the proceedings and contains an explicit limitation restricting the debt eligibility analysis to debts owed on the date of the filing of the petition, the court believed that there was an interest in avoiding protracted litigation about whether a debtor is proceeding in the correct chapter of the Bankruptcy Code in order to reach the merits of the case. 773 F.2d at 756-57.

But whatever interest there may be in avoiding protracted litigation on the "threshold" issue of whether a debtor may proceed under chapter 13 does not apply to the "threshold" issue of whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts for the purposes of section 707(b). The text of section 707(b) is not structured as an independent limitation on who may initiate chapter 7 proceedings and there is no language that indicates an intent to rely on a debtor's schedules. See § 707(b)(1). Instead, section 707(b) provides a cause of action that allows the United States Trustee to obtain relief from a consumer debtor who would abuse the privilege of a chapter 7 discharge.

Identifying whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts is an element on the merits of the United States Trustee's claim for relief — one that is absolutely integral to the purpose of the statute, as it is part of a larger statutory scheme that requires the United States Trustee to identify consumer debtors and then determine whether a consumer debtor is engaging in an abuse of the bankruptcy system. See supra Part I.A. In contrast, an inquiry into whether a debtor may proceed under chapter 13 in order to obtain bankruptcy relief does not go to the merits of whether the debtor ultimately deserves bankruptcy relief any more than an inquiry into whether jurisdiction exists goes to the merits of a plaintiff's cause of action. See Ernst v. Rising, 427 F.3d 351, 367 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Dismissals of actions that do not reach the merits of a claim, such as dismissals for lack of jurisdiction, ordinarily are without prejudice.") (citation omitted). The text, statutory structure, and policy interests motivating section 109(e) and section 707(b) are too different for section 109(e) to inform a section 707(b) analysis.

2. Even if section 109(e) were considered persuasive, the bankruptcy court fundamentally misunderstood the Sixth Circuit's section 109(e) jurisprudence

To the extent that section 109(e) may inform the analysis, the bankruptcy court erred when it interpreted Pearson to instruct bankruptcy courts to rely on the good faith of the debtor to the extreme of denying the obvious reality of a situation. Op. at 6-7. Pearson holds that the section 109(e) analysis follows the amount in controversy jurisprudence. Pearson, 773 F.2d at 757. The Sixth Circuit's amount in controversy jurisprudence is simple: The plaintiff may establish that the amount in controversy requirement is met by a good faith statement in the complaint, but an opposing party may rebut this presumption and require the plaintiff to prove the amount is recoverable to a legal certainty. Charvat v. GVN Mich., Inc., 561 F.3d 623, 628 (6th Cir. 2009).

In this case, the bankruptcy court confused how, for the purpose of establishing jurisdiction, a good faith statement relieves the plaintiff from the initial burden of persuasion with relieving the plaintiff from the entire burden of proof. Pearson, nor any of its known progeny, suggest this extreme deviation from the procedure explained in Charvat.

II. The bankruptcy court erred when it held that the value of a debt included amounts that are unrecoverable under 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6) when determining whether the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)

Even if the bankruptcy court was forced to rely on the Mohrs' bankruptcy schedules when determining whether the Mohrs have primarily consumer or business debts, the court still should have found that the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts because Don Wright Realty's claim for damages was limited by law under section 502(b)(6). The bankruptcy court, however, interpreted the statutory limitation on damages under section 502(b)(6) to only operate upon an objection to a claim and therefore held that the value of the debt is the amount scheduled by the Mohrs, rather than the amount that Don Wright Realty could actually claim. Op. at 10. But the value of a debt is independent of whether or not there has been an objection to a claim.

The value of a debt is based on the value of the debtor's liability on the claim. And the value of a claim for loss of future rent is determined by the net present value of the claim. Calculating the net present value of a claim requires estimating the amount of money a creditor has the legal right to receive from the estate. Thus, it was erroneous for the court to refuse to consider the statutory limitation on damages found in section 502(b)(6) when calculating the value of Don Wright Realty's claim.

A. The value of a debt based on a claim for lost future rent is determined by the net present value of the debtor's liability on the claim

"The term debt means liability on a claim." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12). A claim is defined as a right to payment. 11 U.S.C. § 101(5). The meanings of debt and claim are understood to be coextensive. Glance, 487 F.3d at 320. For a right to payment to exist, there must be a valid legal basis for the creditor's demand — an "enforceable obligation." Id. at 321. "[A] creditor's demand without any legal basis is not even a claim under the Code." Id. The inclusion or omission of claims without a valid legal basis in a debtor's schedules does not change the nature or amount of debt that a debtor has. Id.

When the value of a claim is indeterminate, a bankruptcy court may estimate the value of a contingent or unliquidated claim for the purpose of allowance — in other words, recognizing the validity of the debt — if fixing the value of the claim would unduly delay the administration of the case. 11 U.S.C. § 502(c)(1). And because allowance confirms that the debt is valid and payable by the estate, it follows that estimating the value of a claim for the purpose of allowance is the same as determining if there is a valid legal basis for the claim.

Damages for future lease payments are evaluated as contingent liabilities. Liabilities are contingent if future events need to occur in order for a creditor to be able to demand payment. Glance, 487 F.3d at 322. Because the amount of lost rental income depends upon the ability of the landlord to mitigate and re-rent the property, the value of a creditor's claim for damages is contingent. Manhattan Prop. v. Irving Trust Co., 291 U.S. 320, 331 (1934) ("Since many events may occur which will absolve the tenant from further obligation for rent, the claim is said to be too contingent."); see Saddleback Valley Cmty. Church v. El Toro Materials Co. (In re El Toro Materials Co.), 504 F.3d 978, 979-82 (9th Cir. 2007) (citing Manhattan Prop. v. Irving Trust Co.).

According to the Sixth Circuit, a contingent liability should be valued at its net present value. "To determine a contingent liability, one must discount it by the probability that the contingency will occur and the liability will become real." In re Oakes, No. 92-3935, 1993 WL 339725, at *3 (6th Cir. Sept. 3, 1993). The debtor in Oakes had scheduled the full value of a debt guarantee and attempted to rely on the scheduled value of a debt as proof of pre-petition insolvency for the purposes of an avoidance action under 11 U.S.C. § 547. The Sixth Circuit stated that including "contingent liabilities at full value . . . would cause an absurd result" because "[c]ontingent liabilities are uncertain and frequently never become actual liabilities." Id. (citing Matter of Xonics Photochemical, Inc., 841 F.2d 198, 200 (7th Cir. 1988)). Therefore, a contingent liability needs to be reduced to its present value to reflect the likelihood that the debtor will actually be obligated to pay the contingent obligation. Id.

The method of determining the value of a contingent claim used in Oakes was applied to resolve the question of whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts under section 707(b) in the case In re Cox. No. 08-61964, 2009 WL 1586674 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Feb. 13, 2009). The facts of Cox are substantially similar to this case — the debtors had personally guaranteed a business loan and, based on the face value of the guarantee, asserted that they had primarily business debts. The United States Trustee argued that if the contingent liability was valued at its estimated present value instead of the hypothetical full value, then the debtors would have primarily consumer debts and be subject to dismissal under section 707(b). Id. at *1. The bankruptcy court agreed, holding that "the proper analysis for analyzing contingent liabilities is the same as that for analyzing contingent claims: they are to be estimated, using the same rules." Id. at *4. Therefore, citing Xonics, the bankruptcy court ordered further fact finding would be necessary to estimate the value of the debt. Id.

In the Mohrs' case, the bankruptcy court's task was made even easier because, as shown below, the net present value of the Mohrs' liability on Don Wright Realty's claim is fixed by statute.

B. The net present value of a debtor's liability for damages based on lost future rent must be calculated in consideration of section 502(b)(6)'s limitation on damages

1. A statutory cap on damages affects the net present value of a claim for damages

In the Bankruptcy Act of 1934, Congress enacted the predecessor of section 502(b)(6) to place a cap on damages allowed under the Bankruptcy Code. Vause v. Capital Poly Bag, Inc. (In re Vause), 886 F.2d 794, 801-03 (6th Cir. 1989) (describing the history of section 502(b)(6)). "Congress intended to compensate landlords for their actual damages while placing a limit on large future, speculative damages which would displace other creditors' claims." Vause, 886 F.2d at 801-02. Section 502(b)(6) "limits a lessor's claim for damages to actual past damages for unpaid rent due under the lease . . . plus a maximum of one year or 15% (not to exceed three years) for the loss of future rent." Id. at 798-99.

When read in pari materia, the Bankruptcy Code requires that the court consider section 502(b)(6) when determining whether a debtor has primarily consumer debts under section 707(b). The amount of the debt is determined by the debtor's liability on a claim. § 101(12). Therefore, the bankruptcy court needs to estimate the value of the claim. Cox, 2009 WL 1586674, at *4. Under the Bankruptcy Code, a claim exists to the extent that the creditor has a valid legal basis to receive payment from the estate. Glance, 487 F.3d at 321. Damages for future lease payments are considered contingent liabilities. Manhattan Prop., 291 U.S. at 331. A contingent liability needs to be reduced to its present value to reflect the likelihood that the debtor will actually be obligated to pay the contingent obligation. Oakes, 1993 WL 339725, at *3. Because the net present value of the contingent liability for lost rent is fixed by statute, a court must consider the effect of the limitation on damages under section 502(b)(6): A lessor's right to payment for lost rent is capped at a maximum of one year or 15% (not to exceed three years) for the loss of future rent. Vause, 886 F.2d at 798-99.

2. Relevant authority contradicts the bankruptcy court's reading of section 502(b)(6)

In contrast to this well-established framework, the bankruptcy court's decision cannot be reconciled with how the Sixth Circuit interprets section 502(b)(6) or how other courts have applied claim limitations in analogous situations.

First, the bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 502(b)(6) — that it should only be considered after a formal objection has been made — is inconsistent with the Sixth Circuit's rules of statutory interpretation. In Vause, the Sixth Circuit rejected a bankruptcy court's interpretation of the word "due" in section 502(b)(6) because it was extremely literal and based on a study of the word in isolation from the rest of statute. The Sixth Circuit, quoting Judge Learned Hand, admonished the bankruptcy court "to remember that statutes always have some purpose or object to accomplish, whose sympathetic and imaginative discovery is the surest guide to their meaning." Vause, 886 F.2d at 800 (citation omitted).

The bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 502(b)(6) fails to consider the adjudicatory structure and evidentiary function of section 502 as a whole. Under section 502(a), claims are presumptively allowed unless a party in interest objects. 11 U.S.C. § 502(a); see Fed.

R. Bankr. P. 3001(f) (stating that a proof of claim properly filed under section 502 "shall constitute prima facie evidence of the validity and amount of the claim."). This allows the parties in interest and the court to spend scarce resources on adjudicating claims that are worth more than the cost of their prosecution, rather than waste resources on uncontested claims and pricing creditors with less valuable claims entirely out of the ability to participate in the proceedings and receive a distribution from the estate.

Under section 502(b), however, the court is not permitted to allow certain categories of claims. 11 U.S.C. § 502(b); see Travelers Cas. and Sur. Co. of Am. v. Pac. Gas and Elec. Co., 549 U.S. 443, 449 (2007) ("But even where a party in interest objects, the court "shall allow" the claim "except to the extent that" the claim implicates any of the nine exceptions enumerated in section 502(b)."). If a claim is not allowable, there is no valid legal basis for the right to receive payment from the estate and thus there is no debt for the purposes of the Bankruptcy Code. Glance, 487 F.3d at 321. Although improper claims may slip through the allowance process without objection, it does not mean that a legally enforceable obligation actually existed in the first place. Therefore, amounts in excess of the statutory cap cannot be considered debts under the Bankruptcy Code.

Second, the bankruptcy court's decision is inconsistent with the case law. Even if section 502(b)(6) "is only activated by optional and unpredictable post-petition bankruptcy events," it would make no sense to require the court to ignore the obvious implications of the section 502(b)(6) limitations within the context of an exercise that is intended to establish a present value for claims that may or may not be fully activated by future events. See Oakes, 1993 WL 339725, at *3. The vast majority of courts have had no problem applying future claim limitations when making preliminary determinations in order "to prevent raising form over substance." In re Scovis, 249 F.3d 975, 983 (9th Cir. 2001) (applying 11 U.S.C. § 506(a) even though it "speaks in the terms of an allowed claim."); see In re McClaskie, 92 B.R. 285, 287 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1988) (concluding that the court should not "close its eyes" and rely upon an "overly technical reading of section 506(a) and its impact upon a case to ignore the obvious.").

The bankruptcy court, despite recognizing this case law, failed to establish a coherent basis for treating section 502(b)(6) differently. The court could only provide one case in support of its position, In re Blair. No. 07-50262, 2007 Bankr. LEXIS 4242 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio Dec. 13, 2007). But Blair is a practically unreasoned judgment: it contains no independent analysis and the cases it cites for the proposition that section 502(b)(6) should not determine eligibility for bankruptcy relief only conclude that disputed debts are presumably included in the section 109(e) calculation. Id. at *8. And aside from Blair, the court relies upon two novel statements without providing authority or other explanation: (1) there is "no clear place to schedule the section 502(b)(6) cap" and (2) capping the debt would not be appropriate because other parties in interest would be left without an accurate calculation of the hypothetical full value of the claim. These unsupported propositions provide no basis in statutory or case law to support the bankruptcy court's decision.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order entered below and to remand for further proceedings.

INTRODUCTION

This appeal presents two distinct questions. They are whether (1) 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) required the court to accept as true the Mohrs' valuation of their debts as alleged in their bankruptcy petition and (2) the Mohrs' did not need to apply 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6)'s limitation on damages when they listed the debt in their bankruptcy petition.

In the opening brief, the United States Trustee demonstrated the bankruptcy court's holdings on these issues were erroneous. First, the United States Trustee established that the question of whether an individual has primarily consumer debts is a question fact, and the bankruptcy court erred by declining to make a factual determination based on the evidence. Second, the United States Trustee established that because a claim for damages based on lost future rent is a contingent obligation, it should be valued at the net present value of the liability rather than the full, face value of the liability, and this means that the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts and are therefore subject to dismissal under section 707(b).

In response, the Mohrs concede bankruptcy courts should make an independent determination of the facts, but argue that this bankruptcy court was entitled to rely solely on the allegations in the pleadings when determining if the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts under section 707(b). On the second issue, they argue that the correct value of a claim for lost future rent is the face value of the lease because section 502(b)(6)'s limitation on damages is only operative upon an objection to the claim.

Both of the Mohrs' arguments are unconvincing because they are premised on the belief that the question of whether an individual has primarily consumer debts must be decided based upon the information known to the court at the time the bankruptcy petition is filed, instead of based on the true facts as developed through the trial process. The Mohrs' approach is based on their novel reading of 11 U.S.C. § 109(e), a section that is irrelevant to whether the United States Trustee should be granted relief from abuse under section 707(b). Section 109(e) establishes the maximum amount of debt that an individual may have in order to commence chapter 13 bankruptcy proceedings and has nothing to do with determining abuse under section 707(b).

Given this, the United States Trustee seeks two alternative forms of relief on appeal. First, there is no dispute that if the section 502(b)(6) limitations are applied, then the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts. Therefore, if this Court agrees that section 502(b)(6) should have been applied, this Court may reverse the decision of the bankruptcy court as clearly erroneous, hold that the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts, and remand the proceedings for the bankruptcy court to determine whether the Mohrs' case should be dismissed or converted to one under chapter 13.

Alternatively, if this Court does not believe that the section 502(b)(6) limitations should have been applied, this Court should still reverse the decision of the bankruptcy court and remand the proceedings in order to allow the United States Trustee to develop evidence for the purpose of determining the actual value of the Mohrs' liability on Don Wright Realty's claim for damages.

ARGUMENT

I. The Mohrs concede that the bankruptcy court should make an independent determination of the facts based on the evidence

The parties appear to agree on the bankruptcy court's ability to make a factual determination on whether the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts under section 707(b). As the Mohrs state, "Pearson does not preclude the [bankruptcy court] from examining this issue . . . a court can make an independent determination as to . . . whether certain debts are consumer in nature or non-consumer, as well as a determination of the amounts of such claims." Appellee's Brief at 11. Therefore, for the reasons stated on pages 15-21 of the United States Trustee's opening brief, the court below erred by creating a presumption rather than adjudicating the factual dispute. Consequently, the only remaining question on appeal is whether the bankruptcy court erroneously determined that the Mohrs had primarily business debts.

II. The evidence shows that the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts

The Mohrs do not dispute that they would have primarily consumer debts and thus be subject to dismissal or conversion if Don Wright Realty's claim for damages is valued at the actual amount that the Mohrs are liable to pay. See Appellant's Brief at 9. Still, the Mohrs argue that, based on Pearson, the bankruptcy court was entitled to solely consider the amounts as initially set forth in the bankruptcy petition and the proofs of claim when determining if a debtor is subject to dismissal under section 707(b). See Appellee's Brief at 13. The Mohrs' brief, however, primarily repeats the reasoning of the bankruptcy court without responding to the arguments raised by the United States Trustee. See Appellant's Brief at 13-15. Among other things, they do not rebut that Rule 9014(d) requires the bankruptcy court to take evidence and hear testimony, and that Pearson is irrelevant because it concerns a debtor's eligibility to initiate chapter 13 proceedings under section 109(e). Id. at 21.

As the United States Trustee explained, the value of a debt based on a claim for damages that are contingent upon the occurrence of future events, such as a landlord's ability to re-rent the property after the breach of a lease, are determined by the net present value of that liability. See Appellant's Brief at 25. Here, there are two potential methods of determining the value of the Mohrs' debt to Don Wright Realty. The simplest, and most direct method, is for this Court to hold that section 502(b)(6) applies to the question of whether the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts. Id. at 28.

This Court may do so because a debt only exists to the extent that there is a valid legal basis for the creditor's claim. Glance v. Carroll (In re Glance), 487 F.3d 317, 321 (6th Cir. 2007). The value of Don Wright Realty's claim is subject to section 502(b)(6)'s limitation on damages. Vause v. Capital Poly Bag, Inc. (In re Vause), 886 F.2d 794, 798-799 (6th Cir. 1989). Therefore, the Mohrs only owe a debt to Don Wright Realty to the extent allowed by section 502(b)(6), which is an amount no greater than $86,840.96. See Appellant's Brief at 9.

In contrast, the Mohrs state that the amount of their debt to Don Wright Realty should be valued at $587,336.17. See Appellee's Brief at 13. But the Mohrs do not explain why their amount should control, and their attempts to distinguish the case law regarding the valuation of debts fails to demonstrate any meaningful difference between those cases and the current case. Id. at 8.

Thus, if this Court were to decide that section 502(b)(6) applies, the Mohrs would then have primarily consumer debts and be subject to dismissal or conversion under section 707(b).

See Appellant's Brief at 9-10. On remand, the bankruptcy court would simply be required decide whether the Mohrs case should be dismissed or converted to one under chapter 13.

In the alternative, this Court could hold that the amount of damages that the Mohrs owe Don Wright Realty for breach of the HobbyTown USA lease must be specifically determined. Id. at 16. This scenario presents substantial questions of fact that were not developed in the bankruptcy court, which would require further discovery and many factual determinations that must be made in accord with the Federal Rules of Evidence. Id. at 20; see Indmar Prod. Co. v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 444 F.3d 771, 778 (6th Cir. 2006). The bankruptcy court would be required to hear evidence regarding whether the Mohrs had repudiated the lease prior to filing for bankruptcy or if the lease was appropriately terminated post-petition, Don Wright Realty's attempt to mitigate the loss, and the correct amount of damages based on Don Wright Realty's actual and expected future losses. This inquiry would be further complicated because of how the Mohrs have conducted their bankruptcy proceedings — the lease is technically held by Staddon-Mohr LLC, and the Mohrs have not initiated a separate bankruptcy case for their limited liability company or explained the financial circumstances of Staddon-Mohr LLC and the Mohrs' legal relationship to their closely held company.

Ultimately, it appears as if these elongated proceedings would also lead to finding that the Mohrs have primarily consumer debts because Don Wright Realty does not contest the applicability of section 502(b)(6) to its claim and does not defend the amount of damages it originally claimed, which the Mohrs rely upon in order to assert that they have primarily business debts. See Appellee's Brief at 11. Don Wright Realty acknowledges that its claim is at most valued at $86,840.96. See Appellant's Brief at 9. This would still leave the Mohrs' business debts at $216,123.30, which is less than their $440,934.78 in consumer debts. Id.

Accordingly, through either the lack of factual development or the failure to apply section 502(b)(6), the bankruptcy court erred when it found that the Mohrs did not have primarily consumer debts and their case was not subject to dismissal or conversion to chapter 13 proceedings.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order entered below and to remand for further proceedings.

IN THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

AMR MOHSEN,
Debtor-Appellant

v.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE
Appellee.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES BANKRUPTCY APPELLATE PANEL OF THE NINTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR APPELLEE

Statement of Subject Matter and Appellate Jurisdiction

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(a), the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to hear and decide the United States Trustee's motion under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) to convert Amr Mohsen's ("Mr. Mohsen") bankruptcy case from chapter 11 to chapter 7. The bankruptcy court entered an order converting the case on December 22, 2005. Mr. Mohsen timely filed a motion for reconsideration on January 3, 2006. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b). Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to hear and decide Mr. Mohsen's motion for reconsideration. An order denying the motion for reconsideration was entered on March 22, 2006. Mr. Mohsen filed a timely notice of appeal on March 31, 2006. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b). On March 28, 2007, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit filed its Memorandum and Judgment, affirming the bankruptcy court's orders granting the United States Trustee's motion to convert, and denying Mr. Mohsen's motion for reconsideration. On April 11, 2007, Mr. Mohsen filed a petition for rehearing and rehearing en banc. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8015. On May 1, 2007 the appellate panel denied all relief requested in the motion for rehearing. The orders converting the bankruptcy case to chapter 7 and denying the motion for reconsideration are final orders for purposes of appeal.

On May 24, 2007, Mr. Mohsen filed a timely Notice of Appeal of the appellate panel's May 1, 2007 Order Denying Motion for Rehearing and En Banc Review. See Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B). This Court has jurisdiction to hear this matter under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(1).

Statement of the Issue

> Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion by converting this case from chapter 11 to chapter 7, given the court's findings under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) that conversion, rather than dismissal, was "in the best interest of creditors and the estate?"

Standard of Review

A bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error and its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. Price v. United States Trustee (In re Price), 353 F.3d 1135, 1138 (9th Cir. 2004). The standard of appellate review of the conversion or dismissal of a chapter 11 bankruptcy case is abuse of discretion. See, e.g., Marsch v. Marsch (In re Marsch), 36 F.3d 825, 828 (9th Cir. 1994); Pioneer Liquidating Corp. V. United States Trustee (In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities), 264 F.3d 803, 806 (9th Cir. 2001). A court abuses its discretion if it does not apply the correct law or if it rests its decision on a clearly erroneous finding of material fact. In re At Home Corp., 392 F.3d 1064, 1967 (9th Cir.) (citation omitted), cert. denied, 126 S.Ct 338 (2005); In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities, 264 F.3d at 806.

Statement of the Case

Mr. Amr Mohsen filed chapter 11 bankruptcy on February 5, 2005. At the time of the bankruptcy filing, Mr. Mohsen was incarcerated. Mr. Mohsen intended to utilize the bankruptcy automatic stay (11 U.S.C. section 362(a)) to prevent foreclosure and allow him time to market and sell his real property. Shortly after filing, secured creditor Silicon Valley Bank sought relief from stay to conduct a foreclosure sale. The bankruptcy court granted the relief from stay motion, but delayed its effectiveness until October 1, 2005, giving Mr. Mohsen approximately four months to try to sell the property. As of October 3, 2005, Mr. Mohsen had not been successful in selling his property and the property was sold at a foreclosure sale. Thereafter, the United States Trustee[1] brought a motion under 11 U.S.C. section 1112(b) to convert the case to chapter 7, arguing conversion was in the best interest of the creditors of the estate because a trustee could liquidate the remaining assets for the benefit of creditors. Mr. Mohsen brought a competing motion to dismiss the case asserting that the interests of creditors would be better served by dismissal. The bankruptcy court granted the United States Trustee's motion to convert and denied Mr. Mohsen's motion to dismiss. Mr. Mohsen filed a motion for

[1] In his Opening Brief, Mr. Mohsen occasionally refers to the United States Trustee as the "Chapter 11 Trustee". See, e.g., Appellant's Opening Brief, pp. 6:13, 10:10, 14:12, 21:14. Chapter 11 trustees are private sector individuals appointed by United States Trustees under 11 U.S.C. § 1104 to administer chapter 11 cases. There was never a Chapter 11 trustee appointed in this case.

