Thus, in In re Feinstein Family Partnership, 247 B.R. 502 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2000), the court denied the Chapter 7 trustee's motion to sell the debtor's real property free and clear of liens, refusing to allow the trustee to act as liquidating agent for a secured creditor in selling property to the creditor upon a credit bid, where there was no equity in the property. In so ruling , the court in Feinstein stated, "It is now almost universally recognized that where the estate has no equity in a property, abandonment is virtually always appropriate because no unsecured creditor could benefit from the administration. Id. at 507; see In re Landreneau, 74 B.R. 13, 14 (Bankr. W.D. La. 1987) (court held that trustee could not sell property in which there was no equity by "offset bid", whereby secured creditor would bid amount of secured debt owed to creditor plus administrative expenses); see also In re Williamson, 94 B.R. at 963 (Chapter 7 trustee's expenses in selling property could not be reimbursed as "necessary expenses" pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 506(c), where it was apparent at the time of sale that no potential equity existed for the estate).

Similarly, the courts have held that a Chapter 7 trustee is not entitled to compensation on the sale of fully secured property in bankruptcy cases. See In re Lambert Implement Co., 44 B.R. 860

2/ Abandonment of such property is necessary for the trustee to avoid exposing the estate or the trustee to liability for damages resulting from the retention of the property, see In re Reich, 54 B.R. 995 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1985), or to liability for any taxes resulting from the gain realized on the sale of estate property. See In re Bentley, 916 F.2d 431 (8th Cir. 1990).

(Bankr. W.D. Ky. 1984); In re B & L Enterprises, Inc., 26 B.R. 220, 223 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 1982); In re Truitt, 15 B.R. 169, 170 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 1981); see also In re Lan Associates XI, L.P., 192 F.3d 109, 119-120 (3d Cir. 1999) (value of credit bid could not be included in base on which Chapter 7 trustee's compensation was calculated, where credit bid more closely resembled an abandonment or turning over of property to secured creditor rather than sale to third party). In Lambert Implement Co., the court held in 14 bankruptcy cases consolidated for purposes of hearing that trustees are not entitled to collect statutory commissions on sales of fully secured property, where secured creditors were to receive all or substantially all of the funds in the hands of the trustees after payment of the trustees' commissions and expenses of sale, in absence of sound and documented reasons for proceeding with the disposition of properties in expectation of a benefit to unsecured creditors. 44 B.R. at 861. In so holding, the court cited to a policy statement of the Administrative Office of United States Courts ("AOUSC"), which provided as follows:

> ... the trustee as representative of the estate should not (under usual circumstances) be engaging in activities such as the sale of fully secured property where there is no potential equity for general unsecured creditors and with the trustee enhancing his compensation with no corresponding benefit to the general estate...
> Aside from abandonment, where there will be no equity for general creditors, there is a substantial problem which the court should put a quick end to, when the trustee appears to be acting in his own self-interest rather than in the interest of the estate.

[3/] This same policy is still in effect in jurisdictions which are not subject to case administration by the United States Trustee Program, i.e., the districts of Alabama and North Carolina. See Trustee and Estate Administration Oversight Manual for Bankruptcy Administrators, Bankruptcy Division, Administrative Office of United States Courts, Volume II, § 22.03(d), at E-41, a true copy of which is attached as Exhibit "A" to the Declaration of William L. Courshon in Support of U.S. Trustee's Objection to Trustee's Motion for Authority to List and Sell Property ("Declaration"). The policy

In the instant case, there is no equity in the debtor's property. The proposed sale of such property by the Chapter 7 Trustee would benefit only the IRS and other secured creditors to the extent of their secured claims, as well as the Trustee himself, and would result in no benefit to the estate. For the foregoing reasons, the trustee's motion for authority to list and sell the property should be denied, and the Trustee should be required to abandon such property.

B. THE TRUSTEE SHOULD NOT BE PERMITTED TO SUBORDINATE THE IRS'S TAX LIEN TO ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSE CLAIMS PURSUANT TO 11 U.S.C. § 724(b), WHERE THE SALE OF PROPERTY SUBJECT TO TAX LIEN DOES NOT BENEFIT THE ESTATE AND RESULTS IN PAYMENT OF ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES ASSOCIATED ONLY WITH THE SALE.

Although there is no equity in the debtor's real property, the Trustee intends to rely on 11 U.S.C. § 724(b) to subordinate the IRS's tax lien to the trustee's administrative expenses incurred in connection with the sale of the property.

Title 11 U.S.C. § 724(b) provides as follows:

> (b) Property in which the estate has an interest and that is subject to a lien that is not avoidable under this title and that secures an allowed claim for a tax, or proceeds of such property, shall be distributed–
> (1) first, to any holder of an allowed claim secured by a lien on such property that is not avoidable under this title and that is senior to such tax lien;
> (2) second, to any holder of a claim of a kind specified in section 507(a)(1), 507(a)(2), 507(a)(3), 507(a)(4), 507(a)(5), 507(a)(6), or 507(a)(7) of this title, to the extent of the amount of such allowed tax claim that is secured by such tax lien;

of the AOUSC is fully consistent with the policy of the United States Trustee Program with respect to the sale of fully secured property by Chapter 7 trustees, as set forth in the Handbook for Chapter 7 Trustees, Executive Office for United States Trustees, Chapter 8, ¶ K.4, at 8-20, a true copy of which is attached as Exhibit "B" to the Declaration.

> (3) third, to the holder of such tax lien, to the extent that such holder's allowed tax claim that is secured by such tax lien exceeds any amount distributed under paragraph (2) of this subsection;
> (4) fourth, to any holder of an allowed claim secured by a lien on such property that is not avoidable under this title and that is junior to such tax lien;
> (5) fifth, to the holder of such tax lien, to the extent that such holder's allowed claim secured by such tax lien is not paid under paragraph (3) of this subsection; and
> (6) sixth, to the estate.

11 U.S.C. § 724(b). Section 724(b) provides for the subordination of tax liens to administrative expense claims and other priority unsecured claims under 11 U.S.C. § 507(a), except for priority tax claims under § 507(a)(8) and priority claims under § 507(a)(9) for obligations to a government agency for the debtor's failure to maintain the capital of an insured depository institution. The Trustee states incorrectly that "[t]he purpose of this statute, indeed the only rationale for this statute, is to encourage trustees to collect taxes." See Trustee's Response to Motion to Compel Abandonment, Objection to Exemptions, and Motion for Authority to List and Sell Property, at 2, ll. 11-12.

The legislative history of § 724(b) sets forth Congress's intent in enacting the provision as part of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 as follows:

> Subsection (b) governs tax liens. It is derived from section 67c(3) of the Bankruptcy Act, without substantial modification in result. It subordinates tax liens to administrative expense and wage claims, and solves certain circuity of liens problems that arise in connection with the subordination. The order of distribution of property subject to a tax lien is as follows: First, to holders of liens senior to the tax liens; second, to administrative expenses, wage claims, and consumer creditors > that are granted priority,[4] but only to the extent of the amount of allowed tax claim secured by the lien. In other words, the priority claims step into the shoes of the tax collector. Third, to the tax claimant, to the extent that priority claimants did not use up his entire claim. Fourth, to junior lien holders. Fifth, to the tax collector to the extent that he was not paid under paragraph (3). Finally, any remaining property goes to the estate. The result of these provisions are to leave senior and junior lienors and holders of unsecured claims undisturbed. If there are any liens that are equal in status to the tax lien, they share pari passu with the tax lien under the distribution provisions of this subsection. [Footnote added.]

H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 382 (1977). Thus, § 724(b) was derived from § 67c(3) of the Chandler Act of 1938, which introduced to the Bankruptcy Act the concept of subordination of certain statutory liens to certain priority claims, i.e., claims for wages and administrative expenses. See In re Darnell, 834 F.2d 1263, 1266 (6th Cir. 1987). In 1966, Section 67c(3) was amended, and the legislative history for that amendment provides as follows:

> ...The committee believes that if the policy of the Chandler Act to protect the costs of administration and wages is to be given effect, it is necessary to postpone to the costs of administration and wages at least those tax liens which are on personal property and are unaccompanied by possession.[5] It would be grossly unfair for the bankruptcy court and the attorneys who have labored to wind up the bankrupt's affairs and to accumulate an estate for distribution to receive nothing for their labor. It is also socially desirable that the claims of the wage earner who is normally entirely dependent upon his wages for the necessity of life should be paid to the extent of the restriction in Section 64a(2) before the estate is subject to the heavy burden of all tax liens. [Footnote added; emphasis added.]

[4] Section 724(b) was subsequently amended in 1984, 1986, and 1994 to incorporate additional priority claims that have been added under § 507(a). See 6 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 724.LH.[3], at 724-20 - 724-21 (Lawrence P. King ed., 15th ed. rev. 2000).

[5] In the 1978 Bankruptcy Code, the policy of postponement or subordination of tax liens was continued and expanded, since § 724(b) applies to real property liens as well as tax liens on personal property, and it contains no requirement that the property be unaccompanied by possession. See In re Granite Lumber Co., 63 B.R. at 471.

H.R. Rep. No. 686, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. (1965), U.S. Code & Admin. News at 2442, 2462, quoted in In re Granite Lumber Co., 63 B.R. 466, 470-471 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1986); see also In re Darnell, 834 F.2d at 1266.

Thus, the legislative history for § 724(b) evidences that the purpose of this statute is not to encourage trustees to collect taxes on behalf of governmental taxing agencies, as the Trustee submits, but rather to the contrary. The policy of § 724(b) (and of its predecessor, § 67c(3) of the Bankruptcy Act) is to insure payment of preexisting and outstanding administrative expense claims (incurred for the benefit of the estate), wage claims, and other priority unsecured claims, at the expense of the lien claims of such taxing agencies.

In the case of In re Kerton Industrial, 151 B.R. 101 (E.D. Mich. 1991), the bankruptcy court entered an order authorizing the Chapter 7 trustee to sell certain fully encumbered real and personal property and to subordinate a real property tax lien to the trustee's administrative expenses associated only with the sale of the property, where there were no outstanding and preexisting administrative expenses. On appeal, the district court reversed the bankruptcy court's ruling and held that the tax lien could not be subordinated under § 724(b) where the sale of fully encumbered property did not result in any benefit to the estate, and the only priority claims that were to be paid as a result of such subordination were administrative claims incurred solely in connection with the sale. The court held that subordination pursuant to § 724(b) requires a benefit to the estate and is not proper when the sale proceeds do not go to pay any preexisting and outstanding administrative claims. See In re Kerton Industrial, 151 B.R. at 103; see also In re Prairie Mining, Inc., 194 B.R. 248, 252 (Bankr. D. Kan. 1995); 6 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 724.03[4][c], at 724-14 - 724-15 (Lawrence P. King ed., 15th ed.

rev. 2000). In so holding, the court in Kerton stated, "Obviously, a sale which pays only expenses incurred as a result of the sale does not benefit the estate whatsoever." 151 B.R. at 103. The court also cited to the policy of the United States Trustee Program against the sale of fully secured assets as set forth in the Handbook for Chapter 7 Trustees of the Executive Office for United States Trustees. See id.; Declaration, Exhibit "B".

In contrast with Kerton, a case illustrating the proper application of § 724(b) is In re K.C. Machine & Tool Co., 816 F.2d 238 (6th Cir. 1987). In K.C. Machine, although the property in question was fully secured, the case had been converted from Chapter 11 to Chapter 7, and the estate had incurred substantial administrative expenses in the Chapter 11 case, including postpetition debts due to 35 trade creditors. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit held that subordination under § 724(b) was appropriate because administration of the property in that case resulted in a benefit to the estate, where the sale of the property secured a fund equal to the amount of the tax liens, in excess of $156,000, to pay Chapter 11 administrative creditors. 816 F.2d at 246. The court further concluded that compelled abandonment was not available where administration promised a benefit to the estate by virtue of § 724(b). Id. at 247.

The court's holdings in both Kerton and K.C. Machine are fully consistent with the legislative purpose of § 724(b), i.e., that subordination of tax liens under that provision is intended for payment of preexisting and outstanding administrative expenses, wages, and other priority claims, as opposed to administrative expenses arising solely in connection with the sale of fully secured property without any benefit to the estate.

In the instant case, like Kerton, and unlike K.C. Machine, the Trustee proposes to sell fully secured property without any benefit to the estate and to subordinate the IRS's tax lien to pay administrative expenses arising solely in connection with the property sale. The subordination of the IRS's tax lien in this case to pay the Trustee's administrative expenses, i.e., his fees and expenses incurred solely in connection with the sale, are contrary to the legislative purpose of § 724(a), as well as applicable legal authority. For the foregoing reasons, the Trustee should not be permitted to subordinate the IRS's tax lien pursuant to § 724(b), where only the Trustee, the IRS, and other secured creditors would benefit from the Trustee's proposed actions.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the U.S. Trustee respectfully requests that this Court enter an order denying the Trustee's Motion for Authority to List and Sell Property and granting the debtor's Motion to Compel Trustee to Abandon Property.

DATED this ______ day of June, 2001.

Respectfully submitted,

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin has jurisdiction over the underlying case, initiated by Marvin Ross-Tousey and Deborah Tousey on August 18, 2006, by their filing of a voluntary petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code,[1] 11 U.S.C. §§ 701, et seq. See also 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b), 1334(a).

On December 11, 2006, the bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) for abuse. This appeal is taken from a final order that court entered on December 14, 2006, denying the United States Trustee's motion. The United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from that order under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on December 20, 2006.[2] This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

[1] As used herein, the term "Bankruptcy Code" refers to 11 U.S.C. §§ 101 - 1529, et seq.

[2] Congress has authorized the United States Attorney General to appoint 21 United States trustees, each to serve in a specific geographic region of the United States. See generally 28 U.S.C. § 581, et seq. (establishing the United States Trustee Program). The United States trustees are senior officials of the Department of Justice. Id. The United States trustees "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within his or her region through the exercise of a range of oversight responsibilities. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3). See generally Morganstern v. Revco D.C. Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990) (explaining that United States trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law.). United States trustees may raise, appear, and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under Title 11. 11 U.S.C. § 307; See also In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d at 499-500 (upholding broad appellate standing of United States trustees).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

The United States Trustee sought dismissal of these Debtors' chapter 7 case on two alternative grounds, (a) because the Debtors failed § 707(b)(2)'s means test and, (b) presuming the Debtors passed the means test, because the Debtors' case constituted an abuse under § 707(b)(3)(B)'s totality of the circumstances test. Given this, the issues presented to this Court for determination are whether the court below:

1. erred by ruling as a matter of law that the Debtors could claim an "automobile ownership expense" for debt financing that took the Debtors outside section 707(b)(2)'s statutory means test even though these Debtors had no "automobile ownership expense" because they owned their cars debt-free; or, if the Debtors passed the means test,

2. erred by limiting the "totality of the circumstances" analysis to the income and expenses reported by the Debtors on their B22A Form B22A, when in denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Debtors' bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) the uncontroverted facts showed that, based on their actual income and expenses, the Debtors have significant monthly disposable income available to repay creditors ?

Should this Court determine the court below erred on either ground, this Court should reverse and remand for adjudication of the motion to dismiss on its merits.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The bankruptcy court's findings on "[b]oth questions of law and mixed questions of law and fact are reviewed de novo." Mungo v. Taylor, 355 F.3d 969, 974 (7th Cir. 2004) (citing In re Ebbler Furniture and Appliances, Inc., 804 F.2d 87, 89 (7th Cir. 1986)). The bankruptcy court's factual findings are reviewed for clear error. In re Doctors Hosp. Of Hyde Park, Inc., ---- F.3d ----, 2007 WL 79701 (7th Cir. Jan. 12, 2007); In re Crivello, 134 F.3d 831, 835 (7th Cir. 1998); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013.

> [A] judge abuses his discretion when his decision is based on an erroneous conclusion of law or where the record contains no evidence on which he rationally could have based that decision, . . . or where the supposed facts found are clearly erroneous as found.

Deitchman v. E.R. Squibb & Sons, Inc., 740 F.2d 556, 563-564 (7th Cir. 1984) (citation omitted).

Whether the bankruptcy court properly allowed Debtors to deduct an ownership expense under the means test when they had no loan or lease payment is a question of law and is therefore subject to de novo review. Whether the bankruptcy court properly limited its analysis of Debtors' income and expenses to those contained in their B22A Form B22A in considering the totality of the circumstances in Debtors' case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) is also question of law subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On August 18, 2006, Marvin and Deborah Ross-Tousey (the "Debtors") filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 2).[3] On October 30, 2006, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), asserting that it would be an abuse of chapter 7 to grant the Debtors a discharge. (R. 7).

The United States Trustee's motion was based, first, on the statutory presumption, codified under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), that granting the Debtors a chapter 7 discharge is an abuse of chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code when the Debtors have sufficient disposable income to repay their unsecured creditors at least $166.67 per month. In particular, the United States Trustee argued that under the objective formula used to determine whether a chapter 7 debtor has an ability to pay and the bankruptcy case is therefore presumptively abusive, the Debtors could not qualify for an expense allowance for vehicles referred to as vehicle "ownership costs" under the Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service. This expense standard, the United States Trustee asserted, does not apply to the Debtors who are not making a monthly loan or lease payments because they own their vehicles free and clear of liens.

In the alternative, the United States Trustee argued that if the presumption of abuse did not arise or the Debtors rebutted the presumption, the case should be dismissed under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) because the totality of the circumstances surrounding the Debtors' financial situation, including having significant actual monthly disposable income demonstrated abuse.

On December 11, 2006, after an evidentiary hearing, the bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the case as a presumed abuse of chapter 7, concluding consistent with the court's prior decision in an earlier chapter 13 case, In re Grunert, 353 B.R. 591 (Bankr.E.D. Wis. 2006), that 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) authorized all debtors who own a vehicle, including the Debtors, to reduce their current monthly income by the IRS Local Transportation Expense Standard that the IRS allows for vehicle financing costs. The bankruptcy court also concluded, after limiting its analysis of Debtors' ability to pay to the expenses and income that were provided on Debtors' Form B22A, that under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation did not demonstrate abuse. The United States Trustee timely filed this appeal.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. Statutory Framework

On October 17, 2005, most provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (the "BAPCPA"), S. 256, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, took effect, implementing significant changes to the Bankruptcy Code. As part of this effort, Congress amended § 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, which governs dismissal of chapter 7 bankruptcy cases. Congress enacted the § 707(b) amendments to curb bankruptcy abuse by, inter alia, dismissing cases filed by chapter 7 debtors who seek discharge of their debts despite having the ability to repay their creditors. See 151 Cong. Rec. S1856 (Mar. 1, 2005) (statement of Sen. Charles Grassley). Senator Grassley explained the purpose behind the BAPCPA amendments, "It is this simple: if repayment is possible, then [a debtor] will be channeled into chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code which requires people to repay a portion of their debt . . . ." Id.

As it existed prior to BAPCPA, § 707(b) only authorized dismissal based on a finding that allowing the debtor relief constituted a "substantial abuse" of chapter 7. Further, § 707(b) prior to its amendment by BAPCPA required courts to presume that a debtor was entitled to relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 707(b) now authorizes dismissal where the court finds that the granting of relief would be an "abuse" of chapter 7. As amended by the BAPCPA, § 707(b)(2) repealed the former presumption and replaced it with a new presumption: a case is an "abuse" of chapter 7 if a detailed mathematical formula set out in the statute, commonly referred to as the "means test," yields a minimum amount of monthly disposable income.

The means test uses a series of calculations to determine whether the § 707(b)(2) presumption of abuse arises. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A). Specifically, the means test calculates a debtor's current monthly income, as defined under 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A) (hereafter "CMI"), based on the debtor's average income for the six calendar months preceding the month of the bankruptcy filing. If the debtor's CMI is above the applicable state median family income, as is the case here, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A) calculates the debtor's monthly disposable income available to repay creditors by reducing the CMI by certain categories of expenses identified in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv). If a debtor's monthly disposable income, calculated by reducing the CMI by allowed expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) - (iv), is less than $100 per month (or $6,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does not arise. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i). If the debtor's monthly disposable income is equal to or exceeds $167 per month (or $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does arise. Id. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is between $100 and $167 per month (between $6,000 and $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse arises if the disposable income, over 60 months, is sufficient to pay 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured debt. Id.

Each debtor with primarily consumer debts is required to file, in conjunction with their bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs, a Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation, Official Form B22A ("Form B22A"). 11 U.S.C.

§ 521 and § 707(b)(2)(C). In Chapter 7 cases the main purpose of the Form B22A is to calculate monthly disposable income (ability to pay) following the formula set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), and determine whether the presumption of abuse arises.

If no presumption of abuse arises under § 707(b)(2) based on the means test, or if the presumption is rebutted under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B) by the debtor by demonstrating special circumstances that justify income or expense adjustments for which there is no reasonable alternative, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) directs courts to consider whether the case should nonetheless be dismissed as an "abuse" of chapter 7. In particular, the court "shall consider" whether the case was filed in "bad faith," 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or whether "the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation . . . demonstrates abuse," 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B).

Accordingly, §§ 707(b)(2) and (b)(3) provide distinct and separate bases upon which the court may determine that a chapter 7 case is abusive: first, by presuming the case is an abuse based on the means test, or second, in cases where the presumption does not arise or is rebutted by finding that the case is an abuse of chapter 7 based upon bad faith or upon the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation.

II. Factual Background

1. The Debtors are married with no dependents. (R. 1-12).
2. Debtors are both employed at the Mohican North Star Casino and have been so employed for approximately 13 years. (R. 1-48, p. 21).

3. Relative to their motor vehicles, on line 22 of their Form B22A, the Debtors included a deduction of $358 for "transportation vehicle operation" expense. (R. 1-3). This expense amount, for two or more vehicles, is taken from the IRS Transportation Standards, Operating Costs and Public Transportation Costs, published by the IRS.

4. On Lines 23 & 24 of the Form B22A the Debtors took deductions of $471 and $332, respectively, for a "transportation ownership/lease expense." (R. 1-3). This expense amount is taken from the IRS Transportation Standards, Ownership Costs, which are published by the IRS. Thus, the Debtors claimed a total transportation expense for their vehicles of $1,161 per month.

5. The Debtors do not have a monthly payment obligation with respect to the vehicles. (R. 1-12, Schedules D & J).

6. The United States Trustee recalculated the Debtors' monthly disposable income by: (a) eliminating the $471 and $332 deductions on lines 23 and 24; and (b) allowing the Debtors an additional transportation vehicle operating expense of $400 on account of the age of two vehicles (for a total operating expense of $758 on line 22).[4] Under the United States Trustee's calculations, the Debtors' monthly disposable income was $260.50, which when multiplied by 60, substantially exceeds $10,000 and the presumption of abuse therefore arises.

[4] The Debtors' vehicles include a 1989 Dodge minivan, 1969 Chevrolet truck, 1986 Ford truck, 1994 Ford wagon, 1996 Geo Metro, and a 1993 Pontiac Bonneville . (R1-12, Schedule B, Question 25). The United States Trustee allows an additional $200 operating expense under the means test for each debtor who owns a vehicle, six years or older or with more than 75,000 miles, based on the Internal Revenue Manual which allows such an additional vehicle operating expense. See Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5, (entitled Collecting Process), Chapter 8, § 5.8.5.5.2, Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses, which may be found at the IRS website at http://www/irs/gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html.

7. On their bankruptcy schedules I and J, the Debtors stated the following:

   a. Schedule I - Current Income of individual Debtor(s): Debtors list gross income of $2,338.40 and $2,623.00, respectively; in addition to standard withholdings Debtors deduct $86.00 for a 401K contribution from Mr. Ross-Tousey's income, and $20.00 for a 401K contribution and $50 for a tribal loan repayment from Mrs. Ross-Tousey's income. Mrs. Ross-Tousey also receives a per-capita distribution of $292.33. The total combined net income scheduled is $3,618.88 . (R. 1-12, Schedule I).

   b. Schedule J - Current Expenditures of Individual Debtor(s): Debtors list expenses including $600 for home maintenance; $500 for transportation; $155.82 for a time share; $42.39 for a vacuum cleaner payment; and $500 for replacement vehicle. The net monthly income scheduled is <50.83>. (R. 1-12, Schedule J).

8. On October 30, 2006, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the Debtors' bankruptcy case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1). (R. 1-7, 1-8).

9. On December 11, 2006, the bankruptcy court held an evidentiary hearing on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, during which Mrs. Ross-Tousey testified.

10. Mrs. Ross-Tousey testified that since the time of filing, both her and her husband's income had increased. (R. 1-48, p. 23).

11. Mrs. Ross-Tousey testified that at the time of filing Debtors intended to surrender both their time share and vacuum cleaner/air purifier, and that the last payments on the vacuum cleaner/air purifier and time share were made pre-petition in August and September 2006, respectively. (R. 1-48, pp. 28-29).

12. Mrs. Ross-Tousey admitted that Debtors had not been making any payments for approximately $1,300 in monthly expenses listed on Schedule J for: home repairs ($600); vehicle replacement ($500); time share ($155.82); and vacuum cleaner/air purifier ($42.37). (R. 1-48, pp. 28-29, 35-36).

13. Mrs. Ross-Tousey testified Debtors had saved $2,000 since filing but had not begun any repairs on their home nor replaced any of their vehicles. (R. 1-48, 36-38).

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The court below erred in denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss this bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) and under § 707(b)(3)(B). Under § 707(b)(2), a debtor's cases is presumed abusive as a matter of law and must be dismissed absent special circumstances if the debtor fails § 707(b)(2)'s statutory "means test." Here the Debtors would have failed the means test but for the bankruptcy court's legal ruling, based on its earlier decision in In re Grunert, that the Debtors could claim an "automobile ownership expense" for vehicle debt financing even though the Debtors had no vehicle financing expense because they owned their vehicles debt-free. Whether Debtors can take such imaginary deductions under Congress' 2005 amendment to § 707 is an important question of law that arises relatively frequently in chapter 7 bankruptcy cases. This Court is one of the first appellate courts to consider it.

The bankruptcy court erred as a matter of law by misinterpreting the automobile debt financing allowance. In its application of the means test, the bankruptcy court interpreted § 707(b)(2) to allow the Debtors to subtract expenses that they do not incur on a monthly basis. Even though the Debtors do not make monthly payments to purchase or lease a car, the bankruptcy court ruled that in addition to a monthly car operating expenses allowance of $358, the Debtors were also entitled to subtract a monthly expense of $471 for car one and $332 for car two (totaling $803) in calculating Debtors' monthly disposable income. These additional "imaginary" expenses correspondingly reduced the Debtors' monthly disposable income under the means test by $403.[5] Allowing the Debtors to subtract ownership costs even though they have no applicable vehicle financing expenses stands the means test on its head, eliminating disposable income otherwise reported on Official Form B22A of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure and available to repay creditors.

After disallowing a car financing expense the Debtors do not actually incur, the Debtors' monthly disposable income under the means test is $260.50 which is well above the $166.67 threshold amount, and the presumption of abuse arises. This case must therefore be remanded to the bankruptcy court for further evidentiary proceedings in accordance with § 707(b)(2), including allowing debtors an opportunity to try and rebut the presumption by demonstrating that special circumstances that justify an income or expense adjustment.[6]

Alternatively, the bankruptcy court erred by determining that the Debtors' filing was not an abuse based on the "totality of the circumstances" under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). The bankruptcy court improperly restricted consideration of the Debtors' ability to pay to the amounts contained on Debtors' Form B22A, when there was evidence that certain expenses

[5] When the United States Trustee recalculated the Debtors' Form B22A monthly disposable income, an additional $200 operating expense was allowed under the means test for each Debtor's primary vehicle. See fn. 6, supra.

[6] It is premature to address the merits of a special circumstances rebuttal argument. However, some bankruptcy courts have ruled that extraordinary transportation expenses can constitute special circumstances that justify an expense adjustment that rebuts the presumption of abuse, while other courts would not consider these type of expense adjustments to qualify as special circumstances. Compare In re Pederson, 2006 WL 3000104, at *3-4 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 2006) with In re Johns, 342 B.R. 626, 628-29 (Bankr. E.D. Okla.2006).

on the Form B22A did not reflect the reasonably anticipated expenses they actually incur on a monthly basis. Thus, the bankruptcy court must be reversed and the case remanded to the bankruptcy court for consideration of the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) based on the totality of the circumstances, including the Debtors' actual ability to repay their debts.

ARGUMENT

I. Pursuant to the Plain Language of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), Interpretive Case Law and Legislative Intent, the IRS Local Standard for Vehicle Acquisition Is Not Applicable to Debtors Who Do Not Have Monthly Loan or Lease Payments.

On Lines 23 and 24 of their Official Form B22A, which is an official form of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, the Debtors claimed allowances for the IRS Local Standard referred to as vehicle ownership costs, even though they own their vehicles free and clear of liens. (R. 1-3). In denying the United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss, the bankruptcy court allowed the Debtors to reduce their Current Monthly Income ("CMI") by the IRS Standard for vehicle financing costs for two vehicles, $471 for car one and $332 for car two, even though Debtors do not have any monthly payment obligation associated with the vehicles. Because this holding is contrary to the plain language and legislative intent of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), it must be reversed.

A. The Plain Language of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) Limits the IRS Local Standards, Including the Local Standard Referred to as Vehicle Ownership Cost, to Debtors for Whom the Expense is "Applicable"

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's "applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The plain language of the statute thus specifically provides that before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense itself must first be applicable to the debtor.

As recently stated by the court in In re Devilliers, ---- B.R. ----, 2007 WL 92504 (Bankr. E.D. La. January 9, 2007), by using the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom the expenses actually apply. Only after "a determination is made as to the type of expenses allowed and applicable to the debtor" may the debtor claim the amount set forth under the IRS Local Transportation Standards. In re Devilliers, 2007 WL 92504 at *6 (Bankr. E.D. La. January 9, 2007). See also In re Wiggs, ---- B.R. ----, 2006 WL 2246432, *2-3 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006) (in application of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in context of § 1325 of the Bankruptcy Code, court finds that the statute is "clear and unambiguous," and that the "term 'applicable' modifies the amounts specified to limit the expenses to only those that apply," such that debtors were not allowed to include the standard ownership expense for transportation ownership when they did not have a payment on the vehicle). Accord In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 904 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006).[7]

Thus, the plain language of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) specifically provides a two-step process for bankruptcy courts to employ before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses. First, the debtor must be eligible to claim the expense category, that is, the expense itself must be applicable to the debtor. Second, if the expense is applicable to the debtor, then the specified amount for the debtor's locale is selected from the IRS Local Standards. Thus, a plain reading of the statute leads to the conclusion that Congress necessarily restricted each of the categories of expense allowances in that section, including the IRS Local Standards for transportation, to those debtors for whom such expenses apply.

[7] Demonica is relied on by the bankruptcy court in In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414 (Bankr.D.Del. 2006), a case that is cited and relied upon by the court below in its Grunert decision. The Fowler court misconstrues In re Demonica. In fact, In re Demonica like the In re Wiggs decision, held that a loan or lease payment was required in order to qualify for the IRS Transportation Ownership Cost expense Standard. The Demonica Court allowed the debtor to take an expense adjustment because the debtor in that case established that he actually made payments on the vehicle at issue, even though he did not have a contractual liability on the vehicle loan. In re Demonica, 345 B.R. at 905.

B. The Internal Revenue Service's Application of Its Own Local Standard for Vehicle Acquisition Costs, and Interpretive Case Law, Support the United States Trustee's Reading of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

To determine whether the expense standards issued by the IRS are applicable, the most logical resource to consult is the source of the expense standards, the IRS. On page two of its Collection Financial Standards under the heading "Transportation," the IRS provides as follows:

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs . . . . The ownership costs provide maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense . . . . If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

See IRS Collection Standards (emphasis added), available at ww.irs.gov/individuals/article/0,,id=96543,00.html; see also Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

Thus, according to the IRS, if the debtor does not have a loan or lease payment obligation, then the Local Standard referred to as vehicle ownership costs is not "applicable." If the debtor's vehicle is subject to a monthly loan or lease payment obligation, however, then in addition to the vehicle "operating cost" expense, the "ownership cost" is also "applicable," and shall be the dollar amount specified by the IRS. This application of the means test is supported by the significant bankruptcy court authority.[8]

The court below, in its Grunert decision, which was followed without discussion in this case, concurred with the courts in In re Farrar-Johnson and In re Fowler in drawing a distinction between "applicable" and "actual" expenses. In particular, citing Farrar-Johnson, the court stated in Grunert:

> Congress drew a distinction in the statute between 'applicable' expenses on the one hand and actual' expenses on the other. "Other Necessary Expenses" must be debtor's "actual" expenses. Expenses under the "Local Standards," in contrast, need only be those "applicable" to the debtor–because of where he lives and how large his household is. It makes no difference whether he "actually" has them."

Grunert, 353 B.R. at 593 (citing In re Farrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. at 230-231). This reasoning was recently considered and appropriately rejected by the bankruptcy court in In re Slusher, ---- B.R. ----, 2007 WL 118009 (Bankr. D. Nev. January 17, 2007).

As explained by the Slusher court, when Congress developed the means test, it "could have started from scratch, and created a system that was rigid but easy to administer, such as how many view workers' compensation or social security schemes." Id. at *12. Instead, Congress "incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code an existing, administrative system that the IRS had long had in place." Id. This incorporation "strongly suggests that courts should look to how the IRS determined those standards; that is, as to how the IRS would have applied them in similar circumstances." Id. at * 14. Thus, "if guidance is sought on the meaning of the IRS standards Congress incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code, practical reason would suggest that court should consider the full manner by which the IRS uses these standards." Id.

The Slusher court also considered and rejected the notion entertained by some courts, e.g. In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006), and used by the court below in its incorporation of the In re Grunert conclusions, that considering IRS practice in interpreting "applicable" expenses in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would negate the section's later allowance of "actual" monthly expenses in the IRS categories of Other Necessary Expenses. As the Slusher court correctly explained, "a natural reading" of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) indicates that the words "actual" and "applicable" limit the relevant expense deductions in different ways. In re Slusher, ---- B. R. ----, 2006 WL 118009 at *13. The Slusher Court stated:

> [O]ne is a limitless deduction within the specified categories of Other Necessary Expenses, and the other is a deduction limited to the amount and type specified by the IRS. Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to read, "The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the monthly amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards . . ." rather than "The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expenses amounts specified under the National and Local Standards." This distinction may not appear from the dictionary definitions of both terms, but it did, and does, belong to the IRS' historical and practical use of those standards at the time Congress adopted BAPCPA. In referring to such specialized standards, it would be quite odd if Congress intended to preclude courts from examining the context in which the authoring agency, the IRS, used and employed those standards."

Id. (emphasis in original; citation omitted).

In addition to the IRS Collection Financial Standards themselves, the IRS also publishes guidelines, including the Internal Revenue Manual, that support a reading of § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) that requires debtors to have an actual loan or lease payment obligation on a vehicle before the Local Standard referred to as ownership cost "applies." Recent revisions to the Collection Financial Standards also make clear that the "ownership cost" is calculated by the IRS based on the "five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors." See IRS Collection Financial Standards cited above (at section entitled "Recent Revisions"). As such, the "ownership cost" is intended to account for the reasonable expense of financing a vehicle over five years and is inapplicable if a debtor has no such acquisition financing expense.

Accordingly, guidance in applying its expense standards published by the IRS make clear that the "ownership cost" portion of the Local Transportation Standards is intended to apply only in situations where the debtor has a monthly vehicle acquisition financing expense, i.e., has a monthly vehicle lease or loan payment. Cf. McGuire, 342 B.R. at 613 ("Thus, if a debtor is not incurring expenses for the purchase or lease of a vehicle, the debtor cannot claim a vehicle ownership expense under the IRS standards.") "Because the Local Standards are issued by the IRS, it is instructive to refer to publications of that organization for guidance as to the types of 'debt payments' that can reduce allowances under the Local Standards." Hardacre, 338 B.R. at 726.

C. Congressional Intent Supports Allowing the IRS Local Standard for Vehicle Ownership Costs Only to Debtors Who Have An Applicable Ownership Expense.

The United States Trustee's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is necessary to give effect to the intent of Congress in enacting the means testing provisions of the BAPCPA. See, e.g., Owner-Operator Independent Driver's Ass'n, Inc. v. New Prime, Inc., 192 F.3d 778, 785 (8th Cir. 1999) (while court's principal focus must be on the language of the relevant statute, court cannot ignore the broader perspective and may use legislative history to confirm most plausible construction of statute) (citing Wisconsin Public Intervenor v. Mortier, 501 U.S. 597, 610 (1991)).

Congressional intent to remove judicial discretion regarding whether a debtor with ability to pay should be dismissed from chapter 7, is demonstrated by early committee reports on the bankruptcy reform legislation introduced in 2000.[9] This legislative history provides:

> . . . [It] is intended to both remove unequivocally the bankruptcy court's discretion with regard to whether a debtor with ability to pay should be dismissed from chapter 7, and to restrict as much as possible reliance upon judicial discretion to determine the debtor's ability to pay. Limited judicial discretion remains to deal with the hardship case, but that discretion is not to be abused by lax enforcement of the standards . . . .

146 Cong. Rec. S11683-11729 at 11700 (section-by-section explanation of HR 2415), Dec. 7, 2000.

By allowing every debtor who owns a car to take the IRS Transportation "car financing cost" expense in addition to the IRS Transportation "operating cost" expense and not limiting this expense allowance to debtors who really incur monthly vehicle acquisition finance expenses, the bankruptcy court has in fact reserved for itself more judicial discretion. Under the bankruptcy court's interpretation that the debtor's real expenses are irrelevant, most of the abuse motions will be considered under § 707(b)(3), where the court has broader discretion and no presumptions apply. This result frustrates the purpose of the means test as a whole and is exactly the opposite of what Congress intended by adding the bright line means test under the BAPCPA. Id.

For all these reasons, the bankruptcy court's determination that § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) authorizes the Debtors to reduce their CMI for a vehicle ownership expense when the Debtors have no ownership or lease payment must be reversed, and the case remanded to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings in accordance with the presumption of abuse that arises in this case under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

II. The Bankruptcy Court Erred By Failing to Consider the Debtors' Ability to Pay in Assessing the Totality of the Circumstances Under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3).

11 U.S.C. Section 707(b)(3) provides that dismissal for abuse may be considered "in a case in which the presumption [of abuse pursuant to § 707(b)(2)] does not arise or is rebutted." Section 707(b)(3) further provides that when determining a motion to dismiss under the subsection, the court shall consider whether "the totality of the circumstances . . . of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." Thus, assuming arguendo that no presumption of abuse arises in this case under the means test, the totality of the circumstances must be considered in determining whether the Debtors' bankruptcy filing constitutes an abuse under § 707(b)(3).

At the hearing on December 11, 2006, prior to the presentation of any evidence, the bankruptcy court erroneously determined that because the debtors had "above the median" income the court's evaluation of the debtors' ability to pay, under the totality of the circumstances, was limited to the income and expense amounts contained on the Form B22A. The court stated:

> [I]f [an] above-median debtor passes the means test, then the totality of the circumstances cannot include inappropriate expense deductions on schedule J because the means test is where we are to perform it and how we are to perform it, and part of the means test is looking back and looking at the date of the petition and if – I'm saying that the totality of the circumstances has to be more than something's wrong on schedule J because your schedule J arguments are subsumed for above-median debtors by the means test. (December 11 Hearing Transcript at 14) (emphasis added).

> [I]f you're above median and you have passed this [the means test], the totality of the circumstances don't suggest an abuse because this is the test Congress wanted to substitute. (December 11 Hearing Transcript at 15-16).

By reading § 707(b)(2) as the last word in determining a debtor's ability to pay for abuse purposes the bankruptcy court eviscerates from § 707(b)(3) an important function of adding flexibility to address financial circumstances that have changed from the date the Form B22A was prepared.

A. The Debtors' Actual Ability to Repay Their Debts Must Be Considered Under Section 707(b)(3).

The bankruptcy court in In re Mestemaker, ---- B.R. ----, 2007 WL 79306 (Bankr.N.D.Ohio Jan. 10, 2007) recently addressed the ability to pay issue in the context of above[10] median income debtors. In Mestemaker, the debtors' actual income exceeded their expenses by nearly $300 per month, but their disposable income under the means test calculation was under the amount which would trigger a presumption of abuse. The United States Trustee moved for dismissal under § 707(b)(3) based on the totality of the circumstances, and the debtors objected arguing, inter alia, that the means test was conclusive as to their ability to pay. The bankruptcy court found that the plain language of § 707(b)(3) required the court to evaluate the debtors' actual income and expenses notwithstanding the result of the means test. Id. Accord In re Hare, 2007 WL 201249, *2 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. Jan. 24, 2007) (slip copy) (Section 707(b)(3) is an independent review for abuse distinct from the means test, consistent with the structure of § 707(b).

[10] Relative to below the median income debtors, courts that have addressed the issue in reported decisions have uniformly found that a debtor's ability to pay may be considered as part of the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation under § 707(b)(3)(B). See, e.g., In re Pak, 343 B.R.239, 241 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006); In re Paret, 342 B.R.12, 17 (Bankr. D.Del. 2006).

The court in Mestemaker concluded that considering the debtor's financial situation allows § 707(b)(3) to function as intended – as a counterpart to the rebuttal provision of § 707(b)(2)(B):

> Section 707(b)(2)(B) provides the circumstances under which the presumption of abuse may be rebutted . . . . To the extent that a debtor succeeds in rebutting the presumption of abuse, the presumption dissipates and the party moving for dismissal based upon abuse has the burden of showing such abuse independent of the means test calculation.
> In light of the fact that Congress specifically addressed the situation where a debtor has greater expenses and/or lower income than what is accounted for under the means test calculation, it is unreasonable to interpret § 707(b) as not providing for circumstances where a debtor has fewer expenses and/or higher income than what is set forth under the means test. The plain language of § 707(b)(3) provides for a court to consider that very circumstance. . . . The plain meaning of the phrase "debtor's financial situation" must include a debtor's actual income and expenses, since such information is the starting point for any analysis of an individual's financial situation. There is no provision in § 707(b) stating that the means test is the only method through which a court may determine whether there is abuse based on a debtor's ability to pay. Rather, the plain language of § 707(b)(3), read in conjunction with § 707(b)(1) and (2), is clear and compels a conclusion that a court must consider a debtor's actual debt-paying ability in ruling on a motion to dismiss based on abuse where the presumption does not arise or is rebutted.

In re Mestemaker, ---- B.R. ----, 2007 WL 79306 at *4 (citations omitted)(emphasis added).

The analysis required by § 707(b)(3) is necessarily subjective and does not limit the court's discretion to consider a debtor's ability to pay in making a determination whether the case filing constitutes an abuse. To the contrary, § 707(b)(3) effectively requires the court to consider a debtor's ability to pay outside of the confines of the means test because it expressly requires the court to consider the "totality" of the debtors "financial situation" in determining whether the debtor's case is an abuse. See, e.g., In re Lenton, ---- B.R. ----, 2006 WL 3850011 at *8 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. Dec. 15, 2006) ("The broad language 'totality of the circumstances' and 'financial situation' clearly encompasses a debtor's ability to pay."). Accordingly, to have meaning, the phrase "totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation" in § 707(b)(3) must also include consideration of the debtor's ability to pay his or her debts. See also In re McUne, ---- B.R. ----, 2006 WL 3734388 at *1 (Bankr. D.Or. Dec. 19, 2006) ("what could be more central to a debtor's financial situation than his income and expenses") (citing In re Pak, 343 B.R. 239, 241 (Bankr. N.D.Cal. 2006)).

B. The § 707(b)(2) Means Test and Form B22A are a Mechanical Proxy for the Debtors' Ability to Pay Unsecured Creditors, But Does Not Constitute the Debtors' Ability to Pay Under § 707(b)(3)'s Totality of the Circumstances.

As discussed, supra, at 6-7, § 707(b)(2) imposes a mechanical means test. The means test is a calculation of monthly disposable income which represents the amount available to a debtor to pay their accrued unsecured debts. In order to determine the debtor's ability to pay under the means test contained in § 707(b)(2), a debtor completes Form B22A.[11] Applying this statutory provision, on Form B22A the debtor inserts categories of income and categories of expenses in accordance with the statutory methodology. Regarding expenses, the methodology instructs the debtor to use standardized amounts for certain expense categories and actual amounts for other expense categories.

[11] Subsection (b)(2) incorporates certain defined terms in setting forth its income and expense methodology, such as "current monthly income" which is set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A). Form B22A then provides for a mathematical computation of the debtor's ability to pay, employing the § 707(b)(2) income and expense methodology.

The purpose of the § 707(b)(2)(A) and Form B22A exercise is to provide the United States Trustee, the case trustee, creditors and ultimately the bankruptcy court, with an initial, streamlined, day of preparation assessment - a proxy - of the debtor's ability to repay their accrued unsecured debts. In most cases, this streamlined proxy is sufficient to determine the debtor's ability to pay. However, in other cases the court must undertake a more comprehensive analysis of the debtor's repayment ability. The Form B22A proxy may not be a reliable proxy of the debtor's repayment ability because: (1) a change of circumstances impacts the amounts of income included in the proxy calculation; (2) a change of circumstances impacts the expense amounts included in the proxy calculation; (3) the expense amounts in the proxy calculation are not reasonable or necessary for the particular debtor; and (4) expense amounts are included in the proxy that the debtor does not actually incur on a monthly basis.

Consequently, Congress included in § 707(b) provisions which incorporate flexibility to assess and if necessary make adjustments to the ability to pay proxy calculated under § 707(b)(2)(A). Sections 707(b)(2)(B) and 707(b)(3)(B) provide flexibility to address situations if a party demonstrates that the Form B22A is not a reliable proxy on a particular case. See In re Casey, ---- B.R. ----, 2006 WL 3071401, *4 (Bankr. E.D. Wash. 2006) (in context of chapter 13 case, Form B22A calculation is "modified by any anticipated change in financial circumstances . . . .").

1. Decreased Income

The income on the Form B22A proxy includes amounts the debtor received in the six full months before the month in which the petition is filed. Obviously, there are situations in which a debtor reasonably anticipates lower income than is reported on the proxy form. These situations include: a job loss, cutback on overtime requirements, or a one time income event such as a relocation bonus or a lump sum back-pay settlement. The flexibility in § 707(b) to address these reduced income situations is found at § 707(b)(2)(B), the "special circumstances" provision. In these reduced income situations, a debtor can establish through admissible evidence that there is an adjustment that must be made to the income amount reported on the Form B22A because the amount on the B22A is not reflective of the monthly income the debtor reasonably anticipates receiving. See In re Zimmerman, 2007 WL 295452, *8 (slip copy) (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007).

2. Increased Income

There also may be situations with increased income. In re Pak, 343 B.R.239 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006), is a good example. Debtor was unemployed for 5 of the 6 months used to calculate income on the proxy B22A form because he had been unemployed. Evidence established that the income on the proxy B22 Form was not reflective of debtor's income because it only included 1/6th of his reasonably anticipated income. The court therefore dismissed the case under section 707(b)(3).[12]

---

[12] In response to the court's granting the United States Trustee's § 707(b)(3) motion, the In re Pak debtor converted his case to chapter 13. In chapter 13, he sought to confirm a plan using the Form B22A income which represented only 1/6th of his reasonably

3. Decreased Expenses

A party may also assert that the Form B22A proxy is not reflective of the debtor's ability to pay under Section 707(b)(3) because one or more expenses are not reasonable and necessary or are not actually incurred. Examples of this type of claim would be a mortgage on a vacation or second home, or monthly payment for a loan on a boat or other recreation vehicle, which are an allowed expense deduction under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) but which are generally considered luxuries not reasonable or necessary for the debtor. The United States Trustee is not aware of any reported decisions[13] regarding challenges that an expense allowed under the (b)(2) means test should not be allowed when a more comprehensive analysis is conducted under Section 707(b)(3) because the expense is not reasonable or necessary. In addition, this includes property for which some courts allow the debtor to take Form B22A proxy expense deduction notwithstanding that such property is being surrendered by the debtor and will have no payments post-petition for secured debt, and situations like the case where the debtor is allowed to take expense deductions for the IRS anticipated income and the court denied confirmation. See In re Pak, 343 B.R. 239 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006). Following objections by the chapter 13 trustee and United States Trustee, the court considered plan confirmation in the context of sections 1325(b)'s "projected disposable income", which has been applied by other courts as providing flexibility to address circumstances changed from the proxy form, just as the totality of the circumstances under section 707(b)(3) provides flexibility to account for changed circumstances.

[13] One reason for the absence of reported decisions is because the debtor may convert to chapter 13 in conjunction with a successful § 707(b)(3) motion, and thus no decision is reported. See In re Nockerts, ---- B.R. ----, 2006 WL 3689465 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. December 14, 2006).

Standard for vehicle acquisition financing costs even though the debtor has no loan or lease payment obligation.

C. Considering the Debtors' Ability to Pay Is Wholly Consistent With BAPCPA's Legislative History.

Through enactment of the BAPCPA, Congress sought to adopt a broad approach to § 707(b)(3), including the additional discretion to consider a debtor's actual ability to pay as part of the totality of the circumstances, as outlined by the First Circuit in In re Lamanna, 153 F. 3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998). As stated in a committee report on the bankruptcy reform legislation introduced in 2000:

> [S]ituations in which courts dismiss debtors from Chapter 7 today clearly continue to be grounds for dismissal under HR 2415, including such cases as In re Lamanna,153 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998). In addition, since the standard is "abuse" rather than "substantial abuse," the courts are clearly given additional discretion to control abusive use of chapter 7 when that is appropriate . . . .

146 Cong. Rec. S11683-11729 (section by section explanation of HR 2415), Dec. 7, 2000 (emphasis added). A reading of amended § 707(b)(3) that requires courts to rely only on a petition-date-snapshot of the debtor's financial circumstances represented by the Form B22A, in considering a debtor's ability to pay, would thwart the statute's purpose. This interpretation would make it more difficult for judges to dismiss cases that are abuses of the chapter 7 provisions, rather than to increase the court's power to curb such abuses.

Congress has expressly approved the application of the test set forth in Lamanna and indicated that it did not intend for the means test to foreclose inquiry into a debtor's ability to pay under the totality of the circumstances analysis in § 707(b)(3). In applying pre-

BAPCPA § 707(b), the First Circuit stated in Lamanna that the totality of the circumstances test "demands a comprehensive review of the debtor's current and potential financial situation." Lamanna, 153 F.3d at 4 (emphasis added).

D. Considering the Debtors' Ability to Pay Is Wholly Consistent With the Sixth Circuit's Interpretation of § 707(b)(3)(B)'s Substantially Similar Predecessor.

The Sixth Circuit has long held that in considering motions to dismiss under § 707(b) that a debtor's ability to pay is the primary factor in evaluating the totality of the circumstances, and that such ability to pay alone may warrant dismissal. In re Krohn, 886 F. 2d 123, 126-127 (6th Cir. 1989). In Krohn, the Court stated that:

> Among the factors to be considered in deciding whether a debtor is needy is his ability to repay his debts out of future earnings. That factor alone may be sufficient to warrant dismissal. For example, a court would not be justified in concluding that a debtor is needy and worthy of discharge, where his disposable income permits liquidation of his consumer debts with relative ease.

Id. at 126 (citations omitted) (emphasis added). More recently, the Sixth Circuit categorically reaffirmed and followed this principle in In re Behlke, 358 F.3d 429, 434-435 (6th Cir. 2004) (affirming dismissal where debtors had the ability to repay a percentage of their debts). In Behlke, the Court of Appeals explained that the totality of the circumstances test evaluates whether the debtor is needy and whether he has the ability to repay his debts:

> In addition to evaluating ability to pay debts out of future income, other factors to be taken into account to determine if the debtors are "needy" include whether debtors enjoy a stable source of income, whether debtors' > expenses can be reduced significantly without depriving them of adequate food, clothing, shelter and other necessities and whether debtors' financial situation is the result of an unforseen catastrophic event.

Id. at 437 (citing Krohn).

As articulated by the Lamanna court, and as provided in Krohn, the primary factor under the totality of the circumstances test is the court's assessment of the debtor's ability to fund a chapter 13 plan out of future disposable income. Id., n. 7.

E. The Bankruptcy Court's Refusal to Consider Debtor's Ability to Pay Based on Their Decreased Expenses and Increased Income Was Erroneous.

In considering the Debtors' ability to pay in this case the bankruptcy court should have considered the following evidence and testimony. First, the Debtors own six vehicles. (R. 1-12, Schedule B). The Debtors therefore may not need to procure a replacement vehicle. The Debtors presented no evidence regarding when they anticipated a replacement vehicle or the anticipated cost or credit terms for such a vehicle. See, In re Lenton, supra, 2006 WL 3850011 at *11.

Second, the Debtors testified they had made no post-petition payments on their time share or the vacuum cleaner, included as Schedule J Expenses for $155.82 and $42.39, and that these assets would be surrendered (R. 1-48, pp. 35-36).

Third, the Debtors testified that in the four months post-petition, Debtors had compiled $2,000 in cash after paying monthly expenses. (R. 1-48, pp. 36-38, 63-65). This equates to $500 per month of actual net income for the Debtors.

Based on the evidence and undisputed testimony, Debtors appear to have actual net monthly income in the amount of at least $200 which they can devote to paying creditors. The repayment threshold for abuse Congress established under the BAPCPA is $100 - $167, depending on the level of unsecured debt. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i). More than $167 in monthly disposable income is sufficient to support dismissal under § 707(b) regardless of debt level. Expense amounts on Debtors' Form B22A that were allowed by the bankruptcy court were not expenses incurred by the Debtors on a monthly basis based on the evidence presented. The United States Trustee established that a more comprehensive assessment of the Debtors' finances was warranted under § 707(b)(3)'s totality of the circumstances. Thus, the bankruptcy court's decision must be reversed for the court to examine the evidence of repayment ability on the United States Trustee's Section 707(b)(3) motion to dismiss and not just mechanically apply the expense amounts set forth on the Debtors' Form B22A.

CONCLUSION

For all these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the December 11, 2006 Order entered by the bankruptcy court denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, and remand this case to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings.

Respectfully submitted at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, this 9th day of February, 2007.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

Summary

The jurisdictional summary in the appellant's brief is complete and correct. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over the bankruptcy case of debtors Marvin Ross-Tousey and Deborah Tousey (the "Debtors") under 28 U.S.C. 157. The district court had appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 158(a)(1). This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 158(d)(1). The Debtors timely filed a notice of appeal on June 20, 2007, from the district court order entered May 21, 2007.

Jurisdictional Discussion

This discussion addresses three distinct jurisdictional matters. First, because this Court has never addressed whether bankruptcy court orders denying section 707(b) motions to dismiss are final orders, we explain why they are. Second, we acknowledge the United States Trustee's section 707(b)(2) claim was untimely filed, but explain that the Debtors waived this non-jurisdictional defect by not raising it before the trial court or on appeal. Third, we explain that the district court's order reversing the bankruptcy court, and remanding for further proceedings, is final because there are no significant further proceedings for the bankruptcy court to decide upon remand.

A. The bankruptcy court order is final.

1. The bankruptcy court order is final because it "resolve[d] all contested issues on the merits and [left] only the distribution of estate assets to be completed." Matter of Wade, 991 F.2d 402, 406 (7th Cir. 1993). The United States Trustee's section 707(b) motion to dismiss instituted a contested matter governed by Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9014. See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(f)(1) (Rule 9014 governs proceedings to dismiss a case). The order denying the motion resolved that contested matter. See In re UAL Corp., 408 F.3d 847, 850 (7th Cir. 2005) (an order resolving a contested matter is final if equivalent to the disposition of a stand-alone suit).

The bankruptcy court's order denying the motion to dismiss resolved the issue of the United States Trustee's claim that granting relief to the debtor was an abuse of chapter 7, and rejected the relief sought by the United States Trustee's motion. The order was a formal adjudication of the section 707(b) proceeding: it determined the right of the debtor to proceed and determined the case would not be dismissed for abuse. This is the epitome of a final order. See In re Morse Electric Co., 805 F.2d 262, 265 (7th Cir.1986) ("Finality of the order comes from the fact that it resolves all of [the appellant's] claims . . .").

2. The bankruptcy court order denying the United States Trustee's section 707(b) motion is more final than most bankruptcy court orders determining contested matters, because the Bankruptcy Code's statutory deadline for moving to dismiss this case for presumed abuse, set out in section 704(b)(2), has expired. See 11 U.S.C. 704(b)(2) (establishing a 30-day deadline for the United States Trustee to file a motion to dismiss under section 707(b)(2) measured from the date of the United States Trustee's filing an initial statement under section 704(b)(1) regarding whether the case would be a presumed abuse under section 707(b)(2)). In addition, the deadline for bringing a motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b)(3) has expired. See Interim Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(e)(2) (establishing that a motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b)(3) must be brought within 60 days after the first date set for the meeting of creditors).

In this case, the deadline for the United States Trustee to file a motion to dismiss for presumed abuse under section 707(b)(2) expired on October 30, 2006.[1] The deadline for filing a motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b)(3) expired on November 20, 2006.[2]

[1] October 30, 2006 is 30 days after September 29, 2006, the date when the United States timely filed his statement under section 704(b)(1). See United States Trustee's Appendix, p. 3.

[2] November 20, 2006 is 60 days after September 21, 2006, the first date set for the meeting of creditors. See United States Trustee's Appendix, p. 11.

Therefore, in the section 707(b) context, the bankruptcy court can longer consider whether grounds exist for dismissal of the case for abuse, because the deadlines expired under section 704(b)(2) and Interim Rule 1017(e)(2).

Other types of motions to dismiss bankruptcy cases are not subject to the time bar that restricts section 707(b) motions. For example, a motion to dismiss a chapter 7 case for "cause" under section 707(a) has no statutory or Bankruptcy Rule deadline and could be renewed if denied. See also 11 U.S.C. 1112(b) (permitting dismissal of chapter 11 case for "cause" but establishing no deadlines for seeking such dismissal; the Bankruptcy Rules also set no relevant deadline); 11 U.S.C. 521(i) (setting grounds for "automatic[]" dismissal but establishing no deadlines for seeking orders dismissing such cases; the Bankruptcy Rules also set no relevant deadline). But see Schwartz v. Geltzer (In re Smith), 507 F.3d 64 (2d Cir. 2007) (treating the denial of a section 707(a) motion as final without analysis).

3. Although the United States Supreme Court and this Court have not specifically addressed whether orders denying section 707(b) motions are final, the clear weight of circuit law supports the conclusion that they are. Three United States courts of appeals – the Eighth, Third, and Fifth – have adjudicated appeals from bankruptcy court orders denying section 707(b) motions to dismiss under the pre-2005 version of the statute. Two expressly held such orders are final. See Stuart v. Koch (In re Koch), 109 F.3d 1285, 1289 (8th Cir. 1997) (holding that an order denying a section 707(b) motion to dismiss a chapter 7 case for substantial abuse is final); In re Christian, 804 F.2d 46, 47-48 (3d Cir. 1986) (same). See also In re Cortez, 457 F.3d 448, 453-54 (5th Cir. 2006) (treating as final a bankruptcy court order denying the United States Trustee's section 707(b) motion to dismiss for substantial abuse).

4. These rulings are consistent with Seventh Circuit decisions treating a variety of orders finally deciding discrete disputes within bankruptcy cases as final. This Court has held, for example, that orders disposing of claims by creditors are final. See In re Morse Electric Co., 805 F.2d 262 (7th Cir. 1986). It has held that orders approving or failing to approve the sale of a debtor's property are final. See In re Sax, 796 F.2d 994, 996-97 (7th Cir. 1986). This Court has also held that orders resolving a controversy over who has the right to property are final. See In re Kaiser, 791 F.2d 73, 74 (7th Cir. 1986). It has further held that orders reopening bankruptcy proceedings are final. See In re Joslyn's Estate, 171 F.2d 159, 164 (7th Cir. 1948). Similarly, this Court has also recognized the following orders as final: orders denying relief from an automatic stay; orders determining exemptions; orders on sanctions; orders on appointments of trustees; and orders confirming a bankruptcy plan. See Matter of Wade, 991 F.2d 402, 406 (7th Cir. 1992).

By contrast, bankruptcy court orders deemed interlocutory by this Court differ from the final determination in the Debtors' case, because those orders did not definitively decide a discrete proceeding within the case. In In re Salem, for example, this Court held that an order refusing to convert a closed chapter 7 case in New York into an existing chapter 13 case in Illinois was interlocutory. In re Salem, 465 F.3d 767, 774 (7th Cir. 2006). In In re Klein, similarly, this Court dismissed for lack of finality the appeal of an order not confirming the election of a chapter 7 trustee. In re Klein, 940 F.2d 1075, 1077 (7th Cir. 1991) (holding that order "did not resolve the substantive rights of the parties in any way, but merely decided one procedural question along the way."). Similarly, this Court ruled that denial of a motion to stay an order approving an interim distribution was not a final order, because the appellants had not established any entitlement to the funds in question. Matter of Forty-Eight Insulations, Inc., 115 F.3d 1294, 1299 (7th Cir. 1997). These cases are distinguishable from the Debtors' case because the bankruptcy court order in their case completely adjudicated the contested matter, and the United States Trustee can assert no further claims to dismiss their case under section 707(b).

Also distinguishable on two grounds is In re Vlasek, where this Court held that the denial of a pro se debtor's motion to dismiss his chapter 7 case was not final. In re Vlasek, 325 F.3d 955 (7th Cir. 2002). Vlasek is distinguishable first because, as we explain above, the denial of a section 707(b) motion is different from the denial of a motion to dismiss a bankruptcy case on other grounds. A section 707(b) motion is the functional equivalent of a cause of action and must be filed within a specified time period. When, as here, that deadline has expired, the denial order is final.

In Vlasek, the pro se debtor's motion to dismiss his case was not brought under section 707. Indeed, the motion did not reference any provision of the Bankruptcy Code. The basis for the motion consisted of the debtor's allegations, raised nearly two-and-a-half years into the case, that his mother had fraudulently signed his name to the petition. Id. at 958. In contrast to deadlines limiting the United States Trustee's motion in the Debtors' case, and the fact that future motions are time-barred, nothing would have prevented the debtor in Vlasek from filing multiple motions to dismiss throughout the years in which his case was open.[3]

[3] In contrast to the deadlines that bar the United States Trustee from filing any further section 707(b) motion in the Debtors' case, nothing would prevent a party in a chapter 11 case from filing multiple motions to dismiss while a case is

Vlasek is also distinguishable because it addressed a unique circumstance that is not present in this matter. The practical effect of Vlasek was to avoid depriving a pro se debtor of his ability to appeal a fundamental ruling in his case. Vlasek's holding that the order was interlocutory did not preclude review, but rather allowed this Court to undertake review, in the face of an argument by the chapter 7 trustee, as appellee, that the debtor had forfeited his right to challenge the order by failing to file an immediate appeal. Id. at 960.

Because the bankruptcy court order constituted a final adjudication by the bankruptcy court of this controversy, it is an final order subject to appeal under 28 U.S.C. 158(a)(1).

B. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over the United States Trustee's untimely claim that the presumption of abuse arose in the Debtors' case under section 707(b)(2), because the statutory deadline for filing this claim is not a jurisdictional limit and the Debtors waived any objection to untimeliness.

Section 704(b) of the Bankruptcy Code sets a deadline for filing motions to dismiss chapter 7 cases for presumed abuse under section 707(b)(2) of the Code. 11 U.S.C. 704(b)(1)(A) (requiring the United States Trustee to file a statement open. See 11 U.S.C. 1112(b) (permitting dismissal of chapter 11 case for "cause" but establishing no deadlines for seeking such dismissal; the Bankruptcy Rules also set no relevant deadline). This Court has held that denials of motions to dismiss chapter 11 petitions are generally not final. See In re Jartran, Inc., 886 F.2d 859, 863-64 (7th Cir. 1989).

whether the debtor's case is presumed abusive under section 707(b)(2) within ten days of a debtor's 11 U.S.C. 341 meeting of creditors); and 704(b)(2) (requiring the United States Trustee to file a motion to dismiss under section 707(b)(2) within thirty days from the filing of the section 704(b)(1)(A) statement).

In this case, the United States Trustee timely filed the initial ten-day statement required by section 704(b)(1)(A) on September 29, 2006. United States Trustee's Appendix, p. 3. This obligated him to file a motion to dismiss for presumed abuse under section 707(b)(2) no later than October 30, 2006, the thirtieth day after filing the section 704(b)(1) statement. See 11 U.S.C. 704(b)(2).

On that October 30, 2006 deadline, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b)(1) and 707(b)(3)(B) (allowing dismissal for abuse based upon the totality of the debtor's financial circumstances). See United States Trustee's Appendix, pp. 14-17. But the United States Trustee did not raise a section 707(b)(2) claim until he supplemented his dismissal motion with that claim on November 2, 2006. See id. at pp. 18-22.

The United States Trustee's November 2, 2006, section 707(b)(2) supplement referenced Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, which allows an amendment as a matter of course before a responsive pleading is filed, and allows such an amendment to relate back to the date of the original filing in certain circumstances. See Fed. R.

Civ. P. 15((a)(1) (amendment) and Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(c) (relation back).

But Rule 15 did not apply to the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. Under the Bankruptcy Rules, Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7015 incorporates Fed. R. Civ. 15 into bankruptcy adversary proceedings, which are governed by the 7000 series of the Bankruptcy Rules. Adversary proceedings are instituted by filing complaints. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7003. But the United States Trustee did not file a complaint. As required, he filed a motion to dismiss, which triggered a contested matter governed by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014. Rule 9014 imports some of the 7000 series rules into contested matters, but not Rule 7015. Thus, the United States Trustee's attempt to use Fed. R. Civ. P. 15 to supplement his section 707(b)(3) count with a section 707(b)(2) count was improper.

The debtors did not object to this error before the bankruptcy court. Nor did they raise it as an assignment of error in their appeal to the district court. Nor did they raise it in the opening brief filed they filed with this Court.

That means the United States Trustee's error is waived because section 704(b)'s deadline for filing motions to dismiss is not jurisdictional. See Arbaugh v. Y&H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 504 (2006) (non-jurisdictional defects are waived unless they are raised prior to the entry of an order ruling on the merits).

Statutory limits are jurisdictional only when Congress "clearly states" that they are jurisdictional. Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 513. Typically, jurisdictional statutes are found in Title 28 of the United States Code. See Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 452-53 (2004) (recognizing that Title 28 determines the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts); In re Supreme Beef Processors, Inc., 468 F.3d 248, 258 (5th Cir. 2006) (concluding that if Congress wanted to modify bankruptcy court jurisdiction "it likely would have amended 28 U.S.C. 1334 . . ., not the substantive provisions of [the Bankruptcy Code].").

Arbaugh held that "when Congress does not rank a statutory limitation . . . as jurisdictional, courts should treat the restriction as nonjurisdictional in character." Id. Arbaugh emphasized that a statutory limitation is nonjurisdictional if it "does not speak in jurisdictional terms or refer in any way to the jurisdiction of the [trial] courts." Id. at 515 (internal quotation omitted).

Under these standards, section 704(b) is not jurisdictional. First, section 704(b) is not part of Title 28. Instead, 28 U.S.C. 157 and 1334 determine bankruptcy court jurisdiction. Section 704(b), in turn, sets deadlines for United States Trustees to proceed in filing motions to dismiss based upon a presumption of abuse before bankruptcy courts acting under their Title 28 jurisdiction.

Second, the deadlines identified in section 704(b) are not jurisdictional because Congress did not clearly state that they were jurisdictional. See Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 514. Section 704(b) does not speak in jurisdictional terms or refer in any way to the jurisdiction of bankruptcy courts. See id. at 515. In fact, section 704 is titled "Trustee's duties." 11 U.S.C. 704.

At most, the section 704(b)(2) deadline constituted a statute of limitations for the dismissal claim based upon a presumption of abuse that the Debtors failed to raise as an affirmative defense at any time prior to the bankruptcy court's decision on the merits of the United States Trustee's section 707(b) motion to dismiss.[4] See United States v. Baldwin, 414 F.3d 791, 795 (7th Cir. 2005) (recognizing that expiration of the statute of limitations is an affirmative defense, not a bar to jurisdiction), overruled on other grounds by United States v. Parker, 508 F.3d 434 (7th Cir. 2007). And the Debtors failed to preserve this issue on appeal because they did not press it before the district court and have not pressed it before this Court. See In re Pugh, 158 F.3d 530, 530 (11th Cir. 1998) (holding that the deadlines for trustee actions under 11 U.S.C. 546(a) and 549(d) are waivable statutes of limitations).

Therefore, the untimeliness of the United States Trustee's claim for dismissal for presumed abuse does not constitute a basis for dismissing this appeal or reversing the district court's order. Timeliness could have been raised prior to the bankruptcy court's deciding the motion to dismiss, because it was an element of the United States Trustee's claim. But this untimeliness did not deprive the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction to hear and decide the contested matter, and did not deprive the district court or this Court of jurisdiction to review that order on appeal.

[4] But cf. In re Cadwallder, 2007 WL 1864154 at *9 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. June 28, 2007) (concluding that section 704 is "a mandate for U.S. Trustee action imposed for the benefit of the Court and other parties in interest, not a deadline" and that "even if the U.S. Trustee had not met the § 704(b) deadlines, the motion would not be time barred merely for that reason").

C. The district court order is final.

The district court order is final under 28 U.S.C. 158(d)(1). The district court remanded the case for further proceedings. Neary v. Ross-Tousey (In re Ross-Tousey), 368 B.R. 762, 769 (E.D. Wis. 2007). Typically, this would make the district court order interlocutory. But in this case, the Debtors waived their right under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(B) to attempt to rebut the presumption of abuse in their case on remand. See Debtors' Response Opposing Motion to Dismiss at 4; United States Trustee's Reply to Debtors' Response at 2. Under these circumstances, remand to the bankruptcy court would involve only the ministerial task of dismissing the case, without any significant further proceedings. See In re Riggsby, 745 F.2d 1153, 1156 (7th Cir. 1984) (holding that a district court decision in a bankruptcy appeal is not final when it remands for "significant further proceedings"); In re Fox, 762 F.2d 54, 55 (7th Cir. 1985) (holding that a district court decision in a bankruptcy appeal is final if it remands only for a "ministerial" task).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

The Bankruptcy Code allows debtors to deduct a vehicle ownership expense, in a set amount, when "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The ownership expense amount is a figure for monthly loan or lease payments. The Debtors in this case claimed such a set amount even though they had no vehicle ownership expenses, i.e., they did not have a monthly loan or lease payment.

The question presented is: Did the district court err in ruling the Debtors could not claim that expense because it was not "applicable" in their case?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This appeal addresses whether these Debtors may claim a vehicle ownership expense deduction under the bankruptcy means test that applies to chapter 7 debtors with above-median incomes. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2). The Debtors filed a voluntary chapter 7 bankruptcy petition. The United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss their case for abuse under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). The United States Trustee argued that the Debtors' monthly disposable income exceeded the statutory amount that triggers a presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2), and that under section 707(b)(3)(B) the case was an abuse when the totality of the debtors' financial circumstances was considered. The United States Trustee argued that in calculating their disposable income, the Debtors improperly deducted $803 per month for vehicle ownership expenses under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) when they in fact had no ownership expenses at all. The bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion. The district court reversed, holding that the vehicle ownership deduction was not "applicable" to the Debtors under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), because they owned their vehicles free and clear. The Debtors appealed to this Court.

STATUTORY BACKGROUND

This appeal involves the interpretation of provisions added to the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 101, et seq., by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("2005 Act").[5]

A. The means test Congress added to the Bankruptcy Code in 2005 determines whether above-median-income debtors' chapter 7 cases are subject to dismissal under 11 U.S.C. 707(b) as presumptively abusive.

In the 2005 Act, Congress revised section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code to add a means test to identify chapter 7 cases that are presumptively abusive because debtors have the ability to pay a portion of their unsecured debt.

Under the section 707(b)(2) means test, a presumption of abuse arises when an above-median-income debtor's monthly income,[6] less enumerated expenses, exceeds $167 per month. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(7), 707(b)(2)(A)(i).[7]

Section 704(b) requires United States Trustees to review all individual chapter 7 cases and, whenever a case is presumptively abusive under the statute, either (a) seek its dismissal or conversion, or (b) file a statement declining to seek dismissal. See 11 U.S.C. 704(b).[8] In fiscal year 2007, United States Trustees filed nationally 3,370 motions to dismiss for presumed abuse and filed 1,441 statements

[7] The $167 threshold is the result of dividing $10,000 by 60 under the formula set out in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i). Under section 104 of the Bankruptcy Code, this dollar amount was increased by the Judicial Conference of the United States effective April 1, 2007. Revision of Certain Dollar Amounts in the Bankruptcy Code Prescribed Under Section 104(b) of the Code, 72 Fed. Reg. 7082, 7082-83 (Feb. 14, 2007). This increased dollar amount does not apply to the Debtors' case.

[8] United States Trustees, who are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General, supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases in all judicial districts within this circuit. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977) (explaining that United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena").

If the presumption of abuse arises under section 707(b)(2), an above-median-income debtor may rebut it only by demonstrating “special circumstances,” and only to the extent such special circumstances “justify additional expenses or adjustments to current monthly income for which there is no reasonable alternative.” 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(B)(i).

If the presumption of abuse does not arise based on the means test or is rebutted, the bankruptcy court must consider whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith or whether the totality of the circumstances of the debtor’s financial situation demonstrates abuse justifying dismissal. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(3)(A) (bad faith) and (B) (totality of the debtor’s financial circumstances).

B. Above-median-income debtors use the expense categories enumerated in section 707(b)(2)(A) to determine their allowed expenses under the means test.

Under the section 707(b)(2) means test, above-median-income chapter 7 debtors determine their permissible expenses under the formula found in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A).[9] Approximately 10% of bankruptcy filers have above-median incomes and are thereby subject to the means test.[10] Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) permits these debtors to deduct (a) certain prescribed "actual" expenses, and (b) other "applicable" expense amounts. Applicable expense amounts are determined under the IRS Local and National Standards. Id.

This appeal involves one part of the calculation of expenses for an above-median-income debtor under the means test – whether a debtor who has no monthly vehicle loan or lease payment expenses can claim a vehicle ownership expense amount under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) when calculating his disposable income.

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) states that expense amounts are determined "under" the IRS Local Standards that the IRS uses to determine whether delinquent taxpayers have the financial ability to repay their tax obligations. The IRS Local Standards allow debtors to claim an expense amount to cover monthly vehicle loan or lease payments. See IRS Collection Financial Standards, Local Standards: Transportation (explaining that the vehicle ownership Local Standard is a "figure[] for monthly loan or lease payments").[11]

[10] During fiscal year 2007, according to data collected by the United States Trustee Program, 451,012 non-business chapter 7 cases were filed nationwide, excluding the judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina. See 28 U.S.C. 581(a)(1)-(21) (excluding the federal judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina from the United States Trustee Program). Of these chapter 7 cases, roughly 45,000 involved debtors with above-median incomes subject to the means test and the requirements of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

If an IRS Local Standard is applicable to a debtor, the debtor may deduct the precise dollar amount the standard sets out. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (providing that the applicable expense amount "shall be" the amount "specified" under the IRS Local Standard).

In this case, the Debtors have no loan or lease payments on their vehicles, so this appeal requires this Court to determine whether they may nonetheless deduct $803 under the IRS Local Standard to avoid the presumption of abuse that would otherwise arise in their case.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

On August 18, 2006, the Debtors filed a voluntary petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. United States Trustee's Appendix, p. 1. for Wisconsin was $49,918.[12] Id. at line 14. The Debtors' income was $62,349.60. Id. at line 13.

Because their means test calculations listed no disposable income, the Debtors claimed that the presumption of abuse did not arise. Id. at line 52. They did so because they claimed a $803 ownership expense deduction under the IRS Local Standard for two vehicles, although they own these vehicles free and clear of any loan or lease obligation. Debtors' Appendix 2, Official Form 22A at line 42a.

On October 30, 2006, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the Debtors' case for abuse under section 707(b).[13] United States Trustee's Appendix, [12] The chapter 7 means test form, Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22A, is a new form developed after the enactment of the 2005 Act. This form helps chapter 7 debtors calculate income and expenses under the means test.

The means test form was approved by the Judicial Conference of the United States.

[13] On October 30, 2006, the United States Trustee filed his motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b)(1) and initially asserted that the case was an abuse based upon the totality of the circumstances of the debtors' financial situation under section 707(b)(3)(B). See United States Trustee's Appendix, pp. 14-17. On November 2, 2006, the United States Trustee supplemented the motion and asserted also that a presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2) mandated case pp. 14-22. Under the United States Trustee's analysis, the presumption arose under section 707(b)(2) because the Debtors had monthly disposable income of $260.50, which exceeded the $167 presumed abuse statutory threshold in section 707(b)(2)(A)(I). See Debtors' Appendix 4, United States Trustee's recalculated means test, lines 50, 52.

The United States Trustee's calculation did not allow the Debtors a $803 vehicle ownership expense amount under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Id. at lines 23-24. The United States Trustee's calculation did allow the Debtors a $758 monthly vehicle operating expense deduction for their two vehicles: the $358 monthly deduction for their two vehicles under the IRS Local Standard, along with an additional $200 monthly deduction for each vehicle under the IRS's special allowance for older or high-mileage vehicles. United States Trustee's Appendix, p. 22.

The United States Trustee also requested dismissal for abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B) (allowing dismissal based on the totality of the circumstances of a debtor's financial situation if the presumption of abuse arises or is rebutted). See United States Trustee's Appendix, p. 14.

District of Wisconsin denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss for abuse, concluding no presumption of abuse arose under section 707(b)(2) and that the totality of the circumstances of the debtors' financial situation did not establish abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B). See id. at pp. 23-24, 25. The bankruptcy court read 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as allowing the Debtors to take monthly ownership expense deductions, even though they had no loans or leases on their vehicles. Id. at pp. 23-24. The United States Trustee appealed. Id. at p. 26.

On May 21, 2007, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin reversed. Neary v. Ross-Tousey (In re Ross-Tousey), 368 B.R. 762 (E.D. Wis. 2007). The district court held that debtors may not claim vehicle ownership expense amounts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) for vehicles owned free and clear of any liens and encumbrances. Id. at 768. The district court concluded that the presumption of abuse arose in the Debtors' case and remanded for further proceedings to determine whether the Debtors could rebut this presumption. Id. at 768-69. Because it concluded the presumption of abuse arose under section 707(b)(2), the district court did not address the United States Trustee's alternative argument that the lower court erred in declining the case under section 707(b)(3)(B).

The Debtors appealed to this Court. United States Trustee's Appendix, p. 27-

28. The United States Trustee moved to dismiss the appeal for lack of finality because the remand ordered by the district court would involve the significant factual determination whether the Debtors had “special circumstances” sufficient to rebut the presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2). United States Trustee’s Motion to Dismiss at 4-5. The Debtors responded by stating for the first time that they had no special circumstances they would raise on remand. Debtors’ Response at 4. Due to that concession, the United States Trustee filed a reply agreeing this Court has jurisdiction because the remand ordered by the district court would not involve significant further proceedings. United States Trustee’s Reply at 2. On February 15, 2008, this Court denied the United States Trustee’s motion to dismiss this appeal.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The district court ruled the Debtors have no “applicable” monthly vehicle ownership expense amount to claim under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) because they have no monthly loan or lease expense obligations on their vehicles.

I. This interpretation best reads the statute because it (a) uses the ordinary dictionary meaning of “applicable,” and does so in a way that gives meaning to each word in the statute; (b) fulfills Congress’ stated reasons for enacting the section; (c) determines expense eligibility in the same way the Internal Revenue Service does "under" the IRS standards referenced in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I); and (d) is fair as a matter of bankruptcy policy.

A. Giving "applicable" its ordinary definition in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) validates the district court's interpretation of the statute. That ordinary definition yields a statute that allows debtors who have monthly expenses in an expense category to claim the IRS expense amount, while at the same time preventing debtors who lack monthly expenses in a category from avoiding dismissal by claiming phantom expenses. It also gives meaning to every word in the section, something the Debtors' construction does not. It is therefore no surprise that the eight lower appellate courts that have interpreted the meaning of "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) – six United States district courts and two bankruptcy appellate panels – have rejected the construction of "applicable" the Debtors advance before this Court.[14] Moreover, the Debtors' grammatical criticisms of the district court's interpretation are themselves grammatically incorrect. Even if they were right, they would not establish that nonexistent expenses make an expense amount "applicable" to them under the ordinary definition of the word applicable.

B. The 2005 Act's legislative history supports the district court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The House Report to the legislation reveals Congress enacted the new law to ensure debtors would repay their debts when they were able, and to eliminate loopholes and incentives for debtor abuse in discharging debts when a portion could be repaid. The district court's construction fulfills these congressional goals. The Debtors' construction does not.

C. Although the district court did not choose to rely on the IRS's methodology as a ground for its decision, the district court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is consistent with the IRS's refusal to allow parties to deduct nonexistent vehicle ownership expenses under its Local Standards. This is further support for the district court's interpretation because section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s text and its legislative history indicate Congress wanted courts to employ the IRS's methodology in determining whether debtors are eligible to deduct standard expense amounts in particular cases.[15] The district court's interpretation achieves that; the Debtors' interpretation does not.

D. The district court's interpretation also fosters sound public policy. Its interpretation does not affect below-median-income debtors, because they are not subject to the means test in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(7). Nor is it unfair to above-median-income debtors. It merely requires them to repay their debts when they are able. It is also fair to creditors because it ensures that debtors who have more than $167 per month available to repay debts cannot discharge these debts in a chapter 7 case.

Finally, the bankruptcy system has three safety valves to ensure that above-median debtors without loan or lease payments will not suffer by being denied phantom vehicle expenses. First, if debtors have older vehicles, they are entitled to an additional $200 monthly expense allowance per vehicle, for up to two vehicles, to fund the operation of these older vehicles. Second, debtors may convert to chapter 13 if their disposable income exceeds the statutory threshold in chapter 7, rather than simply have their cases dismissed and lose the protections of bankruptcy. Third, debtors whose cases are dismissed may refile if their allowed expenses subsequently increase or their income decreases.

II. Should this Court determine that the presumption of abuse did not arise in the Debtors' case under section 707(b)(2), this Court should remand so the district court can consider whether the bankruptcy court erred in denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Debtors' case under section 707(b)(3). The United States Trustee pressed this issue below, but because it decided the case under section 707(b)(2) the district court found it unnecessary to pass upon it.

ARGUMENT

I. THE DISTRICT COURT CORRECTLY RULED DEBTORS CANNOT CLAIM A VEHICLE OWNERSHIP DEDUCTION UNDER SECTION 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE WHEN THEY HAVE NO VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSES.

The United States Trustee asks this Court to affirm the district court's ruling that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code does not allow the Debtors to evade the presumption of abuse by claiming an inapplicable vehicle ownership expense. The district court ruled the presumption of abuse arose in the Debtors' case, because they could not deduct a vehicle ownership expense amount when they had no vehicle ownership expenses.

This case presents an issue of statutory interpretation that this Court reviews de novo. Frey v. EPA, 403 F.3d 828, 833 (7th Cir. 2005).

A. The district court's interpretation is the best reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

1. Vehicle ownership expense amounts are only applicable if a debtor is making loan or lease payments on a vehicle.

The Bankruptcy Code permits above-median-income individuals, including these Debtors, to claim a vehicle ownership expense amount when that expense is "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service. . . ." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The statute thus expressly provides that before a specific expense amount may be deducted by a debtor under the IRS Local Standards, the expense amount must first be applicable to the debtor. Id.

"Applicable" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code, so the word should be given its ordinary meaning. Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning."); Carmichael v. The Payment Center, Inc., 336 F.3d 636, 640 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Without a statutory definition, we construe [a] term in accordance with its ordinary or natural meaning, a meaning which may be supplied by a dictionary.") (internal quotation omitted)).

The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean "capable of being applied: having relevance . . . fit, suitable, or right to be applied: APPROPRIATE" Webster's Third New International Dictionary at 105 (1981) (emphasis in original).[16]

The district court applied this ordinary meaning in concluding the Debtors could not deduct a monthly vehicle loan/lease expense amount when they had no monthly loan or lease expenses on their vehicles. Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 (concluding that Congress's choice to standardize the ownership expense allowance "does not mean it also chose to make the Standards into fixed allowances guaranteed to every car owner"). The point here is simple – a debtor has no section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) vehicle ownership expense amounts that are "capable of being applied" to him if he does not make any lease or loan payments. See Ransom v. MBNA America Bank, N.A. (In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 799, 807-08 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007). All lower appellate decisions agree on this point, and reject the Debtors' contrary interpretation. Grossman v. Sawdy (In re Sawdy), __ B.R. __, 2008 WL

[16] This Court has not defined "applicable" in a bankruptcy context, but has observed that it is a "protean word that takes color from context; it lacks a single, enduring meaning." Sierra Club v. EPA, 375 F.3d 537, 541 (7th Cir. 2004). The district court's construction of "applicable" within section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) recognizes the proper contextual meaning of the word.

789116 (E.D. Wis. March 17, 2008); Wieland v. Thomas (In re Thomas), 382 B.R. 793 (D. Kan. 2008); Meade v. McVay (In re Meade), __B.R. __, 2008 WL 792060 (W.D. Tex. Jan. 24, 2008); United States Trustee v. Deadmond (In re Deadmond), 2008 WL 191165 (D. Mont. Jan. 22, 2008); Fokkena v. Hartwick (In re Hartwick), 373 B.R. 645 (D. Minn. 2007); Babin v. Wilson (In re Wilson), __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 681102 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. March 14, 2008).

2. The Debtors' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is grammatically erroneous and renders the word "applicable" superfluous.

The Debtors attack the district court's interpretation on a grammatical basis, claiming that "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) modifies "amounts specified," not "monthly expense." Debtor's Br. at 18. They claim "monthly expense" is itself an adjective that also modifies "amounts specified." Id. From this claim, the Debtors reach the conclusion that "applicable" refers only to the "number of cars owned by the debtor," because the "only basis" for finding the applicable amount is the "various categories under which the amounts are set forth." Id. at 19. Under the Debtors' reading, they can claim the amount under the IRS Local Standards for each car they own even if they do not have any loan or lease payments.[17] Id.

The Debtors' grammatical interpretation is erroneous for two reasons. First, "monthly expense" is not an adjective. The word "monthly" is an adjective, like "applicable," and it modifies the compound noun "expense amount." See Webster's Third New International Dictionary at 800 (1981) (indicating that "expense" is a noun but not an adjective, that "expense account" is a noun, and that "expense constant" is a noun).

Second, the Debtors' grammatical construction of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) ignores this Court's teaching that words must be viewed "not in isolation but in the context of the terms that surround them." Matter of Merchants Grain, Inc., 93 F.3d 1347, 1354 (7th Cir. 1996). The word "applicable" modifies the term that directly follows it: "monthly expense amounts." But the Debtors would skip the two words immediately following "applicable" – "monthly expense" – in order to cherry-pick the isolated term "amounts specified" as the nouns that "applicable" modifies. This approach of "slicing a statute into phrases" while ignoring the context of surrounding words, is "a formula for disaster." Freeman United Coal Mining Co. v.

Foster, 30 F.3d 834, 838 (7th Cir. 1994).

Even assuming for the sake of argument that "applicable" modifies only "amounts specified," the Debtors' argument gets them nowhere in their contention that they are eligible for an ownership expense deduction regardless of whether they have any ownership expenses. That is because the amount specified under the IRS Local Standards is still not "applicable" to them under the ordinary dictionary definition of the word: the Debtors have no ownership expenses in the first place, so the specified amount is not capable of being applied to them and not relevant to their case.[18]

The Debtors' reading of "applicable" is also flawed because it renders that word superfluous. See Debtors' Br. at 17. Under the Debtors' interpretation, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would have the same meaning without the word "applicable" in it. The Debtors suggest the word simply instructs debtors to go to the IRS standards referenced in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) and locate the standard dollar figure it establishes for a debtor's locality and for the number of vehicles the debtor has. Debtors' Br. at 18. But debtors would do the same thing if the word were not in the statute because the statute would still provide "[t]he debtor's monthly expense shall be the debtor's ~~applicable~~ monthly expense amounts" under the IRS standards. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). This phrasing would still lead the debtor to the same line under the Local Standards that the Debtors suggest the word "applicable" exists to accomplish. Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (E.D. Wis. 2007) ("Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) [without using the word 'applicable.']"); Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (concluding that the Debtors' construction would "read[] 'applicable' right out of the Bankruptcy Code"); Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4 ("The word ['applicable'] must mean something, and if some monthly expenses are applicable, then other monthly expenses are not applicable.").

[18] In calculating disposable income, so long as a debtor incurs some vehicle ownership expense, i.e., the expense is applicable to the debtor, the debtor is entitled to list the full amount specified under the IRS Local Standards, even if the debtor's "actual" expense is lower. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (providing that the applicable expense amount "shall be" the amount "specified" under the IRS Local Standards). See also Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650 (recognizing that any vehicle ownership expense will make a debtor eligible for the full IRS standard amount).

Because the Debtors' reading renders "applicable" superfluous, the word must have a different meaning than the one they ascribe. See generally Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect"); Witzke v. Fernal, 376 F.3d 744, 753 (7th Cir. 2004) ("We must read a statute to give effect to each word so as to avoid rendering any words meaningless, redundant, or superfluous.”). As we explain above, the word “applicable” does have a different meaning. Under its dictionary meaning, the word exists to allow debtors to claim a standard vehicle expense amount that is applicable because they have a loan or lease expense.[19]

B. The district court’s interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) fulfills two goals Congress expressed in enacting the 2005 Act: ensuring that above-median-income debtors repay their debts when they can, and eliminating abuse.

1. Congress passed the 2005 Act to maximize debtor repayment to creditors and to eliminate opportunities for bankruptcy abuse.

In interpreting “applicable” in 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), this Court may consider the [19] Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) includes the proviso that monthly expenses may not include any “payments for debts.” In contrast to the suggestion the Debtors offer, see Debtors’ Br. at 20, debtors for whom the ownership expense is applicable do not deduct their “payments” for debts. Instead, debtors receive a fixed standard allowance that is the dollar amount under the applicable standard.

The “payment for debts” language ensures that debtors do not deduct their actual payments for debts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) for categories in the IRS’s Other Necessary Expenses. Other Necessary Expenses categories include secured debt payments, repayments of delinquent tax debts, and student loans. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.10, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html#d0e195695. Secured debt payments may be deducted under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii), and repayments of delinquent tax debts may be deducted under section 707(b)(2)(A)(iv). Student loan payments, however, may not be deducted under the means test for above-median debtors.

relevant legislative history to determine the statute's objectives and illuminate its text. Boim v. Quranic Literacy Inst. and Holy Land Found. for Relief and Dev., 291 F.3d 1000, 1009 (7th Cir. 2002). See also Gillespie v. Trans Union Corp., 482 F.3d 907, 910 (7th Cir. 2007) (examining statutory language and legislative history to determine meaning of word undefined in statute).

The "heart" of the 2005 Act is the means test, which seeks to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89.[20] Cf. Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798 ("If a debtor were permitted a car ownership allowance when he actually incurs no such expense, application of the means test would not accurately reflect the debtor's ability to repay creditors, and the purpose of the statute would be frustrated."). The 2005 Act also seeks to eliminate "loopholes and incentives" in the system "that allow and – sometimes – even encourage opportunistic personal filings and abuse." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5, 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 92.

Ensuring that above-median-income debtors are eligible to claim standardized deductions for vehicle ownership expenses only when they have ownership expenses honors congressional intent that such debtors repay their debts when they are able. See Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 ("The statute is only concerned about protecting the debtor's ability to continue owning a car, and if the debtor already owns the car, the debtor is adequately protected."); Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same); Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807 ("[W]hat is important is the payments that debtors actually make, not how many cars they own, because the payments that debtors make are what actually affect their ability to make payments to their creditors."); Wilson, __ B.R. __, 2008 WL 681102 at *3 (noting that for above-median-income chapter 13 debtors, the "purpose" of the 2005 Act was to "require" such debtors "to make more funds available to their unsecured creditors").

[20] There is no Senate Report or Conference Report to the 2005 Act.

The House Report for the 2005 Act confirms the district court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is fully consistent with the intent of the act. See, e.g., United States v. Robinson, 8 F.3d 418, 421 (7th Cir. 1993) (examining legislative history and finding it "consistent" with statutory language).

2. The Debtors' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would yield results that conflict with congressional intent.

The Debtors' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would frustrate the 2005 Act's goal of proper repayment by allowing above-median-income debtors to claim phantom expenses that do not apply to them.[21] As the district court

[21] By incorrectly deducting $803 in monthly ownership expense amounts for nonexistent monthly expenses in calculating disposable income, the Debtors' interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would deprive creditors of significant payments the creditors would otherwise receive in a chapter 13 plan. In chapter concluded, when a debtor "has no monthly ownership expenses, it makes no sense to deduct an ownership expense to shield it from creditors." Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766.

Under the Debtors' reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), a higher-income debtor with an inoperable car "rusting away in his backyard" could claim the ownership expense amount simply because the car is an "automobile" and he "owns" it. Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 768. This statutory reading has been rejected by lower appellate courts because it "defies common sense." Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4.

C. Although the district court did not choose to rely on the IRS's methodology as a ground for its decision, the district court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is consistent with the IRS's refusal to allow parties to claim nonexistent vehicle ownership expenses under its Local Standard.

The Debtors concede the district court did not base its decision on how the IRS determines threshold eligibility for deductions under its standards.[22] Debtors'

13, debtors are required to devote all of their disposable income to repaying unsecured creditors. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B).

[22] The district court opinion nowhere references or relies upon the IRS's approach that individuals without ownership expenses are not eligible for the ownership expense deduction under the Local Standard. See Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762.

Nevertheless, the amicus brief of the National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys (NACBA) contends that the district court "adopt[ed]" the Br. at 24. The Debtors nevertheless insist courts could not consult the IRS's own threshold eligibility framework and advance that as a ground for reversing the district court. Id. at 22-26, 29.

The district court's construction should not be rejected for improperly relying upon an analysis it never mentioned. Even if the district court could be reversed for such an odd reason, the IRS's eligibility criteria for deductions under its Local Standards support the district court's construction of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). There are two reasons why this is so.

First, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s text requires that expense amounts be those established "under" the IRS standards. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). This textual "reference to amounts specified 'under' the Standards indicates that one should use the numbers that result when the Standards are applied as they usually are." Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798. Given the text of the statute, "the most logical resource to consult is the IRS" to determine whether the IRS's Local Standard is "applicable" to a particular debtor. Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650-51.

Under its Local Standard for vehicle ownership, the IRS prohibits vehicle ownership deductions if an individual has no loan or lease payments.[23] See IRS IRS's approach. NACBA Amicus Br. at 18.

[23] For individuals with existing vehicle ownership costs, the IRS applies the expense deduction as a "cap," under which an individual may take the lower of his

Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B) (providing that if a taxpayer has no vehicle loan or lease payments, the Local Standard ownership cost cannot be claimed by the taxpayer); id., § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

The district court's construction applies section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to deny the nonexistent expenses that the IRS also disallows under its Local Standards. Accord Sawdy, 2008 WL 789116 at *4 (finding it "logical to look at the actual IRS Collection Financial Standards in determining the applicable expense Standards in bankruptcy actions"); Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798 ("[I]t does not appear that Congress intended to adopt only the numbers contained in the Standards without the context and meaning provided by the IRS in creating the Standards and in its normal application of those numbers.").

Second, Congress was interested in more than the mere numbers found in the IRS Local Standards in crafting section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The House Report to the actual expense or the standardized expense amount. See Appendix, IRS Collection Financial Standards (stating that under the Local Standards, "the taxpayer is allowed the amount actually spent or the standard, whichever is less").

As the Debtors recognize, the Bankruptcy Code prescribes a different application for debtors with existing ownership costs: in calculating disposable income, it permits debtors the entire expense amount. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (providing that the applicable expense amount "shall be" the amount "specified" under the IRS Local Standard); Debtors' Br. at 8, 16.

legislation provides that the debtor's monthly expenses "must be the applicable monthly amounts set forth in the [IRS] Financial Analysis Handbook as Necessary Expenses under the National and Local Standards categories." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 99-100 (2005).[24] The Financial Analysis Handbook provides that the Local Standard ownership cost cannot be claimed if a taxpayer has no vehicle loan or lease payments.[25] See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

[24] The Debtors argue that language from an unenacted version of bankruptcy legislation from a prior session of Congress reveals that the 2005 Act meant to forbid courts from consulting the IRS methodology. Debtors' Br. at 24-25. The Debtors attach special importance to the fact that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the 2005 Act defines allowable expenses differently than the proposed 1998 legislation, which included a specific reference to the IRS's Financial Analysis Handbook.

This argument has two significant weaknesses. First, the language of the 2005 Act does not indicate any intent to preclude reference to the IRS's application of its own expense standards and requires that deductions be taken "under" the Local Standards. Second, the legislative history of the 2005 Act specifically references the IRS Financial Analysis Handbook in describing "applicable" expense amounts. See H.R. Rep. 109-31 (I), at 99-100 (2005).

[25] For the other reasons advanced by the district court and in this brief, the district court ruling should be affirmed even if this Court concludes that the IRS's application has no bearing.

D. The district court's construction of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) implements sound bankruptcy policy.

1. The district court's reading is fair to debtors and creditors.

The district court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is fair. It does not hurt below-median-income debtors – those who comprise the vast majority of bankruptcy filers – because such debtors are not subject to section 707(b)(2) in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(7).

The district court's reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is also fair because it ensures that above-median-income debtors will repay their debts when they can. In enacting the 2005 Act, Congress was concerned that under the prior system, "some bankruptcy debtors are able to repay a significant portion of their debts" but are not required to do so. H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92.

The district court's interpretation is fair to creditors because it recognizes that debtors with a financial ability to repay creditors a monthly amount above the statutory threshold in section 707(b)(2) should be subject to paying back their creditors outside of chapter 7. By contrast, the Debtors' interpretation is unfair to creditors because it would allow above-median-income debtors to use nonexistent expenses to lower their disposable income below the threshold for the presumption of abuse. Rather than being subject to higher repayments outside chapter 7, such debtors would instead discharge debts they are able to pay.[26]

2. The bankruptcy system protects debtors who lack vehicle ownership expenses from hardship.

Under the district court's interpretation, at least three safety valves are available to prevent hardships against above-median-income debtors who have no vehicle ownership expenses. First, where debtors own older or higher-mileage vehicles, they are afforded special protection. Debtors who own unencumbered vehicles over 6 years old or with 75,000 or more miles are entitled to an additional $200 in monthly operating expenses per vehicle. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Pt. 5, ch. 8, § 5.8.5.5.2 ("Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses"), available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html. See also Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (recognizing $200 additional allowance); Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same); Wilson, 2008 WL 681102 at *4 (same).

[26] It has been argued unsuccessfully before the lower appellate courts that permitting the vehicle ownership expense deduction only when a debtor has loan or lease payments would allow an unfair windfall for a hypothetical debtor with only a few or a single monthly payment remaining on his vehicle. See, e.g., Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 767-68 (rejecting this argument). This argument fails to recognize that such cases should be dismissed under section 707(b)(3)(B) based on the totality of the circumstances of the debtors' financial situations. Even when debtors pass the means test, they face dismissal under section 707(b)(3)(B) when they will be able to repay debts given the imminent satisfaction of vehicle loan or lease obligations.

Second, even if the presumption of abuse arises for an above-median-income debtor, the debtor may nonetheless obtain bankruptcy relief. Even if the debtor's case presents an abuse of chapter 7, the debtor may elect to convert his chapter 7 case to a case under chapter 13 or chapter 11 both of which, unlike chapter 7, requires such a debtor to repay debts through a repayment plan. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1).

Third, nothing prevents an above-median-income chapter 7 debtor whose case is dismissed from later refiling and appropriately deducting expenses for loan or lease payments for a vehicle obtained after the dismissal. A debtor whose monthly disposable income drops below the statutory presumption of abuse threshold is also free to refile and obtain a discharge.[27]

[27] Upon refiling, the debtor will face the possibility of a time-limited automatic stay if he files within a year of the dismissal. See 11 U.S.C. 362(c)(3)(A). The debtor may, however, also obtain relief from this limitation under section 362(c)(3)(B).

II. IF THIS COURT RULES THAT DEBTORS MAY CLAIM A VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSE DEDUCTION WITHOUT ANY EXISTING OWNERSHIP EXPENSES, IT SHOULD REMAND SO THE DISTRICT COURT CAN DECIDE WHETHER THE TOTALITY OF THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE DEBTORS' FINANCIAL SITUATION DEMONSTRATES ABUSE.

Should this Court accept the Debtors' construction of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), it should remand this case to the district court. In ruling that the presumption of abuse arose under section 707(b)(2), the district court did not reach the alternative argument briefed by the United States Trustee that the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation demonstrated abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B). Remand would allow the district court to consider whether the bankruptcy court erred in denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B). See Walker v. Wallace Auto Sales, Inc., 155 F.3d 927, 936 (7th Cir. 1998) (remanding for consideration of issue not initially reached by the district court).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States respectfully asks this Court to affirm the decision of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, reversing the decision of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

ADDENDUM

11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)

The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief, for the debtor, the dependents of the debtor, and the spouse of the debtor in a joint case, if the spouse is not otherwise a dependent. Such expenses shall include reasonably necessary health insurance, disability insurance, and health savings account expenses for the debtor, the spouse of the debtor, or the dependents of the debtor. Notwithstanding any other provision of this clause, the monthly expenses of the debtor shall not include any payments for debts. In addition, the debtor's monthly expenses shall include the debtor's reasonably necessary expenses incurred to maintain the safety of the debtor and the family of the debtor from family violence as identified under section 309 of the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act, or other applicable Federal law. The expenses included in the debtor's monthly expenses described in the preceding sentence shall be kept confidential by the court. In addition, if it is demonstrated that it is reasonable and necessary, the debtor's monthly expenses may also include an additional allowance for food and clothing of up to 5 percent of the food and clothing categories as specified by the National Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service.

Collection Financial Standards

General

Collection Financial Standards are used to help determine a taxpayer's ability to pay a delinquent tax liability.

Allowances for food, clothing and other items, known as the National Standards, apply nationwide except for Alaska and Hawaii, which have their own tables. Taxpayers are allowed the total National Standards amount for their family size and income level, without questioning amounts actually spent.

Maximum allowances for housing and utilities and transportation, known as the Local Standards, vary by location. Unlike the National Standards, the taxpayer is allowed the amount actually spent or the standard, whichever is less.

Food, Clothing and Other Items

National Standards for reasonable amounts have been established for five necessary expenses: food, housekeeping supplies, apparel and services, personal care products and services, and miscellaneous.

All standards except miscellaneous are derived from the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) Consumer Expenditure Survey (CES). The miscellaneous standard has been established by the IRS.

Alaska and Hawaii

Due to their unique geographic circumstances and higher cost of living, separate standards for food, clothing and other items have been established for Alaska and Hawaii .

Housing and Utilities

The housing and utilities standards are derived from Census and BLS data, and are provided by state down to the county level.

Transportation

The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs broken down by Census Region and Metropolitan Statistical Area (MSA). Public transportation is included under operating costs. A conversion chart has been provided with the standards which shows which IRS districts fall under each Census Region, as well as the counties included in each MSA. The ownership cost portion of the transportation standard, although it applies nationwide, is still considered part of the Local Standards.

The ownership costs provide maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense. The operating costs are derived from BLS data.

If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, only the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

Recent Revisions

The Local Standards for housing and utilities and transportation were revised on 02/01/06 to:

- add family size to the housing and utilities allowances (two or less, three, and four or more);
- base automobile ownership/leasing costs on the five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors; and,
- reflect updated information from the Bureau of Labor Statistics.
- Housing and Utility Standards have been established in 2006 for U.S. Territories

The revised Local Standards for housing and utilities and transportation are effective for financial analysis conducted on or after January 1, 2006.

Having considered these materials in reference to the criteria set forth in 11 U.S.C. sec. 707(b)(2)(A), and pursuant to 11 U.S.C. sec. 704(b)(2), the U.S. Trustee has determined that:(1) the case is presumed to be an abuse under sec. 707(b); and (2) the product of the current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is not less than the requirements specified in sec. 704(b)(2)(A) or (B). As required by 11 U.S.C. sec. 704(b)(2), the U.S. Trustee will file a motion to dismiss or convert under sec. 707(b) or file a statement setting forth the reasons the U.S. Trustee does not consider such a motion to be appropriate not later than 30 days after the first meeting of creditors. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

FORM B9A (10/05)

Filing of Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Case	A bankruptcy case under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code (Title 11, United States Code) has been filed in this court by or against the debtor(s) listed on the front side, and an order for relief has been entered.
Legal Advice	No employee of the United States Bankruptcy Court may give legal advice.
Creditors Generally May Not Take Certain Actions	Prohibited collection actions are listed in Bankruptcy Code §362. Common examples of prohibited actions include contacting the debtor by telephone, mail, or otherwise to demand repayment; taking actions to collect money or to obtain property from the debtor; repossessing the debtor's property; or starting or continuing lawsuits or foreclosures; or garnishing or deducting from the debtor's wages. Under certain circumstances, the stay may be limited to 30 days, or not exist at all; although the debtor can request the court to extend or impose the stay.
Presumption of Abuse	If the presumption of abuse arises, creditors may have the right to file a motion to dismiss the case under § 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. The debtor may rebut the presumption by showing special circumstances.
Meeting of Creditors	A meeting of creditors is scheduled for the date, time, and location listed on the front side. The debtor (both spouses in a joint case) must be present at the meeting, with photo identification and proof of social security number, to be questioned under oath by the trustee and by creditors. Failure of the debtor to appear at the meeting of creditors may result in dismissal of this case without further notice. Creditors are welcome to attend but are not required to do so. The meeting may be continued and concluded at a later date without further notice.
Debtor Must File Required Information	Subject to 11 USC §521(i)(2) and (4) and notwithstanding 11 USC §707(a), if the debtor fails to file all of the information required under 11 USC §521(a)(1) within 45 days of the date of filing the petition, this case will be dismissed without further notice.
Do Not File a Proof of Claim at This Time	There does not appear to be any property available to the trustee to pay creditors. You therefore should not file a proof of claim at this time. If it later appears that assets are available to pay creditors, you will be sent another notice telling you that you may file a proof of claim, and informing you of the deadline for filing your proof of claim. If this notice is mailed to a creditor at a foreign address, the creditor may file a motion requesting the court to extend the deadline.
Discharge of Debts	The debtor is seeking a discharge of most debts, which may include your debt. A discharge means that you may never try to collect the debt from the debtor. If you believe that the debtor is not entitled to receive a discharge under Bankruptcy Code §727(a) or that a debt owed to you is not dischargeable under Bankruptcy Code §523(a)(2), (4), or (6), you must start a lawsuit by filing a complaint in the bankruptcy clerk's office by the "Deadline to File a Complaint Objecting to Discharge of the Debtor or to Determine Dischargeability of Certain Debts" listed on the front side. The bankruptcy clerk's office must receive the complaint and any required filing fee by that deadline.
Exempt Property	The debtor is permitted by law to keep certain property as exempt. Exempt property will not be sold and distributed to creditors. The debtor must file a list of all property claimed as exempt. You may inspect that list at the bankruptcy clerk's office. If you believe that an exemption claimed by the debtor is not authorized by law, you may file an objection to that exemption. The bankruptcy clerk's office must receive any objection by the "Deadline to Object to Exemptions" listed on the front side.
Bankruptcy Clerk's Office	Any paper that you file in this bankruptcy case should be filed at the bankruptcy clerk's office at the address listed on the front side. You may inspect all papers filed, including the lists of the debtor's property, debts, and property claimed as exempt, at the bankruptcy clerk's office.
Foreign Creditors	Consult a lawyer familiar with United States bankruptcy law if you have any questions regarding your rights in this case.

UNITED STATES BANKRUPTCY COURT
EASTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN

In re: MARVIN F. ROSS-TOUSEY and DEBORAH H. TOUSEY

Debtors.

MOTION BY THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE TO DISMISS

NOW COMES the United States Trustee, by Attorney David W. Asbach, who hereby moves to dismiss this case as an abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §707(b)(3) on the following grounds:

1. This Court has jurisdiction over this motion pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §157 and §1334. The United States Trustee has standing to file this motion pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §586(a) and 11 U.S.C. §307. This is a core proceeding.
2. On August 18, 2006, Marvin F. Ross-Tousey and Deborah H. Tousey ("Debtors") commenced this case by filing a voluntary petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code.
3. This case should be dismissed as an abuse of the bankruptcy system, pursuant to 707(b)(1) and (b)(3)(B).
4. In considering the totality of the circumstances, the courts consider at least five factors:
    a. Whether there was any sudden illness, calamity, unemployment or disability;
    b. Whether the debtor made purchases in excess of his or her ability to pay;
    c. Whether the debtor's budget is excessive or unreasonable;
    d. Whether the schedules and statement of financial affairs reasonably and accurately

Attorney David W. Asbach
Office of the United States Trustee reflects the debtor’s true financial condition; and

e. Whether the debtor’s petition is filed in good faith.

In re Green, 934 F.2d 568,572 (4th Cir. 1991).

5. The Debtors’ Schedule I sets forth total monthly net income in the amount of $3,618.88 with no changes of more than 10% expected within the next year. However, the U.S. Trustee asserts that certain deductions should be added back into that figure, namely:

   a. Contributions to a 401(k) plan in the amount of $106 per month. See In re Cohen, 246 B.R. 658, 665-67 (Bankr. D.Colo. 2000).

Eliminating these deductions results in net monthly income in the approximate amount of $3,699.44. [$3,618.88 + ($106 x 76%) = $3,699.44]

6. The Debtors’ Schedule J contains expenses which appear unreasonable and beyond the amounts necessary for the maintenance and support of the Debtors, including:

   a. Home Maintenance. The Debtors assert they spend $600 per month on home maintenance. However, it is not clear the Debtors have actually been spending this amount per month and the Debtors have not provided any documentation to support this expense. At a minimum, this expense should be reduced by $254 to the IRS standards of $346 per month for non-mortgage expenses.

   b. Replacement Vehicle. The Debtors assert they are reserving $500 per month for a “replacement vehicle.” Again, however, it is not clear the Debtors have actually been saving this amount per month on average. The Debtors’ Schedule B does not appear to reflect an account where this money was deposited. Moreover, the Debtors own 6 vehicles. At a minimum, this expense should be reduced by $29 to the IRS standards for the ownership expense for one vehicle in the amount of $471 per month.

c. Time Share. The Debtors list a monthly payment of $155.82 for a time share. This expense does not appear necessary for the maintenance and support of the Debtors, and therefore should be excluded from their expenses. To the extent this obligation is a secured debt, the Debtors have not expressed an intention to reaffirm it.

d. Vacuum. The Debtors list a monthly installment payment of $42.39 on a debt to Bay Finance for a vacuum cleaner loan with a balance of $2,021.52 per Schedule F. This expense does not appear necessary for the maintenance and support of the Debtors, and therefore should be excluded. The Debtors could easily find a more reasonably priced vacuum cleaner and avoid monthly payments. Moreover, the Debtors have not expressed an intention to reaffirm the debt to Bay Finance.

7. Reducing the expenses on Schedule J as described above would lower the Debtors' total monthly expenses to $3,188.50.

8. Based upon the above analysis, the Debtors would be able to pay a meaningful portion of their debts in a Chapter 13 Plan, approximated as follows:

Monthly Income:	$3,699.44
Monthly Expenses:	$3,188.50
Excess Monthly Income ($):	$510.94
Total Unsecured Claims:	$75,323.63	% Div. to Unsec'd Creditors:
Funds ($) avail. for 36 mo. Ch. 13 Plan:	$18,393.84	24.42%
Funds ($) avail. for 60 mo. Ch. 13 Plan:	$30,656.40	40.70%

9. As demonstrated, the Debtors have the ability to pay a meaningful dividend to their unsecured creditors over the life of a five-year Chapter 13 plan and there appears to be no reason for their unwillingness or inability to do so.

WHEREFORE, the United States Trustee requests the Court enter an order dismissing this case as an abuse.

The U.S. Trustee is not filing a brief with this pleading but reserves the right to file a responsive brief if necessary.

Dated: October 30, 2006.

SUPPLEMENT TO U.S. TRUSTEE'S MOTION TO DISMISS

NOW COMES U.S. Trustee William T. Neary, by Attorney David W. Asbach, having filed a Motion to Dismiss on October 30, 2006 and now, pursuant to FRCP 15(d), moves the court to supplement the above described motion as follows:

1. The U.S. Trustee, relying on information provided by the Debtor, performed his own calculations and determined that the presumption of abuse arises in this case. See Exhibit 2.

Statutory Definition of Presumption of Abuse

2. Section 707(b)(1) provides that the Court may dismiss a case filed by an individual whose debts are primarily consumer debts if it finds that granting relief would be an abuse of the provisions of Chapter 7.

3. Section 707(b)(2)(A)(i) requires the Court to presume that a Chapter 7 filing is abusive when the Current Monthly Income (CMI) reduced by amounts determined under §707(b)(2)(A) (ii), (iii), and (iv), and multiplied by 60 is not less than the lesser of –

(I) 25 percent of the nonpriority unsecured claims in the case, or $6,000, whichever is greater; or

(II) $10,000.

4. Therefore, if the monthly net income is $166.67 or more (at least $10,000 to fund a 60-month plan), the filing is presumed abusive.

5. If the presumption of abuse arises, debtors may rebut it only by demonstrating special circumstances, such as a serious medical condition or a call or an order to active duty in the Armed Forces, and only to the extent such special circumstances justify additional expenses or adjustments to CMI for which there is no reasonable alternative. §707(b)(2)(B)(i). Debtors must provide a detailed explanation of the special circumstances, itemize and document each additional expense or adjustment of income, and attest under oath to the accuracy of the information provided. §707(b)(2)(B)(ii) and (iii).

6. In the event debtors can establish special circumstances of the kind described in §707(b)(2)(B)(i), they can rebut the presumption of abuse only if they can demonstrate that the additional expenses or adjustments to income cause the product of their reduced monthly net income, when multiplied by 60, to be the lesser of (1) 25% of the nonpriority unsecured debts or $6,000, whichever is greater, or (2) $10,000. §707(b)(2)(B)(iv).

7. The U.S. Trustee timely filed all documents as required by 704(b)(1)(A).

The U.S. Trustee's Corrected Form B22A Demonstrates that the Presumption of Abuse Arises in This Case

8. On their Form B22A, Debtor Marvin Ross-Tousey reported monthly gross wages of $2,516.48 and Debtor Deborah Tousey reported monthly gross wages of $2,679.32. See Exhibit 1, Line 3.

9. The Debtors stated that their Total CMI was $5,195.80 and their annualized income was $62,349.60. See Exhibit 1, Lines 12 and 13. The Debtors claimed a household size of two. See Exhibit 1, Line 14. The applicable state median income for a family of two is $49,918. The Debtors' annualized income reported on the amended Form B22A exceeds the applicable median income.

10. Because their income exceeded the applicable state median family income, the Debtors were required to complete the remainder of amended Form B22A. After completing the remainder of Form B22A, the Debtors checked the box indicating that the presumption of abuse did not arise in their case.

11. Based on materials filed by the Debtors and the U.S. Trustee's calculations of allowable expenses and deductions, the U.S. Trustee prepared a corrected Form B22A . See Exhibit 2.

12. The corrected Form B22A adjusts the figures listed on the Debtors' Form B22A for local standards; housing and utilities adjustment (Line 21), vehicle operation expenses (Line 22) and vehicle ownership expenses (Lines 23 and 24).

13. The corrected Form B22A reveals that the Debtors' actual monthly disposable income is $260.50. Exhibit 2, Line 50.

14. As $260.50 exceeds $166.67, the corrected B22A Form shows that the presumption of abuse arises in this case.

A. Local Standards; housing and utilities adjustment

15. The Debtors include the amount of $50 for repairs to their home on Line 21. However, the expenses reflected at Line 20A already includes home maintenance and repairs. Moreover, the Debtors have not provided documentation to prove this extra expense. Therefore, the amount has been removed from Line 21 on the corrected Form B22A.

B. Transportation/Vehicle Operating and Ownership Expenses

16. The Debtors operate multiple vehicles and, accordingly, they may deduct the operating expenses for two vehicles on Line 22. The Local Standards for vehicle operating expenses for two vehicles is $358.

17. However, the Debtors own all these vehicles free and clear of any liens.

18. Nevertheless, the Debtors claimed to have ownership expenses for these two vehicles and then entered "zero" on Line 23b and 24b. By asserting that they have ownership expenses associated with two vehicles, ownership expenses are added the Form B22A calculations, Line 23 and Line 24, increasing the allowable expenses under §707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

19. The Debtors cannot claim an ownership expense on Line 23 and 24 because these vehicles are neither financed nor leased. In re Barraza, 346 BR 724, 727 (N.D.Texas 2006)

20. Under IRS collection guidelines, which are incorporated by reference into §707(b)(2), the debtor may add $200 to the transportation expenses for a vehicle that is either (1) more than six years old or (2) has over 75,000 miles and requires no associated ownership expense. I.R.M. §5.8.5.5.2., Barraza at 729.

21. In the present case, the Debtors own two vehicles that fit within the parameters described in ¶ 20. Therefore, they are entitled to an additional operating expense of $200 per vehicle, for a total adjustment of Line 22 to $758.

22. The corrected Form B22A adjusts Line 22 from $358 to $758, and removes the ownership expenses claimed on Lines 23 and 24. See Exhibit 2.

This Case Should Be Dismissed Pursuant to §707(b)(1)

25. To date, the Debtors have not come forward with any evidence of special circumstances to rebut the presumption of abuse as required by §707(b)(2)(B).

26. In the alternative, if the Court does not find the presumption of abuse arises or is rebutted, the Court shall consider whether this case should be dismissed for bad faith or under the totality of the circumstances. §707(b)(3)(A) and (B).

when they were considered an abuse. The provision was replaced with a means test for debtors whose income were above the median, and in addition, if the debtors were able to establish that there wasn't a presumption of abuse under the means test or if they successfully rebutted the presumption of abuse, then under 707(b)(3) the case can be dismissed as an abuse based on the totality of the circumstances under 707(b)(2), that is when applying the means test there's a presumption of abuse if the debtors' income less -- currently monthly income less the enumerated expenses exceeds a certain amount, under 707(b)(3) there is no presumption and the U.S. trustee must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the totality of the circumstances demonstrates that the debtors' case is an abuse. There's no presumption either way. There's no presumption in favor of bankruptcy relief. There's no presumption in favor of abuse.

In this case, The Court has ruled that and does continue to affirm that even though the debtors do not have loans on the vehicles, they are entitled to take ownership expense deductions for two vehicles and this they have done. That authority for that is in RE Grunert, and that decision is available on The Court's web site. Once we allow those deductions, then the other two that the U.S. trustee was concerned about was the $50 repair allowance and the $150 or so expense for a time share that the debtors do not intend to keep. Even if we subtract those from the authorized and allowed expenses, we still do not reach a failure of the means test. So that the 707(b)(2) motion is denied.

Turning to the 707(b)(3), the totality of the circumstances the U.S. trustee's case is grounded in and sounds very much like the old 707(b) motions that were brought, the U.S. trustee points to perhaps an excessive amount being budget for repairs, which then are not made, instead the debtors have used the money for other items; medical expenses, helping children that may be -- they may be legally not dependent but if the debtor needs to spend extra money on gas in order to visit a child in the hospital, I have a hard time -- and I would have had a hard time pre-BAPCPA -- and I will continue to have a hard time now saying that's an abuse. The debtors live, it seems to me, quite frugally. The

EN BANC BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING APPELLEE

INTRODUCTION

Pursuant to Fed. R. App. P. 29 and 11th Cir. R. 35-9, the United States submits this brief as amicus curiae in support of appellee, urging affirmance of the district court's ruling. The United States will address the following question, set forth in the Court's notice of July 18, 2008:

Are the requirements in 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) for filing an involuntary bankruptcy petition subject to waiver or are they subject matter jurisdictional in nature, such that they cannot be waived?

In the first instance, however, the United States will also address this Court's jurisdiction over the instant appeal.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of the federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88 (1977), as reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6049. The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 307; see In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000).

In this brief, the United States respectfully offers this Court its views on the correct interpretation of 11 U.S.C. § 303(b). See 28 U.S.C. § 517 (authorizing Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States").

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the requirements set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) for commencing an involuntary bankruptcy proceeding are jurisdictional in nature, and therefore not subject to waiver.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statute Involved.

At the time the involuntary bankruptcy petition was filed in the instant case, the relevant statute stated in pertinent part that:

> An involuntary case against a person is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under chapter 7 or 11 of this title -- (1) by three or more entities, each of which is either a holder of a claim, against such person that is not contingent as to liability or the subject of a bona fide dispute, or an indenture trustee representing such a holder, if such claims aggregate at least $11,625 more than the value of any lien on property of the debtor securing such claims held by the holders of such claims; [or] (2) if there are fewer than 12 such holders, excluding any [employees, insiders, and transferees of certain voidable transfers], by one or more of such holders that hold in the aggregate at least $11,625 of such claims . . . .

B. Facts of the Case.

The pertinent facts are set forth in the panel opinion. Slip op. 2-5. The statute at issue is 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) (reproduced in section A, supra), which authorizes the commencement of a bankruptcy case through the filing of an involuntary bankruptcy petition against a debtor, under specified conditions concerning the number of creditors, the non-contingent, undisputed character of their claims, and the aggregate amount of the claims. See slip op. 2-3, 8-11. The following subsection, 11 U.S.C. § 303(c), allows the addition of creditors prior to dismissal of a defectively filed petition, while § 303(h), 11 U.S.C. § 303(h), further provides that "[i]f the petition is not timely controverted, the court shall order relief against the debtor in an involuntary case under the chapter under which the petition was filed." Id.

Briefly, creditor Morrison Agency, Inc. ("petitioner"), filed an involuntary chapter 7 bankruptcy petition against debtor Trusted Net Media Holdings, LLC, on April 20, 2002, claiming that the petition met the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 303(b). Slip op. 2. Debtor did not file a response, and on May 15, 2002, the bankruptcy court entered an Order for Relief and appointed a chapter 7 trustee. Id. at 3. Administration of the bankruptcy case then proceeded. Id.

In April 2004, creditor David W. Huffman (an officer and controlling member of debtor) filed a motion to dismiss the case, arguing inter alia that petitioner did not satisfy the requirements of section 303(b), both because petitioner's claim was the subject of a bona fide dispute and because petitioner did not meet the statutory criteria regarding the number of creditors. Slip op. 3-4. The chapter 7 trustee opposed the motion and, after holding a hearing, the bankruptcy court denied it on May 13, 2004. Id. at 4. Creditor Huffman did not appeal. Id.

Subsequently, more than two years later, debtor filed a motion to dismiss, essentially for the same reasons presented by creditor Huffman in 2004. Id. at 4-5. On October 10, 2006, the bankruptcy court denied the motion, holding that "§ 303(b) of the Bankruptcy Code was not jurisdictional and that 'any argument by the Debtor that the petitioning creditor's claims are the subject of a bona fide dispute or that more than one petitioning creditor was required to put this Debtor into bankruptcy has been waived.'" Id. at 5. Debtor appealed, and the district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's ruling.

Debtor appealed, and a panel of this Court (Hull, Wilson, JJ., Albritton, D.J. (sitting by designation)) reversed. See slip op. 2, 27. The panel made clear that it agreed with the holding of the bankruptcy court herein and the Ninth Circuit in In re Rubin, 769 F.2d 611 (9th Cir. 1985), to the effect that section 303(b) is not jurisdictional, and that it disagreed with the contrary ruling of the Second Circuit in In re BDC 56 LLC, 330 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2003). Slip op. 11-19. Regarding the merits of the section 303(b) question, the panel was persuaded by the text and structure of section 303 as a whole (and especially sections (c) and (h), see p. 4, supra), the Ninth Circuit's analysis in In re Rubin, supra, and the ruling of the Eleventh Circuit in In re Pugh, 158 F.3d 530, 530 (11th Cir. 1998), to the effect that other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code were not jurisdictional, that 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) is not a jurisdictional provision. Slip op. 11-19. The panel, however, concluded that under Bonner v. City of Pritchard, 661 F.2d 1206, 1207 (11th Cir. 1981) (en banc), it was bound by the contrary decision of the former Fifth Circuit in In re All Media Properties, Inc., 646 F.2d 193 (5th Cir. 1981). Slip op. 19-26.

On May 14, 2008, defendant-appellee filed a timely petition for rehearing en banc. On June 19, 2008, the Court granted the petition and vacated the panel opinion.

1. First, although we conclude that this Court has jurisdiction over the instant appeal, we consider it our duty to flag the issue for the Court, as it must assure itself that it has jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. Although the matter is not entirely free from doubt, we believe that the district court's order affirming the bankruptcy court's denial of the motion to dismiss the involuntary petition is a final order appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d).

2. Next, with respect to the question of whether the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) are jurisdictional in nature, we agree with the panel's view that these requirements do not affect subject matter jurisdiction, and are subject to waiver. "'Jurisdiction,'" as the Supreme Court has reiterated on several occasions of late, "'is a word of many, too many, meanings.'" Rockwell Int'l Corp. v. United States, 127 S. Ct. 1397, 1405 (2007), quoting Steel Co. v. Citizens for Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 90, 118 S. Ct. 1003, 1010 (1998); Arbaugh v. Y&H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 510, 126 S. Ct. 1235, 1242 (2006) (same). In its most recent rulings, the Court has distinguished among statutory requirements that are truly "jurisdictional" in character and statutory claims processing requirements that are either "absolute" or "subject to waiver." See, e.g., John R. Sand & Gravel Corp. v. United States, 128 S. Ct. 750, 753-56 (2008); Bowles v. Russell, 127 S. Ct. 2360, 2363-65 (2007); Arbaugh v. Y&H Corp., 546 U.S. at 510-16, 126 S. Ct. At 1242-45. Examination of the Court's recent precedents leads to the conclusion that the panel in the instant case correctly concluded that the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) are waivable statutory claims processing requirements.

ARGUMENT

I. THE COURT HAS JURISDICTION OVER THE INSTANT APPEAL.

At the outset, we consider it our duty to flag for the Court the issue of appellate jurisdiction, in light of the Court's obligation to assure itself that subject matter jurisdiction exists. See, e.g., United States v. Storer Broad. Co., 351 U.S. 192, 196, 76 S. Ct. 763, 766-67 (1956); In re Donovan, 532 F.3d 1132, 1136 (11th Cir. 2008); In re Walker, 515 F.3d 1204, 1210 (11th Cir. 2008). "A court of appeals has jurisdiction over only final judgments and orders arising from a bankruptcy proceeding, whereas the district court may review interlocutory judgments and orders as well." Id. at 1210, citing In re F.D.R. Hickory House, 60 F.3d 724, 725 (11th Cir. 1995); see also, e.g., In re Hillsborough Holdings Corp., 116 F.3d 1391, 1393 (11th Cir. 1997); In re Martin Bros. Toolmakers, Inc., 796 F.2d 1435, 1437-38 (11th Cir. 1986).

In our view, as the First Circuit has held, to be final, "a bankruptcy order need not resolve all of the issues in the proceeding, but it must finally dispose of all the issues pertaining to a discrete dispute within the larger proceeding." In re Perry, 391 F.3d 282, 285 (1st Cir. 2004); see also In re Cortez, 457 F.3d 448, 453-54 (5th Cir. 2006) (order denying motion to dismiss chapter 7 bankruptcy petition for abuse treated as final); In re Koch, 109 F.3d 1285, 1289 (8th Cir. 1997) (order denying motion to dismiss chapter 7 bankruptcy petition for abuse held to be final); In re Christian, 804 F.2d 46, 47-48 (3d Cir. 1986) (same). Under this analysis, an order denying a motion to dismiss an involuntary bankruptcy petition is manifestly a final, appealable order.

In its recent decision in In re Donovan, supra, however, this Court appears to have adopted a narrower view of finality in the bankruptcy context. Although we respectfully disagree with the approach and holding of In re Donovan, it is the law of the Circuit, unless or until it is overruled by the Court en banc.

Thus, under In re Donovan, there may be an issue as to this Court's own jurisdiction here, because under the latter ruling it is far from clear that the district court's affirmance of a bankruptcy court's denial of a motion to dismiss a bankruptcy petition is a final order appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(1). See In re Donovan, 532 F.3d at 1136-37 (holding that order denying motion to dismiss converted Chapter 7 bankruptcy case on abuse grounds was not an appealable final order); but cf. In re Walker, 515 F.3d at 1210 (holding that district court order affirming removal of trustee was an appealable final order); compare also, e.g., In re Mason, 709 F.2d 1313, 1315-18 (9th Cir. 1983) (court of appeals had jurisdiction to review denial of motion to vacate order of relief entered on involuntary petition), and In re McGinnis, 296 F.3d 730, 731 (8th Cir. 2002) (court of appeals had jurisdiction to review order of relief entered on involuntary bankruptcy petition), with In re Vlasek, 325 F.3d 955, 960-61 (7th Cir. 2003) (court of appeals did not have jurisdiction to review order denying debtor's motion to dismiss his voluntary bankruptcy petition).

In In re Donovan, however, the Court reaffirmed that "the finality requirement is met where practical considerations require it." In re Donovan, 532 F.3d at 1137 n.1, citing In re Walker, 515 F.3d at 1210. Here, as in In re Walker, where the removal of a trustee was at issue, practical considerations require immediate review, inasmuch as the entire existence of the bankruptcy proceeding -- and not merely its conversion from a chapter 13 proceeding to a chapter 7 proceeding (as in In re Donovan, see 534 F.3d at 1137 n.2), with its concomitant effect on individual creditors' claims -- is at stake.

Furthermore, in In re F.D.R. Hickory House, supra, the Court reiterated that it "will review immediately 'even an order of marginal finality . . . if the question presented is fundamental to further conduct of the case.'" 60 F.3d at 727 (citations omitted). Unlike the "insubstantial sum" which did not warrant immediate review in the latter case, however, the issue of whether the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) go to subject matter jurisdiction -- an issue that this Court has seen fit to decide en banc -- is just such a question. It calls for immediate resolution.

Accordingly, in the government's view, although the question may be a close one under In re Donovan, this Court has jurisdiction over the instant appeal. We would be happy to provide further briefing on this issue, however, should the Court deem it advisable.

II. 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) IS NOT A JURISDICTIONAL PROVISION.

With respect to the merits, the United States agrees with the panel's cogent analysis of the jurisdictional issue posed by 11 U.S.C. § 303(b). The en banc Court should either distinguish or overrule the Fifth Circuit ruling that the panel felt compelled to follow under Eleventh Circuit case law. Recent Supreme Court jurisprudence makes clear that the term "jurisdictional" should not be bandied about loosely, and that provisions such as the one at issue in this case are not jurisdictional in nature.

In its most recent rulings in this area, the Supreme Court has distinguished among statutory requirements that are truly "jurisdictional" in character and statutory claims processing requirements that are either "absolute" or "subject to waiver." See, e.g., John R. Sand & Gravel Corp. v. United States, 128 S. Ct. 750, 753-56 (2008); Bowles v. Russell, 127 S. Ct. 2360, 2363-65 (2007); Arbaugh v. Y&H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 510-16, 126 S. Ct. 1235, 1242-45 (2006); Steel Co. v. Citizens for Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 90, 118 S. Ct. 1003, 1010 (1998). Applying this formulation in the case at bar, the correct conclusion is that the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) are waivable statutory claims processing requirements.

A. In Arbaugh, the Supreme Court cautioned that courts have at times erroneously called a limitation jurisdictional that was actually simply an element of the claim:

> On the subject-matter jurisdiction/ingredient-of-claim-for-relief dichotomy, this Court and others have been less than meticulous. "Subject matter jurisdiction in federal-question cases is sometimes erroneously conflated with a plaintiff's need and ability to prove the defendant bound by the federal law asserted as the predicate for relief -- a merits-related determination."

546 U.S. at 511, 126 S. Ct. at 1242 (quoting 2 J. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice, § 12.30[1], at 12-36.1 (3d ed. 2005)); see also Steel Co., 523 U.S. at 90, 118 S. Ct. at 1010 ("'Jurisdiction . . . is a word of many, too many, meanings'"). To prevent such mischaracterizations, the Arbaugh Court issued a "readily administrable bright line rule":

> If the Legislature clearly states that a threshold limitation on a statute's scope shall count as jurisdictional, then courts and litigants will be duly instructed . . . . But when Congress does not rank a statutory limitation on coverage as jurisdictional, courts should treat the restriction as non-jurisdictional in character.

546 U.S. at 515-16, 126 S. Ct. at 1245.

Thus, as a general matter, statutory requirements are jurisdictional only when Congress "clearly states" that they are jurisdictional. 546 U.S. at 515, 126 S. Ct. at 1245. Typically -- but not invariably -- jurisdictional statutes are found in Title 28 of the United States Code. See 546 U.S. at 513-16, 126 S. Ct. at 1243-45; Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 452-53, 124 S. Ct. 906, 913-14 (2004) (recognizing that Title 28 determines the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts); In re Supreme Beef Processors, Inc., 468 F.3d 248, 258 (5th Cir. 2006) (concluding that if Congress wanted to modify bankruptcy court jurisdiction "it likely would have amended 28 U.S.C. 1334 . . . , not the substantive provisions of [the Bankruptcy Code].").

Arbaugh further held that "when Congress does not rank a statutory limitation . . . as jurisdictional, courts should treat the restriction as nonjurisdictional in character." Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 516, 126 S. Ct. at 1245. And the Arbaugh Court emphasized that a statutory limitation is nonjurisdictional if it "does not speak in jurisdictional terms or refer in any way to the jurisdiction of the [trial] courts." 546 U.S. at 515, 126 S. Ct. at 1245 (citation and internal quotation omitted).

Under these standards, section 303(b) is not jurisdictional. The requirements identified in the statute are not jurisdictional because Congress did not clearly state or indicate that they were jurisdictional. See Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 514, 126 S. Ct. at 1244. Section 303(b) does not speak in jurisdictional terms or refer in any way to the jurisdiction of bankruptcy courts. See 546 U.S. at 515, 126 S. Ct. at 1245. Section 303 is titled "Involuntary cases," and it sets forth the criteria for "commenc[ing]" such cases, but it does not use the language of jurisdiction. See 11 U.S.C. § 303.