The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice, charged by statute with the duty to oversee and supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a); see generally Morganstern v. Revco D.S., Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990) (explaining that United States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law). The United States Trustees may raise, appear, and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under title 11. 11 U.S.C. § 307; see also In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) (upholding broad appellate standing of United States Trustee).

reconsideration, which was denied. Mr. Mohsen appealed to the bankruptcy appellate panel, which affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision. Mr. Mohsen filed a petition for rehearing and rehearing en banc, which was denied by the appellate panel. Mr. Mohsen then appealed to this Court.

Statement of Facts[2]

Mr. Mohsen filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on February 8, 2005. ER Tab 28, p. 242, docket #1 and ER Tab 27, p. 240. He filed to prevent the foreclosure sale of his residence in Los Gatos, California (the "Residence"), which was scheduled for the following day. Appellant's Opening Brief at 6:4-9. Mr. Mohsen's stated intention was to utilize the automatic stay to market and sell the Residence himself, using the proceeds to pay creditors. Id.

At the time of filing, Mr. Mohsen's estate included the Residence which was valued at $10 million, $100,000 in antique rugs, a fire insurance claim valued at $116,000, and real property in Cairo, Egypt valued at $250,000.[3] ER Tab 25, pp.

[2] Mr. Mohsen did not provide separate excerpts of record for this appeal. He redesignated his original Appendix filed with the appellate panel and the UST's Excerpts of Record filed with the appellate panel as the designation of record in this appeal. The United States Trustee has prepared Supplemental Excerpts of Record for this appeal. Citations to these supplemental excerpts will be to ER Tab __, p. __.

[3] The United States Trustee was informed by Mr. Mohsen's bankruptcy counsel that the actual value of the assets was double the amount listed in Mr. Mohsen's schedules. See, ER Tab 22 at 202-08. His liabilities included secured debt against the Residence[4] and more than $741,000 in unsecured nonpriority debt.[5] Id. at pp. 210-17. In addition, while no priority tax debt was scheduled, the IRS filed a claim asserting that Mr. Mohsen owed over $2 million in priority debt, and $379,000 in unsecured nonpriority debt as a result of unfiled returns. ER Tab 23, p. 190-91. At the time of the filing, Mr. Mohsen was incarcerated, and had no income due to his inability to work. ER Tab 26, p. 237.

Shortly after filing, in March 2005, secured creditor Silicon Valley Bank filed a motion for relief from stay, seeking to continue foreclosure proceedings on the Residence. ER Tab 28, p. 247, docket #36. On June 29, 2005, the bankruptcy court orally granted the relief from stay motion, ruling that the stay would terminate on October 1, 2005, and that any trustee's sale 182:6-9. The amount scheduled reflects Mr. Mohsen's one-half community property interest and does not reflect his non-filing spouse's one-half community property interest. Id.

[4] The secured debt against the residence included a first deed of trust in favor of Silicon Valley Bank estimated at $3 million, a second deed of trust in favor of Washington Mutual estimated at $3 million, a Santa Clara County tax lien estimated at $30,964, a disputed deed of trust in favor of Manchester Williams estimated at $42,000, a mechanic's lien in favor of Ravcast estimated at an unknown amount and a contingent and disputed deed of trust in favor of the United States of America estimated at $1 million. ER Tab 25, p. 210.

[5] While Mr. Mohsen scheduled $741,000 in unsecured debt, unsecured claims in the amount of $21,709,244 were filed. ER Tab 24, pp. 192-99.

could take place on or after October 3, 2005. Id. at p. 260, docket #92. As of October 3, 2005, Mr. Mohsen had not been successful in finding a buyer for the Residence and Silicon Valley Bank foreclosed. Appellant's Opening Brief at 6:9-12.

On or about November 21, 2005, the United States Trustee filed a Motion to Convert the bankruptcy case to chapter 7 (the "Conversion Motion"). ER Tab 28 at p. 265, docket # 136 and 137. The bases for the Conversion Motion were: (1) Mr. Mohsen's primary asset had been lost to foreclosure; (2) as a result of the foreclosure Mr. Mohsen was unwilling or unable to reorganize; (3) creditors had received no payments during the ten months that the bankruptcy case had been pending; and (4) it was in the best interest of those creditors and the estate to convert the case so that an independent chapter 7 trustee could perform an orderly liquidation of the remaining assets and use the funds to pay creditors. ER Tab 21 at pp. 177-80. As of the filing of the Conversion Motion, Mr. Mohsen's estate consisted of the real property located in Cairo, Egypt valued at $250,000, the antique rugs valued at $100,000, a fire insurance claim valued at $116,000, pending adversary proceedings against State Farm and Polytex Corporation, and funds in the Debtor-in-possession bank account totaling approximately $80,000. Id. at 178-79. None of the assets were claimed exempt in their entirety. Id.; ER Tab 25 at p. 209. The United States of America, as a creditor, filed papers supporting conversion. ER Tab 18, pp. 153-55.

Mr. Mohsen filed an opposition to the Conversion Motion, arguing that certain unsecured creditors supported dismissal rather than conversion, and that his tax issues were best dealt with outside bankruptcy. ER Tab 15, pp. 129-34. In support of his position, Mr. Mohsen identified eleven creditors who supported dismissal. ER Tab 16 at p. 136. Of the eleven unsecured creditors who supported dismissal, nine were "insiders." Specifically, three were family members and six were close friends that loaned Mr. Mohsen money to fund a retainer to pay bankruptcy counsel in the bankruptcy case of Aptix Corporation, a company for which Mr. Mohsen was the founder and former chief executive officer. ER Tab 25 at pp. 214-15; ER Tab 11, pp. 102:21 - 103:2. An objection to the Conversion Motion was also filed by Mr. Mohsen's brother, Aly Mohsen. ER Tab 19, p. 156.

In response to the Conversion Motion, on or about November 23, 2005, Mr. Mohsen filed a motion to dismiss (the "Dismissal Motion"), conceding that chapter 11 rehabilitation was unlikely and that he would not be able to fund a plan of reorganization, but arguing that dismissal was in the best interest of unsecured creditors. ER Tab 28 at p. 266, docket # 138 and 139; ER Tab 20 at pp. 158:17-24 and 161:18-21. The essence of Mr. Mohsen's argument was that: (1) unsecured creditors would fare better if the case were dismissed, as they would not have to wait in line behind higher priority creditors to get paid; and (2) the only method for dealing with the IRS claim against Mr. Mohsen was outside of bankruptcy. See ER Tab 20, pp. 160-63. Further, in response to the United States Trustee's argument in her Conversion Motion that he did not desire to use his non-exempt assets to pay creditors, Mr. Mohsen responded,

> This is false. [Mr. Mohsen] has consistently stated that he intends to pay his creditors in full. [Mr. Mohsen] has a strong moral obligation to repay his creditors. By far, [Mr. Mohsen's] largest [unsecured] creditor is his brother, Ali [sic] Mohsen, and [Mr. Mohsen] plans to repay his brother with all of his ability. Also, another substantial body of creditors is family friends and community members who loaned [Mr. Mohsen] money after his incarceration. [Mr. Mohsen] intends to pay these creditors in full as well.

Id. at 163:1-7. At no point did Mr. Mohsen state an intent to repay any specific creditors other than his brother and other "insiders."

On December 14, 2005, the United States Trustee filed an objection to the Dismissal Motion, citing Mr. Mohsen's inconsistent positions with regard to his tax liability and disputing the idea that the tax issue could only be dealt with outside of bankruptcy. ER Tab 17, pp. 149-52. In addition, the United States Trustee raised concerns that as Mr. Mohsen was currently incarcerated and unemployed, the only assets available to creditors were those assets that were currently held by the bankruptcy estate, and allowing the case to dismiss may result in

Mr. Mohsen's assets being sent to Egypt to support his family. Id. at p. 151.

At the December 21, 2005, hearing on the Conversion Motion and the Dismissal Motion, the bankruptcy court expressed concern that there was no way that Mr. Mohsen could pay his creditors in full. ER Tab 11 at 94:7-11. The bankruptcy court also expressed its concern that Mr. Mohsen and the unsecured creditors who supported dismissal wanted the case dismissed so that they could reverse the priorities of the Bankruptcy Code and pay insiders and unsecured creditors in front of priority creditors such as the IRS. Id. at 99:24 - 102:19. Finally, the bankruptcy court expressed its concern that if the case were dismissed, Mr. Mohsen's assets would be sent to Egypt or would otherwise be kept for the benefit of insider creditors, at the expense of Mr. Mohsen's other creditors. Id. at 94:12 - 100:8. The bankruptcy court based this second concern on information it had learned about Mr. Mohsen while presiding over the Aptix Corporation bankruptcy. Id. at 94:12 - 98:25.[6] Immediately after the bankruptcy court made these statements, Mr. Mohsen's counsel informed the court that as of the hearing date, Mr. Mohsen's wife had returned to Egypt because Mr. Mohsen had "been unable to support and fund the living expenses for his family so [his] wife is now in Egypt because she can't afford to live [in the United States.]" Id. at 99:17-19.

[6] Aptix Corporation was a company in which Mr. Mohsen was a substantial shareholder, and he was the company's president, chief executive officer and chairman of the board. ER Tab 13, p. 123; ER Tab 26, p. 224. Aptix Corporation filed a voluntary chapter 11 petition on April 23, 2004 (N.D. Cal. Case No. 04-52590) and was converted to a chapter 7 case on November 10, 2005.

Ultimately, the bankruptcy court found that the proper standard for determining whether to convert or dismiss Mr. Mohsen's case was the best interest of all creditors, not just unsecured creditors. Id. at 100:9-14 and 102:14-19. Thereafter, the bankruptcy court found that the interests of all creditors and the estate were best served by conversion, stating,

> What I think is important under all of the circumstances. . . I think it's important that there be an orderly winddown of whatever is left.
> . . . .
> If the trustee decides to not administer these assets, for whatever reason, they're going to be abandoned back to Mohsen. And then he can pick and choose whatever he wants to do with them. And if he wants to pay those folks back, there's nothing in the bankruptcy law that precludes him from paying back whoever he wants to pay back.
>
> But I think that it's important that somebody independent like a Chapter 7 trustee take a look at it, that there be basically a fair shake for all the creditors as to who gets paid or who doesn't get paid out of whatever the trustee develops.

Id. at 107:1-17. An order converting the case to chapter 7 was entered on December 22, 2005. ER Tab 14, p. 128. Carol Wu was appointed chapter 7 trustee on the same day. ER Tab 28 at p. 268, docket #150.

On January 3, 2006, Mr. Mohsen filed a motion to reconsider the order converting the case to chapter 7 (the "Reconsideration Motion"). ER Tabs 12 and 13, pp. 111-27. The United States Trustee filed an opposition to the reconsideration motion. ER Tab 10, pp. 86-90. The chapter 7 trustee also filed an opposition. ER Tab 9, p. 82.

At the hearing on the Reconsideration Motion, Mr. Mohsen's counsel freely acknowledged that Mr. Mohsen wanted the case dismissed to prevent a chapter 7 trustee from pursuing non-exempt assets that existed in Egypt:

> The Court: I almost have to say under all of these circumstances why does [Mr. Mohsen] care whether it's a conversion or dismissal? He is [sic] yes, "Well, I may want to pay some of these people." You're free to pay them all, some of them, whatever you want to do.
>
> Mr. Levin: The issue, Your Honor, is that there is – there is a possibly nonexempt[7] asset in the form of real property in Egypt. And if – and that is what – that is what is motivating [Mr. Mohsen].
>
> The Court: So if that's nonexempt, and if the Trustee can recover it, why isn't that a good thing? Why should that asset go – why should that asset go to nobody, or go to certain select creditors that [Mr. Mohsen] favors, as opposed just to liquidating that asset and the money goes to whoever gets it . . . . under the Code?
>
> Mr. Levin: To answer the question with another question, . . . when [a] voluntary case is not successful. . . why does that voluntary case

[7] Individual debtors are entitled to set aside certain property as exempt from the claims of creditors in bankruptcy cases. See 11 U.S.C. § 522; Cal. Code Civ. P. § 703.140. A non-exempt asset is an asset that is available to pay creditor claims.

> necessarily result in the surrender of nonexempt assets to creditors who had not done anything to enforce their rights with regard to a nonexempt asset? [It] affects a penalty on a debtor who wants to try to reorganize under chapter 11.
>
> The Court: No. It also . . . penalizes the creditor, who may not be able to go to Egypt to try and collect their obligation or may not be a close friend of [Mr. Mohsen] such that they're not going to participate in any dividend, but they might otherwise get some sort of a dividend if you liquidate in a chapter 7, and whatever there is is paid out pro rata to all of these creditors.

ER Tab 8 at 60:11 - 61:18.

Ultimately, the bankruptcy court denied the motion stating,

> I haven't seen anything in [the Reconsideration Motion] that really impresses me as being new and different to the extent that it would change the way I viewed the situation originally.
>
>
> This is one of those cases that almost cries out for a trustee to go through and look at everything to make sure that the system is not taken advantage of in one way or another.
>
> The integrity of the process, in my view, in the circumstances of this case requires there to be a trustee.

Id. at 53:14 - 54:6. An order denying the Reconsideration Motion was entered on March 22, 2006. ER Tab 7, p. 50.

On March 31, 2006, Mr. Mohsen filed a notice of appeal. ER Tab 6, p. 48. Following briefing and oral argument, on March 28, 2007, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit issued a memorandum and judgment affirming the bankruptcy court's orders. ER Tab 5, pp. 36-45; ER Tab 1, p. 3. The appellate panel found that the United States Trustee had met her burden of establishing “cause” under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), and ruled that the bankruptcy court’s reasons for conversion were sound. ER Tab 5 at 42:1-3. As stated by the appellate panel, these reasons included (a) that there would be an estate for a chapter 7 trustee to administer, (b) that conversion would allow for continuing jurisdiction of estate property by the court, and would provide for a trustee to facilitate liquidation of the estate, and (c) Mr. Mohsen’s incarceration would impair his ability to protect assets or generate revenue. Id. at 42:4 - 43:11.

The appellate panel also considered the Reconsideration Motion, despite the fact that Mr. Mohsen had not briefed the issue. The panel concluded that it was not an abuse of discretion for the bankruptcy court to have relied partially upon a November 5, 2003, order entered by the United States District Court for the Northern District of California in the Aptix v. Quickturn Design Systems case[8] in deciding to convert rather than dismiss, because it was a public record and the bankruptcy court could properly take judicial notice of it. Id. at 44:3-7. The panel further ruled that Mr. Mohsen’s argument that the bankruptcy court misapplied the “best interest of creditors”

[8] The district court’s November 5, 2003 order found, among other things, that the grant by Aptix Corporation of a security interest to Mohsen was a fraudulent transfer. ER Tab 13, p. 127:6-9.

standard by discounting the views of unsecured creditors who were friends and family who supported dismissal, was “more than a little tendentious,” since Mr. Mohsen had sought to ignore the fact that the Internal Revenue Service ($2.3 million claim), another federal agency ($1 million claim) and Aptix Corporation ($2 million)[9] did not support dismissal. The appellate panel noted that during his year as a debtor in possession, Mr. Mohsen had never objected to these claims. Id. at 44:8-13.

On April 11, 2007, Mr. Mohsen filed a petition for rehearing and rehearing en banc. ER Tab 4, p. 8. On May 1, 2007 the appellate panel denied all relief requested in the motion for rehearing. ER Tab 3, p. 6.

On May 24, 2007, Mr. Mohsen appealed the appellate panel’s May 1, 2007 order denying motion for rehearing and en banc review to this Court. ER Tab 2, p. 5.

Summary of the Argument

As a threshold matter, Mr. Mohsen did not appeal the underlying bankruptcy appellate panel memorandum decision or judgment filed March 28, 2007; his Notice of Appeal simply states that he appeals “from the judgement entered in this action on the 1st day of May, 2007.” ER Tab 2, p. 5. The May 1, 2007

[9] Actually, the claim filed by Aptix Corporation is for $20 million. ER Tab 24, p. 196.

"judgement" is the Order Denying Motion for Rehearing and En Banc Review Court. Thus, as a technical matter, that is the only order subject to appeal, and should be reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re Fowler, 394 F.3d 1208, 1214 (9th Cir. 2005).

Assuming that this Court reaches the merits of this appeal, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by converting Mr. Mohsen's chapter 11 case to chapter 7 under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). Mr. Mohsen concedes that cause existed under section 1112(b) to convert or dismiss his case. Before this Court, Mr. Mohsen argues the court below erred by converting his chapter 11 bankruptcy case to chapter 7 rather than dismissing it. But conversion was well within the court's broad discretion given its legitimate concern that Mr. Mohsen wanted dismissal so he could retain the power to (a) use his limited assets to prefer his friends' and family's unsecured claims outside bankruptcy at the expense of higher priority claimants, and (b) ensure estate assets he held in Egypt would not be liquidated in a chapter 7 case for the benefit of his creditors. Both the bankruptcy court and the appellate panel agree that the conversion order prevented those injustices and that conversion was "in the best interest of creditors and the estate" under section 1112(b). Their rulings merit affirmance.

Mr. Mohsen's main argument before this Court is that the lower courts utilized the wrong standard in determining whether the case should be converted or dismissed. He contends that the proper standard is whether the creditors will suffer "plain legal prejudice" if the case were dismissed, primarily relying on Matter of International Airport Inn Partnership, 517 F.2d 510 (9th Cir. 1975), a case decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, which was repealed in 1978, and a handful of post-1978 bankruptcy decisions from outside the Ninth Circuit. However, this standard has nothing to do with section 1112(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. The standard under 11 U.S.C. section 1112(b) is not whether there is plain legal prejudice to creditors if the case is dismissed; rather, once cause has been established, the standard is whether conversion or dismissal is in the best interest of creditors and the estate. 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). And the non-statutory "plain legal prejudice" test Mr. Mohsen desires would strip bankruptcy courts of the broad discretion they have under section 1112(b) to consider all relevant factors in deciding whether conversion or dismissal of a chapter 11 case is in the creditors' interest.

Mr. Mohsen also argues that the bankruptcy court should have considered the "vote" of a minority of hand-picked creditors, most of them insiders, who "voted" to have the case dismissed rather than converted. However, he ignores the interests of other unsecured and priority creditors who filed claims that were deemed allowed – creditors who represent over 95% of the total amount of unsecured claims in the case. The bankruptcy court properly concluded that conversion of the case was in the best interest of all the creditors, including the over $23 million in unsecured and priority claimants who did not support Mr. Mohsen's dismissal motion.

Mr. Mohsen further claims that the bankruptcy court failed to consider certain equitable issues, including the lack of incentive on the part of the chapter 7 trustee to file tax returns, and the resulting prejudice to unsecured creditors. But these issues were adequately addressed by the lower court, albeit not with the result that Mr. Mohsen wanted.

Finally, Mr. Mohsen contends that the bankruptcy court erred when it denied his Reconsideration Motion. However, that order should be affirmed because Mr. Mohsen does not demonstrate that there were any manifest errors of fact or law, or manifest injustice.

Argument

Mr. Mohsen did not appeal the underlying bankruptcy appellate panel memorandum decision or judgment entered March 28, 2007; his notice of appeal simply states that he appeals "from the judgement entered in this action on the 1st day of May, 2007." ER Tab 2, p. 5. The May 1, 2007 "judgement" is the Order Denying Motion for Rehearing and En Banc Review. ER Tab 3, p. 6. Accordingly, as a technical matter, that is the only order subject to appeal, and should be reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re Fowler, 394 F.3d at 1214. The panel did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for the reasons we discuss in Section III, below. However, should this Court wish to entertain the merits of Mr. Mohsen's attack upon the conversion order, the United States Trustee addresses the merits below.

I. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by converting Mr. Mohsen's chapter 11 bankruptcy case to chapter 7.

Congress granted bankruptcy courts broad discretion to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 bankruptcy case for "cause" pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). See, e.g., In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities), 264 F.3d at 806-07 (9th Cir. 2001)(decision to convert a case to chapter 7 is within bankruptcy court's discretion); Loop Corp. v. United States Trustee, 379 F.3d 511, 515 (8th Cir. 2004)(bankruptcy court has broad discretion in deciding to dismiss or convert chapter 11 case).

Once cause for relief under section 1112(b) is established, a court is given the discretion to choose between converting the case to chapter 7 or dismissing the case outright, "whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate." 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b); See also, Nelson v. Meyer (In re Nelson), 343 B.R. 671, 675 (9th Cir. BAP 2006) (citations omitted). The "best interest of creditors and the estate" standard implies a balancing test that is applied on a case-by-case basis. In re Staff Inv. Co., 146 B.R. 256, 260 (E.D. Cal. 1993). Ultimately, the determination of the "best interest of creditors and the estate" is a matter for sound judicial discretion. Id.

In the proceedings in the bankruptcy court, Mr. Mohsen conceded that cause existed to dismiss or convert this case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). ER Tab 20 at 161:18-19. Mr. Mohsen does not contend that cause is an issue in this appeal. Appellant's Opening Brief at 26:20-25.

Nor does he dispute that section 1112(b) explicitly provides that the decision to convert or dismiss be based upon what is in the "best interest of creditors and the estate." Id. at 25:8-12. Mr. Mohsen further concedes that the bankruptcy court has wide discretion in determining whether to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 case. Id. at 25:8-9. Thus, the sole question before this Court is whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it determined that conversion, and not dismissal, was in the best interest of all creditors and the estate.

A. The bankruptcy court correctly defined the scope of the best interests of creditors and the estate test.

Bankruptcy Code section 1112(b) as in effect at the time Mr. Mohsen's bankruptcy case was filed provided in pertinent part:

> " . . . on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee or bankruptcy administrator, and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this > chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title or may dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate, for cause, . . ."

11 U.S.C. section 1112(b)(emphasis added).[10]

The evaluation of creditors' best interests requires a bankruptcy court to consider the collective interest of all creditors, not just the majority. See In re Superior Siding & Window, Inc., 14 F.3d 240, 243 (4th Cir. 1994) (the fundamental policy of equality among creditors, which is central to the bankruptcy system, is not served by merely "tallying the votes of the unsecured creditors and yielding to the majority interest."); In re Continental Holdings, Inc., 170 B.R. 919, 937 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1994) (a court may not base its decision to convert or dismiss a case on the consensus of the majority of creditors and reasoning that "to hold otherwise would be to promote collusion between the debtor and certain creditors to the detriment of other creditors."); In re Staff Inv. Co., 146 B.R. at 260 ("There is no specific numerosity requirement inherent in section 1112(b) best interest test. The interest of a single creditor with a large enough claim will suffice.").

Here, the bankruptcy court rejected Mr. Mohsen's argument

[10] In April 2005, certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, including 11 U.S.C. section 1112, were amended by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub.L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 37 (2005), signed into law on April 20, 2005. These amendments did not affect cases that were pending at the time, such as Mr. Mohsen's case.

that the law required the bankruptcy court to accede to the wishes of one subset of creditors, stating, "No, the law is that . . . I take [the interests of the creditors supporting dismissal] into consideration and I make a judgment about what I think is best. It's not controlled by a vote of the creditors." ER Tab 8 at 62:1-3.[11]

The bankruptcy court correctly defined the scope of the best interest of creditors test and therefore, the next inquiry is whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by converting this case to a chapter 7 case.

B. The record amply establishes that the bankruptcy court considered the interests of all creditors and of the estate in determining that conversion was appropriate.

The record reveals that the bankruptcy court appropriately considered the interests of not only unsecured creditors, but the interests of all creditors, including priority creditors, the interests of the estate, and the integrity of the bankruptcy system in coming to the conclusion that conversion was in the best interest of creditors and the estate.

First, the bankruptcy court found that conversion was best

[11] Mr. Mohsen asserts that the bankruptcy court should not have considered the claims of the IRS and the California Franchise Tax Board, since they "were overstated and can be eliminated" (Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 53); the Aptix and Amidhouzour claims, since they were barred by the statute of limitations (Id.); and the bond forfeiture claim of the United States of America, since it was worthless (Id.). But Mr. Mohsen never objected to these filed claims, and they are deemed allowed pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 502(a).

because dismissal could result in a select group of insider creditors being paid, while non-insider creditors received nothing. ER Tab 11 at 107:13-18; ER Tab 8 at 60:22 - 61:3 and 61:12-18. Through dismissal, Mr. Mohsen sought to retain the power to prefer his family and friends.[12] ER Tab 11 at 102:21 - 103:10. Under his scheme, dismissal would enable him to use his limited assets, which were far below the sum of his total indebtedness, to funnel cash to insiders while leaving all other creditors with no prospect of recovery. ER Tab 24, p. 199 and Tab 20 at 163:1-7; ER Tab 25 at pp. 201, 202-08, 210-17. Given that, the court below did not abuse its discretion by ruling that dismissal would serve to "[penalize] the creditor, who may not be able to go to Egypt to try and collect their obligation or may not be a close friend of [Mr. Mohsen] such that they're not going to participate in any dividend, but they otherwise might get some sort of a dividend if you liquidate in a chapter 7." ER Tab 8 at 61:13-17.

Second, the bankruptcy court considered the interests of the estate's priority creditors – those who had a right under the Bankruptcy Code to be paid before Mr. Mohsen's friends and family [12] Those insiders did not appeal the conversion order. Mr. Mohsen lacks standing to advance arguments on their behalf. Wedges/Ledges of California, Inc. v. City of Phoenix, 24 F.3d 56, 61 (9th Cir. 1994); U.S. v. 5.96 Acres of Land, 593 F.2d 884, 887 (9th Cir. 1979); In re Umpqua Shopping Center, Inc., 111 B.R. 303, 305-306 (BAP 9th Cir. 1990) (citations omitted).

and other unsecured creditors.[13] Specifically, in response to Mr. Mohsen's assertion that the "creditors" wanted the case dismissed, the bankruptcy court reminded Mr. Mohsen's counsel that priority creditors were also "creditors" under the Bankruptcy Code and that the bankruptcy court was also required to consider the interests of those creditors. ER Tab 11 at 100:9 - 101:1. Further, the bankruptcy court expressed concern that by voting for dismissal, the unsecured creditors were attempting to reverse the priority scheme of the Bankruptcy Code and attempting to recover funds outside of bankruptcy that properly belonged to the IRS or other higher priority creditors inside bankruptcy. Id. at 99:24 - 100:8 and 101:11 - 102:19.

Finally, the bankruptcy court considered the interests of the estate in general and the integrity of the system. ER Tab 8 at 54:2-8 and 60:22 - 61:18. Mr. Mohsen's plan would have enabled him to prefer "insider" unsecured creditors.[14] ER Tab 20 at 163:1-7. Further, when the bankruptcy court inquired as to why Mr. Mohsen cared whether the case was converted or dismissed, he admitted that the reason he wanted to dismiss his case was simply because he did not want the bankruptcy estate property to be sold by a neutral party such as a trustee to repay his creditors. ER Tab 8 at 60:11 - 61:11. Based on this information and the record as a whole, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the integrity of the system was at risk and was best protected by conversion. As the court found:

[14] In a chapter 7 case, the chapter 7 trustee is an impartial and independent appointee whose duties include collecting and reducing to money the property of the bankruptcy estate, and distributing the money to creditors in accordance with the priorities established by the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 704, 726.

> [T]his is one of those cases that almost cries out for a trustee to go through and look at everything to make sure that the system is note taken advantage of in one way or another.

II. Mr. Mohsen's novel arguments in support of reversal lack merit.

Mr. Mohsen does not deny that section 1112(b)'s text explicitly establishes a best interest of the creditors test for determining whether to convert, and does not deny that courts possess broad discretion when making such a calculus. Nonetheless, he raises a number of novel theories as to why the court below could not convert his case in order to maximize creditor recoveries and ensure equitable payment of claims. None of his novel theories have merit.

A. The "plain legal prejudice" doctrine is not applicable.

Mr. Mohsen spends more than 25 pages advocating an irrelevant test for determining whether courts must convert or dismiss chapter 11 cases, arguing the bankruptcy court had to dismiss the case because it could not convert it to chapter 7 under section 1112(b) unless dismissal would result in "plain legal prejudice to creditors." Applying that test, he argues that the bankruptcy court's findings regarding: (a) discrimination among creditors, (b) difficulty of creditors in collecting debts outside of bankruptcy, (c) the incarceration of Mr. Mohsen and his inability to generate revenue to pay his debts, and (d) the integrity of the system, did not rise to "plain legal prejudice." Appellant's Opening Brief at pp. 26-52. He also contends that the bankruptcy court rested its decision on improper speculations that were not evidence. Id. at 48-49.[15]

Mr. Mohsen's "plain legal prejudice" argument is wrong for three independent reasons. First, the test has nothing to do with section 1112(b), draws no support from the text, and cannot replace the statutory test expressly set out in section 1112(b), which allows conversion whenever conversion is in the "best interest of creditors and the estate." This is a wholly different test than "plain legal prejudice." See 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b).

[15] Mr. Mohsen argues that it was error for the bankruptcy court to convert the case based on "speculations" that he would favor his insider creditors, and that his assets may be sent to Egypt. Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 48. But these were reasonable inferences for the court to draw under the circumstances. See Leyda v. Alliedsignal, Inc., 322 F.3d 199, 208 (2nd Cir. 2003) (appellate court must accept trial court's findings of fact based on inferences from other facts unless they are clearly erroneous).

Second, it impermissibly strips bankruptcy courts of their broad discretion under section 1112(b) to determine whether to convert or dismiss. See, H. Rep. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess 405 (1977) (stating "Subsection (b) [of section 1112] gives wide discretion to the court to make an appropriate disposition of the case when a party in interest requests."); Toibb v. Radloff, 501 U.S. 157, 165 (1991) (the Code gives courts substantial discretion to dismiss a case where a debtor files an untenable plan of reorganization); Pioneer Liquidating Corp. v. United States Trustee (In re Consol. Pioneer Mortgage Entities), 248 B.R. 368, 375 (9th Cir. BAP 2000), aff'd sub nom. In re Consolidated Pioneer Mortgage Entities, 264 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2001)(A bankruptcy court is given wide discretion to convert a chapter 11 case to chapter 7 for "cause"); In re Johnston, 149 B.R. 158, 160 (9th Cir. BAP 1992) (the bankruptcy court is given wide discretion to convert a case to Chapter 7 for cause); Hedquist v. U.S. Trustee (In re Hedquist), 450 F.3d 801, 804 (8th Cir. 2006) (The bankruptcy court has broad discretion in deciding whether to dismiss a Chapter 11 bankruptcy case); In re AMC Mortg. Co., Inc., 213 F.3d 917, 920 (6th Cir. 2000) (The bankruptcy court has broad discretion to dismiss a Chapter 11 case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)); In re Woodbrook Associates, 19 F.3d 312, 316 (7th Cir. 1994) (A bankruptcy court has broad discretion under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) to dismiss a Chapter 11 case for cause); Lumber Exch. Bldg. Ltd. P'ship. v. Mut. Life Ins. Co. (In re Lumber Exch. Bldg. Ltd. P'ship), 968 F.2d 647, 648 (8th Cir. 1992) (bankruptcy court has broad discretion in deciding whether to dismiss or convert a chapter 11 case); In re Gonic Realty Trust, 909 F.2d 624, 626-627 (1st Cir. 1990) (a court shall exercise its judgment in reaching a decision that is in the creditors' best interest); Hall v. Vance, 887 F.2d 1041, 1044 (10th Cir. 1989) (The bankruptcy court has broad discretion under § 1112(b)); Koerner v. Colonial Bank (In re Koerner), 800 F.2d 1358, 1367 (5th Cir. 1986) (Legislative history indicates that in acting upon a request for conversion, the bankruptcy court is afforded wide discretion); Albany Partners, Ltd. V. Westbrook (In re Albany Partners, Ltd.), 749 F.2d 670, 674 (11th Cir. 1984) (determination of cause under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) is subject to judicial discretion under the particular circumstances of each case); All Denominational New Church v. United States Trustee (In re All Denominational New Church), 268 B.R. 536, 538 (8th Cir. BAP 2001) (The bankruptcy court has "broad discretion" in deciding whether to dismiss or convert a Chapter 11 case).

Last, Mr. Mohsen's wholly inapplicable test is satisfied here in any event, as it would have produced "plain legal prejudice to creditors" to allow Mr. Mohsen to dismiss so that he could discriminate among creditors, disadvantage some, and shield estate assets that he had in Egypt.

Put simply, Mr. Mohsen's "plain legal prejudice" rule has no application in section 1112(b) cases. The doctrine as announced in International Airport Inn Partnership was a judicial gloss on section 59g of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, which did not contain any statutory test for dismissal.[16] But section 59g of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 was repealed 30 years ago[17] and has never governed motions to convert or dismiss in cases filed under the Bankruptcy Code – section 1112(b) governs these motions. And, it appears that conversion of that case was not an option in International Airport Inn Partnership, or ever an issue, because the bankruptcy court was not measuring whether conversion or dismissal was in the best interest of the creditors. Id., 517 F.2d at 511-12.

The United States Trustee has found only four appellate cases in this circuit that have applied the "plain legal BAP 2004)(". . . a voluntary Chapter 7 debtor is entitled to dismissal of his case so long as such dismissal will cause no 'legal prejudice' to interested parties")(citation omitted).[18]

[18] Mr. Mohsen cites four bankruptcy court decisions that have applied the "plain legal prejudice" test to motions under section 1112(b); three of these cases are 20 years old (all authored by the same bankruptcy judge) and the fourth is 13 years old. See In re Kimble, 96 B.R. 305 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1988) (finding that the plain legal prejudice standard should be applied when determining whether to dismiss a chapter 11 case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)); In re Geller, 74 B.R. 685 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1987); In re Smith, 77 B.R. 496 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1987); In re Mazzocone, 183 B.R. 402 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1995). No circuit court has ever ruled this way. Indeed, the decisions of Bankruptcy Judge David Scholl in the Geller, Smith and Mazzocone cases are directly contrary to the district court decision in In re Mechanical Maintenance, Inc., 128 B.R. 382 (E.D. Pa. 1991). The district court in that case criticized the use of the "plain legal prejudice" standard in connection with section 1112(b) motions as a misreading of the statute, stating that "the court was wrong to hold that a debtor's voluntary motion to dismiss is reflexively to be granted whenever cause exists but is not negated by a showing of 'plain legal prejudice' to creditors." 128 B.R. at 388.

Mr. Mohsen also cites a number of other chapter 7 cases that allegedly applied the "plain legal prejudice" standard to motions to dismiss. See In re Rajneesh Neo-Sannyas Intern. Commune, 59 B.R. 49 (Bankr. D. Ore 1986); In re Astin, 77 B.R. 537 (Bankr. W.D. Va. 1987); In re Kimball, 19 B.R. 300 (Bankr. D. Me. 1982);

B. The bankruptcy court properly considered the best interest of all creditors, not just a minority in amount.

Mr. Mohsen urges dismissal based on his view that the bankruptcy court did not give proper consideration to the creditors' "vote" based on the claims filed in the case. Appellant's Opening Brief, pp. 53-55. Mr. Mohsen essentially argues that since certain creditors did not file claims in the case, or because he disputed certain filed claims (i.e., the Internal Revenue Service (total claim of $2,393,663), the Franchise Tax Board (total claim of $4,510), Aptix Corporation (filed claim of $20,000,000) and bond forfeiture claim ($1,000,000)), then these creditors should not have any "standing" and their claims should not have been considered by the bankruptcy court in making its determination to convert or dismiss this case. Appellant's Opening Brief at 53; see also ER Tab 12, pp. 114-17. But Mr. Mohsen ignores the fact that because

Mont. 1989). See also In re Richmond Unified School Dist., 133 B.R. 221 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 1991 (chapter 9 case). But these cases are inapposite because as noted above, they have nothing to do with motions to convert or dismiss under section 1112(b), which has its own standard of "best interest of creditors and the estate."

no objection was filed to these claims, they are deemed allowed under 11 U.S.C. section 502(a).[19]

In his Reconsideration Motion, Mr. Mohsen noted that fourteen creditors holding claims totaling $743,576 supported dismissal of the case. ER Tab 12, p. 115. This figure includes the claims of at least nine close friends and family members, including Aly Mohsen (his brother) who has a claim of $500,000. Id. However, Mr. Mohsen ignores the over $23 million in claims filed by the Internal Revenue Service, the United States of America (bond forfeiture claim) and Aptix Corporation in his calculation. As noted above, the evaluation of the best interest of creditors requires a bankruptcy court to consider the collective interest of all creditors, not just a numerical majority. In re Superior Siding & Window, Inc., 14 F.3d at 243. Here, Mr. Mohsen actually had only a small minority of the amount of creditors' claims that favored dismissal – the United States Trustee calculates this minority at something less than 5% of total claims filed.

C. The bankruptcy court considered the equitable issues.

Mr. Mohsen alternatively urges reversal based on his view that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by not

[19] A creditor in a chapter 11 case has standing to raise and appear and be heard on any issue in the case. 11 U.S.C. section 1109. Mr. Mohsen's contention that creditors with deemed allowed claims in the case do not have "standing" and should not be considered by the bankruptcy court is thus erroneous.

considering Mohsen's equitable arguments. Appellant's Opening Brief, pp. 55-56. In particular, he notes that the bankruptcy court could have taken a "wait and see" approach with respect to the IRS claim, which he contends was overstated and could have been eliminated if the final tax returns had been filed. Id. at 55. But it is clear that the bankruptcy court considered this issue. For example, Mr. Mohsen's counsel and the bankruptcy court had the following exchange:

> The Court: Mr. Levin, you want – do you want to – do you want to get all the tax returns filed, figure out what all the priority claims are and pay all of those as a condition of dismissal?
>
> Mr. Levin: My only concern with that, Your Honor, is that it is not – it's not – nothing with this debtor is simple.
>
> The Court: I appreciate that.
>
> Mr. Levin: And it's not just a matter of filing some returns. There were some – there were – there was a transaction in 2001 which is probably going to end up in the tax court. And I don't – and my concern is it would just add another layer of expense to keep the Chapter 11 case open while this tax controversy is decided.

ER Tab 11 at 103:12-24.

Mr. Mohsen is also wrong when he asserts that the chapter 7 trustee lacked incentive to file the tax returns. Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 55. His argument seems to be that since the chapter 7 trustee's compensation base does not include payments to estate professionals, there is no incentive for the trustee to hire an accountant to prepare the tax returns, and thus she would simply pay everything to the IRS. Appellant's Opening Brief, pp. 13:8 - 14:2, 55. But this misstates the law. Disbursements on which a trustee's compensation are based include disbursements to administrative claimants, such as attorneys and accountants. In re Vona, 333 B.R. 191 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2005); In re Nardelli, 327 B.R. 488 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2005); In re Orient River Inv., 133 B.R. 729 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1991).[20] Thus, the trustee would receive the same compensation regardless of whether she disburses the funds to creditors or to professionals or to a combination of the two.

More importantly, however, the trustee is a representative of the estate and has a fiduciary duty to maximize assets available to creditors and the estate. See, 11 U.S.C. §§ 321 and 323(a). Failure to fulfill the fiduciary duty may subject the trustee to liability. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2010. Thus, Mr. Mohsen's argument that the fee structure acts as a disincentive for the trustee to reduce the tax claims is without merit.

Similarly, his premise that the unsecured creditors are prejudiced because the IRS may get paid ahead of them is misplaced. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 507, 726 (giving IRS and other tax claims priority in payment over Mr. Mohsen's friends' and family's unsecured claims). The Bankruptcy Code describes and mandates the treatment and priority of claims to be paid in the case. If the IRS has an allowed claim that is entitled to priority over unsecured claims, then so be it. This is not prejudice, this is simply Bankruptcy Code priority. Further, Mr. Mohsen has stated that he wants to pay all of his creditors in full. See, e.g., ER Tab 20 at 163:1-7. But nothing prevents him from voluntarily paying his brother and his friends after he receives his chapter 7 discharge, if he so chooses; he can pay from exempt assets or post-conversion income.[21]

[20] But see In re Testaverde, 317 B.R. 51, 54 (E.D.N.Y. 2004) (finding that a trustee's attorney is not a "party in interest," thus payments made to the attorney cannot be included in computing the trustee's compensation).

Finally, it is clear that the bankruptcy court considered the equities of the case when it expressed concern that Mohsen was attempting to reverse the Bankruptcy Code priorities by getting the case dismissed so that he could pay insiders and other unsecured creditors ahead of the IRS:

> ". . . we just reverse the priorities. We say: Well, if the case stays here then it's the priority claims that get paid and the IRS, if they're owed money, because they have a priority over the unsecured. And if it's dismissed, then it's the unsecureds that get some money and the IRS and the priority creditors don't get anything." ER Tab 11 at 101:11-17.

[21] Mr. Mohsen also argues that after dismissal, the IRS can commence an involuntary bankruptcy against him, or pursue state court remedies to collect its debt. Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 56:11-13. However, this ignores the fact that there is a remedy for the IRS and other creditors to collect their debts that is already in place – the converted chapter 7 case. Further, this appears to be a rehash of the erroneous "plain legal prejudice" arguments made by Mr. Mohsen. See Appellant's Opening Brief, pp. 27-40.

III. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying Mr. Mohsen's motion for reconsideration.

Before the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit, Mr. Mohsen did not brief or address the bankruptcy court's denial of his motion for reconsideration; citing U.S. v. Montoya, 45 F.3d 1286, 1300 (9th Cir. 1995), the appellate panel noted the issue was "technically waived". ER Tab 5, p. 43. Nonetheless, since Mr. Mohsen was without counsel, the panel addressed the Reconsideration Motion and found that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by considering the District Court's November 5, 2003 order, since it was a public record of which the bankruptcy court could properly take judicial notice. Id. at 44:3-7. The panel also ruled that Mr. Mohsen's other primary argument before the bankruptcy court – that the bankruptcy court had misapplied the law by discounting the creditors' support for dismissal – was "more than a little tendentious" since he had excluded from consideration the large claims of the Internal Revenue Service ($2.3 million), another federal government claim (the $1 million bond forfeiture claim) and Aptix Corporation ($20 million, but mistakenly listed at $2 million in the panel's decision). Id. at 44:8-21. The panel concluded by stating: "Mohsen's arguments do not meet the standards for reconsideration in any case: there was no newly-discovered evidence, nor any manifest error of law or fact." Id. at 44:22-24.

A. There were no manifest errors of fact.

Before this Court, Mr. Mohsen alleges the following three manifest errors of fact resulted in conversion rather than dismissal:

1. The bankruptcy court erroneously referred to "the detriment of the creditors" when only one creditor, Quickturn Design Systems, was named in the District Court order referred to by the bankruptcy court;

2. The bankruptcy court misinterpreted Judge Alsup's order relating to Aptix and failed to recognize that the monetary transactions described by Judge Alsup relating to Aptix (". . . [moving] cash in and out of the corporation to and from [Mr. Mohsen]. Aptix and Dr. Mohsen pay only the creditors they choose, while attempting to immunize assets from all other creditors") were not wrongful or fraudulent; and

3. The bankruptcy court inaccurately referred to a finding by Judge Alsup regarding the subordination of Mr. Mohsen's security interest granted by Aptix. Appellant's Opening Brief, pp. 57-58.

However, Mr. Mohsen failed to properly raise these points as manifest errors of fact before the bankruptcy court, and cannot now raise them before this Court; they have been waived. In re America West Airlines, Inc., 217 F.3d 1161, 1165 (9th Cir. 2000)(absent exceptional circumstances, appellate court will generally not consider arguments raised for the first time on appeal, although it has discretion to do so).

Further, even if these issues were raised below, the bankruptcy court did not commit error, much less manifest error. Judge Alsup's order did not form the foundation of the bankruptcy court's ruling; at most, the court below used it to buttress its ruling that dismissal could result in a select group of insiders being paid, while other creditors received nothing.

Alternatively, the court below did not commit reversible error by using the plural form of the word "creditor." Appellant's Opening Brief at 57:16 - 58:4. The District Court had referred to the arrangement where "Aptix and Dr. Mohsen pay only the creditors they choose, while attempting to immunize assets from all other creditors." ER Tab 13, p. 124:19-20 (emphasis added). Nor did the bankruptcy court commit error by considering or referring to the District Court's order; as the appellate panel noted, that order is public record and the bankruptcy court could properly take judicial notice of it. ER Tab 5 at 44:3-7. Mr. Mohsen appears to want to re-litigate the merits of Judge Alsup's order. But that order is final and unappealable and the bankruptcy court had a right to take judicial notice of it.

B. There were no manifest errors of law.

Mr. Mohsen alleges that the bankruptcy court made the following two manifest errors of law, and each is meritless:

1. The bankruptcy court applied the wrong legal standard in deciding to convert rather than dismiss this case; and

2. The bankruptcy court did not properly consider the "vote" of the creditors. Appellant's Opening Brief, pp. 59-60.

Both of these arguments were raised in connection with the original motions to convert or dismiss. However, in his Reconsideration Motion, Mr. Mohsen did not raise the issue of whether the bankruptcy court erred by using the proper legal standard ("best interest of creditors and the estate") instead of the erroneous "plain legal prejudice" standard urged by Mr. Mohsen. Accordingly, that issue has been waived in connection with the motion for reconsideration. In re America West Airlines, Inc., 217 F.3d at 1165. And even if it had been raised, the bankruptcy court did not commit error, because the proper legal standard for determining whether the case should be converted or dismissed pursuant to section 1112(b) is which remedy is in the best interest of the creditors and the estate. See Section II.A. above.

Further, in deciding to convert this case to chapter 7, the bankruptcy court considered the interest of all the creditors, not just those preferred by Mr. Mohsen. In re Superior Siding & Window, Inc., 14 F.3d at 243.

C. There was no manifest injustice.

Finally, Mr. Mohsen alleges the bankruptcy court did not consider the manifest injustice to the "confirmed" unsecured creditors, the estate and himself, which he alleges outweighed any prejudice to the IRS. Appellant's Opening Brief, p. 60. But this argument presumes that the IRS is not a creditor, despite the fact that it has filed a claim in the amount of $2,393,363, to which no objection was ever filed by Mr. Mohsen. ER Tab 23, p. 190. And the bankruptcy court was properly concerned about the claims of creditors other than the insiders, friends and others who "voted" for dismissal:

> "But I think that it's important that somebody independent like a chapter 7 trustee take a look at it, that there be basically a fair shake for all the creditors as to who gets paid or who doesn't get paid out of whatever the trustee develops." ER Tab 11, 107:13-17.

In fact, the bankruptcy court converted the case to prevent any injustice and to ensure equality of distribution according to the priorities set forth in the Bankruptcy Code.

Conclusion

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the bankruptcy appellate panel's order affirming the bankruptcy court's December 22, 2005 order converting Mr. Mohsen’s case to chapter 7, and affirming the bankruptcy court’s March 22, 2006 order denying reconsideration.