Moreover, section 303(b) is not part of Title 28. Instead, 28 U.S.C. §§ 157 and 1334 determine bankruptcy court jurisdiction. Section 303(b), in turn, merely establishes the criteria for filing an involuntary bankruptcy petition before bankruptcy courts acting under their Title 28 jurisdiction. Compare also 11 U.S.C. § 105 (Bankruptcy Code provision specifying powers of bankruptcy courts).

At most, as the Ninth Circuit has held, the section 303(b) requirements constitute substantive elements of an involuntary bankruptcy petition, subject to waiver by virtue of the failure of a debtor (and/or another interested party with standing) to challenge them in a timely manner. In re Rubin, 769 F.2d 611 (9th Cir. 1985); compare, e.g., United States v. Baldwin, 414 F.3d 791, 795 (7th Cir. 2005) (recognizing that expiration of the statute of limitations is an affirmative defense, not a bar to jurisdiction), overruled on other grounds by United States v. Parker, 508 F.3d 434 (7th Cir. 2007). And the debtor and other creditors herein failed to raise the issue in timely fashion. Compare In re Pugh, 158 F.3d 530, 530 (11th Cir. 1998) (holding that the deadlines for trustee actions under 11 U.S.C. §§ 546(a) and 549(d) are waivable statutes of limitations).

Furthermore, the "timely controver[sion]" provision of 11 U.S.C. § 303, section 303(h), 11 U.S.C. § 303(h), itself suggests that the requirements of section 303(b) are not jurisdictional. Subject matter jurisdiction defects by definition are never waived, and therefore are not subject to such a "timely controver[sion]" requirement. Similarly, section 303(c) of the statute, 11 U.S.C. § 303(c), which permits the addition of creditors to a defectively filed petition prior to dismissal of that petition, suggests that section 303(b) does not establish jurisdictional requirements, inasmuch as a true defect of subject matter jurisdiction could not be cured by such an expedient device. See Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 513-16, 126 S. Ct. at 1243-45 (stating, inter alia, that "when a federal court concludes that it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction, the court must dismiss the complaint in its entirety").

In the instant case, the allegedly noncompliant involuntary bankruptcy petition was filed in April 2002; the debtor did not respond, and the bankruptcy court then appointed a chapter 7 trustee in May 2002. Creditor Huffman did not move to dismiss the case for noncompliance with section 303(b) until April 2004 (and he did not appeal the denial of his motion the following month), whereas the debtor did not move to dismiss on these grounds for another two years, i.e., until the summer of 2006. Under these circumstances, the purported noncompliance with section 303(b) has been waived, because section 303(b)'s requirements are not jurisdictional. See Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 504, 126 S. Ct. at 1238-39 (non-jurisdictional defects are waived unless they are raised in a timely fashion). The involuntary petition was not "timely controverted" within the meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 303(h). Therefore, the alleged deficiencies of the involuntary petition should not constitute a basis for reversing the district court's order.

B. Nor do the Supreme Court's post-Arbaugh rulings in Rockwell Int'l Corp. v. United States, 127 S. Ct. 1397 (2007), Bowles v. Russell, supra, and John R. Sand & Gravel Corp. v. United States, supra, suggest that 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) is either a jurisdictional provision or a mandatory claims processing provision that cannot be waived. In Rockwell Int'l Corp., the Court held that in section 3730(e)(4) of the False Claims Act, 31 U.S.C. § 3730(e)(4), "the jurisdictional nature of the original-source requirement is clear ex visceribus verborum," and further stressed that the Court had "already stated that § 3730(e)(4) speaks to 'the power of a particular court' as well as 'the substantive rights of the parties.'" Rockwell Int'l Corp., 127 S. Ct. at 1406 (citation omitted). In Bowles, the Court reiterated its observation in Kontrick, 540 U.S. at 453 and n.8, 124 S. Ct. at 914 and n.8, that statutory time limit for taking a civil appeal -- set forth in section 2107 of Title 28 of the U.S. Code -- "contains the type of statutory time constraints that would limit a court's jurisdiction," Bowles, 127 S. Ct. at 2364-65, and therefore held that "the timely filing of a notice of appeal in a civil case is a jurisdictional requirement." Id. at 2366. The Court reached a similar conclusion regarding the Court of Claims limitation statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2501 -- also found in Title 28 of the U.S. Code -- in John R. Sand & Gravel Co., 128 S. Ct. at 753-56.

These decisions are not controlling in the instant case, which does not involve a provision of Title 28 of the U.S. Code, but rather a provision of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 101 et seq., that makes no mention of jurisdiction and certainly is not jurisdictional "ex visceribus verborum," Rockwell Int'l Corp., supra. And the language quoted at pp. 11-13, supra, from Arbaugh -- a case that dealt with an employee-numerosity requirement for Title VII suits -- indeed suggests that, particularly with respect to statutory conditions other than time limits, it must be clearly indicated in the statute that Congress intended the condition to be jurisdictional. See Arbaugh 546 U.S. at 513-16, 126 S. Ct. at 1243-45; see also Rockwell Int'l Corp. 127 S. Ct. at 1406. That is manifestly not the case here.

The debtor relies principally upon Canute S.S. Co. v. Pittsburgh & West Virginia Coal Co., 263 U.S. 244, 44 S. Ct. 67 (1923), which held that "the filing of a petition, sufficient upon its face, by three petitioners alleging that they are creditors holding provable claims of the requisite amount, the insolvency of the Defendant and the commission of an act of bankruptcy within the preceding four months, clearly gives the bankruptcy court jurisdiction of the proceeding." 263 U.S. at 248-49, 44 S. Ct. at 68. As the panel opinion states, however, "Morrison's petition listed Morrison as the only petitioning creditor of Trusted Net, and described Morrison's claim against Trusted Net as 'Trade Debt/Judgment' in an amount '[n]ot less than [$]534,000.00'"; furthermore, "Morrison's involuntary petition stated that Morrison was 'eligible to file this petition pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 303(b).'" Slip op. 2. Given these averments, and the fact that § 303(b)(2) authorized the filing of a petition by a single creditor if there were fewer than twelve creditors with noncontingent, undisputed claims in excess of $11,625 (see p. 3, supra), the petition was "sufficient upon its face" within the meaning of Canute. See In re Mason, 709 F.2d 1313, 1318-19 (9th Cir. 1983) ("We agree with the lower court's determination that Mason waived his right to present this defense by failing to raise it in an answer to the petition. The lack of the requisite number of petitioning creditors did not deprive the bankruptcy court of jurisdiction to enter a valid order for relief.") (citing, inter alia, Canute); In re Rubin, 769 F.2d at 614 n.3 (discussing Mason, and stating that "these requirements are not jurisdictional in the technical sense of subject matter jurisdiction, but are instead substantive matters which must be proved or waived for petitioning creditors to prevail in involuntary proceedings. . . . The fact that Mason . . . permitted waivers indicated that the requirements were not truly prerequisites to subject matter jurisdiction, since parties cannot confer subject matter jurisdiction on a federal court by their consent.") (citation omitted). Furthermore, to the extent that dicta in Canute may be read to suggest that the requirements of section 303(b) are jurisdictional, the opinion's use of the term "jurisdiction" should be viewed in light of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court discussed herein, which painstakingly analyze the concept of subject matter jurisdiction. See, e.g., Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 510 ("'Jurisdiction . . . is a word of many, too many, meanings'") (quoting Steel Co., 523 U.S. at 90).

C. Finally, policy considerations militate strongly in favor of the conclusion that 11 U.S.C. § 303(b) is neither jurisdictional in nature, nor a mandatory claims processing rule that cannot be waived. As the history of this case itself demonstrates, bankruptcy cases can go on for many years, and they frequently involve many parties and numerous distinct proceedings. Thus, as a practical matter, it is in the interests of all concerned -- i.e., the courts and the parties -- that issues of the type presented by section 303(b), regarding the validity of an involuntary bankruptcy petition that initiates a bankruptcy case, be resolved promptly and conclusively at the outset of the case, either by adjudication or by waiver, before a great deal of time has been invested and effort expended; nor should parties to bankruptcy proceedings be given an incentive to hang back and belatedly raise "jurisdictional" objections if and when they are dissatisfied with the course of the proceedings.[1] And nothing in the language of the statute, the text and structure of the Bankruptcy Code, or the legislative history of the Code indicates that Congress intended otherwise.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the district court should be affirmed.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over this proceeding under 28 U.S.C. §1334(a) and § 157(b). This court has jurisdiction over the appeal of the final order of the bankruptcy court under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334(a) and 158(a).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court erred in failing to require Debtors to pay post-confirmation quarterly fees as provided for in 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6), as amended and clarified by Public Laws 104-99 and 104-208.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The standard of review on appeal from a final order of the bankruptcy court is clearly erroneous as to findings of fact and de novo as to conclusions of law. In re Caldwell, 851 F.2d 852, 857 (6th Cir. 1988). Because none of the facts in this matter are contested and the issue involves only the construction of a federal statute, the standard of review is de novo.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Uncle Bud’s, Inc., filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on February 23, 1995. [Dkt. No. 1]. Subsequently, two related companies also filed voluntarily for chapter 11 relief on March 20, 1995, Stewart's Ferry Joint Venture, Bk. No. 95-01871-GP3-11 and Uncle Bud's of Franklin, Inc., Bk. No. 95-01872-GP3-11. All three cases were consolidated for joint administration by order entered June 9, 1995. [Dkt. No. 53]. The three debtors (collectively, "Debtors") elected to be treated as small businesses.[1]

On July 12, 1995, the Debtors filed a joint chapter 11 plan. The plan provided, in relevant part, that "[a]ll fees payable under 28 U.S.C. § 1930, as determined by the Court at the hearing on confirmation, shall be paid in full in cash on the Effective Date of the Plan." [Dkt. No. 154, Exh. 10, p. 17]. The Effective Date was defined in the plan, with certain qualifications not relevant here, as "the later of (i) the first business day following the forty-fifth (45th) day after entry by the Court of an order confirming the Plan, or (ii) the first business day after such order has become final and unappealable . . .." [Dkt. No. 154, Exh. 10, p. 3] The plan made no further references to section 1930 fees and made no reference to any claims arising post-confirmation.

The plan was confirmed by order of the bankruptcy court entered August 31, 1995. [Dkt. No. 154, Exh. 12]. Effective January 27, 1996, Congress amended section 1930(a)(6) of title 28 of the United States Code to require chapter 11 debtors to pay quarterly fees during the post-confirmation stage of the case. The Debtors each paid the post-confirmation quarterly fee owing for the first quarter of 1996, but failed to pay any fees due and owing for subsequent quarters. [Dkt. No. 154]. On April 15, 1996, the Debtors filed the Final Report and Motion for Final Decree Closing the Cases. [Dkt. No. 121]. The U.S. Trustee timely objected to the entry of the final decree on the basis that Debtors had not paid all post-confirmation quarterly fees owing pursuant to section 1930(a)(6). [Dkt. No. 124]. The bankruptcy court overruled the U.S.

[1] The bankruptcy court order from which this appeal arises adjudicated the quarterly fee issue for four otherwise unrelated cases: the Uncle Bud's, Inc., Ligonier Powders, Inc., Creekstone Apartments Associates, Inc., and Milton and Jessie Woods. The United States Trustee settled the quarterly fee issue in each of the cases, except Uncle Bud's, Inc.

Trustee's objection and granted the Debtors' motion for a final decree on February 20, 1997. [Dkt. No. 165]. The bankruptcy court's findings of fact and legal conclusions were set forth in its Memorandum Opinion, entered on February 20, 1997. In re Uncle Bud's Inc., et al., 206 B.R. 889 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1997). The U.S. Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from the bankruptcy court's decision. [Dkt. No. 167].

ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court's determination that post-confirmation fees are payable in cases confirmed prior to January 26, 1996, only if the plans specifically required payment of post-confirmation fees is in error for several reasons. First, the bankruptcy court's failure to analyze correctly section 1930(a)(6), as amended, led the court to erroneously conclude that the statute did not provide an end point for the payment of quarterly fees and that it was therefore "absurd." However, the plain language of amended section 1930(a)(6), as subsequently made even clearer by clarifying legislation, is subject to only one valid interpretation — i.e., that quarterly fees are payable in all pending chapter 11 cases without limitation and regardless of confirmation status. A second basis for the bankruptcy court's decision that the Debtors were not liable for post-confirmation fees was the erroneous conclusion that the terms of the Debtors' confirmed plan operated to bind the U.S. Trustee and Congress with respect to fees originating four months after the plan was confirmed. The provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, as well as Supreme Court precedent, clearly indicate that a confirmed plan can not and does not affect the Debtors' liability for quarterly fees and other claims that arise after the plan is confirmed. Finally, the bankruptcy court identified several concerns, including the constitutionality of amended section 1930(a)(6) as applied to debtors with confirmed plans, potential res judicata concerns, potential conflicts with various provisions of the Bankruptcy Code and considerations of equity, that led it to construe amended section as inapplicable to the Debtors. None of these concerns are valid and none justifies the bankruptcy court's rejection of the only reasonable reading of section 1930(a)(6) — that quarterly fees are payable until the earlier of dismissal, conversion, or closing of the case by entry of a final decree. The bankruptcy court's decision should therefore be reversed.

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN FAILING TO REQUIRE PAYMENT OF POST-CONFIRMATION FEES PURSUANT TO AMENDED SECTION 1930(a)(6), WHICH CLEARLY AND UNAMBIGUOUSLY REQUIRES THE PAYMENT OF QUARTERLY FEES IN ALL CHAPTER 11 CASES PENDING AS OF JANUARY 27, 1997, REGARDLESS OF WHETHER THE CASES HAVE CONFIRMED PLANS.

The Supreme Court has advised that the ultimate goal of statutory construction is to give effect to Congressional intent in enacting the statute at issue. United States v. Ron Pair Enterprises, Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 242-43 (1989). In construing a statute, the courts first look to the plain statutory language as the best evidence of congressional intent. CSX Transportation v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658, 663 (1993).

Prior to January 26, 1996, section 1930(a)(6) required that a quarterly fee be paid to the United States Trustee "until a plan is confirmed or the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first." On January 27, 1996, this provision was amended by section 211 of the Balanced Budget Downpayment Act, I, Pub. L. No. 104-99, 110 Stat. 26, 37-38 (1996) ("Public Law 104-99"). Section 1930(a)(6) now provides in relevant part as follows, with the language stricken by Public Law 104-99 redlined in the text:

> In addition to the filing fees paid to the clerk, a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until [~~a plan is confirmed or~~] the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first.

As is evident from the above quoted text, the only change was the deletion of the words "a plan is confirmed or" from the text of section 1930(a)(6). The intended effect of this amendment was to extend a debtor's obligation to pay quarterly fees into the post-confirmation period, thereby increasing the fees collected by the U.S. Trustee Program in each case. McLean Square Associates, C.P., 201 B.R. 436, 439 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1996); see also In re Foxcroft Square Co., 198 B.R. 99 (E.D. Pa. 1996); In re Upton Printing, 197 B.R. 616 (E.D. La. 1996); In re Central Florida Electric, Inc., 197 B.R. 380 (M.D. Fla. 1996).

Following the January 26, 1996 amendment to section 1930(a)(6), however, a number of bankruptcy courts refused to require payment of post-confirmation quarterly fees in those cases with previously confirmed plans based primarily on their conclusion that Congress failed to adequately prescribe the statute’s reach. See, e.g., In re Hudson Oil Company, Inc., 200 B.R. 52 (Bankr. D. Kan. 1996), rev’d, 210 B.R. 380 (D. Kan. 1997); In re Precision Autocraft, Inc., 197 B.R. 901 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1996) rev'd, United States Trustee v. Precision Autocraft, Inc., 206 B.R. 662 (W.D. Wash., January 9, 1997). In response, Congress enacted clarifying legislation pursuant to the Omnibus Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 1997. Public Law 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009 (September 30, 1996). Title I of Public Law 104-208 contains a section entitled “General Provisions for the Department of Justice.” Section 109(d) of the General Provisions provides as follows:

> Section 101 (a) of Public Law 104-91, as amended by section 211 of Public Law 104-99, is further amended by inserting ": Provided further, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the fees under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a)(6) shall accrue and be payable from and after January 27, 1996, in all cases (including, without limitation, any cases pending as of that date), regardless of confirmation status of their plans" after "enacted into law".

Pub. L. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009 (September 30, 1996) (emphasis added). By further amending section 1930(a)(6), Congress clarified that post-confirmation quarterly fees were payable in all pending cases, even those cases in which a plan was confirmed prior to the effective date of the statute. H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 3620, 104th Cong. Sess., 142 Cong. Rec. H11644, H11850 (daily ed. September 28, 1996); see also In re Hudson Oil Co., 210 B.R. 380, 383 (D. Kan. 1997).

In its Memorandum Opinion, the bankruptcy court appeared to acknowledge that passage of the September 30, 1996 amendment indicated that Congress intended amended section 1930(a)(6) to apply to all pending cases. In re Uncle Bud's Inc., 206 B.R. at 899. The bankruptcy court nonetheless refused to require the Debtors to pay post-confirmation fees, in part, because it incorrectly believed that amended section 1930(a)(6) was "absurd" as written. Id. at 899-900. The bankruptcy court based this conclusion on the faulty premise that the language of section 1930(a)(6) requires successful chapter 11 debtors to pay quarterly fees ad infinitum. Id. at 900.

The bankruptcy court's statutory analysis is in error because it incorrectly focuses on an isolated phrase in amended section 1930(a)(6). The entire relevant portion of amended section 1930(a)(6) provides that "a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter . . . until the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first." (emphasis added). Thus, as the plain language of the statute demonstrates, the obligation to pay quarterly fees is triggered by and tied to the existence of a chapter 11 case.

As indicated above, section 1930(a)(6) previously required a fee to be paid in all pending chapter 11 cases until one of the following terminating events occurred: 1) a plan was confirmed, 2) the case was converted to a case under another chapter of the Bankruptcy Code; or 3) the case was dismissed. By striking out the words "a plan is confirmed or" Congress merely removed one of the terminating events — plan confirmation — expressly indicating its intent that payment of quarterly fees should continue throughout the post-confirmation period.

Amended section 1930(a)(6) does not explicitly state that quarterly fees cease to accrue when the case is closed. Because the obligation to pay those fees is triggered by and tied to the existence of the chapter 11 case, however, that obligation necessarily terminates when a case is no longer pending, i.e., after a case has been converted to another chapter, dismissed, or closed by entry of a final decree. See 11 U.S.C. § 350; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 3022; McLean Square Associates, C.P., 201 B.R. 436, 439 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1996) (legislative history demonstrates that payment of quarterly fees is required until case is closed by final decree). In the McLean Square case, the bankruptcy court recognized the only proper construction of amended section 1930(a)(6):

> We agree that the plain language of the statute is clear. The amendment requires quarterly fees be paid until a case is converted or dismissed. A case may be converted or dismissed at any time before or after a plan is confirmed up until the moment the court enters the final decree closing the case. At that time, conversion or dismissal is no longer possible. The logical conclusion is that when a case is closed, the obligation to pay quarterly fees terminates because the possibility of conversion or dismissal no longer exists. There is no ambiguity here, Congress simply did not state the obvious. . . .

201 B.R. at 439 (emphasis added).

Numerous other courts have reached the same conclusion. For example, in Vergos v. Tiner's Air Conditioning & Heat, Inc., No. 96-2812, slip op. at 4-5 (W.D. Tenn. August 29, 1997)(copy attached), the Hon. Julia Smith Gibbons focused on the introductory phrase of section 1930(a)(6) which requires that the quarterly fee be paid in "each case under chapter 11 of title 11." According to Judge Gibbons, this language made clear that the fees terminated upon the closing of the case because, as a result of the closing, there no longer existed a case under title 11. Id. at 5. Similarly, in In re Beechknoll Nursing Homes, Inc., No. C-1-97-165, slip op. at 8 (S.D. Ohio, September 12, 1997)(copy attached), the Hon. Sandra S. Beckwith held that, based on the statutory language and legislative history, Congress intended quarterly fees to be paid through the entry of a final decree. Additionally, in United States Trustee v. CF&I Fabricators of Utah, No. 2-96-CV-920C, slip op. at 5 (D. Utah, April 24, 1997)(copy attached), the Hon. Tena Campbell reversed the bankruptcy court's decision in In re CF&I Fabricators of Utah, 199 B.R. 986 (Bankr. D. Utah 1996), and held that quarterly fees were payable until the case was converted, dismissed or successfully terminated. See also, In re Jr. Food Mart of Arkansas, 201 B.R. 522 (Bankr. E.D. Al. 1996); In re Driggs, 206 B.R. 787, 791 (Bankr. D. Md. 1997); In re Richardson Serv. Corp., 210 B.R. 332, 333 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1997)(a logical construction of the statute requires "payment of the U.S. Trustee's fee until conversion, dismissal, or until entry of the Final Decree.")(emphasis in original); In re SeaEscape Cruises, Ltd., 201 B.R. 321, 322 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1996).

As the McLean Square court and other courts have recognized, Congress intentionally tied the quarterly fee obligation to the pendency of a chapter 11 case. By not expressly providing that the quarterly fee obligation should terminate when the case is closed pursuant to a final decree, Congress simply did not state the obvious. The bankruptcy court's construction of the statute to the contrary is in error.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN HOLDING THAT QUARTERLY FEES ARE PAYABLE IN PENDING CASES WITH PLANS CONFIRMED PRIOR TO JANUARY 27, 1996, ONLY IF SUCH PLANS SPECIFICALLY PROVIDED FOR PAYMENT OF POST-CONFIRMATION FEES.

The bankruptcy court's holding that the Debtors are only liable to pay the fees imposed by section 1930(a)(6) if the confirmed plan expressly provided for the payment of such post-confirmation fees is inconsistent with the intent of Congress that the fees be paid in all pending cases and is therefore necessarily in error. In reaching its decision, the bankruptcy court incorrectly concluded that the Debtors' plan bound the U.S. Trustee. However, both the Bankruptcy Code and Supreme Court precedent make clear that the plan is not binding on the U.S. Trustee with respect to post-confirmation quarterly fees. Consequently, the bankruptcy court decision should be reversed.

The bankruptcy court decision fails to address the Supreme Court's holding in Holywell Corporation v. Smith, 112 S.Ct. 1021 (1992), which directly conflicts with the bankruptcy court's analysis. In Holywell, the Supreme Court examined the binding effect of a confirmed plan and held the plan could not bind the United States or any creditor with respect to claims that accrued post-confirmation. Id. at 1028. In Holywell, the chapter 11 debtor had achieved confirmation of a plan which placed all of the debtors' property in a trust and appointed a trustee to liquidate the trust assets and distribute the same to creditors of the debtors' estates. Id. at 1023-24. The plan made no provision, however, for the payment of taxes by the trustee or the filing of tax returns. Id. at 1024. The plan was confirmed by the Court, with no objection from the United States. Id.

After the plan was confirmed, the trustee, who was appointed pursuant to the plan, liquidated various property resulting in capital gains to one of the debtors. The trustee then sought a declaratory judgement from the bankruptcy court that the trustee did not have to pay the taxes or file the returns. Id. The trustee argued, inter alia, that the terms of the confirmed plan, which did not provide for the filing of tax returns or the payment of taxes post-confirmation, were binding on the United States. Id. at 1027.

On appeal, the Supreme Court flatly rejected the trustee's argument. The Supreme Court noted that the liability to pay the taxes did not accrue until the time for filing the returns, which was after the plan was confirmed in that case. Id. at 1027-28. Relying on the plain language of section 1141(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, which specifies that the plan is binding on "creditors," and section 101(10) of the Bankruptcy Code, which specifies that a "creditor" is an entity holding various pre-confirmation claims, the Supreme Court concluded that the plan could not bind the United States, or any other creditor, with respect to post-confirmation claims. Id. at 1028.

The post-confirmation fees at issue in the present case are no different than the post-confirmation taxes sought by the United States in Holywell. In each case, the liability did not accrue until events occurred post-confirmation. In Holywell, the tax did not accrue until the time for filing the tax return. In the present case, the post-confirmation quarterly fees did not begin to accrue until the end of the first full quarter of 1996 and were based on disbursements made from January 27, 1996, until the entry of the final decree closing the case. Accordingly, consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Holywell, the Debtors' plan does not relieve the Debtors from liability for quarterly fees that arose after the Debtors' plan was confirmed.

In the present case, the bankruptcy court decision, in essence, forever binds both the U.S. Trustee and the United States Congress to the terms of the Debtors' confirmed plan.[2/] As noted previously, the bankruptcy court held that the Debtors were not liable for quarterly fees that accrued post-confirmation because the plan, which was confirmed long before the Congress even created post-confirmation quarterly fees, made no provision at all for such fees. Such a ruling effectively requires the U.S. Trustee to undertake the impossible task of predicting what future fees may be imposed upon the Debtor by Congress. Indeed, in the present case, at the time the Debtor's plan was confirmed, there was no indication from Congress that it intended to amend section 1930(a)(6).

Taken to its logical conclusion, the bankruptcy court decision would have the effect of insulating the Debtor from, for example, any future tax liability, since the Debtors' plan does not provide for post-confirmation income and property tax payments. See In re Richardson Serv. Corp., 210 B.R. 332, 335 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1997)("carried to its logical conclusion, Debtor's

[2/] The bankruptcy court's conclusion that the U.S. Trustee is bound by the terms of the Debtors' confirmed plan was directly contrary to section 1141 of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 1141(a) provides that > the provisions of a confirmed plan bind the debtor, any entity issuing securities under the plan, any entity acquiring property under the plan, and any creditor, equity security holder, or general partner in the debtor, whether or not the claim or interest of such creditor, equity security holder, or general partner is impaired under the plan and whether or not such creditor, equity security holder, or general partner has accepted the plan.

11 U.S.C. § 1141(a). However, the United States Trustee does not fall within the definition of any entity listed in section 1141(a). Section 101(10) of the Bankruptcy Code, in basic terms, defines "creditor" as an entity with a pre-petition claim. Since the U.S. Trustee does not hold a pre-petition claim in this case, she is not a creditor. The U.S. Trustee also does not fall within any other category of claimant denoted in section 1141(a). Thus, according to section 1141(a), the U.S. Trustee is not bound by the terms of the confirmed plan.

argument would in effect immunize a debtor from any new assessments or increases in taxes or fees occurring post confirmation"). The Debtor may even be able to avoid having to pay any vendor claims that arise post-confirmation. Clearly, the bankruptcy court decision gives a much broader meaning to "discharge" than ever intended by Congress in creating the Bankruptcy Code.[3/]

Such a global discharge is clearly unwarranted, especially since the Debtors' plan does not even address its post-confirmation liability for any fees under section 1930. Rather, the plan merely provides that "[a]ll fees payable under 28 U.S.C. § 1930, as determined by the Court at the hearing on confirmation, shall be paid in full in cash on the Effective Date of the Plan." At the time of confirmation, the only U.S. Trustee fees "payable" were those that had accrued prior to confirmation.[4/] The Debtors' plan does not address post-confirmation quarterly fees because at the time of confirmation no such fees existed. Consequently, the plan can not in any way bind the U.S. Trustee with respect to post-confirmation fees.

The United States Trustee is before this Court seeking only to collect an obligation of the Debtors that arose by operation of federal law after the plan of reorganization was confirmed.

[3/] The situation can be analogized to one where a confirmed plan provides for the debtor to file one or more post-confirmation adversary proceedings but which does not provide that the debtor will have to pay any filing fees associated with the adversary proceedings. Like the U.S. Trustee's quarterly fees, the filing fees payable to the court clerk arise under section 1930 of title 28. For the debtor to argue that he is insulated from having to pay the adversary filing fees because his confirmed plan did not provide for the payment of such fees would be ludicrous. The confirmed plan does not bind the court clerk with respect to fees under section 1930 that arise post-confirmation, just as the plan does not bind the U.S. Trustee with respect to post-confirmation fees.

[4/] The term "payable" is defined in Black's Law Dictionary as meaning "[c]apable of being paid; suitable to be paid; admitting or demanding payment; justly due; legally enforceable." Black's Law Dictionary 1016 (5th Ed. 1979).

Pursuant to sections 101(10) and 1141(a) of the Bankruptcy Code and the Supreme Court's holding in Holywell, the Debtors' plan does not insulate the Debtor from paying the fees and taxes lawfully imposed post-confirmation by Congress. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court decision, which purports to bind the U.S. Trustee and Congress with respect to post-confirmation claims, should be reversed.

III. THE CONSIDERATIONS THAT LED THE BANKRUPTCY COURT TO HOLD THAT SECTION 1930(a)(6) DOES NOT REQUIRE THE PAYMENT OF QUARTERLY FEES BY THE DEBTORS ARE WITHOUT MERIT.

As discussed above, section 1930(a)(6), as amended and clarified by Public Laws 104-99 and 104-208, provides that quarterly fees are payable in all pending cases. In holding that quarterly fees were payable only in cases in which a debtor's plan provided for such payment, the bankruptcy court identified several concerns that it concluded militated in favor of its holding. Those concerns included the constitutionality of amended section 1930(a)(6) as applied to debtors with confirmed plans, potential res judicata concerns, potential conflicts with various provisions of the Bankruptcy Code and considerations of equity. The bankruptcy court determined that in construing amended section 1930(a)(6), it must balance these concerns. In re Uncle Bud's Inc., 206 B.R. at 902. None of these concerns are valid, nor do they justify the bankruptcy court rejecting the only reasonable reading of section 1930(a)(6) — that quarterly fees are payable until the earlier of dismissal, conversion, or closing of the case by entry of a final decree.

A. The Application of Section 1930(a)(6) to Pending Cases Which Had Confirmed Plans Prior to January 27, 1996, Is Neither Impermissibly Retroactive, Nor Violative of Any Provision of the Constitution.

In rejecting the notion that the quarterly fees were payable despite the provisions of the confirmed plan, the bankruptcy court first stated that "[t]he debtors argue with some persuasive force that [requiring the debtors to pay quarterly fees until the case is dismissed, converted or closed] would violate due process, is unconstitutionally retroactive, and is too vague to be enforced." In re Uncle Bud's Inc., 206 B.R. 889, 900 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1997). On this basis, without the benefit of a plethora of cases in which such constitutional concerns regarding post-confirmation quarterly fees have been rejected, the bankruptcy court determined that the U.S. Trustee's argument could not be sustained. See, e.g. In re Hudson Oil Co., 210 B.R. 380 (D. Kan. 1997); In re Lancy, 208 B.R. 481 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 1997); In re Maruky, Inc., 206 B.R. 225 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1997); In re Burk Development Co., 205 B.R. 778 (Bankr. M.D. La. 1997). An analytical review of the Constitutional concerns raised by the bankruptcy court reveals that such concerns are illusory and do not support a direct departure from Congress's clearly stated intent in amending section 1930(a)(6).

The bankruptcy court's main concern was that application of amended section 1930(a)(6) to debtors with plans confirmed prior to January 27, 1996, would be impermissibly retroactive and a violation of substantive due process. However, section 1930(a)(6), as amended, only requires the payment of quarterly fees in chapter 11 cases prospectively from the effective date of the amended statute. Consequently, section 1930(a)(6) is not unconstitutionally retroactive. Furthermore, even if section 1930(a)(6) were retroactive, it is economic legislation that is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. Consequently, it does not, under any interpretation, violate due process.

In determining whether a statute is impermissibly retroactive, the court must determine "whether Congress has expressly prescribed the statute's proper reach." Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 114 S. Ct. 1483, 1499 (1994). Obviously, if Congress has prescribed the statute's reach and such reach is prospective only, not retroactive, then the statute should be upheld. A statute is retroactive if it "attaches new legal consequences to events completed before its enactment." Id. at 1499. However, "[a] statute does not operate 'retrospectively' merely because it . . . upsets expectations based on prior law." Id. For example, a statute banning gambling may adversely affect a person who began constructing a casino prior to the statute's enactment, yet the statute would not be unconstitutionally retroactive for that reason. Id. at 1499 n.24.

If, on the other hand, Congress has expressly prescribed the statute's proper reach and such reach is retroactive, the question becomes whether statute is supported by a rational legislative purpose. United States v. Carlton, 114 S. Ct. 2018, 2022 (1994); In re Richardson Serv. Corp., 210 B.R. 332, 334 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1997)(citing Landgraf, 114 S. Ct. at 1505, 1508 and Carlton, 114 S. Ct. at 2020). If Congress did have a rational basis for enacting the legislation, then the court should uphold the legislation despite its retroactive effect. Carlton, 114 S. Ct. at 2022.

In the present case, Congress clearly and unequivocally prescribed the reach of section 1930(a)(6) in its September 1996 amendment, which provided that "the fees under [section 1930(a)(6)] shall accrue and be payable from and after January 27, 1996, in all cases (including, without limitation, any cases pending as of that date), regardless of confirmation status of their plans." Pub. L. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009 (Sept. 30, 1996); see also In re Hudson Oil Co., 210 B.R. 380, 383 (D. Kan. 1997)("the text of the [September 1996] amendment leaves little doubt (if any) that Congress intended the January 1996 amendment to 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) to apply to all pending chapter 11 cases, including those with plans confirmed prior to the effective date of the amendment."). Since Congress prescribed the precise reach of the statute, the next question is whether section 1930(a)(6) operates retroactively. Clearly, the September 1996 Amendment gives the amended statute only prospective effect. In other words, chapter 11 debtors, whose plans were confirmed prior to January 27, 1996, are not to be assessed a quarterly fee based on the period between confirmation of their plans and January 27, 1996. Since section 1930(a)(6) operates only prospectively, the statute should be upheld.

Even if the court determined that section 1930(a)(6) had some retroactive effect, the statute still should be upheld because it is supported by a rational legislative purpose. In amending section 1930(a)(6), Congress clearly expressed its intent to provide additional funding for the United States Trustee Program. Furthermore, Congress wanted the additional funding to come from those entities that use the bankruptcy system. These intentions clearly provide a rational legislative basis for the amendment of section 1930(a)(6), even if the legislation were deemed retroactive. In re Hudson Oil Co., 210 B.R. 380, 383 (D. Kan. 1997)("Congressional concern over declining quarterly fee revenues led Congress to adopt these changes [to section 1930(a)(6)] and the corresponding fees rationally address this concern."); In re Richardson Serv. Corp., 210 B.R. 332, 334-35 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1997). Thus, section 1930(a)(6), as applied to debtors with plans confirmed prior to January 27, 1996, fully satisfies the due process analysis.

B. Requiring the Payment of Quarterly Fees in Cases with Plans Confirmed Prior to January 27, 1996, Until Such Cases Are Dismissed, Converted or Closed Does Not Conflict with Any Provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.

In determining that the Debtor should not have to pay the quarterly fees required by section 1930(a)(6), the bankruptcy court stated that the application of section 1930(a)(6) to debtors with plans confirmed prior to January 27, 1996, would conflict with sections 1141(a), 1141(b), 1142(a), and 1127(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. However, the perceived conflicts arose from the court's erroneous presumption that the terms of the confirmed plan bound the U.S. Trustee with respect to the quarterly fees that arose after the plan was confirmed.

As noted previously, section 1141(a) of the Bankruptcy Code specifies all of the entities that are bound by a confirmed plan in a chapter 11 case. Section 1141(a), however, only operates to bind such entities as to their pre-confirmation claims. Holywell v. Smith, 112 S. Ct. 1021, 1028 (1992). Thus, requiring the Debtors to pay the quarterly fees as intended by Congress in no way conflicts with section 1141(a). Similarly, section 1930(a)(6) as applied to these Debtors does not conflict with sections 1141(b) and 1142(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, both of which merely set forth terms related to the confirmed plan, but which do not relate to the U.S. Trustee or to post-confirmation claimants.

Section 1930(a)(6), as applied to the Debtors, also does not conflict with section 1127(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 1127(b) provides that "[t]he proponent of a plan or the reorganized debtor may modify such plan at any time after confirmation of such plan and before substantial consummation of such plan . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 1127(b). According to the bankruptcy court, the U.S. Trustee's effort to collect the fees that Congress imposed on the Debtors is an effort by the U.S. Trustee to modify the plan even though the U.S. Trustee is not a party entitled to modify the plan under section 1127(b). This argument is also based on the erroneous assumption that the terms of the confirmed plan operate to bind post-confirmation claimants. However, as noted previously, sections 1141(a) and 101(10) of the Bankruptcy Code, as well as the Supreme Court decision in Holywell, clearly indicate that the U.S. Trustee and Congress are not bound by the plan. Since the plan is not binding with regard to post-confirmation fees, the U.S. Trustee has absolutely no need nor desire to amend the Debtors' plan. Consequently, the U.S. Trustee's efforts to collect the fees imposed by Congress do not conflict with section 1127(b).

Finally, the bankruptcy court indicated that allowing fees to accrue post confirmation would conflict with section 1129(a)(12) of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 1129(a)(12) provides that a plan will be confirmed only if, "[a]ll fees payable under section 1930 of title 28, as determined by the court at the hearing on confirmation of the plan, have been paid or the plan provides for the payment of all such fees on the effective date of the plan." 11 U.S.C. § 1129(a)(12). The operative word in section 1129(a)(12) is "payable," which is defined as "capable of being paid; suitable to being paid; admitting or demanding payment; justly due; legally enforceable." Black's Law Dictionary 1016 (5th ed. 1979). Based on that definition, section 1129(a)(12) should properly be read as requiring the debtor to pay all fees due and owing as of confirmation on or before the effective date of the plan. Section 1129(a)(12) does not address the timing of payment of section 1930(a)(6) fees that accrue post-confirmation. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court's characterization of the U.S. Trustee's efforts to collect the fees as a disguised effort to modify the plan and its concern regarding a perceived conflict between section 1930(a)(6) of title 28 and various sections of the Bankruptcy Code are simply wrong as a matter of law.

C. The Imposition of Fees Post-Confirmation on the Debtor Does Not in Any Way Implicate the Principles of Res Judicata.

The third reason why the bankruptcy court rejected the U.S. Trustee's argument that fees must be paid to the U.S. Trustee post-confirmation until the case is converted, dismissed or closed, is that the Debtors' confirmed plan precluded the imposition of such fees under principles of res judicata. While the bankruptcy court was correct in determining that the confirmation order was a final order, the court incorrectly assumed that the order affected the post-confirmation claim of the U.S. Trustee. As discussed before, the confirmed plan does not bind the U.S. Trustee or Congress with respect to post-confirmation fees and, consequently, the principles of res judicata do not apply. See Donaldson v. Bernstein, 104 F.3d 547, 555 (3d Cir. 1997)("Claims for post-confirmation acts are not barred by the res judicata effect of the confirmation order.").

For an order in a prior action to have res judicata effect with respect to a claim in a later action, four elements must be satisfied. First, the earlier order must be a final decision on the merits. Sanders Confectionery Prods., Inc. v. Heller Financial, Inc., 973 F.2d 474, 480 (6th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 1079 (1993) (citing King v. South Cent. Bell Tel. & Tel. Co., 790 F.2d 524 (6th Cir. 1986)). Second, the later case must involve the same parties as in the prior action. Id. Third, the second action must raise an issue that was actually litigated or should have been litigated in the first case. Id. Finally, the causes of action in each case must share a similar identity. Id.

In the present case, the bankruptcy court order clearly fails the third element needed for res judicata effect. Specifically, the U.S. Trustee's claim for post-confirmation fees is not an issue that was or should have been litigated in conjunction with the plan confirmation. First, the statutory imposition of post-confirmation fees did not occur until after the plan was confirmed. Consequently, it would have been impossible to litigate the issue of post-confirmation fees at the time of confirmation. Second, even if the parties could have foretold of the future imposition of fees, such fees would not have accrued as of confirmation. The U.S. Trustee's claim arises from post-confirmation events that could not have been accurately predicted at the time of confirmation of the plan. Thus, the issue of post-confirmation was not and could not have been litigated in conjunction with the hearing on confirmation of the Debtors' plan. Consequently, the confirmation order does not have a res judicata effect with respect to the Debtors' liability for post-confirmation fees under section 1930(a)6). Donaldson v. Bernstein, 104 F.3d 547, 555 (3d Cir. 1997) ("Creditors whose claims arise from and after confirmation are not barred by the event of confirmation from asserting such claims, except to the extent that they arise from pre-confirmation acts")(quoting In re Pavlovich, 952 F.2d 114, 119 (5th Cir. 1992)).

D. Although the Bankruptcy Court Clearly Has Jurisdiction Post-Confirmation to Determine Issues Regarding Quarterly Fees, the Determination of Whether Jurisdiction Exists Has No Bearing on How Section 1930(a)(6) Should Be Interpreted.

Finally, the bankruptcy court decided that section 1930(a)(6) did not require the Debtor to pay post-confirmation fees on the basis that extending the payment of quarterly fees through the closing of the case would present issues of bankruptcy court jurisdiction. This analysis is faulty on two grounds. First, the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court is created by 28 U.S.C. § 157, which does not include any specific limitation on bankruptcy court jurisdiction of cases with confirmed plans. Thus, the bankruptcy court would have jurisdiction post-confirmation to hear matters arising in or arising under a case under title 11, such as post-confirmation quarterly fee issues. Second, assuming arguendo that the bankruptcy court would not have jurisdiction to enforce the collection of quarterly fees post-confirmation, such a determination should lead only to the conclusion that the court had no jurisdiction to rule on the matter before it. Consequently, the bankruptcy court's reference to jurisdictional issues as a basis for relieving the Debtor of its obligation to pay post-confirmation quarterly fees is incorrect.

Clearly the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction post-confirmation to determine issues relating to fees payable under section 1930(a)(6). The bankruptcy court's jurisdiction to hear bankruptcy matters arises under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334(a) and 157.[5/] Section 1334 provides that the district courts have original jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases and section 157(a) provides that "[e]ach district court may provide that any or all cases arising under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11 shall be referred to the bankruptcy judges for the district." 28 U.S.C. § 157(a). Furthermore, 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1) provides that "[b]ankruptcy judges may hear and determine all cases under title 11 and all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11 . . .." 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1). "Sections 1334 and 157 of title 28 are the sources of subject matter jurisdiction for the bankruptcy courts." In re Refrigerant Reclamation Corp., 186 B.R. 78, 80 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1995).

Nowhere in sections 1334 and 157 of title 28 is there any provision limiting the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court post-confirmation. Rather, the bankruptcy court continues to retain jurisdiction post-confirmation to hear and adjudicate any core proceedings related to the bankruptcy case. In re Holly's Inc., 172 B.R. 545, 554 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 1994), aff'd, 178 B.R. 711 (W.D. Mich. 1995) ("nothing in the language of section 1334 even remotely suggests that confirmation of a plan alters the basic jurisdictional analysis for bankruptcy cases and proceedings."). Since the fees arising under section 1930(a)(6) only arise in the context of a chapter 11 case, it is clear that the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to adjudicate all issues related to such fees, so long as the bankruptcy case remains open.[6]

The breadth of bankruptcy court jurisdiction over confirmed chapter 11 cases was recently addressed in In re Refrigerant Reclamation Corporation, 186 B.R. 78 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1995). In the Refrigerant case, after confirmation of the debtor's plan of reorganization but prior to the entry of a final decree, the debtor filed an adversary proceeding seeking relief from various requests for information made by one of the creditors in the case. Id. at 79. The creditor believed it was entitled to the information pursuant to certain agreements made by the debtor in conjunc-

[6] If the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to compel the payment of post-confirmation quarterly fees, then an absurd result would ensue. In particular, the bankruptcy would have the authority post-confirmation to convert a case to chapter 7 or dismiss it if the debtor fails to pay quarterly fees, but would have no authority to direct the debtor to pay those fees. See 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)(10) (providing that the failure to pay quarterly fees is cause for dismissal or conversion of the case); Smith v. Lee, 201 B.R. 267 (D. Nev. 1996)(bankruptcy statute providing for revesting of property in debtor upon confirmation did not deprive bankruptcy court of jurisdiction to enter post-confirmation conversion order); In re Cinderella Clothing Indus., 93 B.R. 373 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1988)(bankruptcy courts retain authority post-confirmation to dismiss or convert case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)).

tion with the chapter 11 plan. However, the creditor argued that the dispute was a breach of contract action over which the bankruptcy court had no subject matter jurisdiction. Id. at 79-80.

In determining whether it had jurisdiction over the dispute, the bankruptcy court first recognized a number of reported decisions which hold that the post-confirmation jurisdiction of bankruptcy courts is more limited than the jurisdiction pre-confirmation. Id. at 80-81. However, the court rejected that line of cases based on the broad jurisdictional grant in 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334 and 157 of title 28 of the United States Code, which does not create any distinction between pre- or post-confirmation cases. Id. at 80. The court further analyzed the history of bankruptcy court jurisdiction, noting that the judiciary's reluctance to exercise post-confirmation jurisdiction stemmed from the former Bankruptcy Act, which specifically limited post-confirmation jurisdiction. However, in 1978, Congress rejected the jurisdictional scheme present in the Bankruptcy Act and "enacted a single grant of comprehensive jurisdiction that would enable the bankruptcy courts to deal 'efficiently and expeditiously with all matters connected with the bankruptcy estate.'" Id. at 81 (quoting Celotex Corp. v. Edwards, 115 S. Ct. 1493, 1498-99 (1995)). Under the present jurisdictional scheme, the analysis of whether bankruptcy court jurisdiction exists over a particular dispute is the same regardless of whether the dispute arises before or after confirmation. In other words, if the proceeding is "related to" the bankruptcy case, then the bankruptcy court has jurisdiction even if a plan has been confirmed in the case. Id. at 82.

All issues regarding fees arising under section 1930(a)(6) clearly fall within the jurisdictional grant of sections 1334 and 157 of title 28. The Debtors' obligation to pay quarterly fees by its very nature could arise only in the context of a bankruptcy case. Consequently, it is necessarily a "proceeding arising in a case under title 11 or, at a minimum, a proceeding related to a case under title 11." In re Marcus Hook Development Park, Inc., 943 F.2d 261, 264 (3d Cir. 1991) (in determining jurisdiction under section 1334, a court "need only determine 'whether a matter is at least related to the bankruptcy.'"). The bankruptcy court therefore has jurisdiction to require the Debtors to pay the mandated fees. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334 & 157(b)(1).

In any event, the existence or non-existence of jurisdiction only applies to the bankruptcy court's ability to hear and decide the post-confirmation fee issue. It does not dictate the validity of section 1930(a)(6) or how it should be applied to the Debtors in this case. Furthermore, even if the bankruptcy court does not have jurisdiction to hear the matter, the district court clearly has jurisdiction to enforce the federal statute. Consequently, the issue of post-confirmation jurisdiction does not affect the determination of whether the Debtors are liable for post-confirmation fees.

In sum, the bankruptcy court had no basis for rejecting the plain language of section 1930(a)(6) which requires the Debtors to pay a fee to the U.S. Trustee for each quarter from and after January 27, 1996, until a final decree is entered in the case. Section 1930(a)(6) does not conflict with any provision of the Constitution or the Bankruptcy Code, and is not defeated by principles of res judicata. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court clearly has jurisdiction to decide all matters related to section 1930(a)(6) fees, at least until the bankruptcy case is closed. Consequently, the bankruptcy court erred in failing to require the Debtor to pay all the post-confirmation fees accrued pursuant to section 1930(a)(6).

CONCLUSION

The 1996 amendments to section 1930(a)(6) of title 28 of the United States Code were intended by Congress to increase the fees collected by the U.S. Trustee Program in chapter 11 cases. The amendments clearly require that from January 27, 1996, all cases pending as of that date or thereafter filed are required to pay a fee to the U.S. Trustee for each quarter that the case is pending, regardless of whether the debtor confirmed a reorganization plan before, during or after January 27, 1996. The bankruptcy court refused to apply the statute as intended by Congress based on a misreading of the statute and concerns regarding illusory Constitutional issues. Section 1930(a)(6) does not offend any provision of the Constitution and is completely consistent with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. Consequently, the Bankruptcy Court erred in failing to require the Debtor to pay post-confirmation quarterly fees to the U.S. Trustee. Accordingly, the U.S. Trustee respectfully requests that the bankruptcy decision be reversed.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEBTOR'S APPEAL AS UNTIMELY

Tracy Hope Davis, the United States Trustee for Region 2, hereby moves to dismiss Mr. Van Eck's untimely appeal of the bankruptcy court's dismissal of his chapter 11 case.

INTRODUCTION

Under section 158 of title 28, this Court has jurisdiction to consider an appeal from a bankruptcy court only if the appeal is taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2). Under Rule 8002(a), a notice of appeal must be filed within 14 days of the date of entry of the order appealed. Mr. Van Eck filed his notice of appeal of the order dismissing his bankruptcy case more than three months after it was entered. His appeal is untimely and therefore must be dismissed.

FACTS

Mr. Van Eck filed a voluntary chapter 11 petition on September 5, 2008. Bankr. Dkt. 1. His case was dismissed on March 16, 2010 because he failed to maintain appropriate insurance, which put the assets of the estate at risk. In re Herman Jan Van Eck, 425 B.R. 54, 61 (Bankr. D. Conn. 2010) (Bankr. Dkt. 303). The case was also dismissed on the alternate ground that Mr. Van Eck was using his chapter 11 case to re-litigate issues that had been decided in state court. Id. at 63. The bankruptcy court barred Mr. Van Eck from filing another bankruptcy petition for two years. Id. at 69; Bankr. Dkt. 304. However, the bankruptcy court retained jurisdiction over any litigation needed to confirm that Mr. Van Eck provided his correct social security number on his bankruptcy filing. Id. at 72; Bankr. Dkt. 304. The order dismissing the case was entered on March 16, 2010. Bankr. Dkt. 304.

Subsequently, creditors DLJ Mortgage Capital, Inc. and GRP Loan, LLC moved the bankruptcy court to direct the Social Security Administration to confirm Mr. Van Eck's social security number under seal. Bankr. Dkt. 305. The bankruptcy court took the requested action. On June 14, 2010, the bankruptcy court confirmed that Mr. Van Eck's registered social security number did not match the number on his petition. Bankr. Dkt. 335.

On June 28, 2010, Mr. Van Eck filed a notice of appeal for review of the bankruptcy court's "Judgment of Dismissal" that had been entered on March 16, 2010. Bankr. Dkt. 337. He did not appeal the litigation related to his social security number, which had been decided and entered on June 14, 2010. Id.

ANALYSIS

For the reasons set forth below, Mr. Van Eck's June 28 notice of appeal was untimely to perfect an appeal from the March 16 order dismissing his case.

A. Mr. Van Eck's Appeal Must be Dismissed Because He Filed His Notice of Appeal Almost Three Months after the Statutory Deadline.

Mr. Van Eck did not comply with the bankruptcy rules that only allow a litigant 14 days to appeal an adverse final order. An order to dismiss a case is a final order. See In re Chateaugay Corp., 826 F.2d 1177, 1179 (2d Cir. 1987) (indicating that "[a] final order 'ends the litigation on the merits and leaves nothing for the court to do but exercise the judgment'") (quoting Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 233 (1945)). An order can be final in bankruptcy even if it does not resolve all of the issues raised in the case, "but it must completely resolve all of the issues pertaining to a discrete claim . . . ." In re Fugazy Express, 982 F.2d 769, 776 (2d Cir. 1992). The order dismissing Mr. Van Eck's case ended consideration of the merits of his chapter 11 filing and therefore was a final order.

After the final order dismissing his case was entered into the docket on March 16, 2010, Mr. Van Eck accordingly had 14 days to file a notice of appeal. Bankr. Dkt. 304; Fed R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). The 14-day appeal clock expired on March 30, 2010. Mr. Van Eck's June 28 notice of appeal was therefore untimely to perfect an appeal from the March 16 dismissal order. Bankr. Dkt. 337.

B. Because Mr. Van Eck's Appeal was Untimely, this Court Does Not Have Jurisdiction to Hear His Appeal.

The deadline established by Rule 8002(a) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure is mandatory and jurisdictional. This Court thus does not have subject matter jurisdiction to hear Mr. Van Eck's appeal because he filed his notice of appeal over three months after the dismissal order was entered into the docket.

This case is governed by the Supreme Court case Bowles v. Russell, which held that if Congress established a time limit for taking an appeal in a statute, "that limitation is more than a simple 'claim-processing rule.'" Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. 205, 213 (2007). It is jurisdictional. Id. at 206; Ruiz-Martinez v. Mukasey, 516 F.3d 102, 118 (2d Cir. 2008) (quoting Bowles). See also In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d 933, 938 (9th Cir. 2007) ("[T]he failure to timely file a notice of appeal is a jurisdictional defect barring appellate review.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Without proper jurisdiction, a court does not have power to hear a case, and therefore "jurisdiction can never be forfeited or waived." United States v. Cotton, 535 U.S. 625, 630 (2002).

The Bowles holding applies to appeals in bankruptcy for two reasons. First, the Rule 8002(a) requirement that appeals be timely filed is incorporated into title 28. Section 158(c)(2) provides that appeals in bankruptcy shall be taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." This reference to Rule 8002 is located in the same section of the statute that grants district courts jurisdiction to hear bankruptcy appeals. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)-(b). Because the time limitation is statutory, it is mandatory and jurisdictional.[1]

Second, federal case law has for over 100 years treated time limits for filing a notice of appeal as jurisdictional. Bowles, 551 U.S. at 206 (stating that it has "long and repeatedly [been] held that the time limits for filing a notice of appeal are jurisdictional in nature"). Specifically, Rule 4(a) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, after which Rule 8002(a) was expressly modeled, is

[1] Cf. Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 454 (2004) (holding that failure to comply with the time requirement in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004 did not affect the court's subject-matter jurisdiction). Critical to the Court's analysis in Kontrick was the fact that "[n]o statute . . . specifies a time limit for filing a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge." 540 U.S. at 448. That is not the case here. By contrast to the time limit in Bankruptcy Rule 4004, the time limit for appeals to the district court in bankruptcy cases derives from 28 U.S.C. § 158. See also Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. at 210 ("Although several of our recent decisions have undertaken to clarify the distinction between claims-processing rules and jurisdictional rules, none of them calls into question our longstanding treatment of statutory time limits for taking an appeal as jurisdictional.").

“mandatory and jurisdictional.” See Browder v. Dir. of Corr. of Ill., 434 U.S. 257, 264 (1978); Siemon v. Emigrant Savs. Bank (In re Siemon), 421 F.3d 167, 169 (2d Cir. 2005). Mr. Van Eck appealed the bankruptcy court’s dismissal order more than three months after it was entered. His failure to file a timely notice of appeal deprives this Court of jurisdiction to review the bankruptcy court’s dismissal order. White v. United States, 183 B.R. 356, 358 (D. Conn. 1995).

CONCLUSION

For all of the foregoing reasons, this Court should dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Alaska had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b) and 1334(a) over Kristen Joan Vesper's voluntary chapter 7 bankruptcy case.

On June 28, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered a Memorandum of Opinion and Order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss Ms. Vesper's case for abuse. The United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from that order under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on July 5, 2007. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

11 U.S.C. § 707(b) provides for dismissal where the granting of a chapter 7 discharge to a debtor would be an abuse. Section 707(b)(2) employs a means test as a tool for presuming abuse in cases where a debtor's income, minus allowed expenses, yields a certain minimum amount of monthly disposable income. Ms. Vesper, the debtor in this case, "passed" the means test because the bankruptcy court ruled she was eligible to claim vehicle ownership expenses, even though she did not have a loan or lease payment for either of her two vehicles. Given that 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows only "applicable" vehicle ownership expenses to be deducted under the means test, did the bankruptcy court err in allowing Ms. Vesper to deduct them when she had no expense for automobile ownership?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In an appeal taken from a bankruptcy court order, a district court reviews the bankruptcy court's findings on questions of law de novo. In re Emery, 317 F.3d 1064, 1069 (9th Cir. 2003) (citing In re Allen, 300 F.3d 1055, 1058 (9th Cir. 2002)). The bankruptcy court's holding that 11 U.S.C. § 707 allowed Ms. Vesper to deduct vehicle ownership expenses for two vehicles when she had no loan or lease payments is a question of law and therefore subject to de novo review.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On December 22, 2006, Ms. Vesper filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. (DE 1: Petition).[1] On March 22, 2007, the United States Trustee timely filed a motion to dismiss Ms. Vesper's case for abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), along with a memorandum in support of her motion.[2] (DE 22, 23). Ms. Vesper filed an objection to the motion on April 30, 2007. (DE 28).

The bankruptcy court heard the parties' arguments at a hearing on the United States

Trustee's motion held on May 23, 2007. (DE 31). The bankruptcy court concluded that the presumption of abuse did not arise under 11 U.S.C. § 707 and entered a memorandum and order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss on June 28, 2007. On July 5, 2007, the United States Trustee timely filed a Notice of Appeal and an election under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(1) to have this appeal heard by the United States District Court for the District of Alaska. STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. Statutory Framework.

On October 17, 2005, most provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (Apr. 20, 2005), took effect, implementing significant changes to the Bankruptcy Code. As part of this effort, Congress significantly amended section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, which governs dismissal of chapter 7 bankruptcy cases. The general goal of Congress in its complete overhaul of section 707(b) was to ensure "that those who can afford to repay some portion of their unsecured debts be required to do so . . . ." 151 Cong. Rec. S2470 (March 10, 2005).

As it existed prior to the 2005 Reform Act, section 707(b) only authorized dismissal based on a finding that allowing the debtor relief (i.e., granting a discharge of debts) constituted a "substantial abuse" of chapter 7. Prior to its 2005 amendment, section 707(b) also required courts to presume that a debtor was entitled to relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 707(b) now authorizes dismissal where the court finds that the granting of relief would be an "abuse" of chapter 7. As amended, section 707(b)(2) repealed the former presumption in favor of a debtor obtaining bankruptcy relief and replaced it with a new presumption: a case presumptively is an “abuse” of chapter 7 if a detailed mathematical formula set out in the statute, commonly referred to as the “means test,” yields a minimum amount of monthly disposable income. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

The means test requires courts sitting in bankruptcy to use a series of calculations when determining whether the section 707(b)(2) presumption of abuse arises. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A). Specifically, the means test calculates a debtor’s “current monthly income” (“CMI”) based on the debtor’s average income for the six calendar months preceding the month of the bankruptcy filing. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A). If a debtor’s CMI is below the applicable state median family income, the debtor’s case will not be presumed abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(7). When, as is the case here, however, the CMI is above $166.67, section 707(b)(2)(A) refers bankruptcy courts next to the debtor’s monthly disposable income available to repay creditors by reducing the CMI by certain enumerated categories of expenses. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv).

At issue in this appeal is whether Ms. Vesper is eligible to deduct vehicle ownership costs under Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service in calculating her monthly disposable income. Determination of that issue will establish whether this case is presumptively abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (2). In determining the expenses to be deducted from CMI in arriving at the current monthly disposable income, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) provides that a debtor’s “monthly expenses shall be the debtor’s applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards and the debtor’s actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service include transportation and housing related expenses, and apportion transportation expenses into two components. See IRS Collection Financial Standards, under heading "Local Standards: Transportation," available at http://www.irs.gov/individuals/article/0,,id=96543,00.html.[3] The first component includes costs associated with financing vehicle acquisition, i.e., the vehicle ownership costs. Id. The second component is associated with the costs of vehicle operation. Id.

If the debtor's monthly disposable income, determined by deducting allowed expenses from CMI, is less than $100 per month (or $6,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does not arise. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i)(I).[4] If the debtor's monthly disposable income is

[3] The IRS revised its Collection Financial Standards, effective October 1, 2007, and such revisions will be made applicable to bankruptcy cases filed as of January 1, 2008. See id. Because Ms. Vesper's case was filed on December 22, 2006, only the Collection Financial Standards in effect prior to October 1, 2007, are applicable to Ms. Vesper's case. For the Court's convenience, a true and correct pdf copy of the Collection Financial Standards applicable to this case are attached as Exhibit "A" and incorporated herein by reference. It is important to note, however, that the revisions made by the IRS effective October 1, 2007 do not change any result in this case. As set forth in the current Collection Financial Standards, the Local Standard for Vehicle Operation is still made expressly contingent on the existence of a loan or lease payment on a vehicle. See id. As explained by the IRS, the recent revisions to the Local Standards were made to create equal allowances for first and second vehicles, add a separate public transportation allowance and reorganize the manner in which taxpayers in certain counties calculate their transportation operating expenses. See id., under heading "Recent Revisions."

[4] Pursuant to section 104 of the Bankruptcy Code, dollar amounts set forth in title 11 applicable to a determination of presumed abuse under the means test were adjusted by the equal to or exceeds $166.67 per month (or $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does arise. Id. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is between $100 and $166.67 per month (between $6,000 and $10,000 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse arises if the disposable income, over 60 months, is sufficient to pay 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured debt. Id.

If the presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2) arises after completion of the means test, the debtor may attempt to rebut the presumption by demonstrating special circumstances that justify income or expense adjustments for which there is no reasonable alternative. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B).[5]

Each debtor who, like Ms. Vesper, has primarily consumer debts is required to file, in conjunction with the bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs, a Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation, Official Form 22A ("Form 22A"). 11 U.S.C. §§ 521 and 707(b)(2)(C). The purpose of Form 22A is to calculate monthly disposable income following the formula set forth in section 707(b)(2), and determine whether the presumption of abuse arises.

II. Factual Background.

Ms. Vesper is a registered nurse. (DE 1: Schedule B, line 23; Schedule I). She lives in Fairbanks with her two children. (DE 1: Petition, p. 1; Schedule I). She filed a chapter 7 Judicial Conference of the United States effective April 1, 2007. 72 Fed. Reg. 7082 (Feb. 14, 2007). This case is not subject to the recent dollar amount adjustments.

[5] Were this court to reverse the order entered below, this case should be remanded so Ms. Vesper could attempt to establish special circumstances, should she believe they exist.

bankruptcy petition to discharge her debts on December 22, 2006. (DE 1: Petition, p. 2). Her debts are primarily consumer debts. (DE 1: Petition, p. 1; Schedules D, E and F; Summary of Schedules). On both her Form 22A and her schedules filed with her petition, Ms. Vesper reported her current monthly income as $5,690.27, which translates into annualized gross income of $68,283.24. (DE 1: Schedule I; DE 5: Lines 3, 11 and 13). Because this annualized amount exceeded the applicable Alaska state median, she was required to complete the expense portion of Official Form 22A–Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation. She filed an amended Form 22A on February 23, 2007 and listed the same current monthly income of $5,690.27, or $68,283.24 per year. (DE 18: Lines 3, 11 and 13).

In computing expenses on her amended Form 22A, Ms. Vesper claimed transportation ownership expenses for two vehicles on lines 23 and 24. (DE 18: p. 3). On line 23, she claimed a transportation ownership expense of $471 for a 2006 Subaru. (Id.). She claimed a transportation ownership expense of $332 for a 1997 Ford Explorer on line 24. (Id.). Ms. Vesper owns these vehicles free and clear of any debt. (DE 1: Schedule D; DE 28, p. 2).[6]

As required by 11 U.S.C. § 704, the United States Trustee reviewed all materials submitted by Ms. Vesper, including her Form 22A, and concluded that the presumption of abuse arose. (DE 24). The United States Trustee determined that Ms. Vesper's claimed deductions for vehicle ownership expenses on Lines 23 and 24 of her Form 22A were not allowable under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) because Ms. Vesper owned her vehicles outright and therefore had no applicable vehicle ownership expense. Accordingly, in determining whether the United States Trustee believed a presumption of abuse arose, the United States Trustee concluded that Ms. Vesper's section 707(b)(2) proffered expenses for two vehicle ownership deductions on Lines 23 and 24 of Form 22A were improper. (DE 22: Motion, p. 5; Exhibit 1 to Motion, p. 3). The United States Trustee also determined that other adjustments were appropriate.[7] (DE 22: Motion, pp. 5-7.) Given that, the United States Trustee calculated that Ms. Vesper had 60-month disposable income of $18,900 on line 51 of Form 22A, or $315 per month. (DE 22: Exhibit 2, p. 6). This exceeded the amount under 707(b) by $148, triggering the presumption of abuse.

[6] Under the terms of her 2006 divorce decree, Ms. Vesper's ex-husband had paid off the debt on the 2006 Subaru. (DE 28: pp. 1-2; Exhibit 1, p. 4). The divorce settlement also recognized Ms. Vesper's ownership of the 1997 Ford Explorer, which her son uses to attend school. (DE 28: Exhibit 1, p. 4.; TR., p. 16).

Having concluded that the presumption of abuse under 707(b) existed in Ms. Vesper's case, the United States Trustee moved to dismiss Ms. Vesper's case as an abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1). (DE 22).

On April 30, 2007, Ms. Vesper filed an opposition to the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. (DE 28). In it, she argued that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) permits her to deduct the Local Standard for Vehicle Ownership even thought she does not have a loan or lease payment on either of her vehicles. (Id.).

The bankruptcy conducted a hearing on the motion to dismiss on May 23, 2007. (DE

[7] In her motion, the United States Trustee identified a number of other adjustments to Ms. Vesper's Form 22A as well, including the following: elimination of a deduction for additional utility expenses on Line 21, elimination of a deduction for Ms. Vesper's 401(k) loan as a mandatory payroll deduction on Line 26, reduction of the deduction for excess home energy costs on Line 37, reduction of the additional food and clothing expense on Line 39 and correction of an error in Ms. Vesper's calculation of allowed deductions for debt payments on Line 46. (DE 22). Only the Vehicle Ownership expenses are at issue in this appeal.

31). At that hearing, Ms. Vesper agreed the presumption of abuse arose under section 707(b)(2) if she could not claim transportation ownership expenses on the Subaru and Explorer. (TR., pp. 8 and 19). At the close of the May 23, 2007 telephonic hearing, the bankruptcy court took the matter under advisement. (DE 31).

By order entered June 28, 2007, the court denied the United States Trustee's motion, finding that Ms. Vesper was entitled to claim the car ownership deductions for the two vehicles even though she did not have any car payments. (DE 33). In its Memorandum Regarding Dismissal, the court reviewed other decisions that came to opposing conclusions on whether debtors are entitled to claim the IRS Local Standard for Vehicle Ownership on Form 22A if they do not have a car payment, and agreed with those courts following In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414 (Bankr. D.Del. 2006) that debtors may in fact do so. (DE 32, pp. 9-13). This appeal followed.

The bankruptcy court erred as a matter of law in denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. It did so by misinterpreting when debtors can claim a vehicle ownership expense under section 707(b)(2). The court held that Ms. Vesper was entitled to deduct vehicle ownership expenses for the 2006 Subaru and 1997 Explorer, even though those vehicles were owned free and clear of encumbrances. This conclusion of law was incorrect because the law allows Ms. Vesper to claim only "applicable" expenses under section 707(b)(2), and she had no applicable vehicle ownership expenses because neither vehicle was subject to a loan or lease payment. By using the word "applicable," Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom the expenses apply. Because the vehicle acquisition/financing expense does not apply with respect to Ms. Vesper's vehicles, the bankruptcy court erred in holding that she was eligible to deduct the expenses under the means test.

Significantly, reading "applicable" in section 707(b)(2) this way has the salutory effect of applying the means tests in a manner that is consistent with the Internal Revenue Service's longstanding application of this standard. Under section 707(b)(2), the means test looks to the IRS to establish certain standard expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). In applying its standards to taxpayers, the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim vehicle ownership expenses absent a monthly car payment expense. See IRS Collection Financial Standards attached hereto as Exhibit A; see also n.3, supra. Congress' use of "applicable" in section 707(b)(2) means this expense should be denied to debtors like Ms. Vesper, who do not have a car loan or lease, for the same reasons the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim such phantom expenses.

Finally, the bankruptcy court's order conflicts with sound notions of public policy and the primary purpose of Congress in passing bankruptcy reform legislation in 2005 – including the amendments at issue in this appeal. The 2005 legislation was intended to ensure that debtors would repay their debts when they can. By allowing Ms. Vesper to claim a phantom expense for her vehicles, the bankruptcy court subverted that purpose.

ARGUMENT

I. The bankruptcy court erred in holding that Ms. Vesper was eligible to claim the IRS Local Standards for vehicle ownership for her vehicles because the expense was not applicable to her.

The bankruptcy court's order denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss should be reversed because it fails to recognize that the Bankruptcy Code only allows debtors to claim vehicle ownership expenses that are "applicable" to the debtor. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Ms. Vesper does not have any "applicable" vehicle ownership expense because she owns her vehicles outright. Her attempt to claim what is a phantom expense is prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code because the Code allows debtors to claim only "applicable" expenses, not phantom ones. For this reason, the order entered below merits reversal.

A. Vehicle ownership expenses are allowable only if "applicable" to the debtor.

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service. . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The statute expressly provides that before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense must itself first be applicable to the debtor. Id.

The Bankruptcy Code does not define the word "applicable," nor has the United States Trustee identified any Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit decision that provides a definition in the bankruptcy context.[8] Where, as here, a statutory term is undefined, a basic principle of statutory construction provides that courts should give such terms their ordinary meanings. E.g., Smith v. U.S., 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning."). The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean applying or capable of being applied; relevant; suitable; appropriate. Random House Unabridged Dictionary (2006). Accordingly, such a meaning should be imparted to the term "applicable" as it appears in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) absent clear indication that Congress intended to give such term a different meaning. See Johnson v. Aljian, 490 F.3d 778, 780 (9th Cir. 2007) (quoting U.S. v. TRW Rifle 7.62x51 mm Caliber, 447 F.3d 686, 689 (9th Cir. 2006) ("[W]e follow the common practice of consulting dictionary definitions to clarify their ordinary meaning[ ] and look to how the terms were defined at the time [the statute] was adopted.").

The bankruptcy court's order is inconsistent with the ordinary, common sense definition of "applicable" because it allows debtors like Ms. Vesper to deduct expenses that do not apply to them. Here, Ms. Vesper seeks to claim a loan or lease payment, but she has none. By inserting the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom such expenses are "relevant; suitable; appropriate" – thereby excluding phantom ones. Because Ms. Vesper did not have vehicle financing expenses for either of her vehicles, the IRS vehicle ownership expense did not apply to her for those vehicles.

The only two appellate courts to have considered the issue to date have read "applicable" this way, and both reversed bankruptcy courts that read "applicable" the way the lower court in this case did. See In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. 645, 650 (D. Minn. 2007) ("word 'applicable' in [section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)] means that, before the expense amount can be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense itself must actually be applicable to the debtor-in other words, the debtor must actually have a loan or lease payment obligation"); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762, 764-67 (E.D. Wis. 2007) (holding that word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) means that "ownership expenses must exist" in the form of an actual loan or lease payment). Cf. In re Devilliers, 358 B.R. 849, 859 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2007) (debtor may claim IRS ownership expense only after "a determination is made as to the type of expenses allowed and applicable to the debtor"); In re Carlin, 348 B.R. 795, 798 (Bankr. D. Or. 2006) (statute plainly and unambiguously does not allow the vehicle operating expense at issue to "free and clear" owners.).

Hartwick and Ross-Tousey reversed the lower court rulings in those cases because those courts, like the court here, failed to give the word "applicable" its ordinary meaning. Instead, courts like the one below created an arbitrary distinction between the word "actual" and "applicable" expenses in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).[9] See, e.g., Fowler, 349 B.R. at 418 ("The use of 'actual' with respect to the Other Necessary Expenses and 'applicable' with respect to the National and Local Standards must mean that Congress intended two different applications.) The bankruptcy court here agreed that "applicable" and "actual" must have different meanings since Congress used both terms in the statute and, therefore, debtors like Ms. Vesper need not have any "actual" expense for the Ownership Expense Standard to be "applicable." (DE 32, p. 5, 9). This logic is misguided, however. As the Ross-Tousey court explained, there is no indication in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) that Congress intended the words "applicable" and "actual" to have essentially opposite meanings. Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765. Rather, as Ross-Tousey held, the better reading of "applicable" in the context of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is that it may have two meanings: first, the ownership expense is "applicable" if the debtor makes a loan or lease payment on a vehicle, and second, the amount allowed to the debtor is the "applicable" amount provided under the IRS Standards, and not the "actual" amount. Id.; see also Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 653. "This reading gives meaning to the distinction between 'applicable' and 'actual' without taking a further step to conclude that 'applicable' means 'nonexistent' or 'fictional.'" Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765.

By using the term "applicable" in this way, a determination of allowable expenses under the means test is a two-step process. The first step is eligibility – i.e., does the debtor qualify for an expense allowance in the category at issue? If so, then the second step is to quantify the expense amount the eligible debtor is allowed by looking at the IRS Standard amounts that are specified for the number of vehicles owned by the debtor and where the debtor lives. See, e.g., Carlin, 348 B.R. at 798 ("There is nothing absurd in Congress drawing the line for vehicle ownership expense eligibility at those debtors who are making payments on the vehicle."). The bankruptcy court's ruling impermissibly skips the first step of determining whether Ms. Vesper is eligible for the Ownership expense by virtue of having a loan or lease payment for a vehicle, and proceeds directly to the second -- only considering the amount the IRS would allow eligible taxpayers to claim for ownership of two vehicles.

B. The UST's construction of "applicable" in section 707(b)(2) has the salutory effect of treating transportation costs the same way in bankruptcy cases that the IRS treats them.

Reversal of the bankruptcy court's order allowing Ms. Vesper to deduct vehicle financing expenses that she does not have has the additional benefit of treating inapplicable phantom expenses in bankruptcy cases the way the IRS has long treated them. In providing which deductions debtors may take under the means test, Congress specifically stated that debtors are permitted to deduct "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . .Local Standards . . .issued by the Internal Revenue Service." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). Accordingly, how the Internal Revenue Service applies the Standards that it developed for its own internal debt collection purposes is instructive on the question of how the same Standards might be applied in bankruptcy cases under section 707(b)(2). See, e.g., Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650-51 ("in order to determine whether the expense Standards issued by the IRS are 'applicable,' the most logical resource to consult is the IRS"). See also In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290, 309 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007) ("if guidance is sought on the meaning of the IRS standards that Congress incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code, practical reason would suggest that court should consider the full manner by which the IRS uses these standards.").

The IRS Collection Financial Standards in effect as of the date of Ms. Vesper's bankruptcy filing[10] fully support the United States Trustee's construction of the term "applicable," and provide as follows:

[10] See n.3, supra.

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs . . . . The ownership costs provided maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense . . . . If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

See IRS Collection Standards attached hereto as Exhibit A (emphasis added); see also Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html#d0e187819.

As of the date Ms. Vesper filed her bankruptcy petition,[11] the "ownership cost" was specifically calculated by the IRS based on the cost to finance the acquisition of a vehicle, and not simply a cost associated with owning a car, such as repair or maintenance. The IRS noted that the "ownership cost" Standards are based on the "five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors." See id. (emphasis added). As such, the IRS does not treat the "ownership cost" expense as applicable when a taxpayer does not have a monthly expense related to financing a car. In exercising its discretion to collect taxes, the IRS recognizes that taxpayers may claim the vehicle "ownership cost" portion of the Local Transportation Standards only in situations where the taxpayer has a monthly vehicle acquisition financing expense, i.e., has a monthly vehicle loan or lease payment. See id.

The court below expressed concern that the IRS Manual differs from section 707(b)(2)'s means test, and that Congress therefore chose to “cherry pick” from the IRS Manual because the Manual lets taxpayers deduct the actual amount of their car payment – up to the cap set out in the IRS’ Local Standards, but the means test allows debtors to claim the full amount of the Local Standard, even if their car payment is less. (DE 32, p. 10, 12). That is irrelevant. The relevant point is the IRS has expressed its discretion to prohibit individuals from claiming a car payment when they have none. The exact same thing happens under the means test because it allows debtors to claim only an “applicable” car expense – not a phantom one.

Further, considering IRS practice in interpreting “applicable” expenses in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not negate the section’s later allowance of “actual” monthly expenses in the IRS categories of Other Necessary Expenses, as the bankruptcy court erroneously concluded. (DE 32, p. 5, 9). Rather, “a natural reading” of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) indicates that the words “actual” and “applicable” limit the relevant expense deductions in different ways. Slusher, 359 B.R. at 308. “Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to read, ‘The debtor’s monthly expenses shall be the monthly amounts specified under the National Standards and the Local Standards ....’ rather than ‘The debtor’s monthly expenses shall be the debtor’s applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National and Local Standards.’” Id. (Emphasis in original).

II. The bankruptcy court's order conflicts with the major goals of the 2005 amendments to the Bankruptcy Code.

The bankruptcy court's order is also inconsistent with Congress' goals and purpose in implementing bankruptcy reform.[12] Congress amended the Bankruptcy Code in 2005 to rectify perceived abuses in the bankruptcy process. "Among the abuses identified by Congress was the easy access to chapter 7 liquidation proceedings by consumer debtors who, if required to file under chapter 13, could afford to pay some dividend to their unsecured creditors." In re Hardacre, 338 B.R.718, 720 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) (citing 151 Cong. Rec. S2459, 2469-70 (March 10, 2005)). A "primary goal" of the 2005 Reform Act was to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89). In cases such as this one, where the debtor has no loan or lease payment, Congress has established a system which does not provide her an expense deduction for vehicle financing. "Allowing debtors to deduct from their disposable income a fictional ownership allowance would give debtors with unencumbered vehicles a windfall at the expense of their unsecured creditors." In re Howell, 366 B.R. 153, 157 (Bankr. D.Kan. 2007).

[12] The bankruptcy court conceded this, stating that its reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) "may appear to conflict with one of the express purposes of the means testing calculation, which was to 'ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford.'" (DE 32, p. 9).

CONCLUSION

For all of these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the June 28, 2007 order entered by the bankruptcy court denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, and remand this case to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings.

Respectfully submitted,

ARGUMENT

I. THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE PROGRAM IS FULLY CONSISTENT WITH THE "UNIFORMITY CLAUSE" OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Victoria Farms, Inc. (the "Debtor") asserts that it is not liable for the United States Trustee's quarterly fees under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6), because the statute creating the United States Trustee Program and the quarterly fee requirement is unconstitutional on the ground that it violates the Uniformity Clause, Article I, section 8, clause 4, of the U.S. Constitution. Because this argument was not raised before the bankruptcy court, and the District Court declined to address it on appeal (D. Ct. Opinion at 2, n.1), the Debtor seeks to convert it into a jurisdictional claim in order to justify asking this Court to hear the argument now. Thus, the Debtor argues that since the underlying statute is unconstitutional, the United States Trustee is a "non- entity [that] does not have standing to be heard in this case." [FN1] (Brief at 3)

The Debtor's belated challenge to the constitutionality of the U.S. Trustee Program should not be heard for the first time in this Court. See Crane v. The Arizona Republic, 972 F.2d 1511, 1520 (9th Cir. 1992); Bolker v. Commissioner, 760 F.2d 1039, 1042 (9th Cir. 1985) ("As a general rule, we will not consider an issue raised for the first time on appeal."). In any event, the challenge is wholly without merit.

[*3] As a preliminary matter, there is a presumption that legislation passed by Congress is constitutional. See, e.g., Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, Inc., 438 U.S. 59, 83 (1978); Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 15 (1976). This presumption is particularly appropriate here.

The Uniformity Clause provides that Congress has the power "To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States . . . ." U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4. This Clause was an extension of power to Congress to create a substantive insolvency law, applicable nationwide, in order to prevent one state from denying effect to the relief granted by another state. Since "[u]niformity among state debtor insolvency laws was an impossibility and the practice of passing private bankruptcy laws was subject to abuse if the legislators were less than honest," the Framers "sought to provide Congress with the power to enact uniform laws on the subject enforceable among the States" and "to prohibit Congress from enacting private bankruptcy laws." Railway Labor Executives Ass'n v. Gibbons, 455 U.S. 457, 472 (1982).

The statute governing the U.S. Trustee Program is not an insolvency law; it created a purely administrative program designed to "separate the administrative duties in bankruptcy from the judicial tasks, leaving the bankruptcy judges free to resolve disputes untainted by knowledge of administrative matters unnecessary and perhaps prejudicial to an impartial judicial determination." H.R. Rep. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 18, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5227, 5230. The Program was specifically created to separate certain administrative responsibilities from the courts' adjudicative responsibilities. Because it is an administrative program and not an insolvency law, the U.S. Trustee Program is not subject to the Uniformity Clause at all. [FN2]

Even if it were subject to that Clause, however, the Program would qualify as uniform because it applies in essentially the same manner in every area of the country. Hanover National Bank v. Moyses, 186 U.S. 181, 190 (1902) (geographical uniformity satisfied where "general operation of the law is uniform although it may result in certain particulars differently in different states"); see Regional Rail Reorganization Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 158 (1974); Vanston Bondholders Protective Committee v. Green, 329 U.S. 156, 172 (1946) (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

When Congress created the U.S. Trustee Program in the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-598, § 224, 92 Stat. 2662 (1978), it established it as a pilot program, with 10 U.S. Trustees appointed to administer 18 federal judicial districts. Following an evaluation of the pilot program, see generally H.R. Rep. No. 764, supra, at 18-20; 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 5230-31, Congress made the U.S. Trustee Program permanent in 1986 for all federal judicial districts, in the Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, §§ 301-02, Pub. L. No. 99-554, 100 Stat. 3118-24 (1986). In so doing, however, Congress determined to continue a phase-in of the Program, see In re Prines, 867 F.2d 478, 482 (8th Cir. 1989), grouping pilot districts with non-pilot districts and creating four classes of districts covered by the Program.

[*4] In the first class of districts (consisting of nearly all the original pilot districts), the Program took effect immediately (§ 301); in the second class, it took effect 30 days following certification by the Attorney General but not later than 270 days from the date of enactment (§ 302(d)(1)); in the third, it also took effect 30 days following certification by the Attorney General but not later than 2 years from the date of enactment (§ 302(d)(2)); and in the fourth, it took effect upon election by the district judges in the district but not later than October 1, 1992 (§ 302(d)(3)). [FN3] This fourth class of districts, consisting of the districts established for the states of Alabama and North Carolina, is the only class for which the Program is not yet in effect.

The Debtor's argument that this has created a lack of geographical uniformity (Brief at 5-9) cannot be taken seriously, since the statute by its own terms applies in essentially the same manner (other than with respect to its effective date) throughout the United States. In other words, Congress has created a uniform program but has continued the incremental approach it employed originally in establishing the pilot program, by phasing in the permanent program. This phase-in is wholly consistent with the Uniformity Clause: "The uniformity required by Article I, § 8, Clause 4, is geographical, not temporal." In re Penn Central Transportation Co., 384 F. Supp. 895, 916 (Regional Rail Reorg. Ct. 1974) (Friendly, J.) (geographic limitation in statute read as equivalent to temporal limitation outside proscription of Clause). No court has ever invalidated a bankruptcy law on uniformity grounds simply because the law was phased in over a period of time. [FN4]

II. THE APPEAL IS NOT MOOT

The Debtor claims that this appeal is moot because the Debtor's bankruptcy case has been dismissed and the Debtor disbursed all of the funds received from the sale. An appeal is not moot, however, unless it is impossible for a court to fashion effective relief. In re Spirtos, 992 F.2d 1004 (9th Cir. 1993); In re International Environmental Dynamics, Inc., 718 F.2d 322, 326 (9th Cir. 1983). The burden is on the movant to demonstrate that an appeal is moot. Matter of the Brickyard, 735 F.2d 1154, 1159 (9th Cir. 1984).

The dismissal of the Debtor's case did not render this appeal moot, because the controversy on appeal does not assume a continuing effort by the Debtor to rehabilitate its financial affairs under the Bankruptcy Code. See, e.g. In re Dahlguist, 751 F.2d 295, 298 (8th Cir. 1985) ("while the dismissal of a bankruptcy action indicates discontinuation of the attempt to restructure the debtor's financial affairs under the auspices of the federal court, it does not necessarily moot all issues collateral or ancillary to the bankruptcy proceedings"); U.S.A. Motel Corp. v. Danning, 521 F.2d 117 (9th Cir. 1975) (compensation issue addressed after dismissal of bankruptcy case); see generally 11 U.S.C. § 349(b) (describing the effect of dismissal). Regardless of whether the case has been dismissed, the Debtor can be held liable for the full amount of quarterly fees at issue in this appeal.

[*5] The distribution of the sale proceeds also does not render the appeal moot, because the U.S. Trustee does not assert a claim to specific funds. If this Court were to reverse the district court, the quarterly fees may be collected from any unencumbered assets held by Victoria Farms, Inc. There is nothing in the record of this appeal demonstrating that a judgment for the amount of the quarterly fees ($3,850) could not be collected from the Debtor, if not now, then in the future.

Beyond these principles which weigh in favor of finding this appeal not moot, are the disturbing factual circumstances of the case. The Debtor remained in chapter 11 for close to one year after the filing of the U.S. Trustee's motion to dismiss the case. During that time, the Debtor utilized the bankruptcy laws to sell a substantial portion of its estate, effecting a distribution of the proceeds without going through the usual plan confirmation procedure. After reaping the benefits of the bankruptcy laws, the Debtor then claimed that it need not pay the quarterly fees owed by all debtors under chapter 11. This Court should entertain the merits of the appeal, to ensure that this Debtor as well as other debtors perform their statutory duty to pay the quarterly fees. Finally, there is the broad precedential effect of the district court's decision, and the effect which such a decision could have on the financing of the United States Trustee Program and the administration of the bankruptcy system.

III. THE SECURED CREDITORS DID NOT OWN THE REAL PROPERTY CONVEYED UNDER THE DEEDS OF TRUST

As the U.S. Trustee demonstrates in his opening brief, all disbursements must be included when calculating the quarterly fee. The Debtor asserts, however, that payments to the beneficiaries of deeds of trust cannot be included, because they constitute property of the beneficiaries, not property of the estate. In other words, the Debtor argues that the deeds of trust effectively conveyed the real property to the trust deed beneficiaries at the time the deeds were created.

The Debtor's contention is contrary to long-established California case law and bankruptcy law. The deeds of trust were not absolute conveyances of the real property, but rather had the effect of creating a lien on the property. The case law cited and quoted by the Debtor is directly contrary to the Debtor's own position. See Monterey S.P. Partnership v. W. L. Bangham, Inc., 49 Cal. 3d 454, 460, 261 Cal. Rptr. 587, 590 (1989), as well as Coast Bank v. Minderhout, 32 Cal. Rptr. 584, 587 (1963), aff'd and opinion vacated on other grounds, 61 Cal.2d 311, 38 Cal. Rptr. 505, 392 P.2d 265 (1964). As the Debtor recognized in its own bankruptcy schedules, the real property became part of the Debtor's bankruptcy estate at the commencement of the case. See 11 U.S.C. § 541(a)(1). The deed of trust beneficiaries then had an interest in "property of the estate", and thus had "secured claims". 11 U.S.C. §§ 101(37) and 506(a). See generally United States v. Whiting Pools, Inc., 462 U.S. 198, 203-04 (1983) (property subject to liens is property of the estate).

[*6] The Debtor's citation of In re Madrid, 725 F.2d 1197 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 833 (1984), similarly provides no support for the Debtor's contentions. The case concerned a prebankruptcy sale of real estate, which the debtor attempted to void as a "fraudulent conveyance" under 11 U.S.C. § 548(a). The Court held that the deed of trust was "perfected" more than one year prior to the commencement of the case, and that the lender's interest under the deed of trust therefore could not be avoided. See 11 U.S.C. § 548(d) (defining "transfer" for purposes of section 548 as dating from perfection of a creditors' interest). Madrid, 725 F.2d at 1200.

The Debtor thus cites no good authority for his assertion that payments to trust deed beneficiaries are to be excluded from the calculation of quarterly fees. To the contrary, the plain language of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) requires that payments to secured creditors be included as "disbursements" when calculating the quarterly fees. The statute makes no distinctions among the recipients of disbursements, such as those drawn by the district court and the Debtor. Moreover, the exclusion of payments to secured creditors is contrary to the purpose of the statute, because it would absolve many debtors who benefit from chapter 11 from having to pay a substantial portion of the quarterly fees otherwise owing, and would impair an important mechanism chosen by Congress for funding the administration of the bankruptcy system.

CONCLUSION

For all the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee urges that the orders of the district court be reversed insofar as they exclude payments to secured creditors from the calculation of quarterly fees under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6).

FOOTNOTES

FN1. The Debtor's argument that the U.S. Trustee lacks standing to be heard in this case (Brief at 2-3) is based entirely on the contention that the U.S. Trustee Program is unconstitutional. The U.S. Trustee has standing under the Bankruptcy Code to raise and be heard on issues in bankruptcy cases: "The United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this title but may not file a [reorganization] plan pursuant to section 1121(c) of this title." 11 U.S.C. § 307. This includes standing to take an appeal. See In re Clark, 927 F.2d 793, 796 (4th Cir. 1991) (denial of motion to dismiss chapter 7 case); In re Plaza de Diego Shopping Center, Inc., 911 F.2d 820, 824 (1st Cir. 1990) (order appointing chapter 11 trustee); In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d 498, 499-500 (6th Cir. 1990) (order refusing to appoint chapter 11 trustee).

FN2. In the same sense, the bankruptcy courts in each district may promulgate local rules that operate solely within the district. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9029. These local rules do not run afoul of the Uniformity Clause, because they are administrative or procedural -- not substantive -- in nature. See In re Walat, 87 B.R. 408, 412-13 (Bankr. E.D. Va.), aff'd, 89 B.R. 11 (E.D. Va. 1988).

FN3. This date was subsequently extended until October 1, 2002. Judicial Improvements Act of 1990, § 317(a), 104 Stat. 5115 (1990).

FN4. This phase-in has allowed Congress to continue to evaluate the operation of the Program in comparison with the districts in Alabama and North Carolina, where the administrative functions are still being handled by the judiciary. See generally General Accounting Office, Bankruptcy Administration: Justification Lacking for Continuing Two Parallel Programs, Sept. 1992 (GAO/GGD-92-133) (comparison of relative efficiencies, costs, and results achieved in sample districts in each program).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE AND STANDARD OF REVIEW

The issue on appeal is whether payments to secured creditors from the proceeds of a sale of secured property are "disbursements" for the purpose of calculating quarterly fees owed by a chapter 11 debtor under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6).

The Court must review the bankruptcy court's findings of fact under the clearly erroneous standard. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013. The lower courts' conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. In re Commercial Western Finance Corp., 761 F.2d 1329, 1333 (9th Cir. 1985). Because the issue on appeal only involves a question of law, the applicable standard of review in this case is de novo.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This appeal arises from the bankruptcy case of Victoria Farms, Inc. The appeal is taken from the final [FN1] orders of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of California, entered on October 6, 1992 and November 24, 1992, reversing in part a final order of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of California, entered on February 6, 1992.

The orders on appeal concern the amount of the quarterly fee owed by the Debtor under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The bankruptcy court's jurisdiction was based on 28 U.S.C. § 157(a), and the district court's jurisdiction was based on 28 U.S.C. § 158(a). This Court's jurisdiction is based on 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(d) and 1291.

[*3] The notice of appeal to the district court was timely filed on February 14, 1992. On October 16, 1992, a timely motion for rehearing under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8015 was filed regarding the district court's order entered October 6, 1992. The notice of appeal from the district court's orders was then timely filed on January 22, 1993, in accordance with Rules 4(a) and 6(b) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On October 23, 1990, Victoria Farms, Inc. (the "Debtor") filed for relief under the reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 1101 et seq. The Debtor's bankruptcy estate included a farm that was encumbered by first and second deeds of trust, as well as other liens. Motion for Order Authorizing Distribution of Proceeds and Notice of Hearing Thereon, at 2-4.

On March 11, 1991, the United States Trustee [FN2] filed a motion to dismiss or convert the Debtor's case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b). B. Ct. Dkt. at 24. Among the various grounds stated in the motion, the United States Trustee asserted that the Debtor had failed to pay fees and charges required under chapter 123 of title 28, including quarterly fees owed under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). [FN3] Motion to Dismiss or Convert, at 2. The United States Trustee's motion was continued several times during the course of 1991.

On August 15, 1991, the Debtor filed a motion to sell the farm free and clear of liens. B. Ct. Dkt. at 46. On October 4, 1991, the bankruptcy court authorized the Debtor to sell the farm pursuant to the terms of an agreement by the parties. B. Ct. Dkt. at 55. The property was sold to Triple R Farms for the total sum of $594,804.60. Motion for Order Authorizing Distribution of Proceeds and Notice of Hearing Thereon, at 2.

Pursuant to the court's October 4, 1991 order and the sale agreement, the proceeds of the sale were first used to pay the secured claim of Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, which held a first deed of trust on the property, and to pay certain real property taxes, assessments and other costs of the sale. [FN4] The sum of $5,772.00 was then paid to the Debtor's bankruptcy estate as a surcharge under 11 U.S.C. § 506(c). The balance of the proceeds -- $130,434.98 -- was placed into an account with the Debtor's counsel. The Debtor then filed a motion for authority to distribute the monies in that account. Motion for Order Authorizing Distribution of Proceeds and Notice of Hearing Thereon, at 2-3.

On January 8, 1992, the court heard the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss or convert the case, and the Debtor indicated that it would consent to a dismissal of its case following distribution of the sale proceeds from the impound account. Transcript of January 8, 1992, at 3-4. The United States Trustee's motion was continued to January 29, 1992, to be heard in conjunction with the Debtor's motion for authorization to distribute the balance of the sale proceeds.

[*4] The United States Trustee objected to the Debtor's proposed treatment of the sale proceeds, asserting that the Debtor should be required to pay quarterly fees on the disbursements to the first lienholder and the other claimants. The quarterly fees based on all these disbursements would total $4,250.00, [FN5] and would be payable from any unencumbered assets of the estate (for example, the surcharge of $5,772.00 that was recovered by the Debtor under 11 U.S.C. § 506(c)). The United States Trustee requested that the Debtor's dismissal be conditioned on the payment of such quarterly fees. Objection to Motion for Distribution of Proceeds, at 2.

In its opinion dated February 5, 1992, the bankruptcy court held that the quarterly fees may be calculated only on the basis of "direct" disbursements by the Debtor. [FN6] Insofar as the Debtor had agreed to pay the minimal quarterly fees owing under section 1930(a)(6), as determined without reference to payments of the sale proceeds, the court dismissed the Debtor's case without conditioning the dismissal on payment of the additional quarterly fees sought by the United States Trustee. B. Ct. Memorandum Opinion, at 7.

On appeal, the district court reversed in part. The district court held that quarterly fees must be calculated on the basis of direct and indirect disbursements. D. Ct. Opinion, at 10. Neither the United States Trustee nor the Debtor have appealed the district court's resolution of that issue. The district court, however, then further held that quarterly fees cannot be based on amounts disbursed to secured creditors. Id. The United States Trustee appeals that discrete issue.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The plain language of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) requires that a quarterly fee be paid by every chapter 11 debtor based on the disbursements that have been made in the case, without distinction as to types of disbursements. The district court's exclusion of payments to secured creditors is contrary to the language of the quarterly fee statute and finds no cognizable support in the case law interpreting the statute. The statute does not call for case-by-case determinations on questions such as who paid the monies on behalf of the debtor, who received the funds, or the nature of the claim that was paid. Payments made to secured creditors, or to any other types of creditors, constitute disbursements under the plain language of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6).

In addition, the exclusion of payments to secured creditors will seriously undermine the mechanism that Congress has established to fund the United States Trustee Program. Payments to secured creditors occur frequently in chapter 11 cases, where debtors' assets are generally heavily encumbered by mortgages and other liens. The exclusion of payments to secured creditors under section 1930(a)(6) will significantly impede the fiscal balance struck by Congress in its provision for funding the administrative responsibilities of the Program.

ARGUMENT

I. THE PLAIN LANGUAGE OF 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) DOES NOT PERMIT THE DEBTOR TO EXCLUDE DISBURSEMENTS TO SECURED CREDITORS IN CALCULATING THE QUARTERLY FEE

[*5] By law, every debtor with a case pending under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code must pay a fee each quarter to the United States Trustee. 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The quarterly fee calculation is simple and straightforward. The statute provides as follows:

> (6) In addition to the filing fee paid to the clerk, a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee, for deposit in the Treasury, in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until a plan is confirmed or the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first. The fee shall be $250 for each quarter in which disbursements total less than $15,000; $500 for each quarter in which disbursements total $15,000 or more but less than $150,000; $1,250 for each quarter in which disbursements total $150,000 or more but less than $300,000; $3,750 for each quarter in which disbursements total $300,000 or more but less than $3,000,000; $5,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $3,000,000 or more. The fee shall be payable on the last day of the calendar month following the calendar quarter for which the fee is owed.

28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The plain language of the statute imposes no limitations on "disbursements."

"The search for Congressional intent begins with the language of the statute," Steadman v. SEC, 450 U.S. 91, 97 (1981). In interpreting the language, "the fundamental canon of statutory construction is that... words will be interpreted as taking their ordinary... common meaning." Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42 (1979). See also Wilshire Westwood Assoc. v. Atlantic Richfield Corp., 881 F.2d 801, 803-04 (9th Cir. 1989).

The district court properly recognized that the term "disbursements" is not defined in the statute, and that "Congress has 'provided absolutely no discussions regarding the definition of 'disbursements'." D. Ct. Opinion, at 9 (quoting In re Wernerstruck, Inc., 130 B.R. 86, 88 (D.S.D. 1991) and In re Ozark Beverage Co., 105 B.R. 510, 512 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 1989)). "Therefore, the court must rely solely on the plain meaning of the statute in order to determine Congress' intent in enacting the statute." Opinion, at 9 (citing Ozark Beverage Co., 105 B.R. at 512). Black's Law Dictionary (6th ed. 1990) defines "disbursement" as "to pay out, commonly from a fund. To make payment in settlement of a debt or account payable." In this case, the disbursements of the sale proceeds of the Debtor's property were clearly payments from a fund in settlement of debts.

In applying this "plain meaning" approach, the district court concluded:

> the ordinary, plain meaning of the statutory language is that payments made by the debtor attributable to property of the debtor whether directly or by a third party acting on the debtor's behalf are to be included in calculating the fees due to the United States trustee pursuant to Section 1930(a)(6).

[*6] D. Ct. Opinion, at 10. The United States Trustee agrees with the district court's conclusion to the extent that it reversed the bankruptcy court and found that payments made on behalf of a debtor must be included in the quarterly fee calculation without regard to whether the debtor made the payment "directly" -- because the statute does not make distinctions based on who actually paid out the monies.

The district court erred, however, when it then proceeded to carve out an exception for payments made to secured creditors from the proceeds of their collateral. The statute refers only to disbursements, and does not distinguish between disbursements to secured and unsecured creditors. Consequently, the distinction cannot be read into section 1930(a)(6). As the district court itself noted in reversing the bankruptcy court's decision, the court must rely on the plain meaning of the statute to determine Congress' intent, and "[t]here is a basic difference between filling a gap left by Congress' silence and rewriting rules that Congress has affirmatively and specifically enacted." D. Ct. Opinion, at 9 (citing Mobil Oil Corp. v. Higginbotham, 436 U.S. 618, 625 (1978)).

The United States Trustee is unaware of any case law providing plausible support for the district court's decision. Rather, the "plain meaning" approach to section 1930(a)(6) has been universally followed in a variety of contexts. See, e.g., In re Hays Builders, Inc., 144 B.R. 778, 780 (W.D. Tenn. 1992), reversing 96 B.R. 142 (Bankr. W.D. Tenn. 1989) ("disbursements" include both direct and indirect payments); In re Wernerstruck, Inc., 130 B.R. 86 (D.S.D. 1991), reversing 122 B.R. 1017 (Bankr. D.S.D. 1991) ("disbursements" include debtor's prepayments on revolving line of credit); Ozark Beverage Co., 105 B.R. 510 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 1989) ("disbursements" include payment of post-petition expenses); See also In re Torres-Ruiz, 123 B.R. 696 (D.P.R. 1990) (quarterly fees are owed even when no disbursements have been made, because the language of the statute does not require minimal disbursements).

Indeed, some of the very cases cited by the district court in construing section 1930(a)(6) involved quarterly fees based on disbursements to secured creditors. See Hays Builders, 96 B.R. at 143; Ozark Beverage Co., 105 B.R. at 511 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 1989). Those courts applied the "plain meaning" approach without finding it necessary to distinguish between disbursements to secured and unsecured creditors. In Hays Builders, the debtor owned certain real property that was subject to mortgages as well as other liens. The debtor sold the property during the reorganization proceeding, and a portion of the sale proceeds was then disbursed to secured creditors through a third party. 144 B.R. at 779-80. The district court in Hays Builders simply applied the statute as written, rejecting the purported distinction between direct and indirect disbursements.

[*7] The court in Ozark Beverage Co. similarly applied the statute as written. Ironically, the debtor in Ozark Beverage Co. argued that disbursement "means any payment to a pre-petition secured creditor"! 105 B.R. at 511. The court in that case rejected the debtor's argument that only such payments are disbursements under section 1930(a)(6), and concluded that payments of administrative expenses incurred during the case were also disbursements.

In summary, the district court below purported to apply a "plain meaning" approach to the statute, but then created an exception that finds no plausible basis in the language of the statute.

II. THE COURT ERRED IN DETERMINING THAT PAYMENTS TO SECURED CREDITORS ARE EXEMPT FROM THE QUARTERLY FEE CALCULATION

In its opinion of October 6, 1992, the district court stated:

> [T]he court concludes that the ordinary, plain meaning of the statutory language is that payments made by the debtor attributable to property of the debtor whether directly or by a third party acting on the debtor's behalf are to be included in calculating the fees due to the United States trustee pursuant to Section 1930(a)(6). This construction excludes any payment made to a secured creditor of the proceeds of the sale of that security. However, it does not exclude distributions of proceeds of the sale of secured property to the debtor or persons or entities other than the secured creditor or secured creditors.
> Therefore, the court reverses the Bankruptcy Court to the extent that its ruling implies that no distribution of proceeds of the sale of property securing a debt is a "disbursements" within the meaning of the statute.

D. Ct. Opinion at 10 (emphasis added). The opinion presents little more than a conclusory statement that payments to secured creditors from the proceeds of collateral are not disbursements for purposes of section 1930(a)(6). [FN7]

While the United States Trustee can only speculate as to the basis for the district court's distinction, presumably the court believed that the proceeds of a sale of collateral are not "attributable to property of the debtor." See also Transcript of November 16, 1992, at 6-7 (district court questioned the extent of the Debtor's "equity" interest in the property). However, under the bankruptcy laws, the Debtor clearly had an interest in the real estate and its proceeds.

Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 541(a)(1), property of the estate includes "all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case." The real estate was therefore "property of the estate" pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 541(a)(1). The Debtor recognized this very fact when it listed the farm on its schedule of assets at the commencement of the Bankruptcy Case. B. Ct. Dkt. at 1. Consequently, the sale proceeds also constituted property of the estate pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 541(a)(6). See Bradt v.

Woodlawn Auto Workers, F.C.U., 757 F.2d, 515 (1st Cir. 1985) (the conversion of property from one form to another does not alter its character as estate property); cf. Reconstruction Finance Corp. v. Cohen, 179 F.2d 773, 776 (10th Cir. 1950).

[*8] The presence of deeds of trust on the property does not negate the interest of the Debtor's bankruptcy estate in the property. "In practical effect, if not in legal parlance, a deed of trust is a lien on the property." Monterey S.P. Partnership v. W. L. Bangham, Inc., 49 Cal.3d 454, 460, 261 Cal. Reptr. 587, 590 (1989). While the real estate was subject to security interests and other liens, the property was nonetheless owned by the Debtor prior to the commencement of the case, and that interest passed to the bankruptcy estate. Of course, the bankruptcy estate's interest was held subject to the liens, and provided a means of recourse if the Debtor did not pay the debts owed to those creditors. But the Debtor retained the right to use the property in the bankruptcy case on behalf of the bankruptcy estate.

Moreover, the bankruptcy estate's interest in mortgaged property was recognized by the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Whiting Pools, Inc., 462 U.S. 198, 203-204 (1983):

> This authorization extends even to property of the estate in which a creditor has a secured interest. §§ 363(b) and (c); see H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, p. 182 (1977). Although Congress might have safeguarded the interests of secured creditors outright by excluding from the estate any property subject to a secured interest, it chose instead to include such property in the estate and to provide secured creditors with "adequate protection" for their interests.

(emphasis supplied).

The United States Trustee therefore maintains that the disbursements of the sale proceeds to the secured creditors must be considered disbursements under section 1930(a)(6). [FN8]

III. THE DISTRICT COURT'S DECISION CONTRAVENES CONGRESS' INTENT TO FUND THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE PROGRAM

The United States Trustee plays an important role in supervising the administration of bankruptcy cases, and that role is financed by those who invoke the protections of the bankruptcy laws. [FN9] In chapter 11 cases, the United States Trustee receives a portion of the filing fee that is paid at the commencement of the chapter 11 case, 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(3), as well as a fee that is paid each quarter during the case, 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The quarterly fee is gauged by the amount of money disbursed by the debtor, and the time for payment is specified in the statute. The debtor's obligation to pay the quarterly fee arises by operation of law, and "no court order or other judicial act is a prerequisite, either to fix the amount of the fee or to require its payment." In re K & M Printing & Lithographing, Inc., 135 B.R. 404, 406 (Bankr. D. Or. 1992).

Any decision that contravenes the express language of this statute adversely affects the fiscal balance struck by Congress. The quarterly fee was designed to apportion the cost of the United States Trustee Program fairly on users, and the statute ensures that the Program "will be paid for by the users of the bankruptcy system -- not by the taxpayer". H.R. Rep. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 22 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5227, 5234 (1986). "The U. S. Trustee Program should not have to be self-funding... However, in this time of budget deficit concerns, self-funding becomes a necessity." Id. at 26. Where Congress has drafted a statute so as to carry out a manifest fiscal purpose, the courts should construe the provision so as to fully effectuate that purpose. Cf. Federal Crop Ins. Corp. v. Merrill, 332 U.S. 380, 385 (1947) (duty of the courts in protecting the public fisc).

[*9] Congress surely crafted the quarterly fee provision with knowledge of the impact it would have on chapter 11 debtors. Modest fees are assessed on a graduated scale according to the amounts of moneys disbursed in a case. A ceiling was also imposed, such that the quarterly fee cannot exceed $5,000 per quarter.

This funding mechanism is seriously jeopardized by any decision that allows payments to secured creditors to be excepted from the otherwise clear application of the statute. Payments to secured creditors are pervasive in chapter 11 cases, because debtors seldom have substantial unencumbered assets. Secured creditors frequently have a lien on all of a debtor's assets, including cash. Payments from such "cash collateral" regularly occur pursuant to the terms of prebankruptcy loan agreements (e.g. installment loans), pursuant to postpetition financing arrangements under 11 U.S.C. § 364 (e.g. revolving lines of credit), and as adequate protection payments under 11 U.S.C. 361. This appeal thus presents just one of the circumstances in which the general rule announced by the district court will adversely impact the fiscal balance struck by Congress.

Finally, recognition must be given to the basic premise for assessing the quarterly fees. The quarterly fee is a "user fee", assessed against the debtor who benefits from the provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. The rights and responsibilities of a debtor in chapter 11 are inextricably tied with the United States Trustee's administrative responsibilities in the case. The Debtor in the instant case had full advantage of the protections afforded by chapter 11 for more than 15 months, and was able to retain possession of its assets until they could be sold, at which point the Debtor then consented to dismissal.

As a corollary to the benefits obtained from chapter 11, the Debtor is obligated to pay quarterly fees. [FN10] The amount of those fees is based on one objective criteria -- the disbursements in the case. By employing this simple unit of measure, Congress clearly did not intend that the quarterly fee calculation should turn on labels or distinctions such as the one the district court attempts to create here. Just as the courts in the past refused to read exceptions into the referee's salary statute, § 40(c)(2) Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (11 U.S.C. § 68(c)(2)(a), repealed 1979), the Court should refrain from creating an exception to the clear language of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). "The fact that the rules do not permit the tailoring of fees to particular circumstances does not lessen their validity; to the contrary, this approach is in keeping with the clearly expressed will of Congress." In re Shoreline Concrete Co., 831 F.2d 903, 906 (9th Cir. 1987) (upholding the Judicial Conference's rules that established a "bright-line" test for the payment of the user fees that funded bankruptcy referees' salaries).

CONCLUSION

For all the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee urges that the orders of the district court be reversed insofar as they exclude payments to secured creditors from the calculation of quarterly fees under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6).

FN1. In bankruptcy matters, "the rules of finality developed under ... 28 U.S.C. § 1291 (1982) are given a flexible reading." In re Victoria Station, Inc., 840 F.2d 682, 683 (9th Cir. 1988). The issue on appeal concerns the types of disbursements that must be considered in determining the quarterly fee. Because the district court determined that the amount of the quarterly fee should have been based on disbursements that included payments not considered by the bankruptcy court, the district court remanded for the bankruptcy court to reassess the quarterly fee owing by the Debtor and to reconsider whether a contingent dismissal might have been appropriate given the district court's construction of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The remand is ministerial, because the amount of the quarterly fee owing under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) does not change with the district court's analysis, so that the district court's decision effectively determined the outcome of the case. FN2. The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice, charged by statute with the duty to oversee and supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a). The United States Trustee is expressly given standing under 11 U.S.C. § 307 to raise and be heard on any issue under title 11, except that the United States Trustee may not file a chapter 11 plan of reorganization.

FN3. The quarterly fees are payable to the United States Trustee and deposited in the United States Trustee System Fund pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 589a(b)(5) and (f)(2), for use as a source of appropriated funds for the United States Trustee Program.

FN4. Specifically, Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States received $421,447.57 because of its first priority lien on the property. Apparently, the sum of $37,150.05 was then paid for various taxes, assessments and costs of the sale. Motion for Order Authorizing Distribution of Sale Proceeds and Notice of Hearing Thereon, at 2-3. The propriety of these payments is not at issue.

FN5. The sum of $3,750.00 would have been owed for the fourth quarter of 1991, based on disbursements of sale proceeds exceeding $300,000. The sum of $500.00 would have been owed for the first quarter of 1992, based on disbursements of the balance of the sale proceeds. The Debtor has paid $400.00 in fees for the two quarters. The Debtor therefore still owes $3,850.00 of the total $4,250.00.

FN6. The disbursements at issue had not been made by the Debtor directly but by an escrow agent, and then by the Debtor's counsel. Response to Objection to Motion for Distribution of Proceeds, at 3.

FN7. Because the court's analysis was so cursory, the United States Trustee moved the district court for a rehearing, noting the lack of authority for the court's position. D. Ct. Dkt. at 37. The district court denied that motion in a per curiam order that does nothing further to explain its analysis. D. Ct. Dkt. at 41.

FN8. Because the real estate and its proceeds were clearly property of the estate, this Court need not address the issue of whether, in fact, disbursements must be "attributable to property of the debtor".

FN9. The responsibilities and duties of the United States Trustee are set forth at 28 U.S.C. § 586(a) and throughout the Bankruptcy Code. The sources of funding for the United States Trustee Program are set forth at 28 U.S.C. § 589a.

FN10. Failure to pay the quarterly fees can be a ground for dismissal or conversion of the case under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)(10).

PETITION FOR PANEL REHEARING

Pursuant to Rule 40 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, the appellant, Linda Ekstrom Stanley, U.S. Trustee for Region 17, hereby petitions for panel rehearing as to Part III.A. of the panel's opinion.

INTRODUCTION

This case involves a constitutional challenge under the Uniformity Clause [FN2] to the U.S. Trustees Program, which operates as an agency within the Department of Justice and is charged with conducting the administrative oversight for the bankruptcy system at present, in all but six federal judicial districts.

Prior to 1982, when the Supreme Court struck down a substantive law governing the bankruptcy of only one railroad in the entire country, it "ha[d] never invalidated a bankruptcy law for lack of uniformity," Railway Labor Executives Ass'n v. Gibbons, 455 U.S. 457, 469 (1982), and it has never done so again. In Uniformity Clause cases, the Supreme Court has not undertaken a searching review of Congress's actions; it has held that "[t]he uniformity requirement is not a straitjacket" for Congress, id., and that there is "flexibility inherent in" the clause. Regional Rail Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 158 (1974).

The panel majority here unnecessarily reached out to invalidate part of an Act of Congress under the Uniformity Clause -- unnecessarily, because the panel's constitutional determination in Part III.A. of its decision had no effect on the ultimate disposition of this litigation. The majority's ruling was also incorrect; it failed to give proper consideration to the administrative nature of the U.S. Trustees' statutory duties and to give proper deference to the deliberate congressional decision to phase the Program in gradually. The panel's decision was not compelled by the policies of the Uniformity Clause or the case law, and put this Court at odds with another circuit. Its effect is to create uncertainty in the U.S. Trustees Program, and to encourage a constitutional challenge by every person outside the Ninth Circuit who claims to be adversely affected by the operation of the Program. We, therefore, request that the panel rehear this case and withdraw Part III.A. of its decision.

STATEMENT

A. THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEES PROGRAM.

[*3] 1. The U.S. Trustees Program was created by Congress in 1978 in order to "separate the administrative duties in bankruptcy from the judicial tasks, leaving the bankruptcy judges free to resolve disputes untainted by knowledge of administrative matters unnecessary and perhaps prejudicial to an impartial judicial determination." H.R. Rep. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 18, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5227, 5230. Until the Bankruptcy Reform Act was passed in 1978, administration of individual bankruptcy cases was the responsibility of bankruptcy judges.

Because of the bankruptcy judges' "dual responsibilities -- administrative and judicial," there was a "close relationship between bankruptcy judges, trustees, trustees' attorneys, and the bankruptcy bar that led to the perception that there was a 'bankruptcy ring' that had the inside track on all bankruptcy matters." General Accounting Office, Bankruptcy Administration: Justification Lacking for Continuing Two Parallel Programs, Sept. 1992 (GAO/GGD-92-133), at 4; see H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 95, reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6056-57 (discussing "bankruptcy ring"). Congress, accordingly, created the U.S. Trustees Program as an agency within the Department of Justice to take over the administrative responsibilities for bankruptcy cases.

The administrative duties of the U.S. Trustees are set forth in 28 U.S.C. 586(a). Principally, the U.S. Trustee is to "establish, maintain, and supervise a panel of private trustees that are eligible and available to serve as trustees in cases under chapter 7 of title 11," and to "supervise the administration of" chapter 7, 11, or 13 bankruptcy cases by "monitoring applications [by a trustee, examiner, or professional person] for compensation and reimbursement," "monitoring plans and disclosure statements" in chapter 11 cases, "monitoring plans filed under chapters 12 and 13," ensuring that "all reports, schedules, and fees required to be filed" under titles 11 and 28 of the United States Code are properly and timely filed, "monitoring creditors' committees appointed under title 11," making criminal referrals to the United States Attorney, "monitoring the progress of cases under title 11" to prevent undue delay, and "monitoring applications filed [for employment of professional persons] under section 327 of title 11." 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(1) & (3)(A) - (H). In addition, the U.S. Trustee is authorized to serve as a bankruptcy trustee when required under title 11 and to deposit or invest money received as bankruptcy trustee in such cases. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(2), (4) & (5). Finally, the U.S. Trustee is instructed to "make such reports as the Attorney General directs." 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(6).

The U.S. Trustees Program is designed to be self-financing through the imposition of fees paid out of the debtor's estate. There is a statutory schedule of quarterly fees found in 28 U.S.C. 1930(a)(6).

2. Congress initially established the U.S. Trustees Program in 1978 as a pilot program in 18 federal judicial districts. Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-598, § 1501, 92 Stat. 2652 (1978). Following an evaluation of the pilot program, Congress made the U.S. Trustees Program permanent in 1986 for all federal judicial districts. However, Congress decided to phase in the Program, bringing some districts into the program later than others. [FN3] Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, §§ 301-02, Pub. L. No. 99-554, 100 Stat. 3118-24 (1986). The last six judicial districts, covering the states of Alabama and North Carolina, were to come within the Program no later than October 1, 1992, and in the meantime the administrative duties were handled by the Bankruptcy Administrator system, an independent program within the judicial branch. In 1990, Congress extended the deadline for those six districts to October 1, 2002. Judicial Improvements Act of 1990, § 317(a), 104 Stat. 5115 (1990).

B. STATEMENT OF FACTS AND COURSE OF PROCEEDINGS.

[*4] 1. Victoria Farms, Inc., is a chapter 11 debtor whose bankruptcy estate included real property subject to first and second deeds of trust and various liens. In October 1991, the debtor obtained bankruptcy court approval of the sale of the real property. The proceeds of sale were to go first to pay the holder of a first deed of trust on the property, and then to pay real property taxes and other charges. The balance of sale proceeds would be placed in an impound account controlled by the debtor-in-possession's counsel. (Dist. Ct. Op. at 4)

In January 1992, the debtor moved for an order authorizing distribution of the sale proceeds, and the U.S. Trustee objected on the ground that the debtor should be required to pay the quarterly fees owing the U.S. Trustee under § 1930(a)(6) for the fourth quarter of 1991 and the first quarter of 1992. The bankruptcy court granted the debtor's motion and dismissed the case, ordering that the U.S. Trustee's quarterly fees be "calculated only on actual disbursements and not on constructive disbursements." (Bankr. Ct. Judg.) Although it is not clear from the opinion, it appears that the bankruptcy court considered the disbursement from the impound account to have been "constructive" because it was made by someone other than the debtor, namely, the debtor's counsel.

The U.S. Trustee appealed to the district court. The court declined to address the debtor's Uniformity Clause challenge to the U.S. Trustees Program, since it had not been raised below. (Dist. Ct. Op. at 2 n.1) The court held that a disbursement was to be excluded from calculation of the quarterly fee only if it was a payment made to a secured creditor from the proceeds of the underlying property. (Id. at 10) It remanded the case to the bankruptcy court to assess the U.S. Trustee's quarterly fees. (Id. at 11)

2. The U.S. Trustee then took an appeal to this Court, arguing that the district court's standard for calculating the quarterly fee was incorrect. This Court reversed, over a partial dissent by Judge Poole.

The panel majority first determined that it was appropriate to consider the constitutional issue even though it had not been addressed by the district court, and held that section 317(a) of the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990 -- the ten-year extension of the opt-in deadline for the judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina -- violated the Uniformity Clause. The majority held that the U.S. Trustee statute was substantive and not administrative, because it "governs the relationship between creditor and debtor," and "has a concrete effect upon the relief available to creditors." Slip op. at 13243. The majority stated that there could be no "geographically isolated problems" that would justify the non-uniformity; since creditors and debtors in Alabama and North Carolina are governed by a less costly system, section 317 violated the Uniformity Clause. Id. at 13244, 13246. Observing that Congress had provided no explicit rationale for the phase-in, the majority declared that "[u]nder any standard of review, when Congress provides no justification for enacting a non-uniform law, its decision can only be considered to be irrational and arbitrary." Id. at 13246.

[*5] Based on what it described as principles of "judicial restraint," id. at 12347, the panel majority held that only the 1990 extension of the effective date for the six districts in Alabama and North Carolina was invalid, and not the entire Program. The result, in the majority's view, was a valid uniform law that could properly be applied to the debtor before it. Accordingly, the majority turned to the fee issue, and held that the U.S. Trustee was entitled to his fee.

A partial dissent by Judge Poole criticized the majority for "deciding a constitutional issue which has not effect on the review of the controversy before it, but which will undoubtedly spawn litigation" in other courts. Id. at 13254 (dissenting opinion). The dissent also explained that the panel had "assume[d], without any empirical footing, a great deal about the effect of the United States Trustee on the relationship between debtors and creditors," noting that there was "tremendous local variation in the practice of bankruptcy" independent of the U.S. Trustee. Id. Finally, the dissent observed that the U.S. Trustee's presence appears to make resolution of bankruptcy matters "more cost efficient," id. at 13255, rather than more expensive, as the majority believed. The majority's conclusion about the law's constitutionality was based on "empirical conjectures" of the sort "best left to Congress," which had decided to introduce the Program throughout all geographic regions of the country in four separate stages. Id.

ARGUMENT

I. THE PANEL MAJORITY FAILED TO GIVE PROPER CONSIDERATION TO THE ADMINISTRATIVE NATURE OF THE U.S. TRUSTEES' STATUTORY DUTIES.

The panel majority gave insufficient attention to the administrative nature of the U.S. Trustee's statutory duties, holding instead that the relevant question under the Uniformity Clause is whether the statute "governs the relationship between creditor and debtor." Slip op. at 13243. This holding is not supported by the policies of the Uniformity Clause or by any precedent.

The principal purpose of the Uniformity Clause was to enable Congress to pass a nationwide bankruptcy law that would prevent one state from denying effect to the relief granted by another state. As the Supreme Court has explained, "[u]niformity among state debtor insolvency laws was an impossibility and the practice of passing private bankruptcy laws was subject to abuse if the legislators were less than honest"; the Framers therefore "sought to provide Congress with the power to enact uniform laws on the subject enforceable among the States" and "to prohibit Congress from enacting private bankruptcy laws." Gibbons, 455 U.S. at 472. The Court has upheld substantive bankruptcy legislation that incorporated the differing laws of the various states, explaining that the "general operation of the law is uniform although it may result in certain particulars differently in different states." Hanover National Bank v. Moyses, 186 U.S. 181, 189-90 (1902). It has also upheld substantive bankruptcy statutes treating "railroad bankruptcies as a distinctive and special problem" and has permitted Congress to "take into account differences that exist between different parts of the country." Regional Railroad Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. at 159.

[*6] Unlike these non-uniform substantive bankruptcy statutes, the U.S. Trustees statute is designed to further the efficient administration of bankruptcy matters, not to alter substantive bankruptcy law. The majority's assertion that the U.S. Trustee statute "governs the relationship between creditor and debtor," and "has a concrete effect upon the relief available to debtors" because debtors are required to pay a quarterly fee, slip op. at 13243, is inaccurate. The U.S. Trustees' statutory duties are administrative in nature; they are described in terms such as "supervise," "monitor," "notify," and "make . . . reports." 28 U.S.C. 586(a). See also pp. 3-4, supra. The statute leaves the substantive debtor-creditor relationship unchanged; it simply provides for an administrative watchdog, the U.S. Trustee, who is responsible for ensuring the fairness and efficiency of the process by which the debtor and creditor resolve their rights and obligations under the substantive law of bankruptcy.

The majority also erred in concluding that the U.S. Trustee's quarterly fee under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a)(6) affected the substantive relief available under the bankruptcy laws. The U.S. Trustee's fee is merely a user fee; Congress intended the Program to be "self-funding and [to] be paid for by the users of the bankruptcy system -- not by the taxpayer." H.R. Rep. No. 764, supra, at 22, reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 5234. There is nothing in the record in this case to support the majority's "conjecture[]," slip op. at 13255 (dissenting opinion), that the U.S. Trustee system is more expensive overall for the debtor than the Bankruptcy Administrator system, id. at 13243, 13246. [FN4]

II. THE PANEL MAJORITY FAILED TO GIVE APPROPRIATE DEFERENCE TO CONGRESS'S STATUTORY PLAN.

Even assuming the uniformity requirement was implicated by the U.S. Trustee statute, the panel majority failed to apply the high level of deference due the congressional purposes behind the phase-in. The majority's declaration that Congress's action was "arbitrary and irrational" and that the law would be invalid "[u]nder any standard of review," slip op. at 13246, was incorrect.

To begin with, the majority failed to recognize that Congress has, in fact, applied the statute in all federal judicial districts; it has merely phased in its application. The majority cited no authority indicating that the Uniformity Clause would bar a phase-in, and we have found none. Moreover, the phase-in makes eminent practical sense. It should be understood as a means by which Congress has pursued a policy of gradualism permitting continued evaluation of the efficacy of the Program. Cf. City of New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297, 303 (1976) (per curiam) ("[l]egislatures may implement their program step by step"); id. at 305 ("gradual approach" permissible). Congress first created a pilot program; in 1986, it made the U.S. Trustee Program permanent nationwide, but phased it in by gradually adding groups of judicial districts to the Program; and, in 1990, it extended the time in which it could evaluate the success of the Program in relation to the Bankruptcy Adminstrator program in effect in Alabama and North Carolina, where the administrative functions are still being handled by the judiciary. See generally GAO Report, supra (comparing relative efficiencies, costs, and results achieved in sample districts in each program). [FN5]

[*7] Rather than determining which standard of review applied, the majority simply held that Congress's failure to specify explicitly its justification for the phase-in made the statute invalid under any standard of review. Slip op. at 13246. This was error. Since the purpose of the Uniformity Clause is to ensure similar treatment of similar debtors, see Regional Railroad Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. at 159, the appropriate standard of review of Congress's reason for non-uniformity should be a deferential one, comparable to "rational basis" review in the equal protection context. Cf. United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434, 446 (1973) (bankruptcy classifications given rational-basis review under the Equal Protection Clause). The Supreme Court has never insisted on searching review in Uniformity Clause cases; it has held that "[t]he uniformity requirement is not a straitjacket" for Congress, Gibbons, 455 U.S. at 457; see Regional Rail Re-organization Act Cases, 419 U.S. at 158 (noting "flexibility inherent in" the clause), and has only once struck down a statute as non-uniform -- when the statute's application to a single debtor gave it no alternative. Gibbons, 455 U.S. at 473 (law addressed to "one named debtor can hardly be considered uniform").

Under a standard of review comparable to "rational basis," the statute's temporary non-uniformity may be justified as a means of permitting Congress to continue evaluating the Program's efficacy. "Rational basis" review requires that a statute be upheld unless there is no conceivable rational basis for it, and the legislative distinction may be based on "rational speculation unsupported by evidence or empirical data." Heller v. Doe, 113 S. Ct. 2637, 2642 (1993). The courts "never require a legislature to articulate its reasons for enacting a statute, [and] it is entirely irrelevant for constitutional purposes whether the conceived reason for the challenged distinction actually motivated the legislature." FCC v. Beach Comm., Inc., 113 S. Ct. 2096, 2102 (1993). Thus, the majority erred here in requiring an explicit statement of congressional intent. Slip op. at 13245-46.

III. THE DECISION UNNECESSARILY DISRUPTS THE U.S. TRUSTEES PROGRAM AND ENCOURAGES LITIGATION ACROSS THE COUNTRY.

Invalidating an Act of Congress on constitutional grounds is, as Justice Holmes noted, "the gravest and most delicate duty [a court] is called upon to perform." Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142, 148 (1927). In the circumstances of this case, it was also an unnecessary duty. The panel majority unnecessarily reached out to "decid[e] a constitutional issue which has no effect on the review of the controversy before it, but which will undoubtedly spawn litigation" in other courts. Slip op. at 13254 (dissenting opinion).

Ordinarily, a constitutional decision will profoundly affect the outcome of a case. Here, however, the invalidation of section 317(a) had no effect, because the majority was able to treat the statute as uniform and to hold that the U.S. Trustee was entitled to his quarterly fee. Slip op. at 13249-52. Since the U.S. Trustee was entitled to the fee whether or not section 317(a) was constitutional, it would have been more consistent with "judicial restraint," id. at 13247, to have pointed this out without actually deciding the Uniformity Clause issue.

[*8] Beyond the narrow confines of this litigation, the majority's unnecessary resolution of the constitutional issue is of great consequence. The U.S. Trustees Program currently operates in 88 of the 94 federal judicial districts nationwide, 73 of which are outside the Ninth Circuit. The majority's decision serves to encourage every debtor in one of those 73 districts (perhaps also those in Alabama and North Carolina) and every other party believing itself to be adversely affected by an action of a U.S. Trustee to raise a similar constitutional challenge. The resulting disruption of the U.S. Trustees Program nationwide and the fostering of voluminous litigation across the country will place an undue burden on the U.S. Trustees, the federal courts, and parties to bankruptcy proceedings.

In addition, the majority's constitutional conclusion here already places this Court at odds with the Eighth Circuit, [FN6] and other courts are certain to weigh in on this issue. We recognize that the debtor here presented an interesting and unusual constitutional issue, but the panel was not compelled to decide it, and in light of the systemic disruption the decision is likely to cause, should not have done so.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the panel should rehear the case and withdraw Part III.A. of its decision.

FOOTNOTES

FN1. Linda Ekstrom Stanley is now the U.S. Trustee for Region 17 and should be substituted for Mark St. Angelo pursuant to Rule 43(c) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

FN2. The Uniformity Clause confers on Congress the power to "establish . . . uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States," U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 4.

FN3. In the first class of districts (consisting of nearly all the original pilot districts), the Program took effect immediately; in the second class, it took effect 30 days following certification by the Attorney General but not later than 270 days from the date of enactment; in the third, it also took effect 30 days following certification by the Attorney General but not later than 2 years from the date of enactment; and in the fourth, it was to take effect upon election by the district judges in the district but not later than October 1, 1992.

FN4. The administrative functions of the U.S. Trustee no more affect the relief available to debtors than do the local bankruptcy court rules, which by definition are non-uniform. See In re Walat, 87 Bankr. 408, 412-13 (Bankr. E.D. Va.), aff'd, 89 Bankr. 11 (E.D. Va. 1988) (local rule requiring a certain form for chapter 13 plans and directing court clerk to reject for filing any nonconforming plan does not violate Uniformity Clause).

FN5. The majority erred in minimizing the significance of this GAO report, the very existence of which demonstrates that Congress was in fact interested in evaluating the relative merits of the two programs. The majority incorrectly interpreted the GAO's statement that it "could not find any justification for continuing two separate programs," GAO Report at 16; see slip op. at 13241, as indicating that Congress never had a basis for its decision to phase the Program in. The GAO's statement simply meant that no further evaluation was needed and that Congress should forge ahead with its longstanding decision to implement the Program nationwide. See GAO Report at 17 (Recommendations to Congress). We do not dispute that a perceived problem with the pilot program in Alabama contributed to one aspect of the phase-in, but the decision to phase in the Program was a far more expansive one concerning all 94 judicial districts across the country, not just three districts in Alabama and three in North Carolina. In any event, an "alleged illicit legislative motive" is not a basis for striking down an otherwise constitutional statute. See United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 383 (1968).

FN6. In In re Prines, 867 F.2d 478 (8th Cir. 1989), the debtors characterized their challenge as an equal protection claim that debtors in non- pilot districts were not subject to quarterly fees until one year after the district was certified, 867 F.2d at 484, and argued that "some measure of heightened scrutiny is required because of the Constitution's provision for uniform bankruptcy laws, see, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8." Id. at 485. The Eighth Circuit concluded, however, that classifications found in bankruptcy legislation are subject to rational-basis review, and that "this statutory scheme is rationally related to the legitimate governmental interest of establishing a nationwide self-supporting trustee system." Id. The panel majority here distinguished Prines as merely an equal-protection case, slip op. at 13247 n.6, but since essentially the same standard of review would apply to the Uniformity Clause issue, this does not distinguish the case.

MEMORANDUM OF LAW IN SUPPORT OF OBJECTION OF THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE TO FIRST PLAZA'S MOTION SEEKING APPOINTMENT TO OFFICIAL COMMITTEE OF UNSECURED CREDITORS

To Hon. Stephen D. Gerling, Chief U.S. Bankruptcy Judge:

The United States Trustee for the Northern District of New York respectfully submits this Memorandum of Law in support of the objection interposed by the United States Trustee with regard to the motion by Mellon Bank, N.A. (hereinafter "First Plaza"), seeking appointment to the official committee of unsecured creditors. The allegations of First Plaza that the United States Trustee acted arbitrarily and capriciously in this case are simply not supported in view of all of the pertinent facts. The facts clearly indicate that First Plaza has an actual conflict of interest by virtue of its significant ownership interest in the debtor's parent corporation, Victory Holdings, Inc. ("VHI"). Additionally, the committee, as created by the United States Trustee, adequately represents the make-up of the entire unsecured creditor body. However, this Court need not reach these issues in view of the 1986 amendment to 11 U.S.C. § 1102, which clearly leaves full discretion regarding committee composition with the United States Trustee.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

The statement of facts included in First Plaza's Memorandum of Law selectively, and conveniently for First Plaza, excludes facts that are relevant to a determination of the issues presented in the motion and makes inaccurate representations as to other pertinent facts. These misrepresentations, including what appears to be an intentional omission of pertinent facts, must be clarified in order for the Court to adequately address the issues before the Court.

On September 20, 1995, the debtor, Victory Markets, Inc., filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Immediately upon the filing of the case, the United States Trustee undertook to solicit the twenty largest creditors for interest in serving on an official committee of unsecured creditors. Initially, the United States Trustee relied on the list of twenty largest unsecured creditors as filed by the debtor pursuant to FRBP 1007(d). That list appropriately did not include First Plaza in compliance with the FRBP 1007(d) requirement that the list exclude insiders.

The United States Trustee's solicitation efforts initially included mailing solicitation forms to each of the twenty largest creditors. Next, an appropriate date for an organizational meeting was determined and the United States Trustee proceeded to call each of the twenty largest creditors to advise such creditors of the date and time of the meeting, namely October 6, 1995, at 10:00 a.m. The meeting was scheduled on an expedited basis in order to allow the creditor's committee an opportunity to review the post-petition financing arrangements and cash collateral matters that are scheduled for final hearings during October. The United States Trustee also ensured that the twenty largest creditors received the solicitation forms. Additionally, the United States Trustee received a seemingly endless chain of telephone inquiries from creditors, each of whom were sent solicitation forms and were advised of the time and place of the organizational meeting. As a result of the United States Trustee's efforts in this case, 26 creditors returned solicitation forms indicating their interest in serving on the unsecured creditors committee.[1]

Within a few days after the filing of this bankruptcy case, the United States Trustee learned of First Plaza's interest in serving on the creditors committee. The United States Trustee requested that First Plaza submit a solicitation form. First Plaza provided a letter in support of its appointment to the committee on or about September 27, 1995. See Exhibit 1. Soon after learning of First Plaza's status as an unsecured creditor and upon review of the case, it was determined that First Plaza was an affiliate of the debtor's parent corporation, Victory Holdings, Inc. ("VHI"), and as such was an insider of the debtor pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 101(31)(E).

In order to determine whether First Plaza should be appointed to the committee, the United States Trustee began investigating the relationship that First Plaza has with the debtor. From September 25, 1995, through October 5, 1995, the United States Trustee had numerous telephone conversations and in person conversations with Stephen A. Donato, Esq., counsel for First Plaza. These discussions all pertained to whether First Plaza would be a member of the unsecured creditor committee. On September 25, 27, 29, October 2 and 3, the United States Trustee conversed by telephone with Stephen A. Donato, Esq. Additionally, on September 29, 1995, Mr. Collins participated in a telephone conference with Mr. Donato and Luc Despins, Esq., of Kirkland & Ellis, regarding the appointment of the committee. On October 3, 1995, Kim Lefebvre, Esq., Assistant United States Trustee, discussed committee issues with Mr. Donato. On October 5, 1995, the night before the organizational meeting, Mr. Collins, Mr. Lefebvre, and Brian Masumoto, Esq., of the New York City U.S. Trustee's office, conferred with Mr. Despins regarding additional information needed to determine whether First Plaza should be appointed to the unsecured creditor committee. Finally, on October 6, 1995, prior to the organizational meeting, Mr. Lefebvre approached Mr. Donato and requested that certain information, which had been requested of Mr. Despins, be provided. Mr. Donato provided the information immediately prior to the start of the organizational meeting.

[1] The United States trustee also received approximately 25 solicitation forms regarding the committee for the New Almac's Inc. bankruptcy case. In all the United States trustee received over 50 solicitation forms.

In further efforts to determine whether First Plaza had a conflict of interest that would preclude its membership on the committee, and in addition to the telephone conferences, the United States Trustee sent letters on September 28, 1995, and September 29, 1995, requesting numerous documents and other information from First Plaza. See Exhibits 2 and 3. Said letters requested that the information be provided on or before October 2, 1995. On September 29, 1995, the United States Trustee received a response letter from First Plaza which did not fully provide the information requested and which indicated that the rest of the information would be provided by October 2, 1995. See Exhibit 4. The United states Trustee responded with a letter dated October 1, 1995, which reiterated the request for information. See Exhibit 5. On October 2, 1995, the United States Trustee received a letter from Luc Despins, Esq., of Kirkland & Ellis, which responded to some of the requests of the United States Trustee. See Exhibit 6. Particularly notable are the inconsistencies between that letter and the factual assertions included in the motion before this Court. In particular, Mr. Despins states in his letter that First Plaza has only voted its shares twice, while First Plaza asserts in its motion that such shares have been voted on three occasions. Additionally, both the letter and the motion fail to state that the First Plaza has the power to place a director on the Board of Directors of VHI.

On October 3, 1995, First Plaza provided certain documents pertaining to the loan that is the basis for First Plaza's unsecured claim, as requested by the United States Trustee.[2] See Exhibits 7 and 8. Michael Collins, Esq., of the United States Trustee's office in Utica, reviewed each of the documents pertaining to the First Plaza debt and delivered copies of the documents to the Albany U.S. Trustee's office for further review. On October 5, 1995, Kim Lefebvre, Esq., Assistant United States Trustee, and Brian Masumoto, Esq., from the New York City U.S. Trustee office, travelled to Utica to assist in forming the committee. A substantial portion of time was spent by Mr. Collins, Mr. Lefebvre, and Mr. Masumoto in further reviewing the documents and information regarding the First Plaza claim. Based on all the information received, the United States Trustee determined that First Plaza has an actual conflict of interest by virtue of its ownership interest in VHI.

In making the determination, the following facts, among others, were considered:

1) First Plaza owns approximately 37% of VHI, which owns 100% of the debtor corporation. Consequently, First Plaza effectively owns 37% of the debtor.

2) First Plaza has voted its shares on several occasions since 1992, indicating that First Plaza exercises some control over the activities of VHI. As noted above, First Plaza has been inconsistent in its recollection of how many times it voted its shares. Additionally, First Plaza represents to the Court that it only voted regarding "technical" matters. However, as disclosed in Exhibit 6, First Plaza voted regarding a stock split and regarding a restructuring in 1994. These matters can hardly be considered "technical." Upon information and belief, First Plaza made no effort to clarify its representation prior to the appointment of the committee.

[2] By this time, the United States trustee had already obtained the documents from the debtor's attorney.

3) First Plaza has the ability to place a director on the Board of Directors of VHI at any time based on its significant ownership interest. Even though First Plaza claims never to have placed any director on the board, the power to exercise such option gives First Plaza some measure of control over VHI.

4) No single entity holds over 50% of the stock of VHI. Consequently, an alignment between First Plaza and another shareholder of VHI could give absolute control over VHI to First Plaza.

5) Upon information and belief, Centre Capital Investors, L.P. ("Centre Capital"), which holds approximately 43.8% of the stock of VHI, and First Plaza are involved in numerous investments together. Consequently, it is likely that the interests of First Plaza and Centre Capital are aligned such that First Plaza and Centre Capital jointly control VHI.

6) In light of First Plaza's interest and control over VHI, First Plaza's presence on the unsecured creditors committee poses an obvious conflict of interest. First, confidential information regarding strategies of the committee in plan negotiations would be compromised if an owner of the debtor were included as a member of the committee. Additionally, allowing an owner of the debtor to negotiate issues with the debtor, such as plan provisions, is effectively allowing the debtor to negotiate with itself. In light of these facts and others, the United States Trustee determined that First Plaza should not be appointed to the Official Unsecured Creditor Committee.

In addition to the efforts to determine the true nature of First Plaza's ownership interest, the United States Trustee made similar efforts to obtain documentation regarding the other unsecured claims. Requests for information regarding the bondholders were made upon Shawmut Bank, N.A. as indenture trustee, Timothy Clark, Esq., representing approximately $40,000,000 of the $60,000,000 of outstanding bonds, and Jeffrey Dove, Esq., the debtor's attorney. Additionally, Mr. Dove was requested to and did provide substantial information regarding the First Plaza debt, the bond debt, and the trade debt.

On the evening of October 5, 1995, after reviewing the facts regarding First Plaza, Mr. Collins, Mr. Lefebvre, and Mr. Masumoto reviewed the 26 solicitation forms received. Upon request, the debtor provided a breakdown of the different types of trade debt involved and provided the debtor's records regarding the amounts owed to the various creditors. The United States Trustee made a preliminary decision as to the numbers and types of creditors to be included in the committee. At the organizational meeting on October 6, 1995, the United States Trustee made the final decision as to which creditors should be appointed to the committee. A notice of appointment of Unsecured Creditor Committee was filed on October 6, 1995. See Exhibit 9. Contrary to the assertion made by First Plaza in its Memorandum of Law, the United States Trustee had absolutely no discussion with any representative of First Plaza at the organizational meeting as to the reason that First Plaza was not selected to the Unsecured Creditors' Committee. The representation made by First Plaza in that regard is completely unfounded.

On the afternoon of October 6, 1995, First Plaza filed the present motion and the Court allowed the hearing to be held on less than one business day of notice to the United States Trustee and the Official Unsecured Creditors' Committee.

DISCUSSION

I. Composition of committees is vested in the sole discretion of the United States Trustee pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1102

A review of the plain language of section 1102, as well as the legislative history of that section, clearly indicates that the United States Trustee is entrusted with the appointment of committees and that the composition of any committees so appointed is fully within the discretion of the United States Trustee. Such discretion is not subject to review by the Court.

Prior to 1986, section 1102 of the Bankruptcy Code provided that the Court could appoint committees under section 1102(a) and could change the composition of any such committee upon motion by a party in interest pursuant to section 1102(c). Prior to 1986, section 1102(c) stated clearly that

> [o]n request of a party in interest and after notice and a hearing, the court may change the membership or the size of a committee appointed under subsection (a) of this section if the membership of such committee is not representative of the different kinds of claims or interests to be represented.

11 U.S.C. § 1102(c)(1988). Thus, prior to 1986, the bankruptcy courts had the authority to make changes in membership and or size of any committee appointed under section 1102.

In 1986, the Bankruptcy Code was substantially amended by Congress to, inter alia, expand the United States trustee program nationwide. In providing for the specific responsibilities of the United States Trustees, Congress made significant amendments to section 1102. First, Congress amended section 1102(a) to provide that the United States trustee, rather than the Court, would be responsible for appointing committees. Additionally, Congress completely deleted section 1102(c), thereby eliminating the power of the Court to change the size or composition of committees appointed by the United States Trustee. In re Wheeler Technology, Inc., 139 B.R. 235, 239 (9th Cir. BAP 1992); In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 210-11 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.

The present version of section 1102(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that > as soon as practicable after the order for relief under chapter 11 of this title, the United States trustee shall appoint a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims and may appoint additional committees of creditors or of equity security holders as the United States trustee deems appropriate.

11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1995). Section 1102(a)(2) provides that the Court may order that additional committees be appointed after notice and hearing "if necessary to assure adequate representation of creditors." This power to order the appointment of additional committees is the court's sole remedy for claims of inadequate representation. In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 211 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990). However, if the Court decides that an additional committee is indeed necessary in any particular case, the United States Trustee is still given the sole authority to appoint the committee. See 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(2)(1995)("[t]he United States trustee shall appoint any such committee"); In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. at 8.

The Ninth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel appears to be the only appellate court to have reviewed the issue of whether a bankruptcy court may effect a change in the composition of a committee in view of the 1986 amendments to section 1102. In In re Wheeler Technology, Inc., supra, the Ninth Circuit reviewed a decision by the bankruptcy court which ordered that a particular creditor be removed from the unsecured creditor committee as a sanction for violating the automatic stay. While the creditor did not dispute the finding that it had violated the automatic stay, the creditor appealed the bankruptcy judge's order requiring removal from the committee.

In reviewing the bankruptcy court decision, the BAP quickly concluded that the bankruptcy court had no authority to effect a change in the composition of the creditors committee. The BAP reviewed the 1986 amendments to section 1102 and concluded that "[t]he power to appoint and delete members of the Creditors' Committee now resides exclusively with the U.S. Trustee." Id. at 239 (emphasis added). Additionally, the BAP noted that section 105 could not be used by the Court to modify the membership of a committee because such action would be "contrary to the legislative history and Congressional intent in deleting subsection (c) of § 1102." Id., citing Matter of Gates Engineering Co., 104 B.R. at 654.

In addition to the Ninth Circuit BAP, the Southern District of New York has also concluded in several cases that the bankruptcy courts have no authority to change the membership of creditor committees. See In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 210 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990); In re Hills Stores Co.., 137 B.R. 4, 8 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992). In In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. at 210, a creditor moved the court to compel the United States Trustee to add the creditor to the committee of unsecured creditors. The creditor had made a formal request to the United States Trustee to be added to the committee, but such request was refused.

The analysis of the court in resolving the matter was almost identical to that utilized by the Ninth Circuit BAP. The Drexel court first recited the present version of section 1102(a), then noted "the absence of any indication in the statute that the court may add to or delete an unsecured creditor from a committee." Id. at 210. The court was also aware that section 1102(c), which had previously provided the court with specific authority to alter the composition of creditors' committees, had been deleted by the 1986 amendments. Id. Properly following the statutory language strictly, the court concluded that section 1102 does not authorize the court to add or delete creditors from committees appointed pursuant to 1102(a). Id. at 210-11. Furthermore, the court concluded that section 105 could not provide such authorization, stating that "[s]ection 105(a) states that a court may issue orders 'necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title,' not in ignorance of what Congress has wrought." Id. at 211. The court, however, did recognize that it had the ability to address inadequate representation problems, but only through creation of other committees. Id.; see 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(2).

The well-reasoned analysis of Judge Buschman in Drexel, as well as the analysis of the Ninth Circuit BAP, should be followed by this court.[3] Indeed, the conclusion reached by Judge Buschman is the only conclusion that makes sense in light of the language of section 1102 and the 1986 amendments thereto. If Congress had intended that the court have authority to alter the composition of committees, why did it delete section 1102(c)? The only explanation is that Congress wanted to remove the bankruptcy courts from the administrative aspects of cases and, consequently, vested sole discretion in the United States Trustee as to the composition of committees.

In the Memorandum of Law submitted by First Plaza, several cases are offered to support the proposition that the court may alter the membership of committees appointed under section 1102(a). However, these cases should be disregarded as either being factually inapposite or being based on a flawed interpretation of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.

The first case cited by First Plaza in support of the Court's ability to alter the composition of a committee is In re First RepublicBank Corp., 95 B.R. 58 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1988). In that case, the creditors' committee moved the court to order the removal of a committee member based on an alleged conflict of interest. A request had been made by the committee on the U.S. Trustee to remove the member, but such request had been refused due to the U.S. Trustee's determination that the member did not have a conflict.

[3] Judge Tina Brozman of the Southern District, in In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. 4 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992), cited the Drexel decision with approval in concluding that "[w]hile [the court] may order the appointment of additional committees under § 1102(a)(2) of the Code, the statute no longer permits the addition or deletion of members of committees by the court." Id. at 8.

While the court ultimately refused to change the composition of the committee, the court analyzed, arguably in dicta, whether it could review the decision of the United States Trustee in refusing to alter the committee. The court first noted that section 1102(c) had been deleted by Congress, but concluded that section 105(a) authorized the court to "review the United States trustee's decision on the question of committee membership to determine if the trustee acted arbitrarily and capriciously." The court, however, never decided what the remedy would be if the court concluded that the United States Trustee had, in the court's opinion, acted arbitrarily and capriciously. Apparently, however, the court felt that section 105 would authorize it to alter the composition of the committee, even though such power is reserved exclusively to the United States Trustee by the Bankruptcy Code.

Such a conclusion is contrary to the notion that "a [bankruptcy] court may not employ its equitable powers to achieve a result not contemplated by the [Bankruptcy] Code." Matter of Fesco Plastics Corp., 996 F.2d 152, 154 (7th Cir. 1993). The Bankruptcy Code provides that the United States Trustee has the sole discretion to determine the composition of committees and, consequently, the court should not use section 105 to alter that result. See In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 211 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990)(specifically stating that section 105 cannot be used to allow the court to alter the composition of creditor committees); In re Wheeler Tech., Inc., 139 B.R. 235 (9th Cir. BAP 1992)(same); Matter of Gates Eng'g Co., 104 B.R. 653, 654 (Bankr. D. Del.

1989)("However, the court cannot under the provisions of § 105 circumvent the unambiguous language . . . of the Code . . . in light of the deletion of subsection (c) in 1986."). Consequently, the dicta in In re First RepublicBank Corp., supra, should be rejected by the this Court.

The debtor also cites Matter of Columbia Gas System, Inc., 133 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Del. 1991), for the proposition that the Court may review the decision of the United states Trustee regarding the committee composition under an abuse of discretion standard. However, the court in Columbia Gas based its holding on an untenable interpretation of the legislative history of section 1102 and a complete misreading of several cases. First, the court analyzes the deletion of section 1102(c) and concludes that "the legislative history indicates the Court's power to change committee membership was removed as a housekeeping measure merely to keep section 1102 internally consistent." However, the court gives absolutely no basis for such a conclusion other than the intent of Congress to relieve the courts of administrative matters. Additionally, the argument that section 1102(c) was removed to keep section 1102 "internally consistent" makes no sense. Had Congress intended that the courts would have the ability to alter the composition of committees, Congress obviously would have left section 1102(c) intact. There is nothing in section 1102(c) that is internally inconsistent with the other provisions of section 1102. Consequently, the argument that Congress removed section 1102(c) as a "housekeeping measure" is untenable.

The Columbia Gas court also misread the case of Matter of Gates Eng'g Co., 104 B.R. 653 (Bankr. D. Del. 1989). The court states that the Gates court held that "a U.S. Trustee's refusal to appoint a creditor was subject to the deferent abuse of discretion standard." Matter of Columbia Gas System, Inc., 133 B.R. at 175. However, nowhere in the Gates decision is there any reference to an abuse of discretion standard. To the contrary, the Gates court concluded that section 105 of the Code did not authorize the court to circumvent the unambiguous language of section 1102 "in light of the deletion of subsection (c) in 1986." Matter of Gates Eng'g Co., 104 B.R. at 654. Additionally the Gates court stated that "the Code does not give any creditor the right to serve on a committee. That selection is within the discretion of the U.S. Trustee." Consequently, the Columbia Gas court completely misread the Gates decision.

Finally, the Columbia Gas court misread the decision In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990). In deciding to disregard the Drexel case, the Columbia Gas court states that the court in Drexel "did not review Gates [supra] or consider whether 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) gives bankruptcy courts the ability to remedy an abuse of discretion by the U.S. Trustee." However, it was unnecessary for Drexel to review Gates because the cases are consistent. Both cases hold that the Court cannot change the composition of creditor committees. Also, the Drexel court did address whether section 105(a) authorized it "to correct abuses by the U.S. Trustee." In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. at 211-12. The Drexel court explicitly rejected such a notion stating that "[s]ection 105(a) states that a court may issue orders 'necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title,' not in ignorance of what Congress has wrought."

Since it is apparent that the Columbia Gas court was operating under various misapprehensions, its decision should be given little or no weight. Had the Columbia Gas court accurately analyzed the decisions in Gates and Drexel, its decision may have been different.

Finally, First Plaza relies on In re Texaco, Inc., 79 B.R. 560 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1987), for support of its request that the court order that First Plaza be added to the creditor committee. As stated by Judge Buschman in In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990), "[i]n Texaco, the Court noted the expense of two committees and effectively merged one committee into another without any discussion of the present language of section 1102 or the repeal of former section 1102(c)."[4] Id. at 210. Consequently, just as Judge Buschman dismissed the Texaco case, this court should give little or no weight to Texaco because that court failed to analyze the issue before this court.

Each of the cases cited by First Plaza should be disregarded and the motion to add First Plaza to the creditors committee in this case should be denied. The clear intent of Congress in amending section 1102 was to place the full discretion in committee composition with the United states Trustee. The Congress left with the court the ability to compel the U,.S. Trustee to appoint additional committees, where the committees presently in place did not adequately represent the creditor interests. Consequently, this Court should deny the motion of First Plaza.

II. FRBP Rule 2020 does not authorize the Court to provide the relief requested

In its motion, First Plaza cites in passing FRBP 2020 in support of the relief requested. However, FRBP 2020 is not applicable in this case because the decision regarding the composition of committees has been committed to the discretion of the United States Trustee by law.

Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure ("FRBP") 2020 provides that "[a] proceeding to contest any act or failure to act by the United States trustee is governed by Rule 9014." Consequently, the Court has the power to review acts of the United States Trustee to make sure that such acts are in compliance with the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code. For example, as noted in the Advisory Committee Note to FRBP 2020,

[4] It is noteworthy that the court in Texaco relied heavily on the decision of Judge Buschman in In re McLean Industries, Inc., 70 B.R. 852 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1987). However, Judge Buschman specifically held that his McLean decision was inapplicable to this issue. Who better to define the scope of a judge's ruling than the judge that made the ruling?

> if the United States trustee schedules a § 341 meeting to be held 90 days after the petition is filed, and a party in interest wishes to challenge the propriety of that act in view of § 341(a) of the Code and Rule 2003 which requires that the meeting be held not more than 40 days after the order for relief, [FRBP 2020] permits the party to do so by motion.

However, the Advisory Committee Note to FRBP 2020 further states that "[FRBP 2020] is not intended to limit the discretion of the United States trustee, provided that the United States trustee's act is authorized by, and in compliance with, the Code, title 28, these rules, and other applicable law."

In the present case, the United States Trustee action in appointing a committee of unsecured creditors is authorized by section 1102(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. Furthermore, the United States Trustee has fully complied with all applicable law in forming the committee. On October 6, 1995, as soon as practicable after the order for relief, the United States Trustee appointed the committee of creditors holding unsecured claims in full compliance with section 1102(a)(1). No other requirements pertaining to committee formation appear in the Bankruptcy Code or the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. Accordingly, since the United States Trustee's actions in this case were authorized, and such actions were in full compliance with all applicable law, section 2020 does not authorize the Court to limit the discretion of the United States Trustee regarding the proper composition of the committee. Consequently, this Court should deny the motion of First Plaza.

III. The decision of the United States Trustee regarding the compostion of the Committee was proper in light of First Plaza's actual conflict of interest.

First Plaza makes the argument that the United States Trustee excluded First Plaza from the committee based on their status as an insider. While it is true that First Plaza is an insider of the debtor pursuant to section 101(31)(E) of the Bankruptcy Code, that fact alone did not end the U.S. Trustee's inquiry as to whether First Plaza should be included as a member of the committee. Indeed, if that fact alone ended the United States Trustee's inquiry, why did the United States Trustee continue to request information and documentation up until the morning of the organizational meeting?

Beyond the misapprehension of First Plaza, the truth is that the decision to exclude First Plaza was based on its actual conflict of interest, which, as it happens, arises simultaneously with First Plaza's status as an insider. The facts as set forth herein indicate, among other things, that First Plaza holds 37% of the voting shares of the debtor's parent corporation, that First Plaza has the power to exercise significant control of VHI, and the debtor, by virtue of First Plaza's power to vote its shares and appoint a director of VHI, that First Plaza has exercised its power to vote its shares at least three times in the past three years, and that First Plaza has a relationship with Centre Capital Investors, the owner of 45% of the voting shares of VHI, that transcends their connection in this case. These factors indicate that First Plaza's presence on the committee would hinder the ability of the committee to represent the interests of the unsecured creditors in this case and, in fact, would not be representative of the different kinds of claims to be represented.

In determining the issue of what creditors should be appointed to the unsecured creditors committee, the United States Trustee did not take the matter lightly. As noted in the Statement of Facts, supra, the United States Trustee personnel undertook a diligent effort to encourage as much creditor participation as possible and to obtain as much information as possible regarding all of the unsecured creditors. Included in this inquiry was a substantial devotion to understanding the true nature of First Plaza's ownership interest in VHI. The information obtained in that inquiry, as set forth in the Statement of Facts. supra, clearly indicates that First Plaza's ownership interest in VHI is such that First Plaza would have a conflict of interest if chosen to be a member of the unsecured creditor committee. Perhaps more importantly, there is a strong concern regarding the confidentiality of discussions that the creditors' committee may have regarding the case. Consequently, even if this Court decides that section 105 allows the Court to take any action regardless of contrary provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, this Court should agree that First Plaza would have an actual conflict of interest as a member of the unsecured creditor committee.

Even if this Court questioned whether an actual conflict of interest exists, the facts related herein clearly indicate that the United States Trustee's decision to appoint a committee of unsecured creditors that does not include First Plaza was not arbitrary and capricious, and was not an abuse of discretion.

IV. The Unsecured Creditor Committee, as appointed, adequately represents all unsecured creditors.

The Unsecured Creditor Committee, as appointed by the United States Trustee, fully represents all unsecured creditors. The debtor in this case has the following debt: Trade/Union debt approximately $20,000,000; First Plaza approximately $20,000,000; and Bond debt approximately $60,000,000. Consequently, the total bond debt equals approximately 60% of the total unsecured claims and the total non-bond debt equals approximately 40% of the total unsecured claims. The breakdown of the composition of the committee is such that the bondholders represent 55.5% of the committee members and the non-bond creditors represent 44.4% of the committee. Consequently, the committee as appointed is representative of the entire unsecured creditor body.

First Plaza claims that its exclusion from the committee causes the committee not to be representative of the entire unsecured creditor body. However, First Plaza acknowledges that its debt is pari passu with the trade creditors. Consequently, any actions taken by the unsecured creditors to protect their interests will protect the interests of First Plaza, at least with respect to the unsecured claims. Additionally, efforts made by the bond holders to maximize their claims will benefit First Plaza since the bondholders are subordinated to First Plaza. Thus, First Plaza's interests as an unsecured creditor (perhaps not as an owner) are adequately represented on the committee.

First Plaza tends to indicate that it was "excluded" from the committee, as if it had some right to be on the committee. Clearly, however, the Bankruptcy Code does not provide to any creditor a right to be a member of an unsecured creditor committee no matter how large such creditor's claim is. Additionally, "[n]owhere does the Code mandate a committee must faithfully reproduce the exact complexion of the creditor body." In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. 4, 7 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992). Indeed, the United States Trustee was unable to place a creditor on the committee that represents the non-food trade creditors. No membership on the committee was given to a frozen goods supplier. Yet the committee can still represent their interests. Since there are endless distinctions between creditors, the only way to have a truly representative committee is to place all of the unsecured creditors on the committee. While such a result is obviously ridiculous, it demonstrates the folly of First Plaza's argument.

In the present case, the United States Trustee has formed a committee that adequately represents the unsecured creditor interests involved in this case. To the extent that any of the 17 creditors that wanted to be on the committee but were excluded continue to feel unrepresented, such entities are free to represent themselves. As noted by Judge Brozman in In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. at 8, the excluded creditors "are not precluded from forming an unofficial committee, retaining counsel and a financial advisor and seeking reimbursement of their expenses to the extent that they make a substantial contribution to the case, as permitted and even envisioned by § 503(b) of the Code."

CONCLUSION

In 1986, the Congress of the United States created the United States Trustee program and conferred on the program certain discretionary responsibilities, including determining the appropriate composition of creditor's committees. The Congress expressly decided to take the Court out of such matters by deleting section 1102(c), which had previously given the Court the power to change the composition of committees. This action by the Congress clearly indicates that the Court may not add First Plaza to the Unsecured Creditors' Committee in this case.

If the Court decides that it has the authority to exercise powers given expressly to the United States Trustee, the Court should still deny First Plaza's motion. The facts of this case clearly indicate that First Plaza would have an actual conflict of interest if placed on the Official Unsecured Creditor's Committee, and that such conflict would work to the detriment of the entire unsecured creditor class. Furthermore, the committee as appointed adequately represents the entire unsecured creditor body, including the unsecured claim of First Plaza. Consequently, the United States Trustee acted properly and did not abuse its discretion in appointing a committee that does not include First Plaza. Accordingly, this Court should deny the motion of First Plaza.

APPELLEE'S BRIEF

The United States Trustee for the Northern District of New York respectfully submits this brief in support of the October 13, 1995, order of the Hon. Stephen D. Gerling, which denied the motion of Mellon Bank, N.A. (hereinafter "Appellant"), seeking appointment to the official committee of unsecured creditors. Based on an analysis of the applicable provisions of the United States Code, the legislative history, the case law, and pertinent policy considerations, the decision of Judge Gerling was correct as a matter of law and should be affirmed.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The legal issue in this appeal, as denoted by the Appellant, cannot serve as the basis for overturning the bankruptcy court decision. The Appellant frames the issue in terms of whether the bankruptcy court can review the U.S. Trustee's decision with regard to the composition of the committee of unsecured creditors. However, the bankruptcy court never reached the issue of whether it could review the U.S. Trustee's actions; rather, the bankruptcy court held that it could not grant the relief requested. The U.S. Trustee does not challenge in this appeal the bankruptcy court's power to review the U.S. Trustee's actions under section 105(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. Thus, there is no real dispute in that regard. The only real dispute is whether the Court can change the composition of the creditors' committee in the face of Congressional intent to shelter the court from committee composition issues. Consequently, this Court should disregard the Appellant's efforts to confuse the real issue in this appeal with arguments regarding the reviewability of U.S. Trustee decisions.

While accurately defining the scope of the bankruptcy court decision is appropriate, it is somewhat inconsequential because this Court does not have jurisdiction to entertain this appeal. As set forth in the Statement of Jurisdiction, infra, the bankruptcy court decision is an interlocutory order, for which leave to appeal is required. However, the Appellant never obtained such leave. Additionally, even if leave to appeal were requested, such request would have to be denied based on the Appellant's failure to satisfy the requirements for leave to appeal an interlocutory order. Finally, the appeal should be dismissed on jurisdictional grounds because the Appellant does not have standing to appeal. Particularly, the Appellant can demonstrate no injury resulting from the bankruptcy court decision. Thus, the appeal should be dismissed with no need to consider the merit, or lack thereof, of the Appellant's arguments.

Regardless of the jurisdictional deficiencies, the appeal should be denied on the merits. In this appeal, the Appellant seeks to have the Court compel the bankruptcy court to review the composition of creditors' committees in every case where a creditor is disappointed that it was not selected as a member of such committee. Yet the statute that gave the bankruptcy court the power to do exactly what the appellant requests -- change the membership of the unsecured creditors' committee -- was repealed in 1986. Specifically, Congress repealed section 1102(c) which provided that "[o]n request of a party in interest and after notice and a hearing, the court may change the membership or the size of a committee appointed under subsection (a) of this section if the membership of such committee is not representative of the different kinds of claims or interests to be represented." By deleting that provision, Congress indicated quite clearly that the bankruptcy courts should be spared from this administrative task which affects no substantive rights. This Court should not vitiate Congress's clear intent in repealing section 1102(c).

Congress did give the bankruptcy courts the power to ensure adequate representation under section 1102(a)(2). To the extent a class of creditors lacks adequate representation, section 1102(a)(2) permits the court to order the appointment of additional creditors' committees to ensure adequate representation, but confers the authority to appoint such committee solely on the U.S. Trustee. Thus, even though section 1102(a)(2) is directed at the appointment of committees (other than unsecured creditors' committees), Congress's intent to remove the court from the appointment process is plainly evident.

The bankruptcy court in the present case recognized Congress's intent and properly held that it could not change the composition of the unsecured creditors' committee. The bankruptcy court also rejected the Appellant's argument that the court's equity powers allow the court to disregard Congressional intent. Since the decision of the bankruptcy court was legally correct and logically sound, the U.S. Trustee urges this Court to affirm that decision.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This Court need not reach the merits of this appeal since the order of the bankruptcy court was not an appealable order. According to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a), "[t]he district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals (1) from final judgments, orders, and decrees; (2) from interlocutory orders and decrees issued under section 1121(d) of title 11 . . .; and (3) with leave of the court, from other interlocutory orders and decrees . . .." The order that forms the basis of the instant appeal is an interlocutory order, not a final order. See In re American Cabinets & Woodcrafting Corp., 159 B.R. 969, 971 (M.D. Fla. 1993) (holding that "an order is not final if it only disposes of an incidental procedural issue during the bankruptcy proceedings."). The bankruptcy court order is also not in any way related to an extension of time to file a plan under section 1121(d) of the Bankruptcy Code. Consequently, the only avenue for judicial review of the bankruptcy court decision is by leave of this Court. However, such leave was never requested nor granted.

It is axiomatic that leave to appeal an interlocutory order should be granted "only if the order (1) involves a controlling question of law (2) over which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion and (3) if an immediate appeal would materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. In re Ionosphere Clubs, Inc., 179 B.R. 24, 28 (S.D.N.Y 1995). Assuming, arguendo, that the first two factors can be demonstrated, the Appellant cannot demonstrate that this appeal will materially advance the ultimate termination of the bankruptcy case. In order to demonstrate that the termination of the case will be materially advanced by the appeal, the party must be able to show that they cannot raise their rights in future proceedings. See In re Ionosphere Clubs, Inc., 179 B.R. at 29 (holding that, with respect to an appeal from an order approving a disclosure statement, the order was not appealable where the appellants could assert their rights at the confirmation hearing). In the present case, the Appellant is free to seek the appointment of an additional committee and to assert and protect all of its rights under the Bankruptcy Code. Such rights are in no way affected by the bankruptcy court decision. Consequently, the Appellant cannot meet the requirements for appeal of an interlocutory order and, accordingly, the appeal should be dismissed.

The Appellant also lacks standing based on the same analysis as set forth above. The requirements for standing are well-settled:

> "[T]he irreducible constitutional minimum of standing contains three elements. First, the plaintiff must have suffered an 'injury in fact' -- an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized, and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical. Second, there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of . . .. Third, it must be likely, as opposed to merely speculative, that the injury will be redressed by a favorable decision."

United States v. Hays, ___ U.S. ___, 115 S. Ct. 2431, 2435 (1995)(quoting Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61 (1992)). The Appellant in the present case, however, cannot articulate a "concrete and particularized" injury resulting from the U.S. Trustee's committee appointment decision. Any injury that the Appellant may try to proffer would be merely "conjectural or hypothetical" and would not serve as a basis for standing in this appeal.

The Appellant's membership or non-membership on a committee does not affect the Appellant's standing in the bankruptcy case nor its priority under the Bankruptcy Code.[1] See cf. In re Gates Engineering Co., 104 B.R. 653, 655 (Bankr. D. Del. 1989)(noting that "the right to vote as a committee member may or may not be of prime importance" since the creditor may participate in the committee "ex-officio"). In fact, membership on the committee is more likely stifle a creditor's ability to protect its own interest because that creditor must act as a fiduciary for the entire unsecured creditor class. See [1] Where a particular creditor has a significant stake in the proceeding, that creditor can generally represent their own interest with or without a committee. Cf. In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. 4, 8 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992). Additionally, creditors "are not precluded from forming an unofficial committee, retaining counsel and a financial advisor and seeking reimbursement of their expenses to the extent that they make a substantial contribution to the case, as permitted and even envisioned by § 503(b) of the Code." In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. at 8.

Woods v. City Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268-69 (1941); In re Bohack Corp., 607 F.2d 258, 262 n.4 (2d Cir. 1979); In re Johns-Manville Corp., 26 B.R. 919, 924 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1983); In re MAP International, Inc., 105 B.R. 5 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1989). If a creditor uses its position on the creditors' committee to further its own cause at the expense of the other creditors represented, then that creditor is subject to removal from the committee as well as possible liability for breach of fiduciary obligations. In re Johns-Manville Corp., 26 B.R. at 925.

Additionally, the Bankruptcy Code provides no right to membership on a creditors' committee to any creditor. In re Gates Engineering Co., 104 B.R. 653, 655 (Bankr. D. Del. 1989); see also In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 211 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990). Section 1102(b)(1) provides some guidance as to how the membership of the committee may be determined, but the language is clearly "only 'precatory' and 'nonbinding." In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. at 211 (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 401-02 (1977)). Accordingly, unsecured creditors have a "right" to have their interests as a class represented by a committee (so long as qualified creditors are willing to serve), but no right as to the composition of such committee. In the present case, there has been no abrogation of the rights of unsecured creditors because their interests as a class are adequately represented by a committee duly appointed by the U.S. Trustee.

Since membership on the committee of unsecured creditors can not be used to further the individual interests of the committee member, the Appellant cannot articulate any legitimate, cognizable injury. Any injury that the Appellant could possibly argue would inevitably relate to an intention to utilize committee membership to further the Appellant's own interests, in violation of the fiduciary responsibilities attendant to committee membership. Such an injury would be, at best, conjectural and hypothetical, and would not serve to satisfy the Constitutional requirements for standing. Consequently, this appeal should be denied on jurisdictional grounds.

STATEMENT OF ISSUE

Whether the Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that, as a matter of law, it could not order the appointment of the Appellant to the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On September 20, 1995, the debtor, Victory Markets, Inc., d/b/a Great American Food Stores (the "debtor"), filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Immediately upon the filing of the case, the U.S. Trustee undertook to solicit the twenty largest creditors for interest in serving on an official committee of unsecured creditors. The U.S. Trustee's solicitation efforts initially included mailing solicitation forms to each of the twenty largest creditors. Next, an appropriate date for an organizational meeting was determined and the U.S. Trustee proceeded to telephone each of the twenty largest creditors to advise such creditors of the date and time of the meeting, namely October 6, 1995, at 10:00 a.m.[2] The meeting was scheduled on an expedited basis in order to allow the creditors' committee an opportunity to review the post-petition financing arrangements and cash collateral matters that were scheduled for final hearings during October 1995.

Within a few days after the filing of this bankruptcy case, the U.S. Trustee learned of the Appellant's interest in serving on the creditors' committee. The U.S. Trustee requested that the Appellant submit a solicitation form. From September 25, 1995, through October 6, 1995, the U.S. Trustee engaged in a diligent effort to understand the true nature of the Appellant's involvement in the case. This inquiry included numerous telephone and in person conversations with counsel for the Appellant, requests for numerous documents and other information by letter, and an in-depth review of [2] Prior to the organizational meeting, the United States Trustee received a seemingly endless chain of telephone inquiries from creditors, each of whom were sent solicitation forms and were advised of the time and place of the organizational meeting. As a result of the United States Trustee's efforts in this case, 26 creditors returned solicitation forms indicating their interest in serving on the unsecured creditors committee.

all documents received pertaining to the Appellant's relationship to the debtor and other parties in interest.[3] The U.S. Trustee's efforts in determining the proper composition of the committee was fully in accordance with U.S. Trustee policies and procedures, as well as the applicable provisions of the Bankruptcy Code and Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure.

In concluding that the Appellant should not be appointed to the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors, the following facts, among others, were considered:

1) The Appellant owns approximately 37% of the stock of Victory Holdings, Inc. ("VHI"), which owns 100% of the debtor corporation. Since the ability to exercise control over the parent corporation is the functional equivalent of an ability to exercise control over a wholly-owned subsidiary of the parent, the Appellant in effect owns and controls 37% of the debtor.

2) The Appellant has voted its shares on at least three occasions since 1992, indicating that the Appellant, in fact, exercises control over the activities of VHI.[4] Indeed, the occasions on which the Appellant exercised its vote were with regard to a stock split and a restructuring in 1994.

3) The Appellant has the ability to place a director on the Board of Directors of VHI at any time based on its significant ownership interest.

4) No single entity holds over 50% of the stock of VHI. Thus, an alignment between the Appellant and another shareholder could give absolute control over VHI to the Appellant.

[3] Much of the information supplied by the Appellant was inconsistent, at best. For example, Mr. Despins stated in a letter to the United States Trustee that the Appellant had only voted its shares twice, while the Appellant acknowledged in its motion before the bankruptcy court that such shares have been voted on three occasions. Additionally, the letter fails to disclose that (i) the Appellant has the power to place a director on the Board of Directors of VHI and (ii) that the Appellant is a guarantor of the debtor's indebtedness to C&S Grocers, Inc., which supplies the debtor with approximately 80% of its inventory.

[4] At the time of the organizational meeting, the United States Trustee had been informed of only two occasions in which the Appellant had voted its shares.

5) The U.S. Trustee's investigation revealed that Centre Capital Investors, L.P. ("Centre Capital"), which holds approximately 43.8% of the stock of VHI, and the Appellant are involved in numerous investments together. Consequently, it is likely that the interests of the Appellant and Centre Capital are aligned such that they jointly control VHI.

6) In light of the Appellant's interest and control over VHI, the Appellant's presence on the unsecured creditors' committee poses an obvious conflict of interest. Confidential information regarding strategies of the committee in plan negotiations would be compromised if an insider that de facto owns and controls the debtor were included as a member of the committee.

On the evening of October 5, 1995, after reviewing the facts regarding the Appellant, the U.S. Trustee office personnel reviewed the 26 solicitation forms received. Upon request of the U.S. Trustee, the debtor provided a breakdown of the different types of trade debt involved and the amounts owed to the various creditors. The U.S. Trustee made a preliminary decision as to the numbers and types of creditors to be included in the committee. At the organizational meeting on October 6, 1995, the U.S. Trustee made the final decision as to which creditors should be appointed to the committee. A notice of appointment of Unsecured Creditor Committee was filed on October 6, 1995.[5]

ARGUMENT[6]

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT CORRECTLY DENIED THE APPELLANT'S MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT TO THE COMMITTEE OF UNSECURED CREDITORS BASED

---

[5] A much more detailed account of the United States Trustee's efforts in forming the committee is set forth in the Memorandum of Law in Support of Objection of the United States Trustee to First Plaza's Motion Seeking Appointment to Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors dated October 9, 1995.

[6] As discussed in the Statement of Jurisdiction, supra, this appeal should also be denied on jurisdictional grounds. Not only has the Appellant failed to demonstrate that appeal of the interlocutory order is appropriate, but also has not established its own standing in this matter. Thus, this Court need not entertain the appeal in the first instance.

ON THE PLAIN LANGUAGE OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE AND THE APPLICABLE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY.

The bankruptcy court acted properly in denying the Appellant's request to be appointed to the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors based on a determination that such relief was not available under the plain language of Section 1102. A review of the language and legislative history of section 1102 clearly indicates that the U.S. Trustee is entrusted with the task of appointing an unsecured creditors' committee in each chapter 11 case and that the composition of any committee so appointed is fully within the discretion of the U.S. Trustee. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court's role is limited to the creation of additional committees if necessary for adequate representation. However, since the Appellant never requested relief in the form of an additional committee, the bankruptcy court rightfully concluded that the motion had to be denied.

Prior to 1986, section 1102 of the Bankruptcy Code provided for the exact type of relief that the Appellant requests. The pre-1986 version of section 1102(a) provided that the bankruptcy court had sole authority to appoint a committee of unsecured creditors. 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1) (1978) (amended 1986). Furthermore, Section 1102(c), which was repealed in 1986, provided that

> [o]n request of a party in interest and after notice and a hearing, the court may change the membership or the size of a committee appointed under subsection (a) of this section if the membership of such committee is not representative of the different kinds of claims or interests to be represented.

11 U.S.C. § 1102(c) (repealed 1986). Thus, prior to 1986, the bankruptcy courts had specific authority to appoint committees under section 1102(a) and to change the membership and size of any such committee.

In this pre-1986 period, many concerns arose regarding the court's role in creating creditors' committees. A substantial concern related to a perceived bias on the part of the court toward its hand-picked committee. See In re McLean Indus., Inc., 70 B.R. 852, 856 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1987)(citing H.R.

Rep. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 18 (1986)). Additionally, there was concern that the court would necessarily obtain information regarding various parties during the selection process which could taint future proceedings. Id. Consequently, the advent of the U.S. Trustee Program provided an avenue for Congress to take the courts out of the committee selection process.

In 1986, the Bankruptcy Code was substantially amended by Congress to, inter alia, expand the U.S. Trustee program nationwide. In providing for the specific responsibilities of the U.S. Trustees, Congress made significant amendments to section 1102. First, Congress amended section 1102(a) to provide that the U.S. Trustee, rather than the Court, would be responsible for appointing committees. Additionally and significantly, Congress completely deleted section 1102(c), thereby eliminating the power of the Court to change the size or composition of committees appointed by the U.S. Trustee. In re Wheeler Technology, Inc., 139 B.R. 235, 239 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1992); In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 210-11 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990); In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. 4, 8 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992); In re Gates Engineering Co., 104 B.R. 653, 654 (Bankr. D. Del. 1989).

The present version of section 1102(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that > as soon as practicable after the order for relief under chapter 11 of this title, the United States trustee shall appoint a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims and may appoint additional committees of creditors or of equity security holders as the United States trustee deems appropriate.

11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1) (1986). The language of section 1102(a)(1) (1986), unlike its predecessor, provides absolutely no role for the court in the appointment process. In fact, the appointment of the unsecured creditors' committee is effective upon the filing of a notice of appointment by the U.S. Trustee, with no court order.

The court, however, does play a significant role in the determination of adequate representation. Section 1102(a)(2) provides that the Court may order that additional committees be appointed after notice and hearing "if necessary to assure adequate representation of creditors." This power to order the appointment of additional committees gives the court the ability to remedy claims of inadequate representation, but relieves the court of the actual administrative task of deciding the membership of such committees. See In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 211 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990). Indeed, if the Court decides that an additional committee is necessary in any particular case, the U.S. Trustee is still given the sole authority to appoint such committee. See 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(2)("[t]-he United States trustee shall appoint any such committee"); In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. at 8. Consequently, the language and history of 11 U.S.C. § 1102 clearly indicate that the bankruptcy court is not to expend its valuable time in the administrative task of determining the composition of creditors' committees. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court in the present case properly denied the Appellant's motion.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DECISION IS SUPPORTED BY A MAJORITY OF PUBLISHED DECISIONS ON THIS ISSUE, INCLUDING THREE DECISIONS FROM THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

An apparent majority of courts directly addressing the issue presently before this Court has held that a bankruptcy court may not change the composition of a section 1102(a) committee of unsecured creditors. In reaching this conclusion, the courts have reviewed the language and legislative history of section 1102, analyzed the policy arguments, and considered the applicability of section 105(a). In the end, these courts recognized the intent of Congress to shelter the courts from composing or recomposing creditors' committees and properly refused to use their equity powers under section 105(a) to circumvent this Congressional intent.

For example, the Ninth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel ("BAP"), in In re Wheeler Technology, Inc., 139 B.R. 235 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1992), which appears to be the only appellate case addressing the issue presently before this Court, held that the bankruptcy court may not effect a change in the composition of a committee in view of the 1986 amendments to section 1102. The Ninth Circuit BAP reviewed a decision by the bankruptcy court which ordered that a particular creditor be removed from the unsecured creditor committee as a sanction for violating the automatic stay. Id. at 237. While the creditor did not dispute the finding that it had violated the automatic stay, the creditor appealed the bankruptcy judge's order requiring removal from the committee. Id. at 238 n.5.

In reviewing and ultimately reversing the bankruptcy court decision, the BAP concluded that the bankruptcy court had no authority to effect a change in the composition of the creditors' committee. Id. at 239. The BAP reviewed the 1986 amendments to section 1102 and held that "[t]he power to appoint and delete members of the Creditors' Committee now resides exclusively with the U.S. Trustee." Id. (emphasis added). Additionally, the BAP noted that section 105(a) could not be used by the court to modify the membership of a committee because such action would be "contrary to the legislative history and Congressional intent in deleting subsection (c) of § 1102." Id., citing In re Gates Engineering Co., 104 B.R. at 654.

In addition to the Ninth Circuit BAP, the bankruptcy courts in the Southern District of New York have unanimously concluded that courts have no authority to change the membership of creditor committees in light of the 1986 amendments to section 1102. See In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 210 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990)(Buschman, J., presiding); In re Hills Stores Co.., 137 B.R. 4, 8 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992)(Brozman, J., presiding); In re Texaco, 79 B.R. 560, 565-66 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1987)(Schwartzberg, J., presiding); see also In re McLean Indus., Inc., 70 B.R 852, 856 n.2 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1987)(Buschman, J., presiding)("Thus, [based on Congress's repeal of section 1102(c),] the court no longer has the option to change committee membership."). For example, in In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. at 210, a creditor moved the court to compel the U.S. Trustee to add the creditor to the committee of unsecured creditors. The creditor had made a formal request to the U.S. Trustee to be added to the committee, but such request was refused. Id.

The analysis of the court in resolving the matter was very similar to that utilized by the Ninth Circuit BAP. The Drexel court first recited the present version of section 1102(a), then noted "the absence of any indication in the statute that the court may add to or delete an unsecured creditor from a committee." Id. at 210. The court was also aware that section 1102(c), which had previously provided the court with specific authority to alter the composition of creditors' committees, had been repealed by the 1986 amendments. Id. Properly following the statutory language strictly, the court concluded that section 1102 does not authorize the court to add or delete creditors from committees appointed pursuant to 1102(a). Id. at 210-11. Furthermore, the court concluded that section 105(a) could not provide such authorization, stating that section 105(a) allows a court to "issue orders 'necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title,' not in ignorance of what Congress has wrought." Id. at 211. The court, however, did recognize that it had the ability to address inadequate representation problems, but only through creation of additional committees. Id.; see 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(2).

The well-reasoned analysis of Judge Buschman in Drexel, as well as the analysis of the Ninth Circuit BAP, should be followed by this Court.[7] Indeed, the conclusion reached by Judge Buschman is the only conclusion that makes sense in light of the language of section 1102 and the 1986 amendments thereto. If Congress had intended that the court have authority to alter the composition of committees, why did it delete section 1102(c)? The only explanation is that Congress wanted to remove the bankruptcy courts from the administrative aspects of cases and, consequently, vested sole discretion in the U.S. Trustee as to the composition of committees.

III. SECTION 105(a) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE DOES NOT PROVIDE A BASIS FOR THE COURT TO DISREGARD THE CLEAR INTENT OF CONGRESS IN REPEALING SECTION 1102(c).

The cases cited by the Appellant in support of the court's ability to change the composition of creditors' committees, even in light of the repeal of section 1102(c), rely on the court's equity power under section 105(a). However, while the bankruptcy courts do retain some equity power under section 105(a), the courts are not empowered to use those equity powers in derogation of Congress's intent. Rather, the equity powers were intended to provide the bankruptcy court an avenue for ensuring that Congress's intent is achieved. Consequently, the use of section 105(a) to achieve a result not intended by Congress would constitute an abuse of the court's equity powers.

Section 105(a) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that "[t]he court may issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title." 11 U.S.C. § 105(a). However, this provision only allows the court the ability to use equity to "fulfill some specific Code provision." In re Fesco Plastics Corp., 996 F.2d 152, 154 (7th Cir. 1993)(citing Norwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988)). In other words, "when a specific Code section addresses an issue, a court may not employ equitable powers to achieve a result not contemplated by the Code." Id. (citing In re Morristown & Erie R. Co., 885 F.2d 98, 100 (3d Cir. 1989)); see also In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litigation, 982 F.2d 721, 751 (2d Cir. 1992). In the present case, the result contemplated by the Code with respect to the formation of creditors' committees is that the U.S. Trustee has sole authority to appoint the committees and the courts are limited to addressing whether additional committees are needed to ensure adequate representation. Thus, section 105(a) of the Code cannot be used to compel the Court to re-enter the committee formation process.

The Appellant proffers In re Columbia Gas System, Inc., 133 B.R. 174 (Bankr. D. Del. 1991), for the proposition that the Court may review the decision of the U.S. Trustee regarding the committee composition under an abuse of discretion standard. However, the court in Columbia Gas based its holding on an untenable interpretation of its powers under section 105(a).

In Columbia Gas, the U.S. Trustee had appointed the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors and had refused a creditor's request to be placed on the committee. Id. at 175. The creditor then moved the bankruptcy court for an order directing the U.S. Trustee to appoint the creditor as a member of the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (the "Committee"). Id. at 174. Prior to the hearing on the creditor's motion, the Committee moved the court to adjourn the creditor's motion and allow briefing on the issue of whether the creditor's motion should fail as a matter of law. Id. at 174-75.

In addressing the Committee's motion, the Columbia Gas court recognized that the deletion of section 1102(c) evidenced Congress's intent that the bankruptcy courts "cannot substitute [their] judgment for that of the U.S. Trustee regarding the composition of the Committee." Id. at 175. However, the court did a dance around this acknowledgment of Congressional intent.[8] The court held that, although it cannot change the composition of unsecured creditors' committees, it can review the U.S. Trustee's actions in appointing the committee under an abuse of discretion standard pursuant to section 105(a). Id. While the court did not expressly address the remedy available if the court concluded that the U.S. Trustee abused its discretion, the court did note that section 105(a) would allow the court to order "necessary or appropriate relief." Id. at 176. Thus, the court inferred that section 105(a) could be used to dodge the intent of Congress in deleting section 1102(c). See also In re Plabell Rubber Products, 140 B.R. 179 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1992) (holding that the court could change the composition of a creditors' committee pursuant to section 105(a), despite the repeal of section 1102(c)).

[8] In analyzing the deletion of section 1102(c), the court concluded that "the legislative history indicates the Court's power to change committee membership was removed as a housekeeping measure merely to keep section 1102 internally consistent." Id. at 175. Certainly, the court's analysis is not plausible. Had Congress intended that the courts would retain the ability to alter the composition of committees, Congress obviously would have left section 1102(c) intact. The provisions of section 1102(c) would have been perfectly consistent with the 1986 amendments to section 1102, if Congress had intended that the courts retain the ability to change the composition of creditors' committees.

As noted above, the conclusion reached by the Columbia Gas court is contrary to the notion that "a [bankruptcy] court may not employ its equitable powers to achieve a result not contemplated by the [Bankruptcy] Code." In re Fesco Plastics Corp., 996 F.2d 152, 154 (7th Cir. 1993); see also Norwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988)("whatever equitable powers remain in the bankruptcy courts must and can only be exercised within the confines of the Bankruptcy Code"); In re Ionosphere, 922 F.2d 984, 995 (2d Cir. 1990)("[t]he bankruptcy court's equitable powers cannot be exercised in derogation of other sections of the Bankruptcy Code"). The Bankruptcy Code provides that the U.S. Trustee has the sole discretion to determine the composition of committees and, consequently, the court should not use section 105(a) to alter that result. See In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 211 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990)(specifically stating that section 105(a) cannot be used to allow the court to alter the composition of creditor committees); In re Wheeler Tech., Inc., 139 B.R. 235 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1992)(same); In re Gates Eng'g Co., 104 B.R. 653, 654 (Bankr. D. Del. 1989)("the court cannot under the provisions of § 105 circumvent the unambiguous language . . . of the Code . . . in light of the deletion of subsection (c) in 1986.").

Finally, the Appellant relies on In re Texaco, Inc., 79 B.R. 560 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1987), for support of its request that the court order that the Appellant be added to the creditor committee. In Texaco, however, the court specifically recognized that, in light of the deletion of section 1102(c), the power to change the size or composition of creditors' committees lies exclusively with the U.S. Trustee. Id. at 565-66. The court ultimately concluded that, because section 1102 was silent regarding the elimination or merger of committees, the court could merge two already formed committees while remaining consistent with the intent of Congress.[9] Id. at 566-67. In reaching that decision, the court, of necessity, addressed whether its determination regarding adequate representation should be made on a de novo basis. Id. at 566. The court correctly concluded that the section 1102(a)(2) issue of adequate representation was a legal issue that the court should consider de novo in deciding whether to order the appointment of an additional committee. Id. However, the court (1) specifically recognized that, even if it decided that the creditor was not adequately represented, the court could not add or delete individual members from a creditors' committee and (2) never addressed the question of whether the court could review the actions of the U.S. Trustee. See id. Thus, the decision in Texaco actually supports the U.S. Trustee's position in this appeal.[10]

Each of the cases cited by the Appellant should be disregarded and the bankruptcy court's Memorandum-Decision denying the motion to add the Appellant to the creditors' committee in this case should be affirmed. The clear intent of Congress in amending section 1102 was to place the full discretion in committee composition with the U.S. Trustee. The Congress left with the court the ability to compel the U.S. Trustee to appoint additional committees, where needed to ensure adequate representation. Section 105(a) should not be used to vitiate Congress's intent.

IV. THE PROPRIETY OF JUDICIAL REVIEW OF THE U.S. TRUSTEE'S ACTIONS

[9] The committees to which the Texaco court was referring had both presumably been appointed by the U.S. Trustee. In any event, the question of whether a court may combine two committees is not presently before this Court.

[10] The Texaco court does state that "[a]ccordingly, it follows that if upon request of an interested party, the United States Trustee does not agree to change the membership or size of a committee . . ., such party may apply to the court for such relief." In re Texaco, Inc., 79 B.R. at 566. However, based on the context of the quote, the court was merely referring to its ability to order the appointment of additional committees pursuant to section 1102(a)(2).

A. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision Did Not Preclude Review of the United States Trustee's Actions; Rather, the Bankruptcy Court Held Only That It Could Not Grant the Relief Requested.

The issue on appeal, as stated by the Appellant, does not serve as a basis for reversing the Bankruptcy Court decision from which this appeal arises. The Appellant has framed the issue in terms of whether the bankruptcy courts have the ability to review decisions of the U.S. Trustee; however, the bankruptcy court never indicated that it did not have the power to review decisions of the U.S. Trustee. Rather, the bankruptcy court decided that, as a matter of law, it did not have the power to grant the specific relief requested by the Appellant. (Memorandum-Decision at 12). Consequently, a decision as to whether the Court has the ability to review decisions of the U.S. Trustee is not a proper issue for appeal.

The Bankruptcy Court's decision was based on a straight-forward analysis of language and history of section 1102, which led directly to the conclusion that the Court could not grant the Appellant's request that the bankruptcy court "issue an Order pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) directing the Office of the U.S. Trustee to appoint [the Appellant] as a member of the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors . . .." (First Plaza's Motion at 9). The court simply concluded that, regardless of whether it had authority to review the actions of the United States Trustee, it could not change the composition of creditors' committees in light of section 1102. Furthermore, the court was unwilling to utilize its equity powers to circumvent the intent of Congress. Thus, the bankruptcy court never reached the issue of whether it could review the actions of the U.S. Trustee in forming the committee. Accordingly, that issue is not ripe for review by this Court.

1. The Bankruptcy Court Has the Power to Review the Make-up of Committees to Determine if Additional Committees Are Needed for Adequate Representation.

Although the bankruptcy court never addressed the issue of its ability to review the action of the U.S. Trustee, it clearly recognized its own ability, pursuant to Section 1102(a)(2), to make a determination of whether classes of creditors were adequately represented. (Memorandum-Decision at 12); see cf. In re McLean Indus., Inc., 70 B.R. 852, 856 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1987). The court rightly concluded that the sole statutory remedy for an inadequately represented class was the creation of an additional committee. (Memorandum-Decision at 10). Since the Appellant never requested relief in the form of an additional committee, the court concluded that it need not review the issue of adequate representation. (Memorandum-Decision at 12).

While section 1102(a)(2) provides for the appointment of additional committees to ensure adequate representation, it does not provide for the review of actions of the U.S. Trustee, nor for alterations to the composition of an existing creditors' committees. Section 1102(a)(2) provides that

> [o]n request of a party in interest, the court may order the appointment of additional committees of creditors or of equity security holders if necessary to assure adequate representation of creditors or of equity security holders. The United States trustee shall appoint any such committee.

11 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(2). By its own terms, section 1102(a)(2) does nothing other than provide a mechanism for appointment of additional committees.[11] It was simply never intended as a source of

[11] Section 1102(a)(2) was created to allow the court an avenue to ensure that all classes of creditors are adequately represented in bankruptcy proceedings. In a particular case, a creditor class, such as equity security holders, may need a separate committee appointed to ensure that the group as a whole has adequate representation. Since the Code does not require that a committee of equity security holders be appointed, a procedure was needed so that the court could ensure that such a committee would be formed where necessary. Thus, section 1102(a)(2) allows the court to order the appointment of a committee of equity security holders, or of any other group of creditors, where necessary to ensure that the class is adequately represented in the proceedings. This intent was explicitly set forth in the House Report:

> [Under the new chapter 11 reorganization chapter,] [t]here will be at least one committee in each case. Because unsecured creditors are normally the largest body of creditors and most in need of representation, the bill requires that there be a committee of unsecured creditors. The [newly created chapter 11] permits the plan of reorganization to affect secured debt and equity as well as unsecured debt.

authority for review of actions of the U.S. Trustee or for altering the composition of committees. Consequently, the Appellant's reliance on section 1102(a)(2) is completely misplaced.

2. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Utilize the "Negative Pregnant" Analysis Discussed in Field v. Mans in Denying the Relief Requested by the Appellant.

The bankruptcy court's analysis and interpretation of section 1102 did not utilize the "negative pregnant" type of analysis that was addressed recently by the Supreme Court in Field v. Mans, 116 S. Ct. 437 (1995). Rather, the bankruptcy court relied on the fact that the Congress specifically repealed section 1102(c) which, prior to its repeal, had authorized the Court to grant the specific relief requested by the Appellant. Consequently, the Field case is not applicable to the present situation.

In Field, the Supreme Court was faced with two sections of the Bankruptcy Code, sections 523(a)(2)(A) and 523(a)(2)(B), both of which provide circumstances under which a bankruptcy claim can be held non-dischargeable. Id. at 441. The issue before the Supreme Court was whether section 523(a)(2)(A) required a showing of "reasonable reliance" by the creditor as a prerequisite to relief, even though the section did not specifically denote such a requirement. Id. at 440. The creditors argued that, because section 523(a)(2)(B) specifically included a requirement that the creditor reasonably rely on the false statement by the debtor, Congress, by not denoting specifically that reasonable reliance was required in section 523(a)(2)(A), must have intended that "reasonable reliance" would not be required for relief under that section. Id. at 442. This argument was referred to by the Supreme Court as a "negative pregnant"; i.e. "that an express statutory requirement here, contrasted with statutory silence there, shows an intent to confine the requirement to the specified instance." Id. While the Supreme

> Thus, the bill also provides for additional committees, with status equal to that of the unsecured creditors' committee, when such additional committees are needed to represent various other interests in the case, including secured creditors, subordinated creditors, and equity security holders.

H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess., at 235 (1977) (citations omitted).

Court accepted the negative pregnant as a useful part of statutory analysis, the Court determined that, based on the facts in the case before it, the negative pregnant "should not be elevated to the level of interpretive trump card." Id.

In the present case, the Court did not utilize a negative pregnant analysis. As noted in Field, the negative pregnant analysis follows the reasoning "that an express statutory requirement here, contrasted with statutory silence there, shows an intent to confine the requirement to the specified instance." Id. at 442. However, in the present case, the statutory silence was specifically and intentionally created by the Congress when it repealed section 1102(c). The bankruptcy court made no comparison between section 1102 and any other section, which would lend to a negative pregnant analysis. Clearly, no need for a negative pregnant analysis exists when an act of Congress so plainly demonstrates its intent.

The distinction between the bankruptcy court's analysis in the present case with the type of analysis in Field becomes very apparent when the facts of Field are hypothetically adjusted to match the facts in the present case. Suppose the Supreme Court, in analyzing section 523(a)(2)(A), reviewed the history of that subsection and determined that, at one time, the subsection included a specific requirement that the creditor demonstrate reasonable reliance. Further suppose that, prior to the Field case, Congress had purposefully deleted from section 523(a)(2)(A) the requirement of reasonable reliance. Such a deletion, in this hypothetical situation, would be clear evidence of Congress's intent that reasonable reliance need not be proved. If the facts in this hypothetical were true, then the Supreme Court would not have needed to address the negative pregnant argument because the specific deletion of the reasonable reliance requirement would have clearly indicated Congress's intent.

The situation articulated in the hypothetical is the same as in the present case. Here, section 1102 at one time provided for the specific relief that the Appellant seeks. However, in 1986, Congress specifically and intentionally repealed that section, demonstrating its intent to shield the bankruptcy courts from involvement in the administrative task of composing creditors' committees. The specific intent demonstrated by the repeal of section 1102(c) is self-evident; thus, the negative pregnant analysis is not applicable to this case.

B. The Administrative Procedures Act Is Inapplicable to This Appeal.

1. A Determination on Appeal Regarding the Applicability of the Administrative Procedures Act Should Be Precluded Because the Issue Was Not Raised by the Appellant in Bankruptcy Court.

The Appellants arguments relating to the applicability of review under the APA should not be considered on appeal since relief under that statute was never requested by the Appellant in the bankruptcy court. See In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 118 B.R. 209, 211 n.1 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990)(the court refused to consider the creditor's APA argument holding that "[t]his belated brief raising new issues is untimely and the issue of judicial review is a substantial issue not to be raised at the last minute."). While it is true that this Court retains discretion to decide issues that were not presented to the bankruptcy court, "the general rule is that a federal appellate court does not consider an issue not passed upon below" unless a failure to consider the issue will lead to manifest injustice. In re Lionel Corp., 29 F.3d 88, 92 (2d Cir. 1994)(citations omitted); In re Macrose Industries Corp., 186 B.R. 789, 802 (E.D.N.Y. 1995). In the present case, the record clearly reflects that the Appellant never requested review under the APA in the bankruptcy court. Consequently, the U.S. Trustee did not address the APA and neither did the bankruptcy court. So the question is whether a failure to review the APA issue will be "manifestly unjust."

In this case, this Court's decision not to review the applicability of the APA will not be manifestly unjust. The Second Circuit has held that "a manifest injustice will not occur when the moving party has other means by which it can obtain a successful result." In re Macrose Industries Corp., 186 B.R. at 802 (citing In re Lionel Corp., 29 F.3d at 92). In this instance, the Appellant is not precluded from moving the bankruptcy court to review the actions of the U.S. Trustee pursuant to the APA, in the event that this Court affirms the decision of the bankruptcy court with respect to section 105(a). Consequently, the Appellant has an alternate means by which it can at least attempt to obtain a successful result with respect to the APA. With such an available alternative, the Appellant's request that this Court review the APA issue should be denied.

2. The Appellant Does Not Have Standing Under the Administrative Procedures Act Because No "Injury in Fact" Has Been Asserted.

In addition to the Appellant's failure to request relief under the APA in bankruptcy court, the Appellant lacks standing to bring an action under the APA. Pursuant to section 702 of the APA, the right to seek review of an "agency action" is limited to those persons "suffering legal wrong because of agency action, or adversely affected or aggrieved by agency action within the meaning of a relevant statute . . .." 5 U.S.C. § 702. In determining what constitutes a "legal wrong," the courts have devised a two part test: a petitioner must (1) demonstrate an "injury in fact" caused by the agency action, and (2) must assert that the alleged injury was within the "zone of interests" to be protected by the statute in question. Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 733 (1972); Gull Airborne Instruments, Inc. v. Weinberger, 694 F.2d 838 (D.C. Cir. 1982). In the present case, the Appellant has no standing under the APA because it has suffered no injury in fact by the alleged agency action in question.

The committee of unsecured creditors, or any other committee, is a creature of administrative convenience. The unsecured creditors' committee, once formed by the U.S. Trustee pursuant to section 1102(a), is charged with representing the unsecured creditor interests as a whole. In that regard, each member of the committee undertakes a fiduciary obligation to the entire unsecured creditor class. Woods v. City Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268-69 (1941); In re Bohack Corp., 607 F.2d 258, 262 n.4 (2d Cir. 1979); In re Johns-Manville Corp., 26 B.R. 919, 924 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1983); In re MAP

International, Inc., 105 B.R. 5 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1989). The members of the unsecured creditor committee, in accordance with their fiduciary obligations, may not use the committee to further their own individual interests, unless those interests correspond to the interests of the unsecured creditor class as a whole. See In re Johns-Manville Corp., 26 B.R. at 925. Consequently, the rights and powers of a particular creditor are not enhanced by membership on the committee, except to the same degree that all creditors' interests are enhanced by the creation of a committee.

Accordingly, an unsecured creditor incurs no injury by not being appointed to the committee of unsecured creditors. As long as a committee is appointed as required by section 1102(a) and regardless of what specific creditors are on the committee, all unsecured creditors will receive the benefits of the committee equally. Thus, a specific creditor, such as the Appellant, cannot show any legitimate injury caused by the U.S. Trustee's decision. Any injury that the Appellant could possibly allege would arise from a desire to utilize the membership on the committee in order to further the Appellant's own interests, which would be a breach of fiduciary obligation. Certainly, such an injury should not serve as a basis for standing under the APA. Thus, since the Appellant has suffered no injury in fact, the Appellant has no standing to seek review under the APA of the U.S. Trustee's actions.[12]

3. The United States Trustee's Decision Regarding the Composition of the Committee Is Not Reviewable Under the APA Because the Composition of the Committee Is Committed to Agency Discretion by Statute.

Even if the Appellant had properly raised the issue in the bankruptcy court, and even if the Appellant had standing, the Appellant's request for review under the APA would have to be denied because the composition of creditors' committees is vested in the discretion of the U.S. Trustee. Pursuant to the plain language of 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(1), the provisions of the APA are not applicable in situations where "statutes preclude judicial review." In the present case, section 1102 of the Bankruptcy Code precludes judicial review of the composition of creditor committees and commits the appointment of creditors' committees to the discretion of the U.S. Trustee. Consequently, the APA offers no basis for review of the U.S. Trustee's committee appointment decisions.

In determining whether a statute precludes judicial review under the APA, both the language of the statute and the purposes of the statute must be considered. Shaltry v. United States, 182 B.R. 836, 840 (D. Ariz. 1995). The inquiry is "statute specific . . . and relates to the language of the statute and whether the general purposes of the statute would be endangered by judicial review." Id. (quoting County of Esmeralda v. United States Dep't of Energy, 925 F.2d 1216, 1218 (9th Cir. 1991)). As noted above, the 1986 amendments to section 1102 effectively took the court out of the committee appointment process. Those amendments furthered Congress's expressed intent of relieving the courts of administrative tasks. However, to allow judicial review of the U.S. Trustee's decisions regarding the composition of committees would effectively nullify the purpose of the 1986 amendments by thrusting the court back into the administrative role of composing creditors' committees. Thus, judicial review itself contradicts Congress's intent, making the APA inapplicable.

Additionally, there is no standard by which the Court can judge the U.S. Trustee's exercise of discretion. According to the Supreme Court, an agency action is not reviewable under the APA if "the statute [from which the agency action derives] is drawn so that a Court would have no meaningful standard against which to judge the Agency's exercise of discretion." Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 830 (1985). In this case, section 1102(a)(1) sets forth no standards for court review. Additionally, section 1102(b)(1) sets no standards for review of U.S. Trustee appointment decisions, except perhaps with respect to appointment of committees organized before the commencement of the case. Without such a standard, review under the APA is not appropriate.

A similar situation was addressed in Joelson v. United States, 179 B.R. 857 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1995). In that case, a former chapter 7 panel trustee, inter alia, sought review under the APA of the U.S. Trustee's action in removing the trustee from the panel. Id. at 859. The court held that no standard existed by which the court could review the U.S. Trustee's actions. Id. at 861-62. Consequently, review under the APA was held to be improper. Id. at 862.

The bankruptcy court first noted that a determination as to reviewability must be made prior to any review under the APA. Id. at 860 (quoting Heckler, 470 U.S. at 821). The court then reviewed 28 U.S.C. § 586, which vests the power to appoint and supervise the panel trustees within the discretion of the U.S. Trustee. That statute provides that the U.S. Trustee "shall . . . establish, maintain and supervise a panel of private trustees that are eligible and available to serve as trustees in cases under chapter 7 of title 11." 28 U.S.C. § 586. Additionally, the statute provides for the supervisory role of the U.S. Trustee over "the administration of cases and trustees in cases under chapter 7, 11, 12, or 13 of title 11." Id. Based on the statutory language, the court concluded that "there is no judicial standard against which to evaluate a U.S. Trustee's exercise of discretion regarding the membership in the Panel of Trustees." Joelson, 179 B.R. at 861. Consequently, the court held that, "as a result of the discretion afforded to the U.S. Trustee, the decision to remove a Panel member renders that decision immune from judicial review under the APA." Id. at 862.

The facts in Joelson are quite similar to the facts in the present case. First, just as in the present case, the court in Joelson was analyzing a task that, prior to 1986, had been vested in the court. Before the advent of the U.S. Trustee program, the court was responsible for appointing chapter 7 trustees. See 11 U.S.C. § 701(a) (1978) (amended 1986). However, based on the same policy concerns that arose with respect to the bankruptcy courts' involvement in selecting creditors' committees, Congress chose to divest the Court of the role of appointing trustees and place that task with the U.S. Trustee. See H.R.

Rep. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 18 (1986). Thus, from a policy perspective, the Joelson case is identical to the instant case.

Second, 11 U.S.C. § 586, which was relied on heavily by the Joelson court, is also applicable in the present case. In providing for the supervision of cases and trustees, section 586 provides that the U.S. Trustee "shall . . . (1) supervise the administration of cases . . . by, whenever the United States trustee considers it to be appropriate . . . (E) monitoring creditors' committees appointed under title 11." 11 U.S.C. § 586. Section 586 further provides that the U.S. Trustee shall "(5) perform the duties prescribed for the United States trustee under title 11 and this title, and such duties consistent with title 11 and this title as the Attorney General may prescribe." Id. These provisions clearly give the U.S. Trustee, as officer of the Attorney General, the discretion to monitor creditors' committees and take whatever action deemed necessary with respect to such committees, so long as such actions are consistent with titles 11 and 28 of the United States Code. In light of such discretion, this Court should take notice of the reasoning in Joelson and hold that the APA is inapplicable to the U.S. Trustee's decisions under section 1102(a)(1).

Since the language and history of section 1102 indicate Congress's intent to (1) relieve the court of the administrate task of appointing committees, and (2) to vest the U.S. Trustee with discretion regarding the composition of committees, this Court should hold that the U.S. Trustee's actions with respect to section 1102 fall within the exemption in section 701(a)(1) of the APA, such that review under the APA is precluded.

C. FRBP 2020 In No Way Authorizes Review of U.S. Trustee Actions; Rather It Merely Specifies a Procedure for Situations in Which a Statutory Basis for Review of the U.S. Trustee Exists.

Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure ("FRBP") 2020 does not provide a basis for review of any actions by the U.S. Trustee, including actions related to committee formation. Rather, FRBP 2020 merely provides for the applicable procedure where a basis for review of the U.S. Trustee exists under the Bankruptcy Code or some other statute. Certainly, a rule of procedure cannot operate as statutory law nor create substantive rights. See 28 U.S.C. § 2075 ("[the FRBP] shall not abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right"); In re Waindel, ___ F.3d ___, 1995 WL 561471 (5th Cir. 1995). Consequently, neither FRBP 2020, nor any other rule of procedure, creates a basis for review of the U.S. Trustee.

FRBP 2020 is applicable, however, where the court reviews whether U.S. Trustee actions are in compliance with the applicable provisions of the Bankruptcy Code and Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. For example, the Advisory Committee Note to FRBP 2020 provides the following example:

> if the United States trustee schedules a § 341 meeting to be held 90 days after the petition is filed, and a party in interest wishes to challenge the propriety of that act in view of § 341(a) of the Code and Rule 2003 which requires that the meeting be held not more than 40 days after the order for relief, [FRBP 2020] permits the party to do so by motion.

Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2020 advisory committee's note. But see In re Brown Transport Truckload, Inc., 161 B.R. 735, 738 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 1993)(holding that FRBP 2003 is void where it conflicts with the section 341 of the Bankruptcy Code, which requires only that the initial meeting of creditors be held within a "reasonable time"). Thus, FRBP 2020 allows the moving party to contest the U.S. Trustee's actions by motion pursuant to FRBP 9014, rather than by summons and complaint. However, FRBP 2020 does not provide the basis for review.

Even if the FRBP provided a basis for review, the Advisory Committee Notes clearly denote that no basis exists for review of discretionary acts by the U.S. Trustee. Specifically, the Advisory Committee Note to FRBP 2020 further states that "[FRBP 2020] is not intended to limit the discretion of the United States trustee, provided that the United States trustee's act is authorized by, and in compliance with, the Code, title 28, these rules, and other applicable law." Fed. R.

Bankr. P. 2020 advisory committee's note. Thus, where the U.S. Trustee's actions are discretionary, FRBP 2020 is not applicable.

In the present case, the U.S. Trustee action in appointing a committee of unsecured creditors is authorized by section 1102(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. Furthermore, the U.S. Trustee has fully complied with all applicable law in forming the committee. On October 6, 1995, as soon as practicable after the order for relief, the U.S. Trustee appointed the committee of creditors holding unsecured claims in full compliance with section 1102(a)(1). No other requirements pertaining to committee formation appear in the Bankruptcy Code or the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. Rather, the actual composition of the committee is left to the discretion of the U.S. Trustee. Accordingly, since the U.S. Trustee's actions in this case were authorized, and such actions were in full compliance with all applicable law, section 2020 does not authorize the Court to limit the discretion of the U.S. Trustee regarding the proper composition of the committee. Consequently, FRBP 2020 supports the conclusion that the decision of the bankruptcy court should be affirmed.

D. The Power to Order the Appointment of Additional Committees Does Not Include a Lesser Remedy of Re-Composing an Existing Committee.

While it is true that the courts have the power to order the appointment of additional committees, such power does not include the lesser power of altering the size of an existing committee. The plain language of the statute compels this conclusion. While considerations of cost to the debtor are important in the context of a bankruptcy case, they are not appropriate considerations in determining this question of law, especially where economic considerations were not the basis for section 1102. In other words, "[t]he potential added cost is not sufficient in itself to deprive the creditors of the formation of an additional committee if one is otherwise appropriate." In re Hills Stores Co., 137 B.R. 4, 6 (Bankr.

S.D.N.Y. 1992). Thus, while the court should consider economic conditions when such consideration is consistent with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, the intent of Congress should not be usurped by the court's own determinations regarding the economics of the case. Furthermore, the intent of Congress should not be compromised through the disingenuous argument that power to appoint additional committees includes the lesser power of changing the composition of committees, especially where the language of section 1102(a)(2) specifically denotes that the U.S. Trustee has sole authority to appoint committees.

CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing analysis of the language and history of section 1102, Congress's intent to remove bankruptcy courts from the administrative task of appointing the committee of unsecured creditors is clear. Since the bankruptcy court recognized this intent, and properly concluded that it could not circumvent that intent through the use of section 105(a) or any other statute, the decision of the bankruptcy court should be affirmed.

STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This is an appeal from an order assessing sanctions against the Appellant in the amount of $33,663.58 for professional misconduct in which he was deemed to have engaged as counsel for the debtor in a bankruptcy case. This Court has jurisdiction over the appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), which provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals
> (1) from final judgments, orders, and decrees; ... of bankruptcy judges entered in cases and proceedings referred to the bankruptcy judges under section 157 of this title. ...

The judgment appealed from may be considered "final" for purposes of appeal even though the underlying bankruptcy case from which it arises remains open. "[A] more flexible standard of finality" exists in bankruptcy proceedings because they "'often continue for long periods of time, and discrete claims are often resolved at various times over the course of the proceedings.'" In re Prudential Lines, Inc., 59 F.3d 327, 331 (2nd Cir. 1995)(citation omitted). Accord In re Martin Bros. Toolmakers, Inc., 796 F.2d 1435, 1437 (11th Cir. 1986). For a bankruptcy order to be considered final for purposes of appeal, it "need not resolve all of the issues raised by the bankruptcy; but it must completely resolve all of the issues pertaining to a discrete claim, including issues as to the proper relief." In re Integrated Resources, Inc., 3 F.3d 49, 53 (2nd Cir. 1993)(emphasis from original). Accord In re Saco Local Development Corp., 711 F.2d 441, 443-6 (1st Cir. 1983); In re Red Carpet Corp. of Panama City Beach, 902 F.2d 883, 890 (11th Cir. 1990). The order from which this appeal is taken clearly meets this test.

ISSUE PRESENTED

The issue presented by this appeal is whether the Bankruptcy Court was authorized to assess monetary sanctions against the Appellant in an amount calculated to be necessary to redress the injury to creditors caused by his disregard of the laws governing the administration of bankruptcy estates.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Appellant, Edmund A. Waller, Esq., served as counsel for the Debtor in the bankruptcy case of In re: Terry L. Vinson, No. 96-20394, both during the initial pendency of the case as a chapter 11 proceeding and after its conversion to a chapter 7 proceeding. He brings this appeal from an order and judgment assessing sanctions against him in the amount of $33,663.58 for participating in sales of bankruptcy estate assets and distributing the proceeds of such sales without notice to creditors or bankruptcy court approval, in violation of the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code. The amount of the sanctions was the amount calculated by the Court to be necessary to compensate unsecured creditors injured by Appellant's disregard of the Bankruptcy Code.[1/]

The Bankruptcy Court entered its ruling at the conclusion of an evidentiary hearing ("the Hearing") which took place over

[1/] In addition to assessing monetary sanctions, the Bankruptcy Court also prohibited Appellant "from representing a Debtor or Creditor in a Chapter 11 case in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Georgia for a period of six (6) months or until such time as he has completed and provided written proof to the Court [that] he has completed not less than thirty (30) hours of CLE seminars in bankruptcy, to include five (5) hours of professionalism and ethics." However, Appellant does not challenge this portion of the Bankruptcy Court's ruling on appeal.

portions of several days. Appellant chose not to include a transcript of the testimony adduced at the Hearing in the record on appeal. However, the record does include a transcript of the Court's findings of fact announced at the conclusion of the Hearing, R-71,[2/] along with copies of the exhibits introduced into evidence during the Hearing. The record also includes a Joint Stipulation of Undisputed Facts entered into by the Chapter 7 Trustee and the Appellant prior to the Hearing. R-69. The United States Trustee submits that the following facts are established by the record before this Court, combined with the admissions contained in Appellant's brief.

The Debtor, Terry L. Vinson, filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on March 5, 1996. R-1. Appellant signed the petition as the Debtor's counsel of record and received a $1,000 fee from the Debtor's mother, Mary Lazell Vinson, in connection with the filing. R-1;[3] R-69, Stipulation 8.

On his Schedules A and D filed with the petition, the Debtor listed real estate assets valued at $370,000, subject to secured claims totaling $230,302. R-1. The schedules did not indicate that any of these properties was jointly owned by any other person.

Subsequent to the filing of the petition, an auction was conducted without notice to creditors or court approval at which certain of the Debtor’s properties were sold for a combined price of $237,151.50. Appellant’s Brief, p. 1; R-69, Stipulations 4-6. Appellant maintains that he did not learn of this auction until several days after it occurred, when he was contacted by the auction company for assistance in closing the sales. Appellant’s Brief, page 2. He states that he took no action on this request for approximately a month, “because there was no court approval of the sale and because it was ... impossible to devise a plan [of reorganization] that would be approved ...” Id. However, he ultimately proceeded to close the

Included in the record as Trustee's Exhibit 3 are copies of various checks produced by Appellant evidencing the manner in which he disbursed the auction proceeds. It is evident from the list appearing at page one of this Exhibit that most of these checks were issued on September 20, 1996, which, according to the two closing statements introduced into evidence as Trustee's Exhibit 6, was the date the sales were closed. It can be discerned from Trustee's Exhibit 3, combined with an earlier accounting of the disbursements submitted by Appellant in his "Response to Chapter 7 Trustee's Motion to Disgorge Fees" filed several months before the Hearing,[4/] that after satisfying liens against the properties[5/] and paying the auctioneer's commission and other closing costs, Appellant distributed the remaining

The Bankruptcy Court's Docket erroneously identifies both entries as Appellant's response to the United States Trustee's motion for disgorgement of fees. Presumably, one or the other of these two entries is actually Appellant's Response to Chapter 7 Trustee's Motion to Disgorge Fees.

proceeds to the Debtor’s ex-wife, the former Janice Vinson, and to a few favored unsecured creditors.[6]

Included in Trustee’s Exhibit 3 are three checks totaling in excess of $19,000 which represent disbursements made to or on behalf of the ex-wife.[7] Appellant refers to these disbursements in his brief as the ex-wife’s “share of the proceeds.” Appellant’s Brief, p. 2. The last of these three checks, in the amount of $17,405.07, was not written until October 30, 1996, more than a month after the sales were closed and only a day before the entry of the order converting the case to a chapter 7 proceeding. R-12.[8] Although not previously disclosed to the Chapter 7 Trustee, it was revealed at the Hearing that Appellant paid the ex-wife an additional $4,148.34 from the auction proceeds in March of 1997, more than four months after the case was converted. Defendant's Exhibit 1. In addition, Appellant paid himself a fee of $5,000 from funds which he maintains belonged to the ex-wife by virtue of her ownership interest in the properties. Appellant's Brief, pp. 2&3; R-69, Stipulation 9.[9/]

[6] The unsecured debts which were paid were apparently those on which the ex-wife was an obligor.

[7] These are, specifically, checks 3308, 3311 and 3357. Check No. 3308, in the amount of $375.00, was made payable to Verdery & Oliver, the law firm which represented the ex-wife in the couple’s divorce case. See Trustee’s Exhibit 3, page 28. Check No. 3311, in the amount of $1,513.14, was made payable directly to the ex-wife. Check No. 3357, in the amount of $17,405.07, was made payable to “Winslow H. Verdery Trust Account.”

The Debtor and his ex-wife were divorced pursuant to a Final Judgement and Decree of Divorce ("the Divorce Decree" or "the Decree") entered by consent of the parties less than two weeks before the filing of the Debtor's chapter 11 petition. Trustee's Exhibit 2. The Divorce Decree gave the Debtor a period of 18 months to pay certain debts for which the ex-wife was liable, failing which she would "obtain and retain a one-half undivided interest in and to all the property owned by the parties, or either of them." Id. at p.5. The Decree further provided that the ex-wife would "obtain and retain an ownership interest" in the properties pending the payment of these debts. However, upon payment of the debts in full she was obligated by the Decree to quit-claim her interest in the properties to the Debtor, Id. at pp.4-5; and the Debtor was likewise entitled to the net proceeds from any sale of the properties "[u]pon full satisfaction of all indebtedness of the parties, and upon [his] full compliance with all terms of the Orders in this case ..." Id. at p.4. Given these provisions, it is, of course, unlikely that a bankruptcy trustee would have treated the ex-wife as having an interest in the auction proceeds superior to that of the bankruptcy estate.[10]

On September 23, 1996, three days after the sales were closed, Appellant filed a "voluntary dismissal" of the chapter 11 case, R-5. Approximately a week later the United States Trustee filed a motion to convert the case to a chapter 7 proceeding, noting that the bankruptcy schedules disclosed the existence of sufficient equity in the estate's real estate assets to pay all creditors in full. R-7. Appellant responded by amending the Debtor's Schedule A to show that he owned only a half interest in two of the properties and by amending his Schedule D to add four judgment creditors, including the ex-wife, as secured creditors. R-11. Nowhere in this amendment was it disclosed that any of the properties had been sold. Appellant mailed a service copy of the amendment to the Office of the United States Trustee on October 17, 1996, accompanied by a transmittal letter in which he discussed certain problems which had prevented him from devising a confirmable plan of reorganization, again without disclosing that any of the Debtor’s properties had been sold. R-8.

As previously indicated, the Court entered its order converting the case to a chapter 7 proceeding on October 31, 1996. R-12. Albert F. Nasuti was appointed Chapter 7 Trustee on that same date, and both he and the United States Trustee subsequently filed separate motions seeking to require Appellant to disgorge all fees received in connection with the case. R-51 & R-53. The United States Trustee’s motion was thereafter amended to add a request for the imposition of monetary sanctions against Appellant in an amount sufficient to redress the injury to unsecured creditors who were omitted from Appellant’s distribution scheme. R-63. In imposing sanctions, the Court characterized Appellant’s conduct as “intentional, misleading and deceitful to this court and its representatives.” R-71, p. 13. Despite this finding, the Court denied the motions for disgorgement of fees out of concern that such disgorgement might benefit non-creditors of the bankruptcy estate to the detriment of creditors, given Appellant’s contention that his fees were paid by third parties. R-71 at pp. 12-13; R-72, par. 2.

ARGUMENT

I A BANKRUPTCY COURT HAS THE AUTHORITY TO ASSESS MONETARY SANCTIONS AGAINST AN ATTORNEY FOR ENGAGING IN PROFESSIONAL MISCONDUCT IN A PROCEEDING PENDING BEFORE IT.

A bankruptcy court has broad powers under 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) to "issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title." It has been held that "[t]he court may[] on its own motion or upon the request of any party in interest, including the trustee, invoke its powers under § 105(a) and order a professional to repay unauthorized disbursements to the estate." In re E Z Feed Cube Co., Ltd., 123 B.R. 69, 74 (Bankr.D.Or.1991). Accord Cuevas-Segarra v. Contreras, 134 F.2d 458 (1stCir.1998)(requiring repayment of funds obtained from unauthorized settlement of malpractice action).

In dealing with misconduct by attorneys, the bankruptcy court's powers are broader even than those conferred by § 105(a). In Glatter v. Miroz (In re Miroz)November 15, 1999, 65 F.3d 1567, 1575 (11th Cir.1995), the Eleventh Circuit held, with specific reference to bankruptcy courts, that a federal court has the inherent power "to control and discipline attorneys appearing before it," stating that the imposition of sanctions for professional misconduct by counsel "'transcends a court's equitable power concerning relations between the parties and reaches a court’s inherent power to police itself ...’” Id., quoting from Chambers v. NASCO, 501 U.S. 32, 46 (111 S.Ct. 2123, 2133, 115 LE2d 27, 46) (1991).

The scope of Appellant’s disregard for his ethical and professional obligations in this case is staggering. His conduct was unethical in that, by his own account, he accepted a $5,000 fee from the ex-wife for closing the sales and distributing the proceeds, even though, as observed by the Bankruptcy Court, her claim to an ownership interest in the properties made her the primary adversary of the estate. R-71 at p.8.

Under 11 U.S.C. § 1107, a debtor in possession “bear[s] essentially the same fiduciary obligation to creditors ... as would the trustee for a debtor out of possession.” Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355, 105 S.Ct. 1986, 1994 (1985). It follows that counsel for a chapter 11 debtor in possession likewise owes a fiduciary duty to the bankruptcy estate and its creditors. As stated by the court in In re Rivers, 167 B.R. 288, 301 (N.D.Ga.1994):

> The professional’s duties run not merely to the person or persons holding the office of the fiduciary but to the trust to which the fiduciary owes allegiance. Thus, in a Chapter 11 case, an attorney for a debtor in possession must balance a role as counsellor to the debtor with the role of officer of the court and fiduciary to the bankruptcy estate. When the interests of the former conflict with those of the latter, it is the estate and the court to which the attorney owes the highest allegiance.

Accord In re Rusty Jones, Inc., 134 B.R. 321 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1991); In re E Z Feed Cube Co., Ltd., supra, 123 B.R. at 74.

Given his fiduciary obligations to the bankruptcy estate and the wording of the Divorce Decree, Appellant's acceptance of compensation from the ex-wife was clearly violative of his ethical obligations under Rule 3-105 of the Code of Professional Responsibility (Canon 5), which provides that "[a] lawyer should exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of a client." Indeed, Judge Brizendine characterized the disbursements to the ex-wife as the equivalent of a "hidden deal" reforming the Decree in her favor, Id. at pp.10-11, and stated that in his entire career as an attorney and a judge he had "never seen ... conduct by an officer of the court this bad in handling a ... Chapter 11 bankruptcy estate." R-71 at p. 11.

In addition to violating his ethical obligations to the bankruptcy estate and its creditors, Appellant also violated his professional obligations as an officer of the court. Under 11 U.S.C. § 363(b)(1) and Bankruptcy Rules 2002 and 6004, any sale of estate property by a trustee or debtor in possession[11] outside the ordinary course of business requires bankruptcy court approval, obtained "after notice and a hearing." Notice to creditors and court approval, in the form of an order confirming a plan of reorganization, are likewise required before the net proceeds of such a sale can be distributed to creditors. Appellant was well aware that both the auction and his subsequent distribution of the proceeds were violative of these provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, and under the circumstances his motion to dismiss the case and his related amendments to the Debtor's bankruptcy schedules can only be viewed as a deliberate attempt to mislead and deceive the court. The Court was not only authorized under § 105(a) and Mroz to impose sanctions for this conduct, it would have been remiss had it not done so.

II THE CHAPTER 7 TRUSTEE WAS NOT REQUIRED TO "MITIGATE DAMAGES" BY FILING AVOIDANCE ACTIONS AGAINST THE RECIPIENTS OF APPELLANT'S DISTRIBUTIONS PURSUANT TO 11 U.S.C. § 549.

Without citing any supporting authority, Appellant contends that the Chapter 7 Trustee was required to "mitigate damages" by filing avoidance actions pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 549 to recover any unauthorized transfers of funds which may have occurred as a result of the manner in which the auction proceeds were distributed. This contention is without merit for several reasons. First, the Court's objective in imposing sanctions against Appellant was not merely to redress the injury to the estate resulting from Appellant's conduct but also to hold Appellant accountable as an officer of the court for his actions, a goal which obviously would not have been achieved by requiring the Trustee to sue the recipients of the distributions pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 549. Second, there has been no showing that such an approach would have been cost effective in light of the number of recipients, the amount in controversy with respect to each of them, and the collectibility of any judgments obtained. Finally, it was not only the Chapter 7 Trustee who was seeking the imposition of sanctions but also the United States Trustee, who lacked standing to bring avoidance actions on behalf of the bankruptcy estate and therefore could not have been required to “mitigate damages” in this manner.

As noted by the Court in Mroz, supra, a “primary aspect” of the inherent powers vested in courts to control and manage their affairs “‘is the ability to fashion an appropriate sanction for conduct which abuses the judicial process.’” Id., 65 F.3d at 1575 (citation omitted). In assessing monetary sanctions for such abuse, it is entirely appropriate to attempt to redress the damage caused by the conduct. Id.

Appellant unquestionably abused the process of the Bankruptcy Court by invoking the automatic stay of 11 U.S.C. § 362 to enable the Debtor to retain possession and control of his properties while disregarding the substantive and procedural rights afforded by the Bankruptcy Code to ensure that all creditors receive fair and equitable treatment. Acting either pursuant to its inherent powers under Mroz or pursuant to its statutory powers under 11 U.S.C. § 105(a), the Bankruptcy Court was authorized to assess sanctions against Appellant in an amount calculated to compensate creditors injured as a result of his misconduct.

III THE REQUEST FOR IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS WAS NOT BARRED BY THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS APPLICABLE TO 11 U.S.C. § 549.

The two-year statute of limitations contained in 11 U.S.C. § 549 applies only to actions brought pursuant to that section and does not constrain or limit the ability of the court to impose sanctions against an attorney for professional misconduct. See Cuevas-Segarra v. Contreras, supra, 134 F.2d at 460; In re E Z Feed Cube Co., Ltd., supra, 123 B.R. at 74. Moreover, Appellant raised no statute of limitations defense in the Bankruptcy Court, with the result that any such defense which might otherwise have been available to him was waived pursuant to Rule 8(c) of the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure and Rule 7008 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. Indeed, Appellant stipulated that the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction “to hear the [motions] and issue rulings under 11 U.S.C. §329 and §105, or as otherwise provided under its inherent power.” R-69, Stipulation 3; R-71 at p.2.

IV THE BANKRUPTCY COURT WAS AUTHORIZED TO CONCLUDE FROM THE EVIDENCE THAT THE EX-WIFE WAS NOT ENTITLED TO THE DISTRIBUTIONS SHE RECEIVED.

Appellant contends that in calculating the amount of the monetary sanctions assessed against him, the Bankruptcy Court incorrectly concluded that the distributions which he made to or on behalf of the ex-wife were improper. Appellant maintains that the ex-wife was entitled to these distributions "not only as a ½ owner of some of the parcels of land, but also as a judgment creditor under her divorce decree." Appellant's Brief, page 5.

As previously indicated, the Divorce Decree operated by its terms to divest the ex-wife of any ownership interest in the properties owned by the parties, provided all the debts referenced in the Decree were paid in full within 18 months.[12/] However, Appellant declined to give effect to these provisions and, having done so, paid himself a fee from what he considered to be the ex-wife's "share of the proceeds." Appellant's Brief, page 2. The Bankruptcy Court was obviously deeply disturbed both by Appellant's failure to appreciate the ethical problems raised by this conduct and by his general lack of awareness of the fiduciary role which he had assumed as counsel for the estate, and for this reason the Court included in its order a provision prohibiting him from representing chapter 11 debtors or creditors for a period of six months or until he completed thirty hours of attendance at bankruptcy seminars, including five hours of professionalism and ethics. R-72, par. 4; R-71 at pp. 3-5.

Given the language of the Divorce Decree, there is simply no basis in the record for a conclusion that the ex-wife was entitled to any portion of the auction proceeds. More importantly, to the extent she asserted an interest in the proceeds which was superior to that of the bankruptcy estate, the issue could be resolved only through adversary proceedings in which she and the estate were represented by separate counsel. Indeed, by arguing on appeal that the ex-wife was entitled to the distributions she received, Appellant continues, in effect, to engage in the same type of unethical conduct for which he was sanctioned by the Bankruptcy Court.

V THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S EXERCISE OF ITS INHERENT POWER TO SANCTION AN ATTORNEY FOR IMPROPER CONDUCT DID NOT CONSTITUTE AN ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

Appellant contends that the Bankruptcy Court abused its inherent power to impose sanctions under Mroz, supra, because the evidence did not establish any bad faith conduct on his part but merely a "'goof' on the interpretation of the law." Appellant’s Brief, p. 6. This is ludicrous. Appellant admits that he made the decision to close the sales and distribute the proceeds following at least a month of reflection over the illegality of the auction. Appellant’s Brief, pp. 1-2. Moreover, it is clear from his brief, as it was from his testimony during the hearing, that he reached this decision based purely on considerations of expediency. After disbursing the proceeds in a manner which favored the interests of the ex-wife over the interests of the bankruptcy estate and its creditors, he then sought to conceal his conduct from the Bankruptcy Court and the United States Trustee by representing, through his motion to dismiss and the related amendments to the Debtor’s schedules, that the estate’s interest in the properties remained intact. For Appellant to characterize this course of action as mere “goof” is nothing short of outrageous.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully submits that the Bankruptcy Court’s order and judgment assessing monetary sanctions against Appellant should be affirmed in its entirety.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

In re SOPHIE CAHEN VORBURGER, Debtor.	Civil No. 1:10-cv-08264-PKC
SOPHIE CAHEN VORBURGER, Appellant, vs. TRACY HOPE DAVIS, as UNITED STATES TRUSTEE, Appellee.	(Bankruptcy Appeals)

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEBTOR'S APPEAL AS UNTIMELY, AND FOR FAILURE TO PAY PRESCRIBED FILING FEE

Appellant Tracy Hope Davis, the United States Trustee for Region 2 (the "United States Trustee"), moves to dismiss Appellee Sophie C. Vorburger's appeal of the bankruptcy court's dismissal of her chapter 11 case as untimely filed under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2).

INTRODUCTION

Under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2), this Court has jurisdiction to consider an appeal from a bankruptcy court order if the appeal is taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2). Under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8002(a), a notice of appeal must be filed within 14 days of the date of entry of the order appealed from. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). Ms. Vorburger filed her notice of appeal from the order dismissing her bankruptcy case more than two weeks after it was entered. Her appeal is untimely and therefore must be dismissed.

Furthermore, the bankruptcy court has denied Ms. Vorburger's request to proceed in forma pauperis in this appeal, and she has not paid the prescribed filing fee. This appeal may also be dismissed based on these grounds.

FACTS

Ms. Vorburger filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on June 17, 2009 (the "Petition Date"). Bankr. Dkt. 1. Ms. Vorburger's reorganization is predicated on the sale of two properties — one in Pennsylvania, the other a Manhattan cooperative apartment. Bankr. Dkt. 63, at 1. On November 10, 2009, the United States Trustee moved to dismiss the case with a one-year bar, or alternatively convert the case to chapter 7 (the "Dismissal Motion"), for three reasons: (1) Ms. Vorburger's delay in obtaining a sale order for Pennsylvania property, (2) Ms. Vorburger had not filed required mandatory monthly operating reports for the five-month period from June 2009 through (and including) October 2009, and (3) Ms. Vorburger had not paid statutory fees due pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). Bankr. Dkt. 28 (Memorandum of Law, at 13-18).[1]

The bankruptcy court continued the hearing on the Dismissal Motion multiple times in order to give Ms. Vorburger additional opportunities to market and sell her properties. Bankr. Dkt. 63, at 1. The automatic stay, however, was lifted as to Ms. Vorburger's Pennsylvania property. Bankr. Dkt. 46. Furthermore, with respect to Ms. Vorburger's Manhattan apartment, because she filed her current bankruptcy case shortly after the dismissal of a prior bankruptcy case, the bankruptcy court ruled on June 10, 2010 that the automatic stay does not apply pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 362(j).[2] Bankr. Dkt. 58.

[1] Under 11 U.S.C. §§ 1112(b)(4)(F) or 1112(b)(4)(K), a chapter 11 debtor's failure to satisfy timely any filing or reporting requirement, or failure to pay any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28, respectively, may constitute cause for the dismissal of the case.

[2] Ms. Vorburger filed a separate Notice of Appeal from a different order determining that the automatic stay did not apply to Ms. Vorburger's Manhattan apartment. Bankr. Dkt. 68 (the "Reconsideration Order"). The United States Trustee was not a party in the proceedings leading to the entry of the Reconsideration Order and is not a party in Ms. Vorburger's appeal thereof. The United States Trustee is a party only in the appeal of the Dismissal Order. Bankr. Dkt. 70.

The bankruptcy court held a hearing on the Dismissal Motion on September 8, 2010. At the time, even though Ms. Vorburger had filed a one-page statement of income and expenses for August through October 2009 in response to the United States Trustee's initial filing of the Dismissal Motion, she failed to file operating reports since that time, or pay statutory fees to the United States Trustee during the entire pendency of her case. Bankr. Dkt. 63, at 3.

Ms. Vorburger's bankruptcy case was dismissed on September 10, 2010. Order (A) Dismissing Chapter 11 Case; (B) Imposing One-Year Bar to Future Bankruptcy Filings; and (C) Setting Forth Related Relief (the "Dismissal Order"), Bankr. Dkt. 70. The bankruptcy court barred Ms. Vorburger from filing another bankruptcy case for one year without first obtaining obtaining leave of court. Bankr. Dkt. 70, at 1. The Dismissal Order was entered on the docket of Ms. Vorburger's case on September 10, 2010. Bankr. Dkt. 70.

On September 30, 2010, Ms. Vorburger filed a Notice of Appeal for review of the bankruptcy court's Dismissal Order that had been entered on September 10, 2010. Bankr. Dkt. 72.

On October 12, 2010, Ms. Vorburger filed an application with the bankruptcy court, seeking leave to proceed in forma pauperis in connection with her appeal of the Dismissal Order. Bankr. Dkt. 75. The bankruptcy court, however, denied the application on October 21, 2010, without prejudice for Ms. Vorburger to seek relief before this Court. Bankr. Dkt. 79. To date, the dockets of Ms. Vorburger's bankruptcy case and of this appeal do not indicate that the filing fee regarding this appeal has been paid or that Ms. Vorburger has sought related relief from this Court.

ANALYSIS

Ms. Vorburger's September 30 notice of appeal was untimely to perfect an appeal from the September 10 order dismissing her bankruptcy case.

A. Ms. Vorburger's Appeal Must be Dismissed Because She Filed Her Notice of Appeal After the Statutory Deadline.

Ms. Vorburger did not comply with the 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2), which only allows a litigant the 14 days specified in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) to appeal an adverse final order.[3] An order to dismiss a case is a final order. See In re Chateaugay Corp., 826 F.2d 1177, 1179 (2d Cir. 1987) (indicating that "[a] final order 'ends the litigation on the merits and leaves nothing for the court to do but exercise the judgment'") (quoting Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 233 (1945)). An order can be final in bankruptcy even if it does not resolve all of the issues raised in the case, "but it must completely resolve all of the issues pertaining to a discrete claim . . . ." In re Fugazy Express, 982 F.2d 769, 776 (2d Cir. 1992). The order dismissing Ms. Vorburger's bankruptcy case ended consideration of the merits of her chapter 11 filing and therefore was a final order.

[3] Section 158(c)(2) of title 28 states, "An appeal under subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be taken in the same manner as appeals in civil proceedings generally are taken to the courts of appeals from the district courts and in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." Bankruptcy Rule 8002(a) states, "The notice of appeal shall be filed with the clerk within 14 days of the date of the entry of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from."

After the final order dismissing her bankruptcy case was entered into the docket of the bankruptcy court on September 10, 2010, Ms. Vorburger accordingly had 14 days to file a notice of appeal. Bankr. Dkt. 70; 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). The 14-day appeal period expired on September 24, 2010. Ms. Vorburger's September 30 notice of appeal was therefore untimely to perfect an appeal from the September 10 dismissal order. Bankr. Dkt. 72.

B. Because Ms. Vorburger's Appeal Was Untimely, This Court Does Not Have Jurisdiction to Hear Her Appeal.

The deadline established by 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2), which incorporates Bankruptcy Rule 8002(a)'s 14-day deadline, is mandatory and jurisdictional. Thus, this Court does not have subject matter jurisdiction to hear Ms. Vorburger's appeal because she filed her notice of appeal over two weeks after the bankruptcy court entered the dismissal order.

This appeal is governed by the Supreme Court's decision in Bowles v. Russell, which held that if Congress established a time limit for taking an appeal in a statute, "that limitation is more than a simple 'claim-processing rule.'" Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. 205, 213 (2007). It is jurisdictional. Id., at 206; Ruiz-Martinez v. Mukasey, 516 F.3d 102, 118 (2d Cir. 2008) (quoting Bowles); see also In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d 933, 938 (9th Cir. 2007) ("[T]he failure to timely file a notice of appeal is a jurisdictional defect barring appellate review.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Without proper jurisdiction, a court does not have power to hear a case, and therefore "jurisdiction can never be forfeited or waived." United States v. Cotton, 535 U.S. 625, 630 (2002).

Here, the period of time for filing a notice of appeal is not merely established by Rule; it is established by section 158(c)(2) of title 28, which provides that appeals in bankruptcy shall be taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." This reference to Rule 8002 is located in the same section of the statute that grants district courts jurisdiction to hear bankruptcy appeals. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)-(b). Because the time limitation is statutory, it is mandatory and jurisdictional.

All of the United States Courts of Appeals agree that bankruptcy appeals must be dismissed when, as here, the appellant has not timely filed a notice of appeal. See, e.g., In re Siemon, 421 F.3d 167, 169 (2d Cir. 2005); In re Bond, 254 F.3d 669, 673 (7th Cir. 2001); Hamilton v. Lake Elmo Bank (In re Delta Eng'g Int'l, Inc.), 270 F.3d 584, 586 (8th Cir. 2001); Williams v. EMC Mortgage Corp. (In re Williams), 216 F.3d 1295, 1298 (11th Cir. 2000); Stangel v. United States (In re Stangel), 219 F.3d 498, 500 (5th Cir. 2000); Shareholders v. Sound Radio, Inc., 109 F.3d 873, 879 (3d Cir. 1997); Anderson v. Mouradick (In re Mouradick), 13 F.3d 326, 327 (9th Cir. 1994); Deyhimy v. Rupp (In re Herwitt), 970 F.2d 709, 710 (10th Cir. 1992); In re Abdallah, 778 F.2d 75, 77 (1st Cir. 1985).

Second, federal case law has for over 100 years treated time limits for filing a notice of appeal as jurisdictional. Bowles, 551 U.S. at 206 (stating that it has "long and repeatedly [been] held that the time limits for filing a notice of appeal are jurisdictional in nature"). Ms. Vorburger appealed the bankruptcy court's dismissal order more than 14 days after it was entered. Bankr. Dkt. 72. Her failure to file a timely notice of appeal, "regardless of whether [Ms. Vorburger] can demonstrate excusable neglect," deprives this Court of jurisdiction to review the bankruptcy court's dismissal order. Siemon, 421 F.3d at 169.

C. The Appeal Should Also be Dismissed Because Ms. Vorburger has Not Paid the Prescribed Filing Fee

Despite the denial of her application to proceed in this appeal in forma pauperis, Ms. Vorburger has failed to pay the filing fee required by 28 U.S.C. § 1930(b) pursuant to the Bankruptcy Court Miscellaneous Fee Schedule. Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, Bankruptcy Court Miscellaneous Fee Schedule § 14 (2010). Failure to pay the filing fee constitutes a failure to prosecute the appeal under Bankruptcy Rule 8001(a), which is a basis for this Court to dismiss this appeal. Sydlar v. Swimelar, No. 6:10-34, 2010 WL 2522362 (N.D.N.Y. June 14, 2010), citing Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 44 (1991); see also Michalek v. Ring, No. 96-5139, 1997 WL 738556 (2d Cir. Nov. 21, 1997) (affirming district court's dismissal of bankruptcy appeal for failure to pay appellate filing fee); Smith v. Nagle Houses, Inc., 2005 WL 1773765 (S.D.N.Y. APPELLATE PANEL FOR THE TENTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEE

Pursuant to Rule 29 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure and 28 U.S.C. § 517, the United States submits this brief as amicus curiae supporting appellee Christopher J. Redmond, the chapter 7 trustee.

STATEMENT OF INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of the federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. § 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977). The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency and to protect and preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. § 307.

At issue in this appeal is whether the pre-petition funds paid as a retainer for services in connection with a chapter 7 bankruptcy became property of the estate, and therefore cannot be used to pay fees incurred post-petition, when the law firm was not employed by the trustee. This issue touches on an area of great concern to the United States Trustee, and one that is highly regulated by the Bankruptcy Code: the payment of attorneys' fees in connection with bankruptcy. Allowing the law firm in this case to recover from property of the estate would undermine Congress's clear intention that the case trustee, subject to court approval, determines what work, if any, counsel can perform at estate expense.

The United States Trustee, as the independent watchdog of the bankruptcy system, acts to ensure the Bankruptcy Code is applied properly in bankruptcy cases. Allowing debtor law firms to recover post-petition fees from property of the estate would violate the Code, and thereby deny creditors the full extent of the recoveries they are lawfully entitled to receive in bankruptcy cases. In addition, because a number of federal agencies, including the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Commerce Department's Economic Development Administration, the Small Business Administration, the Internal Revenue Service, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, regularly appear as creditors in chapter 7 proceedings, the United States has a separate, direct interest in preventing debtors from dissipating the estate's assets through payments to debtors' personal counsel, for activities that do not necessarily benefit the estate.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Before filing their petition for bankruptcy, the debtors in this case paid a cash retainer and assigned tax refunds to their counsel for services rendered and to be rendered in connection with the bankruptcy. At issue is whether these pre-petition funds became property of the estate, and therefore cannot be used to pay fees incurred post-petition when counsel was not employed by the trustee.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Debtors Max and Georgia Wagers paid a pre-petition retainer, consisting of cash and assigned tax refunds, to their legal counsel for services rendered and to be rendered in connection with their chapter 7 bankruptcy. The chapter 7 trustee subsequently filed an adversary action, seeking to recover the retainer as property of the bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy court granted partial summary judgment for the law firm, concluding that the payments were not property of the estate because the assignment by the debtors clearly expressed their intent to divest themselves of control over the tax refunds. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Tenth Circuit reversed. The panel held that the assignment did not transfer ownership of the retainer under Kansas law; that the retainer was indeed property of the estate; and that, under Lamie v. United States Tr., 540 U.S. 526 (2004), the law firm could not be paid from estate property for their post-petition services because they were not employed under 11 U.S.C. § 327.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. The Bankruptcy Code.[1]

The commencement of a bankruptcy case creates an estate consisting of certain property, "wherever located and by whomever held," 11 U.S.C. § 541(a), including "all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case," id. at § 541(a)(1). An entity "in possession, custody, or control" of such property must turn it over to the trustee in the case. 11 U.S.C. § 542(a); see also 11 U.S.C. § 362(a)(3) (prohibiting "any act * * * to exercise control over property of the estate").

The Code authorizes a court to award compensation to "a trustee, a consumer privacy ombudsman appointed under section 332, an examiner, an ombudsman appointed under section 333, or a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1) ("Compensation of officers"). Section 327(a) ("Employment of professional persons") permits the trustee, with the court's approval, to employ attorneys to "represent or assist the trustee" in carrying out his duties, while § 327(e) authorizes the trustee to "employ, for a specified special purpose" other than representing the trustee, an attorney who has represented the debtor. Section 329 authorizes the court to review the reasonableness of an attorney's compensation, regardless of its source, when the payment was made within one year of the filing date. "Any attorney representing a debtor in a case under this title * * * whether or not such attorney applies for compensation under this title, shall file with the court a statement of the compensation paid or agreed to be paid, if such payment or agreement was made after one year before the date of the filing of the petition[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 329(a). A court may cancel an agreement or order return of any payment that exceeds the reasonable value of such services. 11 U.S.C. § 329(b).

B. Proceedings Below.

1. The facts are uncontested. In May 2003, debtors Max and Georgia Wagers hired the law firm of Lentz & Clark, P.A. to advise them about their financial situation, and subsequently paid them a $5,000 cash retainer.[2] 355 B.R. 268, 270 (10th Cir. BAP 2006). On October 22, 2003, the debtors assigned the firm any tax refunds they might obtain for 2003 and prior years as an additional retainer "for services rendered or to be rendered." Appellee Appendix ("App.") 374. The next day, with the firm's assistance, the debtors filed a joint chapter 7 petition. Id. After filing, the debtors received tax refunds exceeding $50,000, all of which were deposited into the firm's trust account. 355 B.R. at 270. After payment of all its pre-petition fees, the firm had about $1,000 remaining of its initial cash retainer, which it applied toward partial payment of post-petition fees.

[2] "The three most common types of legal retainer are: (1) 'classic' (or 'availability'), which ensures an attorney's availability to represent the client; (2) 'flat fee,' which consists of an agreed amount payable for performance of a specific task; and (3) 'security,' which consists of an advance payment that assures payment for future services. * * * Typically, security retainers are placed into the attorney's trust account, out of which fees are paid once they have been earned." 355 B.R. 268, 271 n.6 (10th Cir. BAP 2006); see also Barron v. Countryman, 432 F.3d 590, 595-96 (5th Cir. 2005).

Id. The post-petition fees and expenses through September 2004 totaled slightly more than $13,000. Id. The firm never sought or gained employment by the trustee pursuant to § 327.

Christopher Redmond, trustee for the debtors' bankruptcy estate, brought an adversary proceeding to require the firm to turn over the post-petition remainder of the cash retainer (about $1,000) and the assigned refunds to the estate.[3] The trustee moved for partial summary judgment, arguing that under Kansas law, the cash retainer and tax refunds were the property of the debtors, and hence, became property of the estate; and that 11 U.S.C. § 330, as construed by Lamie v. United States Tr., 540 U.S. 526 (2004), allows estate compensation of debtors' counsel for post-petition services only if the firm were employed as authorized by 11 U.S.C. § 327, which was not the case here. App. 377. The firm filed a counter-motion for partial summary judgment, arguing that 11 U.S.C. § 329, rather than § 330, governs the firm's right to compensation; and that the estate's interest in the retained funds was limited to a contingent right to receive any balance remaining after the firm's fees and expenses are paid. Id. at 377-78.

[3] The trustee's complaint alleged (1) the debtors' assignment gave the firm a security interest in, rather than ownership of, the refunds, which are therefore estate property that must be turned over to the trustee; (2) the transfer should be avoided as fraudulent under § 548, because the debtors received less than reasonably equivalent value from the firm in return for the assignment; (3) the trustee can recover the refunds under § 550 of the Code; (4) the refunds are property of the estate that the trustee can use, sell or lease under § 363, so the firm must turn them over to the trustee as required by § 542; (5) the refunds should be returned to the estate under § 329 because they exceeded the reasonable value of legal services provided pre-petition; and (6) any lien that the firm might have on the refunds is avoidable under § 544 as invalid, unperfected, and subordinate to the trustee's rights. App. 376 n.10.

2. On February 23, 2006, the bankruptcy court granted partial summary judgment for the firm, holding that "the advance payments, including the assignment of future tax refunds, are not property of the estate;" that the estate's interest in the cash and tax refunds on the date of filing was limited to the contingent right to receive the remainder after the firm's pre- and post-petition fees are paid; and that § 329, rather than § 330, controls the payment of attorneys' fees from the retainer. App. 373. The bankruptcy court found that the assignment "clearly expresses" the debtors' intent to "divest[] themselves of all right of control over the refunds." Id. at 386. The bankruptcy court found that this "absolute assignment" distinguished this case from decisions in which other courts, applying other states' law, had adopted the trustee's view that pre-petition retainers become the property of the estate to the extent that fees have not been earned pre-petition. Id. at 395-96.[4] And since the retainer was not estate property, the reasonable fee limitation of § 329 controls the propriety of paying the firm's post-petition fees from the pre-petition retainer, to the exclusion of other Code provisions. Id. at 400-01.

In reaching these conclusions, the bankruptcy court emphasized that taking cash and assignments of tax refunds for both pre- and post-petition services was an accepted practice to assure payment of attorneys' fees; that chapter 7 debtors' counsel provide "valued and essential services postpetition;" and that the trustee's approach "would undermine the unique role" played by the chapter 7 debtors' counsel. Id. at 378-84. In contrast to the trustee's approach, the bankruptcy court reasoned, its own construction of § 541 and § 329 promotes the public policy of preserving the integrity of the bankruptcy system. Id. at 403-04. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court denied the trustee's motion, granted the firm's motion, and retained jurisdiction to determine the remaining counts in the complaint. Id. at 405.

3. The trustee appealed to the Tenth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel, which reversed. 355 B.R. 268 (10th Cir. BAP 2006). The Bankruptcy Appellate employed by the trustee under § 327, these courts "may wish to more carefully consider the property interests which arise when debtors transfer property prepetition for payment of postpetition services." App. 396.

Panel concluded that this case could not be distinguished from Lamie, which held that under the plain language of § 330, only attorneys employed under § 327 may be paid from estate property for post-petition services. 355 B.R. at 271-73. The panel noted that before 1994, § 330(a) specifically authorized courts to award payment to the debtor's attorney from estate funds, but that in the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-394, Congress amended § 330 to delete reference to the debtor's attorney. Id. at 272.

The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel found that the assignment "was intended to pay fees and costs as they were incurred, with the remainder, if any, to be returned to the Debtors." Id. at 274. Thus, the assignment was not a full transfer of ownership under Kansas law, and the tax refunds were the property of the estate. Id. at 273-75, citing, inter alia, In re Barowsky, 946 F.2d 1516, 1517-19 (10th Cir. 1991); In re Scimeca, 962 P.2d 1080, 1091-92 (Kan. 1998). The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel found its conclusion to be consistent with three other courts that "have held, post-Lamie, that money paid pre-petition to secure payment of attorney's fees remains property of the client until earned by provision of services." 355 B.R. at 275, citing In re On-Line Servs., 324 B.R. 342, 346 (8th Cir. BAP 2005); Barron v. Countrymen, 432 F.3d 590, 595-96 (5th Cir. 2005); In re CK Liquidation, 343 B.R. 376, 385 (D. Mass. 2006). The panel further noted that the bankruptcy court's reliance on the assignment "breaks down in light of * * * [its] failure to distinguish between the tax refunds, which were formally assigned, and the cash retainer, which was not": "If simple payment of a cash retainer constitutes an 'assignment' that transfers full ownership of those funds, then every retainer paid without an express reservation of ownership would belong solely to the attorney," a position that the majority of courts have not adopted. 355 B.R. at 374 n.26. The panel rejected the bankruptcy court's finding that the debtors retained only a contingent, reversionary interest in the retainer, stating that (1) the Kansas Supreme Court would more likely hold that the firm had only a contingent interest in the funds, and (2) "even a contingent, reversionary interest is included in a debtor's estate under § 541." Id. at 276, citing In re Montgomery, 224 F.3d 1193, 1194-95 (10th Cir. 2000).

The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel noted that the bankruptcy court's contrary ruling "was driven, at least in part, by public policy." 355 B.R. at 273. While sharing the bankruptcy court's concerns regarding the integrity of the bankruptcy system, id., and adequate payment of debtors' counsel, the BAP stated that it could not "ignore Lamie in favor of a preferred result." Id. at 276. "[S]ince the assigned refunds were [the] property of the Debtors' estate, and the Firm was not employed by the Trustee pursuant to § 327, * * * the Firm may not use pre-petition funds to pay its post-petition fees" in this case. Id.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Bankruptcy Code reflects a long-standing concern with the payment of attorneys' fees in connection with bankruptcy proceedings, and most closely regulates those fees for which attorneys seek payment from the bankruptcy estate. Construing the Code, the Supreme Court has held that fees cannot be awarded to the debtor's attorney from estate funds in a chapter 7 case unless the attorney was employed by the trustee and approved by the court. Lamie v. United States Tr., 540 U.S. 526, 538-39 (2004). Here, the debtors' law firm seeks to use the debtors' pre-petition security retainer to pay for post-petition services rendered during the chapter 7 proceedings, although the firm was neither employed by the trustee nor approved by the court.

Neither applicable state law nor the Code permit such a result. Under Kansas law, the type of retainer at issue here remains the client's money until earned, In the Matter of Scimeca, 962 P.2d 1080, 1091 (Kan. 1998), and hence any unearned funds became property of the bankruptcy estate on the date the bankruptcy petition was filed. To permit recovery under such circumstances would circumvent the Code's careful regulation of attorneys' fees and allow the dissipation of debtors' pre-petition assets through payments to counsel for activities that do not necessarily benefit the estate.

ARGUMENT

THE PRE-PETITION RETAINER PAID TO LENTZ & CLARK CONSTITUTES PROPERTY OF THE ESTATE, AND THEREFORE MAY NOT BE USED TO PAY FEES THAT WERE INCURRED POST-PETITION.

A. The language and structure of the Bankruptcy Code reflect long-standing concern with the payment of attorneys' fees in connection with bankruptcy proceedings. See S. Rep. No. 95-989, at 39 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5825 ("Payments to a debtor's attorney provide serious potential for evasion of creditor protection provisions of the bankruptcy laws, and serious potential for overreaching by the debtor's attorney, and should be subject to careful scrutiny.") (discussing 11 U.S.C. § 329); see generally In re Griffin, 313 B.R. 757, 764 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2004) ("The Bankruptcy Code as a whole is very concerned with conflicts of interest, defective disclosure, and excessive compensation."). The Code most closely regulates those fees for which attorneys seek payment from the bankruptcy estate. As is relevant here, requests for payment from the chapter 7 estate require close interplay among several different code provisions: 11 U.S.C. § 327, which authorizes the trustee to appoint an attorney as a "professional person;" 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1), which authorizes the court to award compensation to persons employed under § 327; and 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(2), which authorizes the estate to pay compensation awarded under § 330(a)(1) as an administrative expense (which, in turn, receives first payment priority under § 507(a)(1)).

This procedure for seeking fees from the chapter 7 estate is exclusive. "[Section] 330(a)(1) does not authorize compensation awards to debtors' attorneys from estate funds, unless they are employed as authorized by § 327. If the attorney is to be paid from estate funds under § 330(a)(1) in a Chapter 7 case, he must be employed by the trustee and approved by the court." Lamie v. United States Tr., 540 U.S. 526, 538-39 (2004).[5] Moreover, § 330 authorizes the award of fees only to the extent that the services provided are reasonable, actual, necessary, and beneficial to the estate.

Fees paid from non-estate funds – i.e., by the chapter 7 debtor post-petition, or by a third party – are also reviewed, though less closely and under a less stringent standard. While the debtor is free to employ an attorney to assist him, all such attorneys, "whether or not such attorney applies for compensation under this title," must file with the court a statement of compensation paid or agreed to be paid, for all payments or agreements made within one year before the date the bankruptcy petition was filed. 11 U.S.C. § 329(a); Bankr. Rule 2016 (requiring professional service providers to submit to court a detailed statement of services rendered and expenses incurred). This holds true even if the attorney was not the debtor's counsel on the date of the filing, see In re Downs, 103 F.3d 472, 477 (6th Cir. 1996). A bankruptcy court may cancel an agreement or order return of any payment that exceeds the reasonable value of such services. 11 U.S.C. § 329(b); Bankr. Rule 2017. As the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel correctly understood, § 329 merely establishes limits on an attorney's otherwise existing right to accept payment: It creates no entitlement to be paid fees from estate funds under § 330 or any other section of the Code.

[5] Although the Code at one point allowed debtors' attorneys to be compensated under § 330 even if not appointed under § 327, that provision was deleted by Congress as "part of a Reform Act designed to curtail abuses in fee awards," a purpose that the deletion furthered "by ensuring that Chapter 7 debtors' attorneys would receive no estate compensation absent the trustee's authorization of their work." Lamie, 540 U.S. at 540.

Under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a), an attorney may be disqualified not only because he is not disinterested, but also because he holds an "interest adverse to the estate." In re Pierce, 809 F.2d 1356, 1363 (8th Cir. 1987). The bankruptcy court's broad discretion in awarding and denying fees paid in connection with bankruptcy proceedings empowers the court to order disgorgement as a sanction to debtors' counsel for nondisclosure, see In re Prudhomme, 43 F.3d 1000, 1003-04 (5th Cir. 1995), citing, inter alia, Woods v. City Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268 (1941) (using denial of compensation as tool for strict enforcement of conflict-of-interest rules), even if the fees to be disgorged were not paid from the bankruptcy estate, see In re 5900 Assocs., Inc., 468 F.3d 326, 330 (6th Cir. 2006) (discussing cases).

B. In short, if the cash retainer and tax refunds are not property of the estate, then those monies are subject to a "reasonableness" review by the bankruptcy court under § 329. But if the cash retainer and tax refunds constitute estate property, then under Lamie, they cannot be used to compensate the Wagers' counsel where, as here, counsel were not employed as authorized by § 327. Thus, the central issue in this appeal is whether those monies constitute property of the chapter 7 estate, a question left unresolved by the Lamie decision.[6]

1. Section 541 provides that the commencement of a bankruptcy case creates an estate consisting of certain property, "wherever located and by whomever held," including "all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case." 11 U.S.C. § 541(a)(1). "That statutory language reflects Congress' intent to define estate property in the broadest possible sense." In re Hines, 147 F.3d 1185, 1189 (9th Cir. 1998), citing United States v. Whiting Pools, Inc., 462 U.S. 198, 204-05 (1983); see also S. Rep. No. 95-989, at 82, reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 5868; see generally In re World Commc'ns, Inc., 72 B.R. 498, 500 (D. Utah 1987) (legislative intent behind the Code is that § 541(a)(1) "includes every conceivable interest of the debtor in the estate") (citation omitted). The Tenth Circuit has noted "Congress' clear intent that contingent interests are to be included in the property of a bankruptcy estate." In re Montgomery, 224 F.3d 1193, 1195 (10th Cir. 2000) (holding contingent earned income credits to be part of estate).

"[W]hile the Bankruptcy Code defines what interests may become property of the estate, it is nonbankruptcy law that defines the scope and existence of those interests." Paul v. Monts, 906 F.2d 1468, 1475 (10th Cir. 1990). This principle, which the Supreme Court stated in Butner v. United States, 440 U.S. 48, 54 (1979) (construing Bankruptcy Act), "applies to the interpretation of the property rights attributable to attorney retainer agreements as to other property governed by state law." Barron v. Countryman, 432 F.3d 590, 595 (5th Cir. 2005). "Funds paid to an attorney by a client for services 'become property of the estate only if, under applicable state law, the debtor has an interest in the [funds] at the time of filing the bankruptcy case.'" In re Hill, 355 B.R. 260, 262 (Bankr. D. Or. 2006) (emphasis in original); In re McDonald Bros. Constr., 114 B.R. 989, 997 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1990) ("It is state law, rather than the Code, that defines the extent of a debtor's interest [in] * * * a retainer, and hence whether the retainer is property of the estate under Section 541.").

2. Whether the Wagers retained a property interest in the cash retainer and tax refunds depends on the terms of their retainer agreement, as construed in light of Kansas contract law and state bar ethical rules and regulations. See generally In re Equip. Servs., Inc., 290 F.3d 739, 746 (4th Cir. 2002) (employing this analysis), aff'd sub nom. Lamie v. United States Tr., 540 U.S. 526 (2004); In re E-Z Serve Convenience Stores, 299 B.R. 126, 130 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. 2003), aff'd, 318 B.R. 637 (M.D.N.C. 2004).[7] Although Kansas contract law does not address property interests in attorney retainers, there is ample case law addressing this issue in the context of attorney disciplinary proceedings. The Kansas Supreme Court has distinguished between a retainer that is to be earned by future services performed by an attorney, which "remains the client's money and subject to [Model Rule of

In re Mahendra, 131 F.3d 750, 755 (8th Cir. 1997) (determining whether interest is part of bankruptcy estate requires 3-part inquiry into (1) whether item constitutes "property" under § 541(a)(1); (2) what is debtor's interest in the property under state law; and (3) whether the debtor had the property interest at the time of filing), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1107 (1998).

Professional Conduct] 1.15," and a nonrefundable retainer paid to commit the attorney to represent the client and not as a fee to be earned through future services, which "is earned by the attorney when paid and is the attorney's money." In the Matter of Scimeca, 962 P.2d 1080, 1091 (Kan. 1998); see generally Indian Motocycle Assocs. III Ltd. P'ship v. Massachusetts Hous. Fin. Agency, 66 F.3d 1246, 1255 (1st Cir. 1995) ("Under the ethical rules applicable in most jurisdictions, [security retainers] * * * remain property of the client until applied by counsel in payment of legal services actually performed."). "Absent clear language that [a] retainer is paid solely to commit the attorney to represent the client and not as a fee to be earned by future services, it is refundable" and must be segregated and safeguarded in an identifiable client account under Rule 1.15. In the Matter of Scimeca, 962 P.2d at 1092.

While the type of retainer involved is a question of fact, and depends on the intent of the parties, see generally Indian Motocycle Assocs., 66 F.3d at 1254 (citing cases), there does not appear to be any dispute here that the Wagers' purpose in paying cash and assigning their tax refund to counsel was to pay for bankruptcy services rendered pre- and post-petition, with the remainder to be turned over to the trustee – a form of "security" retainer. Appellee Br. 5. Counsel's actions in depositing the refunds into the firm's trust account confirm that counsel shared this understanding, as does the size of the retainer (approximately $55,000, compared to about $4,000 in pre-petition billings). Thus, under Scimeca, the retainer in this case was to be considered the Wagers' money until earned, and the unearned portion of the retainer became property of the estate on the petition date under § 541.

The law firm's suggestion in its opening brief that the debtors, and hence the estate, had only a contingent reversionary interest in the unearned portion of the retainer (Appellant's Br. 6-17) cannot be squared with the fact that (1) under Scimeca and Kansas disciplinary rules, the law firm was required to segregate the this money from law firm accounts, because it belonged to the Wagers, and (2) up to the petition date, the Wagers, like any clients, had an absolute right to discharge them, see In re Hines, 147 F.3d at 1191, and to obtain refund of the retainer, In re Hill, 355 B.R. at 263. The law firm's attempt to analogize the retainer to an escrow or security deposit, in which individuals may have only a "potential" interest (Appellant's Br. 11, 13), is therefore wide of the mark. And as the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel correctly noted, even contingent interests are included in a debtor's estate under § 541. 355 B.R. at 276, citing In re Montgomery, 224 F.3d at 1194-95.

Although the law firm asserts a contractual interest in the unearned portion of the retainer (Applt. Br. 6, 8, 14 n.7), as of the petition date, the Wagers "lost the right to authorize [counsels'] * * * legal services which could potentially further encumber this asset of the bankruptcy estate," a right that then belonged solely to the chapter 7 trustee. See In re Mahendra, 131 F.3d 750, 755 (8th Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1107 (1998). Indeed, allowing the law firm to recover its fees from property of the estate would eviscerate the principle that the trustee determines (subject to the court's approval) what work, if any, counsel can perform at estate expense. The Code's comprehensive regulation of attorneys' fees cannot be circumvented by private agreement between the debtor and his attorney. In re 5900 Assocs., Inc., 468 F.3d 326, 329-30 (6th Cir. 2006) (law firm and debtor cannot abrogate bankruptcy court's duty to review fees by entering into a state law contract).[8]

This result is consistent with the only case that has construed the effect of a similar retainer under Kansas ethics rules. In re Hodes, 239 B.R. 239, 242-43 (Bankr. D. Kan. 1999) ("Under Kansas law, an advance fee payment retainer to be earned by future services[] is property of the client and thus is property of that client's bankruptcy estate."), aff'd in part, rev'd in part on other grounds, 289 B.R. 5 (D. Kan. 2003). Other courts, reviewing similar retainers under applicable state law, have reached the same conclusion. See In re Equip. Servs., 290 F.3d at 746-47 (concluding, based on Virginia disciplinary rules, that security retainer was property of estate); In re Prudoff, 186 B.R. 64, 66-67 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1995) (concluding, on basis of Virginia Rules of Disciplinary Procedure, that debtor maintained interest in unearned portion of pre-petition retainer sufficient to constitute property of chapter 7 estate); In re Hill, 355 B.R. at 263 (holding that under Oregon law, retainer remains client's property until earned by attorney, and at time of filing debtor owed no fees, so pre-petition retainer could not be used to pay post-petition fees if attorney not employed by trustee);[9] cf. Barron v. Countryman, 432 F.3d at 597 (under local rules, "advanced payment retainer" was counsel's property and did not become property of the estate); but see In re

[9] A number of federal courts have also reached the same conclusion without any reference to state law. See generally In re Downs, 103 F.3d at 478 ("Retainers paid to counsel for the debtor are to be held in trust for the debtor, and the debtor's equitable interest in the trust is property of the estate.") (citing bankruptcy cases); In re E-Z Serve Convenience Stores, 299 B.R. at 132 (debtors' rights in advance fee with characteristics of security retainer arose pre-petition and therefore became property of estate upon bankruptcy filing under § 541); In re McDonald Bros. Constr., 114 B.R. at 996 (while debtor's interest in pre-petition retainer is matter of state law, "[a] number of bankruptcy decisions have nevertheless held, without reference to state law, that prepetition retainers are property of the estate").

Channel Master Holdings, Inc., 309 B.R. 855 (Bankr. D. Del. 2004) (allowing attorney to apply pre-petition retainer to payment of post-conversion attorneys' fees).

3. The fact that the retainer consists, in part, of assigned tax refunds is not ultimately controlling. The portion of an income tax refund that is based upon the pre-petition portion of a taxable year ordinarily constitutes property of the bankruptcy estate. In re Barowsky, 946 F.2d 1516, 1518 (10th Cir. 1991). It is generally true that, as the law firm notes, under Kansas law, "an assignment passes all of the assignor's title or interest to the assignee, and divests the assignor of all right of control over the subject matter of the assignment." Army Nat'l Bank v. Equity Developers, Inc., 774 P.2d 919, 932 (Kan. 1989) (cite omitted). And one bankruptcy court in Kansas has held that a tax refund assigned to counsel before the bankruptcy petition was filed, as a flat-fee retainer for services rendered and to be rendered, immediately became the attorney's property, with the debtors retaining only a reversionary interest in it. In re Miller, No. 05-25745, 2006 WL 3627745, *2-3 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2006).

However, Miller did not involve a security retainer, which the retainer in this case unquestionably is. See Appellee Br. 5 (quoting Wagers' and counsel's testimony that assignment was intended to pay for fees incurred in the proceeding, with remainder to be turned over to the trustee). Indeed, Miller's outcome would have been entirely different if it had involved a security retainer, in light of the Kansas requirement that client funds used for a security retainer do not become the property of the attorney until earned, and therefore must remain segregated. Nothing in Kansas law suggests that a client's funds can be treated differently depending on whether they consist of cash or assigned funds. Indeed, the bankruptcy court in this case drew no distinction between the two in its analysis. See App. 389.[10]

4. Substantive federal law imposed an affirmative obligation upon the law firm to turn over the pre-petition retainer to the chapter 7 trustee. 11 U.S.C. § 542(a); see also 11 U.S.C. § 362(a)(3). Because this section of the Code mandates turn over, the attorney cannot decline to follow it, keep the retainer, and use the estate funds it contains to pay for its post-petition work. Requiring all third parties, including attorneys, to comply with § 542(a) fosters important policy goals underlying the Code, while preserving debtors' ability to obtain counsel without resorting to the use of bankruptcy estate funds. First, in chapter 7

[10] If the assignment did indeed transfer "the Debtors' right, title, and interest" in the tax refunds to the law firm, as the bankruptcy court believed, App. 396, then the retainer would not in fact be a security retainer, but another type of retainer entirely. See supra note 2. But as stated above, the parties clearly intended the cash and assigned refund to serve as a security retainer.

bankruptcies, unlike other forms of bankruptcy protection, liquidation for the benefit of creditors is the primary objective, not further protection for debtors. See generally In re Equip. Servs., 290 F.3d at 744-45 (noting that in chapter 7 liquidation proceeding, "the Trustee is authorized to hire attorneys at estate expense as needed to help liquidate the estate, negating the need for the assistance of the debtor's attorney"; and that "a debtor's attorney cannot do the type of good work that could enlarge the estate in a Chapter 11 proceeding because a Chapter 7 proceeding is a zero-sum game").