ADDENDUM

11 U.S.C. § 1112

Sec. 1112. Conversion or dismissal

(a) The debtor may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title unless –

- (1) the debtor is not a debtor in possession
- (2) the case originally was commenced as an involuntary case under this chapter; or
- (3) the case was converted to a case under this chapter other than on the debtor's request.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee or bankruptcy administrator, and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title or may dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate, for cause, including –

- (1) continuing loss to or diminution of the estate and absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation;
- (2) inability to effectuate a plan
- (3) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;
- (4) failure to propose a plan under section 1121 of this title within any time fixed by the court;
- (5) denial of confirmation of every proposed plan and denial of a request made for additional time for filing another plan or a modification of a plan;
- (6) revocation of an order of confirmation under section 1144 of this title, and denial of confirmation of another plan or a modified plan under section 1129 of this title;
- (7) inability to effectuate substantial consummation of a confirmed plan;
- (8) material default by the debtor with respect to a confirmed plan;
- (9) termination of a plan by reason of the occurrence of a condition specified in the plan; or
- (10) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28.

(c) The court may not convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 or this title if the debtor is a farmer or a corporation that is not a moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, unless the debtor requests such conversion.

(d) The court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 12 or 13 of this title only if –
  (1) the debtor requests such conversion
  (2) the debtor has not been discharged under section 1141(d) of this title; and
  (3) if the debtor requests conversion to chapter 12 of this title, such conversion is equitable.

(e) Except as provided in subsections (c) and (f), the court, on request of the United State trustee, may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title or may dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate if the debtor in a voluntary case fails to file, within fifteen days after the filing of the petition commencing such case or such additional time as the court may allow, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521, including a list containing the names and addresses of the holders of the twenty largest unsecured claims (or of all unsecured claims if there are fewer than twenty unsecured claims), and the approximate dollar amounts of each of such claims.

(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a case may not be converted to a case under another chapter of this title unless the debtor may be a debtor under such chapter.

APPELLEE'S RESPONSE BRIEF

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157 (a) and (b), and 1334(a) to issue its final order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Debtors' chapter 7 bankruptcy case. The bankruptcy court entered this order, which also gave the Debtors the option to file a motion to convert their case to a chapter 13 proceeding, on September 26, 2008. The Debtors filed a notice of appeal, which is timely under 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a) and (c)(2), on October 5, 2008. This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), a statutory provision under which district courts have jurisdiction to hear appeals from final judgments, orders, and decrees of bankruptcy judges.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by dismissing the Debtors' chapter 7 petition under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B), which allows courts to dismiss chapter 7 petitions when the totality of the circumstances of a debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In an appeal taken from a bankruptcy court order, a district court reviews a bankruptcy court's conclusions of law de novo and its findings of fact for clear error. See In re Holland, 151 F.3d 547, 548 (6th Cir. 1998); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013 ("[the bankruptcy court's] [f]indings of fact, whether based on oral or documentary evidence, shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous"). The bankruptcy court's holding that the Debtors' case should be dismissed for abuse based on the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) is subject to review on appeal for abuse of discretion. See In re DSC, Ltd., 486 F.3d 940, 944 (6th Cir. 2007) (stating "[d]ismissal of a bankruptcy case is reviewed for abuse of discretion"). "A bankruptcy court abuses its discretion when 'it relies upon clearly erroneous findings of fact or when it improperly applies the law or uses an erroneous legal standard.'" Riverview Trenton R.R. Co. v. DSC, Ltd. (In re DSC), 486 F.3d 940, 944 (6th Cir. 2007) (quoting In re Eastown Auto Co., 215 B.R. 960, 963 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 1998)). The burden of proof is on the party that seeks to reverse the bankruptcy court's holding. See In re Lewis, 392 B.R. 308, 311 (E.D. Mich. 2008).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On April 30, 2008, the Debtors filed a voluntary bankruptcy petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 701 et seq. On June 4, 2008, the United States Trustee[1] filed a motion to dismiss the Debtors' petition on the grounds that the totality of the Debtors' financial circumstances demonstrates abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) because the Debtors have sufficient means to repay their unsecured debts. Granting the motion to dismiss, the bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee and found abuse under section 707(b)(3). In its order, the bankruptcy court also gave the Debtors the opportunity to file a motion to convert their case to a chapter 13, as section 707(b)(1) allows it to do. The Debtors did not move to convert. Instead, they appealed the dismissal order to this Court.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. Statutory Background

The Bankruptcy Code establishes two primary forms of bankruptcy for individual debtors – chapter 7 and chapter 13. Under chapter 7, "an individual debtor receives an immediate unconditional discharge of personal liability for certain debts in exchange for relinquishing his or her nonexempt assets to a bankruptcy trustee for liquidation and distribution to creditors." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 701-727. Under chapter 13, "a debtor commits to repay some portion of his or her financial obligations" over a specified period "in exchange for retaining

---

[1] United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977). The United States Trustee Program therefore acts in the public interest to promote and preserve the efficiency and integrity of the bankruptcy system. Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 307. See Thompson v. Greenwood, 507 F.3d 416, n.3 (6th Cir. 2007) (stating "[t]he United States Trustee is an interested party by statute").

nonexempt assets and receiving a broader discharge of debt than is available under chapter 7." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 1321-1330.

The difference between chapter 7 and 13 is dramatic. In chapter 7 cases, creditors may look solely to debtors' pre-bankruptcy, non-exempt assets for payment. See 11 U.S.C. § 541 (limiting property of the estate to a debtor's pre-petition debts). Debtors' post-bankruptcy income is not subject to creditor claims. Id. Subject to narrow exceptions, debtors receive a complete discharge of all their pre-petition debts in a chapter 7 proceeding. See 11 U.S.C. § 727(b). In roughly 96% of chapter 7 cases, unsecured creditors receive no payment. See, e.g., Brief of the United States in Lamie v. United States Trustee, 2003 WL 21839367 at *38 (2003).

Chapter 13 is different because debtors must use post-petition income to fund a chapter 13 payment plan. See 11 U.S.C. § 1306(a)(2) (property of the bankruptcy estate also includes post-petition income); 11 U.S.C. § 1325 (concerns chapter 13 repayment plans). In chapter 13, debtors receive a discharge only after they have fully completed their chapter 13 repayment plans. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 1328(a) and (c); see also 11 U.S.C. § 1328(b) (listing exceptions to this rule).

Since 1984, Congress has enacted a series of tests that have allowed courts to dismiss chapter 7 cases, and thereby prevent unjust discharge of pre-petition debts. In 1984, Congress amended chapter 7 to permit dismissal of a chapter 7 bankruptcy petition under section 707(b) if a court found "substantial abuse." Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-353, § 312, 98 Stat. 333, 335. Congress enacted this amendment to respond "to concerns that some debtors who could easily pay their creditors might resort to chapter 7 to avoid their obligations." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12 (internal quotation omitted). Two years later, Congress again amended this provision to authorize the United States Trustee to seek dismissal of chapter 7 petitions for "substantial abuse." Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-554, § 21, 100 Stat. 3088, 3101.

After twenty-years' experience, Congress found that these amendments were insufficient to control abuse of chapter 7. Congress identified, among other problems, the "inherent[] vague[ness]" of the "substantial abuse" standard, which led to disagreement in the courts about whether a debtor's ability to repay[2] a significant portion of his or her debts out of future income constitutes substantial abuse, meriting dismissal. H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12. Another problem was that the Bankruptcy Code established "a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor," which influenced courts' decisions whether to find substantial abuse. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (2000 suppl. 4); See H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12.

Responding to these perceived shortcomings of the Bankruptcy Code, Congress held hearings over five years to identify what reforms it could adopt "to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 2; See Id. at 12. The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (the "2005 Act"), S. 256, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, implemented the reforms Congress identified in four ways.

[2] In evaluating whether substantial abuse existed, courts jointly considered both the debtor's conduct and the debtor's ability to pay his debts outside bankruptcy or through a chapter 13 repayment plan. See, e.g., In re Stewart, 175 F.3d 796 (10th Cir. 1999); In re Lamanna, 153 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998); In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123 (6th Cir. 1989); In re Kelly, 841 F.2d 908, 915 (9th Cir. 1988). Most courts recognized that a debtor's ability to pay a portion of his debt was the predominant factor when determining whether to dismiss a chapter 7 case. Id.

Second, Congress lowered the standard for dismissal under all subsections of new section 707(b) from "substantial abuse" to mere "abuse." See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) (cases are now dismissed for "abuse"); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) (subjecting cases to dismissal for abuse); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) (same). To address the vagueness of the "substantial abuse" standard, the 2005 Act authorizes the bankruptcy court to dismiss a petition filed under chapter 7 or, with the debtor's consent, to convert such a petition to a case under chapter 11 or 13 "if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1).

Third, Congress authorized dismissal when a mathematical formula, known as the "means test," yields monthly disposable income that exceeds a statutory threshold. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). The 2005 Act provides specific criteria which, if satisfied, require a court to presume the existence of abuse, requiring "dismissal [or conversion to chapter 13] based on a chapter 7 debtor's ability to repay." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 15. To determine if abuse exists, a court first compares the debtor's annualized "current monthly income" to the "median family income" of a similarly-sized family in the debtor's state. If the debtor's current monthly income is below the median, then the presumption of abuse does not arise. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(7); see H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 15. Section 707(b)(2), as originally enacted, requires debtors to file a statement of current monthly income and other calculations disclosing whether a presumption of abuse arises. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 521(a)(1)(B)(ii), 707(b)(2)(C); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(b)(1)(B). Where a debtor's monthly disposable income meets or exceeds the statutory threshold amount, this triggers a presumption of abuse, and the debtor's case must be dismissed (or converted, if the debtor consents, to chapter 13), absent an express showing of special circumstances by the debtor. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (2).

Fourth, Congress enacted new section 707(b)(3). This section allows courts to dismiss cases based upon either a debtor's bad faith, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or the totality of a debtor's financial circumstances, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). Even if the presumption of abuse does not arise or is rebutted under section 707(b)(2), a chapter 7 petition may be dismissed for abuse under section 707(b)(3), which requires the bankruptcy court to consider whether "the totality of the circumstances. . .of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." Id. § 707(b)(3)(B).

Sections 707(b)(3)(A) and (B) of the 2005 Act represent a significant departure from old section 707(b) because they clarify that cases can be dismissed either solely for misconduct, under section 707(b)(3)(A), or solely based upon the totality of the circumstances of a debtor's financial situation, under section 707(b)(3)(B). See, e.g., In re Henebury, 361 B.R. 595, 607 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007) (By bifurcating sections 707(b)(3)(A) and (B), "the debtor's total financial situation as a measure of ability to pay, and bad faith are separate and sufficient grounds for dismissal. Either ability to pay or bad conduct in connection with the bankruptcy will warrant dismissal for abuse under §707(b)(3).").

II. Factual and Procedural Background

The Debtors, Phillip and Faye Moutousis, are married and filed their voluntary chapter 7 bankruptcy petition with the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Michigan on April 30, 2008. The Debtors have two adult dependents who are eighteen and twenty-one-years-old, respectively. See Schedule I. Mr. Moutousis is an engineer. Id. He has worked for the same employer for more than thirteen years. Id. Mr. Moutousis' annual gross income, between 2006 and 2007, grew from $89,744.00 annually to $104,411.00 annually. Statement of Fin. Affairs at No. 1. Mr. Moutousis' current monthly gross wages listed in his bankruptcy papers are $9,943.33, so his annualized base gross salary would be approximately $120,000. Schedule I.

Mrs. Moutousis does not work. Id. The Debtors make a voluntary monthly 401(k) contribution and a monthly 401(k) loan repayment. Id. The Debtors lease two cars and maintain a third car for their adult son. Schedules B and G. The Debtors listed credit card, and related unsecured debt, of $162,810.05. Schedule F. The Debtors owe money on seven different revolving charge accounts: a Citibank card, a Citibank/Sears card, a Citibank USA card, an HSBC/Art Van card, a Lowes card, a Sears and Best Buy card, and another Sears card. Id. The Debtors owe more than one thousand dollars on each of these cards, with the highest amount owed on a single card being $34,288.00. Id.

The Debtors claim all their household furnishings, electronics, jewelry, and other personal property is worth only $9,462.00. Schedule B.

The Debtors live in Sterling Heights, Michigan (Macomb County). Schedule A. The Debtors' Schedule A indicates an estimated market value for their home to be $365,900. Schedule A. However, the Debtors state that "the true market value of the property, although difficult to determine, is substantially less . . . ." Appellants' Br. at 6. The Debtors have home mortgages totaling $346,461, which includes a fifteen-year fixed first mortgage and a home equity line of credit. Id. The Debtors' aggregate monthly mortgage payments are $3,213.15. Id.; Schedule J.

According to local mortgage standards for Macomb County, Michigan, which are based on IRS collection financial standards derived from the U.S. Census Bureau and Bureau of Labor Statistics data, the Debtors' mortgage amount is more than three times the applicable IRS housing standard of $1,097 for a family of four residing in Macomb County, Michigan. See U.S. Trustee Program, "Bankruptcy Allowable Living Expenses," http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/bapcpa/20080317/bci_data/housing_charts/irs_housing_charts_MI.htm.

The Debtors' monthly mortgage amount of $3,213.15 is also more than twice the median monthly housing costs for households in Macomb County of approximately $1,401. See U.S. Census Bureau, "Macomb County, Michigan," http://factfinder.census.gov/home/saff/main.html?_lang=en.

On June 4, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the Debtors' petition as an abuse of chapter 7 under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (b)(3)(B). See United States Trustee Mot. To Dismiss at 1-2. The United States Trustee argued that the totality of the Debtors' financial circumstances demonstrates abuse. The United States Trustee alleged that the totality of the Debtors' financial circumstances reveal they had the ability to repay their debts. The United States Trustee argued that the Debtors' income deductions for retirement contributions and a retirement loan repayment associated with their 401(k) should be considered disposable income available for loan repayment. Id. at 3. The United States Trustee also argued that the Debtors' housing costs, which included mortgage payments, property taxes, and insurance and association dues, are excessive and unreasonable, especially considering the Debtors' mortgaged property is undersecured and only subject to a fifteen-year mortgage term, rather than to a conventional thirty-year mortgage term with a corresponding lower monthly payment. The United States argued that, even if the Debtors found replacement housing of $2,194, an amount equivalent to twice the county median under the IRS standards, this would result in monthly expenses of $3,882.27 and net disposable income of $936.81, which would enable the Debtors to pay their unsecured creditors. Id.

At the initial hearing on the motion, conducted on July 21, 2008, the United States Trustee argued that the Debtors have three potential sources of funding from which to pay a meaningful portion of their unsecured debts. First, the Debtors received a tax refund in 2007 of $8,851, an amount that suggests the Debtors were over-withholding, and an appropriate adjustment would make approximately $700 per month available for unsecured debt repayment. July 21, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 2:22-25. Second, the Debtors could pare back their voluntary 401(k) contributions for a while, which would allow them to pay at least $500 per month to help satisfy their debts. Id. at 3:2-11. Finally, the Debtors' housing cost were excessive, and with replacement housing of even twice the IRS standard, the Debtors could reconfigure their budget to make approximately $936.00 per month available for unsecured debt repayment. Id. at 3:12-22.

After the parties submitted briefs, the bankruptcy court held a second hearing on September 15, 2008. At the end of the hearing, the bankruptcy court, issued an oral opinion granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Debtors' chapter 7 case, finding the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation demonstrated abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:11-25; 8:1-4. The bankruptcy court also granted a request by counsel for the Debtors to have the option to convert their case to chapter 13. Id. at 8:11-13. In granting the motion, the bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee that the Debtors made "a choice to incur expenses for housing that is not fair to their creditors" and that their housing expenses were excessive and not reasonably necessary for their support. Id. 7:16-17. The bankruptcy court concluded that if the Debtors were to pay "a reasonable amount for their housing[,]" they would have "substantial money left over each month" to pay their unsecured creditors. Id. at 7:23-25; 8:1-4. On September 26, 2008, the bankruptcy court issued its order granting the United States Trustee's motion. Sept. 26, 2008 Order Granting United States Trustee Mot. To Dismiss. Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a), the Debtors timely filed a notice of appeal to this Court.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court's dismissal of the Debtors' chapter 7 petition, which also gave the Debtors the opportunity to convert their case to chapter 13, should be affirmed on the ground that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding abuse under section 707(b)(3)'s "totality of the circumstances" inquiry. There are three supporting reasons for affirming the bankruptcy court's dismissal. First, the bankruptcy court properly applied the statutory framework of new section 707(b)(3)(B) when it found that the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation demonstrated abuse since the Debtors have the financial ability to repay a portion of their unsecured debts. The Debtors' challenges to the bankruptcy court's dismissal are premised upon an incorrect understanding of the relevant statutory provisions and case law. Second, the bankruptcy court did not need to rely on non-financial Krohn factors. The Debtors incorrectly characterize the Krohn analysis before this Court, and do not bring to this Court's attention that, even under Krohn's analysis of old, superceded, section 707(b), a debtor's ability to repay debt, by itself, was sufficient to warrant dismissal. The Debtors also fail to recognize that Krohn was superceded by statute with the enactment of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005. Finally, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by ruling without first conducting an evidentiary hearing because there were no disputed material factual issues surrounding the Debtors' ability to repay their unsecured debts. Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9014(d) requires an evidentiary hearing only where there are disputed issues of material fact. In this case, the bankruptcy court relied upon financial data the Debtors submitted under penalty of perjury. The Debtors' data established the Debtors' income, assets, and debts, which the bankruptcy court relied upon. In summary, the bankruptcy court correctly concluded, based on an undisputed factual record and two separate motion hearings, that, because the totality of the Debtors' financial situation demonstrates that they have an ability to repay their unsecured debts, granting relief would be an abuse of chapter 7.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion in Dismissing the Debtors' Chapter 7 Petition Based on the "Totality of the Circumstances" under Section 707(b)(3)(B).

A. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Applied the Statutory Framework of New Section 707(b)(3)(b) When it Found That the Totality of the Circumstances of the Debtors' Financial Situation Demonstrated Abuse Because the Debtors Have an Ability To Repay Their Unsecured Debts.

To determine whether providing chapter 7 relief to a debtor constitutes abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B), a bankruptcy court can consider only the "totality of the circumstances" of the debtor's "financial situation." See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). Under this new Bankruptcy Code section, a bankruptcy court should "take into consideration a debtor's actual income and expenses" when determining whether to dismiss a debtor's case for abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B)'s "totality of circumstances" test. Ross-Tousey v. Neary (In re Ross-Tousey), No. 07-2503 at 27, available at http://www.ca7.uscourts.gov/tmp/JC0OP5E3.pdf (7th Cir. Dec. 17, 2008) (citing In re Zaporski, 366 B.R. 758, 768 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2007)) (emphasis added).

In this case, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in applying section 707(b)(3)(B)'s financial circumstances test. Applying it, the court ruled that the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation meant it would be an abuse of the bankruptcy system to grant the Debtors chapter 7 relief because the Debtors have an ability to repay their unsecured debts. Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:23-25. The bankruptcy court correctly applied the law. The bankruptcy court's holding is supported by substantial evidence in the record. Given that, the bankruptcy court's order merits affirmance.

Both the written and oral record provide a basis for the bankruptcy court's conclusion that the Debtors have an ability to repay their unsecured debts under the financial circumstances test. Indeed, but for their choice to maintain a home that requires abnormally high monthly mortgage payments on an undersecured property, and their choice to do this under an accelerated fifteen-year mortgage, the Debtors can make substantial payments to their creditors outside bankruptcy. Even more could be devoted to creditors if the Debtors reduced or stopped their retirement planning for a while, maintained fewer than three cars, and stopped over-withholding on their taxes.

Prior to filing bankruptcy, the Debtors chose to pay an accelerated mortgage and incur exceptionally high housing costs; lease two cars and maintain a third car for their adult son; and, continue to choose to not both work. However, the bankruptcy court ruled that the Debtors could not maintain such a lifestyle while simultaneously discharging $162,810.05 in credit card and related unsecured debt, and thereby pay their creditors nothing. See Schedule F. Such a discharge would be unfair in this case because, as the bankruptcy court ruled, section 707(b)(3)(B)'s financial circumstances test revealed that a more modest lifestyle would yield meaningful payments to creditors. Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:23-25; 8:1-4. The bankruptcy court's ruling was well-within the ambit of its statutory discretion.

The Debtors made clear to the bankruptcy court that their obligations were "primarily consumer debts." July 21, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 3:23-24. The record made clear to the bankruptcy court that the Debtors' annual income, earned solely by Mr. Moutousis, is approximately $120,000 per year and remains reliable. Id. 2:15-19; Schedule I. The record also made clear that the Debtors' carry an accelerated fifteen-year fixed first mortgage, and the Debtors' monthly mortgage payment exceeds applicable IRS mortgage standards by at least three times. Id. 3:12-17; Schedule A; Schedule D; Mot. To Dismiss at 3; Resp. Br. in Supp. of Mot. To Dismiss at 1-2, 4. The record also made clear that the Debtors' mortgage amount significantly exceeds the value of their mortgaged property. July 21, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 3:12-22; Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 6:16-24.

After submission of the written record and two separate hearings on the motion to dismiss, the bankruptcy court ruled, explaining that the Debtors "make a choice to incur expenses for housing that is not fair to their creditors." Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:15-17. The bankruptcy court further explained that the Debtors' housing expenses are "excessive and not reasonably necessary for their support." Id. 7:17-18. The bankruptcy court also observed that, "from a financial perspective, it's questionable whether it's even good judgment to continue to pay on a mortgage when the debt substantially exceeds the value of the property." Id. 7:20-23. The bankruptcy court went on to conclude that, "if these [D]ebtors were to pay a reasonable amount for their housing, they would have substantial money left over each month to pay their unsecured creditors." Id. 7:23-25-8:1.

All of the bankruptcy court's conclusions have a basis in the undisputed factual record submitted to the court in numerous written pleadings and during two separate hearings on the United States Trustee's motion. The bankruptcy court was within its discretion in finding abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B) since the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation demonstrates an ability to repay unsecured debts. See, e.g., In re Behlke, 358 F.3d 429 (6th Cir. 2004) (affirming dismissal when debtors had ability to pay creditors $634 per month); In re Lamanna, 153 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998) (affirming dismissal under superceded section 707(b) when debtor had $771 in monthly disposable income); Hebbring v. United States Trustee, 463 F.3d 902 (9th Cir. 2006) (affirming dismissal under superceded section 707(b) because debtor had $615 available each month to pay creditors).

The Debtors primarily "take issue with the bankruptcy court's reliance on one factor. . .the size of their mortgage payments . . . in determining that they were not treating their creditors fairly." Appellants' Br. at 11. The Debtors suggest that non-ability to repay factors exonerate their choice to maintain a relatively comfortable lifestyle while paying their creditors nothing. The Debtors fail to persuade based on two main reasons.

First, the Debtors misunderstand the bankruptcy court's power to dismiss when, as here, a debtor's financial situation allows for repayment of debts. Second, the Debtors' challenge demonstrates an incorrect understanding of section 707(b)(3)(B) and relevant case law.

When, under the financial circumstances test, a debtor has an ability to pay, but does not do so, a case can be dismissed under section 707(b)(3)(B) for abuse. This is because, as numerous courts have recognized, the terms "totality of [the] circumstances" and "financial situation" in the 2005 Act "clearly encompass a debtor's ability to pay." In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651, 663 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006); In re Sullivan, 370 B.R. 314, 321(Bankr. D. Mont. 2007) ("[T]he plain language of § 707(b)(3). . . is clear and compels a conclusion that a court must consider a debtor's actual debt-paying ability in ruling on a motion to dismiss based on abuse where the presumption does not arise or is rebutted" (quoting In re Sorrell, 359 B.R. 167 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 2007)); In re Pak, 343 B.R. 239 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006) ("It would be counterintuitive to construe 'totality of the circumstances' [in section 707(b)(3)] to exclude a consideration of the debtor's ability to pay.").