Second, most of the legal and fact-finding work in an individual chapter 7 case is completed before the petition is filed and the estate is created. Thus, in Lamie, the Supreme Court quoted a bankruptcy treatise for the proposition that most debtors' counsel would accept a chapter 7 case only after being paid, pre-petition, an amount to cover the standard pre-petition fee and pre-petition filing costs. 540 U.S. at 537, citing Stanley B. Bernstein et al., Collier Compensation, Employment and Appointment of Trustees and Professionals in Bankruptcy Cases ¶ 3.02[1], p. 3-2 (2002); see also In re On-Line Servs. Ltd., 324 B.R. 342, 349 (8th Cir. BAP 2005) ("An attorney who accepts a Chapter 7 case on a flat fee basis may well be asked to later prove that the fee is a reasonable one, but once paid prepetition such fee is not an asset of the estate."); In re Griffin, 313 B.R. at 769 (noting that debtor could enter into limited pre-petition contract with counsel, that did not provide for any post-petition services).

And finally, debtors with post-petition income are free to pay counsel from their personal post-petition assets. A debtor could enter into a reaffirmation agreement with counsel, whereby the debtor would agree to pay counsel out of post-petition assets for bankruptcy services contracted for pre-petition, which would otherwise be discharged in bankruptcy. In re Griffin, 313 B.R. at 769. Or the debtor could simply contract separately, post-petition, for legal services as needed.

In any event, to the extent that "Congress has been delinquent in failing to deal expressly with the always-present problem of arranging in advance for the payment of services to be rendered after the filing in bankruptcy," In re Hines, 147 F.3d at 1189, that is a problem to be corrected by Congress rather than the courts. As the Seventh Circuit noted in a chapter 7 case, interpreting § 329, the Bankruptcy Code is a "complex compromise" among debtors and different kinds of creditors, of which the debtor's attorney is only one. "Judges are not entitled to override the legislative approach with a lawyer-centric public policy that puts members of their own social class higher in the priority list at the expense of other creditors, or of the debtors themselves." Bethea v. Adams, 352 F.3d 1125, 1128 (7th Cir. 2003), cert. denied, 541 U.S. 1043 (2004).

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should affirm the decision of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Tenth Circuit, reversing the decision of the Bankruptcy Court.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE'S MOTION TO DISMISS DUE TO UNTIMELY NOTICE OF APPEAL

The Plaintiff-Appellee, Daniel M. McDermott, United States Trustee[1] moves this Court

[1] The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. 28 U.S.C. §581(a)(21). The United States Trustee is authorized to object to the discharge of the debtor. 11 U.S.C. §727(c)(1).

for an order dismissing this appeal from the bankruptcy court order entered on July 7, 2010 denying his bankruptcy discharge due to lack of jurisdiction because defendant-appellant filed his Notice of Appeal on August 5, 2010, which is more than fourteen days after the bankruptcy court entered the order denying his bankruptcy discharge.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Jeffrey Allen Wallace ("debtor") filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code on September 12, 2008 (Bankruptcy Case No. 08-63006). (Bankr. Doc. 1).

On April 8, 2010, United States Trustee Daniel M. McDermott filed a complaint objecting to the discharge of the debtor pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(2), (a)(3) and (a)(4). (Adversary Doc. 1). The United States Trustee alleged that on his schedules and statements filed in the bankruptcy court, the debtor failed to identify (a) his 50% ownership interest in a business known as Alliance Baseball Academy LLC, d.b.a. Professional Baseball Academy; (b) his interest in an IRA; (c) transfers made to the IRA; and (d) the existence of a counterclaim asserted in the civil action, Alliance Baseball Academy vs. Jeffrey A. Wallace, et al., pending in Court of Common Pleas of Summit County, Case No.: 2008 CV2638. Further, the United States Trustee alleged that the debtor fraudulently obtained funds through checks written either to cash or himself, or through counter checks from Alliance Baseball Academy, LLC, or Professional Baseball Academy. Finally, the United States Trustee alleged that the debtor failed to keep documents, including books, records, and papers, from which his financial condition or the business transactions of Alliance Baseball Academy LLC might be ascertained.

After the filing of a motion for default judgment by the United States Trustee, the debtor submitted his answer to the complaint on June 15, 2009. (Adversary Doc. 14-Answer). On October 8, 2009, the Court entered an order granting leave to answer and denying the United States Trustee's motion for default judgment. (Adversary Doc. 18).

On June 23, 2009, the Bankruptcy Court issued its trial scheduling order, setting the complaint for evidentiary hearing. (Adversary Doc. 16). The debtor failed to comply with the scheduling order. On the eve of trial, the United States Trustee filed a Motion in Limine requesting that the debtor be prohibited from presenting a defense to the complaint as a result of his failure to comply with the Court's pre-trial scheduling order. (Adversary Doc. 25). On October 29, 2009, the Court issued an order denying debtor's discharge, which it amended a few days later to clarify that the debtor was denied a discharge. (Adversary Docs. 29, 31). Debtor filed a motion to vacate this judgment and to reset the complaint for trial. (Adversary Doc. 28) On March 9, 2010, the Court granted in part the motion to vacate, but in doing so assessed a $750 sanction against Chris Manos, counsel for the debtor, for his failure to comply with the Court's pre-trial scheduling order. (Adversary Doc. 37). The Court ultimately scheduled the complaint for trial on May 10, 2010. The trial was conducted over two days.

On July 7, 2010, the Court issued a six-page written opinion and accompanying order again granting judgment in favor of the United States Trustee and denying debtor's discharge under 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(2) and (a)(4). (Adversary Doc. 52, 53).

On August 5, 2010, 28 days after the entry of judgment, debtor filed a notice of appeal from this final judgment. (Adversary Doc. 56).

BRIEF IN SUPPORT

Under 28 U.S.C. § 158, this Court has jurisdiction to consider an appeal from a bankruptcy court only if the appeal is taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2). Under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a), a notice of appeal must be filed no later than 14 days after the entry of judgment. The time requirements imposed under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002 are jurisdictional and shall be strictly construed. Walker v. Bank of Cadiz (In re LBL Sports Center, Inc.), 684 F.2d 410 (6th Cir. 1982); Owens v. United States Bankruptcy Court, (In re Owens), 129 F.3d 1264 (Table),1997 WL 693555 (6th Cir. Oct. 31, 1997). This rule is uniformly followed. In re Herwit, 970 F.2d 709, 710 (10th Cir. 1992); In re Siemon, 421 F.3d 167,169 (2d Cir. 2005); In re Universal Minerals, Inc., 755 F.2d 309, 311 (3d Cir. 1985).

This case is govern by the Supreme Court case Bowles v. Russell, which held that if Congress established a time limit for taking an appeal in a statute, "that limitation is more than a simple 'claim-processing rule.'" Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. 205, 213 (2007). It is jurisdictional. Id. at 206; Ruiz-Martinez v. Mukasey, 516 F.3d 102, 118 (2d Cir. 2008) (quoting Bowles). See also In re Wiersma, 483 F.3d 933, 938 (9th Cir. 2007) ("[T]he failure to timely file a notice of appeal is a jurisdictional defect barring appellate review.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Without proper jurisdiction, a court does not have power to hear a case, and therefore "jurisdiction can never be forfeited or waived." United States v. Cotton, 535 U.S. 625, 630 (2002).

The Bowles holding applies to appeals in bankruptcy for two reasons. First, the Rule 8002(a) requirement that appeals be timely filed is incorporated into title 28. Section 158(c)(2) provides that appeals in bankruptcy shall be taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." This reference to Rule 8002 is located in the same section of the statute that grants district courts jurisdiction to hear bankruptcy appeals. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)-(b).

Because the time limitation is statutory, it is mandatory and jurisdictional.[2]

In this matter, the Bankruptcy Court's order on July 7, 2010 denying Mr. Wallace's discharge constitutes a final judgment. (Adversary Doc. 53); In re Basso, 397 B.R. 556, 562 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2000). Mr. Wallace filed his notice of appeal from the order denying discharge on August 5, 2010. (Adversary Doc. 56). To perfect his appeal from the order denying discharge, Mr. Wallace needed to file a notice of appeal no later than July 21, 2010. Mr. Wallace filed his appeal more than fourteen days after the order denying discharge was entered. As a result, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel is without jurisdiction over the appeal, and it should be dismissed. In re Linder, 215 B.R. 826, 832 (6 Cir. BAP 1998); Ultimate Appliance CC v. Kirby Co., 601 F. 3d 414 (6th Cir. 2010) (explaining that Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure time limits are mandatory).

CONCLUSION

In setting forth the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel, 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) requires adherence to the time periods established by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002. When a time period for perfecting a timely notice of appeal is set forth in a statute, it is jurisdictional. See Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. 205, 213 (2007). Because Mr. Wallace's notice of appeal was [2] Cf. Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 454 (2004) (holding that failure to comply with the time requirement in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004 did not affect the court's subject-matter jurisdiction). Critical to the Court's analysis in Kontrick was the fact that "[n]o statute . . . specifies a time limit for filing a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge." 540 U.S. at 448. That is not the case here. By contrast to the time limit in Bankruptcy Rule 4004, the time limit for appeals to the district court in bankruptcy cases derives from 28 U.S.C. § 158. See also Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. at 210 ("Although several of our recent decisions have undertaken to clarify the distinction between claims-processing rules and jurisdictional rules, none of them calls into question our longstanding treatment of statutory time limits for taking an appeal as jurisdictional.").

untimely, this Court lacks jurisdiction over the appeal and the appeal should be dismissed.

STATEMENT OF BASIS FOR APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The Bankruptcy Court had subject matter jurisdiction based on 28 U.S.C. § 1334 and 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1). The District Court has jurisdiction of this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

STATEMENT OF STANDARD OF REVIEW

The applicable standard of review on appeal from the Bankruptcy Court is that findings of fact shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. In re Merry-Go-Round Enter., Inc., 400 F.3d 219, 2005 WL 418692 (4th Cir. 2005). A bankruptcy court determination of fraud regarding discharges is reviewed for clear error. Williamson v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 828 F.2d 249, 251 (4th Cir.1987); Dean v. McDow, 299 B.R. 133,139 (E.D.Va.2003); Fed.R.Bankr.P. 8013.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Did the Bankruptcy Court Commit Clear Error in Revoking the Discharge of the Debtor, When the Preponderance of the Evidence Showed the Debtor Obtained His Discharge Through Fraud?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Charles E. Wamsley, Jr., the debtor/defendant/appellant, filed a voluntary petition for relief under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on September 11, 2002. The bankruptcy court converted the Chapter 11 reorganization case to a Chapter 7 liquidation case on March 31, 2003. Thereafter, the bankruptcy court granted the debtor a discharge on September 4, 2003.

After the debtor received his discharge from the bankruptcy court, the United States Trustee received information from the case trustee which indicated that there were grounds to revoke the discharge, on the basis that the discharge was obtained through the fraud of the debtor, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §727(d)(1). Thereafter, the United States Trustee filed a complaint in the bankruptcy court requesting that the bankruptcy court revoke the discharge of the debtor. The complaint set forth eight specific acts committed by the debtor that constituted fraud.

First, the debtor fraudulently transferred his interest in two parcels of real property within one year before the filing of the petition. Second, when the debtor filed his bankruptcy case, he failed to disclose the transfers of the real property in his statement of financial affairs and falsely stated under oath that he made no transfers of real property within one year before the petition date. Third, at his first meeting of creditors, the debtor: (1) falsely testified under oath that the statement of financial affairs was true and correct; and (2) falsely testified under oath that he had made no transfers of real property within one year prior to the petition date. Fourth, after the case was converted to a Chapter 7 liquidation, the debtor executed an amended statement of financial affairs and again failed to disclose the transfers of the real property and falsely stated under oath that he made no transfers of real property within one year before the petition date. Fifth, after the case converted to a Chapter 7 liquidation, the debtor appeared at a second meeting of creditors and (1) falsely testified under oath that the amended statement of financial affairs was true and correct, and (2) again falsely testified under oath that he had made no transfers of property within one year prior to the petition date. Sixth, after the case converted to Chapter 7 liquidation, the trustee took possession of and sold the machinery, equipment and tools listed by the debtor in his schedules; the debtor represented to the Trustee that this machinery, equipment and tools were the only machinery, equipment and tools owned by the debtor, when in fact the debtor also owned other machinery, equipment and tools that was not disclosed by the debtor to the trustee and was concealed from the trustee. Seven, prior to filing his bankruptcy petition, the debtor filed certain amended federal income tax returns that showed substantial tax overpayments and requested a refund of those overpayments. However, the debtor failed to disclose the pending refund in his original bankruptcy schedules and in his amended bankruptcy schedules that were each signed under oath. Furthermore, the debtor testified under oath at his first and second meetings of creditors that his schedules and amended schedules were true and correct, when in fact the schedules and amended schedules failed to disclose the pending tax refund. In fact, the debtor later received a substantial refund from the Internal Revenue Service in the amount of $54,432 and disposed of the funds instead of turning them over to the trustee as required by law.

The complaint alleged that, as a result of these actions, the debtor obtained his discharge by fraud, because the disclosure by the debtor of these actions prior to receiving the discharge would have been grounds for denial of the discharge before it was issued. A trial was held in the bankruptcy court, after which the court revoked the debtor’s discharge.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ERR IN REVOKING THE DISCHARGE OF THE DEBTOR, BECAUSE THE PREPONDERANCE OF THE EVIDENCE SHOWED THE DEBTOR OBTAINED HIS DISCHARGE THROUGH FRAUD

(A) A Debtor Has a Duty to Disclose Assets and Financial Affairs, and a Debtor Who Does Not Make Complete and Truthful Disclosures May Not Receive a Discharge or May Have the Discharge Revoked

The duty of disclosure is a basic prerequisite to obtaining a discharge in bankruptcy. In re Trinsey, 114 B.R.86,91(Bankr.E.D.Pa.1990). Bankruptcy trustees and creditors are entitled to know the extent of the debtor's assets which might have satisfied debts and the disposition of those assets. The trustee and creditors have a right to receive information that will allow them to evaluate the case and to administer the estate's property. In re Olbur, 314 B.R.732,744 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2004). As stated in In re Bren, 303 B.R. 610, 614 (8th Cir. BAP 2004): “Neither the trustee nor the creditors should be required to engage in a laborious tug-of-war to drag the simple truth into the glare of daylight.” Complete financial disclosure is therefore “a condition precedent to the privilege of discharge.” The duty of disclosure is critical with respect to two particular requirements imposed upon a debtor in bankruptcy.

First, a debtor is required to file schedules and a statement of financial affairs at the commencement of the case, in which the debtor is required to list all of his assets, liabilities, income, and expenses, and is required to make certain disclosures regarding his financial affairs. 11 U.S.C. §521(a); Fed.R.Bankr.P. 1007(b). That these schedules and statements must be true and correct is punctuated by the requirement that they be verified by the debtor. Fed.R.Bankr.P. 1008. The importance of having a debtor submit complete and accurate bankruptcy schedules is paramount; the bankruptcy system relies heavily on self-reporting by debtors. In re Mertz, 955 F.2d 596, 598 (8th Cir.1992)("[T]he petition, including schedules and statements, must be accurate and reliable, without the necessity of digging out and conducting independent examinations to get the facts.")

Second, a debtor is required to appear and to testify under oath at a meeting of creditors after the commencement of the case. 11 U.S.C. § 343. In addition, a debtor is required to appear and testify at another meeting of creditors if the case is converted to a case under another chapter of the bankruptcy code.

After a debtor files a bankruptcy petition, a debtor will normally receive a discharge of debts, which prohibits creditors from collecting those debts after the bankruptcy case is concluded. However, the bankruptcy court may not grant a debtor a discharge for a number of specific causes set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 727(a). One predominant cause for the court to deny a discharge is the fraudulent transfer, destruction, removal or concealment of property before or after the case is filed. 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2). In addition, a discharge may be denied if a debtor knowingly and fraudulently makes a false oath or account in the case. 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(A).

An action to deny the discharge is prosecuted in the bankruptcy court as an adversary proceeding pursuant to Fed.R.Bankr.P. 7001(4) and is commenced by filing a complaint. Fed.R.Bankr.P.7003. The complaint must be filed within 60 days after the first meeting of creditors. Fed.R.Bankr.P.4004(a). If no party objects to the discharge before that time period expires, the bankruptcy court must grant the discharge. Fed.R.Bankr.P. 4004(c). In this case, there was no objection to the debtor’ s discharge and the court granted the discharge.

There are times when there may be grounds to object to the discharge, but the grounds are not known to a party until after the discharge is granted. In such cases, the party may commence a proceeding to request that the bankruptcy court revoke the discharge pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 727(d). The statute provides that :

> On request of the trustee, a creditor, or the United States trustee, and after notice and a hearing, the court shall revoke a discharge granted under subsection (a) of this section if-
> (1) such discharge was obtained through the fraud of the debtor, and the requesting party did not know of such fraud until after the granting of such discharge;
>
> (2) the debtor acquired property that is property of the estate, or became entitled to acquire property that would be property of the estate, and knowingly and fraudulently failed to report the acquisition of or entitlement to such property, or to deliver or surrender such property to the trustee; or
> (3) the debtor committed an act specified in subsection (a)(6) of this section.

11 U.S.C. § 727(d).

An action to revoke a discharge is generally governed by many of the same procedural rules that apply to a proceeding to deny a discharge. The action is commenced in the bankruptcy court as an adversary proceeding pursuant to Fed.R.Bankr.P. 7001(4) and is commenced by filing a complaint. Fed.R.Bankr.P. 7003. If the complaint requests revocation of the discharge because the debtor obtained the discharge through fraud, the complaint must be filed within one year after the discharge is granted. 11 U.S.C. § 727(e)(1). In the proceeding, the party requesting revocation of the discharge has the burden of proof. Fed.R.Bankr.P. 4005 . In a discharge proceeding, the standard of proof is the preponderance of the evidence. Farouki v. Emirates Bank Intern., Ltd., 14 F.3d 244,249 (4th Cir.1994).

The revocation of a discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(d)(1) requires that the debtor must have committed a fraud which would have barred the discharge had the fraud been known prior to the discharge. In re Edmonds, 924 F.2d 176, 180 (10th Cir.1991). The fraud must have been discovered by the complaining party after the discharge. Id. In other words, fraud that would be grounds to revoke a discharge under § 727(d)(1) may be shown by the same grounds for denial of discharge under § 727(a). In re George, 179 B.R. 17, 22 (Bankr.W.D.N.Y.1995).

(B) There Was Sufficient Evidence That the Debtor Obtained His Discharge Through Fraud By Transferring His Interest in Two Parcels of Real Property With the Intent to Hinder, Delay or Defraud Creditors or the Trustee, as Set Forth in Count One of the Complaint.

The testimony and exhibits at trial clearly showed that the debtor fraudulently conveyed his interest in two parcels of real property within one year before he filed bankruptcy, which is grounds to deny a discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2)(A) or revoke a discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(d)(1). A discharge may be denied (or revoked) if "the debtor, with intent to hinder, delay or defraud a creditor or an officer of the estate charged with custody of property under this title, has transferred, removed, destroyed, mutilated or concealed ... (A) property of the debtor, within one year before the date of the filing of the petition . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2)(A).

The transfers of real property in this case were clearly fraudulent transfers. The evidence showed that debtor, on or about January 22, 2002, within one year prior to filing his bankruptcy petition on September 11, 2002, transferred his interest in two parcels of real estate in Tucker County, West Virginia. (U.S.Trustee's Exhibits 5 & 6; Trial Trans.P.87). The debtor transferred his interest in the first parcel to Susan G. Wamsley, as evidenced by a deed signed by Charles E. Wamsley on January 23, 2002 and recorded in the Tucker County Clerk's Office in Deed Book No. 170, at page 385, on January 28, 2002. (Trustee's Ex.5). The debtor transferred his interest in the second parcel to Michael Wamsley, as evidenced by a deed signed by Charles E. Wamsley on January 24, 2002, and recorded in the Tucker County Clerk's Office in Deed Book No. 170, at page 387, on January 28, 2002. (Trustee's Ex.6).

In order to determine that a transfer or conveyance is fraudulent, the courts have developed a number of indicia in bankruptcy cases. The factors indicating whether a transfer is fraudulent include: a close relationship between the transferor and transferee; the transfer is in anticipation of litigation; the debtor's financial condition at the time of transfer; the percentage of debtor's property that was transferred; the receipt of inadequate consideration for the transfer; and the debtor's continued use of property after the transfer. In re Kaiser, 722 F.2d 1574,1582-83 (2nd Cir.1983); In re Woodfield, 978 F.2d.516 (9th Cir.1992).

It has not been disputed that these transfers were made to related parties of the debtor, his wife and his brother. In addition, the transfers were made without consideration, evidenced by the testimony of the debtor at his meeting of creditors on June 4, 2003 conducted by the case trustee. (Trustee's Ex.4, Pg.20-22; Trial Trans.P.83-84) A presumption of fraudulent intent arises when transfers between related parties are made without adequate consideration, and this presumption shifts the burden of proof to debtor to establish the absence of fraudulent intent. Tavenner v. Smoot, 257 F.3d 401, 408 (4th Cir.2001). The record in this case clearly shows that the debtor did not carry the burden of proving the absence of fraudulent intent regarding these transfers.

These transfers hindered and delayed the trustee, in that they required the bankruptcy trustee to file complaints to commence proceedings to set aside the transfers and to recover the value of the property for the estate. (Trial Trans.P.88-89; Trustee's Ex.7). In addition, these transfers hindered at least one creditor, Heron Cove LLC, who obtained a judgment against the debtor in the Circuit Court of Garrett County, Maryland just days after these properties were transferred by the debtor. This fact was alleged in the complaint and admitted in the debtor's answer. The transfer of property shortly after the entry of a judgment is indicative of a fraudulent transfer. Ford v. Poston, 773 F.2d 52, 54 (4th Cir. 1985). It would be consistent that a transfer on the eve of judgment is also indicative of fraudulent intent.

The fraudulent nature of these transfers by the debtor is further evidenced by the fact that instead of disclosing the transfers as required by law, the debtor: (1) failed to disclose the transfers on his original Statement of Financial Affairs that was filed with the court on September 23, 2002; (2) denied that he made any pre-bankruptcy transfers in his testimony at his first meeting of creditors on October 22, 2002; (3) failed to disclose the transfers in his amended Statement of Financial Affairs that was filed with the court on May 22, 2003; (4) did not admit to the transfers at his second meeting of creditors on June 4, 2003, until he was confronted with specific questions about the transfers and confronted with the deeds. The failures to disclose the transfers is addressed in more detail below in Paragraph C.

At trial, the debtor denied that he had signed the deeds and denied knowledge of the deeds that transferred the properties transfers. He even denied knowing he had an interest in the properties at the time he filed bankruptcy. However, these were simply self-serving declarations at trial to save the debtor's discharge which were contradicted by prior sworn testimony of the debtor. At his second meeting of creditors, the debtor at first generally denied making any pre-bankruptcy transfers of real estate. (Trustees Ex.4, P.8),. But upon questioning by the trustee that included the specific facts of these transfers , the debtor finally admitted that he had transferred thee properties to his wife and brother. (Trustee's Ex.4,P.10; Trial Trans.P.82). In subsequent questioning by a creditor, the debtor was confronted with questions regarding the specific facts and the actual deeds and again admitted making the transfers. (Trustee's Ex.4, P.20-22.)(Trial Trans.P.86-87). More importantly, when the debtor was shown copies of the deeds at this second meeting, he did not dispute that the signatures on the deeds were his signatures. (Trial Ex.4,P.22; Trial Trans.P.86). And the debtor's signatures on those deeds were properly acknowledged by a notary public under seal. (Trustee's Ex.5, 6). It is interesting that there was no testimony from the notary public who acknowledged the signatures of Mr.

Wamsley and no testimony from Mrs. Wamsley who apparently co-signed the deeds with Mr. Wamsley.

In conclusion, there was sufficient evidence that the debtor transferred his interest in two parcels of real property within the year before he filed bankruptcy with the intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors or the trustee as set forth in Count One of the complaint.

(C) There Was Sufficient Evidence That the Debtor Obtained His Discharge Through Fraud by Making Multiple False Oaths Regarding the Fraudulent Transfers of Real Property, as Alleged in Count Two, Count Three, Count Four, and Count Five of the Complaint.

The testimony and exhibits at trial clearly showed that the debtor made multiple false oaths regarding his transfers of his interest in two parcels of real property, as described above in Paragraph B. Any one of these false oaths is grounds to deny a discharge under 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(4)(A) or to revoke a discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(d)(1). A discharge may be denied (or revoked) if the debtor knowingly and fraudulently, in or in connection with the case - (A) made a false oath or account." 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(A).

(1) The debtor failed to disclose the transfers of real estate on his original Statement of Financial Affairs that was filed with the Court on September 23, 2002. (Trustee's Ex.1). These statements included Question 10 - Other Transfers, which required the debtor to list all property transferred outside the ordinary course of business within one year preceding commencement of the case. The debtor answered that question by affirmatively stating "NONE." The debtor should have listed the real estate transfers that he made to his wife and his brother. As indicated above in Paragraph B, the debtor did in fact transfer his interest in two parcels of real property, within one year prior to the petition date. The debtor signed these Statements under penalty of perjury that he had read the answers contained in the Statements and that they were true and correct. Moreover, the debtor later testified at his first meeting of creditors that he signed these statements, that he had reviewed the statements and schedules before he signed them, and that everything on the statements was correct. (Trustee's Ex.2; Trial Trans.P.22-24). The debtor's false answer to Question 10 of the statement of financial affairs under penalty of perjury constituted a false oath.

(2) The debtor made a false oath at his first meeting of creditors held on October 22, 2002 pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 341 and testified under oath in response to questions by the U.S. Trustee and creditors. The debtor testified that he signed the original statement of financial affairs, that he had read them before he signed them, that everything in the statements was true and correct, and that there were no omissions from those statements or schedules. This statement was false, because the original statement of financial affairs was not correct and had omitted the transfers of real property, as described above in Paragraph B. At that same meeting, the debtor further testified under oath that (1) he had made no transfers of property within one year prior to the petition date, (2) at the time of the meeting, he still owned everything he owned in September of 2001, and (3) that he had not transferred anything to any of his relatives (Trustee’s Ex.2, P.66). In fact, the debtor had transferred his interest in two parcels of real property, within one year prior to the petition date, and the transfers were both to relatives. These false statements under oath at the first meeting of creditors constituted a false oath.

(3) After the case was converted to Chapter 7 and a bankruptcy trustee was appointed, the debtor executed an amended Statement of Financial Affairs that were filed with the Court on May 22, 2003. These amended statements were on the same forms and included the same questions as the original statements the debtor filed when he first filed his bankruptcy case, and which were discussed above in Paragraph 1. These amended Statements included Question 10 - Other Transfers, which required the debtor to list all property transferred outside the ordinary course of business within one year preceding commencement of the case. The debtor again answered that question by affirmatively stating “NONE.” As indicated in Paragraph B above, the defendant did in fact transfer his interest in two parcels of real property, within one year prior to the petition date. The debtor again signed these amended statements under penalty of perjury that he had read the answers contained in the Statements and that they were true and correct. The false answer to Question 10 of the amended Statement of Financial Affairs under penalty of perjury constituted a false oath. Furthermore, the debtor testified at his second meeting of creditors regarding these amended statements, and testified under oath that he signed these statements, that he had reviewed the statements before he signed them, and that everything on the statements was correct. (Trustee's Ex.4; Trial Trans.P.22-24).

(4) The debtor again made several false oaths regarding the fraudulent transfers at his second meeting of creditors. After the Chapter 11 case was converted to Chapter 7, the debtor appeared at a second meeting of creditors conducted by the Chapter 7 trustee on June 4, 2003 and testified under oath. The debtor testified that he signed the amended statement of financial affairs, that he had read the amended statement of financial affairs before he signed them, that everything in the statements was true and correct, and that there were no omissions from those statements or schedules. (Trustee's Ex.4, P.7). This statement was false, because the amended statement of financial affairs was not correct and had omitted the transfers of real property, as described above in Paragraph B. Later in the meeting, the debtor specifically testified under oath that he had not owned any real estate in the last four years, other than what was listed on the schedules and amended schedules. (Trustee's Ex. 4, P.8). This statement was false, because the defendant did in fact own other real property in the last four years and had transferred his interest in two parcels of real property within one year prior to the petition date, as shown above in Paragraph B.

The complaint alleges four instances where the debtor made a false oath. In order to prove a debtor obtained a discharge by fraud by making a false oath, it must be shown that (1) the debtor knowingly and fraudulently made a false oath in or in connection with the bankruptcy proceeding, and (2) the oath concerned a material fact. Williamson v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 828 F.2d 249 (4th Cir.1987). The requirement that a false oath has been made "fraudulently" may be satisfied in one of two ways. First, fraudulent intent may be established by circumstantial evidence, or by inference drawn from a course of conduct. Second, proof of a "reckless indifference to the truth" constitutes the "functional equivalent of fraud." In re Hatton, 204 B.R. 477, 484 (E.D.Va.1997). Because a determination regarding fraudulent intent depends largely upon an assessment of the credibility and demeanor of the debtor, deference to the bankruptcy court's findings is particularly appropriate. Williamson v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 828 F.2d 249, 252 (4th Cir.1987).

The evidence presented at the trial in this case would easily support the second method of finding fraudulent intent. While any single omission or error may be the result of an innocent mistake, multiple inaccuracies are evidence of a pattern of reckless and cavalier disregard for the truth serious enough to supply the necessary fraudulent intent required by 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(A). In re Hatton, 204 B.R. at 484; Dean v. McDow, 299 B.R. 133, 140 (E.D.Va.2003). In this proceeding, there was more than sufficient evidence to show that the debtor knew of the transfers, that the transfers were presumed fraudulent and were in fact fraudulent. The omission of valuable assets from bankruptcy schedules is a material fact. Id. The property interests transferred by the debtor were valuable and material assets; the fraudulent conveyance proceeding initiated by the trustee recovered $24,832 for the bankruptcy estate and its creditors. (Trial Trans.P.91).

At trial, the debtor defended the omission of these transfers from his statement of financial affairs and his testimony at the meetings of creditors by denying that he had signed the deeds and by denying that he had knowledge of the deeds when he filed bankruptcy, reviewed his statements and testified at the meetings. He further testified that he did not even know he had an interest in the properties at the time he filed bankruptcy. However, these were simply self-serving declarations at trial to save the debtor’s discharge which were contradicted by the deeds prior sworn testimony of the debtor. At his second meeting of creditors, the debtor at first generally denied making any pre-bankruptcy transfers of real estate. (Trial Ex.4, Pg.8),. But upon questioning by the trustee that included the specific facts of these transfers , the debtor finally admitted that he had transferred thee properties to his wife and brother. (Trial Ex.4, Pg.10), (Trial Trans. Pg.82). In subsequent questioning at the second meeting by a creditor, the debtor was confronted with questions regarding the specific facts and the actual deeds and again admitted making the transfers. (Trial Ex.4, Pg.20-22, Trial Trans. P. 86,87). More importantly, when the debtor was shown copies of the deeds at this second meeting, he did not dispute that the signatures on the deeds were his signatures. (Trial Ex.4, Pg 22; Trial Trans. P. 86). And the debtor’s signatures on those deeds were properly acknowledged by a notary public under seal. (Trial Ex.5, 6). It is interesting that there was no testimony from the notary public who acknowledged the signatures of Mr. Wamsley and no testimony from Mrs. Wamsley who apparently co-signed the deeds with Mr. Wamsley.

The debtor has also asserted that many of his omissions from his schedules and statements were the fault of his first attorney. This defense is not supported by the facts or the law. The debtor’s first attorney who prepared the statements testified at trial that when he prepared the statements he was not aware of the transfers. (Trial Trans. P.143-144). Furthermore, even if the attorney failed to list the transfers on the statements, the debtor had the opportunity to bring those omissions to the attention of his attorney before he signed them and had the opportunity to bring those omissions to the attention of the U.S. Trustee at the first meeting of creditors or of the case trustee at the second meeting of creditors, when he was asked about the information in those statements and was specifically asked about transfers of real estate. When a debtor has declared under penalty of perjury that he has read his petition and schedules and that they are true and correct, the debtor--not his lawyer--is accountable for any errors and omissions. In re Olbur, 314 B.R. 732, (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2004).

The inference may be drawn from the record in this case that the debtor may not have thoroughly read or paid attention to his schedules and statements before he read them, contrary to his verification on those documents and contrary to his testimony at his meeting of creditors that he did read them. But a debtor who does not read his schedules or does not pay close attention to the schedules before he signs them emphasizes rather than undermines fraudulent intent, and corroborates evidence that the debtor wilfully made a false oath within the meaning of § 727(a)(4)(A). Dean v. McDow, 299 B.R. 133.139 (E.D.Va.2003).

Finally, the debtor’s brief focuses on the statement of the bankruptcy judge when ruling from the bench that the judge did not think the debtor lied and did not commit perjury. The meaning of those statements is not clear in relation to the false oath allegations. However, the context of the statement indicates the judge was more concerned with the overall nature of the case rather than focus on each individual allegation. (Trial Trans.P.266). It certainly cannot be construed as a finding that the debtor did not make false oath as alleged in the complaint.

In conclusion, there was sufficient evidence that the debtor made multiple false oaths in failing to disclose the fraudulent transfers of real property in each of the above instances within the meaning of § 727(a)(4)(A), in his original statements of financial affairs, at his first meeting of creditors, on his amended statement of financial affairs, and at his second meeting of creditors, as alleged in Count 2, Count 3, Count 4 and Count 5 of the complaint.

(E) There was sufficient evidence that the debtor obtained his discharge through fraud by making several false oaths in his original Schedule B and in his amended Schedule B that he owned no tax refund, and by further testifying under oath at his meeting of creditors that the Schedules were true and correct, as alleged in Count Seven of the complaint.

The testimony and exhibits at trial clearly showed that the debtor made multiple false oaths when he failed to disclose his right to receive a tax refund that was property of the estate. Any one of these false oaths is grounds to deny a discharge under 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(4)(A) or revoke a discharge under 11 U.S.C. §727(d)(1). A discharge may be denied (or revoked) if "the debtor knowingly and fraudulently, in or in connection with the case - (A) made a false oath or account . . . .." 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(A).

There is no dispute that the defendant filed amended federal income tax returns for the years 1999 and 2000 in November 2001, prior to filing his bankruptcy petition and schedules. There is no dispute that these amended tax returns showed an overpayment of federal income tax for those two years that entitled the debtor to a refund. (Trustee's Ex.14,15). There is no dispute that the debtor failed to disclose the potential tax refunds on his first bankruptcy schedules and his amended bankruptcy schedules. There is no dispute that in October 2003, after the debtor had received his discharge, the debtor received that refund from the Internal Revenue Service. (Trustee's Ex.14,15). There is no dispute that, when the bankruptcy trustee learned of the refund, he commenced proceedings against the debtor and against his wife to recover the tax refund for the bankruptcy estate. In those proceedings, the Court determined that (1) the tax refund was property of the bankruptcy estate of the debtor; (2) the defendant and his wife, Susan Wamsley, received the tax refund and transferred the funds to a third party (Parsons Woodworking, LLC) instead of transferring the funds to the bankruptcy estate. (Trustee's Ex.18).

When the defendant signed his original schedules, he had already filed the amended tax returns that requested refunds. The debtor was required to disclose all liquidated, contingent and unliquidated debts, specifically including tax refunds. In response to Schedule B, Question 17 regarding tax refunds, the debtor answered by affirmatively stating "NONE" and did not disclose his pending tax refund. (Trustee's Ex.1,Sch.B). The debtor signed these schedules under penalty of perjury that he had read the answers contained in the schedules and that they were true and correct. This was clearly a false oath regarding the tax refund.

After the debtor filed his petition and schedules, he appeared at his first meeting of creditors and testified under oath that his schedules were true and correct. (Trial Trans.P.25; Trustee's Ex.2, P.7-8). This is another false oath: as shown above, the schedules were not correct because they contained a false statement that the debtor was not entitled to a tax refund.

Thereafter, when the case was converted from Chapter 11 to Chapter 7, the debtor amended his bankruptcy schedules. But the debtor again answered Question 17 regarding tax refunds by affirmatively stating "NONE" and did not disclose his pending tax refund. (Trustee's Ex.3,Sch.B). The debtor signed these amended schedules under penalty of perjury. These written declarations have the force and effect of oaths. This was clearly another false oath regarding the tax refunds.

After the case was converted to Chapter 7 and the debtor amended his bankruptcy schedules, the debtor appeared at his second meeting of creditors and testified under oath that his amended schedules were true and correct. (Trial Trans.P.64-65; Trustee's Ex.4,P.7-8). This is another false oath: as shown above, the amended schedules were not true and correct because they contained a false statement that the debtor was not entitled to a tax refund.

The debtor had a number of opportunities to correct the omission of the tax refund from his schedules, but never did so. He could have corrected the schedules when questioned about them at his first meeting of creditors. He did not. He could have corrected the omission when he executed his amended schedules. He did not. Instead of correcting the omission, he perpetuated it by again omitting the tax refund. He could have corrected the omission at his second meeting of creditors before the case trustee. He did not. Instead of correcting it he testified that the schedules were in fact true and correct.

A debtor is required to disclose on his schedules any tax refunds to which he may be entitled. Mertz v. Rott, 955 F.2d 596 (8th Cir. 1992). For such a false oath to bar a discharge, the false statement must be "material" and the failure to disclose a tax refund is a material omission that can provide the basis for a false oath that will bar a bankruptcy discharge. Id.

In Mertz, the Court upheld the denial of a discharge for omission of a tax refund, and in determining whether the omission was intentional found it significant that the debtor "has given three false oaths and has had not one opportunity, but three opportunities to correct any errors or omissions." Id, at 598.

The debtor has again attempted to blame these omissions and false oaths on his first attorney. However, even if a debtor's attorney does not ask him about tax refunds, it is not reasonable for a debtor to rely on that failure. See In re Colvin, 288 B.R. 477 (Bankr. E.D.Mich.2003). In Colvin, the Court found the debtor's failure to disclose a tax refund was an intentional concealment, and based its finding on the fact that the debtor's schedules clearly require a debtor to disclose tax refunds, that the debtor had stated under penalty of perjury that they had no tax refunds, and had stated that they had read the schedules and that they were true. Again, when a debtor has declared under penalty of perjury that he has read his petition and schedules and that they are true and correct, the debtor--not his lawyer--is accountable for any errors and omissions. In re Olbur, 314 B.R. 732, (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2004).

The debtor testified at his meeting of creditors that he did not believe he was going to receive the tax refund, because he believed the Internal Revenue Service would offset the refund against other tax obligations the debtor owed to the IRS. This belief, even if true, is not a defense to the debtor's failure to disclose the refund in his schedules. In this case, after the debtor filed his schedules and amended schedules, and after he testified at his two meetings of creditors, the debtor received the tax refunds that he had requested in the amended tax returns he had filed prior to his bankruptcy.

The bankruptcy court, in revoking the debtor's discharge, gave great weight to the fact that the debtor retained the refund and signed the check over to his wife, who used it in her business. The debtor, if he truly believed he was not entitled to the refund, would have contacted someone regarding this error, whether it be his attorney, his accountant, the trustee, or the IRS revenue officer. The fact the debtor failed to disclose the refund even after its receipt clearly indicates the fraudulent nature of his failure to disclose the refund during his case. In re Reese, 203 B.R. 425 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.1997).

The bankruptcy code specifically provides that a debtor's discharge may be revoked if the debtor acquires property of the (bankruptcy) estate and knowingly and fraudulently fails to report the acquisition of such property or fails to deliver or surrender such property to the trustee. 11 U.S.C. § 727(d)(2). A tax refund for pre-bankruptcy periods but receivable by the debtor after filing bankruptcy is property of the bankruptcy estate. Segal v. Rochell, 382 U.S. 375, 86 S.Ct. 511, 15 L.Ed.2d 428 (1966). The complaint filed by the U.S. Trustee did not specifically plead this ground for revoking the debtor's discharge. But the statute makes it clear that a debtor who receives property of the estate has a duty to report it to the trustee and to turn the property over to the trustee. The debtor clearly violated both of these duties when he failed to report the unexpected tax refund, failed to turn it over to the trustee, and instead diverted it to his wife. This behavior by the debtor is clearly grounds to revoke a discharge. In re Reese, 203 B.R. 425 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.1997). But more importantly, it sheds a great deal of light on the debtor's fraudulent intent in failing to disclose the tax refund in his bankruptcy schedules, as alleged in Count VI of the complaint.

In conclusion, there was ample evidence at trial that the debtor obtained his discharge through fraud by making several false oaths in his original Schedule B and in his amended Schedule B that he was owed no tax refund, and by further testifying under oath at his meeting of creditors that the Schedules were true and correct, as alleged in Count Seven of the complaint.

(F) There was sufficient evidence that the debtor obtained his discharge through fraud by concealing tools and equipment as alleged in Count Six of the complaint.

The testimony and exhibits at trial clearly showed that the debtor concealed a substantial amount of machinery tools and equipment, which is grounds to deny a discharge under 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(2) or revoke a discharge under 11 U.S.C. §727(d)(1). A discharge may be denied (or revoked) if “the debtor, with intent to hinder, delay or defraud a creditor or an officer of the estate charged with custody of property under this title, has transferred, removed, destroyed, mutilated or concealed ... (B) property of the estate, after the date of the filing of the petition . . . .” 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2).

At the beginning of the case, the debtor filed original schedules that listed only 7 items of machinery and equipment valued at $100,000. (Trustee’s Ex.1, Sch.B). The debtor signed the schedules under penalty of perjury that he had read them and that they were true and correct.

Later, at his meeting of creditors, the debtor testified under oath that he had signed the schedules, that he read them before he signed them and that they were true and correct. (Trustee's Ex.2, P.7-8). At that meeting, there was testimony regarding tools and equipment, and the debtor referred to the items that he had listed on original Schedule B and testified that "That is basically all the equipment." When the U.S. Trustee suggested that his business should have additional items, the debtor merely stated there were also a few miter boxes and table saws. (Trustee's Ex.2, P.62)

After the case was converted to Chapter 7, the trustee employed an auctioneer who visited the debtors business premises and, with the debtor's assistance, took possession of what the trustee and auctioneer thought was all of the machinery, equipment and tools owned by the debtor. (Trial Trans.P.59-61). Moreover, the auctioneer relied upon the debtor to designate what items belonged to the debtor and what items did not belong to the debtor. (Trial Trans.P.171-172, 177). But instead of the seven items the debtor had disclosed on the original schedules, the trustee's auctioneer collected and offered for sale over 300 items of machinery, equipment and tools. (Trial Trans.P.60-61). These items brought over $168,710 at the auction. (Trial Trans.P.79). These items are itemized on the trustee's motion to approve the sale. (Trustee's Ex. 10). The machinery, equipment and tools actually recovered by the trustee from the debtor's business premises far exceeded the seven items the debtor had listed on his bankruptcy schedules, and that the original schedules omitted a material amount of machinery tools and equipment.

After the Chapter 7 trustee conducted his auction of 300+ items that the debtor had turned over to the auctioneer, the trustee learned that not all of the debtor's machinery tools and equipment had been turned over by the debtor and included in the first sale. The trustee's auctioneer then visited the debtor's premises and two other locations, pursuant to a Court order, and collected additional items of tools and equipment that were not previously turned over for the first auction. (Trial Trans.P.75-6, Trans.P.179). These additional items were (1) items that were left over from the first sale, (2) items that were recovered from a garage or storage facility, and (2) items that were recovered from a truck. Trans P.179. This second group of over 315 additional pieces is itemized on the auctioneer's inventory. (Trial Trans.P.80; Trustee's Ex.12).

It can be concluded from this evidence that the debtor did not disclose a substantial amount of his machinery, tools, and equipment on his original bankruptcy schedules. It can also be concluded that the debtor did not disclose all of this unlisted machinery tools and equipment to the U.S. Trustee at the first meeting of creditors. Furthermore, is can also be concluded from the evidence that when the trustee and his auctioneer visited the debtor's business premises to collect and inventory the machinery, tools and equipment for sale, the debtor while appearing to be cooperative, did not turn over all of the tools and equipment, specifically including those items not located on the business premises that the trustee discovered in a storage facility and vehicle located away from the business premises.

The concealment of assets as a basis for denial or revocation of a bankruptcy discharge includes conduct, such as placing assets beyond the reach of creditors or withholding knowledge of the assets by failure or refusal to divulge information. "Concealment ··· includes preventing discovery, fraudulently transferring or withholding knowledge or information required by law to be made known." United States v. Turner, 725 F.2d 1154, 1157 (8th Cir.1999); In re Scott, 172 F.3d 959 (7th Cir.1984). In this case, the debtor concealed a substantial amount of machinery, tools and equipment by (1) failing to disclose them on the schedules, (2) failing to disclose them to the U.S. Trustee at the first meeting of creditors, even after being prompted; and (3) most importantly, failing to disclose them and turn them over to the trustee and his auctioneer when they were collected for the first auction. The assets that were concealed were material, over 500 items of tools ane equipment valued at over $100,000.

The debtor offered several defenses at trial. There was much testimony from the debtor and his brother as to why all the debtors tools and equipment were not sold by the trustee at the first auction. There was some testimony that the debtor believed some of the assets did not belong to corporation he owned. (Trial Trans.P.153). But this testimony is clearly contradicted by the debtor's prior testimony at the two meetings of creditors where he firmly testified that his corporations did not own any personal property such as machinery, tools, and equipment. There was also some testimony that the debtor did not turn over to the trustee items that he believed were exempt under the bankruptcy law. However, under the bankruptcy law, a debtor is required to list all of his assets on his bankruptcy schedules, and it does not absolve the debtor who fails to disclose assets he believes might be exempt and not subject to sale by the trustee.

As a general rule, the materiality and intent of an omission is not lessened by the fact that the believes the concealed assets might be exempt, as all assets must be disclosed by a debtor. Mertz v. Rott, 955 F.2d 596,598 (8th Cir.1992); Morris Plan Industrial Bank v. Finn, 149 F.2d 591, 592 (2d Cir.1945).

The extent of the concealment can be most vividly seen by comparing the debtor's original schedules that listed only 7 items of machinery tools, and equipment, with the two inventories of items recovered and sold by the trustee at the two auction sales. It is obvious from that comparison that the debtor failed to disclose and concealed a substantial amount of tools and equipment. The debtor's assertions as to why particular items were not sold by the trustee does not save the fact that the debtor failed to disclose numerous items on his schedules or at his meetings of creditors.

After the case was converted to Chapter 7, the debtor filed amended schedules (Trustee Ex.3). The debtor also signed these amended schedules under penalty of perjury that he had read them and that they were true and correct. This time on Schedule B, Question 24 the debtor listed 28 items of machinery, tools and equipment. The debtor listed the seven items that had been listed on the first schedules, and added an additional 21 items. (Trustee's Ex.3, Sch.B.).

Thereafter, on the defendant appeared at the second meeting of creditors and testified under oath that he had signed the amended schedules, that he had reviewed the amended schedules before he had signed them, that they reflected all of his assets and where they are located, and that he listed all of his equipment. (Trial Ex. 4, Pg.7).

In conclusion, there was sufficient evidence at trial that the debtor obtained his discharge through fraud by concealing substantial machinery, tools, and equipment, by failing to disclose those items on his original Schedule B and in his amended Schedule B, by failing to disclose those items at his first and second meeting of creditors, and by failing to turn those items over to the trustee when the trustee was collecting and inventorying the debtors assets for the first auction, as alleged in Count Seven of the complaint.

CONCLUSION

Based upon the foregoing, the United States Trustee requests that this Court enter an order sustaining the Bankruptcy Court's order revoking the discharge of the debtor, and for such additional or other relief as the Court may deem appropriate.

Appellant,

v.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE AND DIANE REED, CHAPTER 11 TRUSTEE, Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLEE

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

On appeal is the district court's order affirming the bankruptcy court's September 17, 2004 order denying Ward's motion to be employed nunc pro tunc under 11 U.S. § 327(a*)*, denying his application for fees under 11 U.S.C. § 330, and ordering the disgorgement of $63,297.72 in fees. Record on Appeal ("R."), Volume ("V.") 2 at 453-458, and R., V.1 at 249 through V. 2 at 261.

Lloyd Ward and Associates P.C. ("Ward") presents four issues on appeal from the district court's decision:

1. Whether the district court erred in affirming that the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to review attorney's fees incurred by counsel after confirmation of the Debtor's plan of confirmation.

2. Whether the district court erred in affirming that the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to order the filing of employment and fee applications nunc pro tunc for professional work performed between the confirmation of the Debtor's plan of reorganization and the revocation of the order of confirmation.

3. Whether the district court erred in finding that the defects in the order revoking confirmation were irrelevant.

4. Whether the district court erred in failing to find that the bankruptcy court denied Ward due process by ordering the filing of a nunc pro tunc application for employment and payment of fees and not an adversarial proceeding.

R., V. 2 at 470-471.

This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d) to review the district court’s findings for issues one, two, and four. The district court had jurisdiction to review these issues on appeal from the bankruptcy court’s decision under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c).

This Court and the district court do not have jurisdiction over the merits of the appeal on Ward’s third issue because Ward failed to timely appeal the bankruptcy court’s March 4, 2004 order revoking the order of confirmation. R.,V. 2 at 461-463. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 8002. When a district court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, a circuit court of appeals also lacks jurisdiction. See Don Vincente Macias, Inc. v. Texas Gulf Trawling Co., Inc. (In re Don Vincente Macias, Inc.), 168 F.3d 209, 211 (5th Cir. 1999).

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a) and (b) to hear the underlying case, a voluntary petition and plan of reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 1101, et seq. See also 28 U.S.C. § 151, § 1334. The bankruptcy court’s September 17, 2004 decision constituted a final and immediately appealable order. R., V. 1 at 249 through V.2 at 261. See In re Koch, 109 F.3d 1285, 1287 (8th Cir. 1997); In re Christian, 804 F.2d 46 (3rd Cir. 1986).

Ward challenges the bankruptcy court’s subject matter jurisdiction with regard to its authority to review Ward’s post-confirmation employment and fees (Issues one and two). R., V. 2 at 470. The issue of subject matter jurisdiction will be addressed in the Argument section, p. _____.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

The issues presented by Ward on appeal are described in the Jurisdiction section of this brief. These issues may be restated as follows:

1. Did the bankruptcy court have authority under 11 U.S.C. § 327 to disqualify Ward’s representation of the Debtor between the time of his retention and effective date of the plan of reorganization?

2. Did the bankruptcy court have authority to review Ward’s employment and fees for the period between the effective date of the plan and the date the order of confirmation was revoked for fraud under 11 U.S.C. § 1144?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Network Cancer Care, Inc. (“Debtor”) and its president and chief share holder, Dr. Odette Campbell, retained Lloyd Ward and Associates, P.C. (“Ward”) as counsel after the confirmation of the Debtor’s second amended chapter 11 plan of reorganization. Ward did not file a motion to be employed with the court under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) nor did he file a statement of compensation under Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 2016(b). In his capacity as counsel, Ward represented both the Debtor and Dr. Campbell in a real estate transaction transferring the Debtor’s largest asset, a cancer care center in Plano, to a third party entity called Plano Cancer Network, L.P. (“Plano Network”). Plano Network in turn was controlled by a trust set up for the benefit of Dr. Campbell’s minor children. The Debtor received no consideration for this transaction and even guaranteed a secured loan taken out by Plano Network to pay off the lien against the transferred property. Ward received $63,297.72 in fees for these and other services for the period October 14, 2003 through February 9, 2004.

Because of the transfer of the Plano property and the Debtor’s failure to retain new management pursuant to the plan, the Bankruptcy Court revoked the order of confirmation under 11 U.S.C. § 1144. Prior to the revocation of the order of confirmation, the United States Trustee had filed a motion to disqualify Ward as counsel and for disgorgement of his fees. After revocation, the bankruptcy court entered an agreed order in which Ward agreed to 1. file a motion for be employed nunc pro tunc under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a); 2. file an application for compensation under 11 U.S.C. § 330; and 3. file a statement of compensation under Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 2016(b).

Ward subsequently filed a motion for employment under § 327(a) and an application for compensation under § 330 but did not file a Rule 2016(b) statement. In his motion and application, Ward challenged the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction over his employment and fees. On September 17, 2004, the bankruptcy court denied Ward's motion and application and ordered the disgorgement of $63,297.72 in compensation. Ward appealed the bankruptcy court's order to the district court, which the district court then affirmed. Ward has appealed the district court's order to this Court.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. Statutory and Regulatory Background

a. The Chapter 11 Debtor-in-Possession.

A person seeking bankruptcy protection may file a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 1101, et seq. Chapter 11 bankruptcy allows a debtor to continue operating its business while restructuring its debts. See 11 U.S.C. § 1108.

Upon filing its petition, a chapter 11 debtor becomes a debtor-in-possession with virtually all of the rights, powers, and duties of a trustee. See 11 U.S.C. § 1101 (1) and § 1107. At filing, the debtor's assets are transferred to a new legal entity: the bankruptcy "estate." See 11 U.S.C. § 541(a). Unless the bankruptcy court appoints a Chapter 11 trustee, the debtor-in-possession administers the estate for the benefit of its creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 1104 and § 1107. Because a debtor-in-possession has the rights and duties of a trustee, it owes a fiduciary duty to both the bankruptcy estate and the court. CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355, 105 S.Ct. 1986, 1994 (1985)("The willingness of courts to leave debtors-in-possession is premised upon an assurance that the officers and managing employees can be depended upon to carry out the fiduciary responsibilities of a trustee.")(quoting Wolf v. Weinstein, 372 U.S. 633, 651 (1963).

b. Retention of Professionals.

The debtor-in-possession may retain professionals to assist with these administrative duties under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a), which provides:

> Except as otherwise provided in this section, the trustee, with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys, accountants, appraisers, auctioneers, or other professional persons, that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title.

"Disinterested" persons have no "interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or any class of creditors, ..., by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor, ..., or for any other reason." See 11 U.S.C. § 101(14) and § 327(a).

Any attorney representing a debtor in connection with a bankruptcy case must also file a statement with the court disclosing the dates, amounts, and source of payments received. See 11 U.S.C. § 329(a) and Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 2016. An attorney retained by a Chapter 11 debtor-in-possession is therefore subject to both 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) and § 329 because of the debtor-in-possession's dual status as debtor and trustee.

A professional retained under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) must file a fee application with the bankruptcy court prior to being paid from the estate. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Professionals who are not qualified for employment under § 327(a) cannot be paid from the estate. 11 U.S.C. § 330; Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 538-39, 124 S.Ct. 1023, 1032 (2004). Disgorged fees are to be paid back into the estate if those funds either 1) would have been property of the estate or 2) were to have been paid on behalf of the Debtor under a Chapter 11 plan of reorganization. 11 U.S.C. § 329(b)(1).

c. Confirmation of Chapter 11 Plan of Reorganization.

The debtor-in-possession or a party in interest may file a plan of reorganization which provides for the payment of creditors. 11 U.S.C. § 1121 and § 1123. The plan is submitted to creditors for voting. 11 U.S.C. § 1126. After voting, the bankruptcy court then conducts a confirmation hearing to determine whether the plan complies with the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 1128 and § 1129. If the plan has received enough votes and comports with 11 U.S.C. § 1129, the bankruptcy court may enter an order confirming the plan.

Confirmation of a plan of reorganization typically vests the assets of the estate into the reorganized debtor, thereby terminating the bankruptcy estate. 11 U.S.C. § 1141(b). A plan of reorganization may specifically provide, however, that the estate vest in the reorganized debtor on a date other than confirmation. Id. This vesting date is typically called the "effective date" in many plans of reorganization.

After confirmation and the vesting of the estate in the reorganized debtor, the bankruptcy court's involvement in monitoring the chapter 11 case is reduced. See Bank of Louisiana v. Craig's Stores of Texas, Inc. (In re Craig's Stores of Texas, Inc.), 266 F.3d 388, 390[1] (5th Cir. 2001). The bankruptcy court still retains power, however, to ensure that the reorganized debtor carries out the confirmed plan and to comply with its orders. 11 U.S.C. § 1142.

d. Revocation of Confirmation.

[1] "After a Debtor's reorganization plan has been confirmed, the Debtor's estate, and thus bankruptcy jurisdiction, ceases to exist, other than for matters pertaining to the implementation or execution of the plan." Craig's Stores, 266 F.3d at 390. While the estate typically ceases upon confirmation once the estate vests in the reorganized Debtor, the plan may provide otherwise as discussed within. 11 U.S.C. § 1142(b). It is the United States Trustee's position that the estate ceases upon transfer of assets to the reorganized Debtor and not confirmation itself per

The bankruptcy court may revoke an order of confirmation if such order was procured by fraud. 11 U.S.C. § 1144. A bankruptcy court merely needs to find the debtor acted fraudulently to revoke; the bankruptcy court need not find that a creditor relied on such fraud. See Tenn-Fla Partners v. First Union National Bank of Florida (In re Tenn-Fla Partners), 229 B.R. 720, 729-730 (W.D. Tenn. 1999) aff'd by 226 F.3d 746 (6th Cir. 2000). Fraud on the court is defined as "a fraud perpetrated by officers of the court so that the judicial machinery cannot perform in the usual manner its impartial task of adjudging cases that are presented for adjudication." Harbold v. Commissioner, 51 F.3d 618, 622 (6th Cir. 1995). A debtor-in-possession would be deemed an officer of the court because of its status as a fiduciary of the estate.

II. The Present Litigation

a. The Bankruptcy Proceedings

Network Cancer Care, L.P. ("Debtor") filed its voluntary chapter 11 petition on October 26, 2002. At the time of filing, the Debtor operated three cancer treatment facilities, one each in Plano, Irving, and Denton, Texas. The Debtor owned the real estate at its location in Plano, and leased the other two locations. Dr. Odette Campbell, the principal officer of the Debtor, is a medical doctor who treated cancer patients at the Debtor's facilities.

After several contested hearings, the Court entered the order confirming the Debtor's Modified Second Amended Chapter 11 Plan ("Plan") on September 26, 2003[2]. R., V.1 at 214-16. A key provision of the Plan was that Dr. Campbell would no longer be involved in the management of the Debtor but would still be permitted to provide services as a medical doctor. R., V. 1 at 206-207.

Paragraph 8.1 of the Plan provided that “[u]ntil this Reorganization Case is closed, the Bankruptcy Court shall retain such jurisdiction as is legally permissible, including that which is necessary to insure that the purpose and intent of this plan is carried out….” R., V. 1 at 209.

The Plan also provided that its effective date was thirty days after entry of the confirmation order, and that the confirmation date was the date of the entry of a "Final Order" of confirmation. R., V. 1 at 180. The Plan defined a "Final Order" as an order as to which the time for appeal has expired. R., V. 1 at 180. The court entered the order of confirmation on September 26, 2003, so the order was final ten days later on October 6, 2003. R., V. 1 at 214-216. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 8002(a)(notice of appeal must be filed with the clerk within ten days of entry of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from). The "Reorganized Debtor" assumed assets and liabilities on the effective date under Plan Paragraph 5.1. R., V.1 at 203.

[2] The Court actually signed the order of confirmation on September 25, 2003. The order was not entered on the bankruptcy court’s docket until September 26, 2003. Because the Plan refers to entry of the order, September 26, 2003 is the controlling date. R., V.1 at 180.

After confirmation but prior to the effective date, Lloyd Ward and Associates, P.C.'s commenced work as attorney for both the Debtor and Dr. Campbell on October 14, 2003. R., V. 2 at 274 lines 2 through 24; Supplementary Record (“Supp. R.”), V. 2 at 179 - 182. On November 6, 2003, Ward filed his motion to substitute as Debtor's attorney, which asserted his retention was necessary because “[t]here is [sic] the further issues relating to the continued compliance with the Debtor’s Second Amended Plan of Reorganization.” Supp. R., V. 4 at 330-331. Despite this assertion, Ward later claimed he did not read the Plan in its entirety prior to being retained by the Debtor. R., V. 2 at 270 lines 6 through 15. Ward did not disclose his dual representation of the Debtor and Dr. Campbell in his substitution motion. See Supp.R., V.4 at 330-331. Neither the motion to substitute nor the order substituting counse1 sought or permitted nunc pro tunc employment to October 14, 2003 under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a).

Supp. R., V. 4 at 330-332.

The Debtor paid Ward $63,297.72 between October 21, 2003 and January 12, 2004. Supp.R., V.4 at 140. Of this amount, Ward received $44,500 prior to the effective date of November 5, 2003. Supp. R., V.2 at 140.

The Debtor did not hire a new executive to take over management of the reorganized Debtor and Dr. Campbell continued to operate the business after confirmation. Supp.R., V. 4 at 388 line 1 through 389 line 25. During November 2003, the Debtor transferred its Plano property, valued by the Debtor at about $2.5 million, to Plano Cancer Network, L.P. ("Plano Network"), an entity formed by Ward and owned and/or controlled by Dr. Campbell for the benefit of her minor children. R., V.2 at 252. The property was transferred for $1.8 million, with all of the proceeds going to the secured lender, Colonial Bank. Supp.R., V. 4 at 428, line 15 through 429, line 29. Ward claims that these actions were taken to save the Plano property from foreclosure by Colonial Bank, a secured creditor. R., V. 2 at 270 lines 16 through 22.

In addition to representing both the Debtor and Dr. Campbell, Ward also represented Plano Network. Supp. R., V. 2 at 183. Ward issued an opinion letter on Plano Network’s behalf to a potential take-out lender in which he represented that he was acting as counsel for both Plano Network ands the Debtor, which guaranteed the new financing. Supp. R., V. 2 at 186-188.

On December 18, 2003, the bankruptcy court issued a Show Cause Order on for the Debtor's representative to appear and explain why the Debtor had not hired an executive to manage in compliance with the Plan. Supp.R., V. 4 at 335. At the court's Show Cause hearing on January 6, 2004, Ward appeared as attorney for the Debtor but without a representative as required by the order. Supp.R., V. 4 at 355 lines 7-9; 356 lines 22-2. Ward revealed that the Debtor did not have an executive officer operating the Debtor as required by the plan, that Dr. Campbell was operating the business, and that the Debtor transferred its Plano property to Plano Network. Supp.R., V. 4 at 388 line 1 through 389 line 25; 427 line 1 through 428 line 18.

On January 23, 2004, the bankruptcy court set a hearing on its intent to revoke confirmation under 11 U.S.C. § 1144. Supp.R., V. 4 at 337. The Court subsequently determined that the Debtor procured its order of confirmation by fraud, and revoked the order confirming the plan under 11 U.S.C. § 1144 on March 3, 2004. Supp. R., V.2 at 135. The United States Trustee appointed Diane Reed ("Trustee") as Chapter 11 trustee to administer the reconstituted estate. Supp. R., V. 6 at

Prior to the bankruptcy court's order revoking the order of confirmation, the United States Trustee filed his Motion to Disgorge Fees and Disqualify Lloyd Ward from Representing the Debtor and Reorganized Debtor ("Motion to Disgorge"). Supp.R., V.2 at 124 - 128. After confirmation was revoked, Ward signed an agreed order resolving the Motion to Disgorge which provided that Ward would file a motion to be employed nunc pro tunc under 11 U.S.C. § 327, an application for fees and expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 330, and a statement under Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 2016 disclosing the date, amount, and source of fee payments to him. Supp.Rec., V. 2 at 136.

Ward filed a motion to be employed and an application for fees, but did not file a separate statement disclosing the date, amount, and source of fee payments to him. Supp.R., V. 2 at 137-157. Ward revealed that the Debtor had paid him $44,500 in the month of October 2003, prior to the effective date of the plan, and $18,787.72 after the effective date. Supp.V., V.2 at 140.

The bankruptcy court denied Ward's motion for nunc pro tunc employment under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) and his application for compensation under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) and ordered Ward to disgorge $63,297.72. R., V.1 at 249 through V.2 at 261. In its Memorandum Decision and Order, the bankruptcy court determined it had jurisdiction to supervise the Debtor’s choice of counsel after the effective date of the plan because Ward was retained to assist the Debtor with carrying out the plan of reorganization. R., V.2 at 256. The bankruptcy court also held that the Debtor should have sought the bankruptcy court’s approval for Ward’s employment prior to the effective date because the Debtor was still a debtor-in-possession at that time. R., V.2 at 255.

The bankruptcy court denied Ward’s motion for employment under § 327(a) because of his simultaneous representation of the Debtor, Dr. Campbell, and Plano Network, a situation the court described as “ludicrous:”

> …The services Ward claims to have provided to the estate – saving the Plano Property from Colonial’s foreclosure, removing certain lien claims from the Plano Property, and assisting in the Preston refinancing to another of Ward’s clients, PCN – are at the heart of the fraudulent conduct which caused confirmation to be revoked.

R., V.2 at 258. The bankruptcy court also found Ward’s conduct had been sloppy at best and fraudulent at worst:

> At worst, Ward was an active participant in the fraudulent conduct that occurred following his engagement on October 14, 2003. The Court need not decide where along that spectrum Ward’s conduct lies, since even under the best case scenario, Ward cannot be retained consistent with either the spirit of, or the literal requirements of, the Bankruptcy Code.

R., V.2 at 259-260.

The bankruptcy court made the following comment in a footnote:

> Ward argues that he is entitled to protection from disgorgement due to his good faith reliance on the Confirmation Order. While Section 1144 of the Bankruptcy Code provides certain protections to those parties who acquire rights in good faith reliance upon a confirmation order when confirmation is later revoked, there is no evidence in the record from which the Court could credibly find that Ward relied in good faith upon the Confirmation Order in his dealings with the Debtor, thereby entitling him to any such protection.

R., V.2 at 261, n.10.

The bankruptcy court denied Ward's application for compensation because he was not qualified to serve as counsel. R., V. 2 at 259-260. Ward was ordered to disgorge, within ten days of entry of the order, the $63,297.72 in fees and expenses paid to him by the Debtor without court approval. R., V. 2 at 260-261. Ward has not disgorged these fees to the estate as of this date.

b. District Court Proceedings

Ward appealed the bankruptcy court's September 17, 2004 memorandum decision and order. The district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision and found that: 1) he bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to require that the Debtor obtain court approval before employing Ward prior to the effective date; 2) the bankruptcy court did not err legally or clearly err factually in determining that the Debtor could not employ Ward because of his representation of interests adverse to the estate; 3) the bankruptcy court did not err in denying his application for fees and expenses because he agreed to the procedure the court followed; 4) the bankruptcy court did not err in ordering Ward to disgorge the $63,297.72 in compensation; and 5) Ward's arguments regarding the defects in the bankruptcy court's order revoking the order of confirmation were irrelevant. R., V.2 at 453-458.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This appeal involves questions of law that this Court reviews de novo. See In re Ramba, Inc., 416 F.3d 394, 398 (5th Cir. 2005).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Sections 327(a) and 330(a) of the Bankruptcy Code require attorneys to obtain prior court approval before performing work or receiving compensation in a bankruptcy case for representing a debtor-in-possession. Cf. Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 538-39, 124 S.Ct. 1023, 1032 (2004). Network Cancer Care confirmed its chapter 11 plan on September 26, 2003. Mr. Ward billed $44,500 in fees between the plan's confirmation date and the plan's effective date despite neither requesting nor receiving authorization under § 327(a) to do so. Under section 5.1 of the Plan, Network remained a "debtor-in-possession" until its Plan became effective. For that reason, the bankruptcy court properly denied Mr. Ward the $44,500 in fees he sought to charge Network, a debtor-in-possession, for work Mr. Ward performed prior to the effective date of Network's plan.

Mr. Ward also sought $18,797.72 in fees for work he performed after Network's plan became effective on November 5, 2003. The court concluded Mr. Ward was at all times ineligible under § 327(a) to be retained as debtor's counsel because he helped Network engage in gross misconduct by transferring its most valuable asset after the effective date to a trust Network's owner set up for her children. The court found this violated the terms of Network's confirmed plan. The court also found Mr. Ward's conduct violated a prior court order by simultaneously representing Network and its principal. Last, the court found Mr. Ward's acted sloppily at best and with fraudulent intent at worst in assisting Network in its fraudulent scheme.

On appeal, Mr. Ward does not contest court's findings that he acted improperly. Nor could he - the record amply supports them. Instead, he suggests the bankruptcy court lacked "jurisdiction" to deny him fees for the work he performed after Network's chapter 11 Plan became effective. That is plainly wrong. 28 U.S.C. § 157 and § 1334 give bankruptcy courts broad jurisdiction over open bankruptcy cases, and matters relating to them. Network’s case was open at all relevant points in this case, including beyond the effective date of Network’s plan. Indeed, its case remains open today. Thus, the bankruptcy court had statutory jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 157 and § 1334.

The government agrees, however, that § 327 and § 330 did not authorize the bankruptcy court to deny Mr. Ward the $18,787.72 in fees he earned after the chapter 11 Plan became effective. Those provisions do not apply after a chapter 11 debtor’s reorganization plan becomes effective; those sections apply only to debtors-in-possession who are managing bankruptcy estates and Network ceased to be a debtor-in-possession upon the effective date of its plan. See 11 U.S.C. § 541 (the commencement of a case creates a bankruptcy estate); § 1107(a) (debtors-in-possession manage the bankruptcy estate); § 1141(b) and (c) (a confirmed plan takes property from the debtor-in-possession, who represents the estate, and vests it in the reconstituted debtor free of all creditor claims).

Nevertheless, this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court’s order for the disgorgement of $18,787.72 in fees Ward received after the effective date under two alternative grounds for affirmance. First, Section 8.1 of Network’s Plan “retain[ed] [in the bankruptcy court] such jurisdiction as is legally permissible, including that which is necessary to insure that the purpose and intent of this plan is carried out.” Given the bankruptcy court’s finding that Ward’s conduct enabled Network to fraudulently prevent the carrying out of its Plan, this Court can affirm the denial of those fees under section 8.1 of the Plan because Ward’s conduct ran afoul of this section.

Alternatively, this Court can affirm in light of the lower court’s findings because the bankruptcy court revoked Network’s confirmed Plan under 11 U.S.C. § 1144 for fraud. Section 1144 protects the claims of most people who deal with debtors during the time after a plan is confirmed and before it is revoked. That includes attorneys who provide services to debtors with confirmed plans. But § 1144 does not protect entities who did not acquire their rights in good faith during that period. Ward is one of those people. Given the lower court’s finding that he facilitated Network’s fraud and that there was nothing in the record that would lead it to believe that Ward relied on the confirmation order in good faith, Ward’s fees fall within that narrow class of claims that are voided by plan revocation and this forms a separate and independent alternative basis for ordering Ward to disgorge his $18,797.72 in fees.

ARGUMENT

1. The bankruptcy court had power to deny Ward's employment and compensation for the period between his retention and the effective date of the plan because the Debtor was a debtor-in-possession.

Ward was subject to 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) between confirmation and the effective date because the Debtor remained a debtor-in-possession at that time. A debtor-in-possession must obtain the bankruptcy court's approval prior to retaining counsel. 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) and § 1107. Without this approval, a professional cannot be paid from the bankruptcy estate. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a); see Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 538-39, 124 S.Ct. 1023, 1032 (2004)(attorney for converted Chapter 7 debtor could not be compensated from bankruptcy estate because 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) excluded attorneys for debtor).

Ward argues that debtors no longer need the bankruptcy court's approval prior to retaining professionals after confirmation. Ward Brief at 17. Ward is correct in that property of the estate usually vests in the debtor upon confirmation. 11 U.S.C. § 1141(b). The reorganized debtor need not seek the bankruptcy court's approval prior to retaining professionals because there is no longer an estate from which to pay them. However, a plan of reorganization may provide for the vesting of the estate at a date other than confirmation. 11 U.S.C. § 1144(b). Under these circumstances, the debtor remains a debtor-in-possession even after confirmation. Cunningham v. Healthco, Inc., 824 F.2d 1448, 1460 (5th Cir. 1987)(debtor remained debtor-in-possession even after confirmation of a chapter 11 plan because plan provided for continued administration of the bankruptcy estate under § 1141(b)).

Under Section 5.1 of the confirmed Plan, the Debtor remained a debtor-in-possession until the effective date, and not confirmation. R., V.1 at 203. The Plan specifically provided that its assets did not vest in another entity until at least forty-five days after the entry of the confirmation order on the docket. R., V.1 at 203. Therefore, the Debtor operated as a debtor-in-possession until its assets vested in the reorganized Debtor on November 5, 2003. Ward's argument that the effective date does not matter would nullify the specific terms in the plan and 11 U.S.C. § 1141(b).

For the period between confirmation and the effective date (September 26, 2003 through November 5, 2003), Ward received $44,500 from the estate. Supp.R., V. 2 at 140. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it denied Ward’s retention and compensation for this period because he did not qualify for employment under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). R., V.2 at 255. Section 327(a) requires that counsel must be a disinterested person, which is “a person that does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or any class of creditors, ..., by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the Debtor, ..., or for any other reason." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14).

The bankruptcy court specifically found that Ward was not disinterested because he represented both the Debtor and the Debtor’s principal, Dr. Campbell, at the time of his retention[3]. R., V.2 at 257-258. The bankruptcy court also found that Ward represented Plano Network, the entity created for the benefit of Dr. Campbell’s minor children and to whom the Debtor transferred its Plano property for no consideration. R., V.2 at 258-259.

Because Ward was disqualified from employment under § 327(a), he was not eligible to receive fees from the estate prior to the effective date. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Therefore the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error when it denied Ward’s fees of $44,500, which were the fees received by Ward during the period between confirmation (September 26, 2003) and the effective date (November 5, 2003).

2. The bankruptcy court had authority to review Ward's retention and compensation for the period between the effective date of the plan and the revocation of the order of confirmation.

Between November 5, 2003, the date the Plan went effective, and March 3, 2004, the date the order of confirmation was revoked, Ward continued to perform additional work on the Debtor's behalf. Supp.R., V.2 at 135. The reorganized Debtor paid Ward an additional $18,787.72 between the effective date and the revocation of the confirmation order. Supp. R., V.2 at 140. The bankruptcy court had authority to review Ward's employment and fees for this period under two alternative theories. First, the confirmed Plan and 11 U.S.C. § 1142 granted the bankruptcy court authority to review Ward's retention and fees because he was employed to assist the debtor with executing the Plan. Second, the bankruptcy court had authority to order Ward to disgorge his fees after revoking the order confirming the Plan because Ward did not rely on the confirmation order in good faith. 11 U.S.C. § 1144(1).

a. Section 8.1 of the plan of reorganization granted the bankruptcy court authority to review Ward's post-confirmation employment and fees.

The bankruptcy court retained authority over Ward's employment and fees for the period between confirmation and revocation of the order of confirmation because Section 8.1 of the Plan granted the bankruptcy court continuing power to "retain such jurisdiction as is legally permissible, including that which is necessary to insure that the purpose and intent of this plan is carried out…" R., V. 1 at 209. The bankruptcy court also had authority under 11 U.S.C. § 1142(b):

> The court may direct the Debtor and any other necessary party…to perform any other act....that is necessary for the consummation of the plan.

The bankruptcy court retains jurisdiction/authority under 11 U.S.C. § 1142 to address fundamental questions of plan interpretation and administration and to interpret its own orders. In re John-Mansville Corp., 97 B.R. 174, 180 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1989).

The bankruptcy court appropriately ordered Ward to disgorge the $18,787.72 in fees paid between the effective date and revocation of confirmation because Ward assisted the Debtor in frustrating the Plan. While the bankruptcy court ordered Ward to disgorge his fees because he was not disinterested under § 327(a), the United States Trustee believes that disgorgement of fees should have been ordered under the Court's authority per Section 8.1 of the Plan and 11 U.S.C. § 1142, and this Court can affirm on these alternative bases.[4] R., V.2 at 256. Although the bankruptcy court did not specifically find that Ward himself acted fraudulently, it found that "[t]he services Ward claims to have provided to the estate – saving the Plano Property from Colonial's foreclosure, removing certain lien claims from the Plano Property, and assisting in the Preston refinancing to another of Ward's clients, PCN – are at the heart of the fraudulent conduct which caused confirmation to be revoked." R., V.2 at 258. Ward's actions on behalf of the Debtor and Dr. Campbell are intrinsically linked with those events leading to the revocation of the order of confirmation and thereby frustrating the purpose of the Plan.

Ward incorrectly questions the bankruptcy court's subject matter jurisdiction by confusing subject matter jurisdiction with the type of authority defined as "jurisdiction" by Section 8.1 of the plan of reorganization.[5] Ward Brief at 14 –

[4] City of Morgan City v. South Louisiana Elec. Co-op Ass'n, 31 F.3d 319, 322 (5th Cir. 1994)(appellate court may rely upon alternative bases to affirm)(citing United States v. Early, 27 F.3d 140, 142 (5th Cir. 1994)). Alternatively, this Court could remand to the bankruptcy court for consideration of these issues. The government suggests, however, that substantial judicial resources will be saved by deciding these alternative bases arguments in this appeal.

[5] "Clarity would be facilitated if courts and litigants used the label "jurisdictional" not for claim-processing rules, but only for prescriptions delineating the classes of cases (subject-matter jurisdiction) and the persons (personal jurisdiction) falling within a court's adjudicatory authority." Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 455, 124 S.Ct. 906, 915 (2004).

15. “Jurisdiction” refers solely to the question whether a court has constitutional and statutory jurisdiction to decide a particular case or controversy although, as the Supreme Court has explained, even judicial decisions at times use it incorrectly when they are actually analyzing the ‘remedial powers of the court” in a particular circumstance. See Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 90-91, 118 S.Ct. 1003, 1011 (1998). Ward misuses the term in his brief as did Section 8.1 of the Plan. See R., V.1 at 209. The section of the Plan did not grant the bankruptcy court statutory jurisdiction; instead, it gave the court authority in the same way a federal statute grants a court the authority to take a specific action in a case over which it possesses statutory jurisdiction under Title 28 of the United States Code. Even if the Plan did not provide for this authority, § 1142(b) enables the bankruptcy court to “direct the Debtor and any other necessary party…to perform any other act…that is necessary for the consummation of the plan.”

Thus while Ward is correct that § 327 and § 330 do not apply to professionals retained after the effective date, the bankruptcy court still retained sufficient authority under § 1142 and Section 8.1 of the Plan to deny Ward’s compensation because of the unusual fact that his conduct facilitated the fraud related to the revocation of Network’s confirmed Plan.

Specifically, Paragraph 8.1 of the Plan provides "[u]ntil this Reorganization Case is closed, the Bankruptcy Court shall retain such jurisdiction as is legally permissible, including that which is necessary to insure that the purpose and intent of this plan is carried out…." R., V. 1 at 209. The bankruptcy court found that Ward was "an active participant in the fraudulent conduct" that occurred after confirmation; specifically, Ward assisted Dr. Campbell with transferring assets of the Debtor to a trust held for the benefit of her children. R., V.2 at 259-260. Ward not only failed in his duty to assist the Debtor with carrying out "the purpose and intent of the plan," he facilitated the Debtor's fraudulent acts.

Finally, the bankruptcy court clearly retained subject matter jurisdiction over the reorganized Debtor under 28 U.S.C. § 1334 and § 157. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has devised a test for determining whether a bankruptcy court has retained subject matter jurisdiction after confirmation. U.S. Brass Corp. v. Travelers Insurance Group, Inc. (In re U.S. Brass Corp.), 301 F.3d 296, 304-305 (5th Cir. 2002). The first step of this analysis is to determine whether the district court had subject matter jurisdiction over the bankruptcy matter under 28 U.S.C. § 1334. U.S. Brass at 304. If the district court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b), the second step is to determine whether the district court may refer this matter to the bankruptcy court as a core proceeding under 11 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1). Id. If the matter is a core proceeding, the court must determine whether the matter pertains to "the implementation or execution of the plan." Id.; see also Bank of Louisiana v. Craig's Stores of Texas, Inc. (In re Craig's Stores of Texas, Inc., 266 F.3d 388, 390 (5th Cir. 2001).

Ward's post-confirmation employment and compensation meet the U.S. Brass criteria for bankruptcy court subject matter jurisdiction. First, the district court has jurisdiction over the Ward's employment and compensation because they are "related to" a Chapter 11 bankruptcy. See U.S. Brass, 301 F.3d at 304; 28 U.S.C. § 1334. Second, the matter is a core proceeding under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2) because it "invokes a substantive right provided by title 11 or…is a proceeding that, by its nature, could arise only in the context of a bankruptcy case." See U.S. Brass, 301 F.3d at 304. Finally, this matter directly pertains to the implementation or execution of a plan because Ward was hired to assist the Debtor with fulfilling its Plan obligations. Supp.R., V.4 at 331. See U.S. Brass at 304-305. The bankruptcy court therefore retained subject matter jurisdiction over Ward's entitlement to fees after confirmation and Ward forfeited his right to fees under Section 8.1 of the Plan by hindering the Plan's execution.

b. In the alternative, the bankruptcy court had authority under 11 U.S.C. § 1144(1) to order Ward to disgorge his fees because he did not rely on the order of confirmation in good faith.

In the alternative, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in ordering Ward to disgorge his fees because the court's findings support the conclusion by this Court that ward did not rely on the order of confirmation in good faith. 11 U.S.C. § 1144(1). In this particular case, the bankruptcy court revoked the order confirming the plan of reorganization under 11 U.S.C. § 1144, which allows revocation if such order was procured by fraud. Supp. R., V.2 at 135. 11 U.S.C. § 1144. Section 1144 voids the order of confirmation, removes a debtor's authority to operate under the plan, and questions the reorganized debtor's actions. In re Ogden Modulars, Inc., 207 B.R. 198, 200 (Bankr. E.D. Missouri 1997)[6].

Section 1144(1) contemplates that revocation orders will include provisions "to protect any entity acquiring rights in good faith reliance on the order of confirmation." 11 U.S.C. § 1144(1); see Tenn-Fla Partners v. First Union National Bank of Florida (in re Tenn-Fla Partners), 229 B.R. 720, 737 (W.D. Tenn. 1999), aff'd 226 F.3d 746 (6th Cir. 2000); see also In re Circle K Corp., 171 B.R. 666, 669 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 1994)("Section 1144 recognizes that revocation of a Chapter 11 plan impacts innocent third parties…The statutory language expressly considers that parties rely on a confirmation order").

[6] The Ogden Modulars bankruptcy court reasoned that "[a]ny consideration of the post-confirmation/pre-revocation dealings between the Debtor and other parties will in the first instance assume the premise that the Debtor had been operating as a Debtor in Possession during that period." 207 B.R. at 200. The United States Trustee does not agree with this reasoning because it denies due process to parties who were paid under the plan prior to revocation. A more reasonable analysis would have been for the Ogden court to determine whether parties received rights n

By its plain language, § 1144(1) does not protect parties like Ward, who did not rely on the plan in good faith, and courts therefore have authority to order such parties to disgorge any payments received or property transferred to them while the plan was effective. 11 U.S.C. § 1144(1).

Disgorgement of Ward's post-effective date fees under § 1144(1) is appropriate under the facts of this case because Ward directly facilitated the fraud leading to the revocation of the order of confirmation. As the bankruptcy court specifically found, there is "no credible evidence in the record from which the Court could credibly find that Ward relied on in good faith upon the Confirmation Order in his dealings with the Debtor, thereby entitling him to any such protection." R., V.2 at 261, n.10. Ward did not even rely on the Plan because he did not read it in its entirety at the time he was retained by the Debtor. R., V.2 at 270 lines 6 through 13.

Ward argues that the order revoking confirmation was improper because it failed to "contain such provisions as are necessary to protect any entity acquiring rights in good faith reliance on the order of confirmation." Ward Brief at 27. Supp. R., V.2 at 135; 11 U.S.C. § 1144(1). While the order should have contained this language, the district court correctly concluded that this was irrelevant to Ward's appeal because Ward did not rely on the order of confirmation in good faith. Moreover, Ward's quibbling with the revocation order's language is irrelevant here because he falls outside any protection the order would have granted parties who, unlike him, relied on the order in good faith in dealing with the reconstituted Debtor. R., V.2 at 457. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court clearly would not have found Ward to have received property in good faith in reliance on the Plan. See R., V.2 at 261 n.10.

Furthermore, Ward failed to timely appeal the order revoking the order of confirmation; the order is therefore final. 28 U.S.C. § 158 (c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. Proc. 8002(a)(bankruptcy orders must be appealed within ten days of entry).

3. Ward is not eligible to a jury trial.

Ward asserts that he was denied due process because the action for disgorgement should have been tried in an adversary proceeding before a jury. Ward Brief at 29. Ward was not denied this right because he did not have a Seventh Amendment[7] right to a jury trial. The Supreme Court devised a two-part test to determine whether a Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial exists. Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, 492 U.S. 33, 41, 109 S.Ct. 2782, 2790, 106 L.Ed. 2d 26 (1989). First, the court compares the statutory cause of action being asserted with English 18th century actions brought at the time the Amendment was adopted. For the right to a jury trial to exist the statutory action must be analogous to an 18th century English common law cause of action that was tried at law. Id. at 41-42.

Second, the court reviews the remedy sought to determine whether it is legal or equitable in nature. Only if the remedy sought is legal does a jury trial right exists. Id. at 42 (quoting Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 417-418 (1987). Further, the Court noted that greater weight should be given to the second part of the test. Granfinanciera, 492 U.S. at 42, 109 S.Ct. at 2790.

[7] The Seventh Amendment provides in relevant part:

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved[.]

Ward's assertion that he would have been entitled to a trial by jury fails the Granfinanciera test. First, the request for disgorgement of compensation would not have existed at English Common Law because the request would have arisen under Title 11. Thus, under the first part of the Granfinanciera, no right to a jury trial exists on Ward's compensation or employment. See Id. at 42, 109 S.Ct. at 2790. With regard to the second part, disgorgement of profits is equitable because such damages are restitutionary in nature. Local No. 391 v. Terry, 494 U.S. 558, 570-71, 110 S.Ct. 1339, 1348 (1990). Because Ward fails both parts of the Granfinanciera test, he is not entitled to a jury trial.

In the alternative, Ward waived his right to a trial by jury because he failed to file a timely jury trial demand. Fed. R. Civ. P. 38(b)(permits a party "demand a trial by jury of any issue triable of right by a jury," provided the demand is served within ten days "after the service of the last pleading directed to such issue"); incorporated by reference by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9015. Ward has never filed a request for a jury trial.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This appeal calls upon this Court to examine recent statutory amendments affecting chapter 7 bankruptcy cases and trustees serving in such cases. 11 U.S.C. §§ 330(a)(3) and (7).

The United States has a direct interest in the proper construction of these provisions because United States Trustees, who are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General, supervise the administration of chapter 7 bankruptcy cases and trustees in such cases in all federal judicial districts within this circuit. 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589b. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977) (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena"); In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002) (citing this legislative history).

The United States has two separate and distinct interests in this matter. First, the United States Trustee has the statutory duty to "establish, maintain, and supervise a panel of private trustees that are eligible and available to serve as trustees in cases under chapter 7 of title 11." 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(1). Second, the United States Trustee has the statutory duty to supervise the administration of "cases and trustees in cases under chapter 7" by "reviewing . . . applications filed for compensation and reimbursement under section 330" and "filing . . . comments with respect to such application and, if the United States Trustee considers it to be appropriate, objections to such application." 28 U.S.C. §§ 586(a)(3)(A)(i) and (ii).

In light of these interests, the United States submits this brief to share its views on the proper construction of §§ 330(a)(3) and (7). See 28 U.S.C. § 517 (authorizing the Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States"). See also 11 U.S.C. § 307 ("[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding"); In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) (interpreting § 307).

I. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. BACKGROUND.

The Bankruptcy Abuse and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Public Law 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005) ("BAPCPA"), made significant amendments to 11 U.S.C. § 330, which governs compensation for bankruptcy professionals. The amendments replaced the former open-ended reasonableness standard with commission-based compensation for chapter 7 trustees.

The bankruptcy court, however, scrutinized the trustee's request for compensation as if the law had not changed. It applied an analysis that is indistinguishable from pre-BAPCPA law. In short, the bankruptcy court decided this case in exactly the same manner as it would have prior to the BAPCPA amendments - openly acknowledging that it was applying the same frame of analysis, relying largely on the same pre-BAPCPA authorities, and, most importantly, arriving at the same result.

B. DEBTORS' CHAPTER 7 CASE.

The debtors, Donald W. Ward and Jean M. Ward, filed a voluntary petition for chapter 7 relief on April 14, 2006. Richard W. Roeder, Esq. was appointed as chapter 7 trustee on April 17, 2006. Thereafter, Mr. Roeder conducted sales of real estate and commercial inventory. The sales generated total gross receipts of $118,761.24 for disbursement to creditors.

Mr. Roeder requested compensation in the amount of the full statutory commission authorized by sections 330(a)(7) and 326 of the Bankruptcy Code. No party in interest objected to the request for fees, but the bankruptcy court independently scrutinized the fee request. In doing so, the bankruptcy court failed to follow the statutory amendments.

C. THE CHAPTER 7 TRUSTEE'S APPLICATION FOR COMPENSATION.

The trustee's application for compensation requested a commission in the amount of $9,188.04 based on his disbursement of proceeds from the sales of real estate and commercial inventory. This figure represents the full statutory commission to which he is entitled pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 330(a)(7) and 326. Section 330(a)(7) provides:

> In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to a trustee, the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326.[1]

The trustee provided notice of his request for the full statutory commission of $9,188.04 to all parties in interest. No objections were filed, but the bankruptcy court reduced the compensation request sua sponte, declining to award the full commission called for pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 330(a)(7) and 326.

At an initial hearing on December 4, 2006, the bankruptcy court questioned the chapter 7 trustee regarding his interpretation of § 330(a)(7):

MR. ROEDER: This is one of those post-October 17 cases, where my understanding has been that the fee of the Trustee is to be considered as a commission.

THE COURT: What makes that rule?

MR. ROEDER: That's part of the change in the law.

THE COURT: Show me.

MR. ROEDER: Now, I think 330, Sub 7 has a reference . . .

THE COURT: It's the same as it used to say . . .

* * *

THE COURT: [Y]ou think that overrules all the case law that's preceded it?

MR. ROEDER: Well, it was an effort on the part of those Trustees who were organized and petitioning in order to clarify it and make it a commission . . .

THE COURT: [T]he Court still has to consider the reasonableness of the fees, and that takes into consideration everything that's done. Just like we did before.

MR. ROEDER: Well, I will --

THE COURT: I don't see any difference with the -- the old Johnson criteria. . . .[2]

The bankruptcy court authorized briefing by the chapter 7 trustee concerning the new commission standards. After the filing of his brief, as well as briefs in support of the trustee's position by the panel trustees of the Western District of Pennsylvania and the United States Trustee as amica curiae, the bankruptcy court entered an interlocutory order and opinion on April 13, 2007 which ruled against the trustee and again failed to recognize that the law had fundamentally changed.[3] In the April 13, 2007 order, the bankruptcy court "propose[d] to enter

As discussed below, the "old Johnson criteria" refers to a Lodestar review of trustee compensation based largely on time spent, an approach that was superceded by the BAPCPA amendments, it no longer being permissible to consider this factor for chapter 7 trustees. *Johnson v. an order which allows trustee compensation of $5,000" but afforded the trustee "10 days to request an evidentiary hearing. . . ."

On April 19, 2007, the trustee did so and a hearing was held on May 23, 2007. On February 8, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an order indicating that the hearing "did not modify the Court's view on the amount of reasonable compensation as expressed in the OPINION of April 13, 2007." That order allowed compensation of $5,000 to Mr. Roeder as chapter 7 trustee.[4] The trustee's appeal followed.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

This appeal involves questions of law only. The opinion below is therefore entitled to no deference.

III. ARGUMENT

A. PURSUANT TO THE BAPCPA AMENDMENTS, CHAPTER 7 TRUSTEE COMPENSATION MUST BE DETERMINED AS A COMMISSION BASED UPON THE PERCENTAGES PROVIDED IN SECTION 326, ABSENT EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES UNRELATED TO SECTION 330(a)(3) FACTORS.

Section 407 of the BAPCPA amended § 330 in two ways that affect the compensation of chapter 7 trustees.[5] First, it specifically eliminated the amount of time spent on services as a

[5] As amended, § 330(a)(3) currently reads as follows:

> (3) ~~(A)~~ In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to an examiner, trustee under chapter 11, or professional person, the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including -
> > (A) the time spent on such services;
> > (B) the rates charged for such services;
> > (C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title;
> > (D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, the importance, and nature of the problem, issue, or task addressed;~~and~~
> > (E) with respect to a professional person, whether the person is board certified or otherwise has demonstrated skill and experience in the bankruptcy field; and
> > ~~(E)~~ (F) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title.

The removal of the first designation "(A)" was purely a technical amendment to eliminate the use consideration for chapter 7 trustees, by amending § 330(a)(3) to add to the initial paragraph the following critical restrictive language: "to an examiner, trustee under chapter 11, or professional person." Second, section 407 added a new subparagraph (7) to § 330(a) that provides as follows: "[i]n determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded to a trustee, the court shall treat such compensation as a commission, based on section 326."

These provisions transformed the standards for awarding trustee compensation. Read together, they establish a strong presumption that trustee compensation must be calculated as a commission and allowed in the amounts specified by § 326.

Prior to BAPCPA's amendment limiting § 330(a)(3) to examiners, trustees under chapter 11 or professional persons, a bankruptcy court was directed to consider those factors delineated in § 330(a)(3) in assessing the reasonableness of trustee compensation, including hours spent by the trustee. This analysis frequently resulted in reductions of fee requests from § 326 maximum amounts. Those maximum amounts were regarded as a cap - a limitation of fees - and not an entitlement.

With the BAPCPA, Congress fundamentally changed the manner of chapter 7 trustee compensation, by mandating the awarding of a commission and eliminating the cap/limitation concept.

of that designation on two sub-paragraphs. The language in bold indicates the language added by the BAPCPA amendments.

The plain language[6] of amended § 330(a)(3), which contains the factors formally utilized to reduce compensation from the commission amounts, now specifically limits that section's application - and therefore the consideration of such factors and time expended and hourly rates - to only three types of officers: examiners, chapter 11 trustees, and professional persons. Chapter 7 trustees were excluded.

It is critical to note that there is no disagreement on this point - it is unmistakable and indisputable. The bankruptcy court itself recognized that "[s]pecifically missing from those persons to [whom] § 330(a)(3) is applicable is a Chapter 7 Trustee." Ward, 366 B.R. at 473.

Accordingly, for professionals other than chapter 7 trustees, bankruptcy courts must consider such factors as the time expended and the hourly rates charged. The contrary must now be the case for chapter 7 trustees. The language of amended § 330(a)(3) permits but one interpretation: Congress no longer intended bankruptcy courts to determine the reasonableness of chapter 7 trustees' fees according to such considerations as the amount of time spent, the appropriateness of the hourly rates requested and the customary compensation for comparable, non-bankruptcy work. Otherwise, Congress would not have excluded chapter 7 trustees from § 330(a)(3). Courts are now forbidden to consider these factors. It is difficult indeed to imagine a more clear directive.

Moreover, having purposely eliminated chapter 7 trustees from § 330(a)(3), Congress substituted a new unambiguous commission standard of compensation for chapter 7 trustees through the enactment of § 330(a)(7). The plain language of § 330(a)(7) requires that the reasonable compensation of a trustee shall be treated as a commission, based on § 326.[7]

[6] "It is axiomatic that '[t]he starting point in every case involving construction of a statute is the language itself.'" Landreth Timber Co. v. Landreth, 471 U.S. 681, 685 (1985), quoting Blue Chip Stamps v. Manor Drug Stores, 421 U.S. 723, 756 (1975) (POWELL, J., concurring).

Because § 330(a)(7) directs that reasonable compensation must be treated as a "commission" based on § 326, it is necessary to consider the meaning of that term. Courts apply a "fundamental canon of statutory construction . . . that, unless otherwise defined, words will be interpreted as taking their ordinary, contemporary, common meaning." Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42 (1979). "Commission" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code but commonly means a "percentage of money taken in on sale, given as pay to a sales clerk or agent." Webster's New World Dictionary of the American Language 285 (2d ed. 1972). Even when viewed as a legal term, its meaning is virtually the same. For example, its legal usage is a "fee paid to an agent or employee for a particular transaction, usu. as a percentage of the money received from the transaction < a real-estate agent's commission >." Black's Law Dictionary 264 (7th ed. 1999).

In mandating that a trustee's reasonable compensation "shall" be determined according to a "commission" based on § 326 - supplanting the former § 330(a)(3) analysis - the BAPCPA amendments require that § 326 be the starting point for the determination of a chapter 7 trustee's reasonable compensation. See Kelly v. Robinson, 479 U.S. 36, 43 (1986) (statutory text is the starting point for statutory construction). Moreover, because a commission, by definition, is [7] Section 330(a)(7) does not expressly limit its application to a chapter 7 trustee's compensation, but instead simply references the compensation of a trustee. Nonetheless, the compensation of chapter 11 trustees is specifically provided for in § 330(a)(3), while standing trustees in chapters 12 and 13 are compensated pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 586(e). Therefore, considering the overall context of the amendments to § 330, it is evident that Congress intended § 330(a)(7) to apply only to chapter 7 trustees. See Davis v. Mich. Dept. of Treasury, 489 U.S. 803, 809 (1989) ("[i]t is a fundamental canon of statutory construction that the words of a statute must be read in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme").

compensation based on a percentage of funds, such compensation must be determined according to the percentages of disbursements made by the chapter 7 trustee "to parties in interest, excluding the debtor, but including holders of secured claims" as specified in § 326(a).[8]

Congress did not, however, entirely sever the connection between chapter 7 trustee compensation and the standard of reasonableness required by § 330(a)(1). Both § 326(a) and § 330(a)(7) employ the terminology of "reasonable" compensation, and § 330(a)(2) provides that the "court may . . . award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested." The interplay between §§ 326(a), 330(a)(1), 330(a)(2) and 330(a)(7) requires that the trustee's fee must be determined in the first instance according to the commission amounts specified in § 326(a), unless such amounts would constitute unreasonable compensation based on factors other than those identified in § 330(a)(3), from which the chapter 7 trustees have been specifically exempted.[9]

Any other approach would disregard the fact that chapter 7 trustee compensation was excluded from consideration pursuant to the § 330(a)(3) factors - as even the bankruptcy court specifically acknowledges. Moreoever, an alternative construction would fail to give meaning to all provisions of the statute, most notably § 330(a)(7), which would be rendered surplusage.[10]

The applicable BAPCPA amendments require that a chapter 7 trustee's compensation be determined as a commission, absent extraordinary circumstances that are unrelated to the § 330(a)(3) factors. Such circumstances will occur only in the rare and unusual case. There is no suggestion that they are present in this case.[11]

B. THE CASES INTERPRETING SECTION 330(a)(7) FAIL TO FAITHFULLY FOLLOW THE BAPCPA AMENDMENTS.

There are no opinions by United States Courts of Appeal or District Courts addressing the trustee commission mandated by § 330(a)(7). All reported decisions are by bankruptcy courts. To date there have been five substantive decisions, all of which are treated below. Unfortunately, the decisions are contradictory and confusing. Some struggle to reconcile the amendments with prior standards; others - including the opinion of the bankruptcy court - do not even appear to recognize that the law has changed.

[10] See Duncan v. Walker, 533 U.S. 167, 174 (2001) ("It is our duty to give effect, if possible, to every clause and word of a statute. . . . [Because] this rule [is] a cardinal principle of statutory construction . . . a statute ought . . . to be so construed that . . . no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant") (internal quotations and citations omitted). See also, 2A N. SINGER, STATUTES AND STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION § 46:7 (6th ed. 2003) ("The legislature is presumed to have intended to avoid surplusage in the words and sentences and therefore it is permissible to interpret the statute to avoid such a pitfall.")

[11] For example, if the trustee had delegated a substantial portion of case administration, or if the trustee's administration fell below acceptable standards, a court might reduce the trustee's commission in accordance with § 330(a)(2), based on factors other than those set forth in § 330(a)(3).

The first decision to interpret § 330(a)(7) was In re Clemens, 349 B.R. 725 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006). Because Clemens was cited extensively by the bankruptcy court and relied on by subsequent authorities, that decision is discussed in some length.

Clemens is a seriously flawed opinion that has done immense damage to the coherent development of the law by undermining Congress' unmistakable intent to transform trustee compensation standards. In Clemens, the court determined that the language of § 330(a), as amended by the BAPCPA, requires courts to determine the reasonableness of a chapter 7 trustee's fees according to the Johnson Lodestar factors.[12] The court further concluded that the BAPCPA amendments require only that it include a consideration of the provisions of § 326. Id. at 729. The court determined that pursuant to the decision in In re Miniscribe Corporation, 309 F.3d 1234 (10th Cir. 2002), § 330(a)(1) required that the Johnson Lodestar factors supplement the factors set forth in § 330(a)(3). Clemens, 349 B.R. at 727-30. The court further reasoned that although Congress had amended § 330(a)(3) to make that section inapplicable to chapter 7 trustee compensation, it had not amended § 330(a)(1). The court asserted that under Miniscribe, the Johnson factors were derived from § 330(a)(1) and concluded that because Congress had not amended § 330(a)(1), the Lodestar analysis must continue to be part of the reasonableness analysis concerning chapter 7 trustee fees. Id. at 729-30. Because the Lodestar factors were in its view still part of the reasonableness analysis, the court determined that [12] As discussed in Clemens, the Johnson "Lodestar factors" are: 1) the time and labor involved; 2) the novelty and difficulty of the issues involved; 3) the requisite skill to perform the services properly; 4) the preclusion of other employment; 5) the customary charges by other professionals; 6) the contingent nature of the fee; 7) time limitations imposed by acceptance of the employment; 8) the amount generated for the creditors and the results obtained; 9) the experience, reputation, and ability of the professional; 10) the undesirability of the case; and 11) awards in similar cases. Clemens, 349 B.R. at 728, n. 7.

§ 330(a)(7) had a very small impact on pre-BAPCPA practice in awarding trustee fees.[13]

Clemens correctly recognized that the former § 330(a)(3) analysis and the Lodestar analysis substantially overlap. Id. at 730, n. 19, quoting In re Marlar, 315 B.R. 81, 84 (Bankr. W.D. Ark. 2004) ("Although stated differently, these criteria [Lodestar factors] are similar to the factors enumerated by the statute"). There is indeed, a good reason for this similarity.

Section 330(a)(3) was added to § 330 pursuant to the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, Pub. L. 103-394, title I, 117, title II, 224(b), 108 Stat. 4119, 4130, and thereby clarified many of the judicial standards and practices regarding the allowance of professional fees. Ferrara & Hantman v. Alvarez (In re Engel), 124 F.3d 567, 572 n. 10 (3d Cir. 1997). Among the standards codified in § 330(a)(3) were the Johnson Lodestar factors. In re Eliapio, 298 B.R. 392, 398, n. 9 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 2003) (factors set forth in § 330(a)(3) are codification of Johnson factors); In re King, 350 B.R. 327, 331-32 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2006) (same); In re Vernon-Williams, 343 B.R. 766, 795 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2006) ("Congress has now, in effect, substantially codified the holding in Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, Inc., 488 F.2d 714 (5th Cir.1974), into § 330(a)(3) of the Bankruptcy Code"); In re Unger & Associates, Inc., 277 B.R. 694, 697 (Bankr. E.D. Tex. 2001) (same); In re Reconversion Technologies, Inc., 216 B.R. 46, 52 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. 1997) (same).

[13] The court remarked that "its holding may mean that the terms of § 330(a)(7) have a small impact on pre-BAPCPA practice in awarding Trustees fees" and even acknowledged that "[t]o some extent this might conflict with the general rule of statutory interpretation that a Court should avoid surplusage." Clemens, 349 B.R. at 731. The court also noted that under its view "the recent amendments to § 330(a)(3) will likely have little effect on the Court's review of chapter 7 Trustee's fees," id. at 730 n. 20; that "[r]ead literally, § 330(a)(7) adds little to the inquiry required by § 330(a)," id. at 730; and that "it means very little to call this compensation a 'commission.'" Id.

Pursuant to the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, § 330(a)(3) provided that "[i]n determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded, the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors. . . ." Given the directive that the courts consider "all relevant factors" in determining reasonable compensation, it is clear that Congress intended this subparagraph to control the valuation of professional services provided to the bankruptcy estate. This conclusion is buttressed by the fact that Congress codified many of the Johnson Lodestar factors in this subparagraph, as those factors were developed by the courts to assist in the determination of what constituted reasonable compensation for professionals. In light of its legislative history, it is clear that when Congress amended § 330(a)(3) to exclude any consideration of the nature, extent and value of a chapter 7 trustee's services, it intended that the courts were not to consider either the enumerated factors set forth in § 330(a)(3) or the substantially similar Lodestar factors derived from the Johnson case.[14]

The Clemens court recognized the overlap between § 330(a)(3) and the Lodestar factors, concluded that the plain language of § 330(a)(3) prohibits application of the factors enumerated thereunder to chapter 7 trustees, and yet found that § 330(a)(1) mandates the consideration of those same factors under Johnson. A statutory construction that leads to such an absurd result should be avoided. Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490, 514 (1989) ("The basic rule of statutory construction is to first seek the legislative intention, and to effectuate it if possible, and the law favors constructions which harmonize with reason, and which tend to avoid unjust, absurd, unreasonable or confiscatory results, or oppression"), quoting State ex rel. Stern Brothers & Co. v. Stilley, 337 S.W.2d 934, 939 (Mo. 1960).

[14] The Clemens court implicitly recognizes that Congress intended this result, but remarks that "[i]t is beyond our province to rescue Congress from its drafting errors." Clemens, 349 B.R. at 730, n. 7. We respectfully suggest that there was no drafting error. Congress determined that trustee compensation "shall" be treated as a "commission" and so stated.

It should be noted that the Clemens court did not consider the amendments to be totally irrelevant - notwithstanding the foregoing analysis, the court found that it > must now determine reasonableness with an eye on the statutory cap. Thus, the Court might easily conclude that although the Trustee's itemization supports a much lower award, the Trustee is entitled to a higher amount in light of its consideration for § 326(a) as part of its reasonableness determination.

Clemens, 349 B.R. at 731. The court added to its Lodestar factors "[t]he amount resulting from the calculations under § 326 (a)." Id. at 732.[15] It required documentation from the trustee showing the hours spent, and denied the fee request without prejudice. Id. at 733.[16]

The bankruptcy court's April 13, 2007 opinion cited Clemens at length, but without recognition of Clemens' admonition to determine reasonableness "with an eye on the statutory cap." The bankruptcy court indicated that if it were to apply a strict Lodestar standard, it would award approximately $2,000, but it instead determined to award trustee compensation of $5,000, without articulating standards that would enable a meaningful review of its award. Ward, 366 B.R. at 476. The bankruptcy court's opinion is addressed in detail below.

[15] The court also explained that it considers whether any party in interest objects to the fee request, as well as any input from the United States Trustee. Id. In our case, no party objected to the fee request, which the United States Trustee supports.

[16] In Clemens, the trustee requested a commission of $11,631.76. Ironically, after the trustee submitted the requested itemization, the court ultimately awarded him the full $11,631.76. See Chapter 7 Trustee's Final Report and Account, docket no. 53 in case no. 06-20124, United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Utah. Further, the docket reflects that there was no briefing of the issue. Thus the entire misguided development of the law was based on a case that ultimately awarded the trustee a full commission, and in which there was no briefing that would have provided the opportunity for a careful consideration of the amendments.

In re McKinney, 374 B.R. 726 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2007) ("McKinney I"), held that "time spent is still a relevant factor, even if it is no longer the starting point for calculating chapter 7 trustee compensation." Id. at 728. The opinion recognizes that "BAPCPA changed how chapter 7 trustee compensation is to be determined." Id. at 729.[17] It suggests that the commission amount is now the starting point in the analysis, but the court must consider a variety of factors - including time spent - to determine whether the commission amount "constitutes unreasonably large compensation." Id. at 730. However the court explicitly denied that it was employing a Lodestar test.[18] The trustee was ordered to file time records. Id. at 732.

The McKinney I court makes little effort to conceal that it is substituting its own judgment for that of Congress. In the face of § 330(a)(7)'s directive that compensation "shall" be a commission, the court pejoratively responds that "slavish reliance on the amount distributed to creditors is an inappropriate way to determine reasonable compensation for chapter 7 trustees." Id. at 731. But Congress already decided the issue by enacting a commission standard. It is not the court's place to determine whether Congress' judgment is "inappropriate."

In re Mack Properties, Inc., 381 B.R. 793 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2007), relied in part on Clemens, Ward and McKinney I. The bankruptcy court concluded that "[t]he Court, pursuant to [17] Unlike Clemens, McKinney I holds that "[u]nder BAPCPA, the court is directed to apply the Lodestar approach only in determining the compensation of "an examiner, chapter 11 trustee, or professional person." Id. (emphasis in original, footnote omitted).

[18] "The court does not employ a Lodestar approach when it considers time spent along with other factors in determining whether the statutory maximum constitutes unreasonably large compensation in a particular case." Id.

the clear, unambiguous language of Sections 326 and 330, will continue to apply the reasonableness standard in Chapter 7 trustee compensation determinations." Mack Properties, 381 B.R. at 799.[19] Like McKinney I, Mack similarly acknowledges - openly - that it is substituting its judgment for that of Congress, remarking that "[e]mploying a strict maximum commission award . . . may result in unjust and inequitable results." Id.

In Mack, the trustee requested compensation in the commission amount of $39,893.75. The court declared that "[a] reasonable fee for the Trustee's services in this case is $15,000.00." Id. at 796, 799. Given the absence of an explanation for the derivation of that amount, the award has an arbitrary quality. Congress mandated a more objective standard.

In In re McKinney, 383 B.R. 490 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2008) ("McKinney II"), the court revisited § 330 after the trustee submitted the time records required by McKinney I. McKinney II correctly recognized that § 330(a)(7) "creates a presumption that the statutory maximum constitutes reasonable compensation. . . . " Id. at 492. Unfortunately it holds that the presumption can be rebutted by a factor, the consideration of which Congress forbade: the "presumption is rebutted in the present case because the statutory maximum is substantially disproportionate to the value of the services Trustee was required to perform." Id. The court elaborated:

> Section 330(a)(7) creates a presumption that the statutory maximum is reasonable compensation. If the court, after reviewing time records and all other relevant facts and circumstances, determines that the statutory maximum is not substantially disproportionate to the value of the services required from the > trustee, the court should award the statutory maximum. If, after such review, the court determines that the statutory maximum is substantially disproportionate to the value of the trustee's services, the court should award as a "reasonable commission" the maximum amount that is not substantially disproportionate to the value of the trustee's services to the estate.

[19] According to the Mack court, "[h]ad Congress intended to eliminate discretion from a compensation determination, it would have used the imperative 'shall' rather than 'may' in Section 326." Id. at 797 (footnote omitted). But Congress, as has been noted, most definitely used "shall" when discussing the commission in § 330(a)(7) - Congress directed that courts "shall" treat the § 326 amounts as a commission.

Id. at 494.

The court's "substantially disproportionate" test is merely a euphemism for the Lodestar analysis that it earlier claimed to have rejected. The test requires that fees should be reduced if the implied hourly rates are too high.[20]

In summary, the authorities are hopelessly contradictory, which should not be surprising because none of them have based their reasoning faithfully in the statute. Clemens employs a Lodestar analysis which includes the commission amount as one factor. McKinney I specifically repudiates the Lodestar approach as well as any "slavish reliance" on the commission amount mandated by Congress. It employs the commission amount as a starting point, but considers other factors to determine whether the commission amount would constitute "unreasonably large compensation." Mack Properties adopts a reasonableness standard. McKinney II recognizes a presumption requiring the commission amount unless that amount is "substantially disproportionate" to the "value" of the trustees services, in which case courts should award the maximum amount that is not substantially disproportionate.

Bankruptcy courts have, therefore, undermined and largely disregarded clearly expressed legislative intent to transform trustee compensation from reasonableness review to a commission standard. Some courts - including the court below - fail to acknowledge that the law has changed. Other courts struggle to reconcile an inherently conflicted approach - that compensation is to be a commission but must also be reasonable. The United States Trustee submits that these courts are viewing this perceived dilemma through the prism of decades of old law that afforded them unbridled discretion, as witnessed by the bankruptcy court's reliance on four (4) pre-BAPCPA cases (discussed below). As a result, these courts perceive an inconsistency where there is none - Congress in fact determined that the commission amount is presumptively reasonable, and should not be reduced according to those factors set forth in § 330(a)(3). The infirmity is in not reading the statute as a whole and according deference to what Congress sought to accomplish. The courts are placing undue emphasis on the word "reasonable" - as if applying prior law - and diminishing the "commission" requirement if not ignoring it entirely.

[20] In other words, the fee request will be reduced if the "value" of the trustee's services - presumably determined by multiplying hours spent by the trustee's hourly rate - is "substantially disproportionate," presumably meaning significantly less than the commission amount. This test obviously gives significant weight to time spent, notwithstanding the elimination of chapter 7 trustees from § 330(a)(3). We respectfully submit that Congress has already determined that the "value" of the services is the commission amount.

C. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT FAILED TO ARTICULATE OR APPLY COGNIZABLE LEGAL STANDARDS.

The bankruptcy court likewise failed faithfully to follow the BAPCPA amendments. It enunciated no cognizable legal standards for review of trustee compensation. Rather, it employed reasonableness review based largely on the very factors that it concedes were specifically made inapplicable to chapter 7 trustee compensation.[21] The bankruptcy court openly disregarded the BAPCPA amendments, as demonstrated by its statement at the December 4, 2006 hearing that it didn't "see any difference."

[21] As noted, the bankruptcy court explicitly recognized that "[s]pecifically missing from those persons to [whom] § 330(a)(3) is applicable is a Chapter 7 Trustee." Ward, 366 B.R. at 473.

The bankruptcy court began its analysis with an extended approving quotation from Clemens. Ward, 366 B.R. at 474-75. As noted, Clemens has been the fountainhead for misapplication of the law.

The bankruptcy court's opinion also contains a lengthy approving quotation from Collier on Bankruptcy, id. at 475-76. Collier predicts that the "primary effect of the change should be that, in the majority of cases, a trustee's allowed fee will presumptively be the statutory commission amount." Id. at 475. But the bankruptcy court recognizes no such presumption. Instead, the bankruptcy court relies on another passage from Collier contemplating a reasonableness standard of review that encompasses an analysis of hours expended that in many cases will be indistinguishable from the superseded Lodestar approach:

> there may be cases where the amount of "moneys disbursed" by the trustee may be very high in relation to the services performed . . . [C]ases where there are significant disbursements without a proportionate effort by the trustee, are examples of cases where the commission fee may not be reasonable. . . [C]ourts will need to assess whether the implied hourly rate is so high as to render the fee not reasonable.[22]

The bankruptcy court then applies Collier's "proportionate effort" formulation of the Lodestar.[23] It posits that an appropriate hourly fee would result in compensation of approximately $2,000, but, inexplicably, "proposes to allow Trustee Compensation in the amount of $5,000" because "the Court has always recognized that the trustees often perform services in cases where they end up with an estate of little or no value and receive little or no compensation, and therefore, been liberal in awarding trustee fees." Ward, 366 B.R. at 476.[24]

[23] The "proportionate effort" formulation - much like the "substantially disproportionate" test of McKinney II - is another euphemism for analysis of hours spent.

Notwithstanding its lengthy quotation from Clemens, the bankruptcy court did not follow Clemens by recognizing the statutory change in its analysis. Clemens at least acknowledges that a court must "consider the provisions of § 326 as a part of its reasonableness inquiry," 349 B.R. at 731 (emphasis in original), permitting § 330(a)(7) to "supplement the Court's Lodestar analysis." Id. Moreoever, Clemens concludes that courts "must now determine reasonableness with an eye on the statutory cap." Id.

But the bankruptcy court appears to regard the amendments as a nullity, employing the precise analysis that it applied pre-BAPCPA. It has said as much. It reiterated the very standards that it had applied in review of trustee compensation pre-BAPCPA, consistent with its view that nothing has changed.[25] Astonishingly, the opinion cites four (4) pre-BAPCPA cases for the proposition that "[c]ourts have emphasized repeatedly that a trustee is not entitled to the maximum fee allowed under § 326(a)." Ward, 366 B.R. at 473.[26] This citation illustrates in a microcosm the bankruptcy court's disregard for the whole point of Congress' enactment of [24] It is respectfully suggested that Congress likewise recognized this difficulty - that in many cases chapter 7 trustees receive little or no compensation - and decided to address it by mandating a commission, rather than leaving compensation decisions to the generosity of bankruptcy judges.

[25] As noted, at the December 4, 2006 hearing, the bankruptcy court stated that it would consider reasonableness "[j]ust like we did before."

[26] The cases are In re Narragansett Clothing Co., 210 B.R. 432 (1st Cir. BAP 1997); In re Biskup, 236 B.R. 332 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 1999); In re Guyana Dev. Corp., 201 B.R. 462 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 1996) and In re Lan Associates, 192 F. 3d 109 (3d Cir. 1999).

§ 330(a)(7) - to reverse those very holdings and replace them with a commission - with entitlement to maximum fee absent unusual or extraordinary factors.[27]

This court is urged to enter an order that requires the bankruptcy court to faithfully apply § 330(a)(7) in accordance with clearly expressed legislative intent. Section 330(a)(7) requires that the full commission be presumptively allowed unless circumstances are demonstrated that render the commission unreasonable, other than through factors identified in § 330(a)(3), which Congress made inapplicable to chapter 7 trustees.

IV. CONCLUSION

Congress determined that trustee compensation "shall" be treated "as a commission." Congress did not enact language permitting a bankruptcy court to award a commission unless the bankruptcy court felt that the resulting implied hourly rate would be "too high."

The bankruptcy court must therefore be reversed. It applied incorrect legal standards. On remand, the bankruptcy court should be directed to treat § 326 as a commission that can only be rebutted with specific considerations other than those identified in § 330(a)(3), as Congress imposed a strong presumption that the commission constitutes reasonable compensation.

[27] The legislative history indicates that the BAPCPA amendments "add a provision that requires a court, in determining the amount of reasonable compensation to award a trustee, to treat such compensation as a commission pursuant to section 326 of the Bankruptcy Code." H.R. 109-31, 109th Cong., 1st sess. BAPCPA of 2005 § 407 (April 8, 2005).

UNITED STATES BANKRUPTCY APPELLATE PANEL OF THE NINTH CIRCUIT

In re: Michael R. Ware Debtor	BAP No. OR-09-1082 Bk. No. 08-62504 Adv. No. 08-06200
Michael R. Ware, Appellant, v. David F. Wurst, Ronald C. Becker, United States Trustee, Appellees	BRIEF RE FINALITY OF APPELLEES UNITED STATES TRUSTEE AND RONALD C. BECKER

Appellees United States Trustee and Ronald C. Becker ("UST Appellees") submit this brief to address the issue of finality raised by the Clerk of the Court's Order Re Finality dated March 18, 2009.

BACKGROUND

Because there is not yet a record on appeal, the UST Appellees are filing concurrently with this Brief an Appendix containing the Complaint, Answer with Cross-Counter Claim, and the Appellees' Motions to Dismiss. The Order of Dismissal being appealed is already in the record as an attachment to the Notice of Appeal. Those documents establish the following fundamental facts relevant to the issue of finality:

1. This case began as an adversary proceeding filed by the United States Trustee against Appellant Michael Ware seeking to deny his bankruptcy discharge. The primary basis for the United States Trustee's action was Mr. Ware's alleged failure to disclose to the Bankruptcy Court the existence of a $35,000 settlement of an attorney malpractice claim Mr. Ware received approximately 6 months before filing his Chapter 7 bankruptcy.
2. Mr. Ware responded to the United States Trustee's complaint with an Answer which added Mr. Becker (the United States Trustee's attorney) and Appellee David Wurst (the Chapter 7 Trustee) as plaintiffs in the caption and which contained a section Mr. Ware captioned a "Cross-Counter Claim." It is the UST Appellees' belief that this section of Mr. Ware's answer is intended to state a counter-claim against the United States Trustee and third-party claims against Mr. Becker and Mr. Wurst.
3. The UST Appellees filed a motion asking the Bankruptcy Court to dismiss these "Cross-Counter Claims" against the United States Trustee and Mr. Becker, which the Bankruptcy Court did by Order dated March 3, 2009 (the "Dismissal Order"). It is that order which Mr. Ware has appealed.
4. The United States Trustee's original complaint seeking denial of discharge has not been resolved and is still pending before the Bankruptcy Court.

DISCUSSION

The Dismissal Order is not a final order because it only resolves Mr. Ware's claims against the UST Appellees and Mr. Wurst, and does not resolve the United States Trustee's claim against Mr. Ware seeking denial of his discharge. That issue is still being litigated in the Bankruptcy Court. Because the Dismissal Order does not resolve all the claims of all the parties and because there is no Rule 54(b) finality certification that order is not final. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7054(a) (incorporating Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(b) into adversary proceedings). A bankruptcy court's 12(b)(6) order dismissing only some of the claims (there a counterclaim) in an adversary proceeding is interlocutory and is not appealable without a Rule 54(b) certification. In re King City Transit Mix, Inc., 738 F.2d 1065 (9th Cir. 1984).

Neither is there a basis for granting leave to appeal in this case. There is no significant legal issue necessitating early review involved here; only the issue of whether the allegations contained in Mr. Ware's "Cross-Counter Claim" state an actionable claim against the UST Appellees. Furthermore, an immediate appeal in this case would not result in more efficient litigation. Quite to the contrary, reversing the Bankruptcy Court at this stage of the case would re-inject the disruption caused by Mr. Ware's tactic of naming the United States Trustee's attorney as a party.

In addition to all the usual factors which disfavor piecemeal appeals, the current procedural posture of the case allows the United States Trustee to proceed with his discharge denial claim in the normal course of such litigation with his normal counsel. Once the litigation of that claim is complete, if Mr. Ware's claims are still relevant he may pursue them by appeal or by a request for reconsideration to the Bankruptcy Court. Even if the Order of Dismissal is then overturned on appeal, the impact of Mr. Ware's tactic on the discharge denial litigation will be avoided. Given that the United States Trustee's denial of discharge claim is factually distinct from Mr. Ware's "Cross-Counter Claim,"[1] such a result will not result in litigation-related inefficiencies.

CONCLUSION

The Dismissal Order is not a final order and may not be appealed as a matter of right. Leave to appeal should not be granted because there is no significant legal issue presented. Allowing an interlocutory appeal would complicate the litigation and make it more expensive, resulting in litigation inefficiencies. This appeal should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This appeal calls upon this Court to interpret a statutory provision affecting chapter 13 bankruptcy cases, 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Section 1325(b)(3) makes two chapter 7 provisions – 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B) – applicable to chapter 13 cases.

The United States has a direct interest in the proper construction of these provisions because United States Trustees, who are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General, supervise the administration of chapter 7 and chapter 13 bankruptcy cases in all federal judicial districts within this circuit. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977) (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena."); Charges of Unprofessional Conduct Against 199-37 v. Stuart, 249 F.3d 821, 824 (8th Cir. 2001) (citing this legislative history).

This appeal affects the United States' interests for two distinct reasons:

First, by applying section 1325(b)(3), this Court will determine how much above-median-income chapter 13 debtors must repay their creditors in their chapter 13 repayment plans. The United States has an interest in that question because United States Trustees "supervise the administration of [chapter 13] cases and trustees," monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such chapter 13 plans in connection with plan confirmation hearings under section 1324 of the Code. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

Second, because section 1325(b)(3) incorporates two parts of the chapter 7 means test, sections 707(b)(2)(A) and (B), this appeal will also determine what expenses above-median-income chapter 7 debtors can claim on the means test. The means test determines whether an above-median-income debtor's chapter 7 case should be dismissed as abusive. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1) and (2).

United States Trustees play a unique role in chapter 7 means test cases because section 704(b) requires them to review all such cases and, whenever a case is deemed presumptively abusive under the statute, either (a) seek its dismissal, or (b) file a statement declining to seek dismissal. See 11 U.S.C. 704(b). See also Schultz v. United States, 2008 WL 2229495 at *2 (6th Cir. June 2, 2008) (describing the United States Trustee's duties to enforce the chapter 7 means test under the 2005 Act). In fiscal year 2007, United States Trustees filed 3,370 motions to dismiss under section 707(b)(2) and 1,441 statements declining to seek dismissal when a presumption of abuse existed in a case.

Given these interests, the United States submits this brief to share its views on the application of sections 1325(b)(3) and 707(b)(2)(A). See 28 U.S.C. 517 (authorizing the Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States"). See also 11 U.S.C. 307 ("The United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding.").

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

The Bankruptcy Code allows debtors to claim a vehicle ownership expense, in a set amount, when it is "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The expense amount is a standardized dollar value debtors may claim to account for vehicle loan or lease payments. The debtor in this case claimed such a set amount even though he has no loan or lease payments.

The question presented is: Did the bankruptcy court err in ruling Mr. Washburn could claim that expense amount when he had no associated expense?

STATUTORY BACKGROUND

This appeal involves the interpretation of provisions added to the Bankruptcy

Code, 11 U.S.C. 101, et seq., by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.[1] The 2005 Act significantly altered how chapter 13 debtors obtain chapter 13 bankruptcy relief.

In a chapter 13 case, a debtor's unsecured creditors or trustee may insist the debtor devote all of his "projected disposable income" to repay unsecured creditors over a period of up to five years. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). Disposable income is a net number: income less allowed expenses.

Under the 2005 Act, an above-median-income debtor, like Mr. Washburn, determines disposable income by first calculating his gross income.[2] Next, the debtor deducts permitted expenses. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2).

Above-median-income chapter 13 debtors determine their permitted expenses by employing the formula found in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B). 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3) (incorporating those provisions). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) permits debtors to deduct (a) certain prescribed "actual" expenses, and (b) other "applicable" expense amounts. Applicable expense amounts are not the debtor's actual expenses. Instead, they are the static amounts listed in the Internal Revenue Service's Local and National Standards.[3] Id. Last, a debtor may deduct additional expenses identified in other subsections of section 707(b)(2)(A). That yields a net number – disposable income, which establishes the minimum an above-median-income debtor must pay to unsecured creditors under a chapter 13 plan. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B).

[1] Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005). The 2005 Act applies to Mr. Washburn's case, because the act's general effective date is for cases filed on or after October 17, 2005.

[2] The Bankruptcy Code defines income as "current monthly income received by the debtor." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). It defines "current monthly income" in 11 U.S.C. 101(10A).

This appeal poses a question about one part of the expense-side calculation of disposable income – whether a standardized vehicle ownership amount deduction is "applicable" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) when the debtor has no associated vehicle ownership expense. Mr. Washburn has no loan or lease payments on his vehicle, so this appeal requires this Court to determine whether he may nonetheless claim the IRS Local Standard expense amount of $471 for each month of his 60-month plan.

[3] The IRS Collection Financial Standards are in this brief's addendum. Because Mr. Washburn filed his case on March 15, 2007, the Collection Financial Standards in effect prior to October 1, 2007, are applicable. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (stating that the IRS standards will be those "as in effect on the date of the order for relief").

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On March 15, 2007, Mr. Washburn filed a voluntary petition under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. See Appellant eCAST Settlement Corporation's App. pp. 6-8.[4] His means test form calculated monthly disposable income of $379.73.[5] Id. at p. 36. In making this calculation, Mr. Washburn claimed on his means test form a $471 monthly vehicle ownership expense deduction under the IRS Local Standard, although he owns his vehicle free and clear of any loan or lease obligation. Id. at p. 14, p. 18,[6] p. 34, line 28.

Mr. Washburn's chapter 13 repayment plan proposed to pay $430 monthly to unsecured creditors over 60 months. Id. at p. 41.

[4] Appellant eCAST Settlement Corporation's Appendix was filed in Case No. 08-8023, which has been consolidated with this appeal.

[5] The chapter 13 means test form, Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22C, facilitates the computation of a chapter 13 debtor's income and expenses under the 2005 Act.

The means test form was approved by the Judicial Conference of the United States and the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure require all chapter 13 debtors to file the form. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(b)(6).

[6] If Mr. Washburn's vehicle were subject to a loan or lease obligation, he would have reported that fact on either Schedule D, titled "Creditors Holding Secured Claims," or Schedule G, titled "Executory Contracts and Unexpired Leases."

The chapter 13 trustee and an unsecured creditor, eCAST, each objected to confirmation of Mr. Washburn's plan. Id. at pp. 46 - 52. They argued Mr. Washburn could not reduce creditor payments by claiming a vehicle ownership expense amount because he had no associated vehicle ownership expenses. They alleged that striking that inapplicable expense amount yields monthly disposable income of $861.26 to repay unsecured creditors. Id. at pp. 46 - 57, pp. 75 - 89. This is $390.26 more than Mr. Washburn's plan proposed paying his creditors. Mr. Washburn countered that he was entitled to claim the expense amount regardless of whether his car was paid in full. Id. at pp. 68 - 74.

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas overruled the objections of the trustee and eCAST and confirmed Mr. Washburn's plan. Id. at pp. 90 - 92. In so doing, the bankruptcy court adopted the reasoning of In re Wilson, 373 B.R. 638 (Bankr. W.D. Ark. 2007), which held debtors may deduct the standardized vehicle ownership expense amount even when they have no associated vehicle ownership expenses.[7] Id. at p. 91.

On April 15, 2008, the bankruptcy court certified its decision for direct

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Mr. Robert Earl Washburn, a chapter 13 debtor, seeks to shield $28,260 from his creditors by claiming a standardized vehicle ownership expense amount under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).[8] The bankruptcy court allowed Mr. Washburn to claim this expense amount, overruling separate objections lodged by the chapter 13 trustee who administers Mr. Washburn's chapter 13 bankruptcy case, and by one of Mr. Washburn's creditors. That ruling conflicts with a ruling of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Eighth Circuit, Babin v. Wilson (In re Wilson), 383 B.R. 729 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008), and with the overwhelming weight of bankruptcy appellate panel and district court rulings.[9]

[8] Section 1325(b)(3) incorporates section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) into Mr. Washburn's chapter 13 bankruptcy case.

June 12, 2008) (divided court concluded that "applicable" simply directs debtors to pick out and use the dollar amounts set forth in tables published by the Internal Revenue Service as part of the IRS's Local Standards); United States Trustee v. Vesper (In

Mr. Washburn cannot claim this standardized expense amount because section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) restricts it to "applicable" cases. The standardized vehicle ownership amount deduction is not applicable in Mr. Washburn's case because he has no associated vehicle ownership expense.

Reading the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as limiting expense amounts to debtors who have associated expenses is the best construction of this section because it (1) uses the ordinary dictionary meaning of "applicable," and does so in a way that gives meaning to each word in the section; (2) fulfills Congress' stated reasons for enacting the section; (3) determines expense eligibility in the same way the Internal Revenue Service does "under" the IRS standards referenced in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I); and (4) most equitably implements bankruptcy policy - both for debtors and for creditors.

1. Giving "applicable" its ordinary definition in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) yields a statute that allows debtors who have monthly expenses to claim the expense amount set out in the IRS Standards. At the same time, it prevents debtors who lack monthly expenses from claiming phantom expense amounts. This construction also gives meaning to every word in the section, something the bankruptcy court's construction does not.

2. The 2005 Act's legislative history supports this interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The Act's House Report reveals Congress enacted the new law to ensure debtors would repay their debts when they were able, and to eliminate loopholes and incentives for debtor abuse in discharging debts when a portion could be repaid. Allowing Mr. Washburn to claim a fictional expense amount diverges from the purpose of the 2005 Act.

3. Reading "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to require a loan or lease payment also has the salutary effect of applying the means test in a manner that is consistent with the IRS's refusal to allow taxpayers to deduct nonexistent vehicle ownership expenses under its Local Standards. This is significant because section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s text and its legislative history indicate Congress wanted courts to employ the IRS's methodology in determining whether debtors may deduct standard expense amounts.

4. It also fosters sound public policy. Barring above-median-income debtors like Mr. Washburn from claiming inapplicable ownership expense amounts is fair because it simply prevents them from claiming something they do not have. This interpretation does not hurt lower-income debtors, because they are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). It is also fair to creditors because they will receive payments on their debts when debtors have the financial ability to repay.

Finally, the bankruptcy system has two safety valves to ensure that higher-income debtors without loan or lease payments will not suffer by being denied phantom vehicle expenses. First, when they have older vehicles, they receive an additional $200 monthly expense allowance for up to two vehicles to fund the operation of these older vehicles. Second, these chapter 13 debtors can modify their court confirmed repayment plan under section 1329(a) if they require a new car during the course of repaying their creditors.

ARGUMENT

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN RULING THAT DEBTORS CAN CLAIM A VEHICLE OWNERSHIP DEDUCTION UNDER SECTION 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE EVEN WHEN THEY HAVE NO VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSES.

The United States asks this Court to reverse the bankruptcy court's ruling that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows Mr. Washburn to reduce his disposable income available to repay creditors by claiming an inapplicable vehicle ownership expense. This case presents an issue of statutory interpretation that this Court reviews de novo. In re Juhl Enters, Inc., 921 F.2d 800, 802 (8th Cir. 1990).

I. A vehicle ownership expense amount is "applicable" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) only when a debtor is making a corresponding loan or lease payments on the vehicle.

A. Vehicle ownership expense amounts are not "applicable" to a debtor who makes no loan or lease payment on a vehicle.

The Bankruptcy Code permits above-median-income individuals to claim a vehicle ownership expense amount when that expense is "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service. . . ." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added).

"Applicable" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code, so the word should be given its ordinary meaning. Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning."); Cudworth v. Midcontinent Commc'ns, 380 F.3d 375, 381 (8th Cir. 2004) (same). This Court "often turns to a commonly used dictionary to ascertain a word's ordinary meaning." Schumacher v. Cargill Meat Solutions Corp., 515 F.3d 867, 871 (8th Cir. 2008).