Since the Debtors are, by their own admission, paying a "much higher than normal" mortgage at an accelerated rate, see Appellants' Br. at 12, and doing so on a property that is worth tens of thousands of dollars less than the value of their multiple mortgages, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion under its statutory limits, and was within its discretion, in concluding that the Debtors' mortgage was "excessive and not reasonably necessary for their support . . . [and] if these debtors were to pay a reasonable amount for their housing, they would have substantial money left over each month" to pay their debt obligations to unsecured creditors. Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:17-18, 23-25. Indeed, as the Debtors themselves explain to this Court in their statement of the case, "the true market value of the property, although difficult to determine, is substantially less than double the [2008] state equalized value" of the property, Appellants' Br. at 6, and they are continuing to pay a "much higher than normal monthly mortgage payment" amount. Id. at 12.

The Debtors' concede that the totality of the circumstances of a debtor's financial situation should, at a minimum, include his ability to repay his debts. Appellants' Br. at 12-13. However, the Debtors claim that such an ability to repay cannot be based on, by their own words, "one undisputed fact, a much higher than normal monthly mortgage payment . . . ." Id. (emphasis added). The Debtors' contention ignores the reality that the bankruptcy court did look at their entire financial situation under the new financial circumstances test, and concluded that the Debtors, by living more modestly, can repay a meaningful portion of their debts. See Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:23-25. Having made that finding, the bankruptcy court concluded dismissal was proper under section 707(b)(3)(B). Id. Certainly, "[w]hen conducting any 'ability to pay' analysis, a court is often considering multiple [financial] factors," In re Haar, 373 B.R. 493, 500 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007), such as the debtor's assets, liabilities, and expected future income, and whether any of the debtor's obligations are secured by unnecessary luxury goods. Id. The bankruptcy court did not ignore any financial factors in its analysis. Rather, it simply balanced the Debtors' financial factors in a way that the Debtors do not like.

In dismissing the Debtors' chapter 7 case for abuse, the bankruptcy court acknowledged the undisputed facts on the record that, but for the Debtors' "excessive" spending on their housing expenses, they would be able to meet their debt obligations to unsecured creditors. Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:17. Indeed, the record is replete with evidence to support the bankruptcy court's conclusion that the Debtors have the ability to repay their unsecured debt, but for their mortgages. See, e.g., Behlke, 358 F.3d at 438 (holding, under pre-2005 Act section 707(b), that bankruptcy courts have broad discretion to evaluate facts supporting dismissal based on the totality of the circumstances of a debtor's financial situation).

Both on the written and oral record, the bankruptcy court was made aware that it was solely owing to the Debtors' accelerated fifteen-year fixed first mortgage payments that the Debtors' expenses exceeded their monthly gross income. Schedule J; Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 6:16-21. With respect to the Debtors' expected future income, the bankruptcy court was made aware that Mr. Moutousis has worked for the same employer as an engineer for more than thirteen years and earns a six-figure annual salary of approximately $120,000, whereas Mrs. Moutousis does not work. Schedule I. Accordingly, in finding abuse, the bankruptcy court made clear that it was balancing all financial factors, in accordance with the statutory framework of section 707(b)(3)(B), asserting, "from a financial perspective, it's questionable whether it's even in good judgment to continue to pay on a mortgage when the debt substantially exceeds the value of the property." Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:20-23 (emphasis added).

As recognized in the Sixth Circuit, in reviewing for abuse of discretion, a court may reverse "only . . . if left with a definite and firm conviction that the bankruptcy court committed a clear error in judgment." Behlke, 358 F.3d at 438. "'The question is not how the reviewing court would have ruled, but rather whether a reasonable person could agree with the bankruptcy court's decision; if reasonable persons could differ as to the issue, then there is no abuse of discretion.'" Id. (quoting Mayor of Baltimore v. W. Va. (In re Eagle-Picher Indus., Inc.), 285 F.3d 522, 529 (6th Cir. 2002)).

The bankruptcy court, in concluding that the Debtors would have an ability to pay a meaningful portion of their unsecured debts if they were to pay a "reasonable amount" for their housing, did not err in its judgment and did not abuse its discretion. Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. 7:24.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Analyzed only Financial Circumstance Factors Relevant to Section 707(b)(3)(B), Not the Legally Irrelevant, Non-Financial, Krohn Factors of Section 707(b)(3)(A), in Performing the Financial Circumstances Test under the 2005 Act.

The Debtors also seek reversal on the ground that the bankruptcy court did not explicitly address the non-financial factors the Sixth Circuit discussed in In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123 (6th Cir. 1989), which applied the version of section 707(b) that Congress superceded with enactment of the 2005 Act. See In re Krohn, 886 F.2d. 123 (6th Cir. 1989); Appellants' Br. at 8. The Debtors note that Krohn listed a number of bad faith and conduct-type factors that the courts could consider when deciding whether to dismiss for substantial abuse under superceded section 707(b). Appellants' Br. at 9; see Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (discussing "lack of honesty and want of need"). The Debtors suggest that this is significant because they did not engage in bad faith type conduct. Id. at 12-13. This leads the Debtors to conclude the bankruptcy court's dismissal order must be reversed, and the case remanded, because the bankruptcy court did not take any bad faith or conduct-type factors into account. Id. at 14.

However, the Debtors fail to note that neither the superceded statute nor the 2005 Act requires courts to make bad faith findings in ability to repay cases such as the one before this Court. In Krohn, the Sixth Circuit made clear that superceded section 707(b)'s substantial abuse standard allowed courts to ". . . deny Chapter 7 relief to the dishonest or non-needy debtor . . ." Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (citing In re Walton, 866 F.2d at 983) (emphasis added). By using the disjunctive "or," the Krohn panel acknowledged that the superceded standard allowed cases to be dismissed either for bad faith or an ability to repay. Id. (stating that ability to repay "alone may be sufficient to warrant dismissal. A court would not be justified in concluding that a debtor is needy and worthy of a discharge where his disposable income permits liquidation of his consumer debts with relative ease").

Because either bad faith or ability to repay could justify dismissal under the superceded statute, the Krohn panel listed both bad faith and ability to repay factors as ones that could justify dismissal for substantial abuse. Id. However, Krohn allowed for dismissal for either. Id.

The Krohn approach, contrary to what the Debtors suggest, does not mandate both bad faith and ability to repay findings. Were there ever any doubt on this point, the Sixth Circuit resolved it in 2004 by expressly holding bankruptcy courts could dismiss under superceded section 707(b) without making bad faith findings. In re Behlke, 358 F.3d 429, 435 (6th Cir. 2004) (affirming dismissal under superceded section 707(b) because "[t]he bankruptcy court committed no legal error in finding substantial abuse absent a finding of "dishonesty").

Congress codified the approach used in Behlke in 2005 by disentangling bad faith cases from ability to repay cases. See In re Haar, 373 B.R. 493, 499-500 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007) (asserting "nothing in the structure of the 'totality of the circumstances' test of § 707(b)(3) suggest that a debtor's ability to repay an obligation must, as a prerequisite for dismissal, be coupled with other factors"). Congress accomplished this by bifurcating section 707(b) into sections 707(b)(3)(A) and (B). The former authorizes dismissal for bad faith, the latter when debtors have an ability to repay.

Under the plain language of new section 707(b)(3)(B), a court deciding whether to dismiss a chapter 7 case for abuse must consider whether "the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse."[3] 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). The requirement in section 707(b)(3)(B) that courts focus on the "totality of the circumstances" impacting the "financial situation" of a debtor mandates that courts weigh financial factors only, not other factors. This assessment of a debtor's financial situation is compelled by both the plain text and structure of the statutory language, and is consistent with one of the main objectives of Congress in reforming the bankruptcy system: ensuring that debtors who actually have the ability to repay a significant portion of their debt do so. See H.R. Rep. 109-31(I) at 5 and n.18 (2005) (Congress enacted section 707(b) to issue a "clear mandate requiring these debtors to repay their debts."); Perlin v. Hitachi Capital Am. Corp., 497 F.3d 364, 371 (3d Cir. 2007) (noting the 2005 Act amendments to section 707(b) "respond to many of the factors contributing to the increase in consumer bankruptcy filings, such as lack of personal financial accountability, the proliferation of serial filings, and the absence of effective oversight to eliminate abuse in the system") (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 at 2 (2005)); see also Bankruptcy Revision: Hearing on S. 256 Before the S.

[3] The language contained in the parenthetical was a compromise on an earlier provision that would have been more strict in limiting the ability of debtors, such as highly paid recording artists, to reject personal services contracts. 6 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 707.5[3][b] (Alan N. Resnick & Henry J. Sommer eds., 15th ed. rev. 2008). As explained in the conference report on an earlier version of the bill, "among the considerations in applying the 'totality of the circumstances' test for 'abuse' is whether an individual debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor.'" H.R. Rep. No. 105-794, at 123 (1998) (Conf. Rep.) (emphasis added). This legislative focus on "financial need" is in keeping with the application of section 707(b)(3)(B) to require consideration of financial factors exclusively. See, e.g., In re Calhoun, – B.R. –, 2008 WL 4885278 (Bankr. D.S.C. Nov. 10, 2008) (holding that the ability to pay alone without mitigating factors is sufficient to establish abuse).

Comm. on the Judiciary, 108th Cong. (2005) (statement of Sen. John Cornyn) (stating that "Bankruptcy relief should be available to those who are unable to pay – not to those who are simply unwilling to pay").

The government's case against these Debtors under the 2005 Act was premised solely upon a section 707(b)(3)(B) ability to repay theory. See United States Trustee Mot. To Dismiss at 1-2; Resp. Br. in Supp. Mot. To Dismiss at 2-3; Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. at 6:16-25; July 21, 2008 Hr'g Tr. at 2:9-25; 3:1-22. The bankruptcy court, in relying upon uncontested facts drawn from the bankruptcy petition and schedules that these Debtors filed under penalty of perjury, found that the Debtors had such an ability if they lived a more modest lifestyle. Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. at 7:15-25. The court made all the findings it needed to determine they had an ability to repay. Indeed, the amount of debt the Debtors' carry is almost the same as the amount of debt the debtors carried in Behlke, where the Sixth Circuit affirmed dismissal. See Behlke, 358 F.3d at 432, 436 (affirming dismissal under superceded statute because debtors "had an ability to pay their creditors out of future income to the tune of $634.00 per month" when those creditors were owed "$163,944.00 in unsecured nonpriority debt").[4]

Without doubt, the Debtors' petition and schedules appear to raise legitimate questions whether they may have engaged in bad faith conduct. Their schedules list $162,810.05 in credit card and related unsecured debts, but they claim to have only $9,462.00 in property to show for it. Compare Schedule F with Schedule B. This certainly raises significant questions that the United

[4] Notably, the debtors in Behlke earned significantly less than the Debtors in this case do. Whereas in Behlke the debtors' "gross income for 1999 was $93,116.00 and their gross income for 2000 was $93,036.00[,]" Behlke, 358 F.3d at 432, the Debtors in this case earn approximately $120,000 annually. See Schedule I.

States Trustee could have pursued. Resolution of those unanswered questions might have justified the filing of a bad faith section 707(b)(2)(A) count. It might even have justified filing a complaint seeking to deny these debtors a discharge of their debts under 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(2), (3) or (5).

However, the government never relied upon section 707(b)(3)(A) or a bad faith theory before the bankruptcy court. Instead, the United States Trustee relied upon a section 707(b)(3)(B) ability to repay theory. See United States Trustee Mot. To Dismiss at 1-2; Resp. Br. in Supp. Mot. To Dismiss at 2-3; Sept. 15, 2008 Hr'g Tr. at 6:16-25; July 21, 2008 Hr'g Tr. at 2:9-25; 3:1-22.

Since the United States Trustee sought dismissal only under a section 707(b)(3)(B) theory, the bankruptcy court considered factors relevant to this statutory provision by applying the financial circumstances test.[5] The Debtors cannot fault the court for failing to consider factors it did not need to evaluate because their bankruptcy petition and schedules established an ability to repay.

C. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion When It Ruled Without an Evidentiary Hearing Because There Were No Disputed Material Factual Issues Surrounding the Debtors' Ability To Repay Their Unsecured Debts.

Debtors' final challenge to the bankruptcy court's decision is based on the lack of an evidentiary hearing. Appellants' Br. 11-12. The Debtors' suggestion that section 707(b) motions

[5] To the extent that the Debtors rely on In re Seeburger, 392 B.R. 735 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Aug. 8, 2008), see Appellants' Br. at 13-14, a case with no precedential value before this Court and minimal, if any, factual alignment with the Debtors' case, as support for its argument to consider non-financial Krohn factors, the Debtors are unpersuasive. This is because, as discussed supra, the Krohn approach was superceded with the enactment of section 707(b)(3)(B), and does not mandate a consideration of both bad faith and an ability to repay factors. To the extent that the Debtors rely on In re Zaporski, 366 B.R. 758 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2007), see Appellants' Br. at 14, as purported support for considering non-financial Krohn factors in a "totality of the circumstances" analysis, such reliance is inapposite. As the Zaporski court clearly stated, "in reviewing the totality of [the debtor's] circumstances . . . the Court will properly consider, as one of those circumstances, his ability to repay his creditors . . . ." Zaporski, 366 B.R. at 771. Moreover, all the factors that the Zaporski court evaluated in determining that the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation were, in fact, financial factors that impacted the debtor's ability to repay his unsecured debts – namely, the debtor's "substantial income at a stable job; a substantial equity on his balance sheet; a substantial pension plan . . . a substantial 401(k) account . . . ." Id. 773-774.

mandate an evidentiary hearing is legally incorrect. Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 1017(e) provides that dismissal under section 707(b) must be made "on motion." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(e); See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(f) (specifying that 707(b) motions to convert or dismiss should be filed as motions under Rule 9013). Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9013 governs motions. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9013. This rule, along with Bankruptcy Rule 9014, provides that motions create contested matters.

Bankruptcy Rule 9014(d) requires testimony of witnesses in contested matters only to decide disputed matters: "Testimony of witnesses with respect to disputed material factual issues shall be taken in the same manner as testimony in an adversary proceeding." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(d) (emphasis added); see also Hebbring, 463 F.3d at 908 (holding that the bankruptcy court was "not required to hold an evidentiary hearing" on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss for substantial abuse "because there were no disputed issues of material fact") (citing Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(d)); Zick v. Indus. Ins. Svcs., Inc., 931 F.2d 1124, 1129 (6th Cir. 1991) (concluding that the "formalities" of a "full-blown evidentiary hearing" were not required in pre-2005 Act bad faith dismissal action because dismissal was granted within the "court's sound discretion" based on the facts and matters presented to the court).

The case before this Court commenced when the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss. See Mot. To Dismiss. Therefore, Rule 9014(d), and its standard for when an evidentiary hearing is required, applies.

In this case, there were no material disputed facts. Therefore, no evidentiary hearing was required, pursuant to Rule 9014(d). All facts raised in the written and oral record came from the Debtors' sworn petition, schedules and statement, or from statements made by the Debtors' counsel during the two separate hearings on the motion to dismiss held on July 21, 2008 and September 15, 2008, all submitted under penalty of perjury. The Debtors do not dispute the facts on the written or oral record concerning their income, their expenses, their assets, or their liabilities. The Debtors also do not dispute the bankruptcy court's right to rely on these facts.[6]

Given the absence of material facts in dispute, the bankruptcy court acted properly by not wasting limited judicial resources on conducting an unnecessary evidentiary hearing.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the bankruptcy court should be affirmed.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES ON APPEAL

A. Whether Appellants have standing to appeal the provisions of the order which enjoined other entities from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

B. Whether the Bankruptcy Court had subject matter jurisdiction to find that the petition was filed in bad faith and to impose on Debtor, Seth Murdock and affiliates of the Debtor, based on this finding, a 365 day bar from filing voluntary bankruptcy petitions.

C. Whether the Bankruptcy Court had personal jurisdiction over Appellants.

D. Whether the Bankruptcy Court committed clear error when it made a finding of bad faith with respect to this Debtor.

E. Whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion by enjoining Debtor, Seth Murdock and Murdock Transportation System, Inc. from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

F. Whether the procedural due process rights of the Appellants were violated by the Bankruptcy Court when it imposed a 365 day bar on their ability to file a voluntary bankruptcy petition.

III.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's exercise of subject matter jurisdiction is reviewed de novo. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Colello, 139 F.3d 674 (9th Cir. 1998). Similarly, a determination of whether a bankruptcy court had personal jurisdiction over the parties to the appeal is a question of law which is subject to de novo review. Omeluk v. Langsten Slip & Batbyggeri A/S, 52 F.3d 267, 269 (9th Cir. 1995). Furthermore, a claim that one's due process rights have been violated is reviewed de novo. Gonzalez-Julio v. I.N.S., 34 F.3d 820, 823 (9th Cir. 1994). Finally, all issues of law, such as the court's statutory authority to enjoin the filing of a voluntary petition or the standing of Appellants to appeal an order, are reviewed de novo. AT & T Universal Card Services v. Black (In re Black), 222 B.R. 896, 899 (9th Cir. BAP 1998). Therefore, these issues are reviewed directly by this Court.

Orders dismissing a bankruptcy case for bad faith are reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Leavitt v. Soto (In re Leavitt), 209 B.R. 935, 938 (9th Cir. BAP 1997); Marsch v. Marsch (In re Marsch), 36 F.3d 825, 827 (9th Cir. 1994). Similarly, the grant of an injunction is discretionary and is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Parsons v. Plotkin (In re Pacific Land Sales, Inc.), 187 B.R. 302, 308 (9th Cir. BAP 1995). A finding of bad faith, however, is reviewed for clear error. In re Marsch, 36 F.3d at 827; In re Leavitt, 209 B.R. at 938. Under this standard, if the trial court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, a reviewing court may not reverse even if convinced that it would have weighed the evidence differently as trier of fact. Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 574, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 1511-12, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985); In re Leavitt, 209 B.R. at 938. Indeed, reversal under the clearly erroneous standard is only warranted if the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 395, 68 S.Ct. 525, 542, 92 L.Ed. 746 (1948); In re Leavitt, 209 B.R. at 938.

IV.

INTRODUCTION

The issues in this case arise from the Bankruptcy Court's attempt to protect the Bankruptcy system from abuse where there was evidence of a pattern and practice of abuse by Seth Murdock, the principal of this Debtor and of several related debtors. This pattern and practice of abuse was made known to the Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on a motion to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee in the Western XPress, Inc. case and through, among other things, the Report that was filed by the Chapter 11 Trustee that was appointed. Through these sources, the Bankruptcy Court received evidence which suggested that Seth Murdock had attempted shift assets from one entity to another for his own financial benefit to the detriment of the rights of various creditors in this case and related cases. In fact, the Chapter 11 Trustee stated on the record that hundreds of thousands of dollars in assets were missing from the Western XPress, Inc. estate. Based on this record, it was appropriate for the Bankruptcy Court to take steps to prevent further abuses of the bankruptcy system by Seth Murdock.

V.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE[1]

The Debtor in Possession, MTS Jim Baker Trucking, dba Jim Baker Trucking filed a chapter 11 petition in the United States Bankruptcy Court on March 18, 1998. A.R. Tab 9. The bankruptcy petition was signed by Seth Murdock as president of the corporation. The corporation was not represented by counsel. A.R. Tab 9, page 95. The lack of an attorney as well as its failure to comply with the reporting requirements of the United States Trustee resulted in the filing of a motion to dismiss or convert this case under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b) which was set for hearing on April 30, 1998. A.R. Tabs 10 and 11. In addition, the identity of the Debtor was in question because only the face sheet of the petition listed MTS Jim Baker Trucking as the Debtor; all other pages of the voluntary Chapter 11 petition, including a duplicate face sheet, referred to the Debtor as Murdock Transportation

Systems, Inc. A.R. Tab 9. This issue was not clarified until Appellants filed their opening brief in the MTS Jim Baker Trucking case which admits that the Debtor in that case was erroneously named on page one of the petition as MTS Jim Baker Trucking, and that the true and correct name of the Debtor is Murdock Transportation Systems, Inc., dba Jim Baker Trucking. Appellants Opening Brief at 5, n. 3. Based on this admission, the United States Trustee will treat the Debtor in the MTS Jim Baker Trucking case and Murdock Transportation System, Inc. as the same entity (hereinafter “MTS, Inc.”).

Hearings on two other related Chapter 11 petitions were pending before the Bankruptcy Court on April 30, 1998, the date when the U.S. Trustee’s motion to dismiss or convert MTS’s Chapter 11 case was calendared. The petition of the first of the two related Chapter 11 petitions, Western Motor Xpress, Inc. (hereinafter “Western”) reflects the signature of Seth Murdock as president of the corporation, A.R. Tab 1, page 2, while the Statement of Financial Affairs of the second related Chapter 11 case, Espinosa Cartage Company, Inc., (hereinafter “Espinosa”) indicated that Seth Murdock was also the president of that corporation. A.R. Tab 13, page 160.

The first of these cases, Western, was filed on April 3, 1998 under case number LA 98-23236-ER. A.R. Tab 1. An emergency hearing was held on April 15, 1998 with respect to creditor Durable Sales’ motion to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee. A.R. Tabs 2 and 3. Evidence was submitted which indicated that the Estate appeared to have used cash collateral to pay for operating expenses and payroll. A. R.

Tab 4, page 32, lines 17-18. The United States Trustee joined in the motion to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee on the grounds that Western failed to perform its duties under 11 U.S.C. §1107 to account for property of the estate and comply with the United States Trustee’s reporting requirements. A.R. Tab 5. At the April 15, 1998 hearing on the motion for the appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee, Durable Sales presented evidence that Western’s accounts receivable were being diverted. A.R. Tab 16, pages 247-249. The Bankruptcy Court directed the appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee at the April 15, 1998 hearing. A.R. Tab 16, pages 250-251. That order included an injunction against Seth Murdock and any person involved in the current management of Western or their agents or representatives preventing their return to Western’s premises or from obtaining, taking, diverting, or otherwise withdrawing any funds, mail, checks, or other items from any post office boxes in the names of Western or MTS, Inc. A.R. Tab 6, pages 50 and 51. A subsequent report filed by the Chapter 11 Trustee further confirmed that Western’s accounts receivable had been diverted. A.R. Tab 7, page 59, lines 16-26. This report was presented to the Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on April 30, 1998.

The second related Chapter 11 case of Espinosa, case number LA 98-20715-ER, was filed on March 19, 1998. A.R. Tab 12. Because the Debtor in that case, like that of MTS, Inc., was not represented by counsel, a motion to dismiss for failure to comply with Former Local Bankruptcy Rule 102(7)(a) was filed by the United States Trustee and set for hearing on April 30, 1998. A.R Tabs 14 and 15. Hearings on the United States Trustee’s motion to dismiss the Chapter 11 petition of Espinosa for failure to comply with Former Local Bankruptcy Rule 102(7)(a), the U.S. Trustee’s motion to dismiss or convert the related Chapter 11 petition of MTS, Inc. under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b), and the status conference and hearing on the final injunction in Western, were all calendared for April 30, 1998.

The Bankruptcy Court reviewed the Chapter 11 Trustee’s Report in Western, which indicated continued diversion of monies to other related entities, the lack of accounting records, and the commingling of business operations. A.R. Tab 7; E.R. Tab 10, pages 51, 73. At the hearing, the Bankruptcy Court ordered its preliminary injunction, rendered at the April 15, 1998 hearing, to become final, with certain allowances for previous management to gain entry to Western’s business premises. A.R. Tab 8.

The Bankruptcy Court also heard argument on the U.S. Trustee’s motions in MTS, Inc. and Espinosa. At the hearings, the Bankruptcy Court enjoined the Debtor, its principal, Seth Murdock, any entity in which Seth Murdock was an officer, director, employee, or in which Murdock held a controlling interest on the date on which the Debtor’s case was filed from filing a voluntary bankruptcy petition for a period of 365 days. E.R. Tab 10, pages 71-75. The order containing these provisions (hereinafter “the Order”) was entered on May 15, 1998. E.R. Tab 5.

VI.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

First, Appellants do not have standing to obtain all the relief that they request. While they do have standing to appeal the relief that was granted against them, they do not have standing to appeal the relief that was granted against the other entities. Therefore, this Court’s consideration of the appeal should be limited to issues which relate to findings of bad faith and the right of Appellants to file a voluntary petition.

Secondly, the Bankruptcy Court had subject matter jurisdiction concerning the dismissal of the case for bad faith and the issuance of a bar against Appellants, among others, from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days because such relief was necessary to enable the Court to efficiently administer the Western estate and to prevent diversion of Estate assets.

Furthermore, the Bankruptcy Court had personal jurisdiction over Appellants. The United States Trustee’s Motion to Dismiss the MTS, Inc. case was served on Appellants and gave them notice that the United States Trustee was seeking a bar against filing a voluntary petition against the Debtor, as well as any other relief that the Court deemed appropriate. A.R. Tab 10, pages 108 and 109. Therefore, the service of the Notice of Motion and Motion to Dismiss in the MTS, Inc. case was sufficient to enable the Court to obtain personal jurisdiction over Appellants.

The Bankruptcy Court’s finding of bad faith does not constitute clear error and is adequately supported by the record. Similarly, the Bankruptcy Court's decision to enjoin MTS, Inc. does not constitute an abuse of discretion, based on the record and the fact that the Bankruptcy Court made a finding of bad faith. Further, while the United States Trustee contends that the Bankruptcy Court had the authority to enjoin Seth Murdock, she acknowledges that Seth Murdock should not be bound by such an injunction until he has an opportunity to show cause why it should not be issued.

Finally, Debtor's due process rights were not violated when the Bankruptcy Court enjoined the Debtor from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days because it was served with the motion to dismiss and because the motion requested injunctive relief against the Debtor, among other reasons. Furthermore, Seth Murdock's right to notice was respected by the Bankruptcy Court because he was served with the motion. The Court's refusal to allow him to speak on his own behalf, however, was problematic. This deficiency can be remedied on remand by providing Mr. Murdock with an opportunity to show cause why the injunction should not be imposed.

ARGUMENT

A. Appellants Do Not Have Standing to Appeal the Order as to the Other Non-Debtor Entities

Before this Court can consider the other issues raised by Appellants, it must determine whether Appellants have standing to obtain the appellate relief that they seek. Standing is a threshold question that relates to the jurisdiction of the court to consider the appeal. City of South Lake Tahoe v. California Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 625 F.2d 231, 232 (9th Cir. 1980). Therefore, this Court can only review the Order to the extent that Appellants have standing to seek such review.

It is black letter law that a party may only appeal to protect its own interests and does not have standing to file an appeal to protect the interests of another. Estate of Bishop v. Bechtel Power Corp., 905 F.2d 1272, 1276 (9th Cir. 1990); Morrison Knudsen Co., Inc. v. CHG International, Inc., 811 F.2d 1209, 1214 (9th Cir. 1987). A party does not have standing to appeal unless it is aggrieved by the order. Bryant v. Technical Research Co., 654 F.2d 1337, 1343 (9th Cir. 1981). Furthermore, an indirect financial stake in another party’s claims is insufficient to create standing on appeal. Evanston Insurance Co. v. Fred A. Tucker & Co., Inc., 872 F.2d 278, 280 (9th Cir. 1989); Libby, McNeill, and Libby v. City National Bank, 592 F.2d 504, 511-512 (9th Cir. 1978); SEC v. Secs. Northwest, Inc., 573 F.2d 622, 625-626 (9th Cir. 1978)(Principal has no standing to appeal order relating to liquidation of debtor to minimize his liability for debtor’s unpaid taxes).

In the instant case, Appellants do not have a direct stake in the interest of the other non-Debtor entities in being able to file a voluntary petition before May 15, 1999. They only have a direct stake in protecting their own right to file a voluntary petition. If the principal in Secs. Northwest, Inc. did not have standing to appeal an order relating to the debtor's liquidation to minimize his tax liability, then certainly the Appellants do not have standing to appeal the part of the Order which enjoins the other non-debtor entities from filing a voluntary petition. Instead, Appellants only have standing to appeal the Order to the extent that it bars them from filing a voluntary petition. Therefore, the Court should limit its consideration of the appeal to the issues that relate to the finding of bad faith and the right of MTS, Inc. and Seth Murdock to file a voluntary petition before May 15, 1999.

B. The Bankruptcy Court had Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over the Issues Before It.

1. The Instant Contested Matter Constitutes a Core Proceeding

The United States Trustee agrees that subject matter jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts is grounded in and limited by statute. Celotex Corp. v. Edwards, 514 U.S. 300, 307, 115 S.Ct. 1493, 1498, 131 L.Ed.2d 403 (1995). The Celotex court noted, however, that Congress intended to grant comprehensive jurisdiction to the bankruptcy courts so that they might deal efficiently and expeditiously with all matters connected with the bankruptcy estate. 514 U.S. 300, 308, 115 S.Ct. 1493, 1499, 131 L.Ed.2d 403 (1995). Furthermore, the statutory grant of subject matter jurisdiction to bankruptcy courts is not contained in Title 11. Title 11 of the United States Code sets forth the rights of parties in the bankruptcy system and the authority to provide specific relief in cases over which it has jurisdiction. In fact, it is well settled that an allegation that a court does not have the statutory authority to provide a specific form of relief does not implicate the subject matter jurisdiction of the court. Steel Company v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 118 S.Ct. 1003, 1010, 140 L.Ed. 2d 210 (1998).

Instead the subject matter jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court is governed by 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334 and 157. Section 1334(b) provides that ". . . the district courts shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction of all civil proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in or related to cases under title 11." Section 157(a) of Title 28 of the United States Code permits the district court to refer "any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11 . . . to the bankruptcy judges for the district." In turn, section 157(b) permits bankruptcy judges to hear all core proceedings arising under Title 11 which include matters concerning the administration of the estate. Furthermore, Section 157(b)(2)(O) of Title 28 of the United States Code reflects the fact that other proceedings affecting the liquidation of the assets of the estate are also core proceedings.

The Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on April 30, 1998 was concerned about addressing the appropriate remedy to preserve the rights of the creditors in the related Chapter 11 case of Western to ensure that the property of that Estate would neither be dissipated nor transferred to other affiliated companies which may seek relief under the Bankruptcy Code. The Bankruptcy Court had previously received evidence of the diversion of accounts receivable, at the hearing on the appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee in Western, which was subsequently confirmed by the Report of the Chapter 11 Trustee. A.R. Tab 7, page 59, lines 16-26. This Report led the Bankruptcy Court to make final its preliminary injunction against Seth Murdock and others from obtaining unlimited access to Western's business premises. A.R. Tab 8. The bar against refiling was issued to minimize the risk of further dissipation of assets in Western. Therefore, the instant contested matter concerns the administration of the estate and the liquidation of assets and thus is a core proceeding. As a result, the Bankruptcy Court had subject matter jurisdiction over the issuance of the injunctions.

2. The Bankruptcy Court Had the Authority to Enjoin Appellants From Filing Voluntary Petitions

As was explained above, the subject matter jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court over the instant contested matter is provided by the fact that it arises in a case under Title 11, and relates to the efficient administration and liquidation of assets of the Western Estate, among others. Therefore, the issue of the Bankruptcy Court's authority to enjoin non-debtor entities does not affect the Bankruptcy Court's subject matter jurisdiction, but instead relates to the Bankruptcy Court's statutory authority to grant such injunctive relief.

In any event, the United States Trustee disagrees with Appellant's construction of section 349(a).[2] Appellants

[2] 11 U.S.C. § 349(a) provides:
Unless the court, for cause, orders otherwise, the dismissal of a case under this title does not bar the discharge, in a later case under this title, of debts that were dischargeable in the case dismissed;

wrongly contend that section 349(a) provides that a bar on refiling can only be issued to the extent provided for by section 109(g). Appellant’s Opening Brief at 13-14. This argument presumes that the phrase “[u]nless the court, for cause, orders otherwise,” only modifies the clause preceding the semi-colon and that it does not apply to the rest of subsection 349(a). The courts in the Ninth Circuit have not addressed this issue. The majority of the courts which have analyzed this issue, however, have rejected this approach, have determined that the phrase “[u]nless the court, for cause, orders otherwise,” modifies the entire subsection and have concluded that they can enjoin refiling independent of the authorization in section 109(g). In re Casse, 219 B.R. 657, 662 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1998); Stathatos v. United States Trustee for Northern District of Texas (In re Stathatos), 163 B.R. 83, 88 (N.D. Tex. 1993) (Court affirmed bar of two years); Jolly v. Great Western Bank (In re Jolly), 143 B.R. 383, 387 (E.D. Va. 1992); Benefield v. United States Trustee, 1991 WL 542279, *2 (N.D. Tex. 1991) (Court affirmed bar of one year); Lerch v. Federal Land Bank of St. Louis (In re Lerch), 94 B.R. 998, 1001 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (Court affirmed bar of two years); In re McKissie, 103 B.R. 189, 193 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1989) (Debtors barred from filing a voluntary petition for one year); In re Stuart Glass & Mirror, Inc., 77 B.R. 332, 334 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1987) (Court barred corporate debtor from filing a voluntary petition for two years pursuant to section 105). These courts have noted the fact that “nor” is used to create a conjunction between the two clauses and have found that the semi-colon does not create two independent clauses. See e.g. Jolly, 143 B.R. at 387. In fact, the only courts to adopt the construction suggested by Appellants are from the 10th Circuit. In re Freiouf, 938 F.2d 1099, 1103 (10th Cir. 1991). The majority view appears to be the better reading of the statute. If a court can permanently enjoin a debtor from ever obtaining a discharge of its then existing debts for cause, it certainly should be able to impose the less draconian remedy of enjoining the filing of a voluntary petition for one year. In re Dilley, 125 B.R. 189, 197 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1991).

> nor does the dismissal of a case under this title prejudice the debtor with regard to the filing of a subsequent petition under this title, except as provided in section 109(g) of this title.

Furthermore, section 109(g) was adopted to limit bad faith filings. In re Kinney, 51 B.R. 840, 846 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1985) (Mund, J.). When creative debtors attempt to avoid its restrictions, a bankruptcy court may utilize the authority in section 105 to enforce this intent. In fact, section 105(a) specifically authorizes the Bankruptcy Court to issue any order which is necessary to carry out the provisions of the Code or to prevent an abuse of process. Since sections 349(a) and 109(g) do not prohibit the exercise of this power, there is no reason to conclude that the Bankruptcy Court did not have this power to exercise at its discretion. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court at least had the discretion to enjoin MTS, Inc. from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

This analysis also suggests that the Bankruptcy Court had the power to enjoin non-debtors from filing a voluntary petition for a period of time if cause is found. This is especially true where the Court dismisses a case for bad faith, and where the bad faith conduct was committed by the non-debtor who is the principal and sole shareholder of the Debtor. Therefore, not only did the Court have subject matter jurisdiction over the instant contested matter, but it also had the authority to enjoin the Appellants from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

C. The Bankruptcy Court had Personal Jurisdiction Over the Appellants.

A court obtains personal jurisdiction over a party by actual service of process or by voluntary appearance. Burnham v. Superior Court of California, County of Marin, 495 U.S. 604, 615, 110 S.Ct. 2105, 2113, 109 L.Ed.2d 631 (1990)(Service of process is sufficient to confer personal jurisdiction); Veek v. Commodity Enterprises, Inc., 487 F.2d 423, 425 (9th Cir. 1973). In the context of a bankruptcy proceeding, the bankruptcy court acquires personal jurisdiction through compliance with Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9014, which governs contested matters and requires that notice and an opportunity for a hearing “be afforded the party against whom relief is sought”. Rule 9014 also requires service of the motion in accordance with Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 7004. Specifically, it authorizes service of process on an individual by mailing it to the place where the individual regularly conducts a business or profession. Fed. Rule Bankr. P. 7004(b)(1).

In the instant case, Appellants do not contend that the Court did not have personal jurisdiction over Debtor. Appellant’s Opening Brief at 15. In fact, Appellants could not make this contention because Debtor consented to the Court’s personal jurisdiction by filing the voluntary petition.

Instead, Appellants merely contend that the Bankruptcy Court did not have personal jurisdiction over the non-debtor entities. Appellant’s Opening Brief at 15. The only other Appellant who is a non-debtor entity is Seth Murdock. The motion to dismiss or convert the case of MTS, Inc. was served on Seth Murdock at the address on listed for the Debtor on the first page of the voluntary petition. A.R. Tab 9, pages 93; A.R. Tab 10, page 121. This service satisfies Bankruptcy Rule 7004(b)(1) with respect to Seth Murdock because the address that was listed on the petition was the only address that the United States Trustee had for Mr. Murdock, and it was reasonable to conclude that he regularly conducts business at this address, since he signed the petition as the President of the Debtor. Therefore, since Seth Murdock did receive notice of the United States Trustee’s Motion, the Court did obtain personal jurisdiction over Mr. Murdock and the alleged jurisdictional defect does not exist.

D. The Bankruptcy Court’s Finding of Bad Faith Does Not Constitute Clear Error

Section 1112(b) does not expressly require that a petition be filed in good faith, but evidence of bad faith or of an intent to abuse the reorganization process is sufficient “cause” upon which a case can be dismissed. In re Marsch, 36 F.3d at 828; In re Thirtieth Place, Inc., 30 B.R. 503, 505 (9th Cir. Bankr. 1983); In re ACI Sunbow, LLC, 206 B.R. 213, 217 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1997). A determination of whether a petition was filed in bad faith is within the Bankruptcy Court’s discretion. In re Arnold, 806 F.2d 937, 939 (9th Cir. 1986); In re Thirtieth Place, Inc., 30 B.R. at 505. Detriment to the secured creditor is not the only harm resulting from a bad faith filing. “A bad faith filing is an abuse of the bankruptcy process and is offensive to the integrity of the bankruptcy system.” In re Yukon Enterprises, Inc., 39 B.R. 919, 922 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1984). Delay prejudicial to creditors as well as abuse of process have been found to support the finding of bad faith. In re Ortiz, 200 B.R. 485 (D.Puerto Rico 1996).

In this case, the Bankruptcy Court specifically found that the petition was filed in bad faith and dismissed the case based, in part, on this finding. E.R. Tab 10, pages 72-73. Furthermore, contrary to the assertions of the Appellants, the record does support this finding. First of all, the Court stated on the record at the hearing on April 30, 1998 that its finding of bad faith was based on the report of the Chapter 11 Trustee who was appointed to represent the Western Estate. E.R. Tab 10, page 73, lines 1-5. While this report was filed in the Western case, the Bankruptcy Court was entitled to take judicial notice of it pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 201, made applicable by Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9017. Therefore, because the Bankruptcy Court took judicial notice of this report it is part of the record and was before the Bankruptcy Court.

The Trustee’s Report informed the Court, among other things, that Seth Murdock had attempted to obtain assets of the Western Estate for his own personal benefit, A.R. Tab 7, page 56, lines 8 to 11, that attempts were made to persuade customers of Western to send payments for accounts receivable belonging to Western to a Post Office Box in the name of MTS, Inc., A.R. Tab 7, page 59, lines 16-26, that $25,000 was withdrawn from a Western bank account on March 2, 1998, A.R. Tab 7, page 62, lines 7-9, and that it was necessary to inform the customers of Western of the pendency of the bankruptcy proceeding to prevent Seth Murdock from being able to divert receivables from Western. A.R. Tab 7, page 60, lines 8-12. Furthermore, the Trustee discovered that Mr. Murdock had used 5-6 different social security numbers and 4-5 different birth dates, and that he pled guilty to felony perjury on May 18, 1989. A.R. Tab 7, page 61.[3] In fact, the Trustee stated on the record at the hearing on April 30, 1998 that “... there are hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars that are missing from this case.” E.R. Tab 10, page 54, lines 15-20.

The finding of bad faith is also supported by the evidence that was submitted to the Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on April 15, 1998 where the Bankruptcy Court appointed a Chapter 11 Trustee in the Western case and entered a preliminary injunction against Seth Murdock. At this hearing the Court was presented with copies of invoices and address labels. A.R. Tab 16, pages 247-249. This evidence was offered to show that invoices of account receivables of Western were being sent to debtors of the Estate which requested the debtors to send payment to a P.O. Box in Irvine, California, which was close to the residence of Mr. Murdock. Id. Therefore, this evidence supports the statements in the Trustee’s report that Mr. Murdock appears to have diverted funds from the Western estate for his personal use. Finally, Durable Sales, Inc. filed declarations which stated that Western was not segregating the cash collateral of Durable Sales, Inc. A.R. 4, page 32.

Therefore, the Court had been presented with evidence that a significant amount of money had disappeared from the Western Estate, that Mr. Murdock appeared to be behind this diversion and that Western had not been segregating, and was using, the cash collateral of at least one of its secured creditors. The fact that these activities occurred with respect to the Western case, and not the instant case, is not material since Mr. Murdock is the president of Western and MTS, Inc. A.R. Tab 1, page 2; A.R. Tab 9, page 95. This is buttressed by the fact that the creditors who appeared at the hearing on April 30, 1998 expressed a concern that Mr. Murdock would continue to play fast and loose with the bankruptcy system. E.R. Tab 10, page 67. Thus, the record is more than sufficient to enable the Bankruptcy Court to make a finding of bad faith. In no way can this Court conclude that there is no evidence in the record to support the finding of bad faith, as Appellants contend. Appellant’s Opening Brief at 15-16. Neither can this Court conclude, viewing the record as a whole, that it is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made. Therefore, this Court cannot conclude that the finding of bad faith constitutes clear error, and must affirm this finding.

E. The Bankruptcy Court Did not Abuse Its Discretion By Enjoining Murdock Transportation Systems, Inc. From Filing a Voluntary Petition For 365 Days

As was explained above at section VI.B.2., bankruptcy courts have the discretion, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 349(a), to enjoin a debtor from filing a petition in the future for cause. Certainly, where a court has dismissed the case for bad faith, where the Debtor has failed to comply with the reporting requirements of the United States Trustee and where the principal of the Debtor has been alleged to have diverted funds from another estate, it cannot constitute an abuse of discretion for the court to enter the injunction. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion by enjoining MTS, Inc. from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days. Furthermore, the United States Trustee contends that the Court had sufficient cause to enjoin Seth Murdock as well. The United States Trustee acknowledges, however, that he should not be enjoined without having an opportunity to show cause why he should not be subject to such an injunction.

F. Debtor Was Provided Due Process, But It Would Be Appropriate to Remand the Case to Provide Seth Murdock with an Opportunity to Respond Consistent With His Due Process Rights.

The Due Process Clause generally requires that parties be given notice that, under the circumstances, is reasonably calculated to provide adequate notice of the pendency of the hearing and an opportunity to respond. Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust, Co., 339 U.S. 306, 314, 70 S.Ct. 652, 657, 94 L.Ed. 865 (1950), quoted in Walthall v. United States, 131 F.3d 1289, 1294 (9th Cir. 1997). Bankruptcy courts have recognized that due process does not require notice of all possible ramifications of a hearing, but instead is a flexible standard that only requires the procedural protections required by the facts of the case. In re Michigan General Corp., 78 B.R. 479, 485 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1987); In re Petro, 18 B.R. 566, 569 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1982). In fact, the Petro Court specifically found that “due process does not require informing the debtor of all the possible ramifications of a dismissal hearing.” 18 B.R. at 569.

In the instant case, the due process rights of the Debtor were not violated. The Debtor was served with the United States Trustee’s Motion to Dismiss, which requested the imposition of an 180 day bar as to the Debtor, and such other relief as the Court deemed to be appropriate, based on the Debtor’s failure to comply with the reporting requirements of the United States Trustee and its failure to obtain counsel. A.R. Tab 10. These allegations alone are typically sufficient to impose an 180 day bar on the Debtor pursuant to section

Furthermore, Debtor was informed of the pendency of the hearing and of its right to object to the relief requested. A.R. Tab 10, page 106. Debtor, however, failed to so object and failed to have an attorney appear in Court on its behalf pursuant to Former Local Rule 102(7). The fact that the Debtor did not receive express notice that the Bankruptcy Court might make a finding of bad faith did not affect the ability of the Debtor to hire counsel and prepare for the hearing. In fact, Debtor's failure to obtain counsel prevented it from being able to make any arguments at the hearing. Furthermore, the request for such other relief that the Court deemed appropriate was sufficient to put the Debtor on notice that it could be subject to relief such as the relief that was imposed, and that the Court might take notice of other facts that were presented. It certainly was not unreasonable to expect that the Court might exercise its discretion to impose a bar longer than 180 days, given the activity that was alleged to have occurred with respect to the Western case. Therefore, the due process rights of the Debtor were not violated.

The service of the Motion to Dismiss on Seth Murdock

[4] Appellants reliance on Memphis Light, Gas & Water v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 14, 98 S.Ct. 1554, 1563, 56 L.Ed. 2d 30 (1978) is misplaced. In that case, the Supreme Court merely held that where one does not receive notice of one's rights to present objections to the requested relief, the notice is insufficient for due process purposes. 435 U.S. at 14-15, 98 S.Ct. at 1563.

also was sufficient to put him on notice that he might be enjoined from filing a voluntary petition in the future. A.R. Tab 10, page 108. While the Motion did not request this relief, it was reasonable to conclude that it might be imposed since he is the principal of all three debtors. In fact, he had already been subject to injunctive relief with respect to Western and was alleged to have diverted assets from the Western Estate. Therefore, because he was the principal of MTS, Inc., and because the United States Trustee sought to enjoin MTS, Inc., it was not unreasonable for him to conclude that he might be subject to further injunctive relief in this case.

The United States Trustee acknowledges, however, that Seth Murdock did not have an opportunity to respond to the Court’s statement that it was inclined to bar him personally from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days. In fact the Court did not allow him to speak. E.R. Tab 10, page 71, lines 19-20. Therefore, if the Court is not inclined to affirm the Order as it applies to Seth Murdock, the United States Trustee requests that the case be remanded to the Bankruptcy Court to provide Mr. Murdock with an opportunity to show cause why he should not be enjoined from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days from the entry of the Order.

VIII.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the United States Trustee requests that the Court a) affirm the finding of bad faith b) affirm the injunction that is applicable to Murdock Transportation Services, Inc. and c) remand the case to the Bankruptcy Court to provide Seth Murdock an opportunity to show cause why he should not be subject to the injunction.

JURISDICTION

The statutory basis of jurisdiction of this appeal is 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a) and 158(b)(1). The statutory basis of jurisdiction for the Bankruptcy Court was 28 U.S.C. §§ 157, 1334.

II.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES ON APPEAL

A. Whether Appellants have standing to appeal the provisions of the order which enjoined other entities from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

B. Whether the Bankruptcy Court had subject matter jurisdiction to find that the petition was filed in bad faith and to impose on Debtor, Seth Murdock and affiliates of the Debtor, based on this finding, a 365 day bar from filing voluntary bankruptcy petitions.

C. Whether the Bankruptcy Court had personal jurisdiction over Appellants.

D. Whether the Bankruptcy Court committed clear error when it made a finding of bad faith with respect to this Debtor.

E. Whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion by enjoining Debtor, Seth Murdock and Murdock Transportation System, Inc. from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

F. Whether the procedural due process rights of the Appellants were violated by the Bankruptcy Court when it imposed a 365 day bar on their ability to file a voluntary bankruptcy petition.

III.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court’s exercise of subject matter jurisdiction is reviewed de novo. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Colello, 139 F.3d 674 (9th Cir. 1998). Similarly, a determination of whether a bankruptcy court had personal jurisdiction over the parties to the appeal is a question of law which is subject to de novo review. Omeluk v. Langsten Slip & Batbyggeri A/S, 52 F.3d 267, 269 (9th Cir. 1995). Furthermore, a claim that one’s due process rights have been violated is reviewed de novo. Gonzalez-Julio v. I.N.S., 34 F.3d 820, 823 (9th Cir. 1994). Finally, all issues of law, such as the court’s statutory authority to enjoin the filing of a voluntary petition or the standing of Appellants to appeal an order, are reviewed de novo. AT & T Universal Card Services v. Black (In re Black), 222 B.R. 896, 899 (9th Cir. BAP 1998). Therefore, these issues are reviewed directly by this Court.