The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean "capable of being applied:

having relevance . . . fit, suitable, or right to be applied: APPROPRIATE" Webster's Third New International Dictionary at 105 (1981) (emphasis in original).

The bankruptcy court's ruling is inconsistent with the ordinary, common sense definition of "applicable" because it allows debtors like Mr. Washburn to deduct a monthly vehicle loan/lease expense amount when they have no associated monthly loan or lease expenses on their vehicles. See In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762 (E.D. Wis. 2007) (section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not make such "fixed allowances guaranteed to every car owner").

The point here is simple – a debtor has no section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) vehicle ownership expense amounts that are "capable of being applied" to him if he does not make any loan or lease payments. Ransom v. MBNA America Bank, N.A. (In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 799, 807-08 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007). The overwhelming majority of lower appellate decisions agree on this point, and reject the bankruptcy court's contrary interpretation. Babin v. Wilson (In re Wilson), 383 B.R. 729 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008); Grossman v. Sawdy (In re Sawdy), 384 B.R. 199 (E.D. Wis. 2008); Wieland v. Thomas (In re Thomas), 382 B.R. 793 (D. Kan. 2008); Meade v. McVay (In re Meade), 384 B.R. 132 (W.D. Tex. 2008); United States Trustee v. Deadmond (In re Deadmond), 2008 WL 191165 (D. Mont. Jan. 22, 2008); Fokkena

v. Hartwick (In re Hartwick), 373 B.R. 645 (D. Minn. 2007); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762 (E.D. Wis. 2007); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807-08. But see Hildebrand v. Kimbro (In re Kimbro), 2008 WL 2369141 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. June 12, 2008) (divided court concluded that "applicable" simply directs debtors to pick out and use the dollar amounts set forth in tables published by the Internal Revenue Service as part of the IRS's Local Standards); In re Vesper, No. 3:07-cv-00130, slip op. at 3 - 4 (D. Alaska June 12, 2008) (unpublished opinion) (finding ownership costs are "applicable" as long as a debtor owns a vehicle).

B. The bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) suffers from three flaws the Eighth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel's interpretation in Babin v. Wilson avoids: (a) conflating "applicable" with "actual," (b) rendering "applicable" superfluous, and (c) misinterpreting the official means test form.

The bankruptcy court followed the reasoning of the bankruptcy court in In re Wilson, 373 B.R. 638 (Bankr. W.D. Ark. 2007), rev'd 383 B.R. 729 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008). Like the Wilson bankruptcy court, the court below concluded section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) entitles debtors to claim vehicle ownership expenses, even when they have no loan or lease payment. Id. Neither bankruptcy court reads "applicable" as an eligibility requirement. Instead, they conclude "nothing" contained in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) or Form 22C requires debtors to "have current automobile ownership expense[s] as a prerequisite to claiming the [IRS vehicle ownership expense]," so all debtors can claim the expense amount for every vehicle they own. In re Wilson, 373 B.R. at 644.

This interpretation suffers from at least three flaws:

First, it confuses the distinction between the words "actual" and "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The court below ruled that conditioning an expense amount deduction upon the existence of an expense would require "applicable" to mean "actual" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). See Appellant eCAST Settlement Corporation's App. at p. 91.[10] (relying upon Wilson, 373 B.R. at 643-44). This gave the court pause because both these words appear in different parts of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Id. This led the court to rule "applicable" cannot mean debtors must have an associated expense because that would give identical meaning to two different words Congress used in the same statute. Id.

This conclusion fails to recognize the words "applicable" and "actual" have different meanings in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) because "expense amounts" – the words following "applicable" in the statute – do not refer to "actual" costs. In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650 (recognizing that a debtor's "actual" expense does not control the amount of the vehicle ownership deduction" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)). To the contrary, vehicle expense amounts are static numbers drawn from the IRS Local and National Standards; they are not the debtor's actual vehicle ownership expenses. These fixed amounts are used regardless of the debtor's "actual" expenses.[11] Id.

Because "applicable" and "actual" have different meanings, the bankruptcy court's concern about overlapping definitions was simply incorrect, and led to an incorrect reading of the statute. See In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (the United States' reading "gives meaning to the distinction between 'applicable' and 'actual' without taking a further step to conclude that 'applicable' means 'nonexistent' or 'fictional.'"); In re Thomas, 2008 WL 597586 at *4 (same); In re Meade, 382 B.R. at 798 (same).

The bankruptcy court's reading would be wrong, however, even if "applicable" and "actual" meant the same thing in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). As the Supreme Court has recognized, there is nothing wrong with two different words within a single section being synonyms. Wachovia Bank v. Schmidt, 546 U.S. 303, 314 (2006) (noting "Congress may well have comprehended the words 'located' and 'established,' as used in [28 U.S.C.] § 1348, not as contrasting, but as synonymous or alternative terms"). Therefore, even should this Court conclude that "applicable" is synonymous with "actual" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Mr. Washburn would remain ineligible for a vehicle ownership expense amount because he has no "actual" ownership expenses.

See also In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650 (recognizing that any vehicle ownership expense will make a debtor eligible for the full IRS standard amount).

Second, the bankruptcy court's reading of "applicable" renders it superfluous. Under its reading, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would have the same meaning without the word "applicable" in it. The bankruptcy court in Wilson suggests the word simply instructs debtors to go to the IRS standards referenced in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) and locate the standard dollar figure it establishes for a debtor's locality and for the number of vehicles the debtor has. In re Wilson, 373 B.R. at 642-43. But debtors would do the same thing if the word were not in the statute because the statute would then read "[t]he debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's ~~applicable~~ monthly expense amounts" under the IRS standards. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). Striking out the word "applicable" would still lead the debtor to the same line under the Local Standards that the bankruptcy court suggests the word "applicable" exists to accomplish. In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (E.D. Wis. 2007) ("Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) [without using the word 'applicable.']"); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (concluding that the Debtors' construction would "read[] 'applicable' right out of the Bankruptcy Code"); In re Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4 ("The word ['applicable] must mean something, and if some monthly expenses are applicable, then other monthly expenses are not applicable.").

Because the bankruptcy court's reading renders "applicable" superfluous, the word must have a different meaning than the one the court ascribed. See generally Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004)(courts "must, if possible, construe a statue to give every word some operative effect"); United States v. Gomez-Hernandez, 300 F.3d 974, 979 (8th Cir. 2002) (observing that courts should "avoid a statutory construction that would render another part of the same statute superfluous."). As we explain above, the word "applicable" does have a different meaning. Under its dictionary meaning, the word exists to allow debtors to claim a standard vehicle expense amount that is applicable because they have a loan or lease expense.[12]

Third, the Wilson bankruptcy court and the court below were wrong in concluding the means test form allows debtors to claim vehicle ownership amounts when they do not have associated expenses. See In re Wilson, 373 B.R. 638, 642

[12] Section 707(b)(2) includes the proviso that monthly expenses may not include any "payments for debts." Although not raised by the bankruptcy court in this case, two members of a divided Sixth Circuit bankruptcy appellate panel recently found that this provision establishes that Congress intended to allow an ownership expense even when a debtor has no debt payment on a vehicle. In re Kimbro, 2008 WL 2369141 at * 4. This reading misinterprets the term "payments for debts." Debtors for whom the ownership expense is applicable receive a fixed standard allowance that is the dollar amount under the applicable standard. This is not a "payment for a debt." Cf. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) (which allows an expense deduction for a debtor's actual average monthly secured debt payments to creditors). The "payment for debts" language exists merely to ensure debtors do not double-deduct their actual payments for debts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) and then claim overlapping expenses for certain categories in the IRS's Other Necessary Expenses, such as secured debt payments and repayment of delinquent tax debts, as those are already allowed elsewhere under the means test. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.10, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html#d0e195695. (listing categories of Other Necessary Expenses). See also 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) (permitting deduction for secured debts under the means test) and 707(b)(2)(A)(iv) (permitting deduction for tax debts under the means test). And it also ensures debtors do not deduct their student loan payments under the means test, even though the IRS categorizes them as an "Other Necessary Expense." See In re Knight, 370 B.R. 429, 436-37 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2007) (concluding that the plain language of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) "precludes deduction" of student loan payments as an expense under the means test).

(opining that if Form 22C “is filled out correctly the debtor is always allowed at least the standard ownership cost regardless of the existence of or the amount of an actual automobile expense payment”). See also Official Form 22C, line 28 (the portion of the chapter 13 means test form that permits debtors to “claim” vehicle ownership expenses).

First, the form merely instructs debtors to “check the number of vehicles for which you claim an ownership/lease expense.” Official Form 22C, line 28 (emphasis added). It does not define what ownership expense amounts debtors may lawfully deduct under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Nor does it purport to define “applicable”.

Second, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) determines which “applicable” expense amounts debtors may deduct – not the form. See In re Lasowski, 384 B.R. 205 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008) (noting that the Bankruptcy Code, not the chapter 13 means test form, controls the calculation of amounts to be excluded from disposable income). And federal law prohibits an official form from being interpreted as altering the meaning of “applicable” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). 28 U.S.C. 2075 (providing that the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure “shall not abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right”); In re Beaty, 306 F.3d 914, 924 (9th Cir.

2002) ("[A] Bankruptcy Rule cannot create an exception to the Bankruptcy Code . . . ") (internal quotation omitted) In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 805 n. 13 ("[N]ational or local forms are only valid to the extent that they conform to the substantive provisions of the Bankruptcy Code," and "it is axiomatic that guidelines in a form cannot stand as independent authority in opposition to the Bankruptcy Code itself.")

II. Reading section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to limit vehicle ownership expense amounts to debtors with loan or lease payments fulfills two goals Congress expressed in enacting the 2005 Act: ensuring that above-median-income debtors repay their debts when they can, and eliminating abuse.

A. Congress passed the 2005 Act to maximize debtor repayment to creditors and to eliminate opportunities for bankruptcy abuse.

In interpreting "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), this Court may look to its legislative history to determine the statute's objectives and illuminate its text. Porter v. Commissioner, 856 F.2d 1205, 1209 (8th Cir. 1988) (examining legislative history to determine meaning of word undefined in a statute).

The "heart" of the 2005 Act is the means test, which seeks to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89.[13] Cf. In re Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798 ("If a debtor were permitted a car ownership allowance when he actually incurs no such expense, application of the means test would not accurately reflect the debtor's ability to repay creditors, and the purpose of the statue would be frustrated."). The 2005 Act also seeks to eliminate "loopholes and incentives" in the system "that allow and – sometimes – even encourage opportunistic personal filings and abuse." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5, 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 92.

Ensuring that above-median-income debtors claim vehicle ownership expense amounts only when they have associated ownership expenses fulfills Congress' intent that such debtors repay their debts when they are able. See In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 ("The statute is only concerned about protecting the debtor's ability to continue owning a car, and if the debtor already owns the car, the debtor is adequately protected."); In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807 ("[W]hat is important is the payments that debtors actually make, not how many cars they own, because the payments that debtors make are what actually affect their ability to make payments to their creditors."); Babin v. Wilson (B.A.P.), 383 B.R. at 733 (noting that for above-median-income chapter 13 debtors, the "purpose" of the 2005 Act was to "require" such debtors "to make more funds available to their unsecured creditors").

B. The bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would yield results that conflict with congressional intent.

The bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would frustrate the 2005 Act's goal of proper repayment by allowing above-median-income debtors to claim phantom expenses that do not apply to them.[14] In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 (when a debtor "has no monthly ownership expenses, it makes no sense to deduct an ownership expense to shield it from creditors.").

Under the bankruptcy court's reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), a higher-income debtor with an inoperable car "rusting away in his backyard" could claim the ownership expense amount simply because the car is an "automobile" and he "owns" it. In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 768. This statutory reading has been rejected by lower appellate courts because it "defies common sense." In re Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4.

[14] By incorrectly allowing Mr. Washburn to deduct $471 in monthly ownership expense amounts for nonexistent costs in calculating disposable income, the bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would reduce payments to creditors by $28,260 over his 60-month plan (60 months x $471 = $28,260).

III. The bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is inconsistent with the IRS's refusal to allow parties to claim nonexistent vehicle ownership expenses under its Local Standard.

Reversal of the bankruptcy court's order allowing Mr. Washburn to deduct vehicle ownership expenses that he does not have has the additional benefit of treating inapplicable phantom expenses in bankruptcy cases the way the IRS has long treated them. There are two reasons why this is so.

First, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)'s text requires that expense amounts be those established "under" the IRS standards. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). This textual "reference to amounts specified 'under' the Standards indicates that one should use the numbers that result when the Standards are applied as they usually are." In re Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798. Given the text of the statute, "the most logical resource to consult is the IRS" to determine whether the IRS's Local Standard is "applicable" to a particular debtor. In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650-51.

Under its Local Standard for vehicle ownership, the IRS prohibits vehicle ownership deductions if an individual has no loan or lease payments. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15 § 5.15.1.7(4.B) (providing that if a taxpayer has no vehicle loan or lease payments, the Local Standard ownership cost cannot be claimed by the taxpayer); id., §

5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

The bankruptcy court's construction improperly applies section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to allow the nonexistent expenses that the IRS disallows under its Local Standards. Accord In re Sawdy, 2008 WL 789116 at *4 (finding it "logical to look at the actual IRS Collection Financial Standards in determining the applicable expense Standards in bankruptcy actions"); In re Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798 ("[I]t does not appear that Congress intended to adopt only the numbers contained in the Standards without the context and meaning provided by the IRS in creating the Standards and in its normal application of those numbers.").

Second, Congress was interested in more than the mere numbers found in the IRS Local Standards in crafting section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The Act's House Report explains that the debtor's monthly expenses "must be the applicable monthly expense amounts set forth in the [IRS] Financial Analysis Handbook as Necessary Expenses under the National and Local Standards categories." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 99-100 (2005).[15] The Financial Analysis Handbook provides that the Local

[15] In a recent decision, a divided Sixth Circuit bankruptcy appellate panel ignored the relevant legislative history and instead applied legislative history from an unenacted version of bankruptcy reform legislation considered by a prior Congress. In re Kimbro, 2008 WL 2369141 at *6. This led the panel majority to conclude the 2005 Act meant to exclude consideration of the Internal Revenue

Standard ownership cost cannot be claimed if a taxpayer has no vehicle loan or lease payments. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html.

IV. Barring above-median-income debtors from claiming phantom vehicle ownership expenses implements sound bankruptcy policy.

A. Reading section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to limit vehicle ownership expenses to debtors with a loan or lease payment is fair to debtors and creditors.

Reading section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to limit vehicle ownership expenses to debtors with a loan or lease payment is fair. This is so because it establishes a threshold – the existence of vehicle loan or lease payments – for claiming a standardized ownership expense amount, one that is consistent for all chapter 13 debtors. Significantly, section 1325(b)(2) independently requires below-median-income debtors to incur an expense to claim a deduction. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2) (allowing such debtors only "reasonably necessary" expenses). Reading "applicable" as requiring above-median-income debtors to have an associated Manual. Id. This conclusion suffers from two flaws. First, the language of the 2005 Act does not indicate any intent to preclude reference to the IRS's application of its own expense standards and requires that deductions be taken "under" the Local Standards. Second, the legislative history of the 2005 Act specifically references the IRS Financial Analysis Handbook in describing "applicable" expense amounts. See H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 99-100 (2005).

expenses means these debtors will not be able to claim phantom expenses that less wealthy debtors cannot.

Nor does our interpretation adversely affect below-median income debtors – those most likely to file bankruptcy petitions – because such debtors are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). These below-median-income debtors represent approximately 73% of the men and women who seek chapter 13 protection.[16] Similarly, in chapter 7 bankruptcies, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) only applies to the 10% of debtors with above-median incomes.[17] See Schultz v. United States, 2008 WL 2229495 at *1 (6th Cir. June 2, [16] There were 307,521 non-business chapter 13 cases filed in fiscal year 2007. See U.S. Courts, Bankruptcy Statistics, 2007 Fiscal Year by Chapter, available at http://www.uscourts.gov/bnkrpctystats/sept2007/f2table.xls. Of these cases, the United States estimates that 83,030 cases may have been filed by above-median-income debtors. The United States' estimate is based on a 2006 survey conducted by RAND across a sample of nine judicial districts that estimated that 27% of chapter 13 cases were filed by above-median-income debtors. See The Bankruptcy Abuse and Consumer Protection Act of 2005: Evaluation of the Effects of Using IRS Expense Standards to Calculate a Debtor's Monthly Disposable Income, RAND Institute for Civil Justice at x, 23, available at www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/public_affairs/reports_studies/index.htm.

[17] During fiscal year 2007, according to data collected by the United States Trustee Program, 451,012 non-business chapter 7 cases were filed nationwide, excluding the judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina, whose data were not collected. Of these chapter 7 cases, only 10% had above-median incomes and were thereby subject to the means test and the requirements of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

2008) (noting that under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(7), the presumption of abuse cannot arise with respect to below-median-income debtors).

Our interpretation is also fair to creditors. Congress enacted the 2005 Act because under prior law "some bankruptcy debtors are able to repay a significant portion of their debts" but were not required to do so. H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92. Our interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) ensures that above-median-income debtors will not avoid repaying their debts by claiming expense amounts when those debtors have no associated expense.

B. Other Bankruptcy Code provisions adequately protect above-median-income debtors who own vehicles, but lack vehicle ownership expenses.

Notwithstanding our reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), at least two safety valves are available to prevent hardships against above-median-income debtors who own vehicles but have no vehicle ownership expenses.

First, every debtor who owns a vehicle, whether or not it is subject to a loan or lease payment, receives an unrelated vehicle operating expense under the IRS

Local Standards.[18] And, debtors who own unencumbered vehicles that are six or more years old or have 75,000 or more miles, also receive an additional $200 in monthly vehicle expense deduction per vehicle. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Pt. 5, ch. 8, § 5.8.5.5.2 ("Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses"), available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.htm. See also In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (recognizing $200 additional allowance); In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same); Babin v. Wilson (B.A.P.), 383 B.R. at 734 (same).

Second, if any debtor needs a new vehicle during the course of his chapter 13 plan, the debtor can move to modify his plan to reduce payments to creditors to account for the new expense. See 11 U.S.C. 1329(a); Babin v. Wilson, 383 B.R. 729, 734 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008) ("[I]n the event a debtor needs a new car during the course of a case, the debtor can move to modify the plan based on changed circumstances."). For debtors who require a new vehicle, plan modification is appropriate because financing the vehicle usually indicates a substantial change in a debtor's ability to pay that was not already taken into account at the time of plan confirmation. Cf. Education Assistance Corp. v. Zellner, 827 F.2d 1222, 1226 (8th Cir. 1987)(noting that if the debtor's income increased in the future, the creditor could move to modify the debtor's plan under section 1329(a)).

[18] Operating expenses include vehicle insurance, maintenance, fuel, state and local registration, required inspection, parking fees, tolls, and driver's license fees. In a recent decision, a divided Sixth Circuit bankruptcy appellate panel incorrectly characterized many of these operating expenses as "ownership expenses" and failed to acknowledge that all debtors who incur operating expenses receive the allowance under the IRS Local Standards. In re Kimbro, 2008 WL 2369141 at *11-12.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas and remand for further proceedings.

Respectfully submitted,

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLEE

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b) and 1334(a) to issue its final order dismissing the chapter 11 bankruptcy case of Mr. Gary Washington and Mrs. Michele Washington. The bankruptcy court entered its dismissal order on September 27, 2010. On October 5, 2010, the Washingtons filed a notice of appeal, which is timely under 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a) and (c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) . This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), a statutory provision under which district courts have jurisdiction to hear appeals from final judgments, orders, and decrees of bankruptcy judges.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by dismissing the Washingtons' chapter 11 petition under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b)(4)[1], which allows courts to dismiss chapter 11 cases for cause.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews a decision of the bankruptcy court dismissing a case under § 1112(b) for abuse of discretion. Jackson v. United States, 131 F.3d 134 (4th Cir. 1997). "A reviewing court may determine that the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion only when there is a definite and firm conviction that the court below committed a clear error of judgment." Id. This occurs when "(1) the decision was based on an erroneous conclusion of law, (2) the record contains no evidence on which the bankruptcy court could have based its decision, or (3) the factual findings are clearly erroneous." Id.

A finding of fact is clearly erroneous "when although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed" Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573 (1985).

[1] All further references to the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 101 et seq., will be by section number only.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On August 4, 2010, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the Washingtons' case under § 1112(b) because they (1) repeatedly failed to comply with the Bankruptcy Code's reporting requirements and (2) had no prospect for successfully reorganizing. The bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee and dismissed the Washingtons' case. The Washingtons appealed the dismissal order to this Court.

STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

I. Dismissal Under § 1112(b)

Section 1112(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a debtor's case may be dismissed or converted for "cause."[2] Section 1112(b)(4) then lists several subsections that

[2] Effective December 20, 2010, § 1112(b) was amended to read as follows:

> (b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) and subsection (c), on request of a party in interest, and after notice and a hearing, the court shall convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 or dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interests of creditors and the estate, for cause unless the court determines that the appointment under section 1104(a) of a trustee or an examiner is in the best interests of creditors and the estate.
> (2) The court may not convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 or dismiss a case under this chapter if the court finds and specifically identifies unusual circumstances establishing that converting or dismissing the case is not in the best interests of creditors and the estate, and the debtor or any other party in interest establishes that—
>> (A) there is a reasonable likelihood that a plan will be confirmed within the time frames established in sections 1121(e) and 1129(e) of this title, or if such sections do not apply, within a reasonable period of time; and
>> (B) the grounds for granting such relief include an act or omission of the debtor other than under paragraph (4)(A)—
>>> (i) for which there exists a reasonable justification for the act or omission; and >>> (ii) that will be cured within a reasonable period of time fixed by the court.

The amendment does not impact this case.

provide examples of cause, which “includes —

> (A) substantial or continuing loss or diminution of the estate and the absence of reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation;
>
> (F) unexcused failure to satisfy timely any filing or reporting requirement established by this title or by any rule applicable to a case under this chapter; and
> (J) failure to file a disclosure statement, or to file or confirm a plan, within the time fixed by this title or by order of the court.”

§§ 1112(b)(4)(A), (F), (J). Under § 102(3), the term “including” is “not limiting,” so §1112(b)(4)’s list is not exhaustive.

II. The Proposal and Confirmation of Chapter 11 Reorganization Plans

A chapter 11 debtor may file a reorganization plan at any time, including when the case is commenced. § 1121. This plan must conform to the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code, be accepted by the creditors, and be confirmed by the bankruptcy court before the debtor may enact the reorganization plan. §§ 1123 (establishing requirements for the content of a plan), 1126 (requiring creditor acceptance of a plan), 1129 (establishing requirements for the bankruptcy court to confirm a plan). Before a debtor may solicit support for a reorganization plan, it must also provide creditors with a disclosure statement providing "adequate information" allowing a creditor to make an "informed judgment" about the viability of the reorganization plan. § 1125. The disclosure statement often includes historic information, assumptions, accounting and valuation calculations, anticipated litigation, management information, business conditions, tax consequences, and other legal, financial, or economic circumstances that would be relevant to a creditor's decision to accept or reject a proposed plan.

Disclosure statements must be approved by the bankruptcy court. § 1125(b). The South Carolina Local Bankruptcy Rules establish a timeline for this process.

SCLBR 3016-1(a) provides: "Unless otherwise ordered by the Court, a disclosure statement and plan of reorganization shall be filed by the debtor or trustee no later than one hundred eighty (180) days after entry of the order for relief. The debtor, trustee, or other plan proponent shall prosecute its disclosure statement and plan in a timely manner."

SCLBR 3016-1(c) provides: "Denial of Confirmation. If any plan of reorganization or disclosure statement filed by the debtor, trustee, or other plan proponent is not confirmed or approved by the Court, any amendment, modification, or supplement necessary to correct the deficiency must be filed within fourteen (14) days or whatever time period the Court may require. Failure to timely comply may be deemed a failure to prosecute the case and may constitute grounds for dismissal or conversion without further notice or hearing."

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

On November 2, 2009, the Washingtons filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Chapter 11 Voluntary Petition filed on 11/2/09. The Washingtons own almost $1 million in property. Summary of Schedules. In addition to their residence, they own two time shares — one in Orlando and the other in Myrtle Beach — and three rental properties, including a business park for entrepreneurs and two residential buildings. See Schedule A - Real Property. The Washingtons have a variety of businesses for which Mr. Washington is primarily responsible. Statement of Financial Affairs at 8; See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 60, lines 20-24. Mr. Washington's primary business is Carolina Procurement Institute (CPI), which is operated out of the Gervais business park, and is a consulting firm assisting small businesses. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 9.

After filing for bankruptcy, the Washingtons' disclosure statement and chapter 11 reorganization plan were due to be filed with the bankruptcy court within 180 days of their bankruptcy petition. See South Carolina Bankruptcy Local Rule (SCBLR) 3016-1(a). The feasibility of the plan that they filed was contingent upon obtaining a certain level of income from the Washingtons' businesses, but the disclosure statement did not provide sufficient information about their current sources of income or their ability to fund the reorganization plan, such as by providing valuations for the Washingtons' properties. Reorganization Plan and Disclosure Statement filed 4/30/10. Therefore, the United States Trustee objected to the disclosure statement on the ground that it did not provide creditors enough information to evaluate the Washingtons' plan. Objection to Disclosure Statement filed 6/14/10.

The bankruptcy court scheduled a hearing on whether to approve the Washingtons' disclosure statement for June 24, 2010. Docket Text Entry 61. At the Washingtons' request, the bankruptcy court continued the hearing on the disclosure statement to August 3, 2010, providing the Washingtons with an additional 40 days to address the deficiencies with their disclosure statement. Docket Text Entry 79.

On July 12, 2010, the Washingtons filed an application to retain an appraiser, which was approved by the Court on July 14, 2010. Docket Text Entry 85. But they never filed an amended disclosure statement. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 5, lines 15-16. At the August 3, 2010, continued hearing on the disclosure statement, the Washingtons' attorney requested another continuance because the appraisals had not been completed and Mr. Washington needed more time to gather information. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 5, lines 22-25. The Washingtons maintained that the appraisals were critical to their disclosure statement and plan, and their attorney admitted that the disclosure statement they originally filed on April 30, 2010, was inadequate. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 6, lines 1-4. The United States Trustee did not consent to the continuance because there were still significant deficiencies with the disclosure statement that remained uncured, such as the failure of the Washingtons to provide adequate information regarding their sources of income, their projected disposable income, and their inability to fund the plan as evidenced by their proposed payment of only $8,686 to unsecured creditors over 20 years (less than 1% of the amount owed). See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 4-5, lines 18-7. In addition, even if the Washingtons had found additional income, it was not sufficient or reliable enough to have the plan confirmed. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 21, lines 14-25. The United States Trustee indicated that it would move to dismiss the case. Id.

Mr. Washington testified in great detail at the August 3, 2010 hearing about various actions he had taken to obtain the appraisals, decrease expenses and increase revenues in an effort to improve their ability to fund a reorganization plan, such as laying off employees and reducing the amount of vacancies in their rental properties. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, pages 9-18. Mr. Washington testified that he had obtained new tenants at the Gervais Professional Suites (also known as 1815 Gervais) that increased rental income by $2,600, bringing the monthly income to $4,500 to $5,000. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 9, lines 8 - 12. He had five tenants evicted from 2917 River Drive which took five or six months to “move them out of the facility”. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 10, lines 8 - 11. In regards to CPI, Mr. Washington testified he had obtained several new contracts which had increased the monthly revenues from $6,000 to $8,000 to $18, 800 in June 2010 and $26,000 in July 2010. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 9, lines 17 - 19. He also removed one of his employees to reduce expenses by $1,100 to $1,400 per month. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 11, lines 3 - 5.

In regards to the appraisals, which the Washingtons needed for their disclosure statement and plan, Mr. Washington testified that he had asked Mr. Hendrix to appraise the properties because he had previously appraised onel of the residential properties. However, once he learned that Mr. Hendrix could not provide a commercial appraisal, another appraiser was located who Mr. Washington “paid him out of my pocket.” “I’ve paid him over $2,200 on a $4,500 debt of the appraisals.” See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 12, lines 7 - 17.

Mr. Washington also acknowledged that the accountant he had been using to complete the monthly operating reports was “not cutting it” and he had retained a company called RBJ Accountants to take over the accounting responsibilities. “I have to pay them another thousand dollars to remove the documentation from her [current accountant] so I can stay faithful to what I need to do.” See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, pages 14 - 15.

Following Mr. Washington’s testimony, the bankruptcy court did not approve the Washingtons’ disclosure statement, but informed them that they should submit a new one as soon as possible because the court would consider it along with the United States Trustee forthcoming motion to dismiss. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 22, lines 2-7.

On August 4, 2010, the United States Trustee filed a motion under § 1112(b) to dismiss the Washingtons' case, and the bankruptcy court scheduled the next hearing for five weeks later, on September 14, 2010. The Washingtons filed a new disclosure statement at 10:39 pm on September 13, 2010. See Disclosure Statement filed 9/13/10, page 1 (ECF Timestamp).

At the hearing on the motion to dismiss, the bankruptcy court heard testimony from Ms. Julie Smoak, a bankruptcy analyst for the United States Trustee, who testified about the Washingtons' problems with the management of the estate, the untimely payment of quarterly fees, and the persistent nature of their financial difficulties. Ms. Smoak testified that the Washingtons had repeatedly failed to file their monthly operating reports reflecting their post-petition activities which were due on the 20th of each month. The only reports which had been timely filed were May, July and August 2010. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 14, lines 6 - 14. Ms. Smoak further testified that the August 2010 monthly operating report did not appear to be complete and accurate. The description of expenses paid in the August report included transactions for June and July. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 14 - 17. Ms. Smoak also testified to the Washingtons' failure to use their debtor-in-possession bank account as required. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 33 - 34. Ms. Smoak provided testimony regarding the Washingtons' failure to pay quarterly fees as required by 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 12, lines 3 - 25.

The bankruptcy court also heard testimony from Mr. Washington about his compliance with the administrative duties of the estate and the sustainability of his new sources of income. Mr. Washington acknowledged in his testimony that the quarterly fees were not paid when they were due because he did not have the funds at the time. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 35 - 36. Mr. Washington testified he personally completed the August 2010 monthly operating report and that it had the errors noted by Ms. Smoak. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 40 -41; 45 - 47. Mr. Washington also testified that he was not using the debtor-in-possession bank account because it was a hindrance to his operation of his businesses. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 52, lines 1 - 10.

While the bankruptcy court did not find the administrative deficiencies provided sufficient cause for dismissal because the deficiencies were cured at the time of the hearing, the bankruptcy court found that the repeated problems in meeting the administrative requirements did not provide confidence in the Washingtons' ability to propose a confirmable plan and successfully reorganize. Order at 6.

On September 27, 2010, the bankruptcy court issued its order dismissing the Washingtons' case. The court dismissed the case on two principal grounds. First, it found there was cause to dismiss under § 1112(b)(4)(A) because, despite the Washingtons' efforts, the bankruptcy estate continued to operate at a loss and the Washingtons' inability to increase their rental income. Order at 4. For example, at the August 3, 2010 hearing, Mr. Washington had included new tenants in explaining how he had increased revenues. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 9, lines 10 - 11. However, at the September 14, 2010 hearing, it became clear that one of the tenants had not yet taken possession of the premises due to her husband's hospitalization and that she was still trying to obtain a loan. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 56-57. The other tenant was a new lease with a doctor's office for $1,250 per month, but the rent actually starts at $600 per month and does not increase to $1,250 per month until October 2011. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 56, lines 11 - 13; Disclosure Statement filed 9/13/10, Exhibit 3. Mr. Washington also testified that he had evicted five tenants from one of his residential properties and it had taken five to six months to move them out. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 10, lines 2-11. But the disclosure statement reflects that four evictions were still in progress. Disclosure Statement filed 9/13/10, Exhibit 4.

Second, the bankruptcy court found there was cause to dismiss under § 1112(b)(4)(J) because the Washingtons failed to timely submit an amended plan that included all of the information required by the bankruptcy court. Order at 6. As previously discussed, the bankruptcy court found that the administrative deficiencies indicated an inability by the Washingtons to place a confirmable plan before the court. The bankruptcy court's finding that any plan was likely to be followed by liquidation was supported by the Washingtons' inability to timely pay the quarterly fees, inability to timely pay an adequate protection payment until funds cleared, inability to pay expenses without using funds from Mr. Washington's retirement account, and inability to retain employees due to insufficient funds. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 35 - 36; pages 63 - 64; 43; 86, respectively.

The bankruptcy court also found there was no cause for dismissal under section 1112(b)(4)(F) (failure to satisfy timely reporting requirements) because, although the Washingtons had problems complying with filing and reporting requirements in the past, they were now current. Order at 5. Finally, because the Washingtons' assets were fully secured, the bankruptcy court held it was in the best interests of the creditors and the estate to dismiss the case rather than convert it to one under chapter 7. Order at 6.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that cause had been shown for dismissing the Washingtons' case. The bankruptcy court had broad discretion in finding cause, and substantial evidence supports its decision. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that there was cause to dismiss under § 1112(b)(4)(J) because the Washingtons failed to timely submit a plan that was confirmable and/or not likely to followed by liquidation. Alternatively, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that there was cause to dismiss under § 1112(b)(4)(A) because the Washingtons were operating at a net loss, and had no opportunity or resources to develop new business. Therefore, the bankruptcy court's order dismissing the Washingtons' case should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the Washingtons' bankruptcy case for cause under § 1112(b)(4).

Under § 1112(b), a bankruptcy court may dismiss a chapter 11 bankruptcy case "for cause" if there are no "unusual circumstances" that establish that dismissal "is not in the best interests of the creditors and the estate." § 1112(b). Section 1112(b)(4) sets forth a list of 16 examples of what could constitute cause, "including — (A) substantial or continuing loss to or diminution of the estate and the absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation" and "(J) failure to file a disclosure statement, or to file or confirm a plan, within the time fixed . . . by the court." §§ 1112(b)(4)(A), (J). "[T]his list is illustrative, not exhaustive." C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship v. Norton Co. (In re C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship), 113 F.3d 1304, 1311 (2d Cir. 1997); § 102(3) (stating that "including" is "not limiting" in the Bankruptcy Code).

Courts are given broad discretion in determining what may constitute sufficient cause for the dismissal or conversion of a case. Jackson v. United States, 131 F.3d 134 (4th Cir. 1997).

Here, the record provides ample basis for the bankruptcy court's finding cause to dismiss the Washingtons' bankruptcy case.

A. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that cause for dismissal exists under section 1112(b)(4)(J).

Section 1112(b)(4)(J) provides that cause for dismissal exists if the debtor fails to file or confirm a disclosure statement or plan within the time fixed by this title or by order of the court. § 1112(b)(4)(J). "[A] debtor cannot wallow in chapter 11. The debtor must prosecute his or her case to a prompt and successful conclusion." In re Tornheim, 181 B.R. 161, 164 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1995). A court may dismiss a case "if the debtor lacks the ability to formulate a plan or to carry one out." Id.; see, e.g., In re J.D. Mfg., Inc., No. 07-36751, 2008 WL 4533690, at *4 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. Oct. 2, 2008) (finding cause to dismiss based upon the debtor's failure to comply with the basic requirements of a disclosure statement and failure to make amendments as directed by the court).

Here, the local rules require the debtor to file a plan and disclosure statement within 180 days of the date the bankruptcy case is filed. SCLBR 3016-1(a). If the disclosure statement or reorganization plan are not confirmed, the failure to timely comply and correct the deficiency may constitute grounds for dismissal. SCLBR 3016-1(c).

The Washingtons filed a disclosure statement and plan within 180 days of the filing of their bankruptcy case, but they later admitted that the disclosure statement could not be approved as it was filed. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 6, lines 1-3. The Washingtons were given an extra month to fix the deficiencies with their disclosure statement and obtain an independent appraisal for their properties. See Docket Text Entries 79, 85. But they never filed an amended disclosure statement to correct the deficiencies. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 5, lines 15-16.

Mr. Washington had excuses and justifications for the delay. He testified at the August 3, 2010, hearing that he had engaged an appraiser named Mr. Hendrix and "I've paid him over $2,200 on a $4,500 debt of the appraisals." See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 12, lines 7-17. Mr. Washington selected Mr. Hendrix because he had previously conducted an appraisal on one of their residential properties (7602 Hunt Club). However, Mr. Hendrix could not appraise commercial property, and Mr. Washington found the amount quoted by the appraiser Mr. Hendrix located to be too high. Therefore, Mr. Washington located another person (Boston McLean) to conduct the appraisals on the commercial property. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 42, lines 10 - 24.

Mr. Washington also claimed that the trouble with his financial reporting was due to his accountant. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, pages 14-15. Mr. Washington testified that he had hired Yvette Jones with Jones Financial Company to prepare the monthly operating reports because he was back and forth from the Mayo Clinic. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 35. However, Ms. Jones was unable to timely provide the reports to him despite several conversations regarding the need to have them completed by the 16th of each month. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 40 - 41. Mr. Washington engaged RBJ, an accounting firm, but when the bankruptcy court noted its concern regarding the use of a professional which had not been approved by the bankruptcy court, Mr. Washington decided not to engage them. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 41. Ultimately Mr. Washington completed the August 2010 monthly operating report himself, but it contained various errors that Mr. Washington acknowledged. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 46.

But none of this suggested, in any tangible way, how the Washingtons would ever propose a workable chapter 11 reorganization plan. In fact, it causes greater concern about Mr. Washington's capabilities. At the end of the August 3, 2010, hearing the bankruptcy court voiced concern about the Washingtons retaining and paying professionals without court approval as required by § 327 of the Bankruptcy Code, which evidenced that Mr. Washington was not administering the bankruptcy estate in conformity with the Bankruptcy Code. The bankruptcy court stated at the end of the August 3, 2010 hearing, "[I]f rules aren't followed with respect to financial disclosure and professional employment, I think it's going to make it very much more difficult to defeat a motion to dismiss the case." See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 23. Oddly, at the September 14, 2010, hearing Mr. Washington testified he had never paid either party any money. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 87, line 20.

At the August 3, 2010, hearing the Washingtons were given an opportunity to file a new disclosure statement prior to the hearing on the motion to dismiss on September 14, 2010. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 22, lines 8-5. The bankruptcy court cautioned them to do so "quickly" to provide enough time for it to be circulated and offer people an opportunity to object to it. Id.; see § 1125(b) (requiring notice and hearing before the court may approve a disclosure statement).

The Washingtons filed a new disclosure statement at 10:39 pm on September 13, 2010. See Disclosure Statement filed 9/13/10, page 1 (ECF Timestamp). Such timing was not sufficient to allow creditors and parties in interest to review the disclosure statement. Moreover, the disclosure statement provided the same treatment for South Carolina Community Bank, who had objected to the plan filed on April 30, 2010[3], paid unsecured creditors over a 25-year period, and included information on revenues which were not supported by Mr. Washington's testimony.

The Washingtons filed a disclosure statement they knew was insufficient, and then failed to timely correct their disclosure statement, despite receiving two extensions. Therefore, the bankruptcy court was well within its discretion in finding cause to dismiss the Washingtons' case under § 1112(b)(4)(J) (providing cause upon the failure to timely file a disclosure statement).

B. Alternatively, the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that cause for dismissal exists under section 1112(b)(4)(A).

A bankruptcy court may find cause to dismiss a case under section 1112(b)(4)(A) when two criteria are met: (1) continuing loss or diminution of the estate and (2) the absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation. § 1112(b)(4)(A). The purpose of this section "is to preserve estate assets by preventing the debtor in possession from gambling on the enterprise at the creditors' expense when there is no hope of rehabilitation." Loop Corp. v. U.S. Trustee, 379 F.3d 511, 516 (8th Cir. 2004). The Washingtons' case satisfies both criteria.

[3] See South Carolina Community Bank Objection to Confirmation filed May 10, 2010, Docket Entry #63.

1. Continuing Loss or Diminution to the Estate

"To determine whether there is a continuing loss to or diminution of the estate, a court must make a full evaluation of the present condition of the estate, not merely look at the debtor's financial statements." In re AdBrite Corp., 290 B.R. 209, 215 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003). "The absence of a reliable source of income together with the inability to pay current expenses is sufficient to show continuing loss." In re Quail Farm, LLC, No. 09-298, 2010 WL 1849867, at *3 (Bankr. N.D. W.Va. May 5, 2010).

With respect to this factor, the bankruptcy court found that the Washingtons' estate "continues to operate at a loss if all operating expenses and mortgage obligations are paid." Order at 4. The Washingtons contend this finding was erroneous because their monthly operating reports showed an increase in income. Appellant's Br. at 7. But they are wrong because they ignore the inconvenient, and uncontested, fact that the monthly operating reports showed inflated net income by failing to account for a number of off-the-book expenses.

The Washingtons' monthly operating reports stated the following expenses and net income:

Month	Expense	Net Income
November 2009	$11,335.87	-$5,718.87
December 2009	$4,126.59	$1,490.41
January 2010	$4,152.22	$1,152.78
February 2010	$6,772.98	$337.02

March 2010	$8,216	$29
April 2010	$8,466	$29
May 2010	$7,968	$527
June 2010	$14,391	$5,110
July 2010	$24,834	$2,202
August 2010	$19,595	$4,177

This computation of income and expenses does not include all expenses incurred. Mr. Washington testified that he made several payments to creditors which were not reflected on the monthly operating reports. For example, Mr. Washington testified that the first mortgage payment on his home, for $515 or $525, would not have been on any of the monthly operating reports. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 82-84.

Mr. Washington also explained that he had spent around $8,000 in maintenance costs. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 16, lines 18-21. But a review of the monthly operating reports (MOR) only show $3,688 in maintenance and repairs, installation and similar items, leaving $4,312 in undisclosed expenses. See amended August MOR--window $50 and 1815 maintenance $80; July MOR--repairs and maintenance $850, deposit installation $739, upfit to rent out $800; June MOR--repairs and maintenance $450; May MOR--repairs and maintenance $121; April MOR--repairs and maintenance $99; March MOR--repairs and maintenance $125; February MOR--repairs and maintenance $99; and December MOR--thermostat $275.

In addition, Ms. Smoak, a bankruptcy analyst for the United States Trustee, testified that the Washingtons made other allowed payments to creditors that were not included in the monthly operating reports: $1,250 for February 2010, $400 for April 2010, $400 for May 2010, and $276 for May 2010. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 22-23. These payments totaled $7,476.

Furthermore, despite the increase in net income, Mr. Washington's conduct evidences a continuing loss to the estate. Mr. Washington had to use part of the $5,400 he borrowed from his 401k retirement account to cover expenses. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 43-45. Mr. Washington also delayed paying one of the adequate protection payments so the check would not bounce while waiting for funds to clear. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 63 -64.

The bankruptcy court is entitled to rely upon the entirety of the record and is not required to rely solely upon the Washingtons' financial statements. AdBrite, 290 B.R. at 215. And here, the entirety of the record shows that all these undisclosed expenses exceeded the net income reflected on the monthly operating reports. Despite operating under the protection of the Bankruptcy Code for nine months, the Washingtons' generated net income of $15,054.21, but had net expenses of $17,506.87, leaving a cumulative $2,452 deficit. Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding a continuing loss to the estate. Order at 4.

2. Absence of a Reasonable Likelihood of Rehabilitation

Rehabilitation has consistently been understood to "refer to the debtor's ability to restore the viability of its business." Loop, 379 F.3d at 516. This contemplates the successful maintenance or re-establishment of business operations. Douglas Asphalt Co. v. Walton (In re Douglas Asphalt Co.), No. 510-055, 2010 WL 4777534, at *3 (S.D. Ga. Nov. 16, 2010).

When making this determination, a bankruptcy court need not "blindly accept" a debtor's mere optimism about the prospects of reorganization based on speculation. Loop, 379 F.3d at

518. Instead, a court should assess the evidence critically, in light of the debtor's history on the record. Id. And that is what the bankruptcy court did.

Here, the bankruptcy court found that the Washingtons did not "have a realistic prospect of reorganizing their financial affairs." Order at 4. The bankruptcy court's finding was based on: (1) "Mr. Washington's efforts to handle the ordinary daily operation of CPI detract from his developing new business;" (2) Mr. Washington has "several tenants who have not been paying rent and cannot count upon potential new tenants in light of his previous testimony "concerning potential new tenants who failed to take occupancy and pay rent;" (3) the Washingtons' "substantial debt" as reflected by the bankruptcy schedules; and (4) Mrs. Washington's ongoing, significant medical expenses. Order at 4.

The Washingtons argue this finding was clearly erroneous because the bankruptcy court ignored that they were "making more money" and had "improved efficiency,"and was "speculating" about Mr. Washington's ability to run the business in the future. Appellant's Br. at 10. This argument, however, ignores Mr. Washington's own testimony, which fully supports the bankruptcy court's findings, as follows.

First, Mr. Washington testified that the "core" of his ability to reorganize was the income from operating CPI. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 59, lines 9-13. Moreover, Mr. Washington testified that CPI could not make money if he was not working there. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 68, lines 4-7, page 84- 85, lines 19-25, lines 1-4. Mr. Washington also testified that he would make substantially more money if he had a team to work for him, but he could not employ anyone because "I was in such bad shape." Id. Mr. Washington terminated employees of CPI “to make it feasible to make payments that I need to make to everybody that I owe.” See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 86, lines 10-18.

But that left Mr. Washington overburdened with day to day operations. He testified, “I am doing everything now. I don’t have the employee, I don’t have – I am doing it. So, from 6:00 am in the morning to around 7:30 pm at night, that’s where I’m at . . . running – you know, going to different site visits.” See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 60, lines 20-24. As the bankruptcy court correctly observed, “Mr. Washington’s efforts to handle the ordinary daily operation of CPI detract from his developing new business.” Order at 4.

Despite these efforts and the increased income, the monthly operating reports show — and perhaps understate — that while the Washingtons’ income increased from June through August, their expenses also increased. Expenses were 74%, 92%, and 82% of the income respectively, with the highest income month having the corresponding highest percentage of expenses (92%), contradicting the Washingtons’ belief in their increased efficiency.

Mr. Washington admits that he has done everything he can to reduce expenses and increase income. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 16, lines 23-24. Yet Mr. Washington still could not meet all of his financial obligations on time. For instance, he had to delay making a payment to one of his creditors so the check would not bounce while waiting for funds to clear. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 63 -64. And the Washingtons presented no evidence that they would be able to hire employees in the future to further increase revenues.

Second, the record shows it is unlikely that the Washingtons will be able to collect the rents that they rely upon in their disclosure statement. That is because Mr. Washington included rent from tenants that he could not collect or had inflated the revenue he expected to receive.

In discussing sources of revenues to the fund the plan, the third exhibit of the disclosure statement includes $7,229 for rental income from the Gervais Street properties. Disclosure Statement filed 9/13/10, Exhibit 3. But the Washingtons admit that they have only collected $3,537 from these tenants. See August monthly operating report and Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 75, lines 10-13. For example, Mr. Washington had included a new tenant who had not yet taken possession of the premises due to her husband's hospitalization and that she was still trying to obtain a loan. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 56-57. Mr. Washington testified that the "$3,000 a month for the bottom [floor] being rented, that should have happened already, but I can't make a person do anything." See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 71, lines 17 - 19. He testified that the new tenant would begin making $200 or $300 per month payments in September for storage. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 65, lines 8 - 14.

Mr. Washington further testified that he had a new lease with a doctor's office for $1,250 per month, but the rent reflected on the third exhibit of the disclosure statement shows rent starting at $600 per month and not increasing to $1,250 per month until October 2011. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 56, lines 11 - 13; Disclosure Statement filed 9/13/10, Exhibit 3. He also stated that he had evicted five tenants from one of his residential properties and it had taken five to six months to move them out. See Transcript of 8/3/10 hearing, page 10, lines 2-11. But the September 13, 2010, disclosure statement reflects that four evictions were still in progress. Disclosure Statement filed 9/13/10, Exhibit 4.

Third, the record shows that the Washingtons have little equity in their property that they could use to revitalize their business. According to their bankruptcy schedules, their rental properties are fully secured. See Schedule A - Real Property.

Fourth, Mr. Washington testified that Mrs. Washington has significant medical expenses that are likely to be ongoing and are not covered by insurance. See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, pages 52-53; page 61, lines 18-24. This will cause a further burden on Mr. Washington's time and on the family's finances, as the Washingtons have been "running up and down the road to Florida . . . to have special tests done." See Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 52, lines 24-25. This evidences another reason why the Washingtons would have substantial difficulty reorganizing their business affairs.

Thus, the record fully supports the bankruptcy court's purported "speculation" about Mr. Washington's ability to revitalize his business prospects. The bankruptcy court was not required to accept Mr. Washington's optimistic testimony regarding his ability to increase his profits and fund a reorganization plan. Loop, 379 F.3d at 518; see Transcript of 9/14/10 hearing, page 95, lines 11-21 ("Mr. Washington is always very optimistic about the future. And always seems to have something just on the horizon that's going to cure the problem."). Instead, the record shows that the estate continued to operate at a loss and that Washingtons did not prove that they had a reasonable prospect of reorganization. Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it found cause to dismiss the Washingtons' bankruptcy case.

II. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by failing to hold a separate hearing on the Washingtons' new disclosure statement.

The Washingtons contend that because the bankruptcy court did not wait "about two months" and hold an independent hearing on their new disclosure statement, they were not given a reasonable opportunity to demonstrate their newfound viability and to seek approval of their newly filed disclosure statement prior to dismissal. Appellant's Br. at 12-13. They are wrong.

Section 1112(b) provides that “after notice and a hearing” the court may dismiss a case under this chapter. § 1112(b). The Bankruptcy Code defines “notice and a hearing” as “notice as is appropriate in the particular circumstances, and such opportunity for a hearing as is appropriate in the particular circumstances.” § 102(1)(A). Additionally, the Bankruptcy Code “authorizes an act without an actual hearing if such notice is given properly and if such a hearing is not requested timely by a party in interest.” § 102(1)(B)(I).

Within the Fourth Circuit, a bankruptcy court need not always hold an independent evidentiary hearing prior to the entry of a § 1112(b) order. Finney v. Smith (In re Finney), 992 F.2d 43, 46 (4th Cir. 1993). An additional hearing is not necessary when the record shows that a party already had an “adequate opportunity” to address the issue before the bankruptcy court. Id. The Fourth Circuit described that “adequate opportunity” as “at least a day’s notice . . . along with an opportunity to respond (although not necessarily an independent hearing).” Id. Other circuits agree. See, e.g., Loop Corp. v. U.S. Trustee, 379 F.3d 511, 516 (8th Cir. 2004); C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship v. Norton Co. (In re C-TC 9th Ave. P’ship), 113 F.3d 1304, 1312 (2d Cir. 1997); Sullivan Cent. Plaza I, Ltd. v. Bancobost Real Estate Capital Corp. (In re Sullivan Cent. Plaza I, Ltd.), 935 F.2d 723, 727 (5th Cir. 1991).

The bankruptcy court did not err by entering the dismissal order in this case. First, the Washingtons never requested additional time or a separate hearing from the bankruptcy court. Because they did not raise this issue below, the argument has been waived on appeal. Dee-K Enter., Inc. v. Heveafil Sdn. Bhd., 299 F.3d 281, 289 (4th Cir. 2002) (holding that an argument not pursued in the trial court had been waived on appeal).

Second, the Washingtons' argument still fails on the merits. When the bankruptcy court disapproved their disclosure statement at the hearing on August 3, 2010, the court informed the Washingtons that it would consider the viability of a new disclosure statement in tandem with the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, which would be at least 20 days in the future. See Transcript of 8/13/10 hearing, page 22, lines 3, 18-19. The Washingtons filed a new disclosure statement, Mr. Washington testified, and their counsel had a full and fair opportunity to argue at the hearing on the motion to dismiss.

Therefore, the Washingtons had an "adequate opportunity" to develop the record and address the issue before the bankruptcy court. Finney, 992 F.2d at 46. The bankruptcy court was not required to wait another two months to see if Mr. Washington's optimistic projections would finally materialize. C-TC 9th Ave. P'ship, 113 F.3d at 1312 ("When the record is sufficiently well developed to allow the bankruptcy court to draw the necessary inferences to dismiss a Chapter 11 case for cause, the bankruptcy court may do so.").

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered below.

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The jurisdictional statement in appellant's brief is correct, but incomplete. It omits mention of the date of filing of the notice of appeal, as required by Circuit Rule 28(a)(2)(IV). The district court's final judgment was entered on March 10, 2004. WA-36.[1] The appellant's notice of appeal was filed on March 31, 2004. See Dist. Ct. docket number 15.

As required by Circuit Rule 28(a)(3)(iii), the United States Trustee notes that the district court's decision did not remand the case to the bankruptcy court for further consideration, and its judgment is a final appealable order.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

In a prior appeal, this Court held that a release and covenant not to sue between trustee Daniel Hoseman and debtor Sidney Weinschneider barred the trustee from suing for a declaration that certain property belonged to the bankruptcy estate, and that the trustee could not prove that the release and covenant were fraudulently induced. Although Weinschneider supported the trustee's motion for authorization to bring the declaratory action, Weinschneider now seeks to recover his attorney's fees and costs for defending the trustee's suit as damages for breach of contract.

The questions presented are:

1. Whether appellant Sidney Weinschneider can recover attorney's fees and expenses from the bankruptcy estate under Section 503(b)(1)(A) of the Bankruptcy Code.

2. Whether, as a matter of Illinois law, Weinschneider can recover attorney's fees and expenses as damages for the breach of the covenant not to sue even though the covenant does not provide for them.

3. Whether, if Weinschneider has a valid contract claim, that claim is entitled to priority under Sections 503 and 507 of the Bankruptcy Code.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Course Of Proceedings Below

In Hoseman v. Weinschneider, 322 F.3d 468, 470 (7th Cir. 2003), this Court determined that a release and covenant not to sue barred the trustee of appellant's bankruptcy estate from seeking a declaration from the bankruptcy court whether a certain legal claim was property of the estate. After that decision, appellant sought to collect his attorney's fees and expenses from defending the declaratory action as administrative expenses of the bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy court and the district court rejected his claim for fees. See WA-19; WA-23; WA-27. This appeal followed.

II. Statutory Background

1. The United States Trustees supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and the conduct of case trustees within specified geographic regions. See 28 U.S.C. § 581-589. The Bankruptcy Code provides that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this Title." 11 U.S.C. § 307. Congress also has specifically directed United States Trustees to "review[]  applications filed for compensation and reimbursement under section 330 of title 11[] and  [to] fil[e] with the court" any "objections to such application." 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A)(i) and (ii).

The United States Trustee also has authority to appoint a case trustee for a bankruptcy estate. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 701(a) and 702(d). In a chapter 7 bankruptcy, the case trustee's duties include the duty to "collect and reduce to money the property of the estate." 11 U.S.C. § 704(1).

2. Section 507 of the Bankruptcy Code provides that the administrative expenses of a bankruptcy estate have priority over other claims. See 11 U.S.C. § 507(a)(1) ("administrative expenses allowed under section 503(b) of this title" shall be paid "first"). Section 503(b), in turn, specifies what expenses should be allowed as administrative expenses. See 11 U.S.C. § 503. Those administrative expenses include, as relevant here, "the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate, including wages, salaries, or commissions for services rendered after the commencement of the case," 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(1)(A), and "compensation and reimbursement awarded under section 330(a) of this title," 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(2).

III. Statement Of The Facts

Appellant Sidney Weinschneider operated and partially owned nursing homes in the Chicago area. See Hoseman v. Weinschneider, 322 F.3d 468, 470 (7th Cir. 2003). In 1989, he sought protection under the debt reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 1101, et seq. See Hoseman, 322 F.3d at 471. In 1990, Weinschneider's chapter 11 case was converted to a chapter 7 case. See id. The United States Trustee appointed appellee Daniel Hoseman as trustee of the Weinschneider estate, as provided in 11 U.S.C. § 704. See id. This case concerns Weinschneider's claim for attorney's fees and expenses from his defense of a suit brought against him by the trustee.

In December 1996, the trustee executed a release and covenant not to sue on behalf of the Weinschneider estate. See Hoseman, 322 F.3d at 471.[2] The release "remise[d], release[d] and forever discharge[d] all claims, known or unknown, against [Weinschneider, his wife, and certain trusts]." Id. The covenant barred the trustee from "instituting, prosecuting or participating in any suit or action, at law or in equity, or to take any action to collect, enforce or recover on any claim, known or unknown, which the [bankruptcy estate] may, could or have against [Weinschneider, his wife, and certain trusts]." Id. In return, Weinschneider and others surrendered property worth one million dollars to the bankruptcy estate. See id.

In February 1996, Weinschneider filed a breach of contract action in Illinois state court against G.W. Burton and associates (Burton), claiming a stake in Burton's nursing home management operation. See id. Burton answered Weinschneider's second amended complaint with the assertion that the claim belonged to the chapter 7 bankruptcy estate, and not to Weinschneider. See Exhibit A, Answer and Objection to Debtor's Application for Allowance and Payment of Administrative Expense Claims, Bankr. Ct. docket number 389. In September 1997, the state court ordered that it would defer adjudicating Weinschneider's complaint while Weinschneider brought the question of the claim's ownership to the bankruptcy court. See id., Exhibit B.

Although Weinschneider amended his Bankruptcy Schedule B-3 in 1995 to disclose the claim against Burton, see Hoseman, 322 F.3d at 471-72, Weinschneider did not inform the bankruptcy court or the trustee of his Illinois suit when he filed it. See WA-28. Indeed, the trustee did not learn about the suit until after he had executed the release and covenant not to sue. See Hoseman, 322 F.3d at 472 (suit filed in February 1996); id. at 471 (release and covenant executed in December 1996); 1a (letter informing trustee of Illinois suit dated October 1997). In October 1997, after Burton had asserted in the state court proceeding that the claim belonged to the bankruptcy estate, Weinschneider asked the trustee to sign an affidavit concluding that the interest in Burton was not part of the bankruptcy estate. See 1a-7a.[3] The trustee did not sign the affidavit.

[3] Citations to a number followed by "a" are to the appendix bound with this brief.

In order to settle the ownership of the claim, the trustee filed an application with the bankruptcy court to employ attorneys on a contingency basis to seek a declaratory judgment that the claim was property of the bankruptcy estate. See 8a-13a; see also 11 U.S.C. § 704(1) (requiring trustees to "collect and reduce to money the property of the estate"). The application to the court proposed to file an adversary complaint against Weinschneider for a declaratory judgment "that Sidney Weinschneider's interest in the pending State Court litigation is property of his Bankruptcy Estate pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 541, and if successful, to pursue Debtor's claim against G.W. Burton." See 10a.

Weinschneider supported the trustee's request to retain counsel to sue him. See 14a-19a. Weinschneider agreed that "[e]xpedited resolution of the Trustee's rights is appropriate in view of Mr. Weinschneider's age (68) and the need to stop the [state court] defendants from unfairly exploiting bankruptcy issues in the state court case." 15a. His prayer for relief asked the court for the entry of an order:

> 1. Granting the Trustee's application to retain counsel on a contingent fee basis, but limiting the scope of authority to retain counsel to the prosecution or defense of an adversary proceeding in this Court for the purpose of determining the rightful owner of the claim asserted in Weinschneider v. G. W. Burton & Associates Ltd, et al., Case No. 96 L 1371, Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois;

> 2. Requiring the Trustee to file an adversary proceeding before this Court to determine ownership of said claim on or before February 28, 1998.

Id. at 18a. Weinschneider did not contend that the proposed action would violate the release and covenant not to sue between Weinschneider and the trustee. See 14a-19a.

The bankruptcy court granted the trustee's motion for authorization to file suit against Weinschneider, ordering that "[t]he trustee shall file his adversary complaint seeking a determination of the ownership of Sidney Weinschneider's claim against [Burton] on or before February 27, 1998." 27a. The trustee brought a timely suit pursuant to this authorization. See Hoseman, 322 F.3d at 472.

Weinschneider defended the trustee's action on the ground that his state claim arose after he filed for bankruptcy and therefore was not part of the bankruptcy estate. See id. He also contended, for the first time, that the trustee's declaratory judgment action was barred by the release and covenant not to sue. See id. The trustee responded that the release and covenant were void because Weinschneider fraudulently induced their execution by failing to disclose the full extent of his interest in Burton before the trustee executed them, including the breach of contract action. See id.

The bankruptcy court ruled that Weinschneider's lawsuit was the property of the bankruptcy estate and that Weinschneider fraudulently induced the trustee's execution of the release and covenant. See id. The district court reversed, holding that the release and covenant not to sue were not fraudulently induced by Weinschneider and that those documents, by their terms, barred the trustee's suit. See id. at 473.

This Court affirmed the district court, concluding that the release and covenant not to sue barred the declaratory action. See id. at 473. It sustained the district court's determination that the trustee had not met his burden of proving the second element of fraudulent inducement: that Weinschneider knew or believed that he was making a false statement when he asserted in June 1995 on his amended Schedule B-3 that his claim against Burton was acquired post-petition. Id. at 476-77.

After this Court's decision, Weinschneider filed a motion with the bankruptcy court requesting that the estate reimburse the attorney's fees and expenses that he incurred in defending the trustee's adversary proceeding as a first priority expense of the estate. See 29a-34a. Weinschneider averred that his fees and costs amount to more than $500,000. See 32a.

Weinschneider contended that his attorney's fees and expenses were administrative expenses under Section 503(b) of the Bankruptcy Code that were entitled to priority status under Section 507(a)(1). See 33a. According to Weinschneider, his attorney's fees and expenses constituted administrative expenses under Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968). That case interpreted the 1898 Bankruptcy Act, which, like section 503(b)(1)(A), treats "the actual and necessary costs and expense of preserving the estate subsequent to filing the petition" as administrative expenses, as allowing businesses adjoining a debtor's property to obtain administrative expense priority for damages negligently caused by the debtor while it was operating in bankruptcy. See Reading, 391 U.S. at 475; 485. The trustee and the United States Trustee opposed Weinschneider's application.

The bankruptcy court denied Weinschneider's motion to tax his fees and costs to the bankruptcy estate. See WA-19-22. The court rejected the argument that the contract provided for attorney's fees on the ground that "Illinois case law establishes that attorney's fees are not recoverable for breach of a covenant not to sue in the absence of specific language to that effect." WA-21. For that reason, the court found it unnecessary to decide whether the Reading doctrine might justify relief. See WA-21.

Weinschneider sought reconsideration, arguing that he was entitled to attorney's fees because the Illinois Supreme Court would interpret the covenant not to sue as authorizing fees. The court denied the motion, finding the authority that Weinschneider cited to be inapposite. See WA-23-25.

Weinschneider timely appealed the adverse merits ruling to the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. By memorandum opinion and order entered March 10, 2004, the district court affirmed. See WA-27. The district court concluded that Weinschneider's contract-based fee claim failed under Illinois law because the covenant not to sue did not include an attorney's fee provision. See WA-30-32. The court also rejected Weinschneider's alternative argument that sections 503(b) and 507(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code constituted an independent basis for allowing recovery of a Chapter 7 debtor's attorney's fees. See WA-32-35. The court concluded the Reading doctrine was "inapplicable" because "[c]ourts applying the Reading doctrine have narrowed its reach to debts incurred as a result of a trustee's wrongful conduct, including 'tort-like' behavior, wilful statutory violations or initiation of frivolous litigation." WA-34 (emphasis in original). The district court determined there was "no indication that the Trustee's declaratory judgment action was frivolous or brought in bad faith. Rather, the Trustee advanced a good faith argument below that the covenant not to sue was fraudulently induced and . . . the bankruptcy court" ruled for the trustee before reviewing courts overturned that decision. WA-35. The court concluded by suggesting "[t]he estate should not be penalized for the Trustee's good faith execution of his duties." Id.

This appeal followed.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Weinschneider's attorney's fees and expenses do not qualify as administrative expenses under the Bankruptcy Code. This Court's decision in In re Milwaukee Engraving, Co., 219 F.3d 637 (7th Cir. 2000), makes clear that attorney's fees are not available under subsection 503(b)(1)(A), and may be obtained, if at all, under subsection (b)(2). And the Supreme Court's recent decision in Lamie v. United States Trustee, 124 S. Ct. 1023 (2004), makes clear that attorney's fees are available under subsection 503(b)(2) only when the attorney is employed under Sections 327 and 330 of the Code. Because Weinschneider's attorneys were not employed under Sections 327 and 330 of the Code, he is not entitled to attorney's fees.

Perhaps for this reason, Weinschneider characterizes his claim as a claim for damages "in the form of legal expenses and attorneys fees," rather than a direct claim for attorney's fees. See 29a. But his fees are damages only if he has a right to them under Illinois contract law. For this reason, his claim for fees is derivative of his Illinois contract claim, and he has no freestanding claim under the Bankruptcy Code.

Weinschneider does not have a valid claim to attorney's fees as contract damages under Illinois law. Neither the release nor the covenant not to sue provides for attorney's fees in the event of breach, and Illinois law does not award attorney's fees for breach of contract unless the contract explicitly provides for them. Moreover, Weinschneider's failure to raise the release and covenant when the trustee sought authorization to sue means that Weinschneider's argument for fees is barred by laches.

If this court nevertheless holds that Weinschneider is entitled to fees under Illinois law, those fees should not be given priority under section 503(b)(1)(A) and Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968). Because the trustee acted properly and Weinschneider is estopped from arguing otherwise by his own support for the trustee's motion for authorization to sue, because the claim is based in contract, not tort, and because the claim did not arise out of the ongoing operation of the debtor's business, Reading provides no basis for priority for the state law claim.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The district court's decision depends on legal conclusions reviewable de novo. See Hoseman v. Weinschneider, 322 F.3d 468, 473 (7th Cir. 2003) (citing In re Image Worldwide, Ltd., 139 F.3d 574, 576 (7th Cir. 1998)).

ARGUMENT

I. Weinschneider Has No Freestanding Right To His Fees And Expenses Under The Bankruptcy Code.

Weinschneider suggests that he is entitled to fees as a matter of federal law under Reading Co. v. Brown, 391 U.S. 471 (1968), and Section 503 of the Bankruptcy Code independent of his state law contract claim. _See_ Brief for Appellants at 15-16. _Reading_ does not support that contention.

Reading considered the availability of tort damages under a provision of the 1898 Bankruptcy Act, which like Section 503(b)(1)(A) provided payment for "the actual and necessary costs and expense of preserving the estate subsequent to filing the petition."[4] _Reading_, 391 U.S. at 475. In _Reading_, a building owned by the debtor burned while the debtor was under the protection of a bankruptcy receivership. _See_ _id._ at 473. The owner of a building that neighbored the debtor's building claimed the damages that he suffered in the fire as administrative expenses. _See_ _id._ For purposes of deciding whether his claim would receive administrative priority, the court stated that it "would be assumed that the damage to petitioner's property resulted from the negligence of the receiver and a workman he employed." _Id_. at 474.

Reading held that the claim for damages was allowable as an "actual and necessary" expense of preserving the estate even though the negligence that led to the fire did not benefit the estate, because the receiver's operation of the business was an essential element of the debtor's rehabilitation. Reading, 391 U.S. at 485. But Reading did not recognize a freestanding right to payment under the 1898 Act. Instead, the Court assumed that the tort creditor in that case had a valid negligence claim against the trustee; the question was whether that claim qualified as an administrative expense entitled to priority. In this case, there is no basis for a similar assumption.

[4] As relevant here, Section 64a provided that

> The debts to have priority, in advance of the payment of dividends to creditors, and to be paid in full out of bankrupt estates, and the order of payment shall be (1) the costs and expenses of administration, including the actual and necessary costs and expense of preserving the estate subsequent to filing the petition.

11 U.S.C. 104(a)(1) (repealed 1978).

An award of administrative expenses to Weinschneider would be one of two things: a direct award of attorney's fees, or an award of contract damages in the form of attorney's fees.[5] The Supreme Court's recent decision in Lamie v. United States Trustee, 124 S. Ct. 1023 (2004), bars Weinschneider from collecting his fees directly as attorney's fees. That means that Weinschneider may obtain his fees from the estate only if he can show that they are contract damages that happen to take the form of attorney's fees. But in order to show that the fees are actually contract damages, Weinschneider has to show that he has a valid claim to contract damages under Illinois law.[6] [5] Weinschneider has not alleged a tort-based claim, or that he is entitled to recovery under any subsection of 503(b) other than subsection (b)(1)(A).

[6] The covenant not to sue in this case is governed by Illinois law. See Hoseman v. Weinschneider, 322 F.3d 468, 473 (7th Cir. 2003).

A. Lamie Bars Weinschneider From Collecting His Attorney's Fees As Attorney's Fees.

Section 503(B)(1)(A) is the catchall payment provision of Section 503. It permits generally "the [payment of] actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate, including wages, salaries, or commissions for services rendered after the commencement of the case," as administrative expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(1)(A). Section 503(b)(2) is a more specific provision concerning the payment of compensation including attorney's fees as administrative expenses, and it limits those fees to "compensation and reimbursement awarded under section 330(a)." 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(2).

Section 330(a), in turn, covers "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by" an attorney employed under Section 327. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). And Section 327 authorizes a trustee — and only a trustee — to employ an attorney "with the court's approval." 11 U.S.C. § 327. Sections 327 and 330, taken together, prohibit compensation awards to an attorney from a chapter 7 estate unless the attorney is employed as authorized by Section 327. See Lamie, 124 S. Ct. at 1032 ("[i]f the attorney is to be paid from estate funds under § 330(a)(1) in a chapter 7 case, he must be employed by the trustee and approved by the court" as required by Section 327). Weinschneider does not – and could not – show that his attorneys were employed as authorized under Section 327. See id.

The more specific provisions of Section 503(b)(2) control the more general provisions of Section 503(b)(1)(A). By "making express provision for employment [of attorneys] under § 327, payment under § 330, and priority under § 503(b)(2), the Code logically forecloses the possibility of treating § 503(b)(1)(A) as authority to pay (and give priority to) claims that do not meet its substantive requirements." In re Milwaukee Engraving Co., 219 F.3d 635, 636 (7th Cir. 2000) (citing In re Singson, 41 F.3d 316, 320 (7th Cir. 1994)); accord F/S Airlease II, Inc. v. Simon, 844 F.2d 99, 108-109 (3d Cir. 1988) (same); In re Keren Limited Partnership, 189 F.3d 86, 88 (2d Cir. 1999) (same). Accordingly, Weinschneider may not collect attorney's fees under Section 503(b)(1)(A).

B. Weinschneider's Claim For Fees As Contract Damages Depends On His Contract Claim.

Weinschneider's application for administrative expenses sometimes refers to his attorney's fees as "damages in the form of legal expenses and attorneys fees," rather than simply as attorney's fees. See 29a. But if they are damages, then they must be damages from breach of contract. The Bankruptcy Code does not create contract rights, and the breach of contract claim is a creature of Illinois law, not the Bankruptcy Code. See In re Sheridan, 174 B.R. 763, 767 (N.D. Ill. 1994) ("An administrative claim, like any claim, must be based on some legal duty and a corresponding right to payment.").

Weinschneider contends that Section 503(b)(1)(A) and Reading sometimes provide for an award of damages "without relying on state law," when fundamental fairness requires an award. See Brief for Appellants at 15. But whether or not that contention is correct (a question this Court need not decide), Weinschneider's particular claim does depend on state law; it arises out of the trustee's breach of the covenant not to sue. Weinschneider has not alleged a tort-based claim or suggested that he can collect damages under any provision of Section 503(b) other than 503(b)(1)(A). And Weinschneider has no argument that the trustee's action denied him fundamental fairness apart from his argument that the trustee violated his contractual obligations. Nothing in the Bankruptcy Code suggests that the trustee should have refrained from establishing whether the claim against Burton was property of the estate; to the contrary, the trustee's duties under the Code obligated him to pursue the declaratory action. See 11 U.S.C. § 704(1). Accordingly, Weinschneider has no claim independent of his contract claim that his fees are administrative expenses.

Weinschneider's argument that "fundamental fairness," by itself, can give rise to a right to payment of attorney's fees as attorney's fees under Section 503(b)(1)(A) is ultimately an effort to circumvent Lamie. See Lamie, 124 S.Ct at 1030 (stating that a "debtor's attorney not engaged as provided by § 327 is simply not included within the class of persons eligible for compensation"); Milwaukee Engraving, 219 F.3d at 637 ("One might as well erase § 503(b)(2) from the statute if attorneys may stake their claims under § 503(b)(1)(A) even when ineligible under §§ 327, 330, and 503(b)(2)."). There is no unfairness except for the breach of contract. Either his claim is for contract damages, and thus derivative of his claim under Illinois law, or it is a claim for attorney's fees, and thus barred by Lamie.[7] Accordingly, Weinschneider must show that he has a right to attorney's fees under Illinois contract law in order to show that his fees are an administrative expense of the bankruptcy estate.

II. Weinschneider's Illinois Contract Claim Is Meritless.

The covenant not to sue between the trustee and Weinschneider "makes no express provision for an award of attorneys fees in the event of breach." WA-30. For this reason, the lower courts properly held that Weinschneider does not have a valid claim for attorney's fees for breach of the covenant.

[7] The theory that attorney's fees are available as contract damages is in tension with Lamie even in this case, where the recovery would arise - if at all - exclusively from state law principles independent of the bankruptcy proceeding. In other cases, the theory could be irreconcilable with Lamie. For example, Lamie would bar the trustee from entering into a contract that contained a provision obligating the estate to pay a debtor's chapter 7 attorneys fees, and Lamie would also bar a claim for contract damages in the form of attorney's fees arising out of such a contract. Lamie squarely prohibits the siphoning of estate funds to pay the attorney's fees of professionals who are not eligible to be retained and compensated under sections 327 and 330.

A. Illinois Does Not Allow Attorney's Fees For Breach Of Contract Unless The Contract Expressly Provided For Fees.

Under Illinois law, attorney's fees and costs "are not allowable to the successful party in the absence of a statute, or in the absence of some agreement or stipulation specifically authorizing the allowance thereof." Ritter v. Ritter, 46 N.E.2d 41, 43 (Ill. 1943). Although the Supreme Court of Illinois has not applied this rule in a case concerning the breach of a covenant not to sue, courts applying Illinois law in this context have followed Ritter and held that a party cannot recover attorney's fees based on another party's breach of a covenant not to sue unless (1) the covenant specifies that attorney's fees are recoverable or (2) there is an independent statutory basis for a fee award. See Child v. Lincoln Enters., Inc., 200 N.E. 2d 751, 754 (Ill. App. 1964); Isaacs v. Caterpillar, Inc., 702 F. Supp. 711, 714 (C.D. Ill. 1988).

The lower courts in this case properly treated Childs and Isaacs as persuasive when they determined that attorney's fees and costs were not available under Illinois law. Ritter simply applies the American rule that attorney's fees and costs are not available unless the parties have agreed to them or a statute provides for them. See Midwest Grain Prods. of Ill., Inc. v. Productization, Inc., 228 F.3d 784, 792 (7th Cir. 2000), ("Illinois also follows the American rule, under which parties normally bear their own legal costs."). Ritter states that there "is no principle of the common law that permits a successful litigant to recover from his losing adversary the costs and expenses of the litigation." Ritter, 46 N.E.2d at 43. Child is a straightforward application of the American rule. The rule bars Weinschneider's claim.

Weinschneider nevertheless argues that he is entitled to attorney's fees and costs under a line of nineteenth century cases that predate Ritter and provide that when a tortfeasor's acts require an innocent party to defend himself in a suit brought by a third party, the innocent party may recover the costs of defending the suit as damages in a suit against the tortfeasor. See Brief for Appellant 17-22 (citing Himes v. Keighblingher, 14 Ill. 469 (1853); McEwen v. Kerfoot, 37 Ill. 530 (1865); Philpot v. Taylor, 75 Ill. 309 (1874)).

Contrary to Weinschneider's suggestion, these cases do not show that attorney's fees are available under his contract.[8]

[8] As explained, the cases apply a rule of tort law. See Himes v. Keighblingher, 14 Ill. 469 (1853) (when plaintiff delivered a deed to the defendant to be held as evidence, but defendant willfully and maliciously recorded the deed in favor of a third party, plaintiff may sue the defendant for the costs associated with proving that the deed was never legally delivered); McEwen v. Kerfoot, 37 Ill. 530 (1865) (where plaintiff sued to recover the commission on a sale of land purportedly made to a third party by plaintiff for defendant, and defendant showed that plaintiff was not his agent and lacked the authority to sell the land, defendant could recover from plaintiff his costs for defending against the third party's claim to the land and set them off against plaintiff's claim for the

They stand for the separate proposition, recognized by this Court in Champion Parts v. Oppenheimer & Co., 878 F.2d 1003, 1006 (7th Cir. 1989), that if "one consequence of the tortfeasor's actions is to involve a person in litigation with others, the expenses incurred in that litigation are held to be damages no less compensable than any other element of damage resulting from the tort."

The rule is inapposite to this case. Weinschneider's contention that the trustee's declaratory judgment action breached the covenant not to sue sounds in contract, not in tort. And in any event, as explained below in Section III, the trustee's decision to pursue a declaratory judgment was not wrongful; the trustee acted in reliance on the bankruptcy court's authorization to sue and in pursuit of his obligation to identify and reduce to money the property of the estate.

Indeed, because Weinschneider himself supported the trustee's motion to the bankruptcy court for authority to pursue the case, his contention that the trustee's suit was wrongful is barred by laches.[9] Laches bars the lack of due diligence by one commission); Philpot v. Taylor, 75 Ill. 309 (1874) (when a party falsely pretending to be the agent of the owner of land executes a contract for a sale of the land, and the purchaser sues the owner for specific performance of the sale, the pretend agent is liable to the owner for the damages that the owner sustains in defending the suit).

[9] Although laches generally is an affirmative defenses that must be pleaded in the lower court, that rule does not apply here party from prejudicing the opposing party. See Van Milligan v. Board of Fire & Police Commissioners, 630 N.E.2d 830 (Ill. 1994). It applies when a litigant has knowledge of a right but fails to assert it in a timely manner. See Sundance Homes, Inc. v. County of Du Page, 746 N.E.2d 254, 262 (Ill. 2001).

Weinschneider did not timely alert the court or the trustee to his belief that the trustee's declaratory action violated the covenant not to sue. He supported the trustee's motion for authorization to bring the suit; only after the suit had begun did he claim that the action breached his contract rights. See 14a-19a. His failure to exercise due diligence and inform the bankruptcy court and the trustee that he believed the suit violated his agreement with the trustee prejudiced the trustee, because the trustee might well have declined to bring the suit if he had known Weinschneider's position.

because the fee dispute arose from a contested matter governed by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014. Contested matters are instituted by motions. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9013 (motions) and 9014 (contested matters). Rule 9014(c) provides that some rules governing adversary proceedings apply to contested matters. But because Rule 9014(c) does not incorporate Rule 7012, which requires parties in adversary proceedings to file an answer and plead "every defense," affirmative defenses need not be pled in response to contested matters. Also, laches is a proper basis for affirming because this Court may affirm "on any ground that the record supports and that was raised, but not passed on, in the court below." United States v. Gimbel, 782 F.2d 89, 91 n.3 (7th Cir. 1986); Answer and Objection to Debtor's Application for Allowance and Payment of Administrative Expense Claims, Bankr. Ct. docket number 389, at 8 (noting that Weinschneider did not raise the release issue until after the bankruptcy court authorized the trustee to file the declaratory action).

This court should also reject Weinschneider's suggestion that the covenant not to sue is analogous to a duty-to-defend in an insurance contract. See Brief for Appellants at 22-24. Treating the covenant in this way would be contrary to the American rule. Attorney's fees are recoverable for breach of a duty-to-defend clause because a duty-to-defend clause obligates the insurer to bear the costs of litigation. A duty-to-defend clause has the same effect, then, as an express clause providing for attorney's fees in the event of a breach. The cases providing that attorney's fees are available for breach of a duty-to-defend are a straightforward application of the rule that attorney's fees are recoverable for breach of a contract when the contract provides for them. Because the covenant not to sue in this case does not provide for attorney's fees, they are not available under Illinois law.

B. Weinschneider's Contention That The Contract Should Be Construed To Include A Provision For Fees Has No Foundation In Illinois Contract Law.

Although Weinschneider concedes that the release and covenant not to sue do not include a provision for attorney's fees, he argues that this Court should read a fees provision into the contract because otherwise the release makes the covenant superfluous. See Brief for Appellants at 27. As this argument is incorrect and provides no basis to rewrite a contract, it must be rejected.

Weinschneider's contention that the release and the covenant not to sue are redundant is incorrect. A release and a covenant not to sue are not the same thing. "Illinois has long recognized a clear distinction between the legal effect of a release and a covenant not to sue. A release extinguishes a cause of action whereas a covenant not to sue affects only the right to bring suit and not the cause of action itself." Pate v. City of Sesser, 393 N.E.2d 1146, 1151 (Ill. App. 1979) (citing City of Chicago v. Babcock, 32 N.E. 271 (Ill. 1892); Holcomb v. Flavin, 216 N.E.2d 811 (Ill. 1966)). Also, "an unqualified release of one joint tortfeasor operates to discharge all joint tortfeasors, while a covenant not to sue has no such effect." Id. (citations omitted).

In any event, under Illinois law, a redundancy – if there were one – would be no basis to look beyond the clear terms of this contract. A court may not add provisions to an unambiguous contract even if they might make the contract more equitable. See Lakeland Property Owners Association v. Larson, 459 N.E.2d 1164, 1168 (Ill. App. 1984).

III. Even If Weinschneider's Contract Claim Had Merit, It Would Not Be Entitled To Priority Under Reading.

Even if Weinschneider's claim for attorney's fees under Illinois law had merit, it would not be entitled to priority under Section 503(b)(1)(A), Section 507, and Reading. As noted, Reading held that a negligence claim for damages was allowable as "actual and necessary" expenses of the estate entitled to priority because the receiver's operation of the business was an essential element to the rehabilitation of the debtor. Reading, 391 U.S. at 485. Weinschneider's contract claim is fundamentally different from the tort creditor's claim in Reading for four important reasons, discussed in turn.[10]

A. The Trustee Acted Properly.

The receiver in Reading was negligent, but the trustee in this case acted properly. As this Court recently reconfirmed, Reading does not provide a basis for treating damages caused by a trustee as actual and necessary expenses of preserving a bankruptcy estate when the estate or the bankruptcy court has not "committed [an] impropriety that might justify compensation." Corporate Assets, Inc. v. Paloian, 368 F.3d 761, 773 (7th Cir. 2004). And as the district court correctly determined, the chapter 7 trustee did not commit any impropriety in pursuing a declaratory judgment on the ownership of the claims against Burton. See WA-34.

As the district court observed, "there is no indication that the Trustee's declaratory judgment action was frivolous or brought in bad faith. Rather, the trustee advanced a good faith argument below that the covenant not to sue was fraudulently induced and, therefore, did not bar the declaratory judgment action." WA-35. The trustee received authorization from the bankruptcy court before filing the claim. 25a. And pursing the claim was in furtherance of the trustee's statutory obligation to "collect and reduce to money the property of the estate." 11 U.S.C. § 704(1).

Although Weinschneider suggests that this Court's decision that the suit breached the covenant not to sue demonstrates that the trustee's action was "wrongful," that claim cannot be squared with the history of the suit. As the district court noted, the "bankruptcy court held that the Trustee's claim had sufficient merit to survive summary judgment and, after trial, agreed with the Trustee's position." WA-35. That the trustee's arguments ultimately were not successful on appeal is no basis for concluding either that the action was not initiated in good faith or was inconsistent with the Trustee's fiduciary obligations to the estate. As the district court concluded, the "estate should not be penalized for the Trustee's good faith execution of his duties." WA-35.

Weinschneider is incorrect that the district court's conclusion that the trustee acted in good faith was not based on competent evidence. See Brief for Appellants at 13, n.2. The bankruptcy court entered an order authorizing the trustee to retain counsel to file suit, and Weinschneider supported the trustee's request. The trustee was entitled to rely on that order as settling the question whether bringing suit was proper. In any event, Weinschneider's claim for fees does not allege bad faith, see 29a-34a, even though the burden of proving entitlement to priority payment as an administrative expense rests with the party requesting it, see Woods v. City Nat. Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268 (1941).

In re Jack/Wade Drilling, Inc., 258 F.3d 385 (5th Cir. 2001), rejected a claim for administrative priority for attorney's fees as damages for the breach of a contract not to sue even though that contract (unlike the covenant in this case) expressly provided for attorney's fees in the event of breach. The Fifth Circuit declined to interpret Reading as requiring priority for an attorney's fees award to a party who successfully defends litigation brought by a chapter 7 trustee. The court explained that the party's claim for fees was not entitled to priority under section 503(b)(1)(A) because "the actions of the trustee were taken in the course of responsibly carrying out the duties of his position." Id. at 391. As Jack/Wade recognizes, it is the duty of the trustee in a chapter 7 bankruptcy "to identify and liquidate all existing claims on which the trustee has a good faith belief the estate is entitled to recover." Id. (citing Watkins v. Sedberry, 261 U.S. 571, 576 (1923)). To penalize the estate when the trustee faithfully carries out these duties would undermine the incentive structure established by the Bankruptcy Code. Id. at 391 (footnote omitted).

Weinschneider contends that Jack/Wade is distinguishable because the trustee in Jack/Wade sued on contract claims that arose pre-petition, whereas the trustee here sued on contract claims that arose post-petition. See Brief for Appellants at 14. But the relevant question is not when the underlying claim arose, but when the allegedly wrongful suit was filed. In both Jack/Wade and this case, the claim for attorney's fees was for fees from defending a suit brought by the trustee after the petition for bankruptcy was filed. In both cases, the trustee brought the suit as part of his duty to recover property of the estate. There is no relevant distinction.

Finally, contrary to Weinschneider's assertions, nothing in Yorke v. N.L.R.B., 709 F.2d 1138 (7th Cir. 1983), or In re Met-L-Wood Corporation, 115 B.R. 133 (N.D. Ill. 1990), suggests that Reading can apply when the trustee has acted properly. To be sure, Yorke does not mention the Reading requirement that the trustee's action be wrongful. But it also does not apply Reading. Its only citation to Reading is a "cf." citation to support the proposition that, because a trustee's obligation to bargain with a union when terminating operations in a liquidation arises from "the Trustee's decision . . . in the overall interests of the creditors, the costs concomitant with that decision properly can be attributed to the Trustee's efforts to 'preserve the estate,'" it can be considered an administrative expense of preserving the estate. See id. at 1143.

And Met-L-Wood Corp., in affirming an award of attorney's fees incurred by the debtor's attorneys in the successful defense of suit brought by the trustee, noted that the trustee's suits did not have "any merit whatsoever." 115 B.R. at 136.[11] As the bankruptcy court's initial ruling in the declaratory action makes clear, that is not true here. See Hoseman, 322 F.3d at 472. Yorke and In re Met-L-Wood Corporation provide no exception to the rule that Reading does not apply when the trustee has not committed some "impropriety that might justify compensation." Corporate Assets, 368 F.3d at 773.

B. Weinschneider Is Estopped From Arguing That The Trustee's Suit Was Improper.

Weinschneider's support for the bankruptcy court order authorizing the trustee to hire counsel to pursue the claim against Burton estops him from arguing now that the trustee's action was improper. Judicial estoppel is an equitable doctrine providing that a party who prevails on one ground in a lawsuit may not later repudiate that ground. See United States v. Hook, 195 F.3d 299, 306 (7th Cir. 1999). The doctrine "reduce[s] fraud in the legal process by forcing a modicum of consistency on a repeating litigant." Ladd v. ITT Corp., 148 F.3d 753, 756 (7th Cir. 1998). Judicial estoppel may apply when (1) the later position is clearly inconsistent with the earlier position; (2) the facts at issue are the same in both cases; (3) the party to be estopped convinced the first court to adopt its position; and (4) the party seeking to assert an inconsistent position would derive an unfair advantage or impose an unfair detriment on the opposing party if not estopped. Hook, 195 F.3d at 306; see also In re Superior Crew Boats, Inc., No. 03-30692 (5th Cir. June 18, 2004) (debtor estopped from bringing personal injury claim by failure to timely disclose claim to bankruptcy court).

Weinschneider has taken inconsistent positions before the bankruptcy court, first urging the bankruptcy court to grant the trustee's motion for authorization to hire counsel to sue him without raising the covenant not to sue, and then later claiming that he was entitled to receive attorney's fees for defending the declaratory action because the action breached the covenant not to sue. Weinschneider's position that the trustee should be authorized to sue him prevailed; the bankruptcy court granted the trustee's motion. The same facts are involved in the two cases, because Weinschneider's claim for fees arises out of the action instituted as a result of the bankruptcy court's authorization. And Weinschneider would derive an unfair benefit from his inconsistent positions, because when he made the determination to support the trustee's motion to sue him, he did so to enable himself to pursue his claim against Burton in the Illinois courts. He should thus be estopped from arguing that the trustee's suit was improper.[12]

C. Unlike Reading, This Bankruptcy Case Is A Liquidation.

That the bankruptcy estate at issue here was undergoing chapter 7 liquidation rather than chapter 11 reorganization is another important difference from Reading. Reading stressed that the debtor was operating when the damages were inflicted by the fire. See Reading, 391 U.S. at 475 ("the words 'preserving the estate' include the larger objective, common to arrangements, of operating the debtor's business with a view of rehabilitating it."); id. at 478 ("the question is whether the fire claimants should be subordinated to, should share equally with, or should collect ahead of those creditors for whose benefit the continued operation of the business . . . was allowed."); id. at 479 (the "business [was] operating. . . . for the benefit of the creditors and with the hope of rehabilitation. That benefit and that rehabilitation are worthy objectives. But it would be inconsistent with . . . the rule of fairness in bankruptcy to seek these objectives at the cost of excluding tort creditors. . . ."); id. at 483 ("analogous cases suggest that 'actual and necessary costs' should include costs ordinarily incident to operation of a business, and not be limited to costs without which rehabilitation would be impossible."); and id. at 485 n.12 ("[a]mong other expenses incident to conducting a business and therefore allowable as an administrative expenditure").

These statements make clear that the continuing operation of a business was integral to Reading's holding. And this Court has recognized this aspect of Reading, stating that it is "well settled that expenses incurred by the debtor-in-possession in attempting to rehabilitate the business during reorganization are within the ambit of § 503." In re Jartan, Inc. 732 F.2d 584, 586 (7th Cir. 1984) (emphasis added). But in this case, the trustee's violation of the covenant not to sue occurred in Weinschneider's chapter 7 liquidation case. In general, chapter 7 estates liquidate; they do not reorganize. While Section 721 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 721, authorizes trustees to obtain court permission "to operate the business of the debtor for a limited period," the trustee in this case did not operate any business.

As the First Circuit has noted, applying Reading in an ordinary, nonoperating liquidation proceeding "appears extremely problematic, as one fundamental justification for the priority is that general creditors stand to benefit from the post-petition operation of the debtor's business, either through the immediate generation of operating profits or through the ultimate reorganization of the debtor as a viable business entity." Woburn Assoc. v. Kahn (In re Hemingway Transport, Inc.), 954 F.2d. 1, 5 n.5. (1st Cir. 1992). Suing for a declaration that the claim against Burton belonged to the estate did not benefit the creditors in the relevant sense that it might have substantially improved the condition of the bankruptcy entity. Whether the claim against Burton was property of the estate was determined by the facts surrounding the creation of Burton, not by the continuing function of the bankruptcy entity under the trustee's management. The trustee's suit merely sought a declaration of the legal effect of those facts. Accordingly, Reading's rationale that tort creditor's damages were administrative expenses because the general creditors stood to benefit from the trustee's operation of the debtor's business, and the damages were caused by the operation of the business, does not apply to this case.

D. Weinschneider's Claim Sounds In Contract, Not Tort.

Weinschneider's claim is based on breach of contract, which does not come within the Reading doctrine. This Court has expressed skepticism about whether the Reading exception can apply when the creditor's claim is based on a breach of contract, see In re J. Catton Farms, Inc., 779 F.2d 1242 (7th Cir. 1985), noting that in "Reading the Court had stressed the involuntary nature of the tort victim's relationship to the bankrupt," _id._ at 1249 (citing _Reading_, 391 U.S. at 478). In this case, Weinschneider's participation in the declaratory action can hardly be called involuntary; he assented to the trustee's motion for authority to bring the suit. _Compare_ _Catton Farms_, 779 F.2d at 1249-50. Accordingly, the logic of _Reading_ does not support affording administrative priority to Weinschneider's contract damages, if he is entitled to damages.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should affirm the judgment of the district court.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The bankruptcy court's June 20, 2002 order, finding that Westmoreland Human Opportunities, Inc. breached its fiduciary duties to its fellow creditors, was a final order. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

In 1995, the Department of Housing and Urban Development selected Life Service Systems, Inc. to receive grant monies under the federal Supportive Housing Program. Westmoreland Human Opportunities, Inc. v. Walsh, 246 F.3d 233, 236 (3d Cir. 2001). Under the grant, Life Service provided care to the homeless in Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania. See November 9, 1998 Tr Plf Ex 1 (Life Service's grant application); Plf Ex 2 (HUD's August 23, 1995 conditional approval); Plf Ex 4 (HUD's Feb. 5, 1996 final approval); and Plf Ex 5 (executed grant agreement and February 9, 1996 transmittal).

Soon thereafter, Life Service began experiencing financial difficulties. Westmoreland, 246 F.3d at 236. On January 14, 1997, Life Service sought protection under the reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 1101, et seq. BD 1.

Section 1102(a)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes the United States Trustee to create a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims.[2] 11 U.S.C.

[2/] United States Trustees are officials of the Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. See 28 U.S.C. 581-589 (specifying the powers of United States Trustees); *United States Trustee v. In addition to tasks specifically authorized by statute, committees have broad residual authority to investigate "any" "matter relevant to the case." 11 U.S.C. 1103(c)(2).

On January 31, 1997, the United States Trustee appointed an unsecured creditors' committee in the Life Service case. BD 6. Westmoreland was one of Life Service's largest creditors, and it accepted an invitation to join the committee.[3] Id.; Westmoreland, 246 F.3d at 236-37. The committee sought court approval on March 26, 1997 to employ F. Scott Gray, and the firm of Sable, Makoroff & Gufsky, to act as counsel, which the court approved on April 30, 1997. We sincerely hope the project can be saved . . . .

During this time, Life Service was managed by another company, Adelphoi, Inc. February 17, 1999 Tr at 30. In order to fulfill a secret plan it had concocted with Westmoreland to divide Life Service's assets between them, Adelphoi caused Life Services to take no action in response to HUD's offer to try to retain the grant. See, e.g, April 23, 1999 Order at 6-7; June 20, 2002 Order at 5-6, 16-18. Life Service never responded to the letter and never sought to convince HUD to allow it to perform under the HUD grant. Id.

On March 4, 1997, HUD sent another letter to the debtor, whereby HUD once again invited the debtor to submit a 'work-out plan' for the continued implementation of the program. Id. Again, Adelphoi caused the debtor not to respond. Id.

From January of 1997, Westmoreland worked in concert with Adelphoi to transfer Life Service's real property to an entity affiliated with Adelphoi, to deny Life Services any chance to act as HUD's grantee in the future, and to secure the grant for itself. See, e.g., February 17, 1999 Tr at 57-59; April 23, 1999 Order at 6-7; June 20, 2002 Order at 5-6, 16-18.

On May 27, 1997, HUD and Westmoreland entered into an "amendment" to the supportive housing agreement executed previously by the debtor and HUD. Under it, Westmoreland succeeded to the debtor's rights and obligations and became entitled to receive and draw down the remaining $937,136 in funds HUD had set aside for the program. Id. at 7-8; February 17, 1999 Tr at 10, 46-47. Westmoreland did not disclose this to its fellow creditors or to the other members of the creditors' committee. April 18, 2002 Tr at 24 (counsel for Westmoreland does not "dispute that the disclosure of the actual assumption of the HUD contract [sic] in May was not specifically disclosed"); Tr at 53 (Westmoreland's counsel admits the creditors' committee "didn't know [the grant] was transferred").

The committee first learned of Westmoreland and Adelphoi's scheme to transfer the grant in April 1997, roughly one month before the HUD grant was transferred; when it did, the committee filed a motion on April 16, 1997, asking for the appointment of a trustee. Id. at 38-41; BD 20. See 11 U.S.C. 1104(a) (specifying the bases for appointing a chapter 11 trustee). In paragraph 17 of its motion, the committee disclosed its recent discovery that Adelphoi, who was supposed to be managing the debtor for the benefit of the creditors, had instead "negotiated [the debtor's division between] itself and Westmoreland." BD 20. The committee made clear in paragraph 14 that time was of the essence in appointing a trustee because Westmoreland and Adelphoi were "pursuing plans to take some of the Debtor's contracts." Id.

The court denied the committee's April 16, 1997, motion to appoint a trustee because the court believed the HUD grant would not be transferred without a court order. See April 18, 2002 Tr at 24, 53; BD 25 (Adelphoi's opposition); BD 26 (Westmoreland's opposition); BD 27 (hearing on motion to appoint); BD 29 (order denying motion). A trustee ultimately was appointed in November 1997. See BD 190 (order appointing trustee). Mr. James Walsh was appointed to act as the trustee. BD 191.

After investigating Life Service's affairs, Mr. Walsh filed separate adversary actions against Adelphoi and Westmoreland on February 27, 1998, alleging breach of fiduciary duties.[4] Mr. Walsh's complaint against Westmoreland alleged that Westmoreland breached its fiduciary duties by taking the HUD grant, which was property of the Westmoreland bankruptcy estate. AD 1.

The trustee's action against Westmoreland was tried on November 9, 1998 and February 17, 1999. At trial, Mr. Tay Waltenbaugh testified on behalf of Westmoreland. February 19, 1999 Tr at 5-62. Mr. Waltenbaugh had been Westmoreland's CEO since roughly 1990. Id. at 6. Mr. Waltenbaugh testified that he was contacted in January 1997 by Mr. James Bendel, the Executive Director of Adelphoi, Inc., about the HUD grant. Id. at 8. Mr. Bendel suggested that an affiliate of Adelphoi, Westmoreland CHODO, could obtain title to Life Service's real property, and Westmoreland could take the HUD grant from Life Service.[5] February 17, 1999 Tr at 27-33.

On cross-examination, Mr. Waltenbaugh admitted that Westmoreland was working with Adelphoi to take the HUD grant at the same time it sat on the creditors; committee:

> "Q. So – after the bankruptcy, while WHO is on the committee, you're talking to Adelphoi who is running [the debtor], about taking over this HUD

[5] At trial, Mr. Daniel Pagliari, Westmoreland's counsel, offered to "stipulate that discussions took place between Adelphoi, WHO and HUD concerning the transfer of the [HUD] grant from [Life Service] to [Westmoreland], either immediately prior to the bankruptcy petition being filed, or immediately thereafter. We'll stipulate to that." February 17, 1999 Tr at 33.

A. Right.

February 17, 1999 Tr at 37.

The February 18, 1997 minutes of Westmoreland's board of directors confirmed that Westmoreland sought to obtain the HUD grant before the expiration of the 30-day period HUD initially gave Life Service to retain the grant.[6] February 17, 1999 Tr Plf Ex 15 (Westmoreland's minutes); February 17, 1999 Tr at 34-35 (introduction of minutes into evidence); November 9, 1998 Tr Plf Ex 11 (HUD's 30 day letter). These minutes reveal that during this period, when Westmoreland also sat on the creditors' committee, Westmoreland "and Adelphoi [were] in negotiations . . . regarding the homeless shelter coming to [Westmoreland] . . . [Westmoreland] will administer the entire grant, [and] Adelphoi Inc. will own and maintain the property" then owned by the debtor, Life Service. February 17, 1999 Tr at 35-36 (testimony of Westmoreland CEO Waltenbaugh reading the minutes of Westmoreland's February 18, 1997 board meeting).

Mr. Waltenbaugh admitted at trial that even as of June 1997, he had not told anybody about the transfer of the HUD grant from the debtor to Westmoreland. February 17, 1999 Tr at 46-48. He also admitted he had never told the "official committee of unsecured creditors that [Westmoreland] was negotiating with Adelphoi . . . to get this contract." Id. at 47. Nor did he disclose any of those facts to the court. Id.

During this hearing, Mr. Waltenbaugh acknowledged yet again that Westmoreland did not tell its fellow creditors about its actions:

> Q. [Life Service's] did all the work to get the grant, [Life Service] paid its employees, incurred all the costs, and [Westmoreland] just stood up and said give us the grant? And got it?
>
> A. We – yeah I guess.

>
> A. Right.
>
> Q. And while WHO didn't tell the Committee that [Westmoreland had taken over] the grant?
>
> A. Right.

Id. at 53.

Westmoreland also admitted at trial that it did nothing to help Life Service retain the HUD grant; nor did it try to ensure that the grant's proceeds could help pay the claims of its fellow creditors, or help Life Service successfully reorganize in bankruptcy. February 17, 1999 Tr at 59. At trial Mr. Waltenbaugh also admitted that he never asked if anyone would pay more for the grant than Westmoreland did, even though Westmoreland was on the committee. Id. at 37, 59.

Mr. Vincent S. Zeli, Westmoreland's Vice President of Finance, also acted as Westmoreland's representative on the Life Service unsecured creditors' committee. February 17, 1999 Tr at 128-29. Mr. Zeli admitted at trial that he did not disclose to the committee that HUD had assigned the grant to Westmoreland. February 17, 1999 Tr at 130, 131-32.

Mr. Scott Gray, counsel to the creditors' committee, confirmed that Westmoreland never told the committee about its arrangement with Adelphoi, or its attempt to have the HUD grant transferred from the debtor to Westmoreland. April 18, 2002 Tr at 38-41. Mr. Gray explained that the committee "only found out about [Westmoreland's] involvement with Adelphoi through a meeting [the committee] requested with HUD," which occurred around "April, 1997." Id. at 38-39. "It was at that point in time that [the committee] learned that Adelphoi and WHO were trying to get the contract for themselves." Id. at 39.

Committee counsel also "learned that [Westmoreland] was passing documents onto other people other than committee members. And they were working for people other than the best interests of the unsecured creditors in the case." Id. Mr. Gray testified at trial that he asked Westmoreland's representative on the committee to resign because Westmoreland was improperly giving confidential information to people who were not on the committee and who held an adverse interest. February 17, 1999 Tr at 135-36.

On April 23, 1999, the bankruptcy court entered judgment in favor of the trustee. It found that "even though it sat on the committee of unsecured creditors at the time, WHO did not disclose to other general unsecured creditors or to the court that it had an 'understanding' with Adelphoi. They secretly agreed that Adelphoi would purchase 49 Division Street and that WHO would assume debtor's HUD grant and would house individuals in the property. Shortly thereafter WHO became the successor recipient of the HUD funds without providing any consideration to the bankruptcy estate, without notice to unsecured creditors and without obtaining prior court approval. WHO did not, however, house eligible individuals at 49 Division Street when an individual with whom WHO did not have an 'understanding' outbid Westmoreland CHODO and purchased the property. Apparently, WHO would only do business with Adelphoi's corporate relative." April 23, 1999 Order at 11.

Based on these facts, the court below concluded that "WHO breached the fiduciary duty it owed to general unsecured creditors as a result of its membership on the committee of unsecured creditors in that its conduct was blatantly self-aggrandizing" and resulted in Westmoreland improperly taking the grant, which was property of the Life Service bankruptcy estate. Id. at 19. This Court then affirmed. December 17, 1999 Order.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit reversed, holding Westmoreland had not breached its fiduciary duty as a committee member by taking estate property because the HUD grant was not property of the bankruptcy estate. Westmoreland, 246 F.3d at 242-56. The Third Circuit remanded two questions for further consideration:

> 1. Whether a fiduciary obligation to fellow unsecured creditors can arise out of a transaction involving an item of property that does not qualify as property of the estate; and,
> 2. If so, whether, based on the specific facts of Westmoreland's case, did Westmoreland breach such a fiduciary duty.

Westmoreland, 246 F.3d at 258

By order dated June 4, 2001, this Court remanded this adversary proceeding to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings consistent with the opinion of the Third Circuit. After briefing by the parties, the bankruptcy court conducted a hearing on April 18, 2002. The bankruptcy court entered an order on June 20, 2002 granting the trustee's complaint in adversary 98-02082-BM. AD 55. The bankruptcy court concluded that creditors' committee members can breach their fiduciary duties in ways other than by taking estate property. June 20, 2002 Order at 9-15. The court then concluded that Westmoreland "breached its fiduciary obligations to fellow general unsecured creditors when it arranged to have itself named as the successor grantee of the supportive housing program" and this "reduc[ed] rather than maximiz[ed] distribution to the class of general unsecured creditors" that Westmoreland had a fiduciary duty to represent. Id. at 18-19. This appeal followed.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The bankruptcy court's legal conclusion that committee members can breach their fiduciary duties in ways other than by taking estate property is subject to plenary review by this Court. Cinicola v. Scharffenberger, 248 F.3d 110, 115 n.1 (3d Cir. 2001). The bankruptcy court's factual finding that Westmoreland breached its fiduciary duties must be sustained on appeal unless it was clearly erroneous. Id.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

No court has ever held that bankruptcy fiduciaries can breach their fiduciary duties only by taking estate property. To the contrary, there are a number of universally recognized fiduciary duties whose breach need not involve property of the estate. These include the duty not to usurp a corporate opportunity, the duty of loyalty, and the duty of disclosure.

It is important that committee members continue to fulfill these important fiduciary duties in all cases, including those in which committee members do not seek to acquire property of the estate. Public confidence in the Bankruptcy System would be seriously undermined if fiduciaries were free to usurp corporate opportunities, shield important information from fellow creditors, act disloyally, leak confidential information, and take secret actions that reduce creditor recoveries in bankruptcy cases.

In this case, Westmoreland breached its duty not to usurp a corporate opportunity, its duty of loyalty, and its duty to disclose. By violating each of these duties Westmoreland failed the creditors it was bound by law to protect. Collectively, Westmoreland's breaches rise to a level of misconduct rarely encountered in bankruptcy cases.

ARGUMENT

Committee Members are Fiduciaries

Creditors' committees have broad powers and perform important functions in chapter 11 cases. See 11 U.S.C. 1103(c) (specifying committee powers). As the court below explained, a creditors' committee "is supposed to act as a 'watchdog' on behalf of the larger body of general unsecured creditors whose interests it is charged with representing." April 23, 1999 Order at 18 (citing Matter of Advisory Committee of Major Funding Corp., 109 F.3d 219, 224 (5th Cir. 1997)). In many cases, "the responsibility for monitoring the operations of the debtor and its compliance with appropriate bankruptcy procedures has fallen largely to the creditors' committee," Phar-Mor, Inc. v. Coopers & Lybrand, 22 F.3d 1228, 1240 (3d Cir. 1994), and to the United States Trustee.

The creditors' committee is the creditors' advocate. It investigates the debtor for them. 11 U.S.C. 1103(c)(2). It analyzes whether the debtor should continue doing business. Id. It acts as the creditors' representative in dealings with the debtor and with the chapter 11 trustee. 11 U.S.C. 1103(c)(1). It prepares a plan of reorganization if that is appropriate, and responds to plans that other parties propose. 11 U.S.C. 1103(c)(3). If the debtor is not managing its affairs appropriately, the committee protects creditors by requesting the appointment of a trustee. 11 U.S.C. 1103(c)(4). Finally, it has broad residual responsibility to "perform such other services" as are necessary to protect the "interest of those represented." 11 U.S.C. 1103(c)(5).

These important tasks are performed by only a handful of the creditors - most typically seven[7], who represent the collective interests of the entire creditor class. For this Representative System to function effectively, the general creditor body must have confidence that their committee members will protect their collective interests, act as their advocate, serve them loyally, and take no action that could diminish their recovery.

To ensure this, the law imposes affirmative duties and significant restrictions upon committee members. As the Supreme Court has squarely held, committee members are fiduciaries, Woods v. City National Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268-69 (1941) (bondholder committee members have a fiduciary duty to their bondholders), and the Third Circuit has specifically held here that Westmoreland had "a fiduciary duty . . . toward [its] constituent members." [8]

Westmoreland Breached its Fiduciary Duty to not Usurp a Corporate Opportunity

It is settled law that a fiduciary has a duty not to usurp a corporate opportunity. See., e.g., Citicorp Venture Capital, Ltd. v. Committee of Creditors, 160 F.3d 982, 987 (3d Cir. 1998) (bankruptcy fiduciary breached its fiduciary duties to the debtor and the creditors by usurping a corporate opportunity that was unrelated to any purchase of property of the estate); Brown v. Presbyterian Ministers Fund, 484 F.2d 998, 1004-05 (3d Cir. 1973) (applying state law in holding that a corporate fiduciary cannot seize corporate opportunities that his or her corporate employer has not chosen to forego).

In Citicorp, the Third Circuit specifically found a breach of fiduciary duty in a transaction that did not involve property of the estate. In that case, Citicorp Venture Capital had an employee on the chapter 11 debtor's board of directors and, consequently, owed a fiduciary duty to the debtor and its creditors. Citicorp, 160 F.3d at 985. Citicorp violated its fiduciary duty by purchasing notes drawn on the debtor for the purpose of making a profit and influencing the debtor's reorganization in its own favor. Id. at 987. Although the transactions by definition did not involve property of the estate - they involved purchases of debt obligations owed by the estate - the Third Circuit held Citicorp's actions constituted "a paradigm case of inequitable conduct by a fiduciary as that concept has been developed in the case law." Id.

Citicorp establishes that fiduciary duties are breached in the absence of a transaction involving property of the estate. See also Young v. Higbee Co., 324 U.S. 204 (1945) (former committee members breached their fiduciary duties to fellow creditors by selling corporate notes that were not property of the bankruptcy estate); Brown, 484 F.2d at 1004 (usurpation of a corporate opportunity constituted a breach of fiduciary duty under state law).[9]

[9] Support for these holdings are found in decisions defining criminal bankruptcy fraud under 18 U.S.C. 152. They squarely hold that the absence of estate property does not absolve a debtor from criminal liability for making false disclosures about assets because even potential assets must be disclosed. United States v. Cherek, 734 F.2d 1248, 1254 (7th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1014 (1985)("the statute requires a bankrupt to disclose the existence of assets whose immediate status in bankruptcy is uncertain. Even if the asset is not ultimately determined to be property of the estate under the technical rules of the Federal Bankruptcy Code, Section 152 properly imposes sanctions on those who preempt a court's determination by failing to report the asset"); United States v. Beard, 913 F.2d 193, 197 (5th Cir. 1990)(the defendant "was under the duty to disclose to the court the existence of assets whose immediate status in the bankruptcy is uncertain, even if that asset is ultimately determined to be outside the bankruptcy

Westmoreland attempts to distinguish Citicorp on three grounds. First it argues Citicorp does not apply because the debtor in that case could have taken title to the securities but Life Service could never have "owned" the HUD grant. Appellant's Br at 13. This argument is wrong for a number of reasons. First, Citicorp never made such a distinction. To the contrary, the Citicorp panel held the opportunity to purchase the securities was a corporate opportunity notwithstanding Citicorp's argument that the debtor "was not in a financial or legal position to purchase the notes ." Citicorp, 160 F.3d at 988.

Second, Westmoreland cites no case holding that the corporate opportunity doctrine is limited solely to corporate opportunities that would result in the fee simple ownership of an estate asset, and we are aware of none. Certainly, the Supreme Court and the Third Circuit have not imposed any such restriction upon the doctrine.

Finally, such a restriction makes no sense. Suppose a creditor were inclined to loan some dump trucks to a builder who was in bankruptcy at no cost in order to help the builder continue its operations and thereby maximize the chance it would reorganize. If a committee member interjected itself, and convinced the creditor to let it use the dump trucks instead, the creditor class as a whole would suffer a

"potential" loss [10] because the debtor had lost the opportunity to use free trucks. There is no reason to presume a court would not hold this was a prima facie violation of the corporate opportunity doctrine merely because the corporate opportunity involved a no-cost use of the trucks rather than a potential transfer of title.

Westmoreland is similarly incorrect when it argues that Citicorp is inapplicable because "the Court of Appeals found that Citicorp Venture Capital breached its fiduciary duty to the debtor" rather than to the creditors. Appellant's Br at 16. Citicorp expressly found that the corporate director's fiduciary duties ran not only to the debtor but, as here, to the creditors as well. Citicorp, 160 F.3d at 987. On this point Citicorp is fully consistent with the Supreme Court's holding in CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985), where the Court concluded "if a debtor remains in possession . . . the debtor's directors[, such as the Citicorp director, have a] . . . fiduciary obligation to creditors and shareholders."[11]

[10] "Potential" loss is the standard the Third Circuit articulated in this case for determining whether Westmoreland breached its fiduciary duty. Westmoreland, 246 F.3d at 256. On remand, the bankruptcy court found that Westmoreland had caused actual losses. June 20, 2002 Order at 18.

[11] Accord Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of United Healthcare System, Inc. v. United Healthcare System, Inc. (In re United Healthcare System, Inc.), 200 F.3d 170, 177 n. 9 (3d Cir. 1999) (applying Weintraub in finding that "a debtor-in-possession is a fiduciary for its estate and its creditors").

Finally, Westmoreland argues that Citicorp is inapplicable because it involved a usurpation of a fiduciary duty imposed upon corporate officers, not committee members, and committee members should be treated less "stringently." Appellant's Br at 16-17. There is a short answer to this assertion: it is inconsistent with Supreme Court and Third Circuit law. Both make clear that the fiduciary duties of bankruptcy professionals are at least as stringent as those imposed upon persons in the private sector. The Supreme Court holds committee members to very high fiduciary standards. Woods, 312 U.S. at 268 (holding that "[o]nly strict adherence to . . . equitable principles [of fiduciary law] can keep the standard of conduct for [committee member] fiduciaries 'at a level higher than that trodden by the crowd'") (citing Cardozo, C.J., in Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 464, 164 N.E. 545, 546 (1928)) (emphasis supplied)). See also Mosser v. Darrow, 341 U.S. 267, 271 (1951) (trustees are subject to "strict prohibitions");[12] Weintraub, 471 U.S. at 355 (holding debtors in possession have a fiduciary duty to their creditors).[13]

Similarly, in Mountain States, the Third Circuit held, in defining the duties of committee members, that "[u]ncompromising rigidity has been the attitude of courts of equity when petitioned to undermine . . . the strict duties imposed on fiduciaries " Mountain States, 118 F.2d at 407 (quoting Meinhard, 249 N.Y. at 464, 164 N.E. at 546). Adopting Chief Judge Cardozo's analysis in Meinhard, the Third Circuit "held [the stockholders' committee member] to something stricter than the morals of the market place. Not honesty alone, but the punctilio of an honor the most sensitive, is then the standard of behavior. As to this there has developed a tradition that is unbending and inveterate." Id.

[13] "In Weintraub, the Supreme Court noted that "the willingness of courts to leave debtors in possession 'is premised upon an assurance that the officers and managing employees can be depended upon to carry out the fiduciary responsibilities of a trustee.'" Weintraub, 471 U.S. at 355 (citations and internal quotations omitted).

Weintraub underscores that fiduciary duties can be breached in the absence of a taking of property of the estate. A debtor in possession cannot purchase property it already owns. Nevertheless, it clearly operates under a number of fiduciary duties, which restrict the debtor's conduct, and protect shareholders and creditors.

546). In the workaday world of solvent companies it might be entirely appropriate for a creditor to wrest a valuable grant from its debtor. It might also be appropriate for a creditor to diminish the ability of other creditors to recover from that debtor. But bankruptcy is different. A committee member may not snatch an opportunity that might benefit the creditors, and Westmoreland's conduct in doing that constituted a classic breach of the duty not to usurp a corporate opportunity.

Westmoreland Breached Its Duty of Loyalty

All fiduciaries operate under a duty of loyalty. See, e.g., Woods, 312 U.S. at 268 (holding that a member of a bondholders committee has a duty of loyalty to the bondholders); Mountain States, 118 F.2d at 407 (holding that committee members are bound by a duty of "undivided loyalty"); In re Mesta Machine Co., 67 B.R. 151, 156 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 1986) ("[a]s fiduciaries, counsel and committee members have obligations of fidelity, undivided loyalty and impartial service in the interest of creditors they represent") (citation omitted). See also Mosser, 341 U.S. at 271(holding a trustee liable for breach of the duty of loyalty because "[e]quity tolerates in bankruptcy trustees no interest adverse to the trust"); United States v. O'Hagan, 521 U.S. 642, 653 (1997) ("[a] fiduciary who pretends loyalty to the principal while secretly converting the principal's information for personal gain . . . dupes or defrauds the principal" and is liable for that misconduct) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)).

Committee members must meet very high standards of loyalty. Woods, 312 U.S. at 269; Young v. Higbee Co., 324 U.S. 204 (1945) (former stockholders' committee members violated their continuing fiduciary duties to their constituents by settling litigation that could have benefitted the entire stockholder class after they resigned from the committee). See also Mosser, 341 U.S. at 271 (applying the duty of loyalty to a bankruptcy trustee). Their duty of loyalty requires them to "avoid acting upon any matter which may result in a benefit to him in particular as opposed to the members of the class which he represents . . ." In re Nationwide Sports Distributors, Inc., 227 B.R. 455, 464 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1998) (citation omitted). Nothing compelled Westmoreland to serve on the creditors' committee. But having voluntarily chosen to do so Westmoreland, like the committee members in Woods and Young, had a "representative responsibility"[14] to loyally protect the interests of all creditors, not merely its own.

As Woods, Young, and Mosser make clear, it is axiomatic that the duty of loyalty does not apply solely to the purchase and sale of estate property. Under section 1103(c) of the Code, committee members perform many tasks. 11 U.S.C. 1103(c). Nothing in that statute or bankruptcy case law indicates that committee members may be disloyal whenever they are doing things other than purchasing property of the estate. Such an odd construction would render the duty of loyalty a nullity whenever committee members carry out tasks such as investigating the debtor's affairs, proposing plans of reorganization, valuing corporate opportunities, or recommending the appointment of an examiner or a trustee.

In this case, Westmoreland violated its duty of loyalty to its constituent members in a number of ways. Rather than striving to ensure that the debtor's estate would produce the maximum return possible for its fellow unsecured creditors, Westmoreland conspired with Adelphoi to strip real property from the debtor and divert the debtor's HUD grant to Westmoreland. April 23, 1999 Order at 6-9, 18-20; June 20, 2002 Order at 4-6, 16-19. This falls far short of the undivided loyalty required of a fiduciary. Woods, 312 U.S. at 269; Mountain States, 118 F.2d at 407.

Westmoreland also violated its duty of loyalty by failing to fulfill its role as a committee member. Section 1103(c)(3) empowers the creditors' committee to help devise a plan of reorganization that will benefit the creditor class. Rather than loyally taking action that would facilitate the development of such a plan - and thereby ensuring a better prospect of a meaningful return for the unsecured creditor class - Westmoreland did everything possible to make a plan of reorganization impossible. By its own admission, Westmoreland did nothing to maximize creditor recoveries from the retention of the HUD grant, or from its transfer. February 17, 1999 Tr at 37, 59. Instead, unbeknownst to the court, the committee, and the creditor body, at the very time that HUD was inviting the debtor to devise a method to keep its grant, Westmoreland was seeking to have HUD transfer the grant away from the debtor and to it, and was conspiring to have the debtor's real property transferred to Adelphoi. See, e.g., id. at 58. Given the overwhelming evidence establishing Westmoreland and Adelphoi's plot, the court below did not commit clear error in finding that Westmoreland breached its fiduciary duty by "concoct[ing] a secret scheme" with Adelphoi. April 23, 1999 Order at 6.

On appeal, Westmoreland contends its disloyalty is not actionable because it was no secret.[15] Appellant's Br at 8-9. Westmoreland suggests the committee knew about its misconduct. Id. It argues, for example, that paragraphs 14 and 17 of the committee's April 16, 1997, motion for the appointment of a trustee, BD 20, mentions Westmoreland's scheme. Appellant's Br at 8-9.

Westmoreland misinterprets the record. Life Service went into bankruptcy on January, 14, 1997. BD 1. HUD's letter extending Life Service's opportunity to retain the HUD grant was written on January 23, 1997. November 9, 1998 Tr Plf [15] It cites no authority to support this contention.

Ex 11. In January - May, while it was on the committee, Westmoreland was putting into action its scheme to transfer the grant to itself and was not telling the court, the committee or the creditors. See, e.g., February 19, 1999 Tr at 8, 27-33, 35-37, 47-48, 59, 128-32, 136 (admissions of Westmoreland's corporate officers).

The unrebutted testimony adduced at trial establishes that Westmoreland never told the committee about its arrangement with Adelphoi during the months of January, February, March, April, or May of 1997, or about its attempts to have the HUD grant transferred from the debtor to Westmoreland. April 18, 2002 Tr at 38-41. Mr. Gray, counsel for the creditors' committee explained that the committee "only found out about [Westmoreland's] involvement with Adelphoi through a meeting [the committee] requested with HUD," which occurred around "April, 1997." Id. at 38-39. "It was at that point in time that [the committee] learned that Adelphoi and WHO were trying to get the contract for themselves." Id. at 39.

When the committee learned of Westmoreland's conduct, it filed a motion for the appointment of a trustee on April 16, 1997. Id.; BD 20. See 11 U.S.C. 1104(a) (specifying the bases for appointing a chapter 11 trustee). Westmoreland is correct that paragraphs 14 and 17 describe some of Westmoreland's and Adelphoi's misconduct, but it did so to justify why these recent discoveries were so serious that a trustee should be appointed in the case. See BD 20 (motion to appoint trustee).

On remand, the bankruptcy court asked Westmoreland why it had not disclosed the scheme to transfer the HUD grant in January, "at the beginning." April 18, 2002 Tr at 52. Westmoreland's counsel offered no explanation but countered that "the committee knew as early April."[16] Id. Of course, this was months after the bankruptcy, months after the scheme was devised, months after Westmoreland joined the committee, and on the eve of the grant's transfer. Hiding such important facts for months falls short of meeting a committee member's duty of loyalty.

Westmoreland compounded this breach of loyalty with a second independent breach - it took confidential committee information and gave it to third parties. Committee counsel Gray testified that he had to ask Westmoreland's representative on the committee to resign because Westmoreland was improperly giving confidential information to people who were not on the committee and who held an adverse interest. February 17, 1999 Tr at 135-36. Based on its weighing

[16] In response to the court's questioning, Westmoreland's counsel freely admitted that Westmoreland did not disclose the grant's transfer to the interested parties or to the court. Id. at 53-55. As the court noted, Westmoreland's actions in January, February, March, April - and beyond - were "[a] secret to me –." Id. at 53.

of the testimony in the case, the bankruptcy court found that Westmoreland "shar[ed] confidential information with third parties having an interest adverse to the debtor's other unsecured creditors." June 20, 2002 Order at 5. Standing alone, this act of disloyalty would be sufficient to justify a finding of breach of fiduciary duty.

Westmoreland Breached its Duty of Disclosure

Westmoreland breached its fiduciary duty to disclose relevant information to the creditor class. The law requires a fiduciary "to disclose opportunities available to the corporation." Brown, 484 F.2d at 1004; In re Allegheny International, Inc., 954 F.2d 167, 179-80 (3d Cir. 1992) (under Pennsylvania law corporate executive violates its common law duty of loyalty by failing to inform the corporation to whom he owes a duty about significant events); Seidman v. OTS, 37 F.3d 911, 935 n.34 (3d Cir. 1994) ("A fiduciary's duty of candor is encompassed within the duty of loyalty. The duty of candor requires corporate fiduciaries to disclose all material information relevant to corporate decisions from which they may derive a personal benefit") (citations and internal quotations omitted)); Arst v. Stifel, Nicolaus & Co., 86 F.3d 973, 979 (10th Cir. 1996) (the "duty of loyalty as an agent included a duty to disclose"); Shea v. Esensten, 107 F.3d 625, 628 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 914 (1997) (under ERISA, "the duty to disclose material information is the core of a fiduciary's responsibility, animating the common law of trusts long before the enactment of ERISA") (citation omitted)).

Westmoreland's duty to disclose "required that it share everything that it knew [with the creditors'] Committee." Citicorp, 160 F.3d at 988. Westmoreland violated its duty to disclose by keeping secret about the plot to strip the debtor of its real property and to transfer the grant. April 23, 1999 Order at 6-8; June 20, 2002 Order at 6; April 18, 2002 Tr at 53-55. Westmoreland's fellow unsecured creditors would have found these facts significant. The debtor's real property was a principal asset of the bankruptcy estate. A principal source of cash-flow was the HUD grant. Without them, reorganization was impossible. In addition, grant proceeds could have funded payments to creditors. By retaining the HUD grant for an additional period of time, Life Service could have augmented creditor recoveries even if its efforts at reorganization ultimately proved unsuccessful. Finally, transferring the HUD grant had the legal effect of creating additional creditor claims, which also diminished creditor recoveries. Accordingly, Westmoreland's failure to disclose these facts constitutes a separate and independent basis for concluding it breached its fiduciary duties to its fellow creditors.

Sound Notions of Public Policy Support Affirmance

Westmoreland asks this Court to free it from a typical fiduciary's duty of loyalty, duty to disclose, and duty not to seize a corporate opportunity. Appellant's Br at 14 (purporting to ask this Court to create the "narrowest" of exceptions). Supreme Court and Third Circuit authority foreclose such exception-making by mandating that bankruptcy fiduciaries be held to high fiduciary standards. Woods, 312 U.S. at 268; Mosser, 341 U.S. at 271; Young, 324 U.S. at 210-12; Mountain States, 118 F.2d at 407.

Even if it were possible to craft such exceptions within the bounds of existing law, it would be unwise to do so. A fiduciary's duties are defined by a century of jurisprudence. If one wishes to become a bankruptcy fiduciary, it is easy to ascertain what the traditional fiduciary duties are. Similarly, those who must rely upon the loyalty and integrity of bankruptcy fiduciaries know what standards fiduciaries typically must meet. We see no good reason to blur those bright lines. Doing so would only encourage some fiduciaries to test the limits of acceptable practice and diminish the confidence that debtors and creditors will have in the integrity and predictability of the Bankruptcy System.

This is not the kind of case that calls for exceptions. Exculpation would sanction a committee member's transfer of $937,136 in grant funds in a circumstance where the committee member schemed against the debtor and its fellow creditors, hid that conduct from the court, the parties in interest and the United States Trustee, divulged confidential information to third parties, caused creditor losses, and made impossible any reorganization of this debtor.

Seventy-five years ago, Chief Judge Cardozo warned about the "'disintegrating erosion' [caused by creating] particular exceptions" to fiduciary standards. Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 464, 164 N.E. 545, 546 (1928). In rejecting exception-making, he declared that fiduciary standards "will not consciously be lowered by any judgment of this court". Id. The court below has similarly concluded that condoning Westmoreland's conduct "would . . . seriously erode the prophylactic purpose of the proscription against self-dealing." April 23, 1999 Order at 20.

Moreover, many activities that occur in bankruptcy cases have nothing whatever to do with property of the estate. It would make no sense in those instances to allow fiduciaries to act in complete disregard of accepted fiduciary standards of conduct. For example, a debtor might bid on an asset that the debtor was interested in purchasing. If the committee member outbid the debtor (perhaps through a straw party), it would clearly usurp a corporate opportunity, even though no property of the estate was acquired. Or suppose a committee member knew real property that the debtor proposed to purchase was contaminated, rendering it worth a small fraction of the purchase price that the debtor was about to pay. If the creditor did not warn the creditors, it should be held to have violated its duties of loyalty and disclosure, even though it acquired no property of the estate. Or envision a situation where a committee member, out of simple malice, approached a supplier and convinced it to cease doing business with the debtor. No property of the estate would be acquired, but the conduct would be unacceptable for a fiduciary. In each of these scenarios, the nature of the conduct warrants a finding of breach of duty.

Property of the estate and fiduciary duty are distinct legal concepts. There exists no basis in statute, case law or logic for treating them as mutually dependant. Nor is there any reason to conclude the absence of property of the estate can negate or override fiduciary duties owed by committee members.

Fiduciary standards derive from state corporate governance law, ERISA and pension law, labor law, receivership law, and banking law. Both the Supreme Court and the Third Circuit have looked to that law when crafting the fiduciary law of bankruptcy.[17] Nothing in the law and no public policy justifies radically

[17] In Woods, the Supreme Court relied heavily upon Meinhard - a decision interpreting state joint-venture law, as did the Third Circuit in Mountain States. Similarly, the Third Circuit followed the state law decision it previously rendered contracting bankruptcy fiduciary law by engrafting a property of the estate restriction that has never before been applied in any case, an exception that cannot be reconciled with bankruptcy decisions finding breaches in its absence, and one that would transport bankruptcy law far outside the mainstream of fiduciary jurisprudence.

in Brown when it was called upon its Citicorp to define when a bankruptcy fiduciary usurps a debtor's corporate opportunity.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Acting United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the bankruptcy court's ruling that Westmoreland breached its fiduciary duties in the Life Service bankruptcy case.

APPELLEE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE'S BRIEF

Statement of Jurisdiction

Jim Lee Wiersma and Patricia Darlene Wiersma, debtors in bankruptcy, filed a notice appealing three orders of the bankruptcy court entered April 4, 2003; February 11, 2003; and September 20, 2002, respectively. As discussed in the Argument section, p. 20, infra, this Court has jurisdiction only over the April 4, 2003, order.[1/]

[1/] The bankruptcy appellate panel held that it had jurisdiction to review a portion of the February 11, 2003, order. On February 11, 2003, the bankruptcy court entered an order with two provisions. First, it denied the confirmation of the

(a) On April 4, 2003, the bankruptcy court entered a final order dismissing the Wiersmas' bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b). ER Tab 18 p. 851.[2] The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to do so under 28 U.S.C. 157. The bankruptcy appellate panel below had jurisdiction to review this order under 28 U.S.C. 158(b).

(b) The April 4 order dismissing the case is a final order. See, e.g., Dominguez v. Miller (In re Dominguez), 51 F.3d 1502, 1506 (9th Cir. 1995) (dismissal of action is final and appealable if it terminates all possibilities of litigation on merits). The basis for this Court's jurisdiction over this appeal is 28 U.S.C. 158(d).

debtors' chapter 11 plan, and second, it granted a motion approving a settlement. ER, Tab 13, pp. 812-814. The BAP found that the order denying confirmation was interlocutory, and therefore merged into the final dismissal order of April 4. The United States Trustee does not oppose the review of this portion of the order. See, e.g., Elliott v. Frontier Properties, Inc. (In re Four Seasons Properties, Inc.), 979 F.2d 1358, 1364 (9th Cir. 1992) (review of interlocutory order that becomes part of final order reviewable upon appeal of final order).

The bankruptcy court's settlement approval in the February 11 order, on the other hand, is final for appeal purposes, and the April 9 notice of appeal was untimely as to this portion of the order. Both the BAP and this Court lack jurisdiction over untimely filed appeals of final orders of the bankruptcy court. See Argument, p. 20, infra.

[2] Bank of the West's Excerpts of Record are cited as "ER." It was not necessary for the United States Trustee to submit any supplemental excerpts of the record.

p. 854. The BAP judgment was entered on February 1, 2005, ER Tab 25, p. 881, and the Wiersmas filed a timely notice of appeal on February 25, 2005. ER Tab 22 p. 2; see also Tab 22, p. 6 (amended notice). On March 9, 2005, appellee Bank of the West filed a notice of cross-appeal. ER Tab 26, p. 924.

Statement of the Issues

1. Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion by dismissing the Wiersmas' chapter 11 bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b)?

2. Does this Court lack jurisdiction over untimely appeals of final orders of a bankruptcy court where a timely notice of appeal is a jurisdictional prerequisite under 28 U.S.C. 158(c)?

Standard of Review

This Court independently reviews the bankruptcy court's decision without giving deference to the bankruptcy appellate panel. See, e.g., Cossu v. Jefferson Pilot Sec. Corp. (In re Cossu), 410 F.3d 591, 595 (9th Cir. 2005) (citation omitted). A bankruptcy court's conclusions of law are reviewed de novo and its findings of fact are reviewed for clear error. Price v. United States Trustee (In re Price), 353 F.3d 1135, 1138 (9th Cir. 2004). The standard of appellate review of the conversion or dismissal of a chapter 11 bankruptcy case is abuse of discretion. See, e.g., Marsch v. Marsch (In re Marsch), 36 F.3rd 825, 828 (9th Cir. 1994); Price, 353 F.3d at 1138. Questions of subject matter jurisdiction are reviewed de novo. See, e.g., Montana v. Goldin (In re Pegasus Gold Corp.), 394 F.3d 1189, 1193 (9th Cir. 2005).

Statement of the Case

Jim Lee Wiersma and Patricia Darlene Wiersma were Idaho dairy farmers who filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy under the reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. The Wiersmas filed four different plans of reorganization that were not confirmed, and their case was ultimately dismissed on the motion of the United States Trustee under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b). The Wiersmas appealed this dismissal and the bankruptcy appellate panel affirmed.

The Wiersmas also appeal two previously entered orders: a September 20, 2002, order determining the secured status of two creditors and a February 11, 2003, order approving a settlement and denying confirmation of the Wiersmas' third amended plan. The BAP affirmed both orders but held the appeal of the February 11 settlement approval and the appeal of the September 20 secured status determination were moot. The Wiersmas appealed to this Court and the Bank cross-appealed.

Statement of Facts

The Wiersmas are dairy farmers who formerly operated a dairy in Idaho. The growth of the Wiersmas' operation over time was financed in large part by loans from what is now known as Bank of the West ("the Bank"). See ER Tab 2, p. 23. To secure their loans, the Wiersmas granted the Bank a security interest in, among other things, accounts and contract rights, general intangibles, farm products, livestock, milk products quota monies and other property in possession. ER Tab 1, pp. 1-21.

During their expansion, the Wiersmas hired Gietzen Electric to provide electrical services in connection with building construction. See ER Tab 2, p. 22. The Wiersmas allege that the work done by Gietzen resulted in electrical shocks causing physical injury to the Wiersmas' dairy cattle. See, e.g., ER Tab 9, pp. 500-501. Because of the damages suffered and the cost to remedy the problems, the Wiersmas filed a state court lawsuit against Gietzen. ER Tab 2, pp. 22-23. During the pendency of the litigation, on October 1, 2001, the Wiersmas filed a petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. ER Tab 27, p. 980; see 11 U.S.C. 1101, et seq.

While in bankruptcy, the Wiersmas terminated their dairy operation. ER Tab 12, p. 753. After the last of the Wiersmas' dairy cattle were sold, the Bank and O.H. Kruse Grain and Milling (nka Ferndale Grain), an entity which had provided feed to the Wiersmas' cattle, both asserted a secured interest in the Gietzen lawsuit.

During the bankruptcy proceeding, the Wiersmas and Geitzen entered into a settlement agreement. ER Tab 7, pp. 130-142. Subsequently, the Wiersmas filed a motion in the bankruptcy court to determine the secured status of the Bank and Kruse/Ferndale. ER Tab 27, p. 996; see also ER Tab 2, pp. 22-53 (bankruptcy court's memorandum of decision). The court determined that the Bank and Kruse/Ferndale both held valid and enforceable security interests in the Wiersmas' claim against Gietzen and in any proceeds of any settlement or other recovery on the claim. ER Tab 3, p. 54; Tab 2, pp. 22-53.[3/]

During this time, the Wiersmas were attempting in vain to propose a confirmable plan. They ultimately filed four plans, none of which were confirmed. The Wiersmas first filed a plan of reorganization in May 2002, ER Tab 27, p. 993, and then an amended plan in October 2002. ER Tab 27, p. 1002; see also ER Tab 5, pp. 60-126 (transcript of November 19, 2002, hearing where the court denied confirmation). The Wiersmas filed a third plan (a second amended plan) in December 2002. ER Tab 27, p. 1007. In their second amended plan, the Wiersmas proposed to use the settlement from the Gietzen litigation to purchase cows in Georgia where the Wiersmas would move and operate a dairy. See ER Tab 8, pp. 143-311 (transcript of December 20, 2002, hearing on confirmation of second amended plan). The Wiersmas intended to lease an existing dairy farm and purchase the cows from that farm. Id. At the hearing on the second amended plan, the court denied confirmation but granted the Wiersmas additional time to propose a consensual plan. ER Tab 12, p. 808. The Wiersmas then filed a fourth plan (the third amended plan), which the court found was still neither feasible nor consensual, and therefore denied confirmation. Id. at 843.

On February 25, 2002, prior to the time the issues relating to the Geitzen lawsuit were raised in the bankruptcy court, the United States Trustee[4/] filed a motion to dismiss the case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 1112. ER Tab 27, p. 991. At that time, the Wiersmas had not yet filed a disclosure statement or plan despite having been under the protection of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code for almost five months. Moreover, the Wiersmas had not filed monthly financial or operating reports as required by 11 U.S.C. 704(8), 1106, 1107 and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2015. The court ultimately deferred ruling until the March 28, 2003, hearing. ER Tab 12, p. 808. Having offered the Wiersmas an opportunity to convert voluntarily to chapter 7, the bankruptcy court dismissed the Wiersmas case for cause under section 1112(b). ER Tab 18, p. 851; ER Tab 12, p. 843.

The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law on the record and incorporated the reasoning previously set forth in a February 11, 2003, memorandum. In that memorandum, the court outlined its principal concerns about the Wiersmas' reorganization proposal, but reserved ruling so the Wiersmas would have additional time to negotiate a consensual plan with the Bank. ER Tab 12, p. 808. The court found two primary defects in the Wiersmas' second amended plan – first, the plan did not treat the Bank's allowed secured claim fairly and equitably as required by 11 U.S.C. 1129(a), ER Tab 12, p. 798-99, and second, the Wiersmas failed to prove that their plan was feasible and would not likely be followed by the need for further reorganization or liquidation. ER Tab 12, p. 801, 806. At the time of the March 28, 2003, ruling, the court found that these two concerns had not been abated. ER Tab 17, p. 831.

In addition to the feasibility issue, the court noted the inadequacy of the Wiersmas' proposed treatment of the Bank's secured claim under 11 U.S.C. 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii). Specifically, the court stated that it "seriously doubts" that the Bank would "realize the indubitable equivalent of its claim under the debtors' plan, which could prevent confirmation." Id. Summarizing its reasoning, the court found that under all of the circumstances and based upon its "comparison of the bank's rights now, with their rights under the debtors' proposed third amended plan, together with an assessment of their risk now versus the risk under the debtor's plan," it "firmly believes that debtors' proposal to pay the bank through the plan hardly constitutes the indubitable equivalent of the bank's current status." ER Tab 17, pp. 841-842. Accordingly, upon its fourth denial of confirmation, the court also dismissed the Wiersmas' case. ER Tab 18, p. 851.

On appeal, the BAP affirmed the bankruptcy court's dismissal of the case. ER Tab 26, p. 917. The BAP reasoned that the Wiersmas' third amended plan did not adequately address the bankruptcy court's concerns and found the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it found the plan was not feasible, ER Tab 26, p. 917, concluding that Wiersmas' new proposals in their final plan "were nothing more than 'beating a dead horse,' (or here a dead cow), and did not remove the bankruptcy court's substantial doubt [with respect to the previous plan]." ER Tab 25, p. 917.

Next, the panel found that the bankruptcy court correctly denied confirmation of the second amended plan because the plan did not provide the Bank the "indubitable equivalent" of its secured claim as required by 11 U.S.C. 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii). ER Tab 25, p. 910. Further, the BAP concluded that the bankruptcy court's determination that the second amended plan was not feasible under 11 U.S.C. 1129(a)(11) was correct. Id. at 913-915. Finally, the panel dismissed as moot the appeal of the February 11 order approving the settlement and the September 20 order determining secured status. Id. at 884.

Summary of the Argument

The bankruptcy court's findings and conclusions support the existence of cause to dismiss under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b) on at least two independent grounds. First, the Wiersmas were unable to effectuate a plan, which is cause for dismissal under section 1112(b)(2). Despite numerous opportunities to negotiate a consensual plan and filing four separate plans, the Wiersmas still failed to demonstrate the feasibility of a successful reorganization chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Moreover, the treatment of the Bank under the Wiersmas' third amended plan violated 11 U.S.C. 1129 and rendered confirmation unlikely, constituting further cause under 1112(b)(2). Second, every plan proposed by the Wiersmas was denied, and the Wiersmas' request for additional time was denied, constituting cause for dismissal under 1112(b)(5).

Argument

I. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion to dismiss the Wiersmas' bankruptcy case because, as reflected by the record, there was ample cause for dismissal under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b).

Congress granted the bankruptcy courts great discretion to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 bankruptcy case for "cause" under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b). See, e.g., Pioneer Liquidating Corp. v. United States Trustee (In re Consol. Pioneer Mortgage Entities), 264 F.3d 803, 806 (9th Cir. 2001); Marsch v. Marsch (In re Marsch), 36 F.3d 825, 828 (9th Cir. 1994). Section 1112(b) provides a non-exhaustive list of factors constituting cause. 11 U.S.C. 1112(b); see also House Report No. 595, 95th Cong. 1st Sess 405-406 (1977) and Senate Report No. 989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 117-118 (1978) (section 1112(b)'s list of grounds for conversion or dismissal is not exhaustive). This Court should reverse a bankruptcy court's dismissal for cause only if it is "based on an erroneous conclusion of law or when the record contains no evidence on which [the bankruptcy court] rationally could have based that decision." Consol. Pioneer Mortgage Entities, 264 F.3d at 806-807 (citations omitted).

A. Cause to dismiss the Wiersmas' chapter 11 bankruptcy case existed under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b)(2) because the Wiersmas' proposed plans were not feasible.

The bankruptcy court's finding that all of the Wiersmas' proposed plans lacked feasibility is abundantly supported in the record and constitutes cause for dismissal under 1112(b)(2). See 11 U.S.C. 1112(b)(2) ("inability to effectuate a plan" is cause). Dismissal under 1112(b)(2) is proper where "the court determines that it is unreasonable to expect that a plan can be confirmed in the chapter 11 case." In re Woodbrook Assocs., 19 F.3d 312, 316 (7th Cir. 1994). With respect to confirmation of the debtors' plans, the responsibility ultimately fell to the bankruptcy court to determine "whether the things which are to be done after confirmation can be done as a practical matter under the facts." Clarkson v. Cooke Sales and Serv. Co. (In re Clarkson), 767 F.2d 417, 420 (8th Cir. 1985).

The difficulties foreseen by the bankruptcy court in this case were realistic. The Wiersmas had never operated a dairy in Georgia. The use of all of the settlement proceeds for the proposed purchase of dairy cows left the Wiersmas with no equity in the new farming operation, no financial cushion, and no working capital. For these reasons, as well as the fact that it had already granted the Wiersmas numerous chances to effectuate a plan, the bankruptcy court found cause for dismissal of the Wiersmas' case.

The court clearly articulated at least five reasons for its conclusion that the Wiersmas' continuation in chapter 11 was not feasible under any of the plans thus far proposed. First, the court noted that the Wiersmas "have proposed four separate plans to their creditors but have been unable to achieve a consensus on confirmation of [a] plan." ER Tab 17, p. 832. Moreover, in its February 11 order, the court explicitly outlined its concerns with respect to the Wiersmas' plans. Despite its opinion that the Wiersmas "have had ample time to ponder their predicament and plot their course," the court granted them more time to work out a solution with the Bank. Id.; see also ER Tab 5, p. 93 (court had previously ordered mediation). Despite knowing the court's precise concerns and being granted time to implement solutions, the Wiersmas' third amended plan also failed to address the court's articulated concerns.

Second, the court found that the Wiersmas' plans were not feasible because of the "paramount" fact that the Wiersmas "do not propose to save an existing operation through reorganization" but "propose to start up a brand new substantial business, operating [a] fair distan[ce] from Idaho." ER Tab 17, p. 833. Further, the court noted its concern over the fact that the Wiersmas would be starting over "in a totally new business environment" in a location in which they have not had "real experience." Id. Under those circumstances, the court "continue[d] to harbor serious reservations about the debtors' ability to succeed in their new venture." Id. at 833.

Third, the court found that under the third amended plan the Wiersmas would "continue to be burdened by extremely high levels of debt service" that would not allow them to "weather a significant downturn in the market or negative effects on their production levels" and further, would allow them "no breathing room at all" if they had a "bad month or two." Id. at 833-834. Fourth, the court expressed concern that under the third amended plan the debtors would have "precious little equity" in their new operation and that "[n]early all the risks of failure in this case will be born [sic] by the creditors, not the debtors." ER Tab 17, p. 834. Fifth, the court found that the Wiersmas would "have only a small amount of working capital available to them" and a proposed balloon payment at the end of the thirty-six month loan. ER Tab 17, p. 834. The court registered its concern on the record, noting the Wiersmas "would have to show that in three years they would be able to obtain the financing or other resources to pay off the bank's large claim." Id. at 835. The court, however, found "nothing in the present record to persuade [it] that [the Wiersmas] had that ability [to ensure they could pay off the claim]." Id.

Even the testimony of the Wiersmas' expert witness supports the bankruptcy court's finding that the feasibility of the Wiersmas' plan was doubtful at best. Despite his general testimony at the confirmation hearing, Bob Matlick, who testified he thought the Wiersmas' proposed operation was "workable," ER Tab 8, p. 199, he revealed a number of profound uncertainties. Risks, not associated with dairy farming in Idaho, but clearly evident with the intended move to Georgia, were highlighted in the testimony of the Wiersmas' own expert. Mr. Matlick testified the market for milk from the Georgia dairy market differed from the Idaho market, because most milk in Georgia "goes fluid" rather than being made into cheese. ER Tab 8, p. 181. His incontrovertible testimony also highlighted that milk production was lower in the Florida and Georgia region than Idaho, ER Tab 8, p. 183, with heat and humidity as contributing factors. Id. at 221. Mr. Matlick indicated that his projections of the Wiersmas' milk production were greater than the production of the current owner of the Georgia dairy, attributing the increase to the Wiersmas' intention to milk three times a day, rather than twice a day like the current owners of the dairy. ER Tab 8, p. 182. He also testified that he did not use the current market price in Georgia to estimating cash flow because he liked "to look at historical numbers, as well as projected futures numbers." Id. at 192.

In addition to the uncertainties involved with the implementation of the Wiersmas' various plans, there were also risks, particularly for the Bank. The plans proposed to use all of the settlement proceeds in which the Bank claimed a security interest to purchase cows, and to grant the Bank a lien against all the cows until the secured claim was satisfied. This heightened the risk to the lender. Moreover, the plans did not provide the Bank a lien in replacement cattle, milk or milk proceeds. The level of risk to the Bank was supported by the record: Mr. Matlick testified that dairy prices were "off the historical highs" and that fluctuations in milk prices had been seen. ER Tab 8, p. 208. He acknowledged that "(c)urrently, [and] in the past eight months, the dairy industry had been stressed financially." ER Tab 8 p. 237. Finally, the Wiersmas' expert acknowledged that not all dairy operations were successful, and he admitted that he did not have any idea about the failure rate for dairy operations in southern Georgia. ER Tab 8, p. 234.

The Wiersmas maintain their plans were feasible. But "[s]incerity, honesty, and willingness are not sufficient to make the plan feasible, and neither are any visionary promises." Clarkson, 767 F.2d at 420. The Bankruptcy Code requires that a bankruptcy court confirm a plan only if "[c]onfirmation of the plan is not likely to be followed by the liquidation, or the need for further reorganization, of the debtor or any successor to the debtor under the plan, unless such liquidation or reorganization is proposed in the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1129(a)(11). In order for a chapter 11 plan to be confirmed, the proponent must demonstrate that the requirements of 11 U.S.C. 1129 are satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence. Arnold and Baker Farms, 177 B.R. 648, 654 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1994), aff'd on other grounds, 85 F.3d 1815 (1996). To demonstrate that a plan is feasible, a chapter 11 debtor must demonstrate "a reasonable probability of success." Acequia, Inc. v. Clinton (In re Acequia), 787 F.2d 1352, 1364 (9th Cir. 1986).

In this case, the Wiersmas sought to initiate an altogether new dairy farming operation in a geographical area far distant from their previous farms in a different climate and different market. With all of uncertainties and risks, the Wiersmas failed to establish "a reasonable probability" of success under their plans of reorganization. The Wiersmas were unable to file an acceptable plan even after being granted repeated opportunities to demonstrate the feasibility of their plans; this alone may constitute grounds for dismissal. See, e.g., Hall v. Vance, 887 F.2d 1041, 1044 (10th Cir. 1989) (dismissal proper where debtors failed to file a confirmable plan within eight months of petition, regardless of reason for failure).

Additionally, the bankruptcy court found the Wiersmas' third amended plan failed to meet the requirements of 11 U.S.C. 1129, thus rendering the plan unconfirmable. The plan bifurcated the Bank's claim into secured and unsecured portions. ER Tab 12, p. 790. As the court noted, "[a]s to the secured component, although the Bank has voted to reject" the plan, the Wiersmas "can nonetheless obtain confirmation over that rejection if they prove the Plan's treatment of the Bank's claim satisfies one of the three standards" of 11 U.S.C. 1129(b)(2)(A)." ER Tab 12, p. 791. In this case, the plan must meet the requirement of section 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii) by providing the Bank the "indubitable equivalent" of its secured claim. Currently, the Bank's interest is secured by cash, the "ultimate collateral." ER Tab 12, p. 795. The Wiersmas' plan, which proposed to use the cash to purchase cows and pay the bank over time, does not provide the Bank the same security. "The moment the [Wiersmas] exchange the $1.6 million in settlement proceeds for ownership of approximately 800 dairy animals in Georgia, the Bank is subjected to new, different, and potentially challenging risks of getting paid." ER Tab 12, p. 795. These additional enumerated risks mean that the Bank is not recognizing the "indubitable equivalent" of its secured claim, and therefore, the plan is not confirmable over the Bank's objection. See Arnold & Baker Farms v. United States (In re Arnold & Baker Farms), 85 F.3d 1415, 1421-22 (9th Cir. 1996) (to the extent a debtor seeks to alter the collateral securing a creditor's loan, providing the indubitable equivalent within the cram down provision of 11 U.S.C. 1129(b)(2)(A)(iii) requires that substitute collateral not increase the creditor's risk exposure). This forms an additional basis of cause under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b)(3). Accord Windsor on the River Assocs. v. Balcor Real Estate Fin., Inc. (In re Windsor on the River Assocs.), 7 F.3d 127 (8th Cir. 1993); Lumber Exch. Bldg. Ltd. P'ship v. Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York (In re Lumber Exch. Bldg. Ltd P'ship), 968 F.2d 647 (8th Cir. 1992).

B. Cause existed for dismissal of the Wiersmas' chapter 11 bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b)(5) because none of their proposed plans were confirmed.

Pursuant to 1112(b)(5), the bankruptcy court may dismiss a case for cause, including "denial of confirmation of every proposed plan and denial of a request made for additional time for filing another plan or a modification of a plan." 11

U.S.C. 1112(b)(5). The rationale behind 1112(b)(5) as "cause" for dismissal stems from the broad discretion exercised by bankruptcy courts to permit parties to submit numerous and alternative plans, but also their broad "discretion to say when enough is enough." In re Woodbrook Assocs., 19 F.3d 312, 322 (7th Cir. 1994). In light of the firmly-held convictions of a majority of struggling chapter 11 debtors that, given just one more chance, they will be able to successfully reorganize, this function of the court is often exercised and essential to the efficiency of the bankruptcy system.

The bankruptcy court demonstrated a great deal of patience with the Wiersmas' attempts to achieve plan confirmation. The fact remains, however, that none of these plans were confirmable. The court even granted the Wiersmas' one more "last chance" when it declined to dismiss the case after the February 11 hearing and gave them more time to work out a plan that the creditors would accept and allow to be confirmed. Ultimately, after denying confirmation of every plan that the Wiersmas proposed, the court determined that "enough was enough" and declined to grant the Wiersmas additional time to file a fourth amended plan. As a result, the bankruptcy court was well within its discretion to dismiss the Wiersmas' case under 11 U.S.C. 1112(b)(5).

2. The bankruptcy appellate panel and this Court lack jurisdiction over the February 11 and September 20 orders because there was no timely notice of appeal as required by 28 U.S.C. 158(c).

The timely filing of a notice of appeal is "mandatory and jurisdictional." Browder v. Director, Dep't of Corr., 434 U.S. 257, 264 (1978); see also In re Slimick, 928 F.2d 304, 309 (9th Cir. 1990); Greene v. United States (In re Souza), 795 F.2d 855, 856-57 (9th Cir. 1986). Section 158(c)(2) of title 28 grants appellate jurisdiction only where the notice of appeal is filed in compliance with the time limits set forth in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002.

The jurisdiction of a bankruptcy appellate panel to review final judgments, orders and decrees of bankruptcy judges is established by 28 U.S.C. 158(b) and 158(c)(2). Accord Hamilton v. Lake Elmo Bank (In re Delta Eng'g Int'l, Inc.), 270 F.3d 584, 585 (8th Cir. 2001) (bankruptcy appellate panel jurisdiction conferred by 28 U.S.C. 158(b) and (c)). Therefore, jurisdiction cannot be expanded beyond what is authorized by section 158. Subsection 158(c)(2) expressly incorporates a time frame for appealing bankruptcy decisions to the district courts and BAPs, requiring that such appeals "shall be taken in the same manner as appeals in civil proceedings generally are taken to the courts of appeals from the district courts," and "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." 28 U.S.C. 158(c)(2) (emphasis added). In turn, unless extended as specified, Rule 8002(a) requires a notice of appeal be filed within ten days of the bankruptcy court's order.[5] See, e.,g., In re Bond, 254 F.3d 669, 673 (7th Cir. 2001) (to perfect an appeal of a final judgment filed under section 158 and confer appellate jurisdiction, notice of appeal must be filed within ten days of bankruptcy court's decision); River Prod. Co., Inc. v. Webb (In re Topco, Inc.), 894 F.2d 727, 734 (5th Cir. 1990) (appeals under section 158(a) must comply with time requirements of section 158(c)) (citing Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002).

With respect to the September 20, 2002, and February 11, 2003, orders, the April 9, 2003, notice of appeal was filed untimely under 28 U.S.C. 158 and Rule 8002. The debtors filed a timely motion for reconsideration of the February 11, 2003, order, which tolled the time for filing a notice of appeal until ten days after the court's ruling on that motion. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b). The reconsideration motion was denied by an order entered on March 28, 2003. ER Tab 27, p. 1015. Therefore, the time to file a notice of appeal of the February 11, 2003, order ran on April 7, 2003, with the result that the Wiersmas' April 9, 2003, notice of appeal was untimely. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002.

[5] It is worth noting that 28 U.S.C. 158(c)(2), not Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002, creates the jurisdictional requirement of a timely appeal. As the Supreme Court recently noted in Kontrick v. Ryan, procedural rules may not create or withdraw jurisdiction. 124 S. Ct. 906, 914 (2004). Unlike the statute at issue in Kontrick, however, section 158(c)(2) is one of the "[c]ertain statutory provisions" which "contain built-in time constraints." Kontrick v. Ryan, 124 S. Ct. 906, 914 (2004).

Likewise, with respect to the September 20, 2002, order, the April 9, 2003, notice that initiated the instant appeal[6/] was clearly untimely, having been filed more than six months after entry of the order.[7/]

Where a district court or BAP lacks subject matter jurisdiction, a circuit court of appeals also lacks jurisdiction. See, e.g., Lievsay v. Western Fin. Sav. Bank (In re Lievsay), 118 F.3d 661, 662 (9th Cir. 1997) (court of appeals has jurisdiction over final orders of BAP); Don Vincente Macias, Inc. v. Texas Gulf Trawling Co., Inc. (In re Don Vincente Macias, Inc.), 168 F.3d 209, 211 (5th Cir.

[6/] The debtor previously appealed the September 20, 2002, order, but these appeals were dismissed and mandates were issued on March 6, 2003, and the dismissal was never appealed. On September 8, 2003, the BAP vacated the orders dismissing the appeals, reinstated them, and constructively consolidated them with the instant appeal. The BAP lacked jurisdiction to do so because it had not recalled its mandate. See, e.g., Sunset Sales, Inc. v. Clarendon Nat'l Ins. Co. (In re Sunset Sales, Inc.), 195 F.3d 568, 572 (10th Cir. 1999); Neary v. Padilla (In re Padilla), 222 F.3d 1184, 1189-90 (9th Cir. 2000); Ellis v. United States Dist. Ct. for the Western Dist. of Washington, 360 F.3d 1022, 1022-23 (9th Cir. 2004) (mandate is a "secondary decree relinquishing jurisdiction over the case to the [lower] court."); United States v. Ruiz-Alvarez, 211 F.3d 1181, 1184 (9th Cir. 2000); Beardslee v. Brown, 393 F.3d 899, 901 (9th Cir. 2004); see also, e.g., Calderon v. Thompson, 523 U.S. 538, 550 (1998) (mandates should be recalled only in "extraordinary circumstances").

[7/] The BAP incorrectly concluded it had subject matter jurisdiction over the appeal of the September 2002, even though there was no timely notice of appeal. The basis for this conclusion is the court had mistakenly dismissed the appeal in 2002, and it had "inherent authority to rectify an inadvertent misapprehension of the actual facts and correct an order to reflect the court's intentions." ER Tab 25, p. 896 at 16 (citations omitted).

1999); Weston v. Mann (In re Weston), 18 F.3d 860, 862 (10th Cir. 1994); Colon v. Hart (In re Colon), 941 F.2d 242, 244 (3d Cir. 1991).

"Federal courts are not courts of general jurisdiction; they have only the power that is authorized by article III of the Constitution and the statutes enacted by Congress thereto." Bender v. Williamsport Area Sch. Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 541 (1986). Subject matter jurisdiction can be raised at any time, "even initially at the highest appellate interest." Grupo Dataflux v. Atlas Global Group, L.P., 541 U.S. 567, 576 (2004) (quoting Kontrick v. Ryan, 124 S. Ct. 906, 915 (2004)). Moreover, an objection to a federal court's subject matter jurisdiction cannot be forfeited. Id.; see also Kontrick, 124 S. Ct. at 916. Nor can subject-matter jurisdiction be conferred by agreement of the parties or a defect in jurisdiction waived. See, e.g., United States v. Cotton, 535 U.S. 625, 630-31 (2002). Therefore, this Court lacks jurisdiction over the appeal of the bankruptcy court orders entered September 20, 2002, and February 11, 2002, and the appeal should be dismissed with respect to those orders.

Conclusion

For the aforementioned reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the appeal of the September 20, 2002, order and the February 11, 2003, orders be DISMISSED and that the April 4, 2003, order of the bankruptcy court dismissing the bankruptcy case be AFFIRMED.

Sec. 1112. Conversion or dismissal

(a) The debtor may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title unless--

(1) the debtor is not a debtor in possession;

(2) the case originally was commenced as an involuntary case under this chapter; or

(3) the case was converted to a case under this chapter other than on the debtor's request.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee or bankruptcy administrator, and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title or may dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate, for cause, including--

(1) continuing loss to or diminution of the estate and absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation;

(2) inability to effectuate a plan;

(3) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;

(4) failure to propose a plan under section 1121 of this title within any time fixed by the court;

(5) denial of confirmation of every proposed plan and denial of a request made for additional time for filing another plan or a modification of a plan;

(6) revocation of an order of confirmation under section 1144 of this title, and denial of confirmation of another plan or a modified plan under section 1129 of this title;

(7) inability to effectuate substantial consummation of a confirmed plan;

(8) material default by the debtor with respect to a confirmed plan;

(9) termination of a plan by reason of the occurrence of a condition specified in the plan; or

(10) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28.

(c) The court may not convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title if the debtor is a farmer or a corporation that is not a moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, unless the debtor requests such conversion.

(d) The court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 12 or 13 of this title only if--

(1) the debtor requests such conversion;

(2) the debtor has not been discharged under section 1141(d) of this title; and

(3) if the debtor requests conversion to chapter 12 of this title, such conversion is equitable.

(e) Except as provided in subsections (c) and (f), the court, on request of the United States trustee, may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title or may dismiss a case under this chapter, whichever is in the best interest of creditors and the estate if the debtor in a voluntary case fails to file, within fifteen days after the filing of the petition commencing such case or such additional time as the court may allow, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521, including a list containing the names and addresses of the holders of the twenty largest unsecured claims (or of all unsecured claims if there are fewer than twenty unsecured claims), and the approximate dollar amounts of each of such claims.

(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a case may not be converted to a case under another chapter of this title unless the debtor may be a debtor under such chapter.

11 U.S.C. 1129

Sec. 1129. Confirmation of plan

(a) The court shall confirm a plan only if all of the following requirements are met:

(1) The plan complies with the applicable provisions of this title.

(2) The proponent of the plan complies with the applicable provisions of this title.

(3) The plan has been proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law.

(4) Any payment made or to be made by the proponent, by the debtor, or by a person issuing securities or acquiring property under the plan, for services or for costs and expenses in or in connection with the case, or in connection with the plan and incident to the case, has been approved by, or is subject to the approval of, the court as reasonable.

(5)(A)(i) The proponent of the plan has disclosed the identity and affiliations of any individual proposed to serve, after confirmation of the plan, as a director, officer, or voting trustee of the debtor, an affiliate of the debtor participating in a joint plan with the debtor, or a successor to the debtor under the plan; and

(ii) the appointment to, or continuance in, such office of such individual, is consistent with the interests of creditors and equity security holders and with public policy; and

(B) the proponent of the plan has disclosed the identity of any insider that will be employed or retained by the reorganized debtor, and the nature of any compensation for such insider.

(6) Any governmental regulatory commission with jurisdiction, after confirmation of the plan, over the rates of the debtor has approved any rate change provided for in the plan, or such rate change is expressly conditioned on such approval.

(7) With respect to each impaired class of claims or interests--

(A) each holder of a claim or interest of such class--

(i) has accepted the plan; or

(ii) will receive or retain under the plan on account of such claim or interest property of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, that is not less than the amount that such holder would so receive or retain if the debtor were liquidated under chapter 7 of this title on such date; or

(B) if section 1111(b)(2) of this title applies to the claims of such class, each holder of a claim of such class will receive or retain under the plan on account of such claim property of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, that is not less than the value of such holder's interest in the estate's interest in the property that secures such claims.

(8) With respect to each class of claims or interests--

(A) such class has accepted the plan; or

(B) such class is not impaired under the plan.

(9) Except to the extent that the holder of a particular claim has agreed to a different treatment of such claim, the plan provides that--

(A) with respect to a claim of a kind specified in section 507(a)(1) or 507(a)(2) of this title, on the effective date of the plan, the holder of such claim will receive on account of such claim cash equal to the allowed amount of such claim;

(B) with respect to a class of claims of a kind specified in section 507(a)(3), 507(a)(4), 507(a)(5), 507(a)(6), or 507(a)(7) of this title, each holder of a claim of such class will receive--

(i) if such class has accepted the plan, deferred cash payments of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, equal to the allowed amount of such claim; or

(ii) if such class has not accepted the plan, cash on the effective date of the plan equal to the allowed amount of such claim; and

(C) with respect to a claim of a kind specified in section 507(a)(8) of this title, the holder of such claim will receive on account of such claim deferred cash payments, over a period not exceeding six years after the date of assessment of such claim, of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, equal to the allowed amount of such claim.

(10) If a class of claims is impaired under the plan, at least one class of claims that is impaired under the plan has accepted the plan, determined without including any acceptance of the plan by any insider.

(11) Confirmation of the plan is not likely to be followed by the liquidation, or the need for further financial reorganization, of the debtor or any successor to the debtor under the plan, unless such liquidation or reorganization is proposed in the plan.

(12) All fees payable under section 1930 of title 28, as determined by the court at the hearing on confirmation of the plan, have been paid or the plan provides for the payment of all such fees on the effective date of the plan.

(13) The plan provides for the continuation after its effective date of payment of all retiree benefits, as that term is defined in section 1114 of this title, at the level established pursuant to subsection (e)(1)(B) or (g) of section 1114 of this title, at any time prior to confirmation of the plan, for the duration of the period the debtor has obligated itself to provide such benefits.

(b)(1) Notwithstanding section 510(a) of this title, if all of the applicable requirements of subsection (a) of this section other than paragraph (8) are met with respect to a plan, the court, on request of the proponent of the plan, shall confirm the plan notwithstanding the requirements of such paragraph if the plan does not discriminate unfairly, and is fair and equitable, with respect to each class of claims or interests that is impaired under, and has not accepted, the plan.

(2) For the purpose of this subsection, the condition that a plan be fair and equitable with respect to a class includes the following requirements:

(A) With respect to a class of secured claims, the plan provides--

(i)(I) that the holders of such claims retain the liens securing such claims, whether the property subject to such liens is retained by the debtor or transferred to another entity, to the extent of the allowed amount of such claims; and

(II) that each holder of a claim of such class receive on account of such claim deferred cash payments totaling at least the allowed amount of such claim, of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, of at least the value of such holder's interest in the estate's interest in such property;

(ii) for the sale, subject to section 363(k) of this title, of any property that is subject to the liens securing such claims, free and clear of such liens, with such liens to attach to the proceeds of such sale, and the treatment of such liens on proceeds under clause (i) or (iii) of this subparagraph; or

(iii) for the realization by such holders of the indubitable equivalent of such claims.

(B) With respect to a class of unsecured claims--

(i) the plan provides that each holder of a claim of such class receive or retain on account of such claim property of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, equal to the allowed amount of such claim; or

(ii) the holder of any claim or interest that is junior to the claims of such class will not receive or retain under the plan on account of such junior claim or interest any property.

(C) With respect to a class of interests--

(i) the plan provides that each holder of an interest of such class receive or retain on account of such interest property of a value, as of the effective date of the plan, equal to the greatest of the allowed amount of any fixed liquidation preference to which such holder is entitled, any fixed redemption price to which such holder is entitled, or the value of such interest; or

(ii) the holder of any interest that is junior to the interests of such class will not receive or retain under the plan on account of such junior interest any property.

(c) Notwithstanding subsections (a) and (b) of this section and except as provided in section 1127(b) of this title, the court may confirm only one plan, unless the order of confirmation in the case has been revoked under section 1144 of this title. If the requirements of subsections (a) and (b) of this section are met with respect to more than one plan, the court shall consider the preferences of creditors and equity security holders in determining which plan to confirm.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, on request of a party in interest that is a governmental unit, the court may not confirm a plan if the principal purpose of the plan is the avoidance of taxes or the avoidance of the application of section 5 of the Securities Act of 1933. In any hearing under this subsection, the governmental unit has the burden of proof on the issue of avoidance.

Section 158. Appeals

(a) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear appeals

(1) from final judgments, orders, and decrees;

(2) from interlocutory orders and decrees issued under section 1121(d) of title 11 increasing or reducing the time periods referred to in section 1121 of such title; and

(3) with leave of the court, from other interlocutory orders and decrees; and, with leave of the court, from interlocutory orders and decrees, of bankruptcy judges entered in cases and proceedings referred to the bankruptcy judges under section 157 of this title. An appeal under this subsection shall be taken only to the district court for the judicial district in which the bankruptcy judge is serving.

(b)(1) The judicial council of a circuit shall establish a bankruptcy appellate panel service composed of bankruptcy judges of the districts in the circuit who are appointed by the judicial council in accordance with paragraph (3), to hear and determine, with the consent of all the parties, appeals under subsection (a) unless the judicial council finds that–

(A) there are insufficient judicial resources available in the circuit; or

(B) establishment of such service would result in undue delay or increased cost to parties in cases under title 11.

Not later than 90 days after making the finding, the judicial council shall submit to the Judicial Conference of the United States a report containing the factual basis of such finding.

(2) (A) A judicial council may reconsider, at any time, the finding described in paragraph (1).

(B) On the request of a majority of the district judges in a circuit for which a bankruptcy appellate panel service is established under paragraph (1), made after the expiration of the 1-year period beginning on the date such service is established, the judicial council of the circuit shall determine whether a circumstance specified in subparagraph (A) or (B) of such paragraph exists.

(C) On its own motion, after the expiration of the 3-year period beginning on the date a bankruptcy appellate panel service is established under paragraph (1), the judicial council of the circuit may determine whether a circumstance specified in subparagraph (A) or (B) of such paragraph exists.

(D) If the judicial council finds that either of such circumstances exists, the judicial council may provide for the completion of the appeals then pending before such service and the orderly termination of such service.

(3) Bankruptcy judges appointed under paragraph (1) shall be appointed and may be reappointed under such paragraph.

(4) If authorized by the Judicial Conference of the United States, the judicial councils of 2 or more circuits may establish a joint bankruptcy appellate panel comprised of bankruptcy judges from the districts within the circuits for which such panel is established, to hear and determine, upon the consent of all the parties, appeals under subsection (a) of this section.

(5) An appeal to be heard under this subsection shall be heard by a panel of 3 members of the bankruptcy appellate panel service, except that a member of such service may not hear an appeal originating in the district for which such member is appointed or designated under section 152 of this title.

(6) Appeals may not be heard under this subsection by a panel of the bankruptcy appellate panel service unless the district judges for the district in which the appeals occur, by majority vote, have authorized such service to hear and determine appeals originating in such district.

(c)(1) Subject to subsection (b), each appeal under subsection (a) shall be heard by a 3-judge panel of the bankruptcy appellate panel service established under subsection (b)(1) unless–

(A) the appellant elects at the time of filing the appeal; or

(B) any other party elects, not later than 30 days after service of notice of the appeal; to have such appeal heard by the district court.

(2) An appeal under subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be taken in the same manner as appeals in civil proceedings generally are taken to the courts of appeals from the district courts and in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules.

(d) The courts of appeals shall have jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees entered under subsections (a) and (b) of this section.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana had jurisdiction over the Babcock & Wilcox Company chapter 11 bankruptcy cases under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a) and (b) and 1334(a). ACD 27.[1] On July 27, 2006, the bankruptcy court approved a final fee award of $6,387,522.11 to Caplin & Drysdale, Chartered ("Caplin") as counsel for the Asbestos Claimants' Committee ("Committee"). ACD 37. The order allowed Caplin to recover 573.7 hours of non-working travel time at 50% of its normal hourly rates, reducing the firm's fees by $135,685.80, or 2% of the total requested. Id. The order also reimbursed Caplin for coach rather than first class airfare, reducing the firm's expenses by $33,266.23, or 4% of the total requested. Id. The bankruptcy court denied Caplin's motion for reconsideration of a prior, interlocutory fee order. Id. Caplin appealed the bankruptcy court's July 27, 2006 order by notice of appeal filed under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002 on July 28, 2006. ACD 38. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. A bankruptcy court may award estate professionals "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services" under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). In determining "reasonable" compensation, a bankruptcy court may consider a non-exclusive list of five "relevant factors" pertaining to the "nature, the extent and the value" of the services rendered, including "the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners" in non-bankruptcy cases. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E). A professional bears the burden of proving that its fees are both necessary and "reasonable." If it fails to do so, the bankruptcy court may "award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). At a March 12, 2003 hearing, Caplin failed to meet its burden of proof under section 330(a)(1)(A), because it presented no evidence of any of the five "relevant factors," including whether comparably skilled practitioners in its New York and Washington, D.C. practice areas billed their non-bankruptcy clients for non-working travel time at their full hourly rates. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E). At best, Caplin offered only unsupported opinion testimony regarding its preferred billing practices. Given Caplin's failure to meet its burden of proof, did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion in awarding the firm fees for non-working travel time at 50% of its hourly rates?

[3] Neither of the cases cited by Caplin & Drysdale as supporting de novo review pertains to an appeal of an order granting fees and expenses under any section of the Bankruptcy Code, including 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). See Appellant's Opening Brief at 2 – 3. Scurlock Permian Corp. v. Krafsur (Matter of El Paso Refinery, LP), 171 F.3d 249, 253 (5th Cir. 1999) (reversing preference judgment under 11 U.S.C. § 547(b)); Bustamante v. Cueva (In re Cueva), 371 F.3d 232, 235 – 236 (5th Cir. 2004) (affirming reversal of declaratory judgment under 11 U.S.C. § 362(a)). C/f Watkins v. Fordice, 807 F.Supp. 406, 414 (S.D. Miss. 1992), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 7 F.3d 453, 459 (5th Cir. 1993) (holding that the district court's decision to reduce an attorney's hourly rate for travel time by 50% as part of an award of attorneys' fees under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(k), was not an abuse of discretion).

2. A bankruptcy court may authorize reimbursement of estate professionals' "necessary" expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(B). A professional bears the burden of proving that its expenses are "necessary." If it fails to do so, the bankruptcy court may "award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). At a March 12, 2003 hearing, Caplin offered no evidence that flying its professionals first class was required to accomplish the proper representation of the Committee. Caplin demonstrated only that it routinely charged its clients for first class air travel. Where Caplin failed to provide evidence that first class airfare expenses were necessary under section § 330(a)(2), did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion in reimbursing its airfare expenses at coach rates?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Babcock & Wilcox Company and three affiliates filed chapter 11 bankruptcy cases in an effort to reorganize their businesses. The United States Trustee appointed the Committee under 11 U.S.C. § 1102(a). AUS 3. Acting under 11 U.S.C. § 1103(a), the bankruptcy court appointed Caplin to serve as counsel for the Committee. AUS 6. The bankruptcy court authorized estate professionals, including Caplin, to receive interim compensation and reimbursement of fees.

The United States Trustee objected to Caplin's first interim fee application under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), because it sought to charge the estates for non-productive professional travel time at its full hourly rates and for first class, rather than coach, airfare. AUS 13. No other bankruptcy professionals asked for similar fees and expenses.

Pending final resolution by the bankruptcy court, the United States Trustee and Caplin agreed that Caplin could collect these amounts on an interim basis. AUS 17 – 19 and 21 - 22; ACD 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. The United States Trustee objected to Caplin's seventh interim fee application and renewed its previously-expressed concerns. ACD 8, 10.

The bankruptcy court conducted an evidentiary hearing on Caplin's seventh interim fee application on March 12, 2003. ADC 1. The court sustained the United States Trustee's objections. ACD 1, 14. Caplin appealed. ACD 15.

The court's March 12, 2003 order was interlocutory. ACD 15, 16 and 18. With the approval of this Court, Caplin dismissed its appeal, and the parties preserved the issues until the bankruptcy court considered Caplin's final fee application. ACD 18, 27, 28.

Caplin filed its final fee application on April 17, 2006. ACD 27. It also asked the bankruptcy court to reconsider its March 12, 2003 order. Id.

The bankruptcy court entered an order dated July 27, 2006 that awarded Caplin final fees and expenses totaling $6,387,522.11. ACD 37. The order awarded non-working travel time at 50% of Caplin's hourly rates, reducing its total fees by $135,685.80 or 2%. Id. The order also reimbursed Caplin for its airfare expenses at coach rather than first class, reducing its total expenses by $33,266.23 or 4%. Id. The July 27, 2006 order also denied Caplin's request for reconsideration. Id. This appeal followed. ACD 38.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

A. Statutory Framework

The Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 101 et seq., regulates the retention, compensation and payment of bankruptcy professionals in chapter 11 and 7 cases. It grants significant discretion to bankruptcy courts in calculating reasonable professional fees in order to protect estate assets and to promote the integrity of the bankruptcy system. The United States Trustee has standing to object to bankruptcy professional fee applications in chapter 11 and 7 cases. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A); 11 U.S.C. § 307 and § 330(a)(2).

Section 1102(a) authorizes the United States Trustee to appoint one or more unsecured creditors' committees. A creditors' committee may hire bankruptcy professionals to assist it in fulfilling its responsibilities "with the court's approval . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 1103. These professionals, as well as those employed by the debtor, are entitled to first priority payment under 11 U.S.C. § 503(a) and § 507(a)(1) ahead of general unsecured creditors.

The Bankruptcy Code provides two mechanisms for compensating committee professionals. Section 328(a), which is inapplicable here, authorizes a committee to employ professionals "on any reasonable terms and conditions of employment, including on a retainer, on an hourly basis, or on a contingent fee basis . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 328(a). Section 328(a) permits a bankruptcy court subsequently to award different compensation only if the pre-approved "terms and conditions of employment prove to have been improvident in light of developments not capable of being anticipated at the time of the fixing of such terms and conditions . . . ."

Section 330(a) authorizes a bankruptcy court to pay committee professionals "reasonable" compensation for their "actual and necessary services." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). The court may authorize reimbursement of the professionals' "actual" expenses if they are "necessary." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(B). Section 330's requirements regarding reasonable compensation and reimbursement of necessary expenses are particularly important in the context of a creditors' committee, because its professionals' fees are paid by the bankruptcy estate, not the committee members. 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(3).

Bankruptcy professionals bear the burden of demonstrating their entitlement to fees and expenses under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). If a professional fails to meet his burden of proof under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), the bankruptcy court, with or without an objection from a party in interest, may award compensation "less than the amount of compensation that is requested . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). Moreover, section 330(a)(4) prohibits the bankruptcy court from awarding compensation for "unnecessary duplication of services . . . or . . . services that were not . . . reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate . . . or . . . necessary to the administration of the estate . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4). Section 331 authorizes bankruptcy professionals to seek interim compensation on the same basis as under section 330(a). 11 U.S.C. § 331.

B. Factual Background.

The Babcock & Wilcox Company, together with three affiliates, Diamond Power International, Inc., Babcock & Wilcox Construction Co., Inc. and Americon, Inc., sought relief under the debt reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 1101, et seq., by petitions filed on February 22, 2000.[5] That same day, the bankruptcy court entered orders authorizing joint administration of the debtors' cases and establishing procedures for interim compensation of estate professionals, including those employed by official committees.[6]

The United States Trustee appointed the Committee under 11 U.S.C. § 1102 on March 3, 2000. AUS 4. The Committee filed an application to retain Caplin as its counsel on March 3, 2000. AUS 2. The application neither attached an executed retention agreement between the Committee and Caplin nor otherwise specified the terms and conditions of Caplin's employment,

[5] The United States Trustee reprints the principal statutes it relies upon, 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), 503, 507, 1102 and 1103, in an addendum attached to this brief.

[6] The interim compensation order authorized professionals to submit 20 day trailing fee statements to the debtors, with copies to "service parties," for worked performed during the previous month. It required the debtors to pay 80% of the requested fees and 100% of the requested expenses upon receipt of a fee statement, unless one of the service parties objected upon ten days negative notice. The interim compensation order also required professionals to file with the bankruptcy court formal fee applications approximately every four months under 11 U.S.C. § 331. The bankruptcy court modified certain terms of the order on June 28, 2000.

including the range of hourly rates to be charged by the firm's professionals. It did not state that Caplin intended to charge non-working travel time at its full hourly rate and to request reimbursement for airfare expenses at first class rates. Id.

The application did not attempt to establish a compensation plan for Caplin under 11 U.S.C. § 328(a). Id. Instead, it made Caplin's fees and expenses payable only after bankruptcy court approval for reasonableness and necessity under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Id.

As required by Bankruptcy Rule 2014, the Committee attached an affidavit from the Caplin attorney responsible for the case, Elihu Inselbuch. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014. Like the application, the affidavit did not specify the terms and conditions upon with Caplin agreed to work, and it referenced no written retention agreement.[7] AUS 2.

[7] In reciting Caplin & Drysdale's qualifications to serve as committee counsel, Attorney Inselbuch pointed out that the firm represented the creditors' committee "involving Raytech Corporation . . . in a chapter 11 proceeding currently approaching confirmation in the Bankruptcy Court for the District of Connecticut . . . ." AUS 4.

Given the complexity of the debtors' cases, the estates retained more than 20 professionals with "national" bankruptcy practices located in Los Angeles, New York, Chicago, Washington, D.C. and Wilmington. These constituencies also retained local, New Orleans professionals. The bankruptcy court did not authorize any professional employed by the debtors or any committee to charge the estates for non-working travel time at its full hourly rates and first class airfare expenses.

By order dated March 16, 2000, the bankruptcy court granted the Committee's application to employ Caplin retroactively to March 3, 2000. AUS 4. The order stated that "Caplin & Drysdale is to be allowed compensation and reimbursement for its expenses in accordance with Sections 330(a) and 331 of the Bankruptcy Code . . . ." Id.

On September 22, 2000, the United States Trustee filed an omnibus objection to the first interim fee applications filed by five estate professionals, including Caplin. ACD 2; AUS 11. Among other things, the United States Trustee raised concerns about fees and expenses attributable to travel and meals. Id.

The bankruptcy court conducted an evidentiary hearing on the United States Trustee's objection on September 27, 2000. AUS 13. The United States Trustee requested that the bankruptcy court determine appropriate hourly rates for the professionals. Id. at 20 – 21. Attorney Inselbuch testified that Caplin's hourly rates set forth in its first interim fee application were the same as those it charged its clients "across the board," that they were consistent with those charged by comparable firms in its practice areas – New York and Washington, D.C. - and that other bankruptcy courts had recently approved them.[8] Id. at 22 – 24. He did not mention whether Caplin and/or the other firms in its practice area billed their non-bankruptcy clients for non-working travel time at their full hourly rates. He also did not testify whether Caplin and/or similar firms charged their non-bankruptcy clients for first class airfare rather than coach. After hearing the testimony, the bankruptcy court authorized Caplin to bill the estates at its normal hourly rates.[9] Id. at 31 – 32. The court made no modifications to the terms of Caplin's employment under its March 16, 2000 order, and it did not limit its discretion to review Caplin's fees and expenses at the end of the case under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). AUS 4.

By agreed order dated March 1, 2001, the bankruptcy court approved Caplin's first interim application and granted it fees and expenses totaling $516,641.32. ACD 2; AUS 15. The order preserved the United States Trustee's objections to Caplin's charging the estates for non-working travel time at its full hourly rates and for first class, rather than coach, airfare. Id. It nevertheless authorized the debtors to continue paying Caplin 100% of the disputed amounts "pending the resolution of Caplin & Drysdale's final fee application . . . ." Id.[10]

[9] In setting Caplin's hourly rate, the court essentially conducted a section 330(a) analysis, placing emphasis upon the fact that other bankruptcy courts had awarded similar rates. It stated:

> I've listened to the testimony and I'm convinced that that's the going rate and the markets in which these lawyers and their firms primarily practice, and the law on bankruptcy in the . . . last few years - - since the Bankruptcy Code is that bankruptcy attorneys are paid the same amount as other practitioners . . .

Caplin filed six interim fee applications covering the period March 3, 2000 through February 28, 2002. ACD 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. Each interim application attached separate appendices describing the firm's services and expenses. Id. The appendices demonstrated that Caplin billed the estate for non-working travel time at the firm's full hourly rates and for first class airfare. Id. Each application quantified the difference between the cost of first class and coach airfare, but it offered no explanation for booking first class seats instead of coach. Id.

The bankruptcy court entered orders approving Caplin's first six interim fee applications and awarding the firm fees and expenses totaling $4,156,325.01. ACD 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7; AUS 15, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22 and 23. Consistent with the March 1, 2001 agreed order, these orders preserved the United States Trustee's objections to non-productive travel time and first class airfare. Id.

The United States Trustee objected to Caplin's seventh interim fee application on February 21, 2003 in order to obtain "final [bankruptcy court] resolution . . . ." of its prior objections. ACD 8, 10. The United States Trustee argued under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1) that Caplin & Drysdale's charging the estate for non-working travel time at its professionals' full hourly rates was not reasonable and that its requesting reimbursement for first class travel airfare expenses, "when lesser rates or alternative travel . . . ." were available, was not necessary. ACD 10. The United States Trustee further argued that meal expenses exceeding $50 per professional per day were unnecessary. ACD 10.

Caplin responded on March 4, 2003. ACD 11. In support of its response, Caplin attached an affidavit executed by Attorney Inselbuch, an unsigned form "Engagement Letter for New Client and Returning Client" ("Form Engagement Letter") and a chart comparing Attorney Inselbuch's fees for travel time under different billing scenarios.[11] ACD 11. Attorney Inselbuch also testified as Caplin's sole witness at a March 12, 2003 evidentiary hearing on its seventh interim fee application.[12] ACD 1 at 14 - 70.

In both his testimony and affidavit, however, Attorney Inselbuch focused on Caplin's preferred billing practices. ACD 1 and 11. Caplin offered no evidence that comparably skilled practitioners in Los Angeles, Chicago, Wilmington, New Orleans, New York and/or Washington, D.C. billed their non-bankruptcy clients for non-working travel time at their full hourly rates. Id. Caplin similarly failed to demonstrate that charging the estates for first class rather than coach airfare was necessary. Id. See Argument, infra at I and II.

After hearing the evidence and the argument of counsel, the bankruptcy court sustained the United States Trustee's objections. ACD 1 at 78 – 79.

ACD 1 at 78 – 79.

The bankruptcy court incorporated its ruling in an order dated March 19, 2003.[13] ACD 14. Caplin & Drysdale appealed the bankruptcy court's March 19, 2003 order on March 21, 2003. ACD 15. The United States Trustee moved to dismiss the appeal as interlocutory on April 10, 2003. ACD 16. By order dated May 20, 2003, this Court approved a stipulation dismissing the appeal, "without prejudice to Caplin & Drysdale's right to litigate said appeal at such time as a final order is rendered in these bankruptcy cases . . . ." ACD 18.

The bankruptcy court subsequently entered orders approving Caplin's ninth through seventeen interim fee applications, subject to the restrictions established by the March 19, 2003 order. ACD 14, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25 and 26.

Caplin filed its final fee application on January 27, 2006. ACD 27. The application quantified and compared Caplin's fees for non-productive travel time using both its full and half rates. Id. It similarly quantified and compared its airfare expenses using both first class and coach rates. Id.

The application requested that the bankruptcy court reconsider its March 12, 2003 order. Id. The United States Trustee renewed its objections on June 21, 2006. ACD 29. The bankruptcy court made minor corrections to its March 19, 2003 order on April 19, 2006. ACD 28.

[13] The order also denied Caplin's request for non-working travel time at its full hourly rates and first class airfare in its eighth interim fee application. Id.

By order dated July 27, 2006, the bankruptcy court awarded Caplin final fees and expenses as counsel for the Committee totaling $6,387,522.11 under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). ACD 37. Consistent with its March 19, 2003 order, the bankruptcy court made two adjustments to Caplin's requested fees and expenses, which it otherwise allowed in full. ACD 37.

First, it allowed Caplin to recover 573.7 hours of non-working travel time at 50% of its normal hourly rates, reducing the firm's fees by $135,685.80, or 2% of the total requested. ACD 27, 28 and 37. Second, the court authorized the estates to reimburse Caplin for airfare expenses at the coach rather than first class rates, reducing its expenses by $33,266.23, or 4% of the total requested. ACD 37. The order did not reduce the number of hours that Caplin claimed as working or non-working travel time, and it made no other adjustments to Caplin's requested hourly rates and requested expenses. Id.

The July 27, 2006 order made final the bankruptcy court's March 19, 2003 order. ACD 37. It also denied Caplin's motion for reconsideration of the March 19, 2003 order. Id.

Caplin filed its notice of appeal on July 28, 2006. ACD 38.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by reducing Caplin's hourly rates for non-working travel time by 50%, because Caplin failed to meet its burden of proof under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). The evidence that Caplin adduced at the March 12, 2003 did not establish any of the five "relevant factors" for determining reasonableness under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(A) – (E), including whether billing the estate for non-working travel time at its professionals' full hourly rates comported with the practices of comparable firms performing non-bankruptcy services. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E). At best, Caplin offered only unsupported opinion testimony regarding its preferred billing practices.

Similarly, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by reimbursing Caplin for coach rather than first class airfare expenses, because Caplin failed to meet its burden of proof under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(B). At the March 12, 2003 hearing, Caplin did not offer evidence that flying its professionals first class was required to accomplish the proper representation of the Committee. Caplin offered evidence demonstrating only that it routinely charged its clients for first class air travel.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion by Awarding Caplin Fees For Non-Working Travel Time At 50% Of Its Hourly Rates

A. Bankruptcy Courts have substantial discretion in calculating reasonable fees under section 330(a).

Section 330(a) grants a bankruptcy court broad discretion to pay committee professionals only if, and insofar as, their "actual" services are "necessary" and their fees are "reasonable." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539; In re Busy Beaver Building Centers, Inc., 19 F.3d 833, 840 (3rd Cir. 1994). In determining "reasonable" compensation, a bankruptcy court may consider a non-exclusive list of five "relevant factors" pertaining to the "nature, the extent and the value" of the services rendered, "including — (A) the time spent on such services; (B) the rates charged for such services; (C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the services were rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title; (D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time . . . ; and (E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title . . . ." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). In re Teraforce Technology Corp., 347 B.R. 838, 846 – 847 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006).

Section 330(a)(1) requires that a bankruptcy court determine whether a professional's services are "necessary" prior to quantifying "reasonable" fees. In re Temple Retirement Community, Inc., 97 B.R. 333, 339 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 1989) (holding that "[s]ection 330(a)(1) imposes a two-step analysis. As a threshold matter, the court must first satisfy itself that services rendered were in fact necessary and appropriate. Then the court must find that the compensation requested for those services is reasonable, with reference to the factors delineated in Section 330(a)[(3)] . . . ."). "The main inquiry under § 330 is whether the post-petition services were necessary and benefited the estate . . . ." Pro-Snax Distributors, Inc. v. Andrews & Kurth, L.L.P (In re Pro-Snax Distributors, Inc.), 212 B.R. 834, 389 (N.D. Tex. 1997), affirmed sub nom Andrews & Kurth, L..L. P. v. Family Snax, Inc. (In re Pro-Snax Distributors, Inc.), 157 F.3d 414, 426 (5th Cir. 1998) (internal quotations omitted) (adopting a "stricter" test for awarding professional fees under section 330(a)(1) and holding "we are disinclined to hold that any time need only be reasonable to be compensable . . . we believe it important to stress that any work performed by legal counsel on behalf of the debtor must be of material benefit to the estate . . . .").

Section 330(a) represents a market-based approach for compensating bankruptcy professionals insofar as it allows them to earn fees equivalent to those charged by comparable professionals in non-bankruptcy cases. Busy Beaver, 19 F.3d 833, 849 – 850 (holding that order denying paralegal fees as "overhead" was an abuse of discretion, because bankruptcy court failed to consider evidence that comparable firms in the applicant's market billed those fees directly to their clients).[14] Congress enacted section 330(a) in order to abrogate the standards of Bankruptcy courts temper market-driven compensation by exercising their independent authority to review fee applications in the same way as a private client would. Busy Beaver, 19 F.3d at 848. The prospect of post facto bankruptcy court review under section 330(a) should ensure that bankruptcy professionals will exercise billing judgment to excise unnecessary or unreasonable charges from their bills before submitting them. Id. at 855 – 856. Section 330(a)(2) expressly authorizes courts, however, in the exercise of their discretion, to "award compensation that is less than the amount requested . . . ." Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539. Moreover, section 330(a)(4) prohibits the bankruptcy court from awarding compensation for "unnecessary duplication of services . . . or . . . services that were not . . . reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate . . . or . . . necessary to the administration of the estate . . . ." Section 331 authorizes bankruptcy professionals to seek interim compensation on the same basis as under section 330(a). See Teraforce Technology Corp., 347 B.R. at 846 – 847.

Bankruptcy courts use the "lodestar" method, which was adopted from non-bankruptcy, fee-shifting cases, to calculate "reasonable" fees under section 330(a). See Matter of First Colonial Corp. of America, 544 F.2d 1291 (5th Cir.1977), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 904 (1977), citing Johnson v. "A court computes the lodestar by multiplying the number of hours an attorney would reasonably spend for the same type of work by the prevailing hourly rate in the community . . . A court then may adjust the lodestar up or down based on the factors contained in § 330 and its consideration of the twelve factors listed in Johnson . . . ."[15] Cahill, 428 F.3d at 539 - 540.

A bankruptcy court, which is itself an expert on fee issues, uses its experience as a starting point for determining prevailing billing practices in the market under the lodestar and section 330(a). B. Caplin failed to meet its burden of proving that charging the estates for non-working travel time at its full hourly rates was "reasonable" under section 330(a).

The factual record below demonstrates that Caplin failed to meet its burden of proof under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). The evidence that Caplin offered in support of its fee applications at the March 12, 2003 hearing – the affidavit, its attachments and testimony of Attorney Inselbuch - confirmed, at most, the firm's preferred billing practices. ACD 1, 11. It did not establish any of the five "relevant factors" for determining reasonableness under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3), including whether billing the estate for non-working travel time at its professionals' full hourly rates comported with the practices of comparable firms performing non-bankruptcy services under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E).

i. Attorney Inselbuch's testimony established only Caplin's preferred billing practices.

Attorney Inselbuch's testimony at the March 12, 2003 hearing was equivocal and contradictory.

On direct and redirect examination by one of his partners, Attorney Inselbuch testified that it was Caplin's regular and customary practice to bill its non-bankruptcy commercial clients for all travel time at its full hourly rate, that doing so was consistent with his prior work experience at another New York City law firm, Gilbert, Siegel & Young, and that no clients or courts involved in these matters had ever complained about it. ACD 1 at 18 – 23; 64 - 66.[16]

[16] "And I would have to assume, Your Honor, that given my stature in the firm and status within the firm, if there were any dispute of any consequence with any significant client in the firm, I would know about it . . . ." ACD 1 at 65. "I've never had a court hold that our - - the way we calculated our [lodestar], for example, in class action litigation had to be altered to provide for some reduction crediting travel time. I don't remember that Caplin, he said, expected to get paid what it charged, period. ACD 1 at 22. Attorney Inselbuch also stated that Caplin's standard engagement letter, which tracked the Form Engagement Letter and was based upon the "District of Columbia rules," obligated all clients to pay portal to portal travel time at full rates and first class airfare expenses ACD 1 at 18 – 19.

He then opined:

> It is my general understanding based upon conversations that I've had with other firms and with clients throughout the city that as a general proposition, law firms create their billing rates on the assumption that they will bill clients for travel time at the full rates and be paid for them.
>
> If you did it otherwise, you would have to in effect change your billing rates and raise them to accommodate a reduction for payments for travel time and this would in effect discriminate between the clients who require the travel time and the clients who do not require the travel time . . . .

ACD 1 at 22 - 23.

Attorney Inselbuch, who was not qualified as an expert, offered no basis for this opinion, other than his personal experience as a practitioner. ACD 1 at 22 – 23. For example, he did not state whether he had obtained recent form engagement letters or fee schedules from comparable New Orleans, Washington, D.C. or New York law firms demonstrating either that they charged their non-bankruptcy clients full hourly rates for travel time or that they had been required to increase their hourly rates to compensate for clients who refused to do so. ACD 1 at 22 – 23. Attorney Inselbuch did not ask the bankruptcy court under Federal Rule of Evidence 201 to take judicial notice of the hourly rates or billing practices of comparably-skilled professionals employed in the Babcock & Wilcox cases. He referenced no other New Orleans bankruptcy cases employing comparable professionals.

issue ever coming up with a court . . . ." ACD 1 at 49.

On cross and re-cross examination by the United States Trustee, Attorney Inselbuch conceded that Caplin had not entered into a written retention agreement with the committee, because “[w]e don’t use engagement letters in bankruptcy cases . . . ” ACD 1 at 37 – 38; 43. He agreed that the Form Engagement Letter did not expressly authorize Caplin to charge its non-bankruptcy clients its full hourly rates for non-working travel time and for first class airfare. ACD 1 at 41. He also agreed that Caplin’s March 3, 2000 employment application did not expressly authorize the firm charge the bankruptcy estates for the same items. ACD 1 at 43.

Attorney Inselbuch conceded that he did not review each engagement letter with new or existing clients as it was approved by the firm. ACD 1 at 67. He nevertheless insisted that all of Caplin engagement letters incorporated the firm’s (apparently unwritten) policy of requiring clients to pay full rates for travel time and first class airfare and that the firm’s employment terms could altered in its, not the client’s, favor. ACD 1 at 67. “I am quite convinced that I would have been consulted if there were any significant modification for a client – to a client’s retention agreement. Indeed, the changes in these fee letters usually are on the upside, not the downside . . . .” ACD 1 at 67.[17] He could point to no document codifying the firm’s unwritten policy, however. Id.

In response to further questioning, Attorney Inselbuch agreed that the Committee had retained two additional professionals, the Tersigni Consulting Group and Gilbert & Heintz, and that these firm’s were located in Caplin’s Washington, D.C. and New York practice areas. ACD 1 at 44 – 45. He agreed that Caplin reviewed these firms’ fee applications. ACD 1 at 44 – 45.

[17] Attorney Inselbuch stated that all fees billed to non-bankruptcy clients were “subject to review by the billing partner at the end of the day to make certain that the fees being charged, or being sought are reasonable . . . .” ACD 1 at 43. He added that clients who disagreed with Caplin & Drysdale on their bills could “fire” the firm at any time. ACD 1 at 54.

But he claimed ignorance when told that neither Tersigni nor Gilbert & Heintz billed the bankruptcy estates for their full hourly rates for non-working travel time and first class airfare. ACD 1 at 44 – 45.

When asked why firms other than Caplin were not billing their full hourly rates for non-working travel time and first class airfare, Attorney Inselbuch replied "Because you [the United States Trustee] became a nuisance about it . . . ." ACD 1 at 58 – 59.

Finally, Attorney Inselbuch acknowledged that Caplin currently represented committees in comparable bankruptcy cases pending in Delaware. ACD 1 at 49 -50; 52 - 53. He admitted that Delaware's local rules prohibited professionals from charging non-working travel time at their full rate. ACD 1 at 49 -50; 52 - 53. He also admitted that Caplin had agreed to comply with the local rules in cases pending in Delaware, although "we take the position the rules are unfair to the lawyers and to the clients . . . ." ACD 1 at 50; 53.

ii. Caplin failed to demonstrate that billing for non-working travel time at its full hourly rates reflected prevailing market practices under section 330(a)(3)(E).

Based upon Attorney Inselbuch's testimony, Caplin argues that the record below was "undisputed" in demonstrating the firm's customary billing practices. Accordingly, Caplin says, the bankruptcy court erred as a matter of law in reducing its full hourly rates for non-working travel time under section 330(a)(1). Appellant's Opening Brief at 7. This is incorrect, because it not only misstates the requirements of section 330(a) but also mischaracterizes the evidence below.

In order to establish that its billing the estates for non-productive travel at its full hourly rate was reasonable under the comparability standard of section 330(a)(3)(E), Caplin had to adduce "undisputed, credible . . . evidence . . ." that its doing so reflected "market practices . . . "

Busy Beaver Building Centers, Inc., 19 F.3d at 848 (emphasis added). Attorney Inselbuch's testimony provided no such evidence – it did not demonstrate that New York and Washington law firms with practices comparable to Caplin's charged their non-bankruptcy clients for travel time at their full hourly rates. Caplin's evidence pertained solely to the firm's preferred billing practices. Zolfo, Cooper & Co. v. Sunbeam-Oster Co., Inc., 50 F.3d at 260. Caplin's summation effectively captured both of these shortcomings.

> You heard Mr. Inselbuch's testimony concerning what the customary practice of Caplin & Drysdale is with regard to billing for travel time. You heard his testimony with regard to what his practice was at his other firm. I would submit to you that the evidence is unchallenged. Caplin & Drysdale's regular and customary practice is to bill 100 percent of its hourly rate for travel time . . .
> [The] statutory command [of 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)] . . . talks about looking at cases outside of bankruptcy and what's the customary practice outside of there. And here the only evidence before you is that the customary practice of is that Caplin & Drysdale charges its full hourly rate for travel time . . .

ACD 1 at 71 – 74 (emphasis added).

Moreover, while testifying that no court had ever denied Caplin's request for non-working travel time at its normal hourly rate, Attorney Inselbuch did not mention a Connecticut district court decision that arguably affected Caplin's success in doing so while the Babcock & Wilcox bankruptcy cases were pending.

In In re Raytech Corp., 241 B.R. 785 (D. Conn. 1999), the district court vacated and remanded a bankruptcy court order awarding Wolf Block, counsel to the creditors' committee, fees for non-working travel time at its full rate, because the record contained no evidence that doing so was the prevailing market practice among comparably skilled professionals in non-bankruptcy cases. The opinion was issued on August 13, 1999, approximately six months before the Babcock & Wilcox cases were filed in New Orleans. Based upon Attorney Inselbuch's testimony and sworn statements in the Babcock & Wilcox cases, it appears that Caplin was Wolf Block's successor.[18]

The Raytech court stated:

> In awarding these firms their full hourly rates for nonproductive travel time, however, the bankruptcy court failed to consider whether other attorneys in the relevant market customarily charge their non-bankruptcy clients their full hourly legal service rate for nonproductive travel time, and only considered the practices of the applicant attorneys. In fact, there was no finding with respect to the relevant legal market, nor was there any record contained in the application or established at the hearing with respect to travel billing practices in that market . . .

Id. at 789.

According to Attorney Inselbuch, Caplin was submitting fee applications in the Raytech case at least through September 27, 2000, and it probably did so thereafter. AUS 13 at 24. While it is unclear whether the Bridgeport bankruptcy court enforced district court's order prospectively as to Caplin, the Raytech decision was, at minimum, relevant to informing Attorney Inselbuch's opinion testimony under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E).

Caplin's reliance on Strook, Strook & Lavan v. Hillsborough Holdings Corp. (In re Hillsborough Holdings Corp.), 127 F.3d 1398, 1401 – 1402 (11th Cir. 1997) in support of its argument that the bankruptcy court committed "legal" error in awarding it fees for non-productive travel time at 50% of its hourly rates is misplaced. There, the bankruptcy court denied the applicants' request that they be reimbursed for categories of identifiable expenses, such as postage, secretarial services and computer research charges, which they customarily passed through to their clients, because such expenses were appropriately borne as "overhead." Id. The Eleventh Circuit reversed, holding that the bankruptcy court's decision, which it rendered at the outset of the case and without considering any evidence of professionals' billing practices, constituted legal error. Id.

[18] Attorney Inselbuch stated in his March 3, 2000 Bankruptcy Rule 2014 affidavit that Caplin represented the creditors' committee "involving Raytech Corporation . . . in a chapter 11 proceeding currently approaching confirmation in the Bankruptcy Court for the District of Connecticut . . . ." AUS 4 (emphasis added). At the September 27, 2000 evidentiary hearing, he testified that the bankruptcy court should approve Caplin's normal hourly rates, because "these rates have been approved and are being paid in two other bankruptcies, one in Bridgeport, Connecticut and one in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, both of which are similar to this proceeding, in the sense that they involve asbestos liabilities, but neither of which is the size and scope of this bankruptcy . . . ." AUS 13 at 22. He added that "Your Honor, in fee applications that have been filed and approved, both in the bankruptcy court in Bridgeport, Connecticut and the bankruptcy court in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. These same rates have been approved and are being paid. . . ." Id. at 24 (emphasis added).

Unlike Hillsborough, the bankruptcy court here did not limit Caplin's ability to present evidence. Attorney Inselbuch's testimony established, at most, Caplin's preferred billing practices, reflected his opinion only and, contrary to its argument here, did not entitle Caplin to judgment as a matter of law, because it did not establish prevailing billing practices of comparable firms. "Section 330(a) does not authorize the bankruptcy court to award attorney fees for services otherwise not borne by private non-bankruptcy clients . . . . " Raytech, 241 B.R. at 790. "Billable hours are not necessarily compensable hours . . . ." In re Gillett Holdings, Inc., 137 B.R. 475, 481 (Bankr. D. Col. 1992).

The bankruptcy court appropriately exercised its independent expertise in evaluating Caplin's hourly rates for non-productive travel time and discounting Caplin's evidence. In a case presenting facts similar to those here, the debtor's financial advisor, Zolfo, argued that it was entitled to its "customary" rates. Zolfo, Cooper & Co. v. Sunbeam-Oster Co., Inc., 50 F.3d at 260. As evidence of its rates, Zolfo offered the affidavit attached to its employment application, an engagement letter in a separate bankruptcy case and a schedule of rates paid by the debtor's parent corporation in a takeover transaction. Id. The bankruptcy court considered this evidence but declined to be bound by it. Instead, it looked to rates charged by comparable professionals in the market where the court sat, and it reduced Zolfo's hourly rates accordingly. The Third Circuit affirmed, holding that "Zolfo, Cooper bore the burden of proof to demonstrate its customary fees were warranted and did not carry it . . . ." Id. See also Commercial Financial Services, Inc. v. Houlihan Lokey, 427 F.3d 804 (10th Cir. 2005) (affirming order that reduced financial adviser's fee application by 53%, where bankruptcy court looked to hourly rates of comparable professionals rather than to adviser's proffer of customary flat monthly rates).

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by accepting Caplin's proffer as evidence of only its preferred billing practices rather than as conclusive evidence of prevailing market practices for comparable firms in New York and Washington, D.C. The record below supports the bankruptcy court's awarding Caplin fees for non-productive travel time at 50% of its normal hourly rates. Accordingly, the Court should affirm the July 27, 2006 order.

iii. Caplin failed to demonstrate that billing for non-working travel time at its full hourly rates was necessary and materially benefited the estates.

Similarly, Attorney Inselbuch's testimony failed to demonstrate that billing for non-working travel time at its full hourly rates was necessary and materially benefited the estate. Pro-Snax Distributors, Inc., 157 F.3d at 426; 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4). Accordingly, the Court should affirm the July 27, 2006 order.

iv. The bankruptcy court's order is supported by Fifth Circuit fee-shifting cases reducing hourly rates for non-working travel time.

The bankruptcy court's July 27, 2006 order is supported by Fifth Circuit cases that have reviewed fee awards under fee-shifting cases, such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and reduced the hourly rates charged by attorneys for non-productive travel time. See Watkins v. Fordice, 7 F.3d 453, 459 (5th Cir. 1993) (reducing hourly rates for non-productive travel time by 50% in case brought under the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973*l*(e)); Shipes v. Trinity Industries, Inc., 987 F.2d 311, 320 (5th Cir. 1993) (reducing hourly rates for travel time in case brought under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000, et seq.). United States District Courts have concurred. See e.g. Kirksey v. Danks, 608 F.Supp. 1448, 1456 (S.D. Miss. 1985) (reducing hourly rates for travel time in case brought under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 by 50%). Accord Martin v. Mabus, 734 F.Supp. 1216, 1227 (S.D. Miss. 1999) (noting in connection with award of fees under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that "time [spent working on an airplane] simply cannot be 100% efficient . . ." and awarding "'productive' travel time at 75% of the hourly market rate . . . ."); Major v. Treen, 700 F.Supp. 1422, 1432 (E.D. La. 1988) (reducing by 50% the hourly rate for travel under the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The court noted "[w]ork done while traveling is not as efficient as work done in the office and should therefore be compensated at a lower rate . . . Similarly, travel time with no work claimed is not compensable . . . or compensable at a lower hourly rate . . . .") (citations omitted).[19]

v. The bankruptcy court's order is supported by bankruptcy court decisions reducing hourly rates for non-working travel time.

The July 27, 2006 order is also supported by bankruptcy decisions holding that non-working travel time should be compensated at 50% of a professional's hourly rate under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). (internal quotations omitted).

Since Caplin failed to meet its burden of proof under section 330(a)(3)(E), this Court should affirm the July 27, 2006 order.

vi. Caplin could have protected itself through section 328(a), but it chose not to do so.

Section 328(a) authorizes a committee to obtain prior court approval of a professional's compensation plan, such as through a contingent fee arrangement. Pre-approval eliminates any uncertainty as to the professional's compensation arising from the bankruptcy court's post-facto review under section 330(a)(1). Daniels v. Barron (In re Barron), 325 F.3d 690, 692 - 693 (5th Cir. 2003). Section 328(a) permits a bankruptcy court subsequently to award different compensation if "developments, which made the approved plan improvident, had been incapable of anticipation at the time the award was granted . . . ." Id. at 693.

Caplin could have protected itself by obtaining prior bankruptcy court approval of its billing practices under section 328(a). It chose not to do so, however. Daniels v. Barron (In re Barron), 325 F.3d 690 (5th Cir. 2003). Accordingly, the Court should affirm the July 27, 2006 order.

vii. Any error committed by the bankruptcy court was harmless.

A bankruptcy court's error is reversible only if it affected substantial rights of the applicant. See Stewart v. Law Offices of Dennis Olson, 93 B.R. 91, 94 (N.D. Tex. 1988). The bankruptcy court reduced Caplin's fees and expenses by 2% and expenses by 4%, respectively. ACD 37. Assuming that the bankruptcy court's reductions were erroneous, they did not affect substantial rights of Caplin. Accordingly, the Court should affirm the July 27, 2006 order. Zolfo, Cooper & Co. v. Sunbeam-Oster Co., Inc., 50 F.3d at 261 (declining to reverse 12% fee reductions, because "[no] court, viewing a record of this magnitude from the distance inherent in appellate review, could assess the reasonability of a reduction as slight as ten percent with flawless precision . . . ." (internal quotations omitted).

II. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion by Reimbursing Caplin For Coach Rather Than First Class Airfare Expenses

A bankruptcy court may authorize reimbursement of committee professionals' "actual" expenses only if they are "necessary." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(B). In re Needham, 279 B.R. 519, 521 (W.D. La. 2001). An applicant bears the burden of establishing that it is entitled to expenses. In re Gillett Holdings, Inc., 137 B.R. 475, 489 – 490 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1992) "The Court will not assume any expense is necessary . . . An expense is necessary if it was incurred because it was required to accomplish the proper representation of the client . . . ." Id. (internal quotations omitted).

The United States Trustee's Fee Guidelines, 28 CFR Part 58 (1996), the Local Rules for District of Columbia and the Local Rules for the Southern District of New York all prohibit first class airfare. Copies of each are attached hereto as part of the addendum.

i. Caplin failed to demonstrate that billing for first class airfare was "necessary" under section 330(a)(1)(B).

Under direct examination, Attorney Inselbuch testified that Caplin professionals always flew first class in order to save time waiting in "congested airports" to board the plane and to reduce the risk of getting bumped off an oversold flight, particularly since "there are very few flights [between Washington, D.C. or New York and New Orleans] . . . ." ACD 1 at 24.[20] However, he did not ask the bankruptcy court under Federal Rule of Evidence 201 to take judicial notice of any airline flight schedules published on the Internet, which might have corroborated the paucity of flights between New Orleans and the firm's practice areas. Using those schedules or historical booking data, Attorney Inselbuch provided the court with no specific examples of how reserving first class seats prevented Caplin & Drysdale's professionals from being bumped off fully booked flights to New Orleans.[21]

[20] In his affidavit, Attorney Inselbuch also stated that "[o]n several trips from New York to New Orleans I would have been unable to board the airplane had I not had first class seats . . . ." ACD 11. This statement, like Attorney Inselbuch's testimony at the March 12, 2003 hearing, leaves several questions unanswered. Did he reserve his first class seat at the last minute using an online travel ticketing service, such as Travelocity or Orbitz, directly through the airline's website or through a travel agent? If so, what prevented him from reserving a coach seat the same way? The fact that Caplin & Drysdale's fee applications broke out the difference between first class and coach fares suggests that coach seats were available. ACD 2 – 9, 17, 19 – 27.

[21] A review of Caplin & Drysdale's fee applications indicates only one instance where one of its professionals had to book a first class seat, because coach class was full. In its December 17, 2001 fifth interim fee application, the firm notes that it had to fly one of its paralegals, Stacie M. Evans, first class on August 7, 2001, "because coach sold out . . . ." ACD 6. Her contemporaneous time records for that day demonstrate that she billed two hours to "travel time," 5.8 hours to "[a]ssist[ing] NDF in preparation for future depositions by compiling and organizing exhibits to be used in the depositions of Murphy and Burkhart . . ." and .8 hours to "[a]nalyze, compile and index correspondence and pleadings filed in adversary proceedings . . . ." ACD 6 at exhibits "E," "K" and "M". Ms. Evans time records do not indicate that flying in first class enhanced her ability to perform work either on behalf of the bankruptcy estates or any other client.

Attorney Inselbuch also offered no evidence that flying first class reduced Caplin overall travel time to and from New Orleans. He cited no specific emergencies that required the firm to fly first class to New Orleans, and he identified no instances where the firm's professionals could perform their jobs only in first class.

Attorney Inselbuch testified that traveling first class enabled its professionals to work in transit:

> We can work on a plane in first-class . . . [Y]ou can't assume that you will be able to work in coach class, because there is very little room. You . . . are unable to spread out materials and do any sensible work, and worse yet, you never know who will be sitting next to you, and you never know what other security issues might arise . . .

ACD 1 at 24 – 25.

Yet he failed to demonstrate that working in first class was uniformly efficient and beneficial to the debtors' estates vis a vis office time for the same tasks. C/f Gillett Holdings, Inc. 137 B.R. at 491 (noting that travel time "is rarely totally productive . . . .") (internal quotations omitted).

He identified no instances where flying the firm's professionals first class allowed them to arrive more prepared for trials or negotiations than if they had flown coach, and he did not demonstrate that common sense precautions employed in first class to protect client confidences would not work in coach.

The bulk of Attorney Inselbuch's direct testimony focused upon the idea that flying first class saved money for Caplin's clients, because it allowed attorneys to work while traveling. ACD 1 at 24 - 25. He stated:

> [I]ronically, I believe that it is less expensive for the clients for us to fly in first-class where we can work on the client's matters rather than sit in coach class where we can't work on the client's matters and the time we would otherwise > devote to either of those – that client's matters or other clients' matters for which the client wouldn't pay so-called travel time would be added on either before or after the flight . . . .

ACD 1 at 24 - 25.

Citing the chart attached to his affidavit, Attorney Inselbuch attempted to demonstrate that flying first class saved money for the Babcock & Wilcox bankruptcy estates. ACD 25 – 30. This analysis demonstrated only hypothetical savings, however. It was also irrelevant to the issue of whether first class travel was necessary to its representing the client. In short, it established no nexus between flying first class and material benefit to the estate.

On cross-examination, Attorney Inselbuch conceded that Caplin routinely flew first class if it were available and that the firm allowed its professionals to keep frequent flier miles instead of applying them to offset client travel costs. ACD 1 at 45; 47.

Attorney Inselbuch's testimony did not establish that Caplin's flying first class was "necessary" under section 330(a)(1)(B). In re Gillett Holdings, Inc., 137 B.R. at 489.

Separately, assuming that the bankruptcy court's reductions were erroneous, they did not affect substantial rights of Caplin. Accordingly, the Court should affirm the July 27, 2006 order. Zolfo, Cooper & Co. v. Sunbeam-Oster Co., Inc., 50 F.3d at 261

CONCLUSION

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by awarding Caplin fees for non-working travel time at 50% of its normal hourly rates, because Caplin failed to meet its burden of proof that its fees were "reasonable" under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). The evidence that Caplin adduced at the March 12, 2003 did not establish any of the five "relevant factors" for determining reasonableness under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3), including whether billing the estate for non-working travel time at its professionals' full hourly rates comported with the practices of comparable firms performing non-bankruptcy services under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E).

Similarly, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by reimbursing Caplin for coach rather than first class airfare expenses, because Caplin did not meet its burden of proving that those expenses were "necessary" under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(B).

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered below.

STATUTORY ADDENDUM

11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Compensation of officers

(a)(1) After notice to the parties in interest and the United States Trustee and a hearing, and subject to sections 326, 328, and 329, the court may award to a trustee, an examiner, a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103--

(A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney and by any paraprofessional person employed by any such person; and

(B) reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses.

(2) The court may, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States Trustee, the United States Trustee for the District or Region, the trustee for the estate, or any other party in interest, award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested.

(3)(A) In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded, the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including--

(A) the time spent on such services;

(B) the rates charged for such services;

(C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title;

(D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the problem, issue, or task addressed; and

(E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title.

(4)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the court shall not allow compensation for--

(i) unnecessary duplication of services; or

(ii) services that were not--

(I) reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate; or
(II) necessary to the administration of the case.

(B) In a chapter 12 or chapter 13 case in which the debtor is an individual, the court may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section.

(5) The court shall reduce the amount of compensation awarded under this section by the amount of any interim compensation awarded under section 331, and, if the amount of such interim compensation exceeds the amount of compensation awarded under this section, may order the return of the excess to the estate.

(6) Any compensation awarded for the preparation of a fee application shall be based on the level and skill reasonably required to prepare the application.

11 U.S.C. § 503. Allowance of administrative expenses

(a) An entity may timely file a request for payment of an administrative expense, or may tardily file such request if permitted by the court for cause.

(b) After notice and a hearing, there shall be allowed administrative expenses, other than claims allowed under section 502(f) of this title, including--

* * *

(2) compensation and reimbursement awarded under section 330(a) of this title;

11 U.S.C. § 507(a). Priorities

(a) The following expenses and claims have priority in the following order:

(1) First, administrative expenses allowed under section 503(b) of this title, and any fees and charges assessed against the estate under chapter 123 of title 28.

1102. Creditors’ and equity security holders' committees

(a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (3), as soon as practicable after the order for relief under chapter 11 of this title, the United States trustee shall appoint a committee of creditors holding unsecured claims and may appoint additional committees of creditors or of equity security holders as the United States trustee deems appropriate.

Section 1103. Powers and duties of committees

(a) At a scheduled meeting of a committee appointed under section 1102 of this title, at which a majority of the members of such committee are present, and with the court's approval, such committee may select and authorize the employment by such committee of one or more attorneys, accountants, or other agents, to represent or perform services for such committee.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky had jurisdiction over Mr. Charles Wilks' chapter 7 bankruptcy case under 28 U.S.C. 157(b). This appeal is taken from an order that court entered on June 16, 2006 striking Mr. Wilks' petition in bankruptcy over the objection of the United States Trustee, who had asked instead that Mr. Wilks' bankruptcy case be dismissed. The United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from that order under 28 U.S.C. 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on June 23, 2006.[1] This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Under section 301 of the Bankruptcy Code, the filing of a petition commences a bankruptcy case. In a variety of contexts, federal courts routinely dismiss cases that lack merit, including cases brought in the absence of subject matter jurisdiction. Given that law, did the court below err when it ruled Mr. Wilks' petition had not commenced a case and ended Mr. Wilks' bankruptcy proceeding by striking the petition while refusing to dismiss the underlying bankruptcy case?

[1] Congress has authorized the United States Attorney General to appoint 21 United States trustees, each to serve in a specific geographic region of the United States. See generally 28 U.S.C. 581 et seq. (establishing United States Trustee Program). The United States trustees are senior officials of the Department of Justice. Id. United States Trustees "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within his or her region through the exercise of a range of oversight responsibilities. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3). See generally Morganstern v. Revco D.S. Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990) (explaining that United States trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law). United States Trustees may raise, appear, and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under Title 11. 11 U.S.C. 307; See also In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d at 499-500 (upholding broad appellate standing of United States trustees).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This appeal presents an important recurring issue that has arisen under the new Bankruptcy Code as amended by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA). That new law requires individuals to obtain credit counseling from an approved agency before seeking bankruptcy relief. See 11 U.S.C. 109(h). On February 28, 2006, Mr. Wilks filed his petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code without satisfying the Code's pre-filing credit counseling requirement. Mr. Wilks acknowledged that his failure to satisfy the credit counseling requirement rendered him ineligible to be a debtor and filed a motion to strike his case. The United States Trustee opposed the motion to strike and asked, instead, that Mr. Wilks' case be dismissed. The United States Trustee did so because the nature of the relief granted could have substantial impact upon Mr. Wilks' creditors. On June 16, 2006, the bankruptcy court, following a minority line of cases, entered an order that Mr. Wilks' petition be stricken. The United States Trustee then timely filed this appeal.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

1. Statutory Framework

Chapter 3 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 301, et seq., governs the commencement and administration of bankruptcy cases. Under section 301, "a voluntary case under a chapter of [the Bankruptcy Code] is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter." 11 U.S.C. 301.

The commencement of a case under section 301 is significant for many reasons. For example, under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a), "parties commencing a case under title 11" are required to pay the clerk of the bankruptcy court a fee for a case commenced under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. 28 U.S.C. 1930(a). When a debtor commences a chapter 7 case under section 301, the court issues a notice of the debtor's bankruptcy filing to the debtor's creditors, assigning the debtor a case number and advising the debtor's creditors that "the filing of the bankruptcy case automatically stays certain collection and other actions against the debtor." (R. at 6; Notice of Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Case, Meeting of Creditors, & Deadlines).[2] In addition, under 11 U.S.C. 701, the United States Trustee must appoint a disinterested person to "serve as interim trustee in the case." 11 U.S.C. 701(a)(1).

Section 109 establishes rules that govern eligibility to be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code. This section includes general rules that affect the eligibility of individuals to proceed as debtors under each chapter of the Bankruptcy Code. For example, under section 109(g), no individual may be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code if that individual had a case pending at any time during the preceding 180 days if the prior case "was dismissed by the court for willful failure of the debtor to abide by orders of the court." 11 U.S.C. 109(g). Section 109 also places restrictions on the types of individuals who may proceed as debtors under specific chapters of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. 109. For example, only individuals with regular income who have unsecured debts of less than $307,675 and secured debts of less than $922,975 may be debtors under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. 109(e).

The BAPCPA amended Section 109 in 2005 to require, as an additional element of eligibility to be a debtor under any chapter of the Bankruptcy Code, that all individuals receive credit counseling during the 180-day period prior to filing a petition in bankruptcy. See 11 U.S.C. 109(h)(1). [3]

Section 707, of Chapter 7, entitled Dismissal of a case or conversion to a case under chapter 11 or 13, establishes that "a court may dismiss a case under [chapter 7] . . . for cause."

[2] "R. at __" refers to the official docket number in the bankruptcy court's case docket.

[3] Under this new provision, debtors may seek an extension of the pre-filing requirement of up to forty-five days after filing if they can establish, among other things, that exigent circumstances required that they file for bankruptcy protection before obtaining the required credit counseling. See 11 U.S.C. 109(h)(3). In addition, upon notice and a hearing, a debtor may seek waiver of the credit counseling requirement altogether if the debtor can establish that he or she is incapacitated, disabled or on active military duty in a military combat zone. See 11 U.S.C. 109(h)(4). Those sections are not at issue in this appeal.

11 U.S.C. 707(a). It includes a nonexhaustive list of reasons that may constitute cause to dismiss a chapter 7 bankruptcy case. See 11 U.S.C. 707(a).

2. Factual Background

Mr. Wilks filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code on February 28, 2006. (R. at 1; Voluntary Petition). Mr. Wilks was assisted in the preparation and filing of his bankruptcy petition by his bankruptcy counsel, id., who continued to represent Mr. Wilks throughout his bankruptcy proceedings. (R. at 11; Motion to Strike Case).[4] Mr. Wilks checked the box on his bankruptcy petition indicating that he had "received approved budget and credit counseling during the 180-day period preceding the filing of [his] petition," and he signed his petition. (R. at 1; Voluntary Petition). Debtors are required to sign their bankruptcy petitions under penalty of perjury declaring that the information provided in the petition is true and correct. Id. The Bankruptcy Code requires a debtor to file a certificate from the approved credit counseling agency as proof that the debtor has fulfilled the credit counseling requirement of 11 U.S.C. 109(h). See 11 U.S.C. 521(b)(1). Interim Rules 1007(b)(3) and (c) require that the certificate of credit counseling be filed with the bankruptcy petition in a voluntary case.[5] See Int. R. Fed. Bankr. P.1007(b)(3) and (c).

Mr. Wilks did not file the certificate of credit counseling until March 31, 2006. (R at 10; Certificate of Credit Counseling). Despite Mr. Wilks' declaration on his petition that he had obtained the required pre-petition credit counseling, the certificate indicated that Mr. Wilks had [4] Though the court docketed this motion as a Motion to Strike Petition, counsel for the Debtor actually titled said motion as a Motion to Strike Case.

[5] The Interim Bankruptcy Rules were prepared by the Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy Rules and recommended for local court adoption to implement changes made by the BAPCPA. Pursuant to a standing order dated October 14, 2005, the Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky adopted the Interim Rules in their entirety as the local rules of the court. See October 14, 2005 Standing Order on Adoption of Interim Bankruptcy Rules.

not obtained credit counseling until March 21, 2006, more than twenty days after he filed his bankruptcy petition. Id.

On the same day that he filed his certificate of credit counseling, Mr. Wilks filed a motion to strike his bankruptcy case. (R. at 11; Motion to Strike Case). In his motion, he acknowledged that he was ineligible to be a debtor. Id. Mr. Wilks claimed, however, that because he was not eligible to be a debtor, he did not commence a bankruptcy case. Id. He therefore requested that his petition be stricken as opposed to having his case be dismissed. Id.

The United States Trustee filed an objection to Mr. Wilks' motion to strike. (R. at 12; Objection by the United States Trustee). He asked that the bankruptcy court dismiss Mr. Wilks' case. Id.

Based on the parties' briefs, the bankruptcy court ruled that it was appropriate to strike Mr. Wilks' petition "as not having been properly filed as a bankruptcy case." (R. at 18; Order Granting Debtor's Motion to Strike Petition). The bankruptcy court noted that under changes made by the BAPCPA, the automatic stay under 11 U.S.C. 362 has been modified with respect to people who file successive bankruptcy cases. Id. Under section 362(c)(3), when a debtor has had a prior case pending within the preceding one-year period that was subsequently dismissed, the automatic stay in the next case shall terminate automatically on the thirtieth day after the filing of that case unless a debtor is able to establish by motion that the later case is in good faith as to the creditors to be stayed. See 11 U.S.C. 362(c)(3). In order to protect Mr. Wilks from the impact of this new change in a subsequent case, and to deny his creditors of its advantage, the bankruptcy court ordered that the petition be stricken. (R. at 18; Order Granting Debtor's Motion to Strike Petition). The United States Trustee timely appealed that order to this Court. (R. at 21; Notice of Appeal).

Both Mr. Wilks and the United States Trustee agree that the requirements of section 109(h) were not met and that Mr. Wilks' bankruptcy case cannot proceed. (R. at 15; Wilks' Memorandum in Response to the Objection of the United States Trustee). The question raised, however, is the proper disposition of the case once an individual is determined to be ineligible to be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

Federal courts dismiss improperly filed cases - they do not strike them. Courts dismiss cases for many reasons, including lack of jurisdiction, and failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. The same has always been true in bankruptcy. Under section 301 of the Bankruptcy Code, the filing of a petition commences a bankruptcy case. The Bankruptcy Code, consistent with other federal law, makes no provision for striking petitions or cases as a method of disposing of bankruptcy cases.

Despite this, the court below declined to dismiss Mr. Wilkes' bankruptcy case, even though all the parties agreed the case was filed improperly; instead, the court, granted Mr. Wilks' motion to strike even though no federal statute professes to authorize the closure of federal cases by striking. That was error.

That error circumvents important statutory directives, and harms both debtors and creditors. It also engenders confusion because the Bankruptcy Code explains in detail what happens to dismissed cases and how dismissal affects the rights of the various parties to a bankruptcy case, but it says nothing about the effect of striking. See 11 U.S.C. 349. For these reasons, this case should be remanded with instructions that the court below dismiss Mr. Wilks' improperly filed bankruptcy case.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The bankruptcy court is the finder of fact in a bankruptcy case. Harden v. Caldwell (In re Caldwell), 851 F.2d 852, 857 (6th Cir. 1988). When the district court is the appellate court for a bankruptcy case, it reviews the bankruptcy court's factual findings under the clearly erroneous standard and its conclusions of law de novo. Id. This appeal presents only a legal question. De novo review of legal questions requires this Court to review questions of law independent of the bankruptcy court's determination of the law. In re Schaffrath, 214 B.R. 153, 154 (6th Cir. BAP 1997) (citations omitted).

ARGUMENT

1. Dismissal Is the Only Proper Disposition of Mr. Wilks' Improperly Filed Bankruptcy Case.

Federal district courts routinely dismiss improperly pleaded cases under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b) - they do not strike them.[6] See, e.g., Harrod v. Uunet Tech., Inc., 22 Fed.Appx. 570, 571 (6th Cir. 2001) (Sixth Circuit affirmed district court's dismissal of case for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6)); Universal Express, Inc. v. U.S. S.E.C., 2006 WL 1004381, slip op. (11th Cir. 2006) (a "motion to dismiss may be granted for defect in jurisdictional, venue, or process, see Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1)-(5), or for failure to state a claim, see id. R. 12(b)(6)"); Cont'l Cas. Co. v. American Nat. Ins. Co.,417 F.3d 727, 733 (7th Cir. 2005); ("[t]he district court ultimately dismissed this case because the forum selection clauses in the [contract] required arbitration in other districts... [w]e have held dismissal under these circumstances to be appropriate"); Miller v. Yokohama Tire Corp., 358 F.3d 616, 618 (9th Cir. 2004) (Ninth Circuit affirmed district court's dismissal of case under Rule 12(b)(6)); ProEnglish v. Bush, 70 Fed.Appx. 84 (4th Cir. 2003) (Fourth Circuit affirmed district court's dismissal of case for lack of ripeness).

Indeed, the United States Code makes clear that even cases filed without jurisdiction are dismissed. See 28 U.S.C. 1919 (governing the imposition of costs in district court cases "dismissed" for "want of jurisdiction"). See also, Ogle v. Church of God, 153 Fed.Appx. 371, 375, 376 (6th Cir. 2005) ("we affirm [the district court's] holding that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction over this case as a matter of First Amendment law and its dismissal of the case");

Roberts v. U.S., 2006 WL 1866858, slip op. at *4 (6th Cir. 2006) (“the district court properly dismissed [plaintiff’s] lawsuit without prejudice for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction); Coles v. Granville, 448 F.3d 853, 866 (6th Cir. 2006); (the plaintiff “has no injury necessary to make his case ripe for federal review. On this basis alone, the district court's dismissal without prejudice, in lieu of abstention, was not an abuse of discretion”); Int’l Bhd. of Teamsters v. United Parcel Service Co., 447 F.3d 491 (6th Cir. 2006) (Sixth Circuit affirmed district court’s dismissal of case for lack of statutory jurisdiction”).

Bankruptcy is no different. The filing of a petition commences a case. 11 U.S.C. 301. Every chapter of the Bankruptcy Code includes a separate section expressly providing for the “dismissal” of debtors’ cases for “cause” when it is improper for the case to proceed. See 11 U.S.C. 707(a) (providing for “dismiss[al]” of a chapter 7 case for “cause”); see also 11 U.S.C. 1112(b) (providing for dismissal or conversion of a chapter 11 case for “cause”); see also 11 U.S.C. 1208 (providing for dismissal or conversion of a chapter 12 case for “cause”); see also 11 U.S.C. 1307(c) (providing for dismissal or conversion of a chapter 13 case for “cause”).

In fact, as the court below acknowledged in its ruling, prior to changes made by the BAPCPA, bankruptcy courts routinely dismissed cases where individuals were determined to be ineligible to be debtors by operation of 11 U.S.C. 109. (R. at 18; Order Granting Debtor’s Motion to Strike Petition). The government has reviewed over 800 decisions entered prior to the enactment of the BAPCPA where eligibility under section 109 was at issue, and it is not aware of a single case or petition that was stricken as a method of disposing of the underlying case. Bankruptcy courts have consistently dismissed cases when individuals or entities were ineligible to be debtors. See, e.g., In re Hubbard, 333 B.R. 377, 388 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2005)(noting that “[t]his Court and others have generally ‘dismissed’ cases that were filed by ineligible debtors”).

Historically, bankruptcy courts, like district courts, have dismissed cases for a variety of reasons, including jurisdictional defects and improper venue. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1014 (providing that cases filed in an improper district shall either be dismissed or transferred); see also 28 U.S.C. §1930(d)(providing that "[w]henever any case or proceeding is dismissed in any bankruptcy court for want of jurisdiction, such court may order the payment of just costs") (emphasis added).

Given this settled law, it is not surprising that the vast majority of courts have dismissed cases upon concluding the person seeking bankruptcy protection was ineligible to be a debtor under 11 U.S.C. 109(h). See, e.g., Dixon v. LaBarge, Jr. (In re Dixon), 338 B.R. 383, 389 (8th Cir. B.A.P. 2006). In addition, most courts that have considered the issue have dismissed rather than struck cases in which individuals have been ineligible to be debtors because they did not obtain credit counseling. See In re Seaman, 340 B.R. 698 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2006); In re Ross, 338 B.R. 134 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2006); In re Mills, 341 B.R. 106 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2006); In re Bell, 2006 WL 1132907, slip op. (Bankr. D. Neither Mr. Wilks nor the bankruptcy court identified any provision of the Bankruptcy Code or other federal law that allows courts to terminate federal bankruptcy cases by striking the pleading that commenced the case while leaving the underlying case in limbo. Nor can they, because no such provision exists.[7] The lower court decision cited only one statute, 11 U.S.C.

[7] In addition, the only reference to the "striking" of any document in the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure is found in Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7012(b) and 9011. Rule 7012(b), incorporates by reference Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(e) and (f). Rule 12(e) allows a court to strike a

105(a).[8] However, both its plain language and binding Sixth Circuit precedent make clear that this provision cannot be used, as the court would use it here, to deviate from the use of dismissal to terminate improperly filed cases.

By its terms, section 105 nowhere authorizes courts to dispose of cases by striking. To the contrary, it only authorizes courts to take actions that are consistent with the Code. As the Sixth Circuit and many other courts have held, section 105 cannot be employed to deviate from federal law. See Pertuso v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 233 F.3d 417, 423 (6th Cir. 2000) (establishing that a bankruptcy court may not use section 105(a) to legislate additional remedies that are otherwise unavailable under applicable law.); Matter of Kelvin Publishing, Inc., 72 F.3d 129 (6th Cir.

pleading where there is a prior existing order to amend the pleading and the order has not been obeyed. Rule 12(f) allows for motions to strike in the context of adversary proceedings. According to this rule, such motions may be made by a party before responding to a pleading or by a court on its own initiative, and the court may "order stricken from any pleading any insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f). Motions to strike, however, are not favored. Salcer v. Envicon Equities Corp., 744 F.2d 935, 939 (2d Cir. 1984), cert. granted and judgment remanded on other grounds, 478 U.S. 1015 (1986); FDIC v. Abel, et al., 1995 WL 716729 at * 12 (S.D.N.Y. 1995); Brokke v. Stauffer Chem. Co., 703 F. Supp. 215, 223 (D. Conn. 1988). A motion to "strike" under Rule 12(f) also only pertains to the striking of material contained in a pleading. In re Kershaw, 59 B.R. 618, 620 (Bankr. D. Tenn. 1986). Moreover, such motions are not intended to raise substantial, disputed questions of law. Mohegan Tribe v. Conn., 528 F. Supp. 1359, 1362 (D. Conn. 1982) ("The presence of a substantial or seriously disputed question of law will preclude a district court from granting a motion to strike."). Rule 9011 requires that papers filed in bankruptcy courts be signed by at least one attorney of record or by the party herself if she is unrepresented. Rule 9011(a) provides that "an unsigned paper shall be stricken unless omission of the signature is corrected promptly after being called to the attention of the attorney or party." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(a).

[8] Section 105 provides:

> The court may issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title. No provision of this title providing for the raising of an issue by a party in interest shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action or making any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process.

1995)); see also United States v. Sutton, 786 F.2d 1305, 1308 (5th Cir.1986) (citing Southern Ry. Co. v. Johnson Bronze Co., 758 F.2d 137, 141 (3d Cir.1985) (same).

As we discuss above, improperly filed federal cases are dismissed, not stricken, and each chapter of the Bankruptcy Code contains a provision for dismissing - not striking - improperly filed cases. As Sixth Circuit authority underscores, section 105 cannot be used to deviate from that law.

2. It is Error to Strike Cases Under the Theory that 11 U.S.C. 109 is a Jurisdictional Statute Because: (1) It is Not and, (2) Even if it Were, Cases Filed in Violation of Section 109 Would Need to be Dismissed Rather than Stricken.

Although the court below did not expressly purport to do so, some bankruptcy courts have erroneously stricken cases because they believe (1) section 109(h) is a jurisdictional statute and (2) courts must strike petitions filed without jurisdiction under section 109.[9] Both of these conclusions are wrong. To the extent those erroneous beliefs formed any basis for the bankruptcy court's holding, the bankruptcy court erred as a matter of law in relying upon them.

Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit precedent make clear that eligibility statutes like section 109 are not jurisdictional. Instead, jurisdictional provisions are those that actually define the jurisdiction of federal courts, most typically those set forth in title 28 of the United States code. Most recently in Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp.,--- U.S. ----, 126 S.Ct. 1235, 163 L.Ed.2d 1097 (Feb. 22, 2006), the Supreme Court ruled that eligibility provisions in federal statutes do not confer or contract subject-matter jurisdiction. In Arbaugh, the Supreme Court was asked to determine whether an employee-numerosity requirement in Title VII for establishing a defendant/restaurant's "employer" status was jurisdictional, or whether it was merely an element of a bartender/waitress's claim for relief under Title VII. Id. The Court held that the definition of an "employer" in the statute was an element of the plaintiff's claim for relief, the satisfaction of which the defendant employer conceded when it failed to raise the issue prior to the trial on the merits. Id. at 1245. The Supreme Court declined to find that the defendant's status as an "employer" was a jurisdictional requirement that could be questioned at any stage of litigation. Id. In making its determination, the Supreme Court noted that courts have an obligation to determine whether subject-matter jurisdiction exists, even in the absence of a challenge from any party. Id. It concluded that nothing in Title VII's text indicated that Congress intended courts, on their own motion, to assure that the employee-numerosity requirement is met. Id. at 1244.

In rendering its decision, the Supreme Court commented that courts have been imprecise regarding jurisdictional issues noting that "[s]ubject matter jurisdiction in federal-question cases is sometimes erroneously conflated with a plaintiff's need and ability to prove the defendant bound by the federal law asserted as the predicate for relief-a merits-related determination." Id. at 1242 (quoting 2 J. Moore et al., MOORE'S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 12.30[1], p. 12-36.1 (3d ed. 2005). In addition, in order to avoid the "'unfair[ness]" and 'waste of judicial resources. . . entailed in tying the employee-numerosity requirement to subject-matter jurisdiction," the Supreme Court advised courts to "to refrain from constricting § 1331 or Title VII's jurisdictional provision, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(f)(3), and to leave the ball in Congress' court." Arbaugh, 126 S.Ct. at 1245. It noted that Congress is free to instruct that certain elements of a claim for relief "shall count as jurisdictional, ... [b]ut when Congress does not rank a statutory limitation on coverage as jurisdictional, courts should treat the restriction as nonjurisdictional in character." Id.

Even more recently, the Sixth Circuit in Cobb v. Contract Transp., Inc., 452 F.3d 543 (6th Cir. 2006), heeded the Supreme Court's ruling in Arbaugh and overruled its prior holding in Douglas v. E.G. Baldwin & Associates, 150 F.3d 604 (6th Cir.1998) that an eligibility statute was jurisdictional. Drawing heavily upon Arbaugh, the Sixth Circuit concluded that the district court clearly had subject matter jurisdiction over a driver's Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) claims, as the FMLA's definitions of “employer” and “eligible employee” were not jurisdictional in nature. Cobb, 2006 WL 1749628 at *4. In rendering its decision, the Sixth Circuit noted that the Supreme Court has issued a number of decisions in the past three years “instructing courts of appeals to properly distinguish between subject-matter jurisdiction and other limits on a court's authority.” Id. at *5. See e.g. Eberhart v. United States, --- U.S.----, 126 S.Ct. 403, 405, 163 L.Ed.2d 14 (2005); see also Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 453-54, 124 S.Ct. 906, 157 L.Ed.2d 867 (2004). The Sixth Circuit noted that, as a consequence of those Supreme Court decisions, “[a] panel of this Court recently held that these cases overrule prior panel precedent construing the eligibility sections of federal statutes as jurisdictional in nature.” Id. at *5; see also Primax Recoveries, Inc. v. Gunter, 433 F.3d 515, 519 (6th Cir. 2006).

Similar to the “employer” and “eligible employee” provisions of the FMLA discussed in Cobb, section 109 establishes eligibility to be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code. Nothing under Title 11 indicates that Congress intended courts, on their own motion, to assure that the debtor eligibility provisions are satisfied. In addition, 28 U.S.C. 1334 and 157 are the jurisdictional statutes that confer bankruptcy jurisdiction. See, e.g., Rudd v. Laughlin, 866 F.2d 1040, 1041 (8th Cir. 1989); Promenade Nat’l Bank v. Phillips (In re Phillips), 844 F.2d 230, 235-36 n.2 (5th Cir. 1988); In re Republic Trust & Savings Co., 59 B.R. 606, 609 (N.D. Okla. 1986). Section 109 does not speak in jurisdictional terms, and does not refer in any way to the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts. Arbaugh, 126 S.Ct. at 1245. Therefore, under the case law controlling in this circuit, Mr. Wilks commenced a case under the Bankruptcy Code despite the fact that he later admitted that he was ineligible to be a debtor, and the bankruptcy court possessed the jurisdiction to dispose of the case under the Bankruptcy Code.

3. Other Federal Statues Make Clear that Mr. Wilks Filed A Bankruptcy Case, and Everything That Happened in His Case Underscores That Fact.

Other federal statutes and the administration of Mr. Wilks' case make clear Mr. Wilks had a bankruptcy case that needed to be dismissed. Among other things, (i) a "case" number was been assigned to his case,[10] (ii) a chapter 7 "case" trustee was appointed to supervise his case,[11] (iii) the bankruptcy court accepted a "case" filing fee under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a),[12] and (iv) the debtor's creditors were advised that the "filing of the bankruptcy case" operates as a stay of any action they may take to collect any debts owed by the debtor.[13] Each of these actions underscores the obvious fact that Mr. Wilks' decision to file a bankruptcy petition commenced a bankruptcy case.

4. Striking Petitions Creates Substantial Uncertainty under the Bankruptcy Code That Is Harmful to Debtors and Creditors Alike, and Creates Confusion Regarding the Rights of Interested Parties.

The Bankruptcy Code dedicates an entire section of the Code, 11 U.S.C. 349, to explaining the effect of a dismissed case on the rights of the various parties to a bankruptcy proceeding. See 11 U.S.C. 349. Section 349 provides, among other things, that: (i) dismissal of a bankruptcy case reinstates any proceeding or custodianship superseded under section 521; (ii) dismissal vacates any order under sections 522(i)(1), 542, 550, or 553, and (iii) dismissal revests the property of the estate in the entity in which such property was vested immediately before commencement of the case. 11 U.S.C. 349. Therefore, terminating a case through striking rather [11] See R. at 4; Notice of Appointment of Interim Trustee and Fixing of Bond (appointing Phaedra Spradlin as the interim trustee assigned to Mr. Wilks' case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 701).

[12] Under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a), "parties commencing a case under title 11" are required to pay the clerk of the bankruptcy court a fee for a case commenced under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. 28 U.S.C. 1930(a). The Bankruptcy Court collected a filing fee of $274 from Mr. Wilks when he commenced his case. (R. at 2; Receipt of Filing Fee for Chapter 7 Voluntary Petition).

[13] See R. at 6; Notice of Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Case, Meeting of Creditors, & Deadlines (advising Mr. Wilks' creditors that "the filing of the bankruptcy case automatically stays certain collection and other actions against the debtor").

than dismissal will engender substantial confusion and potential prejudice because there are no corresponding instructions in the Code or elsewhere regarding the impact of striking a petition.[14]

5. Striking Petitions Circumvents Statutory Restrictions Upon Debtors Who Have Previously Had a Bankruptcy Case Dismissed.

Congress amended the automatic stay provisions of section 362 of the Bankruptcy Code in 2005 in order to limit a debtor's right to operate under the automatic stay when the debtor has previously had a case "dismissed" by a bankruptcy court. 11 U.S.C. 362(c)(3) (imposing these new restrictions in cases succeeding previously "dismissed" cases). Congress did so because it concluded it was unfair to allow debtors to file multiple bankruptcy cases and automatically reap the substantial benefits of the automatic stay of creditor actions in each case. See H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 2 (2005), U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 2005, pp. 88, 89 (setting forth Congress' conclusions on this point).

Section 362(c)(3) provides that where a debtor has had a prior case "dismissed" within the preceding one-year period, the automatic stay in the next case shall terminate automatically on the thirtieth day after the filing of that case unless a debtor is able to establish by motion that the later case is in good faith as to the creditors to be stayed. See 11 U.S.C. 362(c)(3).

By striking rather than dismissing Mr. Wilks' petition, the order entered below risks circumventing section 362(c)(3)'s new limitation by disposing of a case without "dismissing" it. Some courts have concluded that striking a case rather than dismissing it - the term employed in section 362(c)(3) - frees debtors from section 362(c)(3)'s restrictions upon the use of the automatic stay in a subsequent case. In the government's view, it is not appropriate to vitiate Congress' mandate in section 362(c)(3) by refusing to dismiss cases filed in violation of section [14] In addition, striking a case, rather than dismissing creates substantial uncertainty about the rights and obligations of debtors and creditors in stricken cases. See, e.g., In re Ross, 338 B.R. 134, 139 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2006)(explaining that striking cases could have an unintended result of harming debtors who have had their homes foreclosed due to the absence of the stay in a voided case).

109. For the Bankruptcy System to function optimally, creditors and debtors alike must have faith that time-honored procedures - like dismissing improperly filed cases - will be neutrally applied in all cases. Conversely, faith in the Bankruptcy System will diminish were parties in interest to conclude that neutral bankruptcy rules were being ignored simply to evade policy dictates mandated by Congress that a particular court might deem unwise.

That is not to say Mr. Wilks cannot take full advantage of the automatic stay in a subsequent bankruptcy case. To the contrary, section 362 allows debtors to obtain the full benefit of the stay in a subsequent case if they prove their first case was filed in "good faith." See 362(c)(3) (allowing a debtor to obtain the full benefit of the stay if the debtor establishes the first case was filed in "good faith"). See also In re Seaman, 340 B.R. 698, 706 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2006) (discussing this point). As some courts have stated, "a dismissal under Section 109(h) . . . does not appear to establish any lack of good faith." Id. Under those decisions' rationale, Mr. Wilks might well be able to take full advantage of the automatic stay notwithstanding the dismissal of his prior case. At a minimum, the necessity under section 362(c)(3) of filing a motion to extend the stay in a second case is the procedure Congress mandated. It should not be vitiated by striking rather than dismissing bankruptcy cases.[15]

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order entered below and remand this case with instructions to the bankruptcy court to enter an order dismissing Mr. Wilks' Chapter 7 bankruptcy case.

[15] Although Mr. Wilks sought to have his first case declared a legal nullity at the end of its life, Mr. Wilks enjoyed the benefits of the automatic stay in that bankruptcy case for more than twenty days before he admitted that he was ineligible to be a debtor and filed his motion asking that his petition be stricken.

(h)(1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and (3), and notwithstanding any other provision of this section, an individual may not be a debtor under this title unless such individual has, during the 180-day period preceding the date of filing of the petition by such individual, received from an approved nonprofit budget and credit counseling agency described in section 111(a) an individual or group briefing (including a briefing conducted by telephone or on the Internet) that outlined the opportunities for available credit counseling and assisted such individual in performing a related budget analysis.

(2)(A) Paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to a debtor who resides in a district for which the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) determines that the approved nonprofit budget and credit counseling agencies for such district are not reasonably able to provide adequate services to the additional individuals who would otherwise seek credit counseling from such agencies by reason of the requirements of paragraph (1).

(B) The United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) who makes a determination described in subparagraph (A) shall review such determination not later than 1 year after the date of such determination, and not less frequently than annually thereafter.

(iii) is satisfactory to the court.

(B) With respect to a debtor, an exemption under subparagraph (A) shall cease to apply to that debtor on the date on which the debtor meets the requirements of paragraph (1), but in no case may the exemption apply to that debtor after the date that is 30 days after the debtor files a petition, except that the court, for cause, may order an additional 15 days.

(4) The requirements of paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to a debtor whom the court determines, after notice and hearing, is unable to complete those requirements because of incapacity, disability, or active military duty in a military combat zone. For the purposes of this paragraph, incapacity means that the debtor is impaired by reason of mental illness or mental deficiency so that he is incapable of realizing and making rational decisions with respect to his financial responsibilities; and "disability" means that the debtor is so physically impaired as to be unable, after reasonable effort, to participate in an in person, telephone, or Internet briefing required under paragraph (1).

11 U.S.C. 301 – Voluntary cases

(a) A voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter.

11 U.S.C. 707(a) – Dismissal of a case or conversion to a case under chapter 11 or 13

(a) The court may dismiss a case under this chapter only after notice and a hearing and only for cause, including--

(1) unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to creditors;

(2) nonpayment of any fees or charges required under chapter 123 of title 28; and

(3) failure of the debtor in a voluntary case to file, within fifteen days or such additional time as the court may allow after the filing of the petition commencing such case, the information required by paragraph (1) of section 521, but only on a motion by the United States trustee.

28 U.S.C. 157 – Procedures

(a) Each district court may provide that any or all cases under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11 shall be referred to the bankruptcy judges for the district.

(b)(1) Bankruptcy judges may hear and determine all cases under title 11 and all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11, referred under subsection (a) of this section, and may enter appropriate orders and judgments, subject to review under section 158 of this title.

(2) Core proceedings include, but are not limited to--

(A) matters concerning the administration of the estate;

(B) allowance or disallowance of claims against the estate or exemptions from property of the estate, and estimation of claims or interests for the purposes of confirming a plan under chapter 11, 12, or 13 of title 11 but not the liquidation or estimation of contingent or unliquidated personal injury tort or wrongful death claims against the estate for purposes of distribution in a case under title 11;

(C) counterclaims by the estate against persons filing claims against the estate;

(D) orders in respect to obtaining credit;

(E) orders to turn over property of the estate;

(F) proceedings to determine, avoid, or recover preferences;

(G) motions to terminate, annul, or modify the automatic stay;

(H) proceedings to determine, avoid, or recover fraudulent conveyances;

(I) determinations as to the dischargeability of particular debts;

(J) objections to discharges;

(K) determinations of the validity, extent, or priority of liens;

(L) confirmations of plans;

(M) orders approving the use or lease of property, including the use of cash collateral;

(N) orders approving the sale of property other than property resulting from claims brought by the estate against persons who have not filed claims against the estate;

(O) other proceedings affecting the liquidation of the assets of the estate or the adjustment of the debtor-creditor or the equity security holder relationship, except personal injury tort or wrongful death claims; and

(P) recognition of foreign proceedings and other matters under chapter 15 of title 11.

(3) The bankruptcy judge shall determine, on the judge's own motion or on timely motion of a party, whether a proceeding is a core proceeding under this subsection or is a proceeding that is otherwise related to a case under title 11. A determination that a proceeding is not a core proceeding shall not be made solely on the basis that its resolution may be affected by State law.

(4) Non-core proceedings under section 157(b)(2)(B) of title 28, United States Code, shall not be subject to the mandatory abstention provisions of section 1334(c)(2).

(5) The district court shall order that personal injury tort and wrongful death claims shall be tried in the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending, or in the district court in the district in which the claim arose, as determined by the district court in which the bankruptcy case is pending.

(c)(1) A bankruptcy judge may hear a proceeding that is not a core proceeding but that is otherwise related to a case under title 11. In such proceeding, the bankruptcy judge shall submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court, and any final order or judgment shall be entered by the district judge after considering the bankruptcy judge's proposed findings and conclusions and after reviewing de novo those matters to which any party has timely and specifically objected.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the district court, with the consent of all the parties to the proceeding, may refer a proceeding related to a case under title 11 to a bankruptcy judge to hear and determine and to enter appropriate orders and judgments, subject to review under section 158 of this title.

(d) The district court may withdraw, in whole or in part, any case or proceeding referred under this section, on its own motion or on timely motion of any party, for cause shown. The district court shall, on timely motion of a party, so withdraw a proceeding if the court determines that resolution of the proceeding requires consideration of both title 11 and other laws of the United States regulating organizations or activities affecting interstate commerce.

(e) If the right to a jury trial applies in a proceeding that may be heard under this section by a bankruptcy judge, the bankruptcy judge may conduct the jury trial if specially designated to exercise such jurisdiction by the district court and with the express consent of all the parties.

28 U.S.C. 1334 – Bankruptcy cases and proceedings

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the district courts shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all cases under title 11.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (e)(2), and notwithstanding any Act of Congress that confers exclusive jurisdiction on a court or courts other than the district courts, the district courts shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction of all civil proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in or related to cases under title 11.

(c)(1) Except with respect to a case under chapter 15 of title 11, nothing in this section prevents a district court in the interest of justice, or in the interest of comity with State courts or respect for State law, from abstaining from hearing a particular proceeding arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11.

(2) Upon timely motion of a party in a proceeding based upon a State law claim or State law cause of action, related to a case under title 11 but not arising under title 11 or arising in a case under title 11, with respect to which an action could not have been commenced in a court of the United States absent jurisdiction under this section, the district court shall abstain from hearing such proceeding if an action is commenced, and can be timely adjudicated, in a State forum of appropriate jurisdiction.

(d) Any decision to abstain or not to abstain made under subsection (c) (other than a decision not to abstain in a proceeding described in subsection (c)(2)) is not reviewable by appeal or otherwise by the court of appeals under section 158(d), 1291, or 1292 of this title or by the Supreme Court of the United States under section 1254 of this title. Subsection (c) and this subsection shall not be construed to limit the applicability of the stay provided for by section 362 of title 11, United States Code, as such section applies to an action affecting the property of the estate in bankruptcy.

(e) The district court in which a case under title 11 is commenced or is pending shall have exclusive jurisdiction--

(1) of all the property, wherever located, of the debtor as of the commencement of such case, and of property of the estate; and

(2) over all claims or causes of action that involve construction of section 327 of title 11, United States Code, or rules relating to disclosure requirements under section 327.

I. INTRODUCTION

On August 1, 2008, the debtors, Gregory and Joyce Williams, filed a voluntary petition in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Virginia, Harrisonburg Division. They now challenge the bankruptcy court's determination that their chapter 7 petition is abusive under section 707(b)(2) of title 11 and should be dismissed.

Because Mr. and Mrs. Williams's household income exceeded the applicable median family income amount, the United States Trustee reviewed the case, determined that they had disposable income triggering the presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2), and timely filed a motion to dismiss the case.

In its Memorandum Opinion issued on March 3, 2010, the bankruptcy court found that Mr. and Mrs. Williams had monthly disposable income of $197.07, which created a presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2). It further found that they had not rebutted this presumption. The bankruptcy court thus granted the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. That decision, which was based upon the evidence before the court at that juncture, should be affirmed.

Throughout the proceedings below, Mr. and Mrs. Williams changed the figures on their schedules and means test, first in reaction to the United States Trustee's review, and then in post trial briefing. They also presented revised figures in their opening brief to this Court. None of these recalculations rebut the presumption of abuse that requires their case to be dismissed under section 707(b)(2).

II. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statutory Framework

Most individual debtors seek bankruptcy relief either under chapter 7 or chapter 13. Under chapter 7, "an individual debtor receives an immediate unconditional discharge of personal liability for certain debts in exchange for relinquishing his or her nonexempt assets to a bankruptcy trustee for liquidation and distribution to creditors." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 701–727. By contrast, under chapter 13, "a debtor commits to repay some portion of his or her financial obligations" over a specified period "in exchange for retaining nonexempt assets and receiving a broader discharge of debt than is available under chapter 7." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 1321–1330. Under the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-598, 92 Stat. 2549, a debtor could freely choose whether to file for bankruptcy under chapter 7 or chapter 13. See H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 11.

Responding to perceived shortcomings of the Bankruptcy Code which allowed debtors to obtain chapter 7 relief when they in fact had resources to repay creditors to some extent, Congress held hearings over five years to determine what measures it could adopt "to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 2. As a result of those hearings, Congress determined that it should adopt "needs-based reforms," which would limit the availability of chapter 7 relief to those who Congress believed could not afford to repay a portion of their debts out of future income. Id. at 12.

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA" or "2005 Act") implemented these reforms. Before the 2005 Act, section 707(b) authorized dismissal based on a finding that granting a discharge of debts would be a "substantial abuse" of chapter 7. Before the 2005 Act, section 707(b) also required courts to presume that a debtor was entitled to relief under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. In contrast, the Act now authorizes the bankruptcy court to dismiss a petition filed under chapter 7 or, with the debtor's consent, to convert such a petition to a case under chapters 11 or 13 "if it finds that the granting of relief would be an abuse of the provisions of this chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1).

Congress enacted enforcement provisions to ensure that these reforms would be implemented. Under the 2005 Act, the U.S. Trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator) reviews a chapter 7 debtor's petition and files with the court a statement explaining whether the presumption of abuse arises under section 707(b). 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1). If the U.S. Trustee determines that the presumption of abuse arises, he then files either a motion to dismiss or convert the chapter 7 petition, or a statement explaining why he believes such a motion is not appropriate. 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(2).

The Bankruptcy Code prescribes a specific process for determining if a case is abusive. First, a court is to compare the debtor's annualized “current monthly income” to the “median family income” of a similarly sized family in the debtor’s state. The court calculates a debtor’s “current monthly income” (“CMI”) based on the debtor’s average income for the six calendar months preceding the month of the bankruptcy filing. 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A). If a debtor’s annualized CMI is below the applicable state median family income, the debtor’s case will not be presumed abusive. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(7); see H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 15. Where the debtor's current monthly income exceeds the median family income, however, a means test is used to calculate the debtor's monthly disposable income.

The amount of the debtor's monthly disposable income is determined by following a formula, set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), which subtracts certain necessary expenses from the debtor’s current monthly income, such as the cost of food, clothing, housing, utilities and health care. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii). In addition, the debtor may deduct "monthly payments on account of secured debts," averaged over the 60 months following the date of the petition. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii).

Every debtor in a chapter 7 case who owes primarily consumer debt is required to file a statement of current monthly income and means test calculation in conjunction with their bankruptcy schedules and statement of financial affairs. Fed. R. Bankr. Official Form 22A; 11 U.S.C.§ 521; 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(C) (mandating means test); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(b)(4) (same). In chapter 7 cases, the main purpose of the means test is to calculate monthly disposable income (ability to pay) following the formula set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2), and to determine whether the presumption of abuse arises. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A).

When annualized CMI exceeds the applicable median family income, section 707(b)(2)(A) requires a debtor to calculate his or her monthly disposable income available to repay creditors by reducing CMI by certain enumerated categories of expenses, such as the cost of food, clothing, utilities and health care. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii).[1] In addition, the debtor may deduct "monthly payments on account of secured debts," averaged over the 60 months following the date of the petition. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii).

[1] Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) provides debtors with an extensive list of expenses that a debtor may deduct from current monthly income. These expenses fall into five categories. The first category includes basic expenses and are determined based on IRS regulations. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The second category of expenses allows debtors to claim, if applicable and appropriate to do so, expenses related to the care of disabled, chronically ill or elderly family members. 11

Based on the calculations of the means test, the debtor's monthly disposable income, determined by deducting allowed expenses from CMI, is determined. It is that number that determines whether there is a presumption of abuse. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is less than $109.58 per month (or $6,575 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse does not arise. If the debtor's monthly disposable income is equal to or exceeds $182.50 per month (or $10,950 over 60 months), the presumption of abuse arises. If the above median income debtor's monthly disposable income is between $109.58 and $182.50.67 per month, the presumption of abuse arises if that amount, over 60 months, is sufficient to pay at least 25% of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured debt. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i).

The presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2) can be rebutted if the debtor establishes "special circumstances, such as a serious medical condition or a call or order to active duty in the Armed Forces" and demonstrates that necessary expenses associated with those special circumstances reduce the debtor's current monthly income below the specified benchmarks. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B).

U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II). If the debtor is eligible for chapter 13, the third category allows the debtors to deduct the administrative costs associated with a chapter 13 plan. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(III). The fourth category of expenses, if justified, allows debtors to claim the expenses incurred to send children under the age of 18 to private or public school. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(IV). Finally, the fifth category of expenses allows debtors to claim expenses incurred for home energy costs in excess of the amount proscribed in the first category. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(V).

Even if the presumption of abuse does not arise or is rebutted under section 707(b)(2), a chapter 7 petition may be dismissed for abuse under section 707(b)(3), which requires the bankruptcy court to consider whether "the totality of the circumstances . . . of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B).

B. Statement of Facts

In 2008, the year in which they filed for bankruptcy protection, Mr. and Mrs. Williams's household income exceeded $79,000. United States Trustee Exhibit No 2. They earned in more than $80,000 during 2007. UST Ex. No. 3. As of the date of trial, Mrs. Williams had been employed by Team Electric Service for eight years as an office manager. Trial Tr. at 29. Mr. Williams had been employed by Ksyela Pere et Fils for twelve years as a driver and warehouse employee. Trial Tr. at 7. On their bankruptcy schedule I they listed their annual income as $85,526, which is 131% of the median income in Virginia of $65,342 for a family of two.[2] UST Ex. No. 21.

On their means test, the debtors claimed to have current monthly income of $7,127.24. UST Ex. No. 1. That amount was subsequently revised upwards to $7,601.45 upon discovery that Mr. Williams had not reported all of his overtime. Williams Post-Trial Br. at 3 [Dkt #64] (accepting United States Trustee's income figures). After Mr. and Mrs. Williams calculated their expenses, however, they claimed a negative net monthly income of $611.00. UST Ex. No. 1, Form B22. In addition, Mr. and Mrs. Williams owed more than $30,000 in unsecured debt. UST Ex. No. 1, Schedule F.

Because Mr. and Mrs. Williams earned above average income, the United States Trustee analyzed their filings to determine whether their case should be dismissed under section 707(b)(2). After the United States Trustee's Office completed its investigation of Mr. and Mrs. Williams's schedules, staff members made the adjustments to their calculations, including:

1. Reducing Mr. and Mrs. Williams's telecommunication costs to $100 per month;

[2] Initially, Mr. and Mrs. Williams omitted some of Mr. Williams's overtime pay, bringing their income up to $91,217, which is 140% of the state median. UST Ex. 21.

2. Eliminating $200 per month allowance to Mrs. Williams's adult daughter;

3. Adjusting Mr. and Mrs. Williams's health insurance allowance;[3] and

4. Eliminating Mr. and Mrs. Williams's $162.08 monthly IRA contribution.

See UST Ex. 21; Trial Tr. at 60-61. Based on these adjustments, and others not at issue here, the United States Trustee concluded Mr. and Mrs. Williams had monthly disposable income of $174.82 per month–rather than the negative $611 they had indicated on their means test. See UST Ex. 1, 21; Trial Tr. at 61. The United States Trustee therefore concluded they had enough monthly income to trigger a presumption of abuse because if Mr. and Mrs. Williams paid their creditors $172.82 per month over 60 months they could repay more than 25% of their unsecured debts. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i)(I). On October 22, 2008, the United States Trustee therefore filed a motion to dismiss the case on the basis that Mr. and Mrs. Williams could repay their creditors at least in part and therefore their chapter 7 filing was abusive. [Dkt #17].

[3] Mr. and Mrs. Williams claimed $543 for health insurance costs on their Schedule J. They put $469 for that expense on their means test. The United States Trustee reviewed Mr. and Mrs. Williams's actual pay stubs and concluded that their health insurance cost was $508.92.

At trial, the bankruptcy court heard extensive evidence concerning Mr. and Mrs. Williams's financial situation. It learned that in the two and a half years before filing for bankruptcy, Mr. and Mrs. Williams had taken on a significant amount of secured consumer debt. In 2003, they purchased a 2003 GMC pickup truck for $30,685.00. UST Ex. No. 12. In 2005, they incurred more than $26,000 in debt to purchase a brand new 2006 Pontiac G6. UST Ex. No. 12.

Also in 2005, at approximately the same time that Mrs. Williams identified the onset of their financial problems, she and her husband also purchased an 18-foot Bayliner boat. Trial Tr. at 18. In response to the bankruptcy court's questioning about the decision to buy a boat at that point, Mrs. Williams testified as follows:

> Court: So is it fair to say that beginning in 2005 you started to experience expenses considerably more than what you were bringing home in your pay and that's why you went to the credit cards?
>
> A: It was very, very tight and sometimes yes. And also the date that things were due sometimes we just didn't have it and we were trying, or I was trying to avoid late charges.
>
> Q: And when was the boat purchased?
>
> A: I can tell you it was paid in '07, so probably '05. And that's just a proximity.
>
> Q: And those payments were about $315 a month?
> A: That's correct. Trial Tr. at 47-48.

After purchasing the boat, Mr. and Mrs. Williams purchased a house in 2006. Trial Tr. at 10; UST Ex. Nos. 9-11. They made no down payment on the house but took out an adjustable rate mortgage for $198,000. UST Ex. No. 10. On the same day, they obtained a Credit Line Deed of Trust for $49,500. UST Ex. No. 11; Trial Tr. at 14. At approximately the same time they purchased their home, Mr. and Mrs. Williams financed a new 32 inch LG television. They bought new furniture for the house on credit. They also financed installation of a hot tub. Trial Tr. at 11-12.

By 2007, Mr. and Mrs. Williams paid off the boat in full. Trial Tr. at 49. They have listed the boat as an exempt asset worth $6,400 on their Schedule C.[4] By listing it as exempt, they seek to discharge all their debts but exit bankruptcy with ownership and control of the boat free of all creditor claims.

At the hearing, neither Mr. or Mrs. Williams could pinpoint exactly when or what started their financial problems. Mrs. Williams testified, however, that some medical expenses went up in 2005. Trial Tr. at 47. She also testified that they depended on her husband's overtime work to makes ends meet but that his overtime had been reduced. Trial Tr. at 40.

[4] When a chapter 7 debtor lists an asset as exempt, he or she will be able to keep the asset after their debts have been discharged. 11 U.S.C. § 522. As of the date of filing, and as of the date of the trial conducted in this matter, Mr. and Mrs. Williams were current on their house payment, the payments on their vehicle and, with the exception of the hot tub, all of their furniture and appliance payments. They planned to keep all this property and the boat. UST Ex. 1, Schedule C.

Against the backdrop of Mr. and Mrs. Williams's general financial situation, the trial testimony focused on four disputed expenses. These expenses are at the heart of this case because, if allowed, they would give Mr. and Mrs. Williams monthly disposable income that would not generate a presumption of abuse.

First, Mr. and Mrs. Williams argued that they were entitled to satellite and internet costs of $199 per month, rather than the $100 allocated by the United States Trustee. Trial Tr. at 66.

Second, Mr. and Mrs. Williams claimed entitlement to the $200 per month support payment of Mrs. Williams's 40-year old daughter, Jennifer Swanson. UST Ex. 1, Schedule J. They argued that the daughter needed their help because she had suffered a brutal childhood trauma and had had problems functioning socially ever since. Trial Tr. at 24-25. The United States Trustee has disallowed the cost because Ms. Swanson was able to work and to pursue a master's degree at Strayer University. Trial Tr. at 22-23.

Third, Mr. and Mrs. Williams argued that if they were not entitled to an expense for their monthly IRA contribution, their monthly income tax expense should be increased to reflect the additional tax since they would no longer be able to treat the $162.08 per month as pre-tax income. Trial Tr. at 71.

In response, the United States Trustee questioned the basis for the $86 per month personal property expense levied on the cars registered to Mr. and Mrs. Williams. At trial, Mr. Williams was asked about a Ford Focus on their personal property tax bill that had not been listed on their schedules. After reviewing the bill, Mr. Williams testified "I don't know how that [Ford Focus] got on my personal property tax" and it appeared to be a mistake. He added that he did not think he paid the bill. Trial Tr. at 20-21. There was no testimony regarding what the correct personal property tax expense figure should be.

After the trial, the parties submitted post-trial briefs. Mr. and Mrs. Williams did not raise the IRA issue in their brief. They also did not press their $200 per month expense for Ms. Swanson. Instead, they argued that they were entitled to a personal property tax expense of $49.59, rather than $86. Williams Post-Trial Br. at 3. They argued that under the case law of the Western District of Virginia, they were entitled to $150 in monthly telecommunications expenses, which would include phone and internet. Id. at 4. Based on these expenses, Mr. and Mrs. Williams maintained that they passed the means test, even if the other expenses in dispute were eliminated. Id. at 5.

After reviewing the evidence and testimony, the bankruptcy court ruled that their case should be dismissed because it was abusive under section 707(b)(1). In making that ruling, the bankruptcy court ruled on the parties' disputes about Mr. and Mrs. Williams's appropriate expenses. Specifically:

First, the bankruptcy court denied Mr. and Mrs. Williams's revised personal property tax claim of $49.59 per month because "[t]he Debtors have not produced any evidence in support of [it]." Mem. Op. at 6.