Orders dismissing a bankruptcy case for bad faith are reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Leavitt v. Soto (In re Leavitt), 209 B.R. 935, 938 (9th Cir. BAP 1997); Marsch v. Marsch (In re Marsch), 36 F.3d 825, 827 (9th Cir. 1994). Similarly, the grant of an injunction is discretionary and is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Parsons v. Plotkin (In re Pacific Land Sales, Inc.), 187 B.R. 302, 308 (9th Cir. BAP 1995). A finding of bad faith, however, is reviewed for clear error. In re Marsch, 36 F.3d at 827; In re Leavitt, 209 B.R. at 938. Under this standard, if the trial court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, a reviewing court may not reverse even if convinced that it would have weighed the evidence differently as trier of fact. Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 574, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 1511-12, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985); In re Leavitt, 209 B.R. at 938. Indeed, reversal under the clearly erroneous standard is only warranted if the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 395, 68 S.Ct. 525, 542, 92 L.Ed. 746 (1948); In re Leavitt, 209 B.R. at 938.

IV.

INTRODUCTION

The issues in this case arise from the Bankruptcy Court's attempt to protect the Bankruptcy system from abuse where there was evidence of a pattern and practice of abuse by Seth Murdock, the principal of this Debtor and of several related debtors. This pattern and practice of abuse was made known to the Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on a motion to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee in the Western XPress, Inc. case and through, among other things, the Report that was filed by the Chapter 11 Trustee that was appointed. Through these sources, the Bankruptcy Court received evidence which suggested that Seth Murdock had attempted shift assets from one entity to another for his own financial benefit to the detriment of the rights of various creditors in this case and related cases. In fact, the Chapter 11 Trustee stated on the record that hundreds of thousands of dollars in assets were missing from the Western XPress, Inc. estate. Based on this record, it was appropriate for the Bankruptcy Court to take steps to prevent further abuses of the bankruptcy system by Seth Murdock.

V.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE[1]

The Debtor in Possession, MTS Jim Baker Trucking, dba Jim Baker Trucking filed a chapter 11 petition in the United States Bankruptcy Court on March 18, 1998. A.R. Tab 9. The bankruptcy petition was signed by Seth Murdock as president of the corporation. The corporation was not represented by counsel. A.R. Tab 9, page 95. The lack of an attorney as well as its failure to comply with the reporting requirements of the United States Trustee resulted in the filing of a motion to dismiss or convert this case under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b) which was set for hearing on April 30, 1998. A.R. Tabs 10 and 11. In addition, the identity of the Debtor was in question because only the face sheet of the petition listed MTS Jim Baker Trucking as the Debtor; all other pages of the voluntary Chapter 11 petition, including a duplicate face sheet, referred to the Debtor as Murdock Transportation

Systems, Inc. A.R. Tab 9. This issue was not clarified until Appellants filed their opening brief in the MTS Jim Baker Trucking case which admits that the Debtor in that case was erroneously named on page one of the petition as MTS Jim Baker Trucking, and that the true and correct name of the Debtor is Murdock Transportation Systems, Inc., dba Jim Baker Trucking. Appellants Opening Brief at 5, n. 3. Based on this admission, the United States Trustee will treat the Debtor in the MTS Jim Baker Trucking case and Murdock Transportation System, Inc. as the same entity (hereinafter “MTS, Inc.”).

Hearings on two other related Chapter 11 petitions were pending before the Bankruptcy Court on April 30, 1998, the date when the U.S. Trustee’s motion to dismiss or convert MTS’s Chapter 11 case was calendared. The petition of the first of the two related Chapter 11 petitions, Western Motor Xpress, Inc. (hereinafter “Western”) reflects the signature of Seth Murdock as president of the corporation, A.R. Tab 1, page 2, while the Statement of Financial Affairs of the second related Chapter 11 case, Espinosa Cartage Company, Inc., (hereinafter “Espinosa”) indicated that Seth Murdock was also the president of that corporation. A.R. Tab 13, page 160.

The first of these cases, Western, was filed on April 3, 1998 under case number LA 98-23236-ER. A.R. Tab 1. An emergency hearing was held on April 15, 1998 with respect to creditor Durable Sales’ motion to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee. A.R. Tabs 2 and 3. Evidence was submitted which indicated that the Estate appeared to have used cash collateral to pay for operating expenses and payroll. A. R.

Tab 4, page 32, lines 17-18. The United States Trustee joined in the motion to appoint a Chapter 11 Trustee on the grounds that Western failed to perform its duties under 11 U.S.C. §1107 to account for property of the estate and comply with the United States Trustee’s reporting requirements. A.R. Tab 5. At the April 15, 1998 hearing on the motion for the appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee, Durable Sales presented evidence that Western’s accounts receivable were being diverted. A.R. Tab 16, pages 247-249. The Bankruptcy Court directed the appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee at the April 15, 1998 hearing. A.R. Tab 16, pages 250-251. That order included an injunction against Seth Murdock and any person involved in the current management of Western or their agents or representatives preventing their return to Western’s premises or from obtaining, taking, diverting, or otherwise withdrawing any funds, mail, checks, or other items from any post office boxes in the names of Western or MTS, Inc. A.R. Tab 6, pages 50 and 51. A subsequent report filed by the Chapter 11 Trustee further confirmed that Western’s accounts receivable had been diverted. A.R. Tab 7, page 59, lines 16-26. This report was presented to the Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on April 30, 1998.

The second related Chapter 11 case of Espinosa, case number LA 98-20715-ER, was filed on March 19, 1998. A.R. Tab 12. Because the Debtor in that case, like that of MTS, Inc., was not represented by counsel, a motion to dismiss for failure to comply with Former Local Bankruptcy Rule 102(7)(a) was filed by the United States Trustee and set for hearing on April 30, 1998. A.R Tabs 14 and 15. Hearings on the United States Trustee’s motion to dismiss the Chapter 11 petition of Espinosa for failure to comply with Former Local Bankruptcy Rule 102(7)(a), the U.S. Trustee’s motion to dismiss or convert the related Chapter 11 petition of MTS, Inc. under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b), and the status conference and hearing on the final injunction in Western, were all calendared for April 30, 1998.

The Bankruptcy Court reviewed the Chapter 11 Trustee’s Report in Western, which indicated continued diversion of monies to other related entities, the lack of accounting records, and the commingling of business operations. A.R. Tab 7; E.R. Tab 10, pages 51, 73. At the hearing, the Bankruptcy Court ordered its preliminary injunction, rendered at the April 15, 1998 hearing, to become final, with certain allowances for previous management to gain entry to Western’s business premises. A.R. Tab 8.

The Bankruptcy Court also heard argument on the U.S. Trustee’s motions in MTS, Inc. and Espinosa. At the hearings, the Bankruptcy Court enjoined the Debtor, its principal, Seth Murdock, any entity in which Seth Murdock was an officer, director, employee, or in which Murdock held a controlling interest on the date on which the Debtor’s case was filed from filing a voluntary bankruptcy petition for a period of 365 days. E.R. Tab 10, pages 71-75. The order containing these provisions (hereinafter “the Order”) was entered on May 15, 1998. E.R. Tab 5.

VI.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

First, Appellants do not have standing to obtain all the relief that they request. While they do have standing to appeal the relief that was granted against them, they do not have standing to appeal the relief that was granted against the other entities. Therefore, this Court's consideration of the appeal should be limited to issues which relate to findings of bad faith and the right of Appellants to file a voluntary petition.

Secondly, the Bankruptcy Court had subject matter jurisdiction concerning the dismissal of the case for bad faith and the issuance of a bar against Appellants, among others, from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days because such relief was necessary to enable the Court to efficiently administer the Western estate and to prevent diversion of Estate assets.

Furthermore, the Bankruptcy Court had personal jurisdiction over Appellants. The United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss the MTS, Inc. case was served on Appellants and gave them notice that the United States Trustee was seeking a bar against filing a voluntary petition against the Debtor, as well as any other relief that the Court deemed appropriate. A.R. Tab 10, pages 108 and 109. Therefore, the service of the Notice of Motion and Motion to Dismiss in the MTS, Inc. case was sufficient to enable the Court to obtain personal jurisdiction over Appellants.

The Bankruptcy Court's finding of bad faith does not constitute clear error and is adequately supported by the record. Similarly, the Bankruptcy Court's decision to enjoin MTS, Inc. does not constitute an abuse of discretion, based on the record and the fact that the Bankruptcy Court made a finding of bad faith. Further, while the United States Trustee contends that the Bankruptcy Court had the authority to enjoin Seth Murdock, she acknowledges that Seth Murdock should not be bound by such an injunction until he has an opportunity to show cause why it should not be issued.

Finally, Debtor's due process rights were not violated when the Bankruptcy Court enjoined the Debtor from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days because it was served with the motion to dismiss and because the motion requested injunctive relief against the Debtor, among other reasons. Furthermore, Seth Murdock's right to notice was respected by the Bankruptcy Court because he was served with the motion. The Court's refusal to allow him to speak on his own behalf, however, was problematic. This deficiency can be remedied on remand by providing Mr. Murdock with an opportunity to show cause why the injunction should not be imposed.

VII.

ARGUMENT

A. Appellants Do Not Have Standing to Appeal the Order as to the Other Non-Debtor Entities

Before this Court can consider the other issues raised by Appellants, it must determine whether Appellants have standing to obtain the appellate relief that they seek. Standing is a threshold question that relates to the jurisdiction of the court to consider the appeal. City of South Lake Tahoe v. California Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 625 F.2d 231, 232 (9th Cir. 1980). Therefore, this Court can only review the Order to the extent that Appellants have standing to seek such review.

It is black letter law that a party may only appeal to protect its own interests and does not have standing to file an appeal to protect the interests of another. Estate of Bishop v. Bechtel Power Corp., 905 F.2d 1272, 1276 (9th Cir. 1990); Morrison Knudsen Co., Inc. v. CHG International, Inc., 811 F.2d 1209, 1214 (9th Cir. 1987). A party does not have standing to appeal unless it is aggrieved by the order. Bryant v. Technical Research Co., 654 F.2d 1337, 1343 (9th Cir. 1981). Furthermore, an indirect financial stake in another party's claims is insufficient to create standing on appeal. Evanston Insurance Co. v. Fred A. Tucker & Co., Inc., 872 F.2d 278, 280 (9th Cir. 1989); Libby, McNeill, and Libby v. City National Bank, 592 F.2d 504, 511-512 (9th Cir. 1978); SEC v. Secs. Northwest, Inc., 573 F.2d 622, 625-626 (9th Cir. 1978)(Principal has no standing to appeal order relating to liquidation of debtor to minimize his liability for debtor's unpaid taxes).

In the instant case, Appellants do not have a direct stake in the interest of the other non-Debtor entities in being able to file a voluntary petition before May 15, 1999. They only have a direct stake in protecting their own right to file a voluntary petition. If the principal in Secs. Northwest, Inc. did not have standing to appeal an order relating to the debtor's liquidation to minimize his tax liability, then certainly the Appellants do not have standing to appeal the part of the Order which enjoins the other non-debtor entities from filing a voluntary petition. Instead, Appellants only have standing to appeal the Order to the extent that it bars them from filing a voluntary petition. Therefore, the Court should limit its consideration of the appeal to the issues that relate to the finding of bad faith and the right of MTS, Inc. and Seth Murdock to file a voluntary petition before May 15, 1999.

B. The Bankruptcy Court had Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over the Issues Before It.

1. The Instant Contested Matter Constitutes a Core Proceeding

The United States Trustee agrees that subject matter jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts is grounded in and limited by statute. Celotex Corp. v. Edwards, 514 U.S. 300, 307, 115 S.Ct. 1493, 1498, 131 L.Ed.2d 403 (1995). The Celotex court noted, however, that Congress intended to grant comprehensive jurisdiction to the bankruptcy courts so that they might deal efficiently and expeditiously with all matters connected with the bankruptcy estate. 514 U.S. 300, 308, 115 S.Ct. 1493, 1499, 131 L.Ed.2d 403 (1995). Furthermore, the statutory grant of subject matter jurisdiction to bankruptcy courts is not contained in Title 11. Title 11 of the United States Code sets forth the rights of parties in the bankruptcy system and the authority to provide specific relief in cases over which it has jurisdiction. In fact, it is well settled that an allegation that a court does not have the statutory authority to provide a specific form of relief does not implicate the subject matter jurisdiction of the court. Steel Company v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 118 S.Ct. 1003, 1010, 140 L.Ed. 2d 210 (1998).

Instead the subject matter jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court is governed by 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334 and 157. Section 1334(b) provides that ". . . the district courts shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction of all civil proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in or related to cases under title 11." Section 157(a) of Title 28 of the United States Code permits the district court to refer "any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11 . . . to the bankruptcy judges for the district." In turn, section 157(b) permits bankruptcy judges to hear all core proceedings arising under Title 11 which include matters concerning the administration of the estate. Furthermore, Section 157(b)(2)(O) of Title 28 of the United States Code reflects the fact that other proceedings affecting the liquidation of the assets of the estate are also core proceedings.

The Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on April 30, 1998 was concerned about addressing the appropriate remedy to preserve the rights of the creditors in the related Chapter 11 case of Western to ensure that the property of that Estate would neither be dissipated nor transferred to other affiliated companies which may seek relief under the Bankruptcy Code. The Bankruptcy Court had previously received evidence of the diversion of accounts receivable, at the hearing on the appointment of a Chapter 11 Trustee in Western, which was subsequently confirmed by the Report of the Chapter 11 Trustee. A.R. Tab 7, page 59, lines 16-26. This Report led the Bankruptcy Court to make final its preliminary injunction against Seth Murdock and others from obtaining unlimited access to Western's business premises. A.R. Tab 8. The bar against refiling was issued to minimize the risk of further dissipation of assets in Western. Therefore, the instant contested matter concerns the administration of the estate and the liquidation of assets and thus is a core proceeding. As a result, the Bankruptcy Court had subject matter jurisdiction over the issuance of the injunctions.

2. The Bankruptcy Court Had the Authority to Enjoin Appellants From Filing Voluntary Petitions

As was explained above, the subject matter jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court over the instant contested matter is provided by the fact that it arises in a case under Title 11, and relates to the efficient administration and liquidation of assets of the Western Estate, among others. Therefore, the issue of the Bankruptcy Court's authority to enjoin non-debtor entities does not affect the Bankruptcy Court's subject matter jurisdiction, but instead relates to the Bankruptcy Court's statutory authority to grant such injunctive relief.

In any event, the United States Trustee disagrees with Appellant's construction of section 349(a).[2] Appellants

[2] 11 U.S.C. § 349(a) provides:

> Unless the court, for cause, orders otherwise, the dismissal of a case under this title does not bar the discharge, in a later case under this title, of debts that were dischargeable in the case dismissed;

wrongly contend that section 349(a) provides that a bar on refiling can only be issued to the extent provided for by section 109(g). Appellant's Opening Brief at 13-14. This argument presumes that the phrase "[u]nless the court, for cause, orders otherwise," only modifies the clause preceding the semi-colon and that it does not apply to the rest of subsection 349(a). The courts in the Ninth Circuit have not addressed this issue. The majority of the courts which have analyzed this issue, however, have rejected this approach, have determined that the phrase "[u]nless the court, for cause, orders otherwise," modifies the entire subsection and have concluded that they can enjoin refiling independent of the authorization in section 109(g). In re Casse, 219 B.R. 657, 662 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1998); Stathatos v. United States Trustee for Northern District of Texas (In re Stathatos), 163 B.R. 83, 88 (N.D. Tex. 1993) (Court affirmed bar of two years); Jolly v. Great Western Bank (In re Jolly), 143 B.R. 383, 387 (E.D. Va. 1992); Benefield v. United States Trustee, 1991 WL 542279, *2 (N.D. Tex. 1991) (Court affirmed bar of one year); Lerch v. Federal Land Bank of St. Louis (In re Lerch), 94 B.R. 998, 1001 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (Court affirmed bar of two years); In re McKissie, 103 B.R. 189, 193 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1989) (Debtors barred from filing a voluntary petition for one year); In re Stuart Glass & Mirror, Inc., 77 B.R. 332, 334 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1987) (Court barred corporate debtor from filing a voluntary petition for two years pursuant to section 105). These courts have noted the fact that “nor” is used to create a conjunction between the two clauses and have found that the semi-colon does not create two independent clauses. See e.g. Jolly, 143 B.R. at 387. In fact, the only courts to adopt the construction suggested by Appellants are from the 10th Circuit. In re Freiouf, 938 F.2d 1099, 1103 (10th Cir. 1991). The majority view appears to be the better reading of the statute. If a court can permanently enjoin a debtor from ever obtaining a discharge of its then existing debts for cause, it certainly should be able to impose the less draconian remedy of enjoining the filing of a voluntary petition for one year. In re Dilley, 125 B.R. 189, 197 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1991).

> nor does the dismissal of a case under this title prejudice the debtor with regard to the filing of a subsequent petition under this title, except as provided in section 109(g) of this title.

Furthermore, section 109(g) was adopted to limit bad faith filings. In re Kinney, 51 B.R. 840, 846 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1985) (Mund, J.). When creative debtors attempt to avoid its restrictions, a bankruptcy court may utilize the authority in section 105 to enforce this intent. In fact, section 105(a) specifically authorizes the Bankruptcy Court to issue any order which is necessary to carry out the provisions of the Code or to prevent an abuse of process. Since sections 349(a) and 109(g) do not prohibit the exercise of this power, there is no reason to conclude that the Bankruptcy Court did not have this power to exercise at its discretion. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court at least had the discretion to enjoin MTS, Inc. from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

This analysis also suggests that the Bankruptcy Court had the power to enjoin non-debtors from filing a voluntary petition for a period of time if cause is found. This is especially true where the Court dismisses a case for bad faith, and where the bad faith conduct was committed by the non-debtor who is the principal and sole shareholder of the Debtor. Therefore, not only did the Court have subject matter jurisdiction over the instant contested matter, but it also had the authority to enjoin the Appellants from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days.

C. The Bankruptcy Court had Personal Jurisdiction Over the Appellants.

A court obtains personal jurisdiction over a party by actual service of process or by voluntary appearance. Burnham v. Superior Court of California, County of Marin, 495 U.S. 604, 615, 110 S.Ct. 2105, 2113, 109 L.Ed.2d 631 (1990)(Service of process is sufficient to confer personal jurisdiction); Veek v. Commodity Enterprises, Inc., 487 F.2d 423, 425 (9th Cir. 1973). In the context of a bankruptcy proceeding, the bankruptcy court acquires personal jurisdiction through compliance with Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9014, which governs contested matters and requires that notice and an opportunity for a hearing “be afforded the party against whom relief is sought”. Rule 9014 also requires service of the motion in accordance with Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 7004. Specifically, it authorizes service of process on an individual by mailing it to the place where the individual regularly conducts a business or profession. Fed. Rule Bankr. P. 7004(b)(1).

In the instant case, Appellants do not contend that the Court did not have personal jurisdiction over Debtor. Appellant’s Opening Brief at 15. In fact, Appellants could not make this contention because Debtor consented to the Court’s personal jurisdiction by filing the voluntary petition.

Instead, Appellants merely contend that the Bankruptcy Court did not have personal jurisdiction over the non-debtor entities. Appellant’s Opening Brief at 15. The only other Appellant who is a non-debtor entity is Seth Murdock. The motion to dismiss or convert the case of MTS, Inc. was served on Seth Murdock at the address on listed for the Debtor on the first page of the voluntary petition. A.R. Tab 9, pages 93; A.R. Tab 10, page 121. This service satisfies Bankruptcy Rule 7004(b)(1) with respect to Seth Murdock because the address that was listed on the petition was the only address that the United States Trustee had for Mr. Murdock, and it was reasonable to conclude that he regularly conducts business at this address, since he signed the petition as the President of the Debtor. Therefore, since Seth Murdock did receive notice of the United States Trustee’s Motion, the Court did obtain personal jurisdiction over Mr. Murdock and the alleged jurisdictional defect does not exist.

D. The Bankruptcy Court’s Finding of Bad Faith Does Not Constitute Clear Error

Section 1112(b) does not expressly require that a petition be filed in good faith, but evidence of bad faith or of an intent to abuse the reorganization process is sufficient “cause” upon which a case can be dismissed. In re Marsch, 36 F.3d at 828; In re Thirtieth Place, Inc., 30 B.R. 503, 505 (9th Cir. Bankr. 1983); In re ACI Sunbow, LLC, 206 B.R. 213, 217 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1997). A determination of whether a petition was filed in bad faith is within the Bankruptcy Court’s discretion. In re Arnold, 806 F.2d 937, 939 (9th Cir. 1986); In re Thirtieth Place, Inc., 30 B.R. at 505. Detriment to the secured creditor is not the only harm resulting from a bad faith filing. “A bad faith filing is an abuse of the bankruptcy process and is offensive to the integrity of the bankruptcy system.” In re Yukon Enterprises, Inc., 39 B.R. 919, 922 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1984). Delay prejudicial to creditors as well as abuse of process have been found to support the finding of bad faith. In re Ortiz, 200 B.R. 485 (D.Puerto Rico 1996).

In this case, the Bankruptcy Court specifically found that the petition was filed in bad faith and dismissed the case based, in part, on this finding. E.R. Tab 10, pages 72-73. Furthermore, contrary to the assertions of the Appellants, the record does support this finding. First of all, the Court stated on the record at the hearing on April 30, 1998 that its finding of bad faith was based on the report of the Chapter 11 Trustee who was appointed to represent the Western Estate. E.R. Tab 10, page 73, lines 1-5. While this report was filed in the Western case, the Bankruptcy Court was entitled to take judicial notice of it pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 201, made applicable by Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9017. Therefore, because the Bankruptcy Court took judicial notice of this report it is part of the record and was before the Bankruptcy Court.

The Trustee’s Report informed the Court, among other things, that Seth Murdock had attempted to obtain assets of the Western Estate for his own personal benefit, A.R. Tab 7, page 56, lines 8 to 11, that attempts were made to persuade customers of Western to send payments for accounts receivable belonging to Western to a Post Office Box in the name of MTS, Inc., A.R. Tab 7, page 59, lines 16-26, that $25,000 was withdrawn from a Western bank account on March 2, 1998, A.R. Tab 7, page 62, lines 7-9, and that it was necessary to inform the customers of Western of the pendency of the bankruptcy proceeding to prevent Seth Murdock from being able to divert receivables from Western. A.R. Tab 7, page 60, lines 8-12. Furthermore, the Trustee discovered that Mr. Murdock had used 5-6 different social security numbers and 4-5 different birth dates, and that he pled guilty to felony perjury on May 18, 1989. A.R. Tab 7, page 61.[3] In fact, the Trustee stated on the record at the hearing on April 30, 1998 that “... there are hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars that are missing from this case.” E.R. Tab 10, page 54, lines 15-20.

The finding of bad faith is also supported by the evidence that was submitted to the Bankruptcy Court at the hearing on April 15, 1998 where the Bankruptcy Court appointed a Chapter 11 Trustee in the Western case and entered a preliminary injunction against Seth Murdock. At this hearing the Court was presented with copies of invoices and address labels. A.R. Tab 16, pages 247-249. This evidence was offered to show that invoices of account receivables of Western were being sent to debtors of the Estate which requested the debtors to send payment to a P.O. Box in Irvine, California, which was close to the residence of Mr. Murdock. Id. Therefore, this evidence supports the statements in the Trustee’s report that Mr. Murdock appears to have diverted funds from the Western estate for his personal use. Finally, Durable Sales, Inc. filed declarations which stated that Western was not segregating the cash collateral of Durable Sales, Inc. A.R. 4, page 32.