Second, the bankruptcy court rejected Mr. and Mrs. Williams's argument that precedent in the Western District of Virginia entitled them to $150 per month in telecommunications costs. Mem. Op. at 8. The bankruptcy court held that they were only entitled to costs that are "necessary to health and welfare" and not otherwise captured in the IRS expense allowances incorporated into the means test. Id. The bankruptcy court thus limited telecommunication costs to $51 per month to reflect internet costs related to Mr. and Mrs. Williams's employment. Mem. Op. at 9.

Third, the bankruptcy court disallowed the $200 monthly expense for Ms. Swanson, Ms. Williams's adult daughter. Mem. Op. at 10. Mr. and Mrs. Williams did not produce any evidence that the $200 was for actual expenses that were reasonable and necessary for Ms. Swanson's care. Mem. Op. at 11. Nor was there any evidence that she is “elderly, chronically ill, or disabled,” as required in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II).[5] Id.

Based on its rulings, the bankruptcy court calculated that Mr. and Mrs. Williams had monthly disposable income of $197.07, triggering a presumption of abuse under sections 707(b)(1) and (2). Mem. Op. at 12-13. The bankruptcy court then found that Mr. and Mrs. Williams had failed to rebut the presumption of abuse under section 707(b)(2). Mem. Op. at 13. It did not address the United States Trustee’s argument that the case also could be dismissed under subsections 707(b)(1) and (3). Id.

Mr. and Mrs. Williams timely filed a Notice of Appeal.

[5] The bankruptcy court did not address the IRA issue because Mr. and Mrs. Williams had not raised it in their post-trial brief.

III. STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court’s findings of fact are reviewed for clear error and its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. In re White, 487 F.3d 199, 204 (4th Cir. 2007).

IV. SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court dismissed this case, as required by section 707(b)(2), because their disposable income exceeded the statutory maximum for bankruptcy relief. That ruling should be affirmed because the United States Trustee met its burden of proof to demonstrate a prima facie case that Mr. and Mrs. Williams’s income and expenses constituted an abusive filing and they failed to rebut that presumption.

On their original chapter 7 means test, Mr. and Mrs. Williams claimed monthly disposable income of negative $611.11, although their combined income for a family of two was approximately $90,000 per year. The United States Trustee challenged many of their proposed expenses. Relevant to this appeal, the United States Trustee established a prima facie case on three challenged expenses. First that Ms. Williams’s 40-year old daughter was not qualified for family support. Second, Mr. and Mrs. Williams could not justify their personal property expense. Third, that their telecommunications costs were inflated.

In response, Mr. and Mrs. Williams could not provide evidence that they had to support Ms. Swanson because she was disabled. Nor could they include expenses for a Ford Escort on their personal property tax bill that they claimed they did not own. Nor could they explain how $150 per month for telecommunications charges was necessary to maintain their health and welfare. The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error when it disallowed the proposed expenses.

Thereafter, in post-trial briefing, Mr. and Mrs. Williams increased their disposable monthly income from negative $611.11 to $107.56 on a revised means test attached to their brief. [Dkt. #64]. This amount is still below the mandatory level for dismissal, however. On appeal, Mr. and Mrs. Williams proffer revised expense amounts, resulting in a new monthly disposable income figure. On page 3 of their brief to this Court, Mr. and Mrs. Williams claim monthly disposable income of $62.48; on page 8, they claim $68.76. Appellant Br. at 3, 8. All of these figures have one thing in common: they create a monthly disposable income that falls below the section 707(b)(2) cut-off for a presumption of abuse.

This Court need not sift through the documents – here numbering over 800 pages – to determine if any one of hundreds of figures should be adjusted up or down in order to arrive at an accurate calculation of Mr. and Mrs. Williams's net monthly income. It is too late for that. The United States Trustee established his prima facie case and the bankruptcy court relied upon the data adverted by the parties. Mr. and Mrs. Williams had ample opportunity to rebut the presumption of abuse that the United States Trustee established. They failed to do so. The bankruptcy court's ruling derived from the data in the record, is not clearly erroneous, and should be affirmed on the merits.

Even if this Court were to find that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in finding Mr. and Mrs. Williams's case abusive under section 707(b)(2), it could not reverse this case in favor of Mr. and Mrs. Williams. The United States Trustee argued below that the totality of the Mr. and Mrs. Williams's financial circumstances demonstrated an ability to re-pay their creditors, making their case abusive under section 707(b)(3)(B). The statute mandates that a bankruptcy court review a debtor's full financial situation if it finds that the filing is not presumptively abusive. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) (stating that the court "shall" consider the factors in 707(b)(3)(A)&(B) if the presumption of abuse is overcome). The bankruptcy court did not do that analysis because it found Mr. and Mrs. Williams's case to be abusive under section 707(b)(2). If this Court disagrees, then it should remand so that the bankruptcy court can complete the section 707(b)(3)(B) analysis.

V. ARGUMENT

A. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion In Determining that Mr. and Mrs. Williams's Monthly Income Is High Enough to Create a Presumption of Abuse.

On appeal, Mr. and Mrs. Williams do not challenge that the United States Trustee established a prima facie case that their chapter 7 case is presumptively abusive. They do not challenge the bankruptcy court's application of the Bankruptcy Code to their case. Instead they argue that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by not accepting their figures for expenses related to health insurance, personal property tax, and increased taxes due to the disallowance of their IRA contributions. They conclude that, had the bankruptcy court accepted their calculations, their monthly income would fall below the cut-off amount for a presumption of abuse under 707(b)(2). Appellant Br. at 2. The figures that Mr. and Mrs. Williams offer on appeal, however, are inaccurate, unsupported, or both.

As Mr. and Mrs. Williams do not challenge the United States Trustee's prima facie case of abuse, they have the burden of proving the accuracy of their calculations. In re Meade, 420 B.R. 291, 303 (Bankr. W.D. Va. 2009). The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding that they had failed to meet that burden.

In their brief to this Court, Mr. and Mrs. Williams advocate alternative figures for three expense amounts that they argue would change the outcome of the case. The three issues before this Court are:

> 1. The bankruptcy court committed clear error by calculating the debtors' health insurance costs to be $469 per month;
> 2. The bankruptcy court committed clear error by stating that there was no evidence for their claim of an additional $49.59 per month in personal property taxes; and
>
> 3. The United States Trustee should have increased their tax expenses when he disallowed their monthly IRA contribution.

1. Health Insurance

The Williams argue to this Court for the first time in this case that their health insurance costs are more than $469 per month – the number they themselves put on their means test filed with the bankruptcy court on August 1, 2008 and which the bankruptcy court used in its analysis. UST Ex. 1, Form 22A (Means Test Form), Line 34. In contrast, they claimed a payroll deduction of $543 for health insurance on their schedule I (Current Monthly Expenditures), UST Ex. 1, Schedule I. After analyzing the debtor's pay stubs, the United States Trustee concluded their monthly health insurance cost was $508.92. UST Exhibit 21.

This Court is not an appropriate forum for the debtors to refine the accuracy of their calculations. See Tele-Communications, Inc. v. C.I.R., 104 F.3d 1229, 1233 (10th Cir. 1997) (stating that the appellate court "should not be considered a 'second shot' forum . . . where secondary, back-up theories may be mounted for the first time"). Mr. and Mrs. Williams never defended their assertion that $543 was the correct amount for their health insurance costs. They never filed an amended means test correcting the $469 figure for health insurance expenses to bring the issue to the bankruptcy court's attention. They never asked the bankruptcy court to approve the United States Trustee's figure of $508.92, which they have adopted on appeal. Appellant Br. at 3-4.

Mr. and Mrs. Williams did not raise the issue of these conflicting numbers at any time in the proceedings below. They are, therefore, precluded from raising the accuracy of their health insurance cost figure now. Greenberg v. Crossroads Systems, Inc., 364 F.3d 657, 669 (5th Cir. 2004) (stating that prohibition against raising issues on appeal is "especially true where the assertion first raised on appeal is factual"). The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in relying on the $469 figure that Mr. and Mrs. Williams themselves provided on their means test and that was signed under penalty of perjury.

And even if the bankruptcy court used the incorrect figure, and abused its discretion in doing so, the error is harmless. The bankruptcy court found that the debtors have monthly disposable income of $197.07. Mem. Op. at 13. Mr. and

Mrs. Williams claim that the bankruptcy court undervalued their health insurance costs by $39.92 per month. Appellant Br. at 4. Assuming that is true, their monthly disposable income would be $157.15, which is still high enough to create a presumption of abuse. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i)(I); Appellant Br. at 4 (stating that $127.67 in monthly disposable income is the cut-off for a presumption of abuse).

2. Personal Property Tax

Mr. and Mrs. Williams have not produced any credible evidence to support their personal property tax expense. They first claimed $86 per month and then reduced the amount to $49.59. The bankruptcy court was not obligated to delve through the record in order to determine whether Mr. and Mrs. Williams's calculations were correct. Federal Deposit Ins. Corp. v. La Rambla Shopping Center, Inc., 791 F.2d 215, 223 (1st Cir. 1986) (Breyer, J.); see also United States v. Frazier, 394 F.2d 258, 262 (4th Cir. 1968) (stating it is not "incumbent upon the trial judge to rummage through the file on behalf of the defendant."). The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding that Mr. and Mrs. Williams had not justified their personal property tax claim.

Mr. and Mrs. Williams initially claimed $86 per month on their schedule J for personal property tax, for which they provided no explanation. They submitted two property tax bills as trial exhibits, one for $595.11 and the other for $142.59.[6] At the hearing, when asked about a Ford Escort which was on both tax bills, but was not listed as an asset of the debtors, Mr. Williams testified there was an in error in the tax bill. He stated that the Ford Escort might have belonged to his son at some point and that he did not think he paid the tax bill. Trial Tr. at 20-21. There was no other testimony or evidence to support a claim to personal property tax expense.

Mr. and Mrs. Williams attached a revised means test form to their post-trial brief which reduced their personal property tax claim from $86 to $49.59 per month.[7] However, the latter figure is apparently derived by dividing the annual state property tax bill, $595.11, which includes the Ford Escort, by 12 to obtain the revised monthly figure of $49.59. In essence, the debtors are still claiming the property tax on a car Mr. Williams denied owning under oath.

Given the ambiguities in the record and Mr. and Mrs. Williams's failure to clarify them, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in disallowing the personal property tax expense. Even if Mr. and Mrs. Williams were entitled to [6] $595.11 + $142.59 / 12 = $61.47, leaving the $86.00 figure unexplained. The United States Trustee assumes that one bill was for county property tax and the other for town tax, but the debtors do not explain why there are two bills.

[7] Mr. and Mrs. Williams never formally amended any of their schedules.

some personal property tax expense, “[a]n appellate court ‘cannot assume the functions of a special master and roam at large over the record, . . . any attempt on its part to do so would probably do a great deal more harm than good.’” Wheatley v. Wicomico County, 390 F.3d 328, 335 (4th Cir. 2004) (quoting Hutchinson v. Fidelity Inv. Ass'n, 106 F.2d 431, 436 (4th Cir. 1939)). The bankruptcy court judged the credibility of the evidence and testimony before it and did not abuse its discretion when it found that Mr. and Mrs. Williams had not presented “any evidence in support of the property tax.” Mem. Op. at 6.

Again, even if the bankruptcy court improperly denied this expense, the error would be harmless. Even allowing for an additional $49.59 deduction, Mr. and Mrs. Williams would still have monthly disposable income of $147.48, which would trigger the presumption. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(i)(I).

3. IRA Deduction

Finally, Mr. and Mrs. Williams revive the IRA tax argument they alluded to at the hearing below, but did not include in their post-trial brief, and therefore was not addressed in the bankruptcy court’s opinion. Trial Tr. at 5. A legal theory that is not developed is not preserved for appeal. Beaudett v. City of Hampton, 775 F.2d 1274, 1278 (4th Cir. 1985) (“fleeting references” insufficient to preserve questions on appeal) (discussing limits of leniency given to pro se litigants).

Nevertheless, Mr. and Mrs. Williams assert now that they are entitled to additional tax expense based on an IRA contribution that the United States Trustee disallowed. They still do not provide case law or other support for the claim, however. They merely assert that the additional monthly income would be taxed at 24 percent without explaining how that number was reached or providing any evidence of its accuracy. Except for Mr. and Mrs. Williams's bald assertions as to the applicable tax rate, there is nothing for this Court to review.

As with the other expenses, were the bankruptcy court to have abused its discretion, the error would be harmless. Mr. and Mrs. Williams argue that they are entitled to an extra expense of $38.89 per month, which, if granted, would not put their disposable income below their admitted $127 threshold for abuse.

In fact, this Court would have to find that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion on two of the three disputed expense items before it could hold for Mr. and Mrs. Williams on the question of presumption of abuse.

B. Were this Court to Hold that Mr. and Mrs. Williams's Means Test Does Not Raise A Presumption of Abuse, It Should Remand to Consider Whether Dismissal is Appropriate under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3).

If this Court determines that Mr. and Mrs. Williams's case is either not presumptively abusive or that the debtors have rebutted the presumption of abuse, it would have to remand the case. The bankruptcy court must consider whether to dismiss their case based upon either the debtors' bad faith, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or the totality of their financial circumstances. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). This analysis is mandatory. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). It should be done by the bankruptcy court; an appellate court generally may not consider an issue that has not been passed on below. Liberty Corp. v. NCNB Nat. Bank of S.C., 984 F.2d 1383, 1389 (4th Cir. 1993).

VI. CONCLUSION

For the reasons above, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the decision of the bankruptcy court below, or, in the alternate, remand for consideration of whether this case warrants dismissal under section 707(b)(3).

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This appeal arises from a final order issued by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of Georgia (Lamar W. Davis, Jr., C.J.) on September 3, 2008, finding that the chapter 12 debtor Jack M. Williamson committed fraud in connection with his bankruptcy case and therefore he did not have an unqualified right to dismiss his chapter 12 case. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. section 158(a).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

Did the Bankruptcy Court err in holding that the debtor did not have an unqualified right to dismiss his bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. section 1208(b) when the debtor committed fraud in connection with his case and the United States Trustee requested conversion to chapter 7 pursuant to 11 U.S.C. section 1208(d)?

STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

Appellate Courts "independently review the bankruptcy court's decision, applying the 'clearly erroneous' standard to findings of fact and de novo review to conclusions of law'. . . . [Where the issue] poses a mixed question of law and fact, [the court applies] the clearly erroneous standard, unless the bankruptcy court's analysis was 'infected by legal error...'" In re Winthrop Old Farm Nurseries, Inc., 50 F.3d 72, 73 (1st Cir. 1995) (citations omitted). See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013 (standard of appellate review).[1]

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This appeal involves the intersection between 11 U.S.C. sections 1208(b) and (d),[2] specifically whether a chapter 12 debtor has an absolute right to dismiss his case after the debtor has committed fraud. Appellant Jack M. Williamson asserts that a chapter 12 debtor has an unqualified absolute right to dismiss his bankruptcy case pursuant to 11 U.S.C. section 1208(b), which provides as follows:

> On request of the debtor at any time, if the case has not been converted under section 706 or 1112 of this title, the court shall dismiss a case under this chapter. Any waiver of the right to dismiss under this subsection is unenforceable.

Appellant asserts that because he filed his motion to dismiss before another party made a request to convert,[3] he has an unqualified absolute right to dismissal under any circumstances.

The United States Trustee submits that Appellant's fraudulent conduct merits the application of 11 U.S.C. section 1208(d) which provides as follows:

> On request of a party in interest, and after notice and a hearing, the court may dismiss a case under this chapter or convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title upon a showing that the debtor has committed fraud in connection with the case.

The Bankruptcy Court, like the overwhelming majority of courts addressing this issue, held that Appellant, due to his fraudulent conduct, did not have an absolute right to dismiss his chapter 12 case. The court provided four independent reasons why a fraudulent chapter 12 debtor cannot use section 1208(b) to defeat the express language of section 1208(d). First, the Eleventh Circuit has held that section 1208(d) applies in cases of debtor fraud (In re Cotton, 992 F.2d 311 (11th Cir. (M.D. Ga.) 1993)). Second, if courts were to adopt the position of Appellant, the absolute right to dismiss under section 1208(b) would undermine the express authority granted to courts under section1208(d) and would render that subsection

[3] Appellant filed his Motion to Dismiss on June 19, 2008 [District Court Docket No. 6] in the wake of the discovery of his fraudulent activities in connection with his chapter 12 case. useless. Third, the main purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to provide a fresh start for the honest but unfortunate debtor, not to provide a shield for those who exploit the code's protection and then seek to escape judicial authority when their fraudulent schemes are exposed. Fourth, even if section 1208(b) requires dismissal of a chapter 12 case upon a debtor's request, its language does not require immediate dismissal, which means a court may consider a request to convert made subsequent to the debtor's motion to dismiss. Memorandum and Order of September 3, 2008, pp. 8-10, District Court Docket No. 12.

Appellant appeals from the Memorandum and Order, contending that the Bankruptcy Court erred in holding that the debtor did not have an unqualified right for immediate dismissal under section 1208(b).

STATEMENT OF FACTS

There are no facts in dispute. Following the evidentiary hearing of July 18, 2008, the Bankruptcy Court concluded that Appellant committed fraud, finding the case to be "replete with instances of concealment, false statements, and omissions that collectively evidence an intent to manipulate the bankruptcy process." Memorandum and Order of September 3, 2008, p. 11, District Court Docket No. 12. Specifically, the court found that Appellant failed to reveal "that he owned J & K Farms and at least four bank accounts," as well as "a large crop disaster claim."

Id. Appellant continued his fraud on the court by filing "false monthly operating reports concealing large bank balances in the unrevealed accounts" and "concealed numerous large FSA deposits to his accounts." Id. Finally, "he withdrew large sums of money from one of the accounts, ... apparently the proceeds of his unrevealed crop disaster claim, and hid it in a corn bin from which he claims it has allegedly been stolen." Id. The Bankruptcy Court concluded Appellant's conduct to be "indefensible under any standard of conduct for debtors under bankruptcy protection, amounts to fraud on the Court and his creditors, and presents a text-book case for conversion under § 1208(d)." Id. at 12.

Appellant did not appeal the judicial finding of fraud. To the extent that 11 U.S.C. section 1208(d) requires "a showing that the debtor has committed fraud in connection with the case," Appellant concedes that such a showing occurred.

The only other facts relevant to this appeal are the dates of Appellant's Motion to Dismiss and Appellee's Objection thereto. Appellant filed his Motion to Dismiss on June 19, 2008 [District Court Docket No. 6] after the discovery of fraudulent activities in connection with his chapter 12 case. Appellee United States Trustee filed an Objection the next day on June 20, 2008, requesting conversion to chapter 7 [District Court Docket No. 7].

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Appellant contends that subsection 1208(b) of the Bankruptcy Code gives chapter 12 debtors an absolute right to dismiss their bankruptcy cases. See 11 U.S.C. § 1208(b) (upon a debtor's request for dismissal "at any time" the court "shall dismiss" the case). Typically this is so. But in cases like this, where the debtor has engaged in fraud, subsection 1208(d) governs because it expressly authorizes courts to convert a chapter 12 case to chapter 7 if the debtor has committed fraud. 11 U.S.C. § 1208(d) ("[o]n request of a party in interest, and after notice and a hearing, the court may dismiss a case under this chapter or convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title upon a showing that the debtor has committed fraud in connection with the case."). This more specific provision, dealing only with fraud cases, governs here, rather than the more general provision allowing for dismissal of chapter 12 cases.

With a virtually unanimous voice, courts have concluded that a chapter 12 debtor's general right under section 1208(b) to voluntarily dismiss a case gives way to the more specific rule in subsection 1208(d) that courts can convert cases involving debtor fraud to a chapter 7 liquidation proceeding. The court below followed the majority rule. Its ruling on this point merits affirmance by this Court.

Further support for the lower court's reading is drawn from the text of subsection 1208(e). That subsection provides that "[n]otwithstanding any other provision of this section," a case cannot be converted to another chapter if the debtor is ineligible to be a debtor in that chapter. 11 U.S.C. § 1208(e). Significantly, Congress did not put this "notwithstanding" language into section 1208(b), which supports the bankruptcy court's conclusion that the general right to dismiss is tempered by the court's power under section 1208(d) to convert instead in fraud-specific cases. If section 1208(b) had stated a debtor could dismiss "notwithstanding" section 1208(d), then section 1208(b) would control. The lack of such language in 1208(b) indicates that the more specific provision of 1208(d) should apply in cases of debtor fraud.

The lower court's conversion can also be affirmed as an exercise of the court's inherent power to sanction bad faith conduct. That right is universally recognized. Although chapter 12 debtors typically can dismiss their cases under subsection 1208(b), when as here they engage in bad faith, bankruptcy courts have inherent to sanction such conduct by denying dismissal.

Finally, Appellant's status as a "farmer" under 11 U.S.C. section 101(20) is irrelevant to this case. Appellant was never placed into an "involuntary" chapter 7 case as an initial matter. Rather, Appellant filed a voluntary chapter 12 case and thus subjected himself to all provisions in chapter 12, including section 1208(d).

ARGUMENT AND CITATION OF AUTHORITY

I. As between subsections 1208(b) and (d), subsection (d) is more specific to debtor fraud and therefore (d) is applicable.

A fundamental rule of statutory construction is that a more specific provision controls over a general one. Nat’l Cable & Telecommunications Ass'n, Inc. v. Gulf Power Co., 534 U.S. 327, 335 (2002) (specific statutory language controls over more general language when there is conflict); Clifford F. MacEvoy Co. v. U.S. for Use and Benefit of Calvin Tomkins Co., 322 U.S. 102, 107 (1944) (specific terms prevail over general in same or another statute which otherwise might be controlling); Medberry v. Crosby, 351 F.3d 1049 (11th Cir. 2003) (canon of statutory construction provides that the more specific takes precedence over the more general); Nguyen v. U.S., 2008 WL 4631719 (11th Cir. 2008) (to extent of any overlap, the more specific statutory provision trumps the general one).

Given this rule of construction, subsection (d) should apply to the case. Subsection (b) and its provision for voluntary dismissal applies in a general manner to all chapter 12 debtors, whereas subsection (d) applies to a more specific group - the atypical debtor who commits fraud in connection with the bankruptcy case. Thus, subsection (d) is more narrowly tailored to fit this situation. To the extent that the more specific statutory provision applies, subsection (d) fits the bill.

II. The right to dismiss under subsection1208(b) should not be construed in isolation.

Appellant argues that subsection 1208(b) mandates dismissal regardless of any provision for conversion in situations of debtor fraud. Appellant focuses only on the words "[o]n request of the debtor at any time, ... the court shall dismiss a case under this chapter" to the detriment of other parts of the statute, which is inconsistent with proper construction.

> When interpreting a statute we look not only to the express language, however, but also to the overall purpose of the act. The Supreme Court has directed that we not "construe statutory phrases in isolation." [cit.] We must also consider "the design of the statute as a whole and ... its object and policy." [cit.]

Graven v. Fink (In re Graven), 936 F.2d 378, 385 (8th Cir. 1991).

The words "at any time" and "shall dismiss" should not be construed in isolation to grant an absolute right to immediate dismissal. Subsection (b) should be read in conjunction with section 1208 as a whole, including (d)'s provision for conversion to chapter 7 in cases of debtor fraud. Moreover, the phrase "[o]n request of the debtor at any time" refers to the time frame in which a debtor may make the request; it does not speak to the circumstances under which dismissal may occur. At most, the phrase confers the right to seek dismissal without regard to time frame, not an absolute right to dismiss under any circumstances.

III. Cases addressing the interplay between subsections 1208(b) and (d) hold that subsection (d) is applicable in cases of debtor fraud.

Almost every court addressing the interplay between subsections 1208(b) and (d) has agreed that subsection (d) applies when a chapter 12 debtor commits fraud, even if the debtor has filed a motion to dismiss under subsection (b). See Graven v. Fink (In re Graven), 936 F.2d 378 (8th Cir. 1991); In re Cotton, 992 F.2d 311 (11th Cir. (M.D. Ga.) 1993) (debtor has absolute right to dismissal if debtor has not engaged in fraud); In re Foster, 121 B.R. 961 (Bankr. N.D. Texas 1990) (when facts show that debtors have abused legal process and bankruptcy process through fraud, bankruptcy court has authority to convert chapter 12 case to chapter 7 liquidation, even though debtors have filed motion to dismiss chapter 12 case); In re Cromer Farms, Inc., 2000 WL 33740256 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. July 18, 2000) (stating “the court agrees with cases that hold that a debtor's right to voluntarily dismiss a Chapter 12 case is not unlimited” and “it was not Congress's intent in enacting § 1208(b) of the Code that chapter 12 become ‘a frequently traveled thoroughfare for the unscrupulous seeking to hinder, delay and defraud their creditors.’"); In re Goza, 142 B.R. 766 (Bankr. S.D. Miss. 1992) (court may delay action on debtor's voluntary dismissal until debtor provides an accounting); In re Neal, 181 B.R. 560 (D. Utah 1995) (if party in interest requests conversion for fraud under section 1208(d) before court acts on debtor's motion to dismiss, bankruptcy court may convert case); In re Red Cliff Farms, Inc., 1994 WL 324560 (D. Kan., June 23, 1994). But see In re Davenport, 175 B.R. 355 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1994) (chapter 12 debtors have unqualified right to dismissal).

The seminal case is Graven v. Fink (In re Graven), 936 F.2d 378 (8th Cir. 1991), in which the Eighth Circuit addressed the tension between the competing subsections. In Graven, the trustee discovered that chapter 12 debtors had concealed transfers of real and personal property into a family-owned corporation for no consideration. When the debtors moved to dismiss their case under subsection 1208(b), the trustee filed a motion to convert the case to chapter 7 based on the fraudulent conduct. The bankruptcy court rejected the debtor's argument about an absolute right to dismiss and converted their case to chapter 7. The district court affirmed and the debtors appealed to the Eighth Circuit.

The Eighth Circuit began its analysis by explaining that the purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to protect the honest debtor, not to provide a shield for those who "exploit the code's protection then seek to escape judicial authority when their fraudulent schemes are exposed." Id. at 385. Quoting the bankruptcy court, the Eighth Circuit explained:

> To adopt the interpretation of § 1208(b) and (d) favored by the debtors ... would lead to endless abuse of the bankruptcy process ... and would > clearly thwart the clear purpose of Chapter 12, which is to provide relief for the honest debtor, and the intent of Congress in adopting § 1208(d).

>
> Recognizing an absolute right to dismissal under section 1208(b) would also completely undermine the express authority Congress granted the courts under section 1208(d) and would render that subsection useless.
>
> We conclude that the broad purpose of the bankruptcy code, including Chapter 12, is best served by interpreting section 1208(d) to allow a court to convert a case to Chapter 7 upon a showing of fraud even though the debtor has moved for dismissal under subsection (b).

Id. at 385-86.

The Eighth Circuit concluded its analysis by noting that the Gravens, like the instant Appellant, were attempting to evade the ramifications of their own misconduct:

> The Gravens filed their motion to dismiss one year and seventy-three days after filing their Chapter 12 petition. Having enjoyed the code's protection for that period of time, they abruptly sought dismissal just as the bankruptcy court prepared to hear the evidence of their wrongdoing. We are convinced that the broad purposes of the bankruptcy code are not served by such cynical manipulation of the bankruptcy process. We therefore hold that once fraud has become an issue in a case, the court may delay action on a section 1208(b) motion for dismissal long enough to allow an investigation of the alleged fraud. If fraud is shown, the court may, under 11 U.S.C. § 1208(d), convert the Chapter 12 case to Chapter 7 despite the debtor's motion to dismiss.

Id. at 387.

IV. The case cited by Appellant is unpersuasive and is at tension with the recent Supreme Court decision In re Maramma.

In support of his argument that subsection 1208(b) always provides an absolute right to dismiss, the debtor relies upon In re Davenport, 175 B.R. 355 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1994). Davenport is the only case to conclude that subsection 1208(b) provides an absolute right to dismiss in the context of debtor fraud. In Davenport, after it was discovered that the debtor had committed fraud, the debtor filed a motion to dismiss his chapter 12 case. A creditor then requested that the court hold the debtor's voluntary dismissal in abeyance until the creditor could file a counter-motion to convert the case to chapter 7. The bankruptcy court originally granted the creditor's request on the basis of authority from other jurisdictions (such as In re Graven, supra) and issued a formal order, over the opposition of the debtor, ruling that the debtor's dismissal could be delayed to allow an investigation of fraud. Davenport, 175 B.R. at 355-56.

On April 12, 1994, seven days before the hearing on the creditor's counter-motion, the Ninth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel issued In re Beatty, 162 B.R. 853 (9th Cir. BAP 1994), construing a chapter 13 debtor's right to dismiss as absolute even when a competing creditor's motion to convert is pending. Davenport, 175 B.R. at 356 (citing Beatty). The debtor in Davenport renewed his request for immediate dismissal, asking the bankruptcy court to review Beatty.

The bankruptcy court then reversed its prior ruling and held that a chapter 12 debtor has an unqualified right to dismiss even if the debtor's good faith is in question. The court's reliance on Beatty is apparent from the following excerpt:

> Prior to issuing its memorandum decision directing dismissal of debtors' case, the court twice accepted this line of cases urged by Bank [holding debtor's right to dismiss under 1208(b) is limited by 1208(d) in situations of fraud]. However, upon reflection and consideration of the case law, including the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel's decision in In re Beatty, 162 B.R. 853 (9th Cir. BAP 1994), the court rejects this authority in favor of determining debtors' right to dismiss under section 1208(b) to be unqualified.

Davenport, 175 B.R. at 357. Thus, the decision in Davenport was based upon the precedential authority of the Ninth Circuit BAP in Beatty.

Thirteen years after Beatty, the Supreme Court of the United States decided the case of Marrama v. Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, 549 U.S. 365, 127 S.Ct. 1105 (2007), holding that a debtor's right under 11 U.S.C. § 706(a) to convert a chapter 7 case to chapter 13 did not apply when the debtor has engaged in bad faith. The Supreme Court read 11 U.S.C. § 1307(c), which allows dismissal of bad faith cases, to mean that bad faith debtors cannot obtain chapter 13 relief. Because they are not eligible for such relief, bad faith debtors cannot exercise their right under section 706(a) to convert. Id.

Subsequent to Marrama, the Ninth Circuit addressed a bankruptcy debtor's "absolute" right to dismiss/convert in the face of debtor fraud. Rosson v.

Fitzgerald (In re Rosson),[4] 545 F.3d. 764 (9th Cir. (Wash.) 2008). In Rosson, the Ninth Circuit expressly abrogated Beatty, and held that bad faith conduct precludes a debtor from utilizing an otherwise unqualified right under the Code:

> The conflict between § 1307(b) and (c) has divided courts, including two of our sister circuits, with some courts holding that a debtor has an absolute right to dismiss under § 1307(b), notwithstanding pending motions to convert under § 1307(c), while other courts hold that a bankruptcy court retains the power to convert a case under § 1307(c), even in the face of a debtor's request for dismissal under § 1307(b).

Rosson, 545 F.3d at 771.

The debtors' original brief in Rosson argued that subsection 1307(b) provided an absolute right to dismiss (citing Beatty and other cases), but the Marrama decision occurred in the interim, and the Ninth Circuit described the change in the law as follows:

> Although we have not weighed in on this question, our circuit's Bankruptcy Appellate Panel (BAP) adopted the "absolute right" approach in Beatty. [cit. omitted] In his opening brief, Rosson argues

[4] In Rosson v. Fitzgerald (In re Rosson), 545 F.3d. 764 (9th Cir. (Wash.) 2008), a chapter 13 debtor acted in defiance of a bankruptcy court order by failing to deposit $185,000 in arbitration proceeds with the chapter 13 trustee. Instead, the debtor used a substantial portion of the proceeds to remodel his home. When the trustee and bankruptcy court discovered the situation, the debtor invoked his right to withdraw from bankruptcy under 11 U.S.C. § 1307(b) and requested dismissal. The bankruptcy court denied the motion, stating that it would be a "gross miscarriage of justice to allow [Rosson] to dismiss this case and abscond with [estate] proceeds." Rosson, 545 F.3d at 769. The district court affirmed the decision and the debtor appealed to the Ninth Circuit.

> that we should follow and adopt Beatty and hold that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by refusing to grant his request for dismissal, which was filed prior to the court's formal order converting the case to Chapter 7.
> After Rosson filed his opening brief, however, the Supreme Court issued Marrama v. Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, – U.S. –, 127 S.Ct. 1105, 166 L.Ed.2d 956 (2007). In Marrama, the Court firmly rejected the analysis that the [Ninth Circuit] BAP applied in Croston - the case that followed and reaffirmed Beatty - and implicitly abrogated Beatty as well.
>
> After Marrama, ... the ‘absolute right’ position is no longer viable.
>
> Moreover, although Marrama did not address the exact issue decided in Beatty, it is clear that, after Marrama, Beatty too is no longer good law, insofar as it holds that a Chapter 13 debtor has an absolute right to dismiss under § 1307(b).

Rosson, 545 F.3d at 772-73.

Thus, the case cited in Appellant’s brief (Davenport), which is the only case to hold that subsection 1208(b) provides an absolute right to dismiss in the context of debtor fraud, is no longer good law, having been implicitly overruled by circuit precedent. Davenport relied heavily upon Beatty, a Ninth Circuit BAP decision which has been expressly abrogated by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.

V. The only Eleventh Circuit opinion addressing a debtor's right to dismiss under subsection 1208(b) indicates that the right is limited by debtor fraud.

The Eleventh Circuit addressed a chapter 12 debtor's right to dismiss under section 1208(b) the case In re Cotton, 992 F.2d 311 (11th Cir. 1993), in which the circuit made the following statement: "[w]e hold that the debtor does have a right to immediate dismissal, provided that the case has not been converted to an involuntary proceeding and the debtor has not engaged in fraud that would make immediate dismissal unjust." In re Cotton, 992 F.2d at 312. Although Cotton does not describe how subsections (b) and (d) interrelate, it did hold that, at a minimum, courts can delay dismissal in bad faith cases.

Appellant suggests that this statement in Cotton supports his argument that subsection 1208(b) provides a fraudulent debtor with the right to immediate dismissal under any circumstances (i.e. dismissal that occurs instantly upon the filing of a motion to dismiss). Appellant argues that the second part of the statement should be ignored because the court in Cotton was not adjudicating a situation involving debtor fraud and therefore the second phrase is meaningless dicta. Appellant's Brief, p. 13-14.

Appellant's argument is without merit. First, the Eleventh Circuit clearly intended the entire statement to provide guidance about a chapter 12 debtor's right to dismiss and the limitations thereof. For purposes of the instant appeal, the statement supports the underlying ruling that a chapter 12 debtor's right to dismiss is limited by section 1208(d) in cases of debtor fraud. Second, as explained by the Eighth Circuit, "[n]othing in subsection (b) requires that a court act immediately upon a debtor's request for a voluntary dismissal." Graven, 936 F.2d at 385; see also In re Neal, 181 B.R. 560 (D. Utah 1995) (section 1208(b) does not mandate immediate dismissal, and thus, if, before bankruptcy court acts on debtor's dismissal request, party in interest requests conversion for fraud under section 1208(d), bankruptcy court may convert case); In re Red Cliff Farms, Inc., 1994 WL 324560 at *2 (D. Kan., June 23, 1994) ("neither Chapter 12 nor Chapter 13 contains language indicating that such a dismissal, even if mandatory, must occur immediately.")

VI. Appellant's construction leads to inequitable results.

The Appellant's suggestion that subsection 1208(b) bestows an "immediate" and unconditional right to dismissal would lead to absurd and unwanted results. It should make no difference that Appellant filed his motion to dismiss one day before the United States Trustee filed a responsive pleading requesting conversion to chapter 7. The central concern is the fraud itself, not who wins a race to the courthouse once a debtor realizes that his fraud has been discovered.

VII. Alternatively, the bankruptcy court's ruling can be affirmed as an exercise of its inherent power to sanction bad faith conduct, a power that is augmented by 11 U.S.C. § 105(a).

Courts of law possess a "'well-acknowledged' inherent power ... to levy sanctions in response to abusive litigation practices." Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752, 765 (1980) (citing Link v. Wabash R.R., 370 U.S. 626, 632 (1962)). "It has long been understood that '[c]ertain implied powers must necessarily result to our Courts of justice from the nature of their institution,' powers 'which cannot be dispensed with in a Court, because they are necessary to the exercise of all others.'" Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 43 (1991) (quoting United States v. Hudson, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 32, 34 (1812)). "These powers are 'governed not by rule or statute but by the control necessarily vested in courts to manage their own affairs so as to achieve the orderly and expeditious disposition of cases.'" Ibid. (quoting Link, 370 U.S. at 630-631). One "primary aspect" of a court's inherent powers is "the ability to fashion an appropriate sanction for conduct which abuses the judicial process." Chambers, 501 U.S. at 44-45. A court thus confronted with a party's bad faith in seeking judicial relief or in litigating an action has the discretion to respond with a variety of sanctions.

The Eleventh Circuit, like all circuits, recognizes that bankruptcy courts possess the inherent power to sanction misconduct. See In re Mroz, 65 F.3d 1567, 1575 (11th Cir. 1995) (the fact that rules such as Rule 11 and Bankruptcy Rule 9011 have been promulgated by Congress does not displace a court's inherent power to impose sanctions for a parties' bad faith conduct); Jove Engineering Inc. v. IRS, 92 F.3d 1539, 1153 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Courts have inherent contempt powers in all proceedings, including bankruptcy, to 'achieve the orderly and expeditious disposition of cases.'").

A clear expression of congressional intent is required to displace a court's inherent power to sanction bad faith conduct. Chambers, 501 U.S. at 47. Accordingly, although "the exercise of the inherent power of lower federal courts can be limited by statute and rule," this Court will '"not lightly assume that Congress has intended to depart from established principles,' such as the scope of a court's inherent power." Ibid. (quoting Weinberger v. Romero-Barcelo, 456 U.S. 305, 313 (1982)).

The Bankruptcy Code, far from displacing the inherent powers of courts, expressly recognizes a bankruptcy court's authority to sanction litigants for abusive litigation practices. The Code states that "[n]o provision of this title providing for the raising of an issue by a party in interest shall be construed to preclude the court from, sua sponte, taking any action or making any determination necessary or appropriate to enforce or implement court orders or rules, or to prevent an abuse of process." 11 U.S.C. 105(a) (emphasis added); see 132 CONG. REC. 28, 610 (1986) (statement of Sen. Hatch) (section 105(a) "allows a bankruptcy court to take any action on its own, or to make any necessary determination to prevent an abuse of process and to help expedite a case in a proper and justified manner"). It is well established that bankruptcy courts have the power to sanction parties for bad faith conduct in bankruptcy proceedings.

To be sure, section 105(a) does not empower bankruptcy courts to act contrary to other direct commands of the Code. Cf. Northwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988) ("whatever equitable powers remain in the bankruptcy courts must and can only be exercised within the confines of the Bankruptcy Code"). But section 105(a) expressly cautions against reading provisions to confer an absolute right that would trump a court's ability to sanction misconduct. More broadly, section 105(a) reflects Congress's intent not to displace the established power of courts to impose appropriate orders to prevent an abuse of process. Thus, absent an express provision in the Code that limits a court's inherent power, the bankruptcy court retains the discretion to impose appropriate sanctions in response to a litigant's bad faith.

Subsection 1208(b) does not expressly address, much less limit, a court's inherent power to sanction bad faith conduct. The statutory text, at most, gives rise to a presumptive right of the debtor to dismissal; it does not restrict, either expressly or implicitly, the ability of the court to exercise its inherent power to respond to abusive tactics or bad faith by the debtor. In keeping with the approach expressed in section 105(a), such a provision should not be read to prevent courts from "taking any action ... to prevent an abuse of process." 11 U.S.C. 105(a).

When a debtor intentionally misrepresents his financial condition in the bankruptcy proceeding, it is appropriate for a bankruptcy court to exercise its inherent power by denying the debtor's request for withdrawal from bankruptcy. Such misconduct constitutes an egregious abuse of the bankruptcy system, which has always limited relief to the "honest but unfortunate" debtor. Local Loan Co. v. Hunt, 292 U.S. 234, 244-245 (1934) (emphasis added). "[T]he successful functioning of the bankruptcy act hinges both upon the bankrupt's veracity and his willingness to make a full disclosure" of his assets and financial condition. Boroff v. Tully (In re Tully), 818 F.2d 106, 110 (1st Cir. 1987); In re Little, 245 B.R. 351, 353-354 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2000) ("Perhaps to a greater degree than any other segment of our justice system, Bankruptcy depends on the integrity of the information supplied by its principal participant, the debtor.")

Accordingly, Appellee United States Trustee submits that the Bankruptcy Court properly exercised its inherent power, as supported by § 105(a), to sanction

Appellant's misconduct by denying his motion to dismiss and converting the case to chapter 7. See Marrama, 549 U.S. 365, 127 S.Ct. at 1111-12. ("Indeed, as the Solicitor General has argued in his brief amicus curiae, even if § 105(a) had not been enacted, the inherent power of every federal court to sanction 'abusive litigation practices' [cit. omitted] might well provide an adequate justification for a prompt, rather than a delayed, ruling on a unmeritorious attempt to qualify as a debtor under Chapter 13"); see also Marrama, 549 U.S. 365, 127 S.Ct at 1116-17 (wherein Justice Alito, speaking for the dissent, states "Ultimately, § 105(a) and a bankruptcy court's inherent power may have a role to play in a case such as this . . . . Bankruptcy courts have used their statutory and equitable authority to craft various remedies for a range of bad faith conduct" and cites section 105(a) and the use of inherent power by various bankruptcy courts in Footnotes 4 - 9).

VIII. The Appellant's status as a "farmer" under 11 U.S.C. section 101(20) does not preclude conversion to chapter 7.

Appellant contends his status as "farmer" under 11 U.S.C. section 101(20) precludes conversion to chapter 7. As support for this proposition, he relies upon 11 U.S.C. section 303(a) which states that an involuntary chapter 7 case may not be filed against a farmer. These code sections are inapplicable to this case. First, Appellant was never placed in an involuntary chapter 7 bankruptcy. He filed a voluntary chapter 12 bankruptcy and thus subjected himself to all applicable Code provisions, including section 1208(d). As the district court noted in In re Red Cliff, 1994 WL 324560 at *2 (D. Kan., June 23, 1994), “a debtor obtains important and tangible advantages through filing a petition under Chapter 12. If chapter 12 debtors were allowed subsequently to dismiss the case immune from scrutiny for fraud, ‘Chapter 12 would quickly change from an avenue for the ‘honest, but unfortunate debtor’ seeking to get a fresh start to a frequently traveled thoroughfare for the unscrupulous seeking to hinder, delay and defraud their creditors.’” Red Cliff, 1994 WL 324560 at *2 (citing In re Goza, 142 B.R. at 771).

Second, Appellant’s broad interpretation of section 303(a) would mean that a chapter 12 case could never be converted without the debtor’s consent. Such a reading would render section 1208(d), and its provision for conversion in cases of fraud, utterly superfluous.

Appellant’s Brief at page 15 cites section 1112(c) which provides that “the court may not convert a case under this chapter [11] to a case under chapter 7 of this title if the debtor is a farmer ... unless the debtor requests such a conversion.” Section 1112(c) is entirely inapplicable here. Appellant did not file a chapter 11 case; he filed a chapter 12 case and subjected himself to all sections of chapter 12, including 1208(d) and the possibility of conversion upon a showing of fraud.

IX. It was appropriate for the Bankruptcy Court to convert the case to chapter 7.

On page 12 of his Brief, Appellant argues that conversion to chapter 7 was unnecessary because "it only provides creditors/trustees the ability to bring adversarial proceedings for non-dischargeability of debt" and "[i]f the Debtor's case was dismissed, the Debtor would still be liable as the Debtor has not received a discharge." Appellant's Brief, p. 12.

Appellant is correct that conversion allowed the United States Trustee to seek denial of discharge under 11 U.S.C. section 727 based upon Appellant's concealment of assets. But conversion was appropriate for other reasons, namely (1) it was difficult to know if there was/is equity for distribution to creditors due to Appellant's dishonesty with respect to his assets; (2) a neutral chapter 7 trustee is best suited to make a determination about equity and to identify avoidance actions; (3) the adversary under 11 U.S.C. section 727 is beneficial to creditors in that all debts will remain in existence; and (4) at the evidentiary hearing on July 18, 2008, and subsequently, Appellant's creditors supported conversion to chapter 7. See Objection to Appellant's Motion to Dismiss filed June 23, 2008 by Peoples Bank (District Court Docket No. 8); Objection to Appellant's Motion to Dismiss filed July 3, 2008 by Montgomery Bank (District Court Docket No. 9).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the Appellee United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered below.

STATEMENT OF APPELLEE, THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE, IN RESPONSE TO JURISDICTIONAL QUESTION RAISED BY THE COURT

1. On April 9, 2009, this Court issued a Memorandum to Counsel or Parties, asking the parties to address whether the Court has jurisdiction over this appeal. This Court does have jurisdiction for the reasons given below.[1]

2. Appellant Jack Williamson filed a voluntary motion to dismiss his chapter 12 case, which the United States Trustee opposed because the Appellant had committed bankruptcy fraud. The United States Trustee requested conversion to chapter 7, as opposed to dismissal. The bankruptcy court found that Appellant had committed fraud, denied his motion to dismiss, and converted the case to chapter 7.

[1] The question posed by the Court was framed as follows: Whether this Court has jurisdiction to review the district court's March 4, 2009, order and judgment affirming the bankruptcy court's order converting the debtor's Chapter 12 case to Chapter 7 and denying his motion to dismiss the case? See 28 U.S.C. § 158(a); 11 U.S.C. § 1208(d); Barben v. Donovan (In re Donovan), 532 F.3d 1134, 1136-37 (11th Cir. 2008).

3. The United States Trustee believes it is important to clarify that courts of appeal have jurisdiction to review an order converting a bankruptcy case from chapter 12 to 7 and denying a motion to dismiss.[2] Two separate statutes provide this jurisdiction. First, 28 U.S.C. § 158(d) allows this Court to consider appeals from "all final decisions, judgments, orders, and decrees" entered in a bankruptcy case. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(d). Second, 28 U.S.C. § 1291 provides jurisdiction for this Court to consider appeals from "all final decisions" of a district court concerning, inter alia, a bankruptcy case below. See 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

[2] The United States Trustee Program reviews bankruptcy cases for abuse and files thousands of motions to dismiss in Chapter 7 cases annually. For example, in fiscal year 2007, United States Trustees, according to United States Trustee Program records, filed 3,370 motions to dismiss under section 707(b)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code in judicial districts throughout the United States. Further, United States Trustees are statutorily responsible for supervising the administration of all bankruptcy cases, in all federal judicial districts other than those located in North Carolina and Alabama. See 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3).

because it provides for jurisdiction over “judgments” and “orders” and “decrees” in addition to “final decisions.” The statutory text indicates that this Court takes a broad view when determining questions of power to consider the merits of this appeal.

5. Under section 158(d), an order converting a chapter 12 bankruptcy case to one under chapter 7 and denying a debtor’s motion to dismiss, is a final, appealable order under the broad language of 28 U.S.C. § 158(d) for two reasons.

6. First, conversion of a chapter 12 case to one under chapter 7 dramatically affects the outcome of a bankruptcy case: in a chapter 12 case, a debtor reorganizes over time, and remains in possession of his property during the reorganization process. See 11 U.S.C. § 1207(b). In contrast, upon conversion to chapter 7, a debtor’s assets are liquidated for the benefit of creditors in as expeditious a manner as possible. Moreover, a debtor will not receive a discharge in chapter 12 until his repayment plan is complete, see 11 U.S.C. § 1228, whereas upon conversion to chapter 7, a debtor generally receives his discharge shortly after conversion.

7. Second, conversion of a chapter 12 case to one under chapter 7 conclusively adjudicates the question of whether a debtor has an absolute right to dismiss his chapter 12 case. When conversion to chapter 7 occurs, a bankruptcy debtor no longer has the opportunity to claim an absolute right to dismiss. Rather, upon conversion a debtor must show "cause" in order to obtain a dismissal of his bankruptcy case. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(a). At the same time a debtor whose case has been converted, no longer has the opportunity to reconvert his case to another chapter. See 11 U.S.C. § 706(a) (providing that chapter 7 debtor may only reconvert to chapter 11, 12, or 13 if case has not previously been converted under sections 1112, 1208, or 1307 of the Bankruptcy Code). Accordingly, as part of the process of converting from one chapter to another, the discrete issue of a debtor's alleged absolute right to dismiss his chapter 12 case is adjudicated in a complete and final manner.

8. Barben v. Donovan (In re Donovan), does not mandate dismissal. It did not address the question here - whether an order affirmatively converting a case is final. Instead, it ruled an order denying relief, a motion to dismiss, was interlocutory. There is a fundamental difference between orders affirmatively granting relief and those that deny relief.

9. Nor is there even a hard and fast rule whether denials of motions to dismiss are final. For example, the Donovan decision relied upon a Seventh Circuit decision, Jartran, for the proposition that denials of dismissals are interlocutory. See In re Donovan, 532 F.3d at 1137 (citing In re Jartran, 886 F.2d 859, 864 (7th Cir. 1989). But, a subsequent Seventh Circuit decision ruled that Jartran set no hard and fast rule. See In re Ross Tousey, 549 F.3d 1148, 1153 n.2 (7th Cir. 2008). A court must evaluate the facts of each denial in determining whether a particular denial is final. Id. In Ross Tousey, that factual analysis led the court to rule that the denial of that particular motion to dismiss was final. Id.

10. This Court also does not treat all denials of motions to dismiss as interlocutory. To the contrary, this Court, sitting en banc, post-Donovan, reached the merits of an appeal from an order denying a motion to dismiss a bankruptcy case. In re Trusted Net Media Holdings, LLC, 550 F.3d 1035 (11th Cir. 2008). In Trusted Net Media, the United States, acting as amicus:

    (a) raised the issue of whether denials of motions to dismiss are always interlocutory within this Circuit,

    (b) brought to this Court's attention the 2008 panel decision in Donovan, and

    (c) argued nonetheless that the bankruptcy court order in Trusted Net Media was final.

See EN BANC BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE

SUPPORTING APPELLEE, at pages 8-11 (copy attached).

11. It would appear this Court agreed with the United States that the bankruptcy court order denying the motion to dismiss in Trusted Net Media was a final order, because this Court reached the merits in Trusted Net Media, which it could not have done had the underlying order been interlocutory. In re Walker, 515 F.3d 1204, 1210 (11th Cir. 2008) (court of appeals has jurisdiction over only final judgments and orders arising from bankruptcy proceeding, whereas district court may review interlocutory judgments and orders as well).

12. Given all this, it is not surprising that other circuits have treated conversion orders as final. See In re Graven, 936 F.2d 378 (8th Cir. 1991) (reaching merits of order converting case from one under chapter 12 to one under chapter 7); In re Foster, 945 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1991) (Table) (same) (affirming district court without opinion). Given the broad parameters of 28 U.S.C. § 158(d), and the facts establishing finality here, this Court should treat this conversion motion as final too, and should exercise jurisdiction over this appeal.

Respectfully submitted this 15th day of May, 2009.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watchdogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88 (1977). The United States Trusteee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency and to protect and preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy system. By statute, "[t]he United States Trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this Title." 11 U.S.C. § 307. See also In re Revco D.S., Inc. 898 F.2d at 499-500 (upholding broad appellate standing of United States Trustees).

This case involves a dispute over confirmation of a plan under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. In this matter, the United States Trustee has two separate and distinct interests. First, the United States Trustee has the statutory duty to oversee the administration of Chapter 13 cases, which includes monitoring and, if necessary, objecting to Chapter 13 plans under 11 U.S.C. § 1324. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(C). Second, the United States Trustee has an interest in this appeal because the issue on appeal directly implicates 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), which the United States Trustee oversees pursuant to duties set forth in 11 U.S.C. § 704(b), and under which United States Trustees regularly seek relief involving the same legal issue.

The question of law involved in this appeal is not limited to the Wilsons. Rather, it will apply globally to thousands of debtors in a myriad of different financial circumstances who will file bankruptcy cases in this district and nationally. For this reason, the United States Trustee respectfully offers this Court its views on whether Debtors in a Chapter 13 case may deduct the IRS Local Standard expense for vehicle financing costs, even though they Debtors do not make monthly note or lease payments.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction over this matter pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b) and § 157(b)(2)(L). The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel has jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1)and (b) and Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8001. Joyce Babin, Chapter 13 Trustee, appeals from orders of the United States Bankruptcy Court, Western District of Arkansas, overruling her Objection to Confirmation of Chapter 13 Plan filed in the case of the Debtors, Gregory A. Wilson and Lori A. Wilson ("Debtors" or "Wilsons"), and confirming the Wilsons' chapter 13 plan.

The Wilsons filed their chapter 13 case and proposed a plan of reorganization on September 29, 2006. On November 29, 2006, the Chapter 13 Trustee timely filed an Objection to Confirmation of the Debtors' plan. The Objection was heard on April 18, 2007. On April 19, 2007, pursuant to the Court's hearing, the Chapter 13 Trustee and the Debtors submitted Stipulations to the Bankruptcy Court. On May 17, 2007, the parties submitted Briefs. On July 30, 2007, the Bankruptcy Court entered discrete Orders overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's Objection and Confirming the Wilsons' plan. On August 8, 2007, the Chapter 13 Trustee filed her Notice of Appeal.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

The Chapter 13 Trustee objected to confirmation of the Debtors' modified plan on the grounds that it did not commit all of the Debtors' disposable income to the plan as required under 11U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1)(B). The Bankruptcy Court overruled the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection and confirmed the plan, holding that the Debtors could properly claim the IRS Standard expense allowance for vehicle ownership, notwithstanding that the Debtors had no vehicle loan or lease payment, thereby substantially reducing the funds available to pay creditors under the plan.

In this case, the Debtors' income exceeds the family median income for the State of Arkansas. In chapter 13 bankruptcy cases, when the debtors' income exceeds their state's family median income, 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3) requires the debtors to use the "means test" provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 707(B)(2)(A) and (B) to determine their expenses. Given that 11 U.S.C. 707(B)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows only "applicable" vehicle ownership expenses to be deducted under the means test, the issue presented to this court for determination is whether the Bankruptcy Court erred by holding that the Debtors could claim the IRS Standard expense allowance for vehicle financing in the calculation of their disposable income, even though the Wilsons had no vehicle financing expense because they owned their cars debt free.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel reviews the Bankruptcy Court's factual findings for clear error and the conclusions of law de novo. DeBold v. Case, 452 F.3d 756, 761 (8th Cir. 2006); Litzinger v. Litzinger (In re Litzinger), 340 B.R. 897, 903 (8th Cir. BAP 2006); Ford v. Student Loan Guarantee Foundation (In re Ford), 269 B.R. 673, 675 (8th Cir. BAP 2001) [citing Andresen v. Nebraska Student Loan Program, Inc. (In re Andresen), 232 B.R. 127, 128 (8th Cir. BAP 1999)]; Eibert v. Pelican (In re Eibert), 162 F.3d 523, 525 (8th Cir. 1998). In this case, the facts are not in dispute. Therefore, the Bankruptcy Court's interpretations of the relevant provisions, including 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(2), 1322(a), and 1325, are legal conclusions that are reviewed de novo.

STATUTORY FRAMEWORK AND BACKGROUND

I. Statutory Framework

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA") altered the analysis bankruptcy courts must employ when determining whether to confirm proposed Chapter 13 repayment plans. When, as here, a trustee or holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to plan confirmation, 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1) conditions plan confirmation upon the debtors committing all of their "projected disposable income" to payments to unsecured creditors through the Chapter 13 plan. "Disposable income" is the current monthly income received by the debtors (other than child support payments, foster care payments, or disability payments for a dependent child) less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2). The term "current monthly income" is the average monthly income from all sources that the debtors receive during the six-month period ending on the last day of the calendar month immediately preceding the date of the commencement of the case, including any amount paid by a third party on a regular basis for the household expenses of the debtor or the debtor's dependents, but excluding benefits received under the Social Security Act. 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A). For above-median-income debtors, the "amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" are determined "in accordance with" § 707(b)(2)(A)[1] and (B), which provides various specific expense categories from which debtors may reduce their "current monthly income."[2] 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3).

[1] As amended by the BAPCPA, § 707(b)(2) repealed the former presumption in favor of the debtor, and replaced it with a new presumption. A case is an "abuse"

The "means test" provisions of §§ 707(b)(2)(A) and (B) are used in determining the expenses of Chapter 13 debtors, like these debtors, whose income exceeds their state's family median income. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3). In determining expenses, § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) provides that a debtor's "monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides…." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added).

II. Factual Background

The Debtors own two vehicles, a 2002 Ford F-150 and a 1999 Toyota 4-Runner Sport Utility Vehicle. App. 32, 34.[3] They own them outright; neither vehicle is encumbered by debt. Id. In their Form 22C, Lines 28 and 29, Debtors claimed the IRS Standard "transportation ownership/lease expense" in the amounts of $471 and $332, respectively, for both vehicles. App. 62.[4] of Chapter 7 if a detailed mathematical formula set out in the statute, commonly referred to as the "means test," yields a minimum amount of monthly disposable income. The means test uses a series of calculations to determine whether the § 707(b)(2) presumption of abuse arises in Chapter 7 cases. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A).

---

[2] Form 22C, which debtors must file pursuant to Interim Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 1007(b)(6), serves, in part, to calculate debtor's "current monthly income."

[3] In this brief, "App." followed by a number refers to the record on appeal set forth in the docket of the Bankruptcy Court for this case.

[4] These amounts are in addition to the "vehicle operation expenses" for two or more vehicles of $336 taken by the Debtors on Line 27. Because the vehicles are

The Chapter 13 Trustee filed an objection to confirmation of the Debtors' Chapter 13 plan, claiming the plan failed to provide all of the Debtors' disposable income for the payment of creditors, contrary to 11 U.S.C. §§ 1325(a)(3) and (b)(1)(B). The Chapter 13 Trustee argued that the Debtors had more income to devote to paying creditors because they were improperly claiming the IRS Standard expense for vehicle financing expenses, even though that expense deduction was not applicable because these Debtors have no vehicle or lease payments. App. 71.

On July 30, 2007, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Arkansas entered orders overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection to the Debtors' plan and confirming the Debtors' Chapter 13 plan. The Court ruled that the Debtors were entitled to reduce their disposable income by the amount of the IRS Standard expenses allowance for vehicle financing costs even though they had no vehicle financing costs. On August 8, 2007, the Trustee timely filed her notice of appeal of the Court's orders of July 30, 2007.

each over six years old, the United States Trustee would also allow the Debtors an additional $200 operating expense per vehicle, based on the Internal Revenue Manual which allows such an additional vehicle operating expenses. See Internal Revenue Manual, Part 5 (entitled Collecting Process), Chapter 8, § 5.8.5.5.2, Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses, which may be found on the IRS website at http://www/irs/gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.html.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court erred as a matter of law in overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection to confirmation and confirming the Wilsons' Chapter 13 plan. It did so by misinterpreting when debtors can claim a vehicle ownership expense under section 707(b)(2). The court held that the Wilsons were entitled to deduct $803 in vehicle ownership expenses for their 2002 Ford F-150 and 1999 Toyota 4-Runner Sport Utility Vehicle, even though those vehicles were owned free and clear of encumbrances. This conclusion of law by the bankruptcy court was incorrect because the law allows the Wilsons to claim only "applicable" expenses under section 707(b)(2), and they had no applicable vehicle ownership expenses because neither vehicle was subject to a loan or lease payment. By using the word "applicable," Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom the expenses apply. Because the vehicle acquisition/financing expense does not apply with respect to the Wilsons' vehicles, the bankruptcy court erred in holding they were eligible to deduct the expenses under the means test.

Significantly, reading "applicable" in section 707(b)(2) this way has the salutary effect of applying the means test in a manner that is inconsistent with the Internal Revenue Service's longstanding application of this standard. Under section 707(b)(2), the means test looks to the IRS to establish certain standard expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i)(I). In applying its standards to taxpayers, the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim vehicle ownership expenses absent a monthly car expense. See IRS Collection Financial Standards attached hereto as Exhibit 4 of the Addenda.[5] Congress' use of "applicable" in § 707(b)(2) means this expense should be denied to debtors like the Wilsons, who do not have a car loan or lease, for the same reasons the IRS does not allow taxpayers to claim such phantom expenses.

Finally, the bankruptcy court's order overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection to confirmation of the Wilsons' plan conflicts with sound notions of public policy and the primary purpose of Congress in passing bankruptcy reform legislation in 2005 - including the amendments at issue in this appeal. The 2005 legislation was intended to ensure that debtors repay their debts when they can. By allowing the Wilsons to claim a fictional expense for their two vehicles, the bankruptcy court subverted that purpose.

[5] The IRS revised its Collection Financial Standards, effective October 1, 2007, and such revisions will be made applicable to bankruptcy cases filed as of January 1, 2008. Because the Wilsons' case was filed on September 29, 2006, only the Collection Financial Standards in effect prior to October 1, 2007, are applicable to the Wilsons' case. For the Court's convenience, a true and correct PDF copy of the Collection Financial Standards applicable to this case are attached as Exhibit "4" on the Addenda and incorporated herein by reference. It is important to note, however, that the revisions made by the IRS effective October 1, 2007, do not change any result in this case. As set forth in the current Collection Financial Standards, the Local Standard for Vehicle Operation is still made expressly contingent on the existence of a loan or lease payment on a vehicle. See Id. As explained by the IRS, the recent revisions to the Local Standards were made to create equal allowances for first and second vehicles, add a separate public transportation allowance and reorganize the manner in which taxpayers in certain counties calculate their transportation operating expenses. See Id., under heading "Recent Revisions."

I.

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN HOLDING THAT THE WILSONS WERE ELIGIBLE TO CLAIM THE IRS LOCAL STANDARDS FOR VEHICLE OWNERSHIP FOR THEIR VEHICLES BECAUSE THE EXPENSE WAS NOT APPLICABLE TO THEM.

The bankruptcy court's order overruling the Chapter 13 trustee's objection to confirmation of the Wilsons' plan should be reversed because it fails to recognize that the Bankruptcy Code only allows debtors to claim vehicle expenses that are applicable to the debtors. 11 U.S.C. § 707(B)(2)(A)(II)(I). The Wilsons do not have any "applicable" vehicle ownership expense because they own their vehicles outright. Their attempt to claim what is a phantom expense is prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code because the Code allows debtors to claim only "applicable" expenses, not phantom ones. For this reason, the order entered by the bankruptcy court merits reversal.

A. Vehicle ownership expenses are allowable only if "applicable" to the debtors.

Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the...Local Standards...issued by the Internal Revenue Service..." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b0(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). The statute expressly provides that before the specific IRS expense amounts may be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense must itself first be applicable to the debtor. Id.

The Bankruptcy Code does not define the word "applicable," nor has the United States Trustee identified any Supreme Court or Eighth Circuit decision that provides a definition in the bankruptcy context.[6] Where, as here, a statutory term is undefined, a basic principle of statutory construction provides that courts should give such terms their ordinary meanings. E.g., Smith v. U.S., 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary or natural meaning."). See also Watson v. Ray, 192 F.3d 1153, 1155 (8th Cir. 1999) (stating that, "When interpreting a statute the court starts with the statute's plain meaning."). The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean applying or capable of being applied; relevant; suitable; appropriate. Random House Unabridged Dictionary (2006). Accordingly, such a meaning should be imparted to the term "applicable" as it appears in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) absent clear indication that Congress intended to give such term a different meaning. See Johnson v. Aljian, 490 F3d 778,780 (9th Cir. 2007) (quoting U.S. v. TRW Rifle 7.62x51 Meter Caliber, 447 F.3d 686,689 (9th Cir. 2006) ("[W}e follow the common practice of consulting dictionary definitions to clarify their ordinary meaning[] and look to how the terms were defined at the time [the statute] was adopted.").

The bankruptcy court's order is inconsistent with the ordinary, common sense definition of "applicable" because it allows debtors like the Wilsons to deduct expenses that do not apply to them. Here, the Wilsons seek to claim a loan or lease payment, but they have none. If the expenses which the Wilsons do not incur on a monthly basis are disallowed, they have the ability to repay their unsecured creditors $25,977, which is sixty-one percent (61%) of their total scheduled unsecured claims in a 60-month repayment plan under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. By inserting the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), Congress limited eligibility for expenses under the Local Standards to debtors for whom such expenses are "relevant; suitable; appropriate"--thereby excluding phantom ones. Because the Wilsons did not have vehicle financing expenses for either of their vehicles, the IRS ownership expense does not apply to those vehicles.

[6] But see, Fong v. Glover, 197 F.2d 710, 711 (9th Cir. 1952) (defining "applicable" as it appears in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as "capable of being applied.")

The only two appellate courts to have considered the issue to date have read "applicable" this way, and reversed the bankruptcy courts that read "applicable" the way the bankruptcy court in this case did. See In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. 645, 650 (D. Minn. 2007) (finding that "word 'applicable' in [section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)] means that, before the expense amount can be included in the debtor's allowed monthly expenses, the expense itself must actually be applicable to the debtor–in other words, the debtor must actually have a loan or lease payment obligation"); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762, 764-67 (E.D. Wis. 2007) (holding that word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) means that 'ownership expenses must exist" in the form of an actual loan or lease payment). Cf In re Devilliers, 358 B.R. 849, 859 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2007) (stating that debtors may claim IRS ownership expense only after "a determination is made as to the type of expenses allowed and applicable to the debtor"); In re Carlin, 348 B.R. 795, 798 (Bankr. D. Or. 2006) (finding that statute plainly and unambiguously does not allow the vehicle operating expense at issue to "free and clear" owners).

Hartwick and Ross-Tousey reversed the bankruptcy court rulings in those cases because those courts, like the bankruptcy court here, failed to give the word "applicable" its ordinary meaning. Instead, bankruptcy courts, like the one in this case, created an arbitrary distinction between the word "actual" and "applicable" expenses in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (footnote in draft). See, e.g., Fowler, 349, 414, 418 (stating "The use of 'actual' with respect to the Other Necessary Expenses and 'applicable' with respect to the National and Local Standards must mean that Congress intended two different applications.) The bankruptcy court here agreed that "applicable" and "actual" must have different meanings as Congress used both terms in the statute and, therefore, debtors like the Wilsons need not have any "actual" expense for the Ownership Expense Standard to be "applicable." App. __(p. 7 of op.) This logic is misguided, however. As the Ross-Tousey court explained, there is no indication in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) that Congress intended the words "applicable" and "actual" to have essentially opposite meanings. Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765. Rather, as Ross-Tousey held, the better reading of "applicable" in the context of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) is that it may have two meanings: first, the ownership expense is "applicable" if the debtor makes a loan or lease payment on a vehicle, and second, the amount allowed to the debtor is the "applicable" amount provided under the IRS Standards, and not the "actual" amount." Id., see also Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 653. "This reading gives meaning to the distinction between 'applicable' and 'actual' without taking a further step to conclude that 'applicable' means "nonexistent' or 'fictional.'" Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765.

By using the term "applicable" in this way, a determination of allowable expenses under the means test is a two-step process. The first step is eligibility—i.e., does the debtor qualify for an expense allowance in the category at issue? If so, then the second step is to quantify the expense amount the eligible debtor is allowed by looking at the IRS Standard amounts that are specified for the number of vehicles owned by the debtor and where the debtor lives. See. e.g., Carlin, 348 B.R. at 798 ("There is nothing absurd in Congress drawing the line for vehicle ownership expense eligibility at those debtors who are making payments on the vehicle."). The bankruptcy court's ruling impermissibly skips the first step of determining whether the Wilsons are eligible for the ownership expense by virtue of having a loan or lease payment for a vehicle, and proceeds directly to the second—only considering the amount the IRS would allow eligible taxpayers to claim for ownership of two vehicles.

B. The UST's construction of "applicable" in § 707(b)(2) has the salutary effect of treating transportation costs the same way in bankruptcy cases that the IRS treats them.

Reversal of the bankruptcy court's order allowing the Wilsons to deduct vehicle financing expenses that they do not have has the additional benefit of treating inapplicable phantom expenses in bankruptcy cases the way the IRS has long treated them. In providing which deductions debtors may take under the means test, Congress specifically stated that debtors are permitted to deduct "the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the...Local Standards...issued by the Internal Revenue Service." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). Accordingly, how the Internal Revenue Service applies the Standards that it developed for its own internal debt collection purposes is instructive on the question of how the same Standards might be applied in bankruptcy cases under section 707(b)(2). See. e.g., Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650-51 ("in order to determine whether the expense Standards issued by the IRS are 'applicable,' the most logical resource to consult is the IRS"). See also In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290, 309 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007) ("if guidance is sought on the meaning of the IRS standards that Congress incorporated into the Bankruptcy Code, practical reason would suggest that court should consider the full manner by which the IRS uses these standards.").

The IRS Collection Financial Standards in effect as of the date of the Wilsons' bankruptcy filing[7] fully support the United States Trustee's construction of the term "applicable" and provide as follows:

> The transportation standards consist of nationwide figures for monthly loan or lease payments referred to as ownership costs, and additional amounts for monthly operating costs....The ownership costs provided maximum allowances for the lease or purchase of up to two automobiles if allowed as a necessary expense....If a taxpayer has a car payment, the allowable ownership cost added to the allowable operating cost equals the allowable transportation expense. If a taxpayer has no car payment, or no car, the operating costs portion of the transportation standard is used to come up with the allowable transportation expense.

See IRS Collection Standards attached hereto as Exhibit A (emphasis added); see also Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.7(4.B), available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html#d0e187819.

As of the date the Wilsons filed their bankruptcy petition,[8] the "ownership cost" was specifically calculated by the IRS based on the cost to finance the acquisition of a vehicle, and not simply a cost associated with owning a car, such as repair or maintenance. The IRS noted that the "ownership cost" Standards are based on the "five-year average of new and used car financing data compiled by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors." See Id. (emphasis added). As such, the IRS does not treat the "ownership cost" expense as applicable when a taxpayer does not have a monthly expense related to financing a car. In exercising its discretion to collect taxes, the IRS recognizes that taxpayers may claim the vehicle "ownership cost" portion of the Local Transportation Standards only in situations where the taxpayer has a monthly vehicle acquisition financing expense, i.e., has a monthly vehicle loan or lease payment. See Id.

The court below agreed that the IRS Manual differs from section 707(b)(2)'s means test, and that the IRS Manual lets taxpayers deduct the actual amount of their car payment or the IRS' Local Standards, whichever is less (Op. at pp. 4-5), but the Standards are not statutory nor promulgated by regulation. (Op. at p. 4). That charge is irrelevant. The relevant point is the IRS has expressed its discretion to prohibit individuals from claiming a car payment when they have none. The exact same thing happens under the means test because it allows debtors to claim only an "applicable" car expense—not a phantom one.

Further, considering IRS practice in interpreting "applicable" expenses in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not negate the section's later allowance of "actual" monthly expenses in the IRS categories of Other Necessary Expenses. Rather, "a natural reading" of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) indicates that the words "actual" and "applicable" limit the relevant expense deductions in different ways. Slusher, 359 B.R. at 308. "Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to read, "The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the monthly amounts specified under the National Standards and the Local Standards....' rather than 'The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National and Local Standards." Id. (Emphasis in original).

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S ORDER CONFLICTS WITH THE MAJOR GOALS OF THE 2005 AMENDMENTS TO THE BANKRUPTCY CODE.

The bankruptcy court's order is also inconsistent with Congress' goals and purpose in implementing bankruptcy reform.[9] Congress amended the Bankruptcy

[9] The bankruptcy court conceded this, stating that its reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) "may appear to conflict with one of the express purposes of the means testing calculation, which was to 'ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford.'"

Code in 2005 to rectify perceived abuses in the bankruptcy process. "Among the abuses identified by Congress was the easy access to chapter 7 liquidation proceedings by consumer debtors who, if required to file under chapter 13, could afford to pay some dividend to their unsecured creditors." Hardacre, 338 B.R. at 720 (citing 151 Cong. Rec. S2459, 2469-70 (March 10, 2005)). A "primary goal" of the 2005 Reform Act was to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89). In cases such as this one, where the Wilsons have no loan or lease payment, Congress has established a system which does not provide them an expense deduction for vehicle financing. "Allowing debtors to deduct from their disposable income a ficational ownership allowance would give debtors with unencumbered vehicles a windfall at the expense of their unsecured creditors." In re Howell, 366 B.R. 153, 157 (Bankr. D. Kan. 2007).

CONCLUSION

For all of these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the July 30, 2007, Orders entered by the bankruptcy court overruling the Chapter 13 Trustee's objection to confirmation of the Debtors' plan and confirming the Debtors' plan, and remand this case to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings.

United States Bankruptcy Court,W.D. Arkansas,Hot Springs Division.
In re Gregory and Lori WILSON, Debtors.
No. 6:06-bk-72193M.

July 30, 2007.

Background: Chapter 13 trustee objected to plan proposed by above-median-income debtors, on "projected disposable income" grounds, and specifically challenged debtors' ability, in computing their disposable income, to take vehicle ownership expense deductions for vehicles that they owned outright.

Holding: The Bankruptcy Court, James G. Mixon, J., held that debtors were entitled to deduct standard vehicle ownership expense for which they qualified based on number of vehicles which they owned, as being "applicable" vehicle ownership expense to which they were entitled, notwithstanding that debtors owned their vehicles outright and thus had no "actual" ownership payments.

Objection overruled.

Under the "means" test, as applied in Chapter 13 case of above-median-income debtors to allow debtors to determine whether they were devoting all of their "projected disposable income" to payment of unsecured creditors under plan, debtors were entitled to deduct standard vehicle ownership expense for which they qualified based on number of vehicles which they owned, as being "applicable" vehicle ownership expense to which they were entitled, notwithstanding that debtors owned their vehicles outright and thus had no "actual" ownership payments; term "applicable," as used in bankruptcy statute that authorized debtors to deduct "applicable monthly expense amounts" under the "National and Local Standards," had to be contrasted with "actual," as used later in same statute in allowing debtors to deduct only their actual "Other Necessary Expenses." 11 U.S.C.A. §§ 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), 1325(b)(3).

Task of bankruptcy court in construing provision added to the Code by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act (BAPCPA) was to follow language of statute as it was written. Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, § 1, 11 U.S.C.A. § 101 note.

Major objective of Congress in enacting the "means" test, as measure of whether Chapter 7 case was presumptively abusive or whether above-median-income Chapter 13 debtors were devoting all of their "projected disposable income" to payment of unsecured creditors under plan, was to remove judicial discretion from process. 11 U.S.C.A. §§ 707(b)(2), 1325(b)(1)(B), (b)(3).

Sherry Daves, Attorney at Law, Hot Springs, AR, for Debtors.

JAMES G. MIXON, Bankruptcy Judge.
On September 29, 2006, Gregory A. Wilson and Lori A. Wilson (Debtors) filed a voluntary petition for relief under the provisions of Chapter 13 of the United States Bankruptcy Code. This case is, therefore, governed by the new provisions contained in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA).

On November 29, 2006, the Trustee filed a timely objection to confirmation of the Debtors' proposed plan. The objection was based on the Debtors' claim of vehicle ownership expenses on Form B22C for vehicles that the Debtors own free and clear of any liens. A hearing on the Trustee's objection was held in Hot Springs, Arkansas, on April 18, 2007. The parties agreed to submit the matter upon written stipulated facts, exhibits, and briefs. The matter was taken under advisement pending receipt and review of the stipulations and briefs. The matter before the Court is a core proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(L), and the Court has jurisdiction to enter a final judgment in the case.

On Schedule B, the Debtors list an ownership interest in two vehicles, a 2002 Ford F 150 Truck and a 1999 Toyota 4-Runner sport utility vehicle. (Ex. 1.) Both vehicles are unencumbered by any security interests and the Debtors have no current automobile ownership expense. The Debtors value the 1999 Toyota at $5,000.00 and the 2002 Ford F-150 Truck at $9,325.00. (Ex. 1.)

The Debtors' statement of combined monthly income is $5,968.50. Computed on an annual basis, their income is $71,622.00. (Ex. 2.) The applicable median income for a family of two in the State of Arkansas is $38,438.00. (Ex. 2.) Because the Debtors' annual income is above the median income, they are required by 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3) to compute the amount of disposable income available to pay to unsecured creditors by using the means test provided for in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).FN1 The computation required by 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) is made on official form B22C, which is required by the interim Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure 1007(b)(6), adopted on October 14, 2005 in the Eastern and Western Districts of Arkansas by General Order 25.

The calculations made by the Debtors using Form B22C compute to a negative $370.04 available to pay to unsecured creditors. (Ex. 3.) Among the deductions allowed by Form B22C is a deduction for the ownership expense of two automobiles. (Ex. 3.) The Debtors' first automobile allowance is $471.00 and the allowance for the second automobile is $332.00. (Ex. 3.) If the automobile expenses are not included in the deductions from current monthly income, the result will compute to the sum of $432.96 per month available for distribution to unsecured creditors. The Debtors' plan proposes to pay $100.00 a month for 60 months. (Ex. 2.) After payment of attorney's fees, trustee's fees, and priority claims, this would leave a total of $636.00 for distribution to the allowed claims of general unsecured creditors.

The Trustee argues that the Debtors may not take the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) Local Standard deduction for vehicle ownership costs if the Debtors have no actual vehicle payment. The Debtors argue that pursuant to BAPCPA Congress created a fixed allowance for vehicle ownership deductions, regardless of whether the Debtors have an actual vehicle payment. Both parties have filed briefs pointing out that the courts considering this issue are hopelessly split.

[1] The statute applicable to this issue is 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I):

The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief, for the debtor....[FN2]

The National and Local Standards referenced in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) are standards used by the IRS to determine a taxpayer's ability to pay a delinquent tax liability. In reHaley, 354 B.R. 340, 342 (Bankr.D.N.H.2006) (citing In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414, 416-417 (Bankr.D.Del.2006)). The Local Standards include: (1) an expense for ownership costs based on the number of vehicles owned by the taxpayer and (2) an expense for operating costs based on the number of vehicles owned by the taxpayer and the taxpayer's location. In re Haley, 354 B.R. at 342-43 (citing In re Fowler, 349 B.R. at 416-417). The issue raised in the case at bar regards only the Debtors' allowable ownership costs.

Two bankruptcy courts in the Eighth Circuit have directly considered this issue and reached opposite results. See In re McGuire, 342 B.R. 608, 613 (Bankr.W.D.Mo.2006) (disallowing Standard expense unless debtor actually has a vehicle expense); In re Hartwick, 352 B.R. 867, 869 (Bankr.D.Minn.2006)(ruling BAPCPA mandates that debtors use the higher of the Local Standard expense or the actual expense and the rule does not change if the actual expense is zero).See also In re Skaggs, 349 B.R. 594, 600 (Bankr.E.D.Mo.2006) (stating in dicta that a debtor is allowed either the Local Standard expense or the amount the debtor actually spends).

A number of cases are consistent with In re McGuire and hold that a debtor must have an existing vehicle payment or ownership expense in order to be eligible for the standard deduction. See In re Wiggs, No. 06 B 70203, 2006 WL 2246432 (Bankr.N.D.Ill. Aug.4, 2006)(the vehicle ownership expense is not allowed as it is not "applicable" to the debtor because there is no expense incurred for the purchase or lease of the vehicle); In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718 (Bankr.N.D.Tex.2006) (based on the Collection Financial Standards, Local Standards do not permit a debtor to claim an ownership deduction for a vehicle owned free and clear by the debtor).See also In re Howell, 366 B.R. 153 (Bankr.D.Kan.2007); In re Ceasar, 364 B.R. 257 (Bankr.W.D.La.2007); In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290 (Bankr.D.Nev.2007); In re Devilliers, 358 B.R. 849 (Bankr.E.D.La.2007); In re Harris, 353 B.R. 304 (Bankr.E.D.Okla.2006); In re Carlin, 348 B.R. 795 (Bankr.D.Or.2006); In re Oliver, 350 B.R. 294 (Bankr.W.D.Tex.2006); In re Barraza, 346 B.R. 724 (Bankr.N.D.Tex.2006); In re Lara, 347 B.R. 198 (Bankr.N.D.Tex.2006).Cf. In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2006)(finding McGuire reasoning persuasive, and while the debtor did not own or lease the vehicle, the debtor did make monthly payments for a vehicle owned by the non-debtor spouse and so was allowed the deduction).

However, many other cases construe the applicable statute consistent with Judge O'Brien's opinion in In re Hartwick and allow the standard vehicle ownership expense whether or not the debtor has an actual vehicle ownership expense.[FN3]See In re Grunert, 353 B.R. 591 (Bankr.E.D.Wis.2006) (allowing standard deduction even if debtor has no vehicle payment by following plain meaning of the statute by comparing the use of "actual" and "applicable" and legislative history); In re Haley, 354 B.R. 340 (Bankr.D.N.H.2006) (opining that Bankruptcy Code and IRS use ownership expense for different purposes; section 707(b) uses IRS standard not as a cap but as a fixed allowance; therefore, debtor may use standard deduction for vehicle ownership expense even though debtor owes no car payment); In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414 (Bankr.D.Del.2006) (stating that according to the plain language of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) the debtor's monthly expense shall be a fixed amount specified under the Local Standards; there is no reference in that language to use of Local Standards as a cap).See also In re Lynch, 368 B.R. 487 (Bankr.E.D.Va.2007); In re Chamberlain, 369 B.R. 519 (Bankr.D.Ariz.2007); In re Swan, 368 B.R. 12 (Bankr.N.D.Cal.2007); In re Zaporski, 366 B.R.

Nov. 15, 2006).Cf. In re Farrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. 224 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2006) (Congress drew a distinction when using "actual" to qualify other necessary expenses and "applicable" to qualify monthly expenses under the National and Local Standards; therefore, the debtor may claim a housing expense on Form B22C even if he has no housing expense).

The United States Trustee's publication dealing with the allowable expenses for transportation does not address the methodology of applying the Local Standards.[FN4]The IRS web site containing the allowable expenses for transportation states the following:

Disclaimer: IRS allowable expenses are intended for use in calculating repayment of delinquent taxes. Expense information for use in bankruptcy calculations can be found on the website for the U.S. Trustee program.[FN5]

The Form B22C attempts to follow the language of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). If the form is filled out correctly the debtor is always allowed at least the standard ownership cost regardless of the existence of or the amount of an actual automobile expense payment.[FN6]According to Collier's, "[t]he better view is that ... the ownership allowance specified in the standards is the minimum amount to be deducted for the expense of car ownership rather than the remaining car payments on a vehicle, if any...." 6 Collier's on Bankruptcy, ¶ 707.05[2][c][I] at 707-44 (Alan N. Resnick and Henry J. Sommers et. al. eds., 15th ed. rev.2006). A document not referred to by the Bankruptcy Code, called the Internal Revenue Manual (IRM), purports to give instructions on how the transportation expenses are to be applied.[FN7]The IRS treats the standard operating cost as the maximum a delinquent taxpayer may claim. According to the IRM, "[t]axpayers will be allowed the local standard or the amount actually paid, whichever is less."The Internal Revenue Manual § 5.15.1.7(4). The IRM also provides that "[i]f a taxpayer has no car payment only the operating cost portion of the transportation standard is used to figure the allowable transportation expense."The Internal Revenue Manual § 5.15.1.7(4)(B). As one court observed, "[p]art of the problem in resolving this issue lies in the level of informality of the standards; they are not statutory, nor are they promulgated by regulation.... They are part of an internal administrative process used to help determine a taxpayer's ability to pay a delinquent tax liability."In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290, 307 (Bankr.D.Nev.2007).

Judge O'Brien explained:

The IRS directive has no application to determining the debtor's applicable expense amounts specified under the ... Local Standards as part of the means test. IRS use of the Local Standards [for collecting delinquent taxes] is the opposite of that mandated by BAPCPA [Form B22C and 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)], that is the applicable IRS allowed amount is either the Standard amount or actual amount, whichever is lower.

Of course, the IRS directives reflect IRS policy to disallow any Standard amount where the actual expense is 0. How could they instruct otherwise?

In re Hartwick, 352 B.R. 867, 869 (Bankr.D.Minn.2006).The Honorable Eugene R. Wedoff commented on this issue as follows:

[T]here is a question of whether an ownership expense may be claimed by a debtor who owns a car free of any lien. The language quoted from the IRM states that if the debtor makes no car payments, the ownership expense amount may not be claimed. Indeed, this result follows necessarily from the IRM's treatment of the Local Standards as caps on actual expenditures: if a taxpayer has no car payments, the taxpayer obviously cannot claim a Local Standard amount intended to cap actual car payment expenses. However, since the means test treats the Local Standards not as caps but as fixed allowances, it is more reasonable to permit a debtor to claim the Local Standards ownership expense based on the number of vehicles the debtor owns or leases, rather than on the number for which the debtor makes payments. This approach reflects the reality that a car for which the debtor no longer makes payments may soon need to be replaced (so that the debtor will actually have ownership expenses), and it avoids arbitrary distinctions between debtors who have only a few car payments left at the time of their bankruptcy filing and those who finished making their car payments just before the filing.

Eugene R. Wedoff, Means Testing in the New § 707(b), 79 Am. Bankr.L.J. 231, 257-258 (Spring 2005).

This issue was also discussed by Judge Lundin. He opined:

When is a Chapter 13 debtor entitled to "ownership costs" as part of allowable living expenses for transportation under the Local Standards issued by the IRS? If the debtor owns one car, the statute can be interpreted to allow the debtor the National Ownership Cost Allowance for a first car ($475). The statute does not require the debtor to have a car payment to have ownership costs. If the debtor owns one car, the debtor gets the $475 per month ownership cost allowance without regard to the existence or amount of debt associated with that ownership.

The drafters of Official Form B22C accept the position at Lines 27, 28 and 29 that the debtor gets ownership costs under the Local Standards for Transportation for each vehicle for which the debtor has a "claim" of "ownership/lease expense." Consistent with the IRS Local Standards for Transportation, the debtor can claim an ownership/lease expense for up to two vehicles.

The statute does not link or condition a Chapter 13 debtor's entitlement to ownership costs to debt or any particular amount of debt secured by the car. To do so would make no economic sense either. Imagine a debtor who owns a car that is fully paid for. If a car payment or car debt is a predicate to the ownership costs component of the Local Standards for Transportation, then this debtor would not be entitled to the $475-per-month first-car allowance by the IRS. An identical debtor who has the good sense to borrow $100 or $500 before the petition and grant a security interest in the car would be entitled to almost the entire $475-per-month allowance notwithstanding the complete absence of economic reality. More reasonably, "ownership costs" are allowed if the Chapter 13 debtor owns one or more cars without regard to debt secured by a car. This does create the perverse incentive that Chapter 13 debtors should definitely own at least two cars when they file a Chapter 13 petition-any cars will do. A $500 car is worth the same $475-per-month ownership cost as a $15,000 car. This is how the statute is written.

5 Keith M. Lundin, Chapter 13 Bankruptcy § 476.9 (3d ed. 2000 & Supp.2006).

Many courts focus on the word "applicable" contained in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(ii)(I). Some of the courts conclude that if the debtor has no vehicle ownership expense then the Local Standards are not "applicable." I respectfully disagree; the word "applicable" must be analyzed in the context of the entire statute. "Applicable" modifies "the monthly expense amounts specified under ... Local Standards."Congress within the same sentence chose to use "actual" to modify "Other Necessary Expenses." As one Judge observed, "Congress drew a distinction in the statute between 'applicable' expenses on the one hand and 'actual' expenses on the other. 'Other Necessary Expenses' must be the debtor's 'actual' expenses. Expenses under the 'Local Standards' in contrast, need only be those 'applicable' to the debtor-because of where he lives or how large his household is. It makes no difference whether he 'actually' has them."In reFarrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. 224, 230-231 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2006). Nothing contained in Form B22C or 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) requires that the Debtors must have current automobile ownership expense as a prerequisite to claiming the Local Standard deduction amount specified by the IRS. Requiring an existing vehicle payment as a prerequisite to entitlement to the Local Standard deduction amounts to a rewriting of the statute in order for the outcome to make more sense.

In the so-called "good old days" before BAPCPA's enactment, mentioned by Judge Goldgar in In re Farrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. 224, 228 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2006), Bankruptcy Courts would have examined Schedules I and J in this case to determine disposable income and would not have allowed the debtors an expense deduction that did not exist. Congress changed that when they enacted BAPCPA by removing any discretion from the Bankruptcy Court in these matters and creating a mechanical test based in part on hypothetical numbers.

Some would argue, as many cases do, that it makes no sense to allow a vehicle ownership expense according to Local Standards if the debtors have no vehicle payment at all. This has obvious logical appeal. But does it make any more sense if the debtors have a $100.00 vehicle payment, but are still allowed to deduct $471.00 as if that were their vehicle payment? Does it make any sense to allow anything but a debtor's actual expense? Does it make any sense that the gift of non-existent expenses are conferred only on above-median income debtors? FN8

[2] The irony is palpable that Congress' efforts to eliminate perceived abuses in the bankruptcy system by forcing debtors into Chapter 13 also diminishes payments to unsecured creditors by mandating the use of fictitious amounts of income and expenses. However, the task of the Bankruptcy Court is to follow the language of the statute as it was written. See Henry J. Sommer, Trying to Make Sense Out of Nonsense: Representing Consumers Under the "Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005," 79 Am. Bankr.L.J. 191 (Spring 2005).

Judge O'Brien's comments in In re Hartwick are appropriate. He stated:

> The argument that the statute should be read to disallow the Standard amount where no actual debt exists at filing largely rests on the assertion that such best serves the gatekeeping purposes of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). But, as discussed below, Congress locked the Courts out of the means test, and judicial discretion has no role in it.
>
> ....
> Congress has already determined the fairness of the application of the means test, and a major objective of the legislation was to remove judicial discretion from the process.

[3] I agree with Judge O'Brien's analysis. Therefore, for these reasons the objection to confirmation is overruled.

IN RE: GREGORY AND LORI WILSON,

Debtors.

CASE NO. 6:06-bk-72193M
(CHAPTER 13)

ORDER

On September 29, 2006, Gregory A. Wilson and Lori A. Wilson (Debtors) filed a voluntary petition for relief under the provisions of Chapter 13 of the United States Bankruptcy Code. This case is, therefore, governed by the new provisions contained in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA).

On November 29, 2006, the Trustee filed a timely objection to confirmation of the Debtors' proposed plan. The objection was based on the Debtors' claim of vehicle ownership expenses on Form B22C for vehicles that the Debtors own free and clear of any liens. A hearing on the Trustee's objection was held in Hot Springs, Arkansas, on April 18, 2007. The parties agreed to submit the matter upon written stipulated facts, exhibits, and briefs. The matter was taken under advisement pending receipt and review of the stipulations and briefs. The matter before the Court is a core proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(L), and the Court has jurisdiction to enter a final judgment in the case.

FACTS

On Schedule B, the Debtors list an ownership interest in two vehicles, a 2002 Ford F150 Truck and a 1999 Toyota 4-Runner sport utility vehicle. (Ex. 1.) Both vehicles are unencumbered by any security interests and the Debtors have no current automobile ownership expense. The Debtors value the 1999 Toyota at $5,000.00 and the 2002 Ford F-150 Truck at $9,325.00. (Ex. 1.)

The Debtors' statement of combined monthly income is $5,968.50. Computed on an annual basis, their income is $71,622.00. (Ex. 2.) The applicable median income for a family of two in the State of Arkansas is $38,438.00. (Ex. 2.) Because the Debtors' annual income is above the median income, they are required by 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3) to compute the amount of disposable income available to pay to unsecured creditors by using the means test provided for in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).[1] The computation required by 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) is made on official form B22C, which is required by the interim Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure 1007(b)(6), adopted on October 14, 2005 in the Eastern and Western Districts of Arkansas by General Order 25.

The calculations made by the Debtors using Form B22C compute to a negative $370.04 available to pay to unsecured creditors. (Ex. 3.) Among the deductions allowed by Form B22C is a deduction for the ownership expense of two automobiles. (Ex. 3.) The Debtors' first automobile allowance is $471.00 and the allowance for the second automobile is $332.00. (Ex. 3.) If the automobile expenses are not included in the deductions from current monthly income, the result will compute to the sum of $432.96 per month available for distribution to unsecured creditors. The Debtors' plan proposes to pay $100.00 a month for 60 months. (Ex. 2.) After payment of attorney's fees, trustee's fees, and priority claims, this would leave a total of $636.00 for distribution to the allowed claims of general unsecured creditors.

[1] This requirement is technically not applicable unless the Trustee or an unsecured creditor objects to confirmation. See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1-3) (2006).

ARGUMENT

The Trustee argues that the Debtors may not take the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) Local Standard deduction for vehicle ownership costs if the Debtors have no actual vehicle payment. The Debtors argue that pursuant to BAPCPA Congress created a fixed allowance for vehicle ownership deductions, regardless of whether the Debtors have an actual vehicle payment. Both parties have filed briefs pointing out that the courts considering this issue are hopelessly split.

DISCUSSION

The statute applicable to this issue is 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I):

> The debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the National Standards and Local Standards, and the debtor's actual monthly expenses for the categories specified as Other Necessary Expenses issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the area in which the debtor resides, as in effect on the date of the order for relief, for the debtor . . . .[2]

The National and Local Standards referenced in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) are standards used by the IRS to determine a taxpayer's ability to pay a delinquent tax liability. In re Haley, 354 B.R. 340, 342 (Bankr. D. N.H. 2006) (citing In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414, 416-417 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006)). The Local Standards include: (1) an expense for ownership costs based on the number of vehicles owned by the taxpayer and (2) an expense for operating costs based on the number of vehicles owned by the taxpayer and the taxpayer's location. In re Haley, 354 B.R. at 342-43 (citing In re Fowler, 349 B.R. at 416-417). The issue raised in the case at bar regards only the Debtors' allowable ownership costs.

[2] The Local Standard amounts are found on the internet at www.usdoj.gov/ust/.

Two bankruptcy courts in the Eighth Circuit have directly considered this issue and reached opposite results. See In re McGuire, 342 B.R. 608, 613 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2006) (disallowing Standard expense unless debtor actually has a vehicle expense); In re Hartwick, 352 B.R. 867, 869 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2006)(ruling BAPCPA mandates that debtors use the higher of the Local Standard expense or the actual expense and the rule does not change if the actual expense is zero). See also In re Skaggs, 349 B.R. 594, 600 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 2006) (stating in dicta that a debtor is allowed either the Local Standard expense or the amount the debtor actually spends).

A number of cases are consistent with In re McGuire and hold that a debtor must have an existing vehicle payment or ownership expense in order to be eligible for the standard deduction. See In re Wiggs, No. 06 B 70203, 2006 WL 2246432 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. Aug. 4, 2006)(the vehicle ownership expense is not allowed as it is not "applicable" to the debtor because there is no expense incurred for the purchase or lease of the vehicle); In re Hardacre, 338 B.R. 718 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2006) (based on the Collection Financial Standards, Local Standards do not permit a debtor to claim an ownership deduction for a vehicle owned free and clear by the debtor). See also In re Howell, No. 06011652, 2007 WL 1237832 (Bankr. D. Kan. April 26, 2007); In re Ceasar, 364 B.R. 257 (Bankr. W.D. La. 2007); In re Slusher, 359 B.R. 290 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007); In re Devilliers, 358 B.R. 849 (Bankr. E.D. La. 2007); In re Harris, 353 B.R. 304 (Bankr. E.D. Okla. 2006); In re Carlin, 348 B.R. 795 (Bankr. D. In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006)(finding McGuire reasoning persuasive, and while the debtor did not own or lease the vehicle, the debtor did make monthly payments for a vehicle owned by the non-debtor spouse and so was allowed the deduction).

However, many other cases construe the applicable statute consistent with Judge O'Brien's opinion in In re Hartwick and allow the standard vehicle ownership expense whether or not the debtor has an actual vehicle ownership expense.[3] See In re Grunert, 353 B.R. 591 (Bankr. E.D. Wis. 2006) (allowing standard deduction even if debtor has no vehicle payment by following plain meaning of the statute by comparing the use of "actual" and "applicable" and legislative history); In re Haley, 354 B.R. 340 (Bankr. D. N.H. 2006) (opining that Bankruptcy Code and IRS use ownership expense for different purposes; section 707(b) uses IRS standard not as a cap but as a fixed allowance; therefore, debtor may use standard deduction for vehicle ownership expense even though debtor owes no car payment); In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006) (stating that according to the plain language of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) the debtor's monthly expense shall be a fixed amount specified under the Local Standards; there is no reference in that language to use of Local Standards as a cap). See also In re Lynch, No. 06-33193, 2007 WL 1387987 (Bankr. E.D. Va. May 8, 2007); In re Chamberlain, No. 06-01774, 2007 WL 1355894 (Bankr. D. Ariz. [3] As one Judge observed, there is "a clear trend towards allowing the expense deduction." In re Lynch, 2007 WL 1387987, at *2. This trend is evident in that more of the recent opinions are allowing the deduction regardless of whether the debtor has an actual ownership expense or not.

Mont. 2006); In re McIvor, No. 06-42566, 2006 WL 3949172 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. Nov. 15, 2006). Cf. In re Farrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. 224 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006) (Congress drew a distinction when using "actual" to qualify other necessary expenses and "applicable" to qualify monthly expenses under the National and Local Standards; therefore, the debtor may claim a housing expense on Form B22C even if he has no housing expense).

The United States Trustee's publication dealing with the allowable expenses for transportation does not address the methodology of applying the Local Standards.[4] The IRS web site containing the allowable expenses for transportation states the following:

> Disclaimer: IRS allowable expenses are intended for use in calculating repayment of delinquent taxes. Expense information for use in bankruptcy calculations can be found on the website for the U.S. Trustee program.[5]

The Form B22C attempts to follow the language of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). If the form is filled out correctly the debtor is always allowed at least the standard ownership cost regardless of the existence of or the amount of an actual automobile expense payment.[6] According to Collier's, "[t]he better view is that . . . the ownership allowance specified in the standards is the minimum amount to be deducted for the expense of car ownership rather than the remaining car payments on a vehicle, if any . . . ." 6 Collier's on Bankruptcy, ¶ 707.05[2][c][I] at 707-44 (Alan N. Resnick and Henry J. Sommers et. al. eds., 15th ed. rev. 2006). A document not referred to by the Bankruptcy Code, called the Internal Revenue Manual (IRM), purports to give instructions on how the transportation expenses are to be applied.[7] The IRS treats the standard operating cost as the maximum a delinquent taxpayer may claim. According to the IRM, "[t]axpayers will be allowed the local standard or the amount actually paid, whichever is less." The Internal Revenue Manual § 5.15.1.7(4). The IRM also provides that "[i]f a taxpayer has no car payment only the operating cost portion of the transportation standard is used to figure the allowable transportation expense." The Internal Revenue Manual § 5.15.1.7(4)(B). As one court observed, "[p]art of the problem in resolving this issue lies in the level of informality of the standards; they are not statutory, nor are they promulgated by regulation . . . . They are part of an internal administrative process used to help determine a taxpayer's ability to pay a delinquent tax liability." In re Slusher 359 B.R. 290, 307 (Bankr. D. Nev. 2007).

Judge O'Brien explained:

> The IRS directive has no application to determining the debtor's applicable expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards as part of the means test. IRS use of the Local Standards [for collecting delinquent taxes] is the opposite of that mandated by BAPCPA [Form B22C and 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)], that is the applicable IRS allowed amount is either the Standard amount or actual amount, whichever is lower.
>
> . . . .
>
> Of course, the IRS directives reflect IRS policy to disallow any Standard amount where the actual expense is 0. How could they instruct otherwise?

In re Hartwick, 352 B.R. 867, 869 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2006).

The Honorable Eugene R. Wedoff commented on this issue as follows:

[7] See www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html#d0e182782.

> [T]here is a question of whether an ownership expense may be claimed by a debtor who owns a car free of any lien. The language quoted from the IRM states that if the debtor makes no car payments, the ownership expense amount may not be claimed. Indeed, this result follows necessarily from the IRM's treatment of the Local Standards as caps on actual expenditures: if a taxpayer has no car payments, the taxpayer obviously cannot claim a Local Standard amount intended to cap actual car payment expenses. However, since the means test treats the Local Standards not as caps but as fixed allowances, it is more reasonable to permit a debtor to claim the Local Standards ownership expense based on the number of vehicles the debtor owns or leases, rather than on the number for which the debtor makes payments. This approach reflects the reality that a car for which the debtor no longer makes payments may soon need to be replaced (so that the debtor will actually have ownership expenses), and it avoids arbitrary distinctions between debtors who have only a few car payments left at the time of their bankruptcy filing and those who finished making their car payments just before the filing.

Eugene R. Wedoff, Means Testing in the New § 707(b), 79 Am. Bankr. L. J. 231, 257-258 (Spring 2005).

This issue was also discussed by Judge Lundin. He opined:

> When is a Chapter 13 debtor entitled to "ownership costs" as part of allowable living expenses for transportation under the Local Standards issued by the IRS? If the debtor owns one car, the statute can be interpreted to allow the debtor the National Ownership Cost Allowance for a first car ($475). The statute does not require the debtor to have a car payment to have ownership costs. If the debtor owns one car, the debtor gets the $475 per month ownership cost allowance without regard to the existence or amount of debt associated with that ownership.
>
> The drafters of Official Form B22C accept the position at Lines 27, 28 and 29 that the debtor gets ownership costs under the Local Standards for Transportation for each vehicle for which the debtor has a "claim" of "ownership/lease expense." Consistent with the IRS Local Standards for Transportation, the debtor can claim an ownership/lease expense for up to two vehicles.
>
> The statute does not link or condition a Chapter 13 debtor's entitlement to ownership costs to debt or any particular amount of debt secured by the car. To do so would make no economic sense either. Imagine a debtor who owns a car that is fully paid for. If a car payment or car debt is a predicate to the ownership > costs component of the Local Standards for Transportation, then this debtor would not be entitled to the $475-per-month first-car allowance by the IRS. An identical debtor who has the good sense to borrow $100 or $500 before the petition and grant a security interest in the car would be entitled to almost the entire $475-per-month allowance notwithstanding the complete absence of economic reality. More reasonably, "ownership costs" are allowed if the Chapter 13 debtor owns one or more cars without regard to debt secured by a car. This does create the perverse incentive that Chapter 13 debtors should definitely own at least two cars when they file a Chapter 13 petition - any cars will do. A $500 car is worth the same $475-per-month ownership cost as a $15,000 car. This is how the statute is written.

5 Keith M. Lundin, Chapter 13 Bankruptcy § 476.9 (3d ed. 2000 & Supp. 2006).

Many courts focus on the word "applicable" contained in 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(ii)(I). Some of the courts conclude that if the debtor has no vehicle ownership expense then the Local Standards are not "applicable." I respectfully disagree; the word "applicable" must be analyzed in the context of the entire statute. "Applicable" modifies "the monthly expense amounts specified under . . . Local Standards." Congress within the same sentence chose to use "actual" to modify "Other Necessary Expenses." As one Judge observed, "Congress drew a distinction in the statute between 'applicable' expenses on the one hand and 'actual' expenses on the other. 'Other Necessary Expenses' must be the debtor's 'actual' expenses. Expenses under the 'Local Standards' in contrast, need only be those 'applicable' to the debtor-because of where he lives or how large his household is. It makes no difference whether he 'actually' has them." In re Farrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. 224, 230-231 (Bankr. N. D. Ill. 2006). Nothing contained in Form B22C or 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) requires that the Debtors must have current automobile ownership expense as a prerequisite to claiming the Local Standard deduction amount specified by the IRS. Requiring an existing vehicle payment as a prerequisite to entitlement to the Local Standard deduction amounts to a rewriting of the statute in order for the outcome to make more sense.

In the so-called "good old days" before BAPCPA's enactment, mentioned by Judge Goldgar in In re Farrar-Johnson, 353 B.R. 225, 228 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006), Bankruptcy Courts would have examined Schedules I and J in this case to determine disposable income and would not have allowed the debtors an expense deduction that did not exist. Congress changed that when they enacted BAPCPA by removing any discretion from the Bankruptcy Court in these matters and creating a mechanical test based in part on hypothetical numbers.

Some would argue, as many cases do, that it makes no sense to allow a vehicle ownership expense according to Local Standards if the debtors have no vehicle payment at all. This has obvious logical appeal. But does it make any more sense if the debtors have a $100.00 vehicle payment, but are still allowed to deduct $471.00 as if that were their vehicle payment? Does it make any sense to allow anything but a debtor's actual expense? Does it make any sense that the gift of non-existent expenses are conferred only on above-median income debtors? [8]

The irony is palpable that Congress' efforts to eliminate perceived abuses in the bankruptcy system by forcing debtors into Chapter 13 also diminishes payments to unsecured creditors by mandating the use of fictitious amounts of income and expenses. However, the task of the Bankruptcy Court is to follow the language of the statute as it was written. See Henry J. Sommer, Trying to Make Sense Out of Nonsense: Representing Consumers Under the "Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005," 79 Am. Bankr. L. J. 191

[8] Debtors whose income is below the state medium income do not use the means test or Form B22C. These debtor's disposable income is determined by reference to Schedules I and J. See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3); 8 Collier on Bankr. ¶ 1325.08[c][ii].

(Spring 2005).

Judge O'Brien's comments in In re Hartwick are appropriate. He stated:

> The argument that the statute should be read to disallow the Standard amount where no actual debt exists at filing largely rests on the assertion that such best serves the gatekeeping purposes of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). But, as discussed below, Congress locked the Courts out of the means test, and judicial discretion has no role in it.
>
> . . . .
> Congress has already determined the fairness of the application of the means test, and a major objective of the legislation was to remove judicial discretion from the process.

I agree with Judge O'Brien's analysis. Therefore, for these reasons the objection to confirmation is overruled.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

Sections 157(b)(1) and (2) of Title 28 of the United States Code confer jurisdiction upon bankruptcy courts to hear and determine all core proceedings under title 11 of the United States Code. The adjudication of a fee reduction motion filed under 11 U.S.C. § 329 of the Bankruptcy Code is a core proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A).

On March 7, 2007, the bankruptcy court, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 329, denied Arthur G. Lawrence, the appellant, $8,850.00 of the $12,928.00 in legal fees he received from his former clients, Pauline and Murray Windman (the "debtors"). This was a final order over which this Court has jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (c)(1)(B).

II.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Whether the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to order reduction of fees in two sequential chapter 11 bankruptcy cases as part of the proceedings in the second case after the first had been closed.

2. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by ordering a bankruptcy attorney to return fees under 11 U.S.C. § 329(a) because he ignored the procedural requirements under the Bankruptcy Code and provided negligible, if any, benefit to the debtors.

III.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This is a fee reduction case. On June 22, 2007, Murray Windman, aged 94, and his wife Pauline Windman, aged 88, filed a chapter 11 bankruptcy petition (Windman I) under the guidance of their then-attorney, Arthur G. Lawrence. The bankruptcy court dismissed this case on August 10, 2007, because the debtors had failed to obtain pre-petition credit counseling. Nineteen days later, on August 29, 2007, Mr. Lawrence filed a second chapter 11 petition (Windman II) on their behalf, submitting the same inaccurate schedules that he submitted in Windman I. Mr. Lawrence was suspended from the practice of law 20 days later for failing to pass the Multistate Professional Responsibility Exam. The California State Bar had ordered him to take the test as part of a stipulated six-month suspension for appropriating client funds, including a $5,000 settlement for a homeless woman. The court dismissed Windman II on November 1, 200,7 with a 180-day refiling bar and a finding of bad faith after the debtors' new attorney acknowledged that they had filed for chapter 11 protection to gain respite in a state court dispute over a real estate deal.

Mr. Lawrence nevertheless requested compensation from the court in Windman II, prompting the United States Trustee to file a motion under 11 U.S.C. § 329 for reduction of fees. After two hearings, Mr. Lawrence failed to produce credible evidence of the nature and timing of the services he provided his clients, or of the compensation he had received. The court awarded him $1,000 for each of the two chapter 11 cases and ordered him to return $8,850.

Mr. Lawrence has appealed to this Court on two grounds: first, that the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to order a reduction in fees; and second, that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in awarding him $2,000 for a representation that produced two dismissed chapter 11 petitions and a finding of bad faith for his clients.

IV.

RELEVANT FACTS

The debtors in this case are an elderly couple. Murray Windman, 94, has severe mobility problems, and Pauline, 88, has seriously impaired vision. (E.R.,[1] D, p. 19, ll. 1-7.) The appellant, Arthur G. Lawrence, represented them between June and November 2007, when he filed two consecutive chapter 11 bankruptcy cases on their behalf. (E.R., D, pp. 13-17.) The first chapter 11 bankruptcy case, Case No. 2:07- bk-15236 BB ("Windman I") was dismissed on August 10, 2007, principally because the debtors failed to obtain pre-petition credit counseling. (E.R., C, pp. 11-12.) Mr. Lawrence filed the second chapter 11 case, Case No. 2:07-bk-17535 BB ("Windman II") on August 29, 2007. (E.R., D, 13-17.) On September 18, 2007, the State Bar of California suspended Mr. Lawrence from practicing law because he failed the Multistate Professional Responsibility Examination. (A.E.R., 7, p. 129, ¶ 28.) He had been required to take the test as part of a stipulated disciplinary action for, among other things, misappropriating client funds, including a $5,000 settlement intended to benefit a homeless woman, whose name Mr. Lawrence cannot recall. (A.E.R., 1, p. 33.) Mr. Lawrence charged the debtors $600 for traveling to their home to inform them of his newest suspension. (A.E.R., 7, p. 136; 11, p. 175, ll. 12-24.)

The debtors paid for the professional assistance of Mr. Lawrence in their chapter 11 cases, even though he did not file an application under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) to be employed as debtors' attorney in either Windman I or Windman II. (A.E.R., 11, p. 171, ll. 11-24.) In both bankruptcy cases, Mr. Lawrence failed to help ensure his clients complied with basic requirements of the Bankruptcy Code, and he submitted inaccurate and incomplete schedules in both Windman I and Windman II. (E.R., G, p. 43, ll.3-10, p. 44, ll.7-25, p. 45, ll.1-19, and p. 48, ll.5-19;

"A.E.R." refers to the 'Appellee's Appendix of Exhibits' and is likewise followed by a reference to a numbered exhibit and then, as appropriate, by page number(s) therein.

A.E.R., pp.14-15, ll. 16-26 and 1-22; 10, p. 195-196, ll. 15-24 and ll. 1-20.)   After he was suspended from practice, the debtors hired another attorney, but Mr. Lawrence tried to remain on the case, styling himself a "business advisor." (E.R., 11, p. 171, l. 21).

The new attorney, Lorraine Howell, worked with the debtors and the United States Trustee to identify, and correct, all the mistakes in the debtors' schedules. (A.E.R., 9, pp. 156-158.) Ms. Howell explained to the court that the debtors had filed bankruptcy primarily "for the purpose of having a place to breath[e] and to reorganize their matters because they found themselves in a real property dispute among family members in the California Superior Court." (E.R., D, p. 19, ll. 8-12.) The material deficiencies in the debtors' filings, and the admission that the purpose of declaring bankruptcy was related to state court litigation rather than financial distress, led to the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss Windman II pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) and § 109(g). (E.R., D, pp. 13-28; A.E.R., 1, pp. 1-38; 10, pp. 199-200.)

After the hearing on the motion to dismiss, the bankruptcy court found that the same errors that appeared in the debtors' schedules in Windman I remained unremedied or tardily-corrected in debtors' schedules. (E.R., D, pp. 13-28; E.R., E, pp. 29-31; A.E.R., 2, pp. 39-41; 11, pp.171, 176-177, 195.) The bankruptcy court also found that Mr. Lawrence had poorly served his clients by repeatedly failing to seek or obtain court approval for his employment, in violation of 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). (E.R., D, pp. 13-28 and E, pp. 29-31; A.E.R., 2, pp. 39-41; 11, pp.171, 176-177, 195.)

Based on this evidence, the bankruptcy court dismissed Windman II with a 180-day refiling bar, in part because of the "admitted fact that the sole purpose of the instant filing was to gain leverage or other advantage with state court litigation regarding the partition of real property and not to resolve any other financial difficulties." (E.R., E, pp. 29, ll. 24-28.) The court found that the petitions had been filed in bad faith and ordered the debtors and Mr. Lawrence to reimburse counsel in the state court litigation for the costs associated with challenging their chapter 11 filing. (A.E.R., 2, p. 39.) Finally, the order retained jurisdiction to adjudicate the merits of a separate motion under 11 U.S.C. § 329 seeking reduction of fees paid to Mr. Lawrence. (E.R., E, pp. 30, ll. 4-8.) Neither the debtors nor Mr. Lawrence appealed that order.

The United States Trustee then filed his motion to reduce fees, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 329. (E.R., G, pp. 41-50.) When he filed Windman II, Mr. Lawrence requested a $10,000 retainer. (A.E.R., 12, p. 213-214.) The United States Trustee's fee reduction motion alleged that the debtors relied upon Mr. Lawrence to complete and file their schedules and guide them through chapter 11. (E.R., G, pp. 48-49.) The United States Trustee also alleged that Mr. Lawrence, despite collecting $12,928.00 in fees – of which $2,078 was attributed to paying the filing fees in Windman I and Windman II – filed the same error-filled petition in both bankruptcy cases. (A.E.R., 5, pp. 90-94; 6, pp. 100-109; 7, pp.125-131, 8, pp. 140-141; 9, pp. 156-157; 10, pp. 161-165; 11, pp. 170-173.) The United States Trustee also alleged that Mr. Lawrence's bar suspension, which occurred on September 18, 2007, required the debtors to hire and pay for another attorney, but Mr. Lawrence improperly continued to provide services to the debtors – including attending the 11 U.S.C. § 341(a) meeting of creditors along with the debtors' second attorney – and bill himself as "Business Counselor." (A.E.R, 9, p. 147 and pp. 156-157; 10, pp. 161-165; 11, pp. 176-178, 184-185.)

At the hearing on February 7, 2008, the court made a tentative ruling that it would order return of the $10,000 retainer, which it found excessive for the 20 days Mr. Lawrence was involved in Windman II before he was suspended for failing the Multistate Professional Responsibility Exam. (A.E.R., 5, p. 108.)

The court's tentative ruling prompted Mr. Lawrence to remember that he had received most of his compensation during the course of Windman I.

> Mr. Lawrence: Statement in there that I paid, uh, I was paid a retainer of $10,000, uh, for the filing of the second chapter bankruptcy work is error. That has to be amended, and I have to apologize for that mistake.
>
> Court: Wait, so the 10,000 was for both cases?
> Mr. Lawrence: The $10,000 were the monies that I received from the very beginning, which was on or about June 22, June 21, um, roughly nine weeks before that. And I'm not going to refer to the bill or the dates or the amounts because the Court doesn't have the benefit of, um, seeing it.

(A.E.R., 6, p. 108, ll. 1-11.)

Based on the confusion arising from Mr. Lawrence's new recollections, the court granted a continuance for Mr. Lawrence to submit further documentation to the court. On February 26, 2008, Mr. Lawrence submitted a disclosure of compensation that stated he had received $2,139.50 for compensation in Windman II. (A.E.R., 9, p 147.) He failed to submit any evidence substantiating his fee claims except for a billing statement that was created between the two February hearings. (A.E.R., 11, p. 174.) The only contemporary record of payment was a handwritten note put together by the debtors' bookkeeper. (E.R., I, p. 56.)

On February 28, 2008, the bankruptcy court found that Mr. Lawrence, whether acting as the debtors' attorney, or in some other professional capacity, failed to provide advice or services to his clients reasonably valued at the amount he charged them, and this conduct violated 11 U.S.C. § 329. (A.E.R., 11, p. 200. ll. 4-19, pp. 201-202, ll. 7-24 and ll.1-12.) The court limited Mr. Lawrence's aggregate compensation for both cases to $2,000, which was "more than 13 hours worth of services that I'm saying you should be compensated for, but no more because the services that were rendered were really substandard in this case." (A.E.R., 10, p. 200, ll. 16-19.)

Excluding filing fees, the amount of the court-approved compensation was approximately $8,000 less than Mr. Lawrence had received from his clients, and he was ordered to refund the excess. The court also ordered Mr. Lawrence to pay

$8,850 to the counsel of the debtors' opponents in the state court litigation in partial satisfaction of the award given in light of the finding of a bad faith filing. (A.E.R., 10, p. 203; 11, pp. 202-204; E.R., H, pp. 51-52.) The finding of bad faith was ultimately expunged by agreement of the parties, but the debtors and Mr. Lawrence remained liable for attorney fees. (E.R., J, p. 57-59.)

APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

The question whether the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees in the Windman cases is a question of law that is reviewed de novo; any factual findings are reviewed for clear error. In re Ferrell, 539 F.3d 1186, 1189 (9th Cir. 2008). A bankruptcy court's reduction of attorney's fees is reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re Mednet, 251 B.R. 103, 106 (9th Cir. B.A.P 2000). A court abuses its discretion when the record contains no evidence to support its decision. MGIC Indemnity Corp. v. Moore, 952 F.2d 1120, 1122 (9th Cir. 1991). Findings are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013.

VI.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over the United States Trustee's motion to reduce fees in Windman II. Although less certain, precedent from various circuits, including the Ninth Circuit, support the conclusion that the court had jurisdiction to reduce Windman I fees in the Windman II case. That is so because all the parties were the same in both cases, and Mr. Lawrence put his Windman I fees at issue in Windman II.

As part of Windman II, Mr. Lawrence requested the court approve a retainer of $10,000. In February 2008, six months after filing his request, Mr. Lawrence informed the court that he remembered he actually had earned only $2,139.50 in Windman II, and received the balance while Windman I was pending. After two hearings, the court allowed Mr. Lawrence to keep $1,000 for each case and to pay $8,850 towards the attorney fees that the debtors owed to the lawyer in their state court proceedings as a result of the finding that they had filed for chapter 11 protection in bad faith.

No serious argument can be made that the court did not have jurisdiction over the fee-reduction motion in Windman II. The court had full authority under 11 U.S.C. § 329 to limit Mr. Lawrence's compensation in that case to $1,000.

Under Ninth Circuit precedent, it appears that the court could also reduce the fees Mr. Lawrence received during Windman I. A bankruptcy court retains jurisdiction over a dismissed case in order to monitor post-dismissal activities such as authorization of attorney fees. Section 1334 of Title 28 of the United States Code also gives a bankruptcy court general jurisdiction over matters arising under Title 11. This authority arguably could include adjudication of fee disputes after a case has been closed. Accordingly, when the court ruled on the United States Trustee's motion to reduce fees, it apparently acted within its jurisdiction.

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it reduced Mr. Lawrence's fees. He failed to inform his elderly clients that they needed credit counseling before filing Windman I, prompting its dismissal. The schedules he submitted on the debtors' behalf were substandard. Mr. Lawrence was suspended from the practice of law 20 days after filing Windman II. He charged his clients $600 – two hours for travel and two hours of meeting time – to inform them he had failed the MPRE and was temporarily unable to practice law.

The bankruptcy court's finding that Mr. Lawrence did not provide value to the debtors should be affirmed.

VII.

ARGUMENT

A. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT RETAINED JURISDICTION TO REVIEW AND REDUCE MR. LAWRENCE'S FEES.

The jurisdictional issue in this case has two components: the court's authority to order reduction of Windman I fees in Windman II, and its authority to order the same in Windman II. As a starting point, the court's authority to reduce Mr. Lawrence's Windman II fees under 11 U.S.C. § 329 in Windman II is incontrovertible.

When Mr. Lawrence filed Windman II on behalf of the debtors, he invoked the jurisdiction of the court to provide bankruptcy protection. 11 U.S.C. § 301. The case was assigned to Judge Sheri Bluebond, the same judge who had presided over Windman I. (A.E.R., 1, p.6.) Accordingly, the court had jurisdiction over the case and to ensure compliance with the precise set of procedures that an attorney must complete in order to be compensated from a bankruptcy estate, including approving appointment of debtor's counsel, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 327, and authorization of payment upon submission of detailed billing records and justification for services rendered, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 329(a). It also had the power to find that a fee requested "exceeds the reasonable value of any such services, [and to] . . . order the return of such payment, to the extent excessive to" either the estate or the entity that made the payment. 11 U.S.C. 329(b). By Mr. Lawrence's own admission, he earned $2,139.50 in Windman II and requested authorization from the court to keep those funds. (A.E.R., 9, p. 147.) The court allowed him to keep $1,000 for his work in Windman II. (A.E.R., 10, p. 179, ll. 21-24.) It had full jurisdiction to order him to return the remaining fees.

The more novel issue is whether the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to order Mr. Lawrence to keep $1,000 for his services in Windman I and return the rest. As a preliminary matter, disciplinary proceedings, including disgorgement of fees, are core proceedings. Cf. In re Henderson, 360 B.R. 477, 483-84 (Bankr. D. S.C. 2006) (citing In re Lehtinen, 332 B.R. 404 (9th Cir. BAP 2005), aff'd 564 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2008)); (A.E.R., 10, p. 201, ll. 17-22.) Therefore, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction as a general matter to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees based on his lack of competence and failure to follow the Bankruptcy Rules.

The specific issue is whether the court had authority to order Mr. Lawrence to return fees earned in connection with Windman I in its order in Windman II. The parties in Windman I and II were identical, and the same bankruptcy judge presided over both cases. Therefore, there is no concern that one judge interfered with the docket of a fellow-judge. Windman I was the judge's case. If the judge retained jurisdiction over it, then the judge could properly adjudicate the fee issue. Cf. Snell v. Cleveland, Inc., 316 F.3d 822 (9th Cir. 2002) (holding that judge erred in vacating judgment in an earlier action before another judge upon determining that diversity jurisdiction had not been adequately proven in the first case).

Windman I was dismissed on August 10, 2007, and closed on August 29, 2008. Defining a bankruptcy court's jurisdiction after dismissal of a case, and to what extent closing a case bears on that jurisdiction has been described as "[t]wo poorly-charted areas of [the] swamp [of 28 U.S.C. 1334]." Aheong v. Mellon Mortg. Co. (In re Aheong), 276 B.R. 233, 239 (B.A.P 9th Cir. 2002). In the Ninth Circuit, however, bankruptcy courts maintain jurisdiction over dismissed cases, which includes adjudication of a post-dismissal application for an award of attorney's fees. In re Taylor, 884 F.2d 478, 481 (9th Cir. 1989); see In re Elias, 188 F.3d 1160, 1162 (9th Cir. 1999); Angelo v. Victoria Farms, Inc., 38 F.3d 1525, 1533 (9th Cir. 1994) (superceded by statute on other grounds) ("A court may properly award fees even after a bankruptcy case has been dismissed."). Therefore the dismissal of Windman I did not preclude Judge Bluebond from exercising jurisdiction to consider Mr. Lawrence's fee request for services allegedly rendered in Windman I, as the same court and same judge had presided over that case and had retained jurisdiction over it, despite its dismissal.

Nor does it appear that Judge Bluebond was prohibited from exercising jurisdiction over Mr. Lawrence's fee request because Windman I had been closed and never reopened. In a recent case, the United States District Court for the Central District of California, reviewing a bankruptcy court decision, considered whether a bankruptcy court could issue a contempt citation after the case had been closed. Sole Survivor Corp. v. Buxbaum, No. CV 07-3858-GW, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9400 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 22, 2009). Retained jurisdiction, which refers to jurisdiction retained by a court after a case has been dismissed, is not a proper basis for making a fee decision in a closed case. Id. at *13 (citing In re Pavelich, 229 B.R. 777, 781 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1999) (stating that retained jurisdiction can only be a theory for a motion in a dismissed case because the Bankruptcy Code treats "closing and dismissal as mutually exclusive."); Aheong, 276 B.R. at 239 (calling dismissing and closing a case "two separate events"). However, under the general "arising under" jurisdiction of 28 U.S.C. § 1334, a bankruptcy court can exercise jurisdiction over a closed case. See In re Brown, 371 B.R. 486, 494-95 (N.D. Okla. 2007) (stating that its "jurisdiction to review [ ] fees is not dependent on whether the status of the case stands as open, closed, pending, or dismissed"). Furthermore, the bankruptcy court's "arising under" jurisdiction can provide authority to adjudicate matters in a closed case without reopening it. Menk v. Lapaglia (In re Menk), 241 B.R. 896 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1999); Aheong, 276 B.R. at 240 ("'reopening a closed case is not a jurisdictional prerequisite to subject-matter jurisdiction under [Section] 1334(b)'") (citing Menk).

The Sole Survivor court held that seeking an order for contempt fell within the jurisdiction identified in Menk and Aheong: "Similarly, the Clerk's administrative act of ordering the bankruptcy case 'closed' did not have any jurisdictional significance." Sole Survivor, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS, at *16.[2] It would not be a large step for this Court to determine that a bankruptcy judge has “arising under” jurisdiction over fee reduction motion under 11 U.S.C. 329, whether or not the underlying case is reopened, under the reasoning of Sole Survivor.

[2] Courts from numerous circuits have recognized this assessment. See Dery v. Cumberland Cas. & Sur. Co., 468 F.3d 326, 330 (6th Cir. 2006) (citing cases for the rule that a bankruptcy court may retain jurisdiction "even after the underlying case has been adjudicated or dismissed"); GMX Resources v. Kleborn (In re Petroleum Prod. Mgmt.), 282 B.R. 9, 14-15 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2002) (citing cases for the rule that for the rule that reopening a closed case is a ministerial act with no

The jurisdictional conundrum can be solved in another way. The court below stated that “the $1,000 per case will be the total amount due for both cases, period.” (A.E.R., 11, p. 179, ll. 22-24.) If this Court finds the bankruptcy court lacked jurisdiction to reduce fees in Windman I, it should do three things. First, this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court’s decision that Mr. Lawrence’s fees should be limited to $1,000 in Windman #2, as there are no jurisdictional issues in that case. Second, since the bankruptcy court did not make a finding concerning the allocation of fees received in the two cases, it would also be appropriate to remand for the court to clarify the amount of fees Mr. Lawrence received, as a matter of fact, in each case. Third, this Court should remand the case to allow the United States Trustee to file a motion to reopen Windman I to adjudicate the propriety of the fees Mr. Lawrence took in that case.

B. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION BY REDUCING MR. LAWRENCE’S FEES.

No argument can be made the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by reducing Mr. Lawrence’s fees based on his behavior in Windman I and II. He failed to disclose his proposed fee arrangement to the court, which is sufficient grounds for a fee reduction.[3] 11 U.S.C. §§ 327(a) and 329; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014; see, e.g., In independent legal significance); Leinbach v. Reigle (In re Ramelah), No. 08-5074, 2009 WL 1213953 (E.D. Pa. May 5, 2009) (district court on appeal affirming order to reduce attorney fees in sequential closed cases, regardless of whether they were re-opened our not).

[3] While Mr. Lawrence filed a tardy disclosure of compensation on February 26, 2008, one he filed181 days after he filed the petition in Windman II, he did so re Park-Helena Corp., 63 F.3d 877, 880 (9th Cir. 1995). Another justification for the fee reduction rests with Mr. Lawrence's misconduct. See generally In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246 (3d Cir. 2002); United States Trustee v. First Jersey Secur., Inc., (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504, 514, and n.9 (3d Cir. 1999). The bankruptcy court was within its discretion in granting the fee reduction motion under 11 U.S.C. 329 because the debtors paid Mr. Lawrence over $10,000 and received nothing in return.[4] See 11 U.S.C. § 329(b) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2017(b). In fact, the debtors were arguably worse off than they had been before they engaged Mr. Lawrence. Specifically, the court found:

- Mr. Lawrence submitted grossly inaccurate schedules for the debtors, failing to correct any of the errors made in the first filing in the second case. (A.E.R., 11, p. 182) (referring to a $65 cable bill that was listed as a $6,500 obligation).
- Mr. Lawrence failed to advise his clients that they needed to complete credit counseling before filing chapter 11 bankruptcy, resulting in the dismissal of their case and creating a "detriment" because they were "behind the eight ball coming in a second time." (A.E.R., 1, p. 6; 11, p. 178.)
- Mr. Lawrence improperly charged the debtors $600 to travel to only in response to the United States Trustee's fee reduction motion. Even after that, Mr. Lawrence never sought the required bankruptcy court approval of his employment. In ordering a reduction in Mr. Lawrence's fees, the bankruptcy court acknowledged this fact, stating "[t]he Court never authorized the employment of Mr. Lawrence in either of the Windmans' bankruptcy cases . . . . On that basis alone, it could be argued that the entirety of any amounts paid to Mr. Lawrence . . . should be disgorged." (A.E.R., 5, p. 93).

[4] Mr. Lawrence, in his brief, discusses a finding by the bankruptcy court in its dismissal of Windman II that the debtors had filed in bad faith, alleging that there was no basis for such a finding. (Appellant's Opening Br. at 6-7.) Mr. Lawrence's discussion misleads this Court because the grounds cited in the United States Trustee's fee reduction motion, brought pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 329, did not depend upon the bankruptcy court's bad faith finding. Indeed, a November 18, 2008 stipulation to resolve a related district court appeal, Case No. CV08-1498 TJH, to which the United States Trustee was neither a party, removed the bad faith finding. (E.R., J, p.58, ll.10-11 and 16-18.)

their home to inform them that he had been suspended from the practice of law for failing the MPRE. (A.E.R., 7, p. 129, ¶ 28; 11, p. 175, ll. 12-24.)

- Mr. Lawrence improperly tried to charge the debtors as a "business consultant" after he was suspended from practicing law. (A.E.R., 9, p. 147; 5, p. 91.)
- Mr. Lawrence never substantiated or provided an evidentiary basis for the fees he charged debtors, although the court continued the case for two weeks after his initial failure to do so. (A.E.R., 5, p. 92.) (commenting on Mr. Lawrence's "relatively haphazard system for keeping track of time spent for the Windmans.")

Mr. Lawrence's opening brief inexplicably places sole responsibility for his failings, particularly his failure to submit "reports, statements and other documents," upon the debtors, aged 94 and 88 respectively, and both lacking any knowledge of bankruptcy law. (Appellant's Opening Br. at 9.) The brief continues "[t]he Attorney is not a guarantor that the debtors comply with the requirements for filing of schedules, and if they do not, it should not be attributed to the Debtor's lawyers." Id. Although a voluminous record chronicles Mr. Lawrence's many short-comings as a lawyer, his statement, standing by itself, indicates he had no inkling of his duty to provide services with a reasonable value to his clients. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in ordering a fee reduction.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

This is an appeal from the bankruptcy court's order reducing Appellant Arthur Lawrence's attorney fees in two cases because his efforts in them did not benefit his clients, debtors Murray and Pauline Windman. These reductions were independently authorized by two federal statutes, 11 U.S.C. §§ 329 and 330. Reduction of attorney fees is a core matter. 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A); Price v. Lehtinen (In re Lehtinen), 564 F.3d 1052, 1058 (9th Cir. 2009). The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b)(1)-(2).[1] An order reducing fees is final. 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1); Law Offices of Nicholas A. Franke v. Tiffany (In re Lewis), 113 F.3d 1040, 1043-44 (9th Cir. 1997).

Mr. Lawrence timely appealed the bankruptcy court's order on March 17, 2008 to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel of the Ninth Circuit. 28 U.S.C. § 158(e)(2); Fed R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). The appellate panel had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(1). It affirmed the bankruptcy court's order on November 18, 2009. Mr. Lawrence then filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court on December 17, 2009. Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B) & 6(b)(1). This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(1).

[1] Mr. Lawrence's argument that the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to reduce his fees in one of the two cases is incorrect for the reasons explained in section II of the Argument portion of this brief. See United States Trustee Br. at 25.

1. Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion when it limited Mr. Lawrence's compensation to $2,000 for his work on the Windmans' two chapter 11 bankruptcy cases?

2. Did the bankruptcy court act properly when it ordered Mr. Lawrence to return fees he may have received in the Windmans' predecessor, closed, case at a hearing in the follow-on, open, case?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Statutory Framework

A. Attorney's Fees

The Bankruptcy Code regulates the employment and compensation of bankruptcy professionals. Bankruptcy courts have significant discretion when determining whether professional fees are reasonable. 11 U.S.C. §§ 329-331.

Attorneys must obtain court approval to be retained as bankruptcy counsel for chapter 11 debtors. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. §§ 327(a); 11 U.S.C. § 1107; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a) (describing application process and requirements). In such cases, attorneys must establish that their fee requests satisfy the standards set out in 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). See also 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A) (mandating "reasonable compensation"); 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(A)-(F); 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4)(A)(ii)(I)-(II) (prohibiting compensation for services not "reasonably likely" to benefit the estate or "necessary" for its "administration").

Independent of that, section 329(a) of the Bankruptcy Code requires every attorney representing a debtor in any type of a bankruptcy case to file a statement of the compensation paid, or agreed to be paid, for services related to the bankruptcy case. 11 U.S.C. § 329(a); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016. Section 329 mandates that every bankruptcy attorney demonstrate that the fee sought does not "exceed[] the reasonable value of any such services;" if it does, the court may reduce or deny the fee altogether. 11 U.S.C. § 329(b).

B. Jurisdiction

A bankruptcy court's jurisdiction is established by statute. Section 1334(a) of title 28 gives district courts "original and exclusive" jurisdiction of "all cases" under title 11. 28 U.S.C. § 1334(a). Subsection 1334(b) gives federal district courts non-exclusive subject matter jurisdiction over "all civil proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in or related to cases under title 11." 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b). Bankruptcy judges are "units" of the district court. 28 U.S.C. § 151.

Section 157(a) of title 28 allows district courts to refer to a bankruptcy judge "any or all cases under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to a case under title 11." 28 U.S.C. § 157(a). Upon such referral, a bankruptcy judge has jurisdiction to enter final orders in all "cases under title 11" and in "all core proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in a case under title 11." 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1).

A core proceeding includes all "matters concerning the administration of the estate." 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A). Section 1334 of title 28 gives courts sitting in bankruptcy "exclusive jurisdiction . . . over all claims or causes of action" that involve the retention of bankruptcy professionals. 28 U.S.C. § 1334(e)(2).