Therefore, the Court had been presented with evidence that a significant amount of money had disappeared from the Western Estate, that Mr. Murdock appeared to be behind this diversion and that Western had not been segregating, and was using, the cash collateral of at least one of its secured creditors. The fact that these activities occurred with respect to the Western case, and not the instant case, is not material since Mr. Murdock is the president of Western and MTS, Inc. A.R. Tab 1, page 2; A.R. Tab 9, page 95. This is buttressed by the fact that the creditors who appeared at the hearing on April 30, 1998 expressed a concern that Mr. Murdock would continue to play fast and loose with the bankruptcy system. E.R. Tab 10, page 67. Thus, the record is more than sufficient to enable the Bankruptcy Court to make a finding of bad faith. In no way can this Court conclude that there is no evidence in the record to support the finding of bad faith, as Appellants contend. Appellant’s Opening Brief at 15-16. Neither can this Court conclude, viewing the record as a whole, that it is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made. Therefore, this Court cannot conclude that the finding of bad faith constitutes clear error, and must affirm this finding.

E. The Bankruptcy Court Did not Abuse Its Discretion By Enjoining Murdock Transportation Systems, Inc. From Filing a Voluntary Petition For 365 Days

As was explained above at section VI.B.2., bankruptcy courts have the discretion, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 349(a), to enjoin a debtor from filing a petition in the future for cause. Certainly, where a court has dismissed the case for bad faith, where the Debtor has failed to comply with the reporting requirements of the United States Trustee and where the principal of the Debtor has been alleged to have diverted funds from another estate, it cannot constitute an abuse of discretion for the court to enter the injunction. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion by enjoining MTS, Inc. from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days. Furthermore, the United States Trustee contends that the Court had sufficient cause to enjoin Seth Murdock as well. The United States Trustee acknowledges, however, that he should not be enjoined without having an opportunity to show cause why he should not be subject to such an injunction.

F. Debtor Was Provided Due Process, But It Would Be Appropriate to Remand the Case to Provide Seth Murdock with an Opportunity to Respond Consistent With His Due Process Rights.

The Due Process Clause generally requires that parties be given notice that, under the circumstances, is reasonably calculated to provide adequate notice of the pendency of the hearing and an opportunity to respond. Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust, Co., 339 U.S. 306, 314, 70 S.Ct. 652, 657, 94 L.Ed. 865 (1950), quoted in Walthall v. United States, 131 F.3d 1289, 1294 (9th Cir. 1997). Bankruptcy courts have recognized that due process does not require notice of all possible ramifications of a hearing, but instead is a flexible standard that only requires the procedural protections required by the facts of the case. In re Michigan General Corp., 78 B.R. 479, 485 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1987); In re Petro, 18 B.R. 566, 569 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1982). In fact, the Petro Court specifically found that “due process does not require informing the debtor of all the possible ramifications of a dismissal hearing.” 18 B.R. at 569.

In the instant case, the due process rights of the Debtor were not violated. The Debtor was served with the United States Trustee’s Motion to Dismiss, which requested the imposition of an 180 day bar as to the Debtor, and such other relief as the Court deemed to be appropriate, based on the Debtor’s failure to comply with the reporting requirements of the United States Trustee and its failure to obtain counsel. A.R. Tab 10. These allegations alone are typically sufficient to impose an 180 day bar on the Debtor pursuant to section

Furthermore, Debtor was informed of the pendency of the hearing and of its right to object to the relief requested. A.R. Tab 10, page 106. Debtor, however, failed to so object and failed to have an attorney appear in Court on its behalf pursuant to Former Local Rule 102(7). The fact that the Debtor did not receive express notice that the Bankruptcy Court might make a finding of bad faith did not affect the ability of the Debtor to hire counsel and prepare for the hearing. In fact, Debtor's failure to obtain counsel prevented it from being able to make any arguments at the hearing. Furthermore, the request for such other relief that the Court deemed appropriate was sufficient to put the Debtor on notice that it could be subject to relief such as the relief that was imposed, and that the Court might take notice of other facts that were presented. It certainly was not unreasonable to expect that the Court might exercise its discretion to impose a bar longer than 180 days, given the activity that was alleged to have occurred with respect to the Western case. Therefore, the due process rights of the Debtor were not violated.

The service of the Motion to Dismiss on Seth Murdock

[4] Appellants reliance on Memphis Light, Gas & Water v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 14, 98 S.Ct. 1554, 1563, 56 L.Ed. 2d 30 (1978) is misplaced. In that case, the Supreme Court merely held that where one does not receive notice of one's rights to present objections to the requested relief, the notice is insufficient for due process purposes. 435 U.S. at 14-15, 98 S.Ct. at 1563.

also was sufficient to put him on notice that he might be enjoined from filing a voluntary petition in the future. A.R. Tab 10, page 108. While the Motion did not request this relief, it was reasonable to conclude that it might be imposed since he is the principal of all three debtors. In fact, he had already been subject to injunctive relief with respect to Western and was alleged to have diverted assets from the Western Estate. Therefore, because he was the principal of MTS, Inc., and because the United States Trustee sought to enjoin MTS, Inc., it was not unreasonable for him to conclude that he might be subject to further injunctive relief in this case.

The United States Trustee acknowledges, however, that Seth Murdock did not have an opportunity to respond to the Court’s statement that it was inclined to bar him personally from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days. In fact the Court did not allow him to speak. E.R. Tab 10, page 71, lines 19-20. Therefore, if the Court is not inclined to affirm the Order as it applies to Seth Murdock, the United States Trustee requests that the case be remanded to the Bankruptcy Court to provide Mr. Murdock with an opportunity to show cause why he should not be enjoined from filing a voluntary petition for 365 days from the entry of the Order.

VIII.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the United States Trustee requests that the Court a) affirm the finding of bad faith b) affirm the injunction that is applicable to Murdock Transportation Services, Inc. and c) remand the case to the Bankruptcy Court to provide Seth Murdock an opportunity to show cause why he should not be subject to the injunction.

INTRODUCTION

On July 18, 2006, the Debtors obtained bankruptcy court approval of a self-styled "management incentive plan" (the "MIP"), under which they were authorized to pay more than a million dollars in bonuses to their senior managers and other employees. Both the United States Trustee and the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors have appealed from this order. These appeals assert that the MIP impermissibly circumvents 11 U.S.C. § 503(c), a provision of the Bankruptcy Code restricting payments to insiders, which Congress recently enacted in order to address growing concerns regarding excessive management compensation in corporate bankruptcy cases.

Having paid their senior managers and others several hundred thousands of dollars under the auspices of the bankruptcy court's MIP order, the Debtors now seek to evade appellate review of that order by asserting that the U.S. Trustee's appeal is constitutionally and equitably moot. Both of these arguments are foreclosed by the Third Circuit's decision in United States Trustee v. Official Committee of Equity Security Holders (In re Zenith Electronics Corp.), 329 F.3d 338 (3d Cir. 2003), the facts of which are indistinguishable on all relevant points from the present appeal.

In particular, Zenith forecloses any contention by the Debtors that this appeal is equitably moot. In Zenith, the Third Circuit held that the doctrine of equitable mootness was viable, at most, only in the limited circumstances of an appeal that seeks to unwind a confirmed and substantially consummated plan of reorganization. No such circumstances are presented by this appeal, which involves an order in a pre-confirmation contested matter, and no plan has yet been proposed by the Debtors. As a result, the doctrine of equitable mootness is inapplicable to this appeal as a matter of law.

Zenith also forecloses the Debtors' contention that the U.S. Trustee's appeal is constitutionally moot. Although the Debtors suggest that this appeal no longer presents a case or controversy because the Debtors have already made a distribution of funds under the MIP, this Court may still grant effective relief by ordering the Debtors' managers to disgorge the funds they improperly paid themselves under the MIP, or by ordering the Debtors to take appropriate action to recover any voidable transfers made to other persons. On this point, the facts of this appeal are indistinguishable from Zenith, which held that an appeal of a professional fee award was not constitutionally moot notwithstanding the fact that the professionals, who did not participate in the appeal, had already been paid. Moreover, although the Debtors speculate that the transferees of MIP payments may be able to raise defenses to disgorgement, the mere possibility that such defenses will be raised in a later proceeding is insufficient to render this appeal moot. As a result, this appeal presents a live case or controversy for this Court to determine, and is not constitutionally moot.

Accordingly, the Debtors' motion to dismiss should be denied.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The U.S. Trustee appeals from the Bankruptcy Court's order entered on July 18, 2006, which approved the MIP and authorized payments thereunder up to an aggregate amount of $1.395 million. [A-2][1]. The United States Trustee's notice of appeal was timely filed on July 27, 2006. [A-3]. The Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors appointed in the Debtors' cases has also appealed from the order. [A-4].

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On January 28, 2006, the Debtors filed voluntary petitions for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. The Debtors continue in possession of their properties and are operating and managing their business as debtors and debtors in possession pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a) and 1108.

On April 28, 2006, the Debtors filed their Motion for Entry of an Order Authorizing and Approving Payments Under Management Incentive Plan. [A-1]. In that motion, the Debtors sought authority to implement and make payments under the MIP. The U.S. Trustee and the Committee objected to the MIP motion on grounds that it was a veiled attempt to seek approval of a management retention plan in contravention of recently-enacted section 503(c) of the Bankruptcy Code. Following an evidentiary hearing held on July 10 and 13, 2006, the bankruptcy court granted the MIP Motion by an order dated July 18, 2006. [A-2].

Under the terms of the MIP, nine members of Debtors' senior management received semi-annual bonus payments, purportedly for their assistance in managing the Debtors' reorganization and the resulting additional responsibilities which they assumed. Payments under the MIP were calculated based on the Debtors' financial performance during calendar year 2006. Payments under the MIP commenced shortly after the U.S. Trustee and the Committee filed their notices of appeal, and the Debtors ultimately paid approximately $550,000 under the MIP before the program expired.

Discovery received by the U.S. Trustee and the Committee in connection with the MIP hearing revealed that in March or April, 2006, after the Debtors had filed for bankruptcy, the Debtors implemented a second, previously-undisclosed employee bonus program, which paid the Debtors' employees (including its senior managers) an additional bonus of up to 70% of their base pay. [B-1,2].[2] Although the 2006 bonus plan was not disclosed to the bankruptcy court until the hearing on the MIP in July, 2006, the bankruptcy court approved a modified version of that plan over the objection of the U.S. Trustee on May 14, 2007. [B-3,4,5].

A chapter 11 plan has neither been proposed nor confirmed in the Debtors' bankruptcy cases. The Debtors are presently engaged in an effort to sell substantially all of their operating assets to a third-party purchaser. [B-6].

ARGUMENT

The Debtors offer two arguments in support of their motion to dismiss this appeal. First, the Debtors urge the Court to invoke the doctrine of "equitable mootness" and to dismiss the appeal on the grounds that a reversal of the MIP order would be inequitable. Appellee Br. at 7. Second, the Debtors urge the Court to dismiss this appeal on the grounds of "constitutional mootness" under the theory that because the Debtors have already made MIP payments, the Court cannot vacate the MIP order without violating the due process rights of the MIP beneficiaries, and therefore "there is absolutely no form of relief that this Court could fashion." Id. at 6. Each of these arguments is contrary to controlling precedent of the Third Circuit.

A. The Third Circuit Has Rejected the Doctrine of Equitable Mootness Except in Narrow Circumstances Not Applicable Here

In Zenith, a case decided under a highly similar set of facts to the present appeal, the Third Circuit observed that "when a court has jurisdiction to hear an appeal, it has a 'virtually unflagging obligation' to exercise that jurisdiction." Zenith, 329 F.3d at 347 (quoting Colorado River Water Conservation Dist. v. United States, 424 U.S. 800, 817 (1976)). In keeping with this principle, the Third Circuit clarified that the doctrine of equitable mootness is only "a limited and well-defined exception" to the appellate court's obligation to exercise jurisdiction, which is applicable only to the single, limited circumstance of an appeal that would unravel a confirmed and consummated plan of reorganization. Id. As the Third Circuit observed, > [Equitable mootness] has been carefully developed to apply only in that rare situation in which a successful appeal would undo a complicated reorganization. It would make little sense, in light of this carefully considered doctrine, and in light of our "virtually unflagging obligation" to exercise our jurisdiction, to allow courts to dismiss appeals on the basis of an ad hoc weighing of the equities of a successful appeal.

Id. (emphasis added).

Zenith arose from the U.S. Trustee's appeal of an unstayed order of the bankruptcy court that awarded compensation to professionals retained by an committee of equity security holders. See id. at 341. In the proceedings below, the district court concluded that the U.S. Trustee's appeal was equitably moot, on the exact same grounds that the Debtors now raise in the present case: because the fees awarded to the professionals had already been disbursed, any order requiring them to return such fees would be inequitable. See id. at 342. However, the Third Circuit reversed, holding that the doctrine of equitable mootness was inapplicable and that the district court had abused its discretion by relying on equitable considerations to dismiss an appeal. See id. at 347.

The Debtors do not cite Zenith in their discussion of equitable mootness, but instead rely on the earlier Third Circuit decision of In re Continental Airlines, 91 F.3d 553, 560 (3d Cir. 1996). The decision in Continental, however, involved an appeal that had become moot due to the confirmation of a plan, and much of the test set forth in Continental is meaningless outside the context of a confirmed and consummated plan of reorganization. See, e.g., Continental, 91 F.3d at 560, 565 (holding that "foremost consideration" in determining whether appeal is equitably moot is "whether the reorganization plan has been substantially consummated" and noting that "central animating force" of equitable mootness is importance of encouraging reliance on confirmed reorganization plans). As a result, as Zenith and other subsequent decisions by courts within the Third Circuit have recognized, the test set forth in Continental is simply inapplicable in cases, such as the present appeal, where no plan of reorganization exists. See Zenith, 329 F.3d at 347; see also In re Main, 239 B.R. 59, 73 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1999) (holding that under Continental, "the 'equitable mootness' doctrine has been confined . . . to situations where a party has appealed a bankruptcy order confirming a plan of reorganization").[3]

B. The U.S. Trustee's Appeal Is Not Constitutionally Moot Because an Effective Remedy, Disgorgement, Is Available

In the alternative, the Debtors suggest that the Court should dismiss the U.S. Trustee's appeal on grounds of constitutional mootness. As explained by the Third Circuit in Continental, constitutional mootness arises "only if events have taken place during the pendency of the appeal that make it impossible for the court to grant any effectual relief whatever." Continental, 91 F.3d at 558 (internal citations omitted). Although the MIP payments have already been disbursed, this [3] In arguing that the doctrine of equitable mootness has applicability beyond plan confirmation orders, the Debtors rely on a series of decisions from courts outside the Third Circuit and/or that predate the Third Circuit's decision in Zenith. See Mine Management, Inc. v. Wolfe (In re Mountain Laurel Resources Co.), 2000 WL 341913 (4th Cir. Apr. 3, 2000); Huntington Nat'l Bank v. Shawnee Hills, Inc. (In re Shawnee Hills, Inc.), 2002 WL 31681538 (S.D. W. Va. Nov. 19, 2002); In re Quality Spice Corp., 107 B.R. 843 (D.N.J. 1989). None of these decisions justify a departure from the rule unequivocally expressed by the Third Circuit in Zenith, by which this Court remains bound.

Court can still order effective relief, either through the remedy of disgorgement or through an order compelling the Debtors to commence avoidance actions to recover any transfers made in violation of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 549 (providing that debtor may avoid unauthorized post-petition transfers), In re Kmart Corp., 359 F.3d 866 (7th Cir. 2004) (noting that transfers made under order authorizing payments to critical vendors, which was later reversed, would be recovered for estate through adversary proceedings). In addition, if the MIP payments are found to have been improper, the Debtors may possess claims against any officers or professionals who breached their fiduciary duties in connection with the MIP. See Sample v. Morgan, 914 A.2d 657 (Del. Ch. 2007) (holding, on defendant's motion to dismiss, that shareholder stated claim for breach of fiduciary duty where management allegedly harmed company through improper approval and implementation of management retention plan).

As the Third Circuit and other courts have recognized, where the remedy of disgorgement is available, an appeal is not constitutionally moot. See Zinchiak v. CIT Small Bus. Lending Corp. (In re Zinchiak), 406 F.3d 214, 223 n.10 (3d Cir. 2005) (debtor's appeal of order permitting foreclosure of property was not moot, notwithstanding subsequent foreclosure and sale of property, where debtor could still seek disgorgement from lender); Zenith, 329 F.3d at 340 n.1 ("[B]ecause the Bankruptcy Court can order the Professionals to disgorge the monies requested by the Trustee, the appeal is not constitutionally moot."); see also Focus Media, Inc. v. National Broad. Co. (In re Focus Media, Inc.), 378 F.3d 916, 923 (9th Cir. 2004) (disgorgement of attorney's fees previously paid by bankruptcy estate); Lawrence Athletic Club v. Scroggin (In re Scroggin), 364 B.R. 772, 779 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007) (disgorgement of funds garnished pursuant to bankruptcy court judgment); Rajala v. Hodes (In re Hodes), 289 B.R. 5 (D. Kan. 2003) (disgorgement from attorneys who were permitted to draw down retainers).

Although the Debtors do not dispute that disgorgement is a form of effective relief, they suggest that this appeal is nevertheless moot because the MIP beneficiaries may have various defenses in the event the Debtors are forced to seek disgorgement from them. In particular, the Debtors suggest that the MIP beneficiaries are "faultless" persons who "earned every penny paid to them under the MIP." Appellee Br. at 6. In addition, the Debtors argue that a reversal of the MIP order would violate these beneficiaries' due process rights. See id.[4]

The Debtors' attempt to limit this Court's appellate jurisdiction cannot be reconciled with the Third Circuit's decision in Zenith. That case, like the present appeal, involved an appeal of a bankruptcy contested matter in which the relief sought was the disgorgement of estate funds paid to third parties. If ordering disgorgement would violate the due process rights of the MIP payees in this case, the same would have been true of the third-party payees in Zenith. Moreover, although the Debtors cite Zenith in passing as a case "where the parties to an appeal continued to exist and could be ordered to disgorge monies received under the order on appeal," see Appellee Br. at 6, there is no reason to distinguish Zenith on that basis. As the docket in Zenith indicates, the professionals whose fees were at issue did not file a brief, did not participate in oral argument, and did not otherwise appear in the proceedings before the Third Circuit. [B-7]. The Debtors do not dispute that the MIP payees continue to exist, and there is no reason why their ability to repay improperly received funds should be any different from that of the professionals in Zenith.

[4] Notably, the Debtors do not raise any arguments with respect to their own due process rights, but instead contend only that the reversal would violate the due process rights of the individual recipients of MIP disbursements. The Debtors, however, lack standing to raise due process arguments on behalf of third parties. See United States v. Palma, 760 F.2d 475, 477 (3d Cir. 1985).

By suggesting that the court should dismiss this appeal because of the defenses that their employees might raise in a later proceeding, the Debtors erroneously conflate the issue of mootness with the substantive merits of a hypothetical avoidance action by the Debtors (which is not presently before the Court).[5] In any event, there is no reason to assume (as the Debtors apparently do) that their employees would necessarily prevail on an equitable defense to disgorgement. The principal beneficiaries of the MIP payments are not rank-and-file employees ignorant of the intricacies of bankruptcy litigation, but rather are the highest-ranking members of the Debtors' management. These are the same persons who designed the MIP, made the calculated decision to commence disbursements under the MIP notwithstanding the U.S. Trustee's appeal, and who presumably continue to direct the Debtors' litigation strategy. If these persons are prejudiced by a disgorgement order, it is because of a risk that they willingly assumed.

In any case, the Debtors have failed to demonstrate that disgorgement of any improper MIP payments would violate due process. Notably, the Debtors do not raise any arguments with respect to their own due process rights, but instead contend only that the reversal would violate the due process rights of the individual recipients of MIP disbursements. The Debtors, however, lack standing to raise due process arguments on behalf of third parties. See United States v. Palma, 760 F.2d 475, 477 (3d Cir. 1985).

[5] Indeed, by emphasizing the allegedly faultless nature of the MIP beneficiaries as grounds for dismissal, the Debtors urge this Court to adopt a rule similar to the holding of the Ninth Circuit in S.S. Retail Stores Corp. v. Ekstrom (In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp.), 216 F.3d 882 (9th Cir. 2000). where the court dismissed, as moot, an appeal challenging an attorney fee award in part due to the fact that the attorneys had "performed . . . superbly" and the fact that there was no allegation of wrongdoing. Id. at 885. The Third Circuit, however, expressly rejected the holding in S.S. Retail Stores and has cautioned that such equitable considerations are irrelevant in a determination of mootness. See Zenith, 329 F.3d at 347.

Moreover, the Debtors fail to identify any way in which the due process rights of individual MIP beneficiaries have been violated. The Debtors have vigorously defended the MIP program at the direction of their management (who are themselves beneficiaries of MIP payments). The relief granted by the bankruptcy court was directed to the Debtors, not their individual employees, and no employees have sought to intervene in this matter. Moreover, reversing the bankruptcy court's MIP order will not deprive the MIP payees of their day in court, because the Debtors must still commence an appropriate action under 11 U.S.C § 549 to avoid the unauthorized MIP payments. If such actions are commenced, the MIP payees will have an opportunity to assert defenses to repayment, if any, and will receive all the due process to which they are constitutionally entitled. See, e.g., Kmart, 359 F.3d at 871 (where order authorizing payment to vendors was appealed, beneficiaries who had received payment under order did not have due process right to participate in appeal).

In addition, none of the authorities cited by the Debtors support the proposition that this case should be deemed constitutionally moot because of due process concerns. The principal authority relied on by the Debtors is a Second Circuit decision, Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of LTV Aerospace & Defense Co. v. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of LTV Steel Co. (In re Chateaugay Corp.), 988 F.2d 322, 327 (2d Cir. 1993), in which the court held that an appeal of a bankruptcy court order authorizing the debtor to make pension payments was moot. The court declined to exercise its jurisdiction in that case, however, not because of any due process concern, but rather due to its subjective view that disgorgement would cause "unfair hardship"to the pension beneficiaries, combined with its "strong policies favoring settlement" and other equitable considerations. Id. at 326. In stark contrast, as discussed above, the Third Circuit specifically prohibited use of such factors in Zenith, and it is Zenith, not Chateaugay, that is binding on this

Court.[6]

The remaining cases cited by the Debtors are equally inapposite. Rochman v. Northeast Utilities Service Group (In re Public Service Co.), 963 F.2d 469 (1st Cir. 1992), involved an appeal of a confirmed reorganization plan, in which the court determined both that the appeal was equitably moot and that unwinding the confirmation order was no longer possible. No such circumstance is present here. Evergreen Int'l. Airlines, Inc. v. Pan Am Corp. (In re Pan Am Corp.), No. 94 CIV. 8093 (DLC), 1995 WL 366356 (S.D.N.Y. June 20, 1995), was decided under the rule set forth in Chateaugay, and like Chateaugay relied on equitable rather than constitutional mootness in reaching its result. See id. at *4 (concluding that reversal of order would be "impracticable" and would pose "unfair hardship on faultless beneficiaries"). Credit Alliance Corp. v. Dunning-Ray Insurance Agency, Inc. (In re Blumer), 66 B.R. 109 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1986), supports the U.S. Trustee's argument in this matter, holding that an appeal was not constitutionally moot because the court could order effective relief through disgorgement. See id. at 113. Finally, Carr v. King (In re Carr), 321 B.R. 702 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2005), erroneously cites Blumer for the proposition that a court cannot order disgorgement from a third-party transferee, and further arises from an appeal taken in connection with the final distribution to creditors under a chapter 7 case, a circumstance that is far more analogous to the consummation of a chapter 11 plan rather than to the non-plan-related payments at issue in this appeal. Accordingly, this Court should deny the Debtors' motion to [6] In Chateaugay, the Second Circuit appears to have held that the appeal of the pension order was both equitably and constitutionally moot. See Chateaugay, 988 F.2d at 325. However, the only discussion in the decision relevant to the issue of constitutional mootness was the Second Circuit's observation that a second order of the bankruptcy court, which was not appealed, also required the debtors to make the same payments. See id. at 327. The Debtors do not allege that any comparable circumstance is present in this case.