In this case Mr. Lawrence suggests that the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to set his fees in one of these two interrelated cases because it was closed. Br. at 17-18. Sections 1334 and 157 of title 28 do not explicitly address whether such jurisdiction extends to administrative matters that arise in closed cases. The United States believes, however, there is jurisdiction to establish the fees the Windmans must pay Mr. Lawrence in both of those cases. We address that issue in Section II of the Argument portion of this brief. See United States Trustee Br. at 25.

II. STATEMENT OF FACTS

The debtors in this case were an elderly couple. Murray Windman, who was 94 at the time the petition was filed, has since passed away. His wife Pauline, 88, has seriously impaired vision. ER at 19. The appellant, Arthur G. Lawrence, represented them between June and November 2007, when he filed two consecutive chapter 11 bankruptcy cases on their behalf. ER at 13-17.

Mr. Lawrence filed the first chapter 11 case, No. 07-15236 (the "predecessor case" or "Windman I"), on June 22, 2007. AER at 215. The bankruptcy court issued a notice of deficiency because Mr. Lawrence had not filed mandatory bankruptcy

Schedules B, C, D, E, F, A, G, H, I, J, Form 22B, a Statement of Financial Affairs and an Employee Income Record. AER at 224. The bankruptcy court also issued a Case Commencement Deficiency Notice, noting the omission of nine documents, including a Statement of Related Cases, a Summary of Schedules, Disclosure of Attorney Compensation, and a Certificate of Credit Counseling. AER at 226.

Mr. Lawrence has admitted that the schedules submitted in Windman I were prepared "in haste" and thus contained "numerous errors . . . including obvious typographical errors." AER at 50, ¶ 3. And he admitted "there were a number of items that were not given full attention at the outset." AER at 51, ¶ 6.

On August 6, 2007, Mr. Lawrence filed the omitted Summary of Schedules in the predecessor case. AER at 228. He also filed a disclosure of attorney compensation, dated August 6, 2007, revealing that he had received $10,000 as a retainer and with the notation "at $150 per hour." AER at 252. Mr. Lawrence certified that "the foregoing is a complete statement of any agreement or arrangement for payment to me for representation of the debtor(s) in this bankruptcy proceeding." AER at 252 (emphasis added). He did not seek employment authorization from the bankruptcy court under 11 U.S.C. § 327, nor did he request approval from the court for his compensation, as required under sections 329 and 330 of the Bankruptcy Code. See generally AER at 9-14.

The bankruptcy court dismissed the predecessor chapter 11 bankruptcy case on August 10, 2007, principally because Mr. Lawrence filed it although the Windmans had not obtained the pre-petition credit counseling required by 11 U.S.C. § 109(h)(1). ER at 11-12. The clerk closed the case on August 30, 2007. AER at 14.

One day before the first case closed, on August 29, 2007, Mr. Lawrence filed a second chapter 11 case for the Windmans, No. 07-17535 (the "follow-on case" or "Windman II"). AER at 261. The case was assigned to the same judge. ER at 15. Mr. Lawrence filed many of the same flawed schedules.[2] AER at 261. Again the bankruptcy court issued deficiency notices due to missing schedules and other missing documents. AER 301-304. Mr. Lawrence afterwards worked with the Windmans' bookkeeper to make handwritten corrections to the submitted schedules and "many of the handwritten corrections" were entered into the record on October 2, 2007 at the meeting of creditors required by 11 U.S.C. § 341. AER at 50, ¶¶ 4-5.

[2] For instance, in the first petition, Mr. Lawrence's address is "Law Offices of Arthuer [sic] G. Lawrence 1089 santa [sic] Anita Avenue;" the same errors appear on the August 29 filing. On the second filing, the date June 22, 2007 by the signatures has been crossed out and the date August 20, 2007 written in by hand. Compare AED at 215-17 (Official Form 1 filed June 22, 2007) with AED at 261-63 (Official Form 1 filed Aug. 29, 2007). The follow-on petition has two Statements of Related Cases: the first is dated August 20, 2007 and states that the Windmans had no previous bankruptcy filings. AER at 264. The second is dated August 28, 2007 and lists Windman I. The Summary of Schedules and the Schedules in the follow-on case (07-17535) lists the Case Number of the predecessor case (07-15236). AER at 266-287. The Statement of Financial Affairs in the follow-on case has the same "year to date" figure for non-employment income, although it was filed two months later. Compare AER 247 with AER 283.

Mr. Lawrence included an attorney compensation disclosure statement in the follow-on filing, dated August 20, 2007, in which he represented that he had received a $10,000 retainer and agreed to work for $150 per hour. AER at 213. He certified again that the disclosed compensation reflected the payment agreed upon for his representation in "this" bankruptcy proceeding. AER at 213. He again did not seek authorization from the bankruptcy court to represent the Windmans' chapter 11 estate, as required by section 327. AER at 171, 176, 177.

Less than three weeks after filing Windman II, the State Bar of California suspended Mr. Lawrence from practicing law because he failed the Multistate Professional Responsibility Examination. AER at 129, ¶ 28. California had required him to take the test as part of a stipulated disciplinary action for commingling client funds. AER at 16, 22, 33. Mr. Lawrence charged the debtors $600 for traveling to their home to inform them of his suspension. AER at 136, 177. After he was suspended from practice, Mr. Lawrence tried to remain on the case, styling himself a "business advisor," but he continued to work without seeking or obtaining court authorization under section 327 to act as a bankruptcy professional. AER at 171, 176.

The Windmans hired a new attorney, Lorraine Howell, paying her $4,000 to represent them.[3] AER at 196. Ms. Howell worked with the debtors to identify and correct most of the mistakes in the debtors' schedules. AER at 156-158. After reviewing the case, Ms. Howell explained to the court that the debtors had filed bankruptcy primarily "for the purpose of having a place to breath[e] and to reorganize their matters because they found themselves in a real property dispute among family members in the California Superior Court." ER at 19.

[3] Ms. Howell is also counsel of record for Mr. Lawrence in this appeal.

The United States Trustee moved to dismiss Windman II for "cause" under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b) because the schedules that Mr. Lawrence had submitted remained deficient and he had not complied with reporting requirements and other court rules. AER at 1-5. In addition, Wayne Windman and other litigants in the state court proceeding filed a motion for attorney's fees on the grounds that the chapter 11 filing had been done in bad faith. ER at 35-36. After briefing and a hearing, the bankruptcy court granted the motion to dismiss with a 180-day refiling bar. ER at 29-30. It found the Windmans' case had been filed in bad faith due to 1) numerous compliance issues; 2) uncorrected errors in filings; and 3) the "admitted fact that the sole purpose of the instant filing was to gain leverage or other advantage with state court litigation regarding the partition of real property and not to resolve any other financial difficulties." Id. The court also granted Wayne Windman's motion and ordered the debtors and Mr. Lawrence jointly to reimburse him and his co-litigants in the state court case for $18,000 in fees that their counsel had charged for dealing with the bad-faith bankruptcy court litigation. ER at 35-37. The dismissal order also retained jurisdiction to adjudicate a motion by the United States Trustee to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees. ER at 30.

The United States Trustee filed a motion to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees in Windman II to zero because 1) Mr. Lawrence failed to "competently represent" the Windmans and 2) he failed to "comply with the rules governing employment of professionals in bankruptcy cases." ER at 41-42, 44, 46. At the fee-motion hearing on February 7, 2008, the bankruptcy court tentatively ruled that Mr. Lawrence must return his $10,000 retainer that he had disclosed he had received in Windman II. AER at 213. The court found it was excessive compensation for the 20 days Mr. Lawrence was involved in Windman II before he was suspended for failing the Multistate Professional Responsibility Exam. AER at 107-08.

After the court explained its tentative ruling denying all fees in Windman II, Mr. Lawrence stated that his disclosure that he had been paid a retainer of $10,000 in Windman II was incorrect. Facing a complete denial of fees in Windman II, he testified:

> Mr. Lawrence: [My] statement in there that I paid, uh, I was paid a retainer of $10,000, uh, for the filing of the second chapter bankruptcy work is error. That has to be amended, and I have to apologize for that mistake.
> Court: Wait, so the 10,000 was for both cases?
>
> Mr. Lawrence: The $10,000 were the monies that I received from the very beginning, which was on or about June 22, June 21, um, roughly nine weeks before that. And I'm not going to refer to the bill or the dates or the amounts because the Court doesn't have the benefit of, um, seeing it.

AER at 110.

Based on the confusion arising from Mr. Lawrence's last-minute change in testimony, the bankruptcy court continued the hearing so that Mr. Lawrence could submit additional billing records to prove in what case(s) he had received fees. AER at 113. On February 26, 2008, Mr. Lawrence submitted an amended disclosure of attorney compensation that stated he had received $2,139.50 for compensation in Windman II. AER at 147. He failed, however, to submit any evidence substantiating his fee claims or a declaration explaining his billing methods. AER at 173-174.

Instead, he submitted a billing statement that he had created between the two February hearings. AER at 132-36. The Statement contained several entries that had nothing to do with the Windmans bankruptcy cases. For instance, he charged four hours to meet with the Windmans "at Factors Deli" to "review two Superior Court law suits." AER at 132. He billed them six hours to inspect a building in Culver City "to analyze its value." AER at 133-34. He also billed five hours, including two hours travel time, to "gather information regarding the Haney Law firm's billing and their efforts to lease vacant space in the Washington Blvd property." AER at 135.

In contrast, he billed one hour to "work[] with Mr. Goe's office to prepare Second Petition for Chapter 11," yet charged four hours to file the petition. AER at 135. He billed $1,275 for his work as a "business advisor" after he was suspended from the practice of law. AER at 136. Finally, he neglected to bill for preparing and filing three extensions of time on July 6, 19, and 27, 2007. AER at 132-36. The billing statement also does not reflect any work done on the status report he submitted out of time at a hearing on August 8, 2007. Id.

After reviewing Mr. Lawrence's billing statement, the bankruptcy court stated that there was nothing in it "that makes me think it's reliable." AER at 175; see AER at 92 (commenting on Mr. Lawrence's "relatively haphazard system for keeping track of time spent for the Windmans").

The only record of payment in the record that was contemporaneously prepared is a one-page handwritten note by the Windmans' bookkeeper. ER at 56.

On February 28, 2008, the bankruptcy court conducted a second hearing on Mr. Lawrence's fee application, which produced a 40-page transcript. The colloquy between the bankruptcy court and Mr. Lawrence takes up approximately 17 pages. AER at 188-205.

The bankruptcy court admonished Mr. Lawrence three times to focus his comments on the fee issue, asking that he proceed more quickly in fairness to other litigants.[4] Finally, the bankruptcy court stated "Okay, so I'm going to give you a total of five more minutes to make remarks here . . . it isn't just that I have other parties waiting, it's that what you're telling me is not helpful and not relevant to the issues I need to focus on." AER at 197 (emphasis added).

[4] "Okay, I need you to make your simple statement more quickly. If you'll notice, I have a pretty full courtroom of people waiting. So if you - I understand that you have a manner of delivering things, and I hate to interfere with your personal style, but it-we need to pick it up a little bit." AER at 191.

"Okay, sir, you need to focus your remarks more quickly. You need to move more quickly through this, or I'm going to need to terminate this, this hearing . . . ."

At the end of Mr. Lawrence's presentation, the court found that Mr. Lawrence's advice and services to his clients could not be reasonably valued at $10,000 and that his fees were not justified under 11 U.S.C. § 329. AER at 200-202. The court limited Mr. Lawrence's aggregate compensation for both cases to $2,000: "That [$2,000] would be intended to be the total amount due, the $1,000 per case will be the total amount due for both cases, period." AER at 179. The bankruptcy court did not award more because "the services that were rendered were really substandard in this case." AER at 200. The bankruptcy court also considered the fact that Windman II was filed in bad faith, although that aspect of the case was "not a dispositive factor" in the decision to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees to $1,000 for each case. AER at 200.

When Mr. Lawrence attempted to argue that issues related to his performance should be adjudicated by the California state bar, the bankruptcy court stated that "under 28 U.S.C. 1334, [this court] does have exclusive jurisdiction over the issue of what's an appropriate amount to allow as compensation for services rendered by a bankruptcy attorney in a bankruptcy case." AER at 201. Mr. Lawrence responded that his position was that "for the work I did, when I did it, and how I did it, has no place being looked at by Your Honor in this case. It doesn't come within your jurisdiction." AER at 202.

The bankruptcy court ordered Mr. Lawrence to return $8,850 by paying the money to the Windmans' opponents in the state court litigation in partial satisfaction of the November 7, 2007 award they had received against him from the bankruptcy court because Windman II was filed in bad faith. AER at 202-204; ER at 52.[5]

A. Appeal to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel

Mr. Lawrence appealed to the bankruptcy appellate panel of the Ninth Circuit on two grounds: first, the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction to order a reduction in fees; and, second, it abused its discretion in awarding him $2,000 for his representation of the Windmans.

In an unpublished opinion, the bankruptcy appellate panel affirmed the reduction of fees to $1,000 for Mr. Lawrence's work in each of the two Windman cases. Lawrence v. United States Trustee (In re Windman), 08-1080, slip op. at 2 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. Nov. 18, 2009) ("Mem. Op."); United States Trustee Supp. ER at 32. It held that the bankruptcy court had not abused its discretion in finding Mr. Lawrence's legal representation to be "substandard." Mem. Op. at 7; United States Trustee Supp. ER at 37 (stating that "there is . . . ample evidence in the record to support such a determination [of poor representation]").

[5] The finding of bad faith was ultimately expunged by agreement of the parties on appeal in a separate case, but the debtors and Mr. Lawrence remained jointly liable for attorney fees. ER at 57-59.

The bankruptcy appellate panel held that the bankruptcy court did not lose its jurisdiction to address outstanding fee issues in Windman I after it was dismissed and closed, because a motion to reduce fees under section 329 is a core proceeding "arising under" the court's jurisdiction as provided for in title 28, section 1334(b). Id. at 9. The panel stated that "we think" that the bankruptcy court could order the reduction of fees without "formally reopening the case under § 350." Id. at 10. It did not decide the issue because "on these facts, any error was harmless." Id. The panel also suggested that the fee reduction order should be upheld on equitable grounds because any confusion was due to Mr. Lawrence's lack of candor with the bankruptcy court. Id. at 11.

Mr. Lawrence filed a timely appeal to this Court. United States Trustee Supp. ER at 1-2.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews decisions of the bankruptcy appellate panel de novo and applies the same standard of review as the panel applied to the bankruptcy court's decision. Boyajian v. New Falls Corp. (In re Boyajian), 564 F.3d 1088, 1090 (9th Cir. 2009). In this case, the bankruptcy appellate panel reviewed the bankruptcy court's conclusions of law de novo and its findings of fact for clear error. Mem. Op. at 6; United States Trustee Supp. ER at 36; see Scott v. United States Trustee (In re Doser), 412 F.3d 1056, 1061 (9th Cir. 2005).

The bankruptcy court's jurisdiction over Mr. Lawrence's fees in the Windman cases is a question of law that is reviewed de novo. McDonald v. Checks-N-Advance (In re Ferrell), 539 F.3d 1186, 1189 (9th Cir. 2008). A bankruptcy court's reduction of attorney's fees is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Roberts, Sheridan & Kotel, PC v. Bergen Brunswick Drug Co. (In re Mednet), 251 B.R. 103, 106 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2000).

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

1. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it reduced Mr. Lawrence's fees in two sequential chapter 11 cases to $2,000 because of the "substandard" service he provided. Under section 329 of the Bankruptcy Code, a bankruptcy court may reduce or eliminate attorney fees if the compensation "exceeds the reasonable value" of the services provided.

Mr. Lawrence did not serve his clients well; in fact, they were in a worse position after they followed Mr. Lawrence's legal advice. Both of their bankruptcy cases were dismissed. The first case ended because Mr. Lawrence allowed his clients to file before receiving mandatory pre-bankruptcy credit counseling. Mr. Lawrence's filings in the first case were full of errors, the vast majority of which he did not correct when he re-filed the schedules in the second case.

The results of the second case were even worse. In addition to taking issue with his flawed schedules and filings, the court ruled that the follow-on case had been filed in bad faith. As a result, the Windmans were prohibited from receiving bankruptcy relief for 180 days. They had to pay a second attorney an additional $4,000 to correct the errors and bring the second case to a close. And the Windmans were ordered jointly with Mr. Lawrence to reimburse the litigants in the state-court case $18,000 in the attorney fees that they incurred protecting their rights in the bankruptcy case.

Given Mr. Lawrence's incompetent representation, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in reducing his fees.

2. There are three factors that made it proper for the bankruptcy court to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees, regardless of whether they were earned in the dismissed case (Windman II) or the dismissed and closed case (Windman I).

First, Mr. Lawrence created the ambiguity about when he received his fees when he claimed at the last minute that he received $10,000 in the follow-on case was a "mistake." Facing denial of these fees, he tried to convince the court that he had received the money in Windman I, in an apparent attempt to create doubt about the court's jurisdiction. In that way, he hoped to stop the court from implementing its tentative decision to reduce his fees to zero. But he had no right to fees in Windman I either, both due to his poor work and because he had never been appointed under section 327.[6]

Second, the predecessor and follow-on cases are mirror images of each other. They involve the same parties, issues, and are before the same judge, who anticipated having the follow-on case assigned to her. In fact, the two cases even were both open at the same time for one day. No one is prejudiced by the court's decision to handle the fee issue in one case.

Third, case law from the Supreme Court, and this Court demonstrate that a court's jurisdiction is at its zenith when addressing issues related to the administration of justice, particularly the conduct of an officer of the court. This is particularly true when a court must consider whether the conduct of the attorney before it warrants a reduction of fees. Bankruptcy courts in particular have an affirmative duty to ensure that attorney fees are reasonable because they are paid out of the debtor's estate and thus reduce the dividend otherwise available to creditors.

In fact, had the bankruptcy court accepted Mr. Lawrence's assertion it did not have jurisdiction over his fees, it would have made meaningless its finding that Mr. Lawrence represented his clients poorly. It also would have acquiesced in the violation of sections 327, 329 and 330 of the Bankruptcy Code in both cases, which only authorize compensation that is commensurate with the quality of the services rendered.

[6] See Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 533-34 (2004) (holding chapter 11 counsel must be retained under section 327to receive fees).

3. Mr. Lawrence's other arguments for why he should be able to keep $10,000 for services that were detrimental to his clients are without merit:

- Value of Service: Mr. Lawrence merely asserts that the work he did on the Windmans' state-court litigation was in contemplation of, or connected to, the bankruptcy cases and therefore is compensable. He has not produced credible billing records. Furthermore, his service in bankruptcy to the Windmans was so poor that it cannot be offset by other work, even if it were relevant to the bankruptcy cases.
- Due Process and Judicial Bias: The bankruptcy court held two hearings on the fee issue, allowed three rounds of briefing, and gave Mr. Lawrence a second opportunity to produce contemporaneous billing records, affording him ample due process. In the end, the court let him keep $2,000 in spite of his poor representation, undermining any allegation of bias.
- Bad Faith Filing of *Windman II: The bankruptcy court reduced Mr. Windman's fees because of his "substandard" legal representation. Because the bad faith finding was not a "dispositive factor" for reducing fees, its expungement – even if legally valid – does not change the result here.

- Mootness: The reduction of fees is not moot simply because the bankruptcy court designated a recipient of the funds who has now been paid, something Mr. Lawrence alleges but does not prove. The determining factor is the quality of the services, not who receives the refund.

The bankruptcy court's decision to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees to $2,000 should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion by Reducing Mr. Lawrence's Fees Because Its Findings that He Served His Clients Poorly and Ignored the Bankruptcy Code's Requirements Concerning Attorney Compensation Were Not Clearly Erroneous.

A. Mr. Lawrence is not entitled to $10,000 because the Bankruptcy Code requires that an attorney's compensation be commensurate with the value the attorney has provided to the estate, and the bankruptcy court's finding that Mr. Lawrence's representation was "substandard" is not clearly erroneous.

The bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that Mr. Lawrence's representation of the debtors was "substandard." Under the Bankruptcy Code, a professional can only be paid an amount that reflects the value his or her work has brought to the estate. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3) (tying the amount of compensation to the "value" of the services and the "benefit" rendered to the estate); 11 U.S.C. § 329 (authorizing courts to order attorneys to return excessive fees to debtors).

The bankruptcy court's finding that Mr. Lawrence's representation of the elderly Windmans was substandard is amply supported by the record. For instance:

- In June 2007, Mr. Lawrence filed a chapter 11 petition for his clients that he admits was filled with "numerous errors . . . including obvious typographical errors." AER at 50. The petition also failed to include a number of required forms. AER at 224, 226.

- Mr. Lawrence failed to advise his clients that they needed to complete credit counseling before filing chapter 11 bankruptcy, which led to Windman I being dismissed, creating a "detriment" because they were "behind the eight ball coming in a second time." AER at 6, 178.
- On August 29, one day before Windman I was closed, Mr. Lawrence filed the same error-ridden petition to commence the follow-on chapter 11 case, Windman II. AER at 183, 241, 279 (listing, for example, a $65 cable television bill as a $6,500 obligation on Schedule F in both cases).
- Mr. Lawrence represented the Windmans for less than a month in the follow-on case. He was suspended from the practice of law after that because he failed the Multi-State Professional Responsibility Exam, which the State Bar of California had ordered him to take as part of a disciplinary proceeding.

For comparison, an attorney who filed an incomplete and erroneous bankruptcy petition, failed to inform the debtors about the bankruptcy process, and tried to persuade them to dismiss their petition without explaining the consequences, had to return all the fees he received. Hale v. United States Trustee, 509 F.3d 1139, 1147 (9th Cir. 2007). Mr. Lawrence's representation of the Windmans is of the same, or lower, caliber.

Mr. Lawrence's efforts on behalf of the Windmans resulted in two error-filled chapter 11 petitions, two dismissals of their bankruptcy cases – the second with a bad faith finding, leading to a 180-day filing bar against them. His work also caused an $18,000 liability for third-party attorney fees, $2,078 in filing fees, and $4,000 in fees to substitute counsel. AER at 105, 178-79, 196; ER at 27. Plus the Windmans had to pay Mr. Lawrence himself $2,000. Not only did Mr. Lawrence's services not benefit the Windmans, they were worse off than they had been before they met Mr. Lawrence. ER at 36. Under these circumstances, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in concluding that Mr. Lawrence did not render any beneficial service to the Windmans and thus his fees should be reduced.

B. Far from abusing its discretion, the bankruptcy court generously gave Mr. Lawrence $2,000 in fees although he failed to comply with the requirements in the Bankruptcy Code that professionals must follow to receive compensation.

Mr. Lawrence wants to shield his fees by arguing he earned them in Windman I. Mr. Lawrence's ploy cannot work. He has no legal basis to claim fees in the predecessor case for three reasons.

Under sections 327 and 1107, the Windmans needed court approval to employ Mr. Lawrence before he could work on the case for compensation. 11 U.S.C. § 327; 11 U.S.C. § 1107; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a) (describing employment application process). Failure to obtain court authorization prohibits fees. See Lamie, 540 U.S. at 529. Neben & Starrett Inc. v. Chart well Fin. Corp (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877, 883 (9th Cir. 1995); In re Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1040. See also Mehdipour v. Marcus & Millichap (In re Mehdipour), 202 B.R. 474, 480 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1996) (stating that these rules "are not discretionary").

It is undisputed that Mr. Lawrence did not request employment authorization under section 327 in either case. Given this, the bankruptcy court would not have abused its discretion had it denied all fees in both cases. Instead it allowed Mr. Lawrence to keep $2,000, although he had ignored the Code requirements for employment authorization.

Second, an attorney must seek approval for the amount of compensation received so that the bankruptcy court and other parties in interest may verify it is reasonable. 11 U.S.C. §§ 329, 330. Complete candor in disclosing what compensation was received within the year before the filing of the bankruptcy petition is required. 11 U.S.C. § 329. Any inaccuracy regarding the time of receipt of a retainer is alone sufficient grounds to reduce fees. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1045. Thus, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in reducing Mr. Lawrence's fees because of his admission that his attorney disclosure in the follow-on case was a "mistake."

Attorneys are required to disclose compensation and seek court approval to "protect the debtor from the debtor's attorney" by making sure the debtor is not overcharged. Id. at 1044. Furthermore, bankruptcy courts have an affirmative duty to review all fees because they are paid out of the debtor's estate and thus reduce the dividend otherwise available to creditors. In re Busy Beaver Bldg. Centers, Inc., 19 F.3d 833, 841 (3d Cir. 1994); In re Dorsett, 297 B.R. 620, 624 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 2003) (chapter 13 case) (citing In re Montgomery Drilling Co., 121 B.R. 32, 35 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1990) (chapter 11 case)). Therefore, an attorney may not keep fees received without court authorization. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016(a) (stating an attorney "shall" file an application for compensation); cf. In re Pedersen, 229 B.R. 445, 449 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1999) ("To obtain court approval of attorneys' fees outside of the chapter 13 fee guidelines, a fee application must be filed.").

It is undisputed that Mr. Lawrence did not seek approval for his fees in the predecessor case. 11 U.S.C. §§ 329-330; see generally docket in case 07-15236, AER 9-14. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in giving him $1,000 for his work in Windman I because he had neglected to seek any court authorization for fees.

Third, a bankruptcy court has discretion to refuse to approve fees if the applicant cannot produce contemporaneous billing statements. See Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. 424, 433 (1982). It is undisputed that Mr. Lawrence did not provide a contemporaneous record of the fees he charged the Windmans in either case.[7] [7] The only contemporaneous evidence regarding Mr. Lawrence's fees is a handwritten note by the Windmans' bookkeeper. ER at 56. The court continued the case for two weeks after the initial hearing so that Mr. Lawrence could produce additional credible documentation, which he was not able to do. AER at 114-115, 175.

Furthermore, a court has discretion not to award fees if it does not find reconstructed billing statements credible. See United States v. $12,248 U.S. Currency, 957 F.2d 1513, 1521 (9th Cir.1992). The bankruptcy court found that nothing in the billing statement that Mr. Lawrence recreated "makes me think it's reliable." AER at 175.

Faced with evidence of Mr. Lawrence's detrimental service to the Windmans, with his lack of billing records, and with his admission that his Attorney Compensation Disclosure was false, the bankruptcy court acted properly in reducing Mr. Lawrence's fees to $1,000 for his work in each case.

II. Under the Circumstances of this Case, the Bankruptcy Court Properly Ordered Mr. Lawrence to Return Fees No Matter When He Received Them.

A. The bankruptcy court could assert jurisdiction to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees to $1,000 in Windman II after the case had been dismissed.

The bankruptcy court ordered the fee reduction in Windman II after the case had been dismissed but before it was closed. Mr. Lawrence does not challenge the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction over his fees in Windman II. See Br. at 17. Nor could he. The court expressly retained jurisdiction to decide the fee issue. ER at 30. Furthermore, it had the power to do so because "bankruptcy courts have broad powers over fees paid to attorneys." Mem. Op. at 9; United States Trustee Supp. ER at 39 (citing 28 U.S.C. § 1334); see e.g., Park Ave. Assoc. LLC v. Park Ave. Garage, LLC

(In re Park Ave. Garage, LLC), Nos. 10-455 & 10-391, 2010 WL 5071879, at *1, n.2 (2d Cir. Dec. 14, 2010) (summary order).

. The bankruptcy appellate panel below relied on In re Aheong to hold the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to reduce attorney fees even if the case were dismissed. Mem. Op. at 9-10 (United States Trustee Supp. ER at 39-40) (discussing Aheong v. Mellon Mortg. Co. (In re Aheong), 276 B.R. 233, 244 (9th Cir BAP 2002)). It concluded that section 1334, which applies to bankruptcy courts through 28 U.S.C. § 157(a), allowed a bankruptcy court to hear any request for relief under Bankruptcy Code, including, section 329. Id. (holding that an attorney fee adjudication is a "core proceeding arising under title 11" under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1) & (2)(A)).

This Court has also approved consideration of attorney fee issues after the main bankruptcy petition has been dismissed but before the case is closed. Tsafaroff v. Taylor (In re Taylor), 884 F.2d 478, 481 (9th Cir. 1989) (stating that a bankruptcy court retains jurisdiction to dispose of "ancillary matters" such as "an award of attorney's fees for services rendered in connection with the underlying action"); see also Battle Ground Plaza, LLC v. Ray (In re Ray), – F.3d – , No. 09-60005, 2010 WL 4160135, at *9 (9th Cir. Oct. 25, 2010); U.S.A. Motel Corp. v. Danning, 521 F.2d 117 (9th Cir. 1975) (affirming a fee award rendered after a chapter 11 case was dismissed).

In analogous situations, the Supreme Court has allowed courts to address attorney fee issues after the underlying case is completed because "[i]t is well established that a federal court may consider collateral issues after an action is no longer pending." Cooter & Gell v. Hartmarx Corp., 496 U.S. 384, 395 (1990) (awarding Rule 11 sanctions against an attorney) (citing Sprague v. Ticonic Nat'l Bank, 307 U.S. 161(1939)). In Sprague, the Court held that an attorney fee application cannot be fully assessed until the underlying litigation is over and therefore a federal court can consider a request for attorney fees "years after a judgment on the merits." See Sprague, 307 U.S. at 170; Chambers v. NASCO Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 56 (1991) (taxing attorney fees after judgment).

Furthermore, Cooter itself held that a court has jurisdiction to consider Rule 11 sanctions after the underlying case is terminated because the violation occurs during the case when the meritless papers are filed. Cooter, 496 U.S. at 395. If a litigant could escape sanction simply by dismissing the case, the deterrent effect of Rule 11 would be lost. Id. at 398.

Similarly, Mr. Lawrence rendered "substandard" services to the Windmans throughout his representation. He should not be able to avoid the consequences simply because his poor lawyering led to the dismissal of the case. See also NASCO, 501 U.S. 32, 55 (1991) (allowing court to sanction of attorneys fees after final judgment).

Mr. Lawrence's reliance on Taylor for the proposition that a bankruptcy court cannot reduce fees in a dismissed case is misplaced. Br. at 16. Although Taylor says that a bankruptcy court may not grant new relief after a case has been dismissed, 884 F.2d at 481, it also carves out an exception that allows courts to deal with "ancillary matters" such as attorney fees after dismissal. Id. The bankruptcy court did not order any "new relief" as Mr. Lawrence asserts. Br. 16-17. Rather, it dealt with the question of Mr. Lawrence's compensation after Windman II had been dismissed and it became clear how detrimental Mr. Lawrence's representation had been. NASCO, 501 U.S. at 55; Sprague, 307 U.S. at 170.

Finally, Mr. Lawrence is responsible for the fact that bankruptcy court did not address fees in the predecessor case because he did not seek employment authorization or approval for fees. 11 U.S.C. § 327, 330. He cannot ignore the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code and then seek to profit from his inaction.

The bankruptcy court acted properly in exercising its jurisdiction even after Windman II had been dismissed to order Mr. Lawrence to keep $1,000 in fees and return the balance.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Also Acted Properly In Reducing Mr. Lawrence's Fees in the Predecessor Case, Windman I, to $1,000.

The only procedural difference between the two Windman cases is that the predecessor case was both dismissed and closed without addressing attorney fees whereas the follow-on case dealt with the fee issue post dismissal but before closure.

This Court has not ruled on whether closing a case terminates the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction over attorney fees.[8] It has addressed the issue in dicta, however, observing that such jurisdiction can be proper in the case of attorney fees. Elias v. United States Trustee (In re Elias), 188 F.3d 1160, 1161 (9th Cir. 1999) (stating that reopening a case "was not necessary for a determination of fees in favor of Elias").

On the issue of whether the bankruptcy court could reduce fees without "formally reopening" Windman I the bankruptcy appellate panel stated "[w]e think it could." Id. at 10. It did not decide the matter, however, because any failure to reopen was "harmless error." Id.

Other lower courts in this circuit have concluded that in the bankruptcy context closing a case does not necessarily affect jurisdiction. Menk v. Lapaglia (In re Menk), 241 B.R. 896, 910-11 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1999) ("[R]eopening a closed case is not a jurisdictional prerequisite to subject-matter jurisdiction under § 1334(b)."); Sole Survivor Corp. v. Buxbaum, No. CV 07-3858, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9400, at *16 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 22, 2009) (stating that closing a bankruptcy case is an administrative act done by the clerk of court that has no jurisdictional significance); Aheong, 276 B.R. at 244.[9] [8] This jurisdictional argument is based on the fact that attorney fees are at issue. The United States Trustee does not take any position concerning bankruptcy court jurisdiction in closed cases as a general matter.

[9] In a "Notice to Appellants" the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, acting in a bankruptcy appeal, stated: "The Court's indication in its Order that the case was closed, which was included in the order for statistical

Finally, the United States Trustee has located two cases that are directly on-point and in both cases the courts – one bankruptcy, one district – held that the authority of a bankruptcy court to police fees stretches back into closed cases. Leinbach v. Reigle (In re Ramelah), No. 08-5074, 2009 WL 1213953, at *7 (E.D. Pa. May 5, 2009) ("the Ramelah III Bankruptcy Court acted properly to order disgorgement of a fee associated with a prior closed case"). The Brown court found that its "jurisdiction to review such fees is not dependent on whether the status of the case stands as open, closed, pending, or dismissed." In re Brown, 371 B.R. 486, 494 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. 2007) (ordering disgorgement in a pending 2006 bankruptcy case of fees charged in two related, but dismissed, 2003 bankruptcy cases).

Remalah and Brown are directly on point. They involve poor performance by a lawyer who failed to disclose fees and who represented the debtors in serial cases. The United States Trustee is not aware of any case with this fact pattern with the opposite result.

Interpreting bankruptcy court jurisdiction to allow attorney fee determinations at any stage of this case makes sense. Although section 1334(b), which is the bankruptcy-specific jurisdictional provision, does not speak in terms of closed cases, purposes only, does not require a subsequent order reopening the case in order to permit a party to file a timely motion for reconsideration." Law Works USA Inc. v. Walton, No. 10-60731, (S.D. Fla. entered Oct. 6, 2010) (Dkt. #28) (available on PACER).

the legislative history to its similar predecessor, repealed section 1471(b), expressly stated that jurisdiction exists over closed cases. Section 1334(b) went into effect on July 10, 1984. Act of July 10, 1984, Pub. L. 98-353, 98 Stat. 333. Its predecessor, 28 U.S.C. § 1471(b), was enacted in 1978 and was superceded by the enactment of section 1334(b). Act of Nov. 6, 1978, Pub. L. 95-598, 92 Stat. 2667.

The legislative history of section 1334(b)'s similarly-worded predecessor noted it gave bankruptcy courts jurisdiction to take action in closed cases."[10] H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 445 (1977), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 6400. The legislative history states that bankruptcy court jurisdiction "also includes any disputes related to administrative matters in a bankruptcy case. The use of the term 'proceeding,' though, is not intended to confine the bankruptcy case. Very often, issues will arise after the case is closed. . . . The bankruptcy courts will be able to hear these proceedings because they arise under Title 11." Id. (emphasis added).

The United States does not mean to suggest that bankruptcy courts are free to act outside the ambit of any case. To exercise jurisdiction, it must have a vehicle - an open case - through which to act.

[10] This legislative history is significant because the text of the relevant part of section 1471, which is section 1471(b), mirrors the relevant part of section 1334 of title 28, which is section 1334(b). Compare 28 U.S.C. 1471(b) (repealed) (granting bankruptcy courts jurisdiction over "all civil proceedings arising under title 11 or arising in or related to cases under title 11") with 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b) (bestowing jurisdiction on "all civil proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in or related to cases under title 11"). The full text is appended in the Addendum at 12-13.

Here there was a case - the Windmans' follow-on bankruptcy, which overlapped the predecessor case by one day. The two cases had the same judge. They had the same parties. The pleadings were virtually identical because Mr. Lawrence appears to have largely reprinted the predecessor case's pleadings and resubmitted them in Windman II. And Mr. Lawrence put his fees in the first case at issue in the second one by first alleging he had received $10,000 in the second case and then changing his story to allege $8,000 of that $10,000 was actually earned in the first.

There may be cases where section 1334(b) is not broad enough to allow courts to take actions in open cases that occurred in a prior one. But this situation, which involves identical facts and law, and sits at the core of a bankruptcy court's jurisdiction - adjudicating fees - is one in which the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to adjudicate Mr. Lawrence's fees in the first case after Mr. Lawrence put them at issue in the follow-on case.

Were this Court to have concerns over the bankruptcy court's power to order a fee reduction in a closed case, however, the solution would be to affirm the fee reduction for the open case (Windman II) and remand with instructions so that the bankruptcy court could re-open the predecessor case and enter the fee reduction order in that case as well. 11 U.S.C. § 350. There is no legal justification for allowing Mr. Lawrence to keep his full retainer.

III. Mr. Lawrence's Arguments that the Bankruptcy Court Improperly Reduced His Fees Are Unpersuasive.

A. Mr. Lawrence's argument that his work in the Windmans' state-court real estate action was "in connection with" or "in contemplation of" the Windmans' two bankruptcy cases has been waived, is not supported by the evidence, and does not redeem his poor performance in the bankruptcy cases.

Mr. Lawrence argues that other work that he did for the Windmans in connection with a non-bankruptcy state-law suit property suit was "in connection with" or "in contemplation of" their bankruptcy case, and thus he is entitled to the full amount of his fees. Br. at 9-11. This argument is without merit for three reasons. It is waived; it is not supported by the evidence; and services related to state-court litigation cannot offset Mr. Lawrence's detrimental representation of the Windmans in the bankruptcy court.

Mr. Lawrence did not raise the issue of his state-court litigation work for the Windmans in his opening brief to the bankruptcy appellate panel. Lawrence v. United States Trustee (In re Windman), No. 08-1080, Doc. #91291691 (filed Apr. 9, 2009).[11] An issue not raised on appeal is waived. "It is a fundamental rule of federal appellate procedure that only such points as are made in the court below or such questions as [11] This Court may take judicial notice of Mr. Lawrence's briefs below. O'Rourke v. Seaboard (In re E.R. Fegert, Inc.), 887 F.2d 955, 958 (9th Cir. 1989). In addition, the United States Trustee has filed a motion to supplement the record in order to provide excerpts from the briefs in his Supplemental Record Excerpts.

are there raised will be reviewed on appeal[.]" Kottemann v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 81 F.2d 621, 623 (9th Cir. 1936).[12]

And Mr. Lawrence only made a general argument about the value of his services in his reply brief to the bankruptcy appellate panel, mentioning his work in the state-court litigation. This, however, did not preserve the issue for two reasons.

First, a litigant may not raise an issue for the first time on appeal in a reply brief. United States v. Montoya, 45 F.3d 1286, 1300 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 814 (1995). But see Baldwin v. Marshack (In re Baldwin), 70 B.R. 612, 617 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1987) (stating that raising an issue for the first time in a reply brief is "disfavored"). Second, Mr. Lawrence did not argue that his state-court litigation work was "connected to" or "in anticipation of" the Windmans' bankruptcy cases until this appeal. Even in his brief to this Court, he does not discuss the tests used to determine if legal services do qualify under section 329. In re Perrine, 369 B.R. 571, 580 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2007); In re Rheuban, 121 B.R. 368, 378 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1990). An underdeveloped argument is likewise waived. See In re Aimster Copyright Litig., 334 F.3d 643, 656 (7th Cir. 2003).

[12] A district court may decide an issue of law that was not raised in the bankruptcy court, if it is supported by the record. Pizza of Hawaii, Inc. v. Shakey's, Inc. (In re Pizza of Hawaii, Inc.), 761 F.2d 1374, 1379 (9th Cir.1985). Here, however, Mr. Lawrence is attempting for the first time to interpret section 329 based on facts that he has not proven and which the bankruptcy court did not find.

In addition, the lack of reliable evidence is fatal to Mr. Lawrence's argument. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding that his billing statements were not credible. AER at 175. Therefore, Mr. Lawrence has not met his burden as appellant to show that 1) he did work related to the state-court litigation and 2) that his services had a connection to the bankruptcy case that would satisfy section 329 and 3) that his services provided value to the chapter 11 estate, as required by section 330.

Finally, Mr. Lawrence is left with the bankruptcy court's finding that his services were "substandard." Mr. Lawrence does not explain how any legal work that led to the dismissal of the Windman II bankruptcy case could possibly warrant compensation under section 329. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that Mr. Lawrence provided no benefit to the estate, "other than stalling, which is an inappropriate benefit . . . ." AER at 179.

B. The bankruptcy court's finding that the Windmans' case was filed in bad faith may have been "expunged" in an appeal settlement, but this is irrelevant to the bankruptcy court's decision to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees.

Mr. Lawrence argues that the district court on appeal approved a settlement in which the bankruptcy court's "bad faith" finding was "expunged" from the record, making the reduction of his fees clearly erroneous. Br. at 12; ER at 63-64 (Order). This argument is unpersuasive.

Mr. Lawrence is making the remarkable suggestion that he should get full fees because he filed a bankruptcy case in bad faith. Such conduct should be sanctioned, regardless of whether the sanctioned party subsequently persuades the other party to give up the bad faith finding for a payment of money, which is what happened here.[13]

The bankruptcy court discussed the fact that Windman II was dismissed as a bad-faith filing but that aspect of the case was not the "dispositive factor" that caused the bankruptcy court to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees. Instead, "the problem [was] . . . that the services weren't adequately rendered in order to make that bankruptcy filing survive." AER at 199-200. The decision to reduce Mr. Lawrence's fees resulted from 1) the limited services he rendered to the Windmans and 2) the poor quality of the services he did perform. AER at 102-103. Specifically, Mr. Lawrence's efforts resulted in two dismissed bankruptcy cases and cost his clients "a fair amount of money," only a part of which was attributable to Mr. Lawrence's advice to file for bankruptcy to delay state-court litigation. AER at 195-96.

C. The fee-reduction order is not "moot."

[13] Although the issue is not before this Court, a losing party may not expunge, i.e. vacate, a court finding through an agreement with the prevailing party, as was done here. United States Bancorp Mortg. Co. v. Bonner Mall Partnership, 513 U.S. 18, 26 (1994) ("It is petitioner's burden, as the party seeking relief from the status quo of the appellate judgment, to demonstrate . . . equitable entitlement to the extraordinary remedy of vacatur.").

Mr. Lawrence's argument that the fee-reduction order is "moot" is without merit. The bankruptcy court ordered Mr. Lawrence to return $8,850 in fees to Wayne Windman, the lead state-court plaintiff. The payment was to satisfy in part the court's earlier order that the Windmans and Mr. Lawrence were jointly and severally liable for the attorney fees associated with the bad-faith chapter 11 filing. AER at 202-203; ER at 51-52 (Order). Mr. Lawrence now alleges, without support in the record, that the $18,000 due to the state-court plaintiffs has been paid and therefore following the bankruptcy court's order would result in a "double-payment." Br. at 13.

Even if it is true that the attorney-fee debt has been satisfied, it does not follow that the order that Mr. Lawrence return fees is "moot." Id. This is so because section 329 governs this case. It provides that a court may "order the return of any such payment, to the extent excessive, to – . . . (2) the entity that made such payment." 11 U.S.C. § 329(b)(2). Mr. Lawrence's fees were reduced because he did not render valuable service to the Windmans under section 329 and 330 of the Bankruptcy Code. AER at 200. The mechanics of returning the fees is a separate issue from the legal basis for ordering the fee reduction in the first place.

If Mr. Lawrence or the Windmans have reimbursed Wayne Windman for his attorney fees, he should inform the bankruptcy court. At that point, the court could redirect payment, most likely to his surviving client, Mrs. Pauline Windman.[14] That, rather than keeping the $8,500 in excessive fees, is the avenue Mr. Lawrence should take if the sanction has been paid.

D. Mr. Lawrence's due process rights were not violated.

Mr. Lawrence's argument that his due process rights were violated because the bankruptcy court did not give him sufficient time to speak at the fee hearings borders on the frivolous for two reasons. Br. at 19-21. First, there is no constitutional right to oral argument. Toquero v. I.N.S., 956 F.2d 193, 196, n.4 (9th Cir. 1992). Second, the bankruptcy court afforded Mr. Lawrence ample time to present his case.

The bankruptcy court held two hearings on the United States Trustee's fee reduction motion – the first on February 7, 2008 and the second on February 28th. The judge continued the first hearing after Mr. Lawrence changed his story by testifying that his attorney disclosure form in Windman II was inaccurate and that he had received his retainer during the predecessor case. AER at 110. The court gave Mr. Lawrence an extra two weeks to provide billing records to clarify the situation, although they should have already been submitted to the court. AER at 115.

[14] Nor does Mr. Lawrence's assertion that Mrs. Windman wants him to keep the money, Br. at 13, factor into the analysis. One purpose of section 329 is to safeguard debtors against the "serious potential for overreaching by the debtor's attorney" in the bankruptcy context. S. Rep. No. 95-989, 95th Cong., 2d. Sess., 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787; In re Hill, 5 B.R. 541, 542 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1980) (stating it is the court's "duty under § 329 of the Code to see that the debtor is not imposed upon by her counsel").

At the second fee hearing, the bankruptcy court engaged Mr. Lawrence for 17 transcript pages. AER 188-205. The court requested twice that Mr. Lawrence focus his comments to issues relevant to the fee motion. AER at 191, 194. It then stated "Okay, so I'm going to give you a total of five more minutes to make remarks here . . . it isn't just that I have other parties waiting, it's that what you're telling me is not helpful and not relevant to the issues I need to focus on." AER at 197 (emphasis added).

A court is not required to work with a litigant, particularly one who has been licensed as an attorney, so that it can extract information to allow it to construct a cogent argument. See Toquero, 956 F.2d at 196, n.4. Mr. Lawrence was given ample opportunity to present his case. His failure to persuade the bankruptcy court does not violate his due process rights.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the decisions entered below.

STATUTES & RULES

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This appeal arises from a final order issued by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Massachusetts (Henry J. Boroff, C.J.) on July 3, 2008, finding that attorney Francis Lafayette violated Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 and 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4), and imposing sanctions against Mr. Lafayette in the amount of $3,585. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158 (a) and (c).

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion in imposing sanctions pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c) and 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)?

STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

Appellate courts "independently review the bankruptcy court's decision, applying the 'clearly erroneous' standard to findings of fact and de novo review to conclusions of law'. . . . [Where the issue] poses a mixed question of law and fact, [the court applies] the clearly erroneous standard, unless the bankruptcy court's analysis was 'infected by legal error. . . .'" In re Winthrop Old Farm Nurseries, Inc., 50 F.3d 72, 73 (1st Cir. 1995) (citations omitted). See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013 (standard of appellate review).[1] An appellate court may reverse sanctions imposed under Rule 9011 for manifest abuse of discretion. Kristan v. Turner (In re Kristan), 395 B.R. 500, 506 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2008).

[1] A finding of fact is clearly erroneous "when although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. . . ." United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 395, 68 S.Ct. 525, 542, 92 L.Ed. 756, 766 (1948). "When the finding of fact is premised on an improper legal standard, or a proper one is improperly applied, that finding loses the insulation of the clearly erroneous rule. . . ." Wilson v. Huffman (In re Missionary Baptist Foundation of America, Inc., 712 F.2d 206, 209 (5th Cir. 1983).

On April 9, 2007, attorney Francis J. Lafayette ("Mr. Lafayette") filed a voluntary petition for relief under the reorganization provisions of chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code on behalf of his client, Mr. Daryl Withrow ("Debtor"). On April 20, 2007, the case was voluntarily converted to chapter 7. Due to its concerns regarding the veracity of certain papers filed by Mr. Lafayette in this case, the bankruptcy court, on September 6, 2007, entered an order requiring Mr. Lafayette to show cause why he should not be sanctioned for misrepresentations, omissions, and errors contained on the Debtor's bankruptcy Schedules, Statement of Financial Affairs, and Rebuttal of Presumption of Abuse (the "Show Cause Order"). On November 7, 2007, pursuant to Mr. Lafayette's request, an evidentiary hearing was held to consider the bankruptcy court's Show Cause Order. Finally, on July 3, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered an order, and related memorandum decision, imposing sanctions on Mr. Lafayette pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c)(1)(B) and 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C) and (D). Mr. Lafayette now appeals from that order.[2] [2] The bankruptcy court's July 3, 2008, order also rescheduled a related hearing on Mr. Lafayette's fee application in this case. That hearing was held before the bankruptcy court on July 16, 2008. At that hearing, the bankruptcy court entered an order disallowing Mr. Lafayette's fees and requiring Mr. Lafayette to disgorge $1,195.00 previously received from the Debtor. On July 26, 2008, Mr. Lafayette filed a notice of appeal from the bankruptcy court's July 16, 2008 order. Nevertheless, because Mr. Lafayette failed to timely comply with Bankruptcy Rule 8006 with respect to that appeal, that appeal was dismissed on August 22, 2008.

STATEMENT OF FACTS[3]

On April 9, 2007, the Debtor, by and through his counsel, Mr. Lafayette, filed a voluntary petition for relief under the reorganization provisions of chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Massachusetts, Western Division. UST App. at 1-12. The filing consisted only of the voluntary petition for relief and the matrix of creditors. Shortly thereafter, the bankruptcy court ordered the Debtor to file the remaining documents required by section 521 of the Bankruptcy Code, and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007, by April 25, 2007. UST App. at 13-14.

On April 20, 2007, the Debtor voluntarily converted his case to a liquidation case under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. UST App. at 15-16. At that time, the bankruptcy court issued a new order requiring that all missing documents required pursuant to section 521 of the Bankruptcy Code, and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007, be filed by May 8, 2007. UST App. at 17-18.

On May 9, 2007, one day beyond that deadline, Mr. Lafayette filed a motion to extend time requesting that the May 8, 2007 deadline imposed by the bankruptcy court to file the Debtor's missing documents be extended once again to May 25, 2008. UST App. at 19. That same day, the bankruptcy court granted the extension despite its tardiness. UST App. at 21. The Court did not comment upon Mr. Lafayette's failure to explain why the motion was being filed after the deadline had passed. Id.

On May 24, 2007, Mr. Lafayette filed the documents required by the bankruptcy court's References to this Appendix will be cited as UST App. at ___.

May 9, 2007 order, and also filed a document he styled "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship."[4] UST App. at 22-66. The rebuttal sought to preserve a chapter 7 discharge for the Debtor due to "special circumstances." Id. at 66. The rebuttal claimed that the Debtor's average monthly income of $5,333.33 (allegedly derived from the Debtor's means test form) was based on overtime pay that he no longer received. Id. Consequently, the rebuttal stated that the Debtor's average monthly income had been reduced to $4,000.00. Id. The rebuttal also claimed that the Debtor's mother had suffered a stroke subsequent to the Debtor filing the case, and that he would have to pay $100.00 per month to help support her. Id.

On June 4, 2007, Joseph B. Collins, chapter 7 trustee for the Debtor's bankruptcy estate, filed a response to the rebuttal. UST App. at 67-73. The trustee claimed that the rebuttal was false and misleading for a number of reasons. Id. at 68-69. First, the trustee claimed that the Debtor's means test form did not list $5,333.33 as his average monthly income; it actually listed his average monthly income as $4,834.22. Id. Second, the trustee claimed that recent pay stubs from the Debtor's employer evidenced that the Debtor was, in fact, still receiving overtime pay. Id. Third, the trustee claimed that Debtor's mother had suffered her stroke before the commencement of the case, not after it. Id.

On July 17, 2007, Mr. Lafayette filed an interim application for compensation in this case, requesting compensation in the amount of $1,195.00.[5] UST App. at 74-88. On July 27, 2007, the trustee objected to the application on the grounds that because certain papers filed by [4] In preparing the Debtor's means test form, Mr. Lafayette checked the box indicating that a presumption of abuse arose under section 707(b)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code. UST App. at 60.

[5] Mr. Lafayette is required to file an application for compensation with the bankruptcy court in every case in which he serves as counsel in the District of Massachusetts. See In re LaFrance, 311 B. R. 1, 25 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2004).

Mr. Lafayette in this case were false and misleading, and because the Debtor testified at his section 341 meeting of creditors that he had fully and truthfully informed Mr. Lafayette about the facts and circumstances related to those papers, compensation was not appropriate. UST App. at 89-93. The trustee reiterated the claims made in his June 4, 2007 response to the Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Hardship," and noted that notwithstanding that the Debtor's Schedule B only reflected one bank account, the Debtor admitted to having seven bank accounts at his section 341 meeting of creditors. Id. The United States Trustee objected to Mr. Lafayette's application as well, for the same reasons cited by the trustee. UST App. at 94-95.

On August 3, 2007, the Debtor, through Mr. Lafayette, filed an affidavit seeking to clarify the discrepancies pointed out by the trustee in his objection to Mr. Lafayette's fee application. UST App. at 96-100. Among other things, the Debtor stated that the failure to list all of his bank accounts on his schedules and statements was due to his own forgetfulness. Id. Further, the Debtor reaffirmed his financial commitment to his mother. Id.

On September 5, 2007, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on Mr. Lafayette's fee application. UST App. at 108. At this hearing, the trustee and Mr. Lafayette proposed a settlement in which Mr. Lafayette would pay the trustee $1,000.00 to compensate him for his time and expenses incurred due to Mr. Lafayette's errors in this case. In re Withrow, 391 B. R. 217, 222 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2008). The bankruptcy court did not approve this settlement, and indicated that a Rule 9011 sanction might be appropriate. Id. Mr. Lafayette objected, and requested an evidentiary hearing on the matter. Id. The bankruptcy court then entered the Show Cause Order in order to provide Mr. Lafayette with the evidentiary hearing he had requested. UST App. at 117.

On October 18, 2007, the trustee filed an affidavit with the bankruptcy court, pointing out additional errors with the Debtor's schedules and statements. UST App. at 118. Among other things, the trustee stated that Mr. Lafayette, on behalf of the Debtor, failed to exempt the Debtor's equity in his home and automobile on Schedule C. Id. at 119-20. Further, the trustee repeated his concerns about the misleading nature of the Debtor's schedules, and other papers filed with the bankruptcy court concerning the Debtor's mother and overtime pay. Id. at 122-23.

On November 4, 2007, the Debtor, acting through Mr. Lafayette, filed an affidavit in response to the trustee's October 18, 2007 affidavit. UST App. at 128. In it, the Debtor continued to deny that he had received overtime pay, and stated that medical conditions caused him to answer questions incorrectly at times. Id. Further, the affidavit stated that amended schedules had been filed by the Debtor. Id.

In his affidavit the Debtor also gave two valuations for his home. UST App. at 128. (compare paragraph 6 of the affidavit, which states a value of $179,900 for the Debtor's home with paragraph 7 of the affidavit, which states a value of $177,000 for the Debtor's home).

On November 6, 2007, two days after the Debtor's November 4, 2007 affidavit was filed, Mr. Lafayette filed amendments to the Debtor's Schedules A, B, C, and Statement of Financial Affairs with the bankruptcy court. UST App. at 109, 137.

On November 7, 2007, the bankruptcy court held the show cause hearing requested by Mr. Lafayette. UST App. at 152. At that hearing, Mr. Lafayette admitted that the Debtor's schedules contained errors related to Debtor's claimed exemptions. Id. at 163. Mr. Lafayette also admitted that he had helped the Debtor prepare and file his November 4, 2007 affidavit. Id. at 193. Mr. Lafayette claimed that the omission of the Debtor's bank accounts on the Debtor's schedules and/or statement of financial affairs was due to the Debtor's forgetfulness and was justified by the minimal balances in those accounts. Id. at 191. Mr. Lafayette also conceded that he had made mistakes on the Debtor's means test form. Id. at 175. Finally, when questioned at length by the bankruptcy court concerning alleged inconsistencies and errors regarding the Debtor's actual income as reported on Schedule I,[6] and the actual income reflected on the Debtor's May 24, 2007 "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship,"[7] Mr. Lafayette's sole response was to cite the $4,834.22 in current monthly income reflected on the Debtor's means test form and state that "you would logically assume that the monthly income is less if that overtime pay is taken away." Id. at 189.

On July 3, 2008, the bankruptcy court issued a memorandum decision regarding the Show Cause Order. UST App. at 209. It ruled that Mr. Lafayette had engaged in misconduct, and specifically found that Mr. Lafayette had failed to: (1) properly review information provided by the Debtor with respect to his prepetition income; (2) identify contradictions and inconsistencies on the Debtor's schedules and statement of financial affairs, May 24, 2007 "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship," and affidavits submitted on behalf of the Debtor, before the filing of those documents; (3) promptly correct those contradictions and inconsistencies; and (4) place himself in a position of being able to explain the reasons for those contradictions and inconsistencies to the bankruptcy court in the context of the November 7, 2007 show cause hearing. Id..

Based upon these findings, the bankruptcy court, in an order entered that same day, imposed sanctions against Mr. Lafayette under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011 and section 707(b)(4) of the Bankruptcy Code. UST App. at 223. The bankruptcy court imposed these sanctions in the amount of $3,585, and directed that they be made payable to the case trustee within thirty days. Id.

On July 14, 2008, Mr. Lafayette filed his notice of appeal from the bankruptcy court's July 3, 2008 order.[8] UST App. at 225.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Because neither the bankruptcy court's findings regarding the basis for sanctions, nor the modest $3,585 in sanctions imposed constitute an abuse of discretion, this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court's July 3, 2008 order. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013; Western Auto Supply Co. v. Savage Arms, Inc. (In re Savage Industries, Inc.), 43 F.3d 714, 719-20 (1st Cir. 1994).

ARGUMENT

A. The Bankruptcy Court Had an Adequate Factual Basis to Impose Sanctions Under Rule 9011 and Section 707(b)(4).

Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011(b)(3) requires attorneys practicing before the bankruptcy courts to certify that, to the best of their knowledge, information, and belief, formed after an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances, factual contentions contained in papers submitted to the bankruptcy courts have evidentiary support, or are likely to have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(b)(3). Similarly, section 707(b)(4)(C) of the Bankruptcy Code provides that the signature of an attorney on a petition, pleading, or written motion shall constitute a certification

[8] Although Mr. Lafayette's notice of appeal is styled as an appeal to the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, he failed to file a separate statement of election to appeal to the district court as required by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8001 (e) and 28 U.S.C. § 158 (c)(1). Accordingly, on July 28, 2008, this Court entered an order denying a transfer of the instant appeal to the district court.

that the attorney has: (a) performed a reasonable investigation into the circumstances that gave rise to the petition, pleading, or written motion; and (b) determined that the petition, pleading, or written motion is well grounded in fact, and is warranted by existing law, or a good faith extension, modification, or reversal of existing law. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C). Here, as demonstrated below, the bankruptcy court found that Mr. Lafayette failed to comply with each of these provisions.[9]

First, the bankruptcy court expressly found that Mr. Lafayette helped prepare and file the November 4, 2007 affidavit that stated that amendments to the Debtor's schedules had been filed when those amendments were not actually filed with the Court until two days later. See Withrow, 391 B.R at 224.

Second, the bankruptcy court noted that Mr. Lafayette had conceded error regarding the inconsistent treatment of current monthly income on the Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship" (which stated that the Debtor's average current monthly income in reference to Line 3 on the Debtor's means test form was $5,333.33), and the Debtor's actual means test form (which only reflected $4,834.22 in current monthly income at Line 3). Id.

Third, the bankruptcy court described differences between the Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship" (which listed actual monthly income without overtime pay in the amount of $4,000) and the Debtor's Schedule I (which listed actual monthly income without overtime pay in the amount of $3,309.73). Id. Moreover, the bankruptcy court found it significant that Mr. Lafayette was completely unable to explain the bases for these differences. Id.

[9] The bankruptcy court's memorandum decision also referenced section 707(b)(4)(D) of the Bankruptcy Code. See In re Withrow, 391 B.R. 217 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2008). However, the memorandum decision fails to discuss exactly what information contained on the Debtor's schedules is incorrect, and the sanction award is most appropriately affirmed under Rule 9011 and section 707(b)(4)(C) of the Bankruptcy Code. Id.

Finally, the bankruptcy court relied upon differences between the Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship" (which indicated that the Debtor anticipated that he would have to assist his mother financially for an indefinite period of time after the filing of his case) and the Debtor's Schedule J (which provided that the Debtor did not reasonably anticipate a significant increase or decrease in expenses in the upcoming year). Id., at 224-25.

Each of these findings were wholly derived from the papers filed in this case by Mr. Lafayette, or from Mr. Lafayette's testimony at the November 7, 2007 Show Cause Hearing. UST App. at 160-208. On appeal, Mr. Lafayette does not argue any of these findings are clearly erroneous. See Appellant's Brief. Accordingly, because nothing in the record before this Court indicates that the above-referenced findings were clearly erroneous, the bankruptcy court's July 3, 2008 order should be affirmed because there was a substantial basis on the record to impose sanctions under Rule 9011 and section 707(b)(4) of the Bankruptcy Code. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013; In re Winthrop Old Farm Nurseries, Inc., 50 F.3d at 73.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Had an Adequate Legal Basis to Impose Sanctions Under Rule 9011 and Section 707(b)(4).

Pursuant to Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011(c), if, after notice and an opportunity to respond, a bankruptcy court determines that Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011(b) has been violated, the court may impose an appropriate sanction upon an attorney.[10] See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c). The First Circuit has imposed a standard of reasonableness for a Rule 11 inquiry. See Navarro-Ayala v. Nunez, 968 F.2d 1421, 1425 (1st Cir. 1992); Cruz v. Savage, 896 F.2d 626, 631 (1st Cir. 1990) (same).

Similarly, section 707(b)(4)(C) of the Bankruptcy Code, by its plain language, imposes a standard of reasonableness with respect to the type of investigation that counsel is required to conduct prior to the filing of petitions, pleadings, or written motions in a bankruptcy court. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C) (requiring certification that a "reasonable investigation" has been performed). In this regard, at least one bankruptcy court has held that the certification required under section 707(b)(4)(C) is analogous to the certification long imposed under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011(b). See In re Robertson, 370 B. R. 804, 809 n.8 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2007).

Here, the bankruptcy court had more than adequate legal basis for determining that Mr. Lafayette failed to meet the standard of reasonableness required of him under Rule 9011(b) and section 707(b)(4)(C) of the Bankruptcy Code. For example, when Mr. Lafayette prepared and filed the Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship" in this case, he should have known what the Debtor's means test form indicated with respect to current monthly income, what the Debtor's Schedule I indicated with respect to actual income, and what the Debtor's Schedule J indicated with respect to the Debtor's anticipated future expenses because each of these documents were filed on the very same day as the Debtor's Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship." UST App. at 104-05. However, rather than conducting the most basic of inquiries with respect to these papers, much less the reasonable inquiry required by Rule 9011 and section 707(b)(4)(C), Mr. Lafayette submitted the Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship" with numerous factually inaccurate statements to the bankruptcy court. See supra, at 9-10 (discussing discrepancies between information contained on Debtor's means test form, Schedule I, and Schedule J, and Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship"). Accordingly, the bankruptcy court's conclusion that Mr. Lafayette failed to exhibit the standard of reasonableness required under Rule 9011(b) and section 707(b)(4)(C) of the Bankruptcy Code did not constitute an abuse of discretion.

[10] "Because Rule 9011 is derived from Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11, the First Circuit has explained that 'Rule 11 jurisprudence is largely transferable to Rule 9011 cases.'" White v. Burdick, (In re CK Liquidation Corp,), 321 B.R. 355, 361(B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2005) (citing Featherstone v. Goldman (In re D.C. Sullivan Co.), 843 F.2d 596, 598 (1st Cir. 1988)).

C. The Bankruptcy Court Acted Within its Discretion in Imposing Sanctions In the Amount of $3,585.

"In reviewing the propriety of a Bankruptcy Rule 9011 sanction, an [appellate court] should 'defer, within broad limits, to the bankruptcy court's exercise of its sound discretion.'" Kristan, 395 B.R. at 510 (quoting Navarro-Ayala v. Nunez, 968 F.2d at 1426). Here, the bankruptcy court analyzed five factors in considering what type of sanction to impose against Mr. Lafayette: (1) the egregiousness of the conduct complained of; (2) the extent of the harm caused; (3) the deterrence to others of repeating the conduct; and (4) whether the conduct is repetitive of conduct for which the actor has been previously criticized.[11] Withrow, 391 B. R. at 229.

In reaching its decision to impose $3,585 in sanctions, the bankruptcy court specifically noted that Mr. Lafayette's representation of consumer debtors had previously been the subject of considerable criticism. Id., at 229 (citing In re LaFrance, 311 B. R. at 25 (court described Mr.

[11] On appeal, Mr. Lafayette does not suggest that the $3,585.00 sanction imposed against him was inappropriate. Rather, he appears to take issue with the fact that the bankruptcy court chose to impose sanctions at all. See UST App. at 246.

Lafayette's practices as "sloppy, careless and unprofessional" and ordered Mr. Lafayette to file fee applications in every case he filed); In re LeClair, 360 B. R. 388 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2006) (even after the LaFrance decision, many fee applications of Mr. Lafayette denied because he continued to provide poor quality services to his consumer debtor clients)). Further, the bankruptcy court went to great lengths in its findings of fact to specifically demonstrate the problems associated with Mr., Lafayette's conduct in this case. Withrow, 391 B.R. at 220-25.

The bankruptcy court pointed out that, Mr. Lafayette had an extensive history of providing poor quality service to his consumer debtor clients and of "sloppy, careless and unprofessional" practices. Id., at 229.

The same can be said for the case at hand, where among other things, his errors and omissions placed Debtor in the untenable position of having to possibly defend against numerous false oath claims due to factually erroneous information contained in the "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship." See supra, at 9-10 (discussing discrepancies between information contained on Debtor's means test form, Schedule I, and Schedule J, and Debtor's "Rebuttal of Presumption of Undue Hardship"); see also Withrow, 391 B.R. at 229 ("After all of the argument and testimony, the Court still is not sure what the Debtor earned in the six months prior to the filing of the petition or what the Debtor earns now. Nor is the Court sure whether the Debtor intended to mislead the Court with respect to the information provided in his bankruptcy papers or his section 341 meeting testimony."). Accordingly, because the sanction imposed by the bankruptcy court appropriately serves to deter Mr. Lafayette from repeating the conduct that occurred in this case, and others, it should be affirmed.[12] [12] The bankruptcy court's July 3, 2008 order required that Mr. Lafayette tender sanctions to the trustee. See UST App. at 223. While section 707(b)(4)(C) of the Bankruptcy Code is silent with respect to who may receive sanctions imposed under it, Rule 9011 is not. See Fed. R.

Bankr. P. 9011(c)(2) (providing for payment to court and movant). Accordingly, should this Court conclude that sanctions under Rule 9011 alone is appropriate, the Court may wish to consider remand solely to direct payment of those sanctions to the bankruptcy court. Otherwise, the trustee could keep the sanction as section 707(b)(4)(B) expressly authorizes an award to the trustee.

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

In approving the Debtor's application to employ special counsel, did the bankruptcy court err in failing to determine that the firm's representation encompassed matters which constitute "represent[ing] the trustee [i.e., the debtor in possession] in conducting the case" that are proscribed by 11 U.S.C. § 327(e)?

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATE STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's decision to approve an application for employment under 11 U.S.C. § 327 is reviewed for abuse of discretion. See In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246, 250 (3d Cir. 2002) (citing In re Marvel Entm't Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 470 (3d Cir. 1998)). A bankruptcy court abuses its discretion when its decision is based on "a clearly erroneous finding of fact, an errant conclusion of law, or an improper application of law to fact." See Marvel, 140 F.3d at 470. The Acting United States Trustee submits that the bankruptcy court's decision to approve the employment of special counsel under 11 U.S.C. § 327(e) is premised upon an erroneous conclusion of law. This Court conducts a de novo review of the bankruptcy court's conclusions of law. See, e.g., Rode v. Dellarciprete, 892 F.2d 1177, 1182 (3d Cir. 1990); In re Hechinger Inv. Co., 276 B.R. 43, 45 (D. Del. 2002).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Woodworkers Warehouse, Inc. (the "Debtor"), a debtor in possession, has substantially the same rights that a trustee serving in a chapter 11 case enjoys. One of those rights is the right to employ professional persons under 11 U.S.C. § 327(e) ("Section 327(e)"). Section 327(e) authorizes the Debtor to employ, "for a specified special purpose, other than to represent the trustee in conducting the case, an attorney that has represented the debtor, if in the best interest of the estate, and if such attorney does not represent or hold any interest adverse to the debtor or to the estate with respect to the matter on which such attorney is to be employed" (emphasis added). This appeal addresses a simple question: what constitutes "represent[ing] the trustee in conducting the case" under Section 327(e)?

At the outset of the case, the Debtor applied to the bankruptcy court to employ Kronish Lieb Weiner & Hellman LLP ("Kronish Lieb") as its general bankruptcy counsel pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) ("Section 327(a)"). Section 327(a) permits the trustee to employ counsel for purposes of "represent[ing] or assist[ing] the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under [the Bankruptcy Code]." In order to employ a professional under Section 327(a), the applicant must demonstrate that the proposed professional "do[es] not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate . . . [and is a] disinterested person[]." Id. Roberta A. DeAngelis, Acting United States Trustee for Region 3 (the "U.S. Trustee"), objected to the Debtor's application to employ Kronish Lieb under Section 327(a) on grounds that the firm had a disqualifying conflict of interest stemming from its representation of the official committee of unsecured creditors in a prior bankruptcy case. After a hearing, the bankruptcy court denied the Debtor's application to employ Kronish Lieb under Section 327(a). In a published memorandum supporting its ruling on the application, the bankruptcy court agreed with the U.S. Trustee that Kronish Lieb had a disabling conflict of interest which prevented the firm from representing or assisting the Debtor in carrying out its duties under the Bankruptcy Code.

The Debtor subsequently filed an application to employ Kronish Lieb as special counsel under Section 327(e), nunc pro tunc to the petition date. The Debtor proposed that Kronish Lieb be permitted to represent it in connection with a wide range of matters, including the preparation of papers, negotiations of contested items, and appearances on the Debtor's behalf in bankruptcy court related to the following matters: (a) asset sales, including the sale of substantially all of the Debtor's inventory, its major asset, and the disposition of executory contracts; (b) the Debtor's use of cash collateral; and (c) the key employee retention program proposed by the Debtor. Given that the bankruptcy court correctly decided that Kronish Lieb was disqualified from serving as general bankruptcy counsel to the Debtor due to the firm's conflict of interest, and given that the proposed scope of Kronish Lieb's employment involved representing the Debtor in conducting the case, the U.S. Trustee objected to the Debtor's application to employ Kronish Lieb as special counsel. Notwithstanding the fact that the bankruptcy court previously ruled that Kronish Lieb could not represent or assist the Debtor in carrying out its responsibilities under the Bankruptcy Code, the bankruptcy court granted the Debtor's application to employ Kronish Lieb as special counsel. This appeal followed.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

The Debtor was formed in October, 2001 as part of a confirmed plan of reorganization in a prior chapter 11 proceeding. Trend-Lines, Inc. and Post-Tool, Inc. (the "Prior Debtors") filed chapter 11 petitions in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Massachusetts (the "Prior Cases"). R.22 (Debtor's response to 327(a) objection) at ¶ 2(a). The Debtor and its predecessor were a specialty retailer of power and hand tools and accessories, primarily for use in woodworking and light construction, operating retail stores under the "Woodworkers Warehouse" name. R.4 (Welker affidavit) at ¶ 4; R.53 (Disclosure statement in Prior Cases) at § 4.1. Kronish Lieb served as counsel to the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors (the "Prior Committee") in the Prior Cases. R.22 (Debtor's response to 327(a) objection) at ¶ 2(b).

As part of a joint reorganization plan in the Prior Cases, the Prior Debtors and the Prior Committee proposed that, in satisfaction of their claims, general unsecured creditors would receive both a pro rata share of a cash distribution of $2 million (which was to be paid on January 15, 2002) and shares of common stock in "Newco." R.22 (Debtor's response to 327(a) objection) at ¶ 2(d). The plan in the Prior Cases called for the continued operation of the Woodworkers Warehouse retail stores. R.53 (Disclosure Statement in Prior Cases) at § 5.15.[1] The Prior Debtors' remaining assets were liquidated. R.53 (Disclosure Statement in Prior Cases) at § 5.15.

The joint reorganization plan in the Prior Cases was confirmed on October 17, 2001. R.22 (Debtor's response to 327(a) objection) at ¶ 2(c). The plan went effective on October 19, 2001. On or about the effective date of the plan, the reorganized debtor was merged into "Newco," forming the Debtor. R.22 (Debtor's response to 327(a) objection) at ¶ 2(g). The equity stake promised to unsecured creditors under the plan was distributed. However, the cash distribution of $2 million provided for under the plan was never paid. R.50 (12/29/03 Tr.) 52:14-24.

The Debtor filed a voluntary petition under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on December 2, 2003 (the "Petition Date"). R.1 (Petition). On the Petition Date, the Debtor operated 93 stores located in the New England and Mid-Atlantic regions. R.4 (Welker affidavit) at ¶ 4.

To operate its business post-petition as a debtor in possession, the Debtor needed to be able to use its cash, which was subject to the first-priority, perfected security interest of its primary lenders. R.5 (Cash collateral motion) at ¶ 18. The Bankruptcy Code restricts the Debtor's ability to use cash and cash equivalents ("cash collateral") subject to a security interest; the Debtor may only use cash collateral if (a) each entity with an interest in the cash collateral consents to such use or (b) the court, after notice and a hearing, authorizes the use of cash collateral consistent with the provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 363. Accordingly, on the Petition Date, the Debtor filed a motion for authority to use its cash collateral and for related relief. R.5 (Cash collateral motion). Throughout the case, the Debtor reached a series of agreements with its primary lenders which enabled its use of cash collateral. R.9 (1st interim cash collateral order); R.16 (2nd interim cash collateral order).

Prior to filing for bankruptcy protection, the Debtor determined that it would not be able to meet its working capital needs, debt service requirements and planned capital expenditures through the end of fiscal year 2003. R.6 (Welker affidavit) at ¶ 8. Thus, the Debtor planned to quickly wind-down its operations by means of "going out of business" ("GOB") sales. R.6 (Welker affidavit) at ¶ 9. On the Petition Date, the Debtor filed an emergency motion to establish bidding procedures for the sale of its primary asset – inventory – and to set dates for the related auction and sale. R.4 (GOB sale motion). The emergency motion indicated that the Debtor had entered into an agreement with a group of liquidators to purchase the inventory for approximately one-half of its retail price, subject to higher and better offers at auction.[2] R.4 (GOB sale motion) at ¶ 19. Given that bidders would likely factor in the number of days available during the holiday season in submitting their bids, the bankruptcy court approved a short schedule for the sale of the inventory at the Debtor's request. The bankruptcy court scheduled the auction of the inventory for December 4 and the related sale hearing for December 5. R.10 (Bidding procedures order) at ¶¶ 7, 9. A competing bid to purchase the inventory for approximately 55% of the retail price was approved at the December 5 sale hearing.

[2] The "stalking horse" bid was also subject to adjustment as described in the agency agreement appended to the bidding procedures motion.

R.15 (Sale order); R.14 (Agency agreement).

The Debtor also filed a motion for entry of an order authorizing retention payments to "key employees" under 11 U.S.C. §§ 105(a) and 363(b)(1) (the "KERP Motion") on the Petition Date. R.8 (KERP motion). The Debtor sought authority to pay nine employees a total of $400,000 and 10% of the net recovery from the liquidation of the Debtor's assets in excess of all sums due the Debtor's primary secured lender. R.8 (KERP motion) at ¶¶ 9, 10. The proffered purpose of the KERP Motion was to keep certain employees with the company as long as the liquidation effort necessitated their presence. R.8 (KERP motion) at ¶ 14. The Debtor maintained that its "ability to stabilize and preserve its business operations and assets [would] be substantially hindered if the Debtor [was] unable to retain the services of the Key Employees." R.8 (KERP motion) at ¶ 11. After negotiations with the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors ("OCUC"), the Debtor was able to reach an agreement on a modified key employee retention program which, when compared to the Debtor's original request, provided for substantially reduced payments. R.51 (1/8/04 Tr.) 5:22 - 9:21.

In connection with its bankruptcy filing, the Debtor sought to employ Kronish Lieb pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) as its bankruptcy counsel (the "327(a) Application"). R.2 (327(a) Application). The U.S. Trustee objected to the 327(a) Application on grounds that Kronish Lieb had a disqualifying conflict of interest stemming from its representation of the Prior Committee. R.20 (327(a) objection). Given that Kronish Lieb advised the Prior Committee in connection with its proposal of, and support for, the reorganization plan in the Prior Cases, the U.S. Trustee submitted that Kronish Lieb could not advise the Debtor with regard to the bankruptcy treatment and/or discharge of claims and interests that were created by that plan. R.20 (327(a) objection) at ¶ 17. In its response to the U.S. Trustee's objection to the 327(a) Application, the Debtor insisted that Kronish Lieb did not have a disqualifying conflict. R.22 (Debtor's response to 327(a) objection).

After a hearing was held on the 327(a) Application, the bankruptcy court denied the 327(a) Application. R.27 (327(a) order). In the memorandum issued in support of its denial of the 327(a) Application, the bankruptcy court essentially adopted the U.S. Trustee's argument as to why Kronish Lieb was unfit to assist the Debtor in performing its duties under the Bankruptcy Code:

> At a minimum the retention of KLWH [Kronish Lieb] would create an appearance of a conflict. KLWH's retention, however, would do more; KLWH has a potential conflict and perhaps even an actual conflict. KLWH represented the co-proponent of the plan in the Massachusetts Bankruptcy; the Committee urged its constituencies to vote in favor of the plan. Now that it is clear that the plan cannot be fully consummated, KLWH seeks to represent the very party that defaulted on its obligation to KLWH's former clients in a case that arises, in part, because of those defaults . . . . R.36 (327(a) memorandum) at 4.

The Debtor did not appeal from the bankruptcy court's ruling on the 327(a) Application.

The bankruptcy court's order denying the 327(a) Application stated that, "[s]hould the Debtor require services of KLWH as special counsel on some basis, the Court would consider such an application on an expedited basis." R.27 (327(a) order) at 2. The day after the 327(a) Application was denied, the Debtor filed an application to employ Kronish Lieb as special counsel under 11 U.S.C. § 327(e) nunc pro tunc to the Petition Date (the "327(e) Application"). R.29 (327(e) application). In the 327(e) Application, the Debtor described the proposed scope of Kronish Lieb's employment as follows:

> (a) prepare and prosecute on behalf of the Debtor, as Debtor in possession, all necessary motions, applications, answers, orders, reports, and papers in connection with the sale of the Debtor's assets, including inventory, intellectual property, unexpired leases and > executory contracts, furniture, fixtures and equipment. Thus far, KLWH has successfully arranged a bidding process, enticed other liquidators to bid, conducted an auction and drafted the document signed by the liquidator which has generated over $3 million additional dollars in excess of the first bid delivered to the Debtor, at the request of the Debtor's bank. KLWH has also been intricately involved in the continuing efforts to maximize proceeds from the sale of other assets of the Debtors [sic];

> (b) prepare and prosecute on behalf of the Debtor, as Debtor in possession, all necessary motions, answers, orders, and papers in connection with the Debtor's use of cash collateral;
>
> (c) prepare and prosecute on behalf of the Debtor, as Debtor in possession, all necessary motions, applications, answers, orders, reports, and papers in connection with the Debtor's request to make certain key employee retention payments. The KERP program has been negotiated with the Debtor's Board of Directors and is now the subject of intense negotiations with the creditors' committee; and
> (d) handle other minor administrative matters such as obtaining continuation of insurance. R.29 (327(e) application) at ¶ 8.

The U.S. Trustee objected to the 327(e) Application on grounds that, in direct contravention of 11 U.S.C. § 327(e), the Debtor sought to employ Kronish Lieb "to represent the trustee in conducting the case." R.31 (327(e) objection) at ¶ 12. In the 327(e) Application and its response to the U.S. Trustee's objection thereto, the Debtor did not cite any published authority which stated that representing the trustee in connection with the use of cash collateral, the sale of substantially all of the estate's assets, and obtaining court approval of a key employee retention program could be authorized under Section 327(e). R.29 (327(e) application); R.35 (Debtor's response to 327(e) objection).

At the hearing on the 327(e) Application, the U.S. Trustee argued that, given the impermissibly broad scope of Kronish Lieb's proposed employment, the 327(e) Application "might as well be labeled a [m]otion to [r]econsider [the bankruptcy court's] prior ruling with respect to [the 327(a) Application]." R.51 (1/8/04 Tr.) 16:3-6. The U.S. Trustee pointed out that "the tasks for which the Debtor is now seeking to employ Kronish Lieb as special counsel are a good chunk of this particular case." R.51 (Tr. 1/8/04) 16:11-14. After hearing argument, and without explaining the reasons for its decision, the bankruptcy court immediately directed the Debtor to provide an order which authorized Kronish Lieb's employment as special counsel under 11 U.S.C. § 327(e) nunc pro tunc to the Petition Date with regard to asset sales, cash collateral, and the key employee retention program.[3] R.51 (Tr. 1/8/04) 18:22 - 19:13. The bankruptcy court entered the order on January 13, 2004. R.42 (327(e) order). The U.S. Trustee filed her notice of appeal from the order on January 23, 2004. R.47 (Notice of appeal).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court erred in failing to strictly apply Section 327(e)'s prohibition against employing special counsel to represent the debtor in possession in conducting the case. The Supreme Court and the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit have consistently ruled that statutory language must be applied in accordance with the plain meaning of its terms. In this case, the bankruptcy court authorized Kronish Lieb to represent and assist the Debtor in performing duties central to the Debtor's bankruptcy proceeding. The bankruptcy court's ruling is contrary to the clear, unambiguous language of Section 327(e). The ruling also runs counter to the legislative history supporting Section 327(e), which indicates that the "specified, special purpose" for which

[3] The bankruptcy court did not approve the "catch-all" provision that was proposed. Instead, the court ruled that, if the Debtor, the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors, and the U.S. Trustee agreed that Kronish Lieb's employment should be expanded to encompass certain services, Kronish Lieb would be authorized to provide those services upon the filing of an appropriate notice and certification. If the parties could not agree on whether the employment should be expanded, then the Debtor would have to file another application with the bankruptcy court.

counsel may be retained under Section 327(e) must be unrelated to the Debtor's reorganization.

Kronish Lieb's representation of the Debtor, as authorized by the bankruptcy court, involves three general subject areas that are all central to the Debtor's reorganization. The bankruptcy court authorized Kronish Lieb to represent it in connection with obtaining court approval for the use of its cash collateral. Without use of its cash, the Debtor would have not been able to move forward with its chapter 11 case. In addition, the bankruptcy court authorized Kronish Lieb to represent the Debtor in connection with asset sales and the related disposition of executory contracts. The Debtor's asset sales included the sale of substantially all of its inventory by means of a "going out of business sale." The bankruptcy court also authorized the Debtor to employ Kronish Lieb to represent it in connection with the preparation and negotiation of the Debtor's key employee retention program, as well as appearing before the bankruptcy court with regard to the motion to approve the program. The program provided for certain payments to personnel the Debtor believed were critical to the successful completion of the bankruptcy case

The bankruptcy court's decision to authorize Kronish Lieb's employment under Section 327(e) for the specified services is especially troubling in light of the bankruptcy court's prior ruling that the firm was not qualified to serve as general bankruptcy counsel under Section 327(a). Courts have routinely rejected efforts to circumvent the conflict and disinterestedness prerequisites of Section 327(a) by permitting counsel to be employed under Section 327(e) to assist the trustee in conducting the case. In this case, the bankruptcy court itself ruled that Kronish Lieb could not represent the Debtor under Section 327(a) due to a conflict of interest. Accordingly, by overlooking the limitations on the permissible scope of employment under Section 327(e) and permitting the Debtor to employ Kronish Lieb to provide services central to the Debtor's case, the bankruptcy court undercut its prior ruling.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN FAILING TO STRICTLY APPLY THE SECTION 327(e) PROHIBITION AGAINST EMPLOYING SPECIAL COUNSEL TO REPRESENT THE DEBTOR IN POSSESSION IN CONDUCTING THE CASE

Section 327(e) states that a Chapter 11 debtor in possession[4] may employ, > with the court's approval, for a specified special purpose, other than to represent the trustee in conducting the case, an attorney that has represented the debtor, if in the best interest of the estate, and if such attorney does not represent or hold any interest adverse to the debtor or to the estate with respect to the matter on which such attorney is to be employed. 11 U.S.C. § 327(e) (emphasis added).

The statutory language is exceptionally clear, and it establishes the following six specific criteria, each of which must be present before an attorney may be employed by a debtor in possession pursuant to Section 327(e):

(1) the court must approve the employment;

(2) the employment must be for a "specified special purpose;"

(3) the "specified special purpose" cannot constitute the representation of the debtor in possession in conducting the case;

(4) the attorney to be employed must have previously represented the debtor;

(5) the employment must be in the best interest of the estate; and

(6) the attorney must not represent or hold any interest adverse to

[4] Although Section 327(e) refers to the "trustee," pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1107 most of the rights, powers, and duties of a trustee in a Chapter 11 case are conferred upon the debtor in possession. This includes the trustee's power to employ professional persons under 11 U.S.C. § 327. See United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 141 (3d Cir. 1994). See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9001(10) ("'Trustee' includes a debtor in possession in a Chapter 11 case.").

> the debtor or the estate with respect to the matter on which the attorney is to be employed.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly stressed that the plain language of the Bankruptcy Code must be applied as written, even if the result is harsh. See, e.g., Lamie v. United States Trustee, ___ U.S. ___, 124 S.Ct. 1023, 1032 (2004) ("Our unwillingness to soften the import of Congress' chosen words even if we believe the words lead to a harsh outcome is longstanding."); Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1, 6 (2000) ("when the statute's language is plain, the sole function of the courts – at least where the disposition required by the text is not absurd – is to enforce it according to its terms") (internal quotation marks omitted). In addition, the Third Circuit has strictly applied statutory limitations on employment under 11 U.S.C. § 327. See United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 141-42 (3d Cir. 1994). Indeed, this Court has previously held that the "clear and unequivocal" language of Section 327(e) must be strictly applied. See MeesPierson Inc. v. Strategic Telecom Inc., 202 B.R. 845, 850 (D. Del. 1996) (reversing bankruptcy court's authorization of employment as special counsel of attorney disqualified under Section 327(a) where attorney had not previously represented debtor).

In light of this precedent, Section 327(e) cannot be interpreted such that some clauses are read strictly and others are read loosely. It is not sufficient under Section 327(e) to simply specify in counsel's employment application the services to be rendered; if any of the proposed services constitute the representation of the Debtor in conducting the case, employment under Section 327(e) is prohibited as a matter of law. See In re Neuman, 138 B.R. 683, 686 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) ("[I]t is clear both from the language of § 327(e) and from the framework of § 327 more generally that, even if there is a special purpose, it is crucial that the appointment not be part of the trustee's general duty of conducting the case.").

Section 327(a) is the only statutory provision pursuant to which counsel may be employed "to represent or assist the [debtor in possession] in carrying out [the debtor in possession's] duties under [the Bankruptcy Code]." See 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). Congress clearly intended Section 327(e) to apply to a much narrower set of circumstances, and did not intend for it to be used as an indirect avenue for employment of conflicted counsel to represent the debtor in carrying out its general duties. Congress' use of the singular – a "specified, special purpose," as opposed to numerous purposes – indicates that Section 327(e) "may be limited to cases involving a single lawsuit or a discrete and specialized advisory role (i.e. tax, securities, antitrust, etc.)." See In re First Am. Health Care of Ga., Inc., 1996 WL 33404562 at *3 (Bankr. S.D. Ga., Apr. 18, 1996).

The legislative history supports the strict interpretation of Section 327(e)'s prohibition regarding "conducting the case":

> [Section 327(e)] does not authorize the employment of the debtor's attorney to represent the estate generally or represent the trustee in the conduct of the bankruptcy case. The subsection will most likely be used when the debtor is involved in complex litigation, and changing attorneys in the middle of the case after the bankruptcy case has commenced would be detrimental to the progress of that other litigation.

H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 328 (1977), reprinted at 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5824-25. In addition, a leading commentator has stated that the "special purpose" for which an attorney may be employed under Section 327(e) "must be unrelated to the reorganization of the debtor." See 3 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 327.04[9][b] at 327-61 (15th ed. rev'd 2003) (emphasis added).

In the proceedings before the bankruptcy court, the Debtor did not cite any published authority which stated that representing the trustee in connection with the use of cash collateral, the sale of substantially all of the estate's assets, and obtaining court approval of a key employee retention program could be authorized under Section 327(e). Given that Kronish Lieb's services were central to the conduct of the case, the bankruptcy court should have strictly applied Section 327(e) and rejected the application. In light of the statutory prohibition against employing special counsel to represent the Debtor in conducting the case, the Bankruptcy Court's decision was erroneous, and should be reversed.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN AUTHORIZING THE EMPLOYMENT OF KRONISH LIEB TO RENDER SERVICES THAT CONSTITUTE THE REPRESENTATION OF THE DEBTOR IN CONDUCTING THE CASE UNDER SECTION 327(e)

Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1107, most of the rights, duties, and powers that the Bankruptcy Code places on trustees must be carried out by Chapter 11 debtors in possession. An analysis of the various statutory duties imposed on Chapter 11 debtors in possession shows that the services to be rendered by Kronish Lieb constitute the representation of the Debtor in conducting the case.

Both as part of its duty to operate the business (see 11 U.S.C. § 1108) and as a separate statutory duty, a debtor in possession has the duty of obtaining consensual or court-authorized use of cash collateral under 11 U.S.C. § 363(c)(2). As the Debtor argued before the bankruptcy court, the operation of the Debtor's business, and thus the successful sale of the Debtor's assets, would have been impossible without the use of cash collateral. Therefore, Kronish Lieb's representation of the Debtor with regard to use of cash collateral constitutes representing the Debtor in conducting the case. See Interstate Dist. Ctr. Assocs. (A), Ltd., 137 B.R. 826, 833 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1992) (representation in connection with restructuring Debtor's financing "clearly beyond the scope and intent of Section 327(e)"); In re Hempstead Realty Assocs., 34 B.R. 624, 625 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1983) (giving Debtor legal advice in connection with its "powers and duties as debtor in possession" within conduct of case).

Among the most important statutory duties of a debtor in possession in a liquidating case are the duties to comply with the strictures of 11 U.S.C. §§ 363 and 365 when selling estate assets and dealing with executory contracts. In the instant case, Kronish Lieb's intended services regarding the sale of substantially all of the Debtor's assets, as well as assuming and assigning executory contracts, constitute the representation of the Debtor in conducting the most important part of this case. Every other aspect of this case, including the preparation of a plan of liquidation, hinges on the sale of the Debtor's assets. See In re Tidewater Mem. Hosp., Inc., 110 B.R. 221, 228 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1989) (denying employment under Section 327(e) where services included negotiating sale of debtor's business upon which plan would be based).

In addition, Kronish Lieb's proposed services include representing the Debtor with regard to the Debtor's efforts to obtain approval of the KERP motion. Retention programs for key employees are approved when they are shown to be vital to the debtor's successful operations, or successful sale in a liquidating chapter 11 such as the instant case. See, e.g., In re Montgomery Ward Holding Corp., 242 B.R. 147, 155 (Bankr. D. Del. 1999). As the retention of key employees is, in the Debtor's judgment, fundamental to the Debtor's ability to successfully carry out its liquidation, Kronish Lieb's representation of the Debtor with regard to the KERP motion constitutes representing the Debtor in conducting the case. Further, the KERP motion was a contested matter in the main bankruptcy case. Therefore, Kronish Lieb's representation of the Debtor with regard to the KERP motion falls squarely within the conduct of the case.[5]

Unlike the typical use of special counsel, Kronish Lieb has not been employed for a tangential purpose, such as continuing to pursue pre-petition litigation or addressing a discrete non-bankruptcy law issue. Instead, Kronish Lieb has been employed to render services that are central to the Debtor's ability to successfully complete its chapter 11 case. As Kronish Lieb's proposed services are far too broad to meet Section 327(e)'s prohibition against representing the Debtor in conducting the case, the bankruptcy court's decision was erroneous, and should be reversed.

III. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN AUTHORIZING THE EMPLOYMENT OF COUNSEL DISQUALIFIED UNDER SECTION 327(a) TO ACT AS SPECIAL COUNSEL TO REPRESENT THE DEBTOR IN CONDUCTING THE CASE UNDER SECTION 327(e)

The statutory scrutiny of an application to employ special counsel under Section 327(e) should be heightened where, as in the instant case, proposed counsel is disqualified from being employed under Section 327(a). Section 327(e) is not a wide-open back door through which the Debtor can employ otherwise disqualified counsel to represent it in carrying out its duties; to the contrary, Section 327(e) contains specific unambiguous exclusionary hurdles that must each be cleared before special counsel may be employed. Under the coherent system established by Congress, the only attorney who may represent a debtor in possession in its conduct of the case is one employed under Section 327(a). In the instant case, that attorney is the Bayard Firm. Kronish Lieb's disqualification under Section 327(a) thereby prohibits it from being employed under any statutory provision to represent the Debtor in carrying out the basic duties that constitute "conducting

[5] The Debtor's request to employ Kronish Lieb with regard to prosecution of the KERP motion before the bankruptcy court is substantially different than a request to employ special counsel in connection with labor law issues that are not central to the conduct of the bankruptcy proceeding. In this case, the Debtor has employed the firm of Robinson & Cole LLP as special labor law counsel for that purpose. R.18 (Special labor counsel application).

the case."

The U.S. Trustee is unaware of any reported decision in any judicial district in which the court interpreted the Section 327(e) "conducting the case" prohibition as nevertheless allowing an attorney disqualified under Section 327(a) to be employed as special counsel under Section 327(e) to represent the debtor in possession in carrying out its basic duties. To the contrary, as the following analysis will show, for over twenty years reported decisions throughout the nation have uniformly held that Section 327(e) is not a back door through which counsel disqualified under Section 327(a) can be employed to represent the debtor in possession in carrying out duties central to the success of the Chapter 11 case.

Although the U.S. Trustee is unaware of any reported decisions by this Court analyzing Section 327(e)'s "conducting the case" terminology, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York has weighed in on the issue. In In re Neuman, 138 B.R. 683 (S.D.N.Y. 1992), the debtor sought to employ counsel disqualified under Section 327(a) to pursue Medicare and Medicaid issues limited to one creditor and one kind of claim. Id. at 686. The court stated that, as specific as this purpose was, it nevertheless constituted "a large part of conducting this case." Id. The court reversed the bankruptcy court's authorization of the attorney's employment under Section 327(e) and held that, given the disinterestedness requirement of Section 327(a), "disinterestedness is a requirement for anyone representing the trustee in conducting any part of the case." Id. at 686.

Bankruptcy courts addressing the issue have also overwhelmingly held that counsel disqualified under Section 327(a) cannot be employed under Section 327(e) to represent the debtor in possession in carrying out the basic duties attendant to conducting the case. For example, in In re Michigan Interstate Railway Co., 32 B.R. 327, 330 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1983), the court termed "sheer sophistry" the debtor's attempt to characterize its attorney as special counsel just to get around the strictures of Section 327(a). Similarly, in In re Hempstead Realty Assocs., 34 B.R. 624 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1983), an attorney sought employment not as "general counsel" under Section 327(a), but only as special counsel under Section 327(e). In denying the request, the court noted that the determining factor is not the label the attorney gives himself, but rather the duties to be performed. See id. at 625. As "the professional services to be performed . . . [were] more appropriately the sort of legal work that general counsel for a Chapter 11 debtor must pursue," the employment was denied. Id.

Thereafter, in In re Tidewater Memorial Hospital, Inc., 110 B.R. 221, 223 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1989), the debtor sought to employ an attorney disqualified under Section 327(a) as special counsel under Section 327(e) to represent the debtor in soliciting and negotiating proposals for the sale of the debtor's hospital. The court rejected the application on grounds that (1) the attorney was disqualified under Section 327(a), and (2) the services for which he was to be employed were so related to the debtor's reorganization as to be "tantamount to representing the debtor in the conduct of the case." Id. at 228. The court held that "counsel who cannot meet the disinterestedness standard of § 327(a) should not be able to bypass this requirement through employment as special counsel." Id.

Later, in In re Interstate Distribution Center Assocs. (A), Ltd., 137 B.R. 826 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1992), the debtor sought to employ an attorney disqualified under Section 327(a) as special counsel under Section 327(e) for services which included the negotiation of financing. The court stated that "[t]he suggestion that the contemplated services do 'not necessarily fall under the purview of services normally rendered by general bankruptcy counsel' is sophistry, as the case law clearly demonstrates." Id. at 833. The court denied the application, as "[t]he Bankruptcy Code certainly does not allow attorneys to change hats at their own whim in order that its specific requirements may be circumvented." Id. at 834 (internal quotations omitted).

In In re Argus Group 1700, Inc., 199 B.R. 525 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1996), a case within the Third Circuit, the debtor sought to employ an attorney disqualified under Section 327(a) to serve as special counsel under Section 327(e) to pursue a specific piece of litigation termed by the court "the sine qua non of the bankruptcy case." Id. at 527. The court stated that, while "at first blush" the proposed services appeared to be for a sufficiently limited purpose, in actuality the litigation in question "is the bankruptcy case." Id. at 530 (emphasis added). The court held that "the more rigorous standards" of Section 327(a) should be applied to counsel rendering services on which the success of the entire case turned. Id. at 531. Thus, the court denied employment under Section 327(e), stating that "[g]iven that the role of litigation is preeminent . . . , litigation counsel, not bankruptcy counsel, is the primary legal adviser," leaving "a very limited role for bankruptcy counsel." Id.

In In re First American Health Care of Ga., Inc., 1996 WL 33404562 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. April 18, 1996), the debtor sought to employ an attorney disqualified under Section 327(a) to serve as special counsel to render specialized services related to Medicare litigation. Id. at *2. The court stated that "when analyzing the prospective employment of counsel pursuant to Section 327(e), the bankruptcy court should consider not only the 'special' purpose specified in the application, but all relevant facts surrounding the debtor's bankruptcy[.]" Id. at *3. The court further stressed that the exception to Section 327(a) created by Section 327(e) "must be narrowly construed to avoid evisceration of the general rule." Id. at *4. The court held that the Medicare litigation "will strike at the very heart of or be central to the Debtors' conduct of this Chapter 11 case," since "the outcome . . . will dictate the manner in which Debtors' bankruptcy counsel can conduct the case and determine in large measure the success of this Chapter 11 case." Id. at *6. The court denied the employment under Section 327(e), as to do otherwise "would potentially grant the firm a position of influence and control which should only be reserved for general counsel." Id.

In light of the overwhelming weight of authority, it is clear that the services to be rendered by Kronish Lieb are the kind of services for which employment as special counsel under Section 327(e) is not authorized. Any decisions to the contrary are in error, as they simply view Section 327(e) as a back door through which counsel disqualified under Section 327(a) may nevertheless be employed to represent the debtor in possession in conducting the case. As the bankruptcy court's decision was contrary to the jurisprudence regarding the employment of counsel disqualified under Section 327(a) to serve as special counsel to represent the debtor in possession in conducting the case, it was erroneous as a matter of law and should be reversed.

IV. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED BY FAILING TO MAKE ITS FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW A MATTER OF RECORD

In adjudicating the disputed 327(e) Application, the bankruptcy court was obligated to identify its findings of fact and conclusions of law on the record. See, e.g., In re Pillowtex, 304 F.3d 246, 255 (3d Cir. 2002) (remanding professional employment application for further proceedings). The bankruptcy court failed to do so. After hearing oral argument, the bankruptcy court simply directed Kronish Lieb to submit a form of order that authorized the firm to represent the Debtor. R.51 (1/8/04 Tr.) 18:22 - 19:13. Thus, the bankruptcy court has left the parties in interest to guess the basis for its decision. Therefore, even if this Court believes that an outright reversal of the bankruptcy court's order is not warranted, at a minimum this matter should be remanded to the bankruptcy court so that it may clearly articulate the basis for its ruling.

CONCLUSION

WHEREFORE the U.S. Trustee requests that this Court reverse the bankruptcy court's order dated January 13, 2004 or, alternatively, remand the matter to the bankruptcy court with directions to make its findings of fact and conclusions of law related to its ruling on the 327(e) Application a matter of record.

1. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by properly adjudicating matters under § 110 as promulgated by Congress pursuant to Article I, section 8, clause 4 of the United States Constitution.
2. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by failing to provide Appellants a trial by jury when no appropriate demand for a jury trial was made.
3. Whether Appellants were denied freedom of speech under the First Amendment when the commercial speech is deceptive, misleading and illegal.
4. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it correctly entered and certified facts under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1) upon finding an overwhelming amount of evidence demonstrating unfair and deceptive practices.
5. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it correctly entered a final order for injunctive relief under 11 U.S.C.§ 110(j) after finding significant evidence of repeated violations under § 110.
6. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it correctly found that the fee charged by Appellants was in excess of the services rendered in light of the unfair and deceptive acts committed by We the People.
7. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when, based on the testimony and overwhelming documentary evidence, it found Appellants engaged in the unauthorized practice of law.

APPLICABLE STANDARDS OF REVIEW

This Court reviews the Bankruptcy Court's findings of fact with the clearly erroneous standard. Taunt v. Hurtado (In re Hurtado), 342 F.3d 528, 531 (6th Cir. 2003). The bankruptcy court's application of law to fact is reviewed de novo with a standard for abuse of discretion. In re Burns, 322 F.3d 421 (6th Cir. 2003).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This case is on appeal from a memorandum and order issued by the bankruptcy court for the Middle District of Tennessee dated October 6, 2004[1], arising out of four consolidated cases involving the third-party complaints of three debtors (Finch, Toalson and Smith) against Vincent and Shannon Gould and We the People Nashville; and an adversary proceeding filed by the United States Trustee for the Middle District of Tennessee (U.S. Trustee) for (1) violations of § 110; (2) fines under § 110(b), (c), (f); (3) turnover of any excessive fee under subsection (h); (4) a finding of unfair and deceptive acts under subsections (i) and (j); (5) a finding of the unauthorized practice of law under subsection (k); and (6) injunctive relief under subsection (j). The United States Trustee filed his adversary action against Vincent Gould, We the People Forms and Service Center of Nashville and We the People Forms and Service Centers, USA, Inc., a California corporation. A trial on the four consolidated cases was held July 28, 2004 and adjourned to September 22, 2004, at which time the trial was competed. The Defendants (Appellants) in the proceedings appeal from a favorable decision for the United States Trustee and third-party complainants/debtors.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

A. Objection to Appellants' Statement of Facts

The United States Trustee objects to certain "facts" stated by Appellants. More particularly, those statements dealing with "the organized bars attitude" and the "legal monopoly" the "organized bar" desires to retain for its own.[1] The appellate record is devoid of such evidence. The Appellants do not reference the trial transcript or any exhibit to substantiate such facts as being part of this record on appeal. These "facts" are poorly veiled as argument and are irrelevant, nonsensical and unnecessary.

B. United States Trustee's Relevant, Additional Facts

Until April 4, 2004, Vincent Gould d/b/a We the People Forms and Service Center of Nashville ("WTP") in Nashville, Tennessee as a franchisee of We the People Forms and Service Centers, USA, Inc., a California corporation ("WTP-USA") conducted business in a store on Thompson Lane.[2] We the People assisted and "prepared" bankruptcy petitions for pro se debtors. The business advertised We the People's services using newspapers, circulars, the yellow pages, Graffiti Indoors and bus benches showing their telephone number as "44-LEGAL."[3] We the People charge $199 for their services.[4] Mr. Gould operated the business until he sold it back to the franchisor a year later for $59,500.[5]

Customers who paid the $199 fee charged by WTP received a blue folder with (1) a bankruptcy document preparation agreement stating that WTP has a "supervising attorney" who will assist a customer if the customer has questions, (2) a WTP chapter 7 petition customer information workbook with questions to be filled out by customers ("Workbook"), (3) a bankruptcy overview-chapter 7-Tennessee ("Overview"), (4) a Tennessee bankruptcy

Antoinette Inmon, a 25-year old patient service coordinator at Vanderbilt Hospital[9], went to WTP after seeing an ad in the newspaper advertising bankruptcies for $199.[10] Ms. Inmon recalled the telephone number as "44-LEGAL"[11] Ms. Inmon decided to file for bankruptcy after a vehicle she returned to the place she originally purchased it from began garnishing her paycheck.[12] She called WTP and explained her "situation" to Mr. Gould who could see her right away.[13] Ms. Inmon went to WTP immediately and was greeted by Mr. Gould who gave her a packet to fill out.[14] The packet contained a Workbook, in the form of a long questionnaire, which Ms. Inmon began to fill in at the store.[15] Ms. Inmon testified that whenever she came to a question she did not understand Mr. Gould explained the question or provided her examples to help her answer the question.[16]

As Ms. Inmon reviewed her Workbook during her testimony, Ms. Inmon identified a number of places in her Workbook where the writing was not hers.[17] Ms. Inmon testified that there were questions that were filled out that she did not provide information for, questions that were marked through, but she did not do it, and other anomalies.[18] Ms. Inmon

Mr. Gould also helped Ms. Inmon value her vehicle and advised her to use a "quick sale" value.[20] She paid Mr. Gould $199 once she finished her paperwork.[21] Ms. Inmon then went back to WTP to get her Official Statement, Schedules and petition.[22] Ms. Inmon was never given her Workbook so she could compare the information in the Workbook with the Official Statements and Schedules and petition that were typed.[23] Ms. Inmon took the documents provided by WTP and filed for bankruptcy in the Middle District of Tennessee.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This case deals with questions which Appellants have repeatedly raised and which courts through out the country have repeatedly rejected. Those questions are: (1) the scope of Congress' power under the Bankruptcy Clause; (2) the Appellants' First Amendment rights; (3) the finding by the bankruptcy court that Appellants' conduct rose to the level of deceptive and unfair practices; (4) the finding by the bankruptcy court that Appellants' engaged in the unauthorized practice of law; and (5) the finding by the bankruptcy court that Appellants violated §§ 110(b)(1), (c)(1), (c)(2), (f)(1), (h), (i), (j) and (k). Courts having the opportunity to entertain these issues, both at the trial court level and at the appellate level, have rejected these arguments.[24]

Most recently, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Doser v. United States Trustee (In re Doser),[25] denied to give any legitimacy to the very arguments made by Appellants to this appeal. In the Doser case, the circuit court failed to accept the notion that Congress exceeded its authority under Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 4, when it enacted 11 U.S.C. § 110 to regulate the conduct of bankruptcy petition preparers.[26] The Court rejected appellant's argument that subsections (h), (i) and (j) are vague and overbroad because they somehow fail to provide adequate notice of the conduct to be sanctioned, or because they somehow fail to provide guidance to a court which must enforce the mandates of the statute.[27] The court likewise did not give credence to Appellant's contention that its bundle of services (use of a "supervising attorney and providing customers an 'Overview' and 'Workbook'"), was not a fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive act.[28]

The district court, in Doser,[29] validated the bankruptcy court's position that providing customers the Overview and Workbook "was a fraudulent, unfair or deceptive act" under § 110.[30] The Doser[31]bankruptcy court held that the distribution of these materials constituted the unauthorized practice of law and amounted to a deceptive and unfair practice in violation of § 110.[32] These are the very same arguments Appellants are making in this appeal and which courts have resoundingly rejected.

The bankruptcy court in the Inmon case found that it was deceptive and unfair for Appellants to provide an erroneous Overview, Workbook and packet of information.[33] Appellants cannot refute that the information contained in the Overview was inaccurate. Nor can Appellants deny that question number ten in the Workbook dealing with the transfer of property was patently wrong, and caused the chapter 7 trustee to file § 727 complaints against some of the Appellees. The bankruptcy court much like other courts throughout the country also rejected Appellants argument that their conduct is not unfair and deceptive and does not rise to the level of unauthorized practice of law.[34]

ARGUMENT

Appellants raise ten separate issues on appeal. The United States Trustee will combine and address only eight of those issues pertaining directly to his complaint filed in the Inmon adversary proceeding. The two remaining issues regarding adjudication of the third-party complaints will be left to the respective Appellees to address.[35]

The Appellants argue the bankruptcy court erred because by making findings under § 110 the court intended only to punish non-lawyers for "providing generalized legal information, document preparation services and adjuncts to those services" at a low cost.[36] The bankruptcy court did not commit reversible error on any of the issues raised by Appellants nor did the court punish Appellants merely because they were non-lawyers providing document preparation services under § 110. Instead, the bankruptcy court applied § 110 as intended by Congress. With an overwhelming amount of evidence, the bankruptcy court concluded that the repeated conduct of Appellants violated § 110 and warranted the remedies enumerated under the statute. The bankruptcy court sought to enjoin a business practice that was detrimental to the public. The services Appellants provided were not innocuous. The evidence established, their method of doing business had a negative impact on the debtors involved in this appeal. Appellants' bundle of services and behavior showed such an intentional disregard of the Bankruptcy Code as to rise to the level of unfair and deceptive acts for which injunctive relief was necessary. Because the bankruptcy court applied the statute in the way Congress intended, potential bankruptcy consumers are no longer prey to the unfair and deceptive acts of We the People and their franchisee in this jurisdiction. A brief discussion of the overview and history of this consumer protection legislation is instructive.

I. OVERVIEW & HISTORY OF 11 U.S.C. § 110

A. OVERVIEW OF 11 U.S.C. § 110

In 1994, Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 110 as part of the Bankruptcy Reform Act, Pub. L. No. 103-394, 308, 108 Stat. 4135 (Oct. 22, 1994) in order to address the "growing problem of bankruptcy preparers who abuse the system in the course of preparing documents for debtors to file in bankruptcy court."[37] Section 110 applies to any "bankruptcy petition preparer." A bankruptcy petition preparer is defined as "a person other than an attorney or an employee of an attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing" in a bankruptcy case.[38]

The statute requires bankruptcy petition preparers to sign each document prepared for filing in a bankruptcy case and to include on each document the preparer's name, address and Social Security number.[39] Bankruptcy petition preparers are also required to provide the debtor a copy of each document for filing.[40] Section 110 prohibits petition preparers from executing documents on behalf of debtors,[41] from advertising their services as "legal,"[42] and from collecting or receiving any payment from the debtor for court fees in connection with the filing of the petition.[43] The statute provides for fines of not more than $500 for each violation of these requirements.[44]

Section 110 authorizes additional methods of enforcement against bankruptcy petition

preparers, including actions for damages for the negligent or intentional disregard of the Bankruptcy Code or any "fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive act,"[45] and for injunctive relief.[46] The statute provides that any fees "in excess of the value of services rendered for the documents prepared" shall be disallowed and ordered to be turned over to the bankruptcy trustee.[47]

B. SECTION 110 IS A CONSUMER PROTECTION STATUTE

Title 11 U.S.C. § 110 is a consumer protection statute intended by Congress to protect consumers from fraudulent and deceptive conduct by bankruptcy petition preparers.[48] Although the Bankruptcy Code and other laws expressly addressed attorney misconduct,[49] prior to the enactment of § 110, there were no statutory legal tools available to address non-attorneys seeking to profit at the expense of individuals unwilling or financially unable to hire legal counsel.[50] The legislative history for § 110 unequivocally expresses Congress' resolve to stem the widespread national problem of fraudulent and deceptive practices directed against unsophisticated consumers by bankruptcy petition preparers. The legislative history expresses Congress' concerns in enacting this statute:

> This section adds a new section to * * * title 11 * * * to create standards and penalties pertaining to bankruptcy petition preparers. Bankruptcy petition preparers not employed or supervised by any attorney have proliferated across the country. While it is permissible for a petition preparer to provide services solely limited to typing, far too many of them also attempt to provide legal advice and legal > services to debtors. These preparers often lack the necessary legal training and ethics regulation to provide such services in an adequate and appropriate manner. These services may take unfair advantage of persons who are ignorant of their rights both inside and outside the bankruptcy system.[51]

Congress passed § 110 to tackle petition preparers who prey on the poor and unsophisticated. It was hoped that the new law would address the abuses of bankruptcy petition preparers and at least provide minimal protection to consumers.[52] The legislation authorizes the bankruptcy court, as the court did in the Inmon case, to utilize statutory tools in order to stop the deceptive practices of petition preparers (We the People) who prey on the unknowing, unsophisticated consumer.

II. SECTION 110 IS A VALID EXERCISE OF CONGRESSIONAL POWER AND THE BANKUPTCY COURT'S FINDINGS OF FACTS & CONCLUSIONS OF LAW ENTERED OCTOBER 6, 2004, DID NOT VIOLATE APPELLANTS' CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS.

The Appellants assert A[t]here is nothing in the language of § 110 which authorizes the Bankruptcy Court to adjudicate or regulate matters concerning violations of ' 110.@[53] This includes the ability of the bankruptcy court to make any determinations under § 110(b) through (i).[54] According to Appellants, no authority exists for an Article I bankruptcy court to order injunctive relief or to order fines, penalties, or other damages for violations of § 110.[55] Appellants believe Congress intended only Article III courts to determine and enjoin actions under § 110.[56] Appellants are of the opinion that § 110 is vague and overbroad.

As stated earlier, this argument has been raised and rejected in the Ninth Circuit case of In re Doser.[57] As the Ninth Circuit court acknowledged, § 110 represents a constitutional exercise of Congressional authority under the Bankruptcy Clause of the U.S. Constitution, Art. 1, § 8, cl. 4, that was added to the Bankruptcy Code to Acreate a set of standards and accompanying penalties to regulate bankruptcy petition preparers.@[58] Section 110 does not exceed the scope of Congress' enumerated power under the Bankruptcy Clause. Moreover, courts having considered the constitutional argument raised by Appellants have plainly rejected the argument.[59]

A. The Bankruptcy Clause.

The Bankruptcy Clause empowers Congress "to establish uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies."[60] Congress is also conferred the power then to Amake all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution@[61] that authority.[62] As the Supreme Court stated in United States v. Fox:[63]

> There is no doubt of the competency of Congress to provide * * * for the enforcement of all legislation necessary or proper to the execution of powers with which it is entrusted. * * * [Congress' Bankruptcy Clause power] may embrace within its legislation *whatever may be deemed important to a complete and effective bankrupt [sic] system. * * * Any act committed with a view of evading the legislation of Congress passed in the execution of any of its powers, or fraudulently securing the benefit of such legislation, may properly be [regulated]* (emphasis added).[64]

Section 110 was enacted "to police fraud and abuse by bankruptcy petition preparers, and it is 'critically needed' to confront the large scale fraudulent conduct of those preparers."[65] Section 110 created a set of standards and penalties to regulate the conduct and practices of bankruptcy petition preparers throughout the country.

The Appellants maintain that the Supreme Court decision in Northern Pipeline Co.

v. Marathon Pipe Line Co. (In re Northern Pipeline)[66] holds that any legislation passed within the ambit of the Bankruptcy Clause must deal directly with the adjustment of the debt relationship between debtor and creditor.[67] Appellants assert that because § 110 was enacted under the Bankruptcy Clause, it is an unconstitutional exercise of legislative authority since § 110 has no direct effect on the debtor-creditor relationship.[68] Appellants posit the argument that Congress' authority under Article I cannot be extended to "reach the conduct of persons who simply provide a service to individuals by giving and assisting them to fill-out forms."[69]

In determining the constitutionality of a Federal statute, the Court should consider the underlying purpose behind the statute to determine whether it falls within the ambit of the Constitutional directive.[70] Congress has stated the purpose of the statute was to curtail the problem of abusive conduct by bankruptcy petition preparers in the course of preparing bankruptcy documents and, ultimately, abuse upon the bankruptcy system as a whole.[71] The preparation of bankruptcy documents combined with ill-informed advice to the debtors does directly affect the debtor-creditor relationship. As such, § 110 falls within the legislative authority under the Bankruptcy Clause and serves the purpose intended by Congress.

Every facet of § 110 is integrally related to the goals and operations of bankruptcy law and the bankruptcy system. Section 110 regulates permissible methods of conduct for preparing petitions and it does so by regulating petition preparers who seek to be paid for services they render. The statute's purpose is to protect debtors from abuse that might otherwise siphon pre-petition assets from the bankruptcy estate and to protect the bankruptcy system from inaccurate forms that might be prepared using fraudulent or deceptive means. Section 110 thus lies within Congress' power to control how bankruptcy litigation is pursued and operates, and is strikingly similar to other federal provisions that are ancillary to bankruptcy proceedings.[72]

Appellants reliance on Northern Pipeline is completely misplaced. Appellant We the People-USA and their respective franchisee fail to acknowledge in their brief that courts presented with this argument uniformly disregard such claim.[73] As the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Doser v. United States Trustee (In re Doser) stated, "[n]owhere in Northern Pipeline did the Court limit Congress' substantive power under the Bankruptcy Clause to the restructuring of debtor-creditor relationship."[74] The Ninth Circuit viewed the opposite occurring: "the scope of Congress' power under the Bankruptcy Clause has been recognized as broad."[75] The United States Supreme Court acknowledged in Continental Ill. Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago v. Chicago R.I. & P. Ry. Co.,[76] that "[f]rom the beginning, the tendency of legislation and of judicial interpretation has been uniformly in the direction of progressive liberalization in respect of the operation of the bankruptcy power."[77] The constitutional grant of authority has never been interpreted in such limited manner as that proposed by Appellants, and simply cannot be viewed that restrictively.

In further support of their argument, Appellants rely upon In re C.F. Foods, Inc.[78] The case of In re C.F. Foods, Inc. rejected a Bankruptcy Clause claim partly because of Louisville Joint Stock Bank v. Radford.[79] Nothing in either of these cases supports Appellants' position. The C.F. Foods case suggests that, at a minimum, to "all cases where the law causes to be distributed the property of the debtor amongst his creditors," the greatest part of that authority under the Bankruptcy Clause limits that power to "a discharge of the debtor from his contracts."[80] While C.F. Foods indicates that "[a]ll intermediate legislation, affecting substance and form, but tending to further the great end of the subject C distribution and discharge C are in the competency and discretion of Congress,"[81] it does not limit the enactment of bankruptcy laws only to those affecting the distribution and discharge in the debtor-creditor relationship. The grant of power goes to "whatever may be deemed appropriate" to effectuate the "bankrupt system" (or title 11 of the United States Code).

Appellants argue that because their work is completed pre-bankruptcy filing, a bankruptcy petition preparer cannot be involved in a bankruptcy case because bankruptcy court jurisdiction is not established pre-filing, but rather only once a case is commenced or filed.[82] For that reason, Appellants view the bankruptcy court as having no jurisdiction over them or their practices under § 110.[83] However, courts having considered this same argument have routinely rejected it. As the bankruptcy court in Moore pointed out, "[t]he petition is essential to the proper operation of the bankruptcy process, and all parties suffer if a petition is improperly prepared."[84] The Ninth Circuit in Doser also noted the importance of the petition and schedules in the bankruptcy process:

> [W]e hold that it is within the meaning of "the subject of Bankruptcy" and within Congress' power to pass uniform laws governing those persons wishing to prepare such documents. Even if not squarely within the meaning of "the subject of Bankruptcies," passing uniform laws for the protection of debtors during the process of preparing the bankruptcy petition is eminently "necessary and proper" to effectuate Congress' power under the Bankruptcy Clause.[85]

There is no greater legislation and form affecting substance and form than the complete and accurate disclosure of information in a debtor's statements and schedules.[86] A debtor's initial filings present the financial information central to the administration of the bankruptcy case and, as Appellant argues, the debtor-creditor relationship. Appellants' argument ignores the fundamental relationship between preparing and filing accurate information. This is at the very core of §110. If a preparer submits to a debtor a set of "prepared" bankruptcy documents that are incorrect or false then § 110 performs its intent. That intent is the ability of Congress under the Bankruptcy Clause to empower a bankruptcy court to determine and address violations under the statute, and thereby uphold the integrity of the bankruptcy system.

That is what the bankruptcy court in Inmon[87] and related proceedings sought to do: address the fundamental relationship between inaccurate statements and schedules "prepared" by Appellants and, consequently, maintain the reliability of the bankruptcy system as a whole. The bankruptcy court found Ms. Inmon's testimony that Appellants changed and manipulated the written answers she had provided in the "Workbook" to Appellants was Acredible, articulate and thorough@.[88] Appellant Gould ineffectively attempted to explain away this business practice. The business practice of manipulating information was further reinforced by another Appellee to this appeal, Mr. Toalson. Mr. Toalson testified that the A$900@ figure in his "Workbook" did not look like his handwriting.[89] If bankruptcy petititon preparers are able to manipulate and change information provided by debtors, then the integrity of the bankruptcy system comes in question. In the Inmon case, the Appellants changed the debtor's answers to the questionnaire, and translated that changed information onto her statements and schedules without her knowledge, permission or consent.[90] The statements and schedules are at the core of the bankruptcy case and bankruptcy administration. They ultimately affect the very debtor-creditor relationship Appellants contend is so crucial to withstand constitutional challenge to § 110. As the Douglas court observed when rejecting We the People's argument, A[t]here can be no more fundamental exercise of core subject matter jurisdiction by the bankruptcy court than its policing of professionals whom debtors pay to render service in connection with their case.@[91]

B. The Bankruptcy Court Has Jurisdiction To Hear This Matter Because This Proceeding "Arises Under" Title 11 And Is A "Core" Proceeding.

Appellants' next argue that the instant proceeding could not have an effect on the bankruptcy estate because it is not "related to" the bankruptcy case, it is not "core."[92] In accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 157(a), the district court may refer proceedings to a bankruptcy court "to hear and determine all cases under title 11 and all core proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11, and may enter appropriate orders and judgments."[93] A core proceeding may be decided by the bankruptcy court with a final order. In a non-core matter, the bankruptcy court may only submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to the district court.[94]

It is clear the instant proceeding "arises under" title 11. Section 110 is a statute contained within title 11 of the United States Code (ABankruptcy Code@). Because this proceeding involves exclusively the provision of § 110, it stands to reason it Aarises under@ the Bankruptcy Code.[95]

Once a determination is made that a matter Aarises under@ title 11, the court must determine whether it is a Acore@ proceeding.[96] The Sixth Circuit states:

> While we determined that this matter was at least Arelated to@ the bankruptcy, that determination was for the purpose of determining whether the matter falls within [94] 28 U.S.C. § 157(c). Section 110 is a perfect example of the division of jurisdiction for "core" and "non-core" matters. Pursuant to subsections (b) through (h), the bankruptcy court is given authority to enforce the essential "core" duties of a bankruptcy petition preparer, including proper disclosure of fees and the return of any excess fees. Under subsection (i), the sanctions that are not otherwise described in section 110 are reserved for the district court.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

> Subsection 157(b)(1) vests full judicial power in bankruptcy courts over Acore proceedings arising under title 11, or arising in a case under title 11.@ The prepositional qualifications of core proceedings are taken from two or three categories of jurisdiction set forth in section 1334(b): proceedings "arising under" title 11, "arising in" title 11 cases, and "related to" title 11 cases. Although the purpose of this language in section 1334(b) is to define conjunctively the scope of jurisdiction, each category has a distinguishable meaning. These meanings become relevant because section 157 apparently equates core proceedings with the categories of "arising under" and "arising in" proceedings (emphasis added). [98]

Numerous courts addressing We the People challenges to their subject matter jurisdiction have discarded Appellants' arguments and held that § 110 are core proceedings.[99] Because § 110 is a substantive provision of the Bankruptcy Code, it logically "arises under" title 11. Accordingly, under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334(b) and 157(b)(1), the Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction to hear and decide the matter which is now on appeal.

III. APPELLANTS FREEDOM OF SPEECH RIGHTS UNDER THE FIRST AMENDMENT HAVE NOT BEEN VIOLATED.

Those courts that have dealt with the freedom of speech argument made by Appellants have likewise rejected this argument as well.[100] Despite those rulings, Appellants continue to insist the bankruptcy court committed error because it has restricted the information We the People can communicate to the public.[101] Appellants believe the freedom not only extends to the right to speak and publish but also the Aperipheral rights to distribute, read, and receive information.@[102] First, it should be acknowledged that a bankruptcy petition preparer's speech is not affected by § 110 as long as the business activity does not violate § 110. This is because § 110 is aimed at Appellants' conduct as a bankruptcy petition preparer not at the distribution of literature.[103] Section 110's terms do not target speech at all, much less speech of particular content or viewpoint. Rather, § 110's undisputed purpose is to protect debtors from abuse by paid bankruptcy petition preparers, regardless of whether such abuse occurs through speech or otherwise.

A. Section 110 Does Not Infringe on Appellants' First Amendment Rights.

The Appellants state that the decision being appealed prohibits any practice by a bankruptcy petition preparer other than providing a typing service, and further prohibits their ability to disseminate material, which is no different than that sold at book stores.[104] They additionally advance the notion that finding Appellants have engaged in the unauthorized practice of law further abrogates their rights under the First Amendment. It is an accepted principle that commercial speech is afforded less protection than other forms of protected expression.[105] The Supreme Court in Central Hudson created a four-part test to assess the protection due commercial speech:

> For commercial speech to come within [the First Amendment], it at least must concern lawful activity and not be misleading. Next, we ask whether the asserted governmental interest is substantial. If both inquiries yield positive answers, we must determine whether the regulation directly advances the government interest asserted, and whether it is not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest.[106]

In applying the test to the proposition advanced by Appellants, the Ninth Circuit in Doser found "[t]he government has a substantial interest in protecting pro se debtors from fraudulent and deceptive practices of non-attorneys who prepare bankruptcy petitions (citation omitted). The statute directly advances that interest because it specifically prohibits fraudulent and deceptive acts by bankruptcy petition preparers and only in the narrow context of the preparation of bankruptcy petitions."[107] The inquiry need go no further because Appellants' conduct in the first instance is an unlawful activity which is misleading.

In the Inmon decision, the bankruptcy court found that Appellants' conduct violated §§ 110(b), (c), (f), (h), (i) and (k). Appellants' business practices rose to the level of unauthorized practice of law (unlawful activity) and Appellants committed unfair and deceptive acts (misleading activity).[108] The proof in Ms. Inmon's case "overwhelmingly" supported the bankruptcy court's conclusion. As stated earlier, Ms. Inmon testified of many instances when someone, other than herself, at We the People changed the information on the "Workbook" she originally completed.[109] The bankruptcy court had the opportunity to review the information and documentation provided to potential bankruptcy customers by Appellants. The bankruptcy judge found the information packet given to Ms. Inmon substantially identical to the package provided the debtor in In re Rose.[110] The bankruptcy court agreed with Judge Stair that the 'packet" alone demonstrated not only the unauthorized practice of law but also unfair and deceptive conduct.[111] The packet was unfair and deceptive: "the Customer Packet provides" problems because the documents alone actually inform potential debtors what to include within their bankruptcy schedules. Judge Stair found that these documents "disseminate legal advice, some of which is misleading and contradictory."[112] Appellants' deceptive and unlawful speech is, therefore, not protected speech.

B. Sections 110(h), (i) and (j) Are Not Vague or Overbroad.

The Appellants also raise the concern that subsections (h), (i) and (j) of § 110 are unconstitutionally vague and overbroad because they fail to provide adequate notice of the conduct to be sanctioned.[113] They believe the statute is vague "when it fails to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his contemplated conduct is forbidden by statute."[114] As such, Appellants conclude § 110 infringes upon free speech due to the failure of the statute to provide adequate notice of what conduct is permissible.

The Supreme Court has held that, before invoking the "strong medicine" of overbreadth doctrine, a claimant bears the burden of showing, "from the text of [the law] and from actual fact," that "a law's application to protected speech be substantial, not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the scope of the law's plainly legitimate applications."[115] "Rarely, if ever, will an overbreadth challenge succeed against a law * * * that is not specifically addressed to speech or to conduct necessarily associated with speech."[116] Courts have further explained that, in analyzing overbreadth claims, the "first task is to determine whether the enactment reaches a substantial amount of constitutionally protected conduct. If it does not, then the overbreadth challenge must fail. The court should then examine the facial vagueness challenge and, assuming the enactment implicates no constitutionally protected conduct, should uphold the challenge only if the enactment is impermissibly vague in all of its applications."[117] It is dispositive that § 110 involves only economic regulation, and does not infringe constitutional rights.[118]

Citing Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville,[119] Appellants make their Fifth Amendment argument with respect to vagueness. However, a statute is not impermissibly vague under the Fifth Amendment if it, "give[s] a person of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, so that he may act accordingly."[120] "Laws regulating economic activity not involving constitutionally protected conduct are subject to a quite lenient test for constitutional sufficiency."[121]

Courts having considered the issue as advanced by Appellants have determined the statute is not vague and have given no consideration to Appellants' arguments. The Barcelo and Doser courts found a person of ordinary intelligence reading § 110 would have fair notice of who is covered by the statute and of what conduct is forbidden by it.[122] These courts deemed § 110 to be extremely clear.

Section 110 unambiguously defines a petition preparer as "a person, other than an attorney or an employee of an attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing" by a debtor in a bankruptcy case.[123] "Person" is a definable term under § 101(41) and includes a corporation. This provides adequate and fair notice of what parties the statute reaches: Appellants Gould (the franchisee) and We the People-USA (the franchisor).

Section 110(h) unequivocally prohibits the collection of fees "found to be in excess of the value of services rendered for the documents prepared" by a bankruptcy petition preparer. This section certainly specifies the prohibited conduct: no collection of excessive fees. Courts dealing with this portion of Appellants' argument have rejected it and have not struggled in applying this subsection of the statute.[124] Typically, the service to be compensated is typing. The rate of compensation is usually an hourly rate or flat rate. After hearing the evidence on this issue, the bankruptcy court held $30 in the Inmon case to be the value of services rendered for the documents prepared.[125] This evidence was partly based on Sharon Muller's testimony, a paralegal in the area who prepares petitions for a local bankruptcy firm. Mrs. Muller stated that she charged a maximum $30 per hour for each petition she prepared for the firm.[126] The other portion of evidence was Ms. Inmon's testimony that proved the fees were in excess of the value of the services that were rendered to her.[127] Appellants offered no rebuttal evidence. The section provides adequate notice of the conduct prohibited: the collection of excessive fees. As the Barcelo court recognized, courts have not had difficulty in applying this legislative directive to the facts and circumstances of a case and, therefore, no vagueness exists as to this subsection.[128] In view of the foregoing, § 110(h) is not impermissibly vague.

As to Appellants concerns regarding subsection (i), Section 110(i) permits claims based upon the unfair, fraudulent or deceptive acts of a bankruptcy petition preparer. It allows damages if any of the following events occur: (1) dismissal of the case for failure to file necessary documents; (2) a bankruptcy petition preparer's negligent or intentional disregard of the Bankruptcy Code or the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure; (3) violation of any portion of § 110; or (4) any fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive act committed by the bankruptcy petition preparer. These violations are fairly straightforward and a person of ordinary intelligence undoubtedly knows what the statute means. Appellants, however, deem it necessary for the bankruptcy court to have some "guidance."[129] The implication is that some type of laundry list should have been codified as part of the subsection. Simply because Congress has not set forth a list of what constitutes a fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive act under the subsection does not render the statute unconstitutionally vague. Appellants contend that the bankruptcy court erred because it applied an "I know it when I see it" standard. Nowhere in the court's opinion is this type of standard expressed. The bankruptcy court thoroughly noted the case law under § 110(i) and applied the law to a case "saturated with evidence demonstrating unfair and deceptive practices."[130] As the Barcelo court points out:

> The term "unfair and deceptive" was used by Congress at least as early as 1938, and is used in many federal regulations spanning a broad variety of subjects. See, e.g., 16 C.F.R. § 1.8 (general authority); 7 C.F.R. § 1150.161 (agricultural promotion); 12 C.F.R. § 227.11 (banking); 16 C.F.R. § 14.12 (marketing research); 49 U.S.C. § 41712 (proscribing unfair or deceptive practice by air transporters). There is also ample case law defining "unfair and deceptive acts," and many courts have found that the unauthorized practice of law amounts to unfair and deceptive conduct [citations omitted]. In light of the common and accepted statutory usage of "unfair and deceptive," and the widely known Section 110(j)(1) authorizes the Court to enjoin the bankruptcy petition preparer from conducting business in violation§ 110 or from acting as a bankruptcy petition preparer. "Since the class of persons affected by the statute is adequately defined, and the conduct proscribed is adequately described in each subsection preceding subsection (j), it follows that Section 110(j) gives a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice of what conduct is forbidden."[132] Therefore, § 110(j) is not impermissibly vague.

IV. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT DENY APPELLANTS DUE PROCESS RIGHTS WHEN IT IMPOSED FINES AND INJUNCTIVE RELIEF UNDER § 110 AND DID NOT PROVIDE APPELLANTS A JURY TRIAL.

A. The Appellants Received Due Process.

Appellants claim the bankruptcy court erred and denied their due process rights when it imposed "criminal" fines under § 110 and did not utilize a standard of proof that rose to the level of "clear and convincing." First, the fines imposed under § 110 are civil in nature and not criminal.[133] Section 110(j)(1) specifically states that, "the United States trustee may bring a civil action to enjoin a bankruptcy petition preparer (emphasis added)." The adversary proceeding initiated by the United States Trustee in the Inmon case was a civil proceeding. Appellants must remember that disgorgement under § 110(h) does not constitute "damages." Rather, disgorgement refunds a debtor the fees in excess of the value of the services rendered, a value capable of being determined by a bankruptcy court.[134] standard the United States Trustee has easily met the standard, the more appropriate standard of proof in bankruptcy is a "preponderance of the evidence."[135] The record is replete with instances of how each and every subsection of § 110 were violated.[136] The significant amount of evidence relied upon by the bankruptcy court came from Appellees' testimony and documentary evidence to which the Appellants stipulated.[137] Despite the United States Trustee's assertion that it has met the clear and convincing standard of proof, preponderance of the evidence is the more appropriate standard in this context.

Appellants' second assertion is that they were denied due process of law because the bankruptcy court imposed fines in accordance with § 110. Nothing in § 110(i)(1) diminishes or takes away authority of the bankruptcy court to enforce the provisions of § 110, or to fine or enjoin any conduct that violates the statute. By virtue of the clear and unambiguous wording of § 110, Appellants were on notice of (1) the prohibited conduct and business practices; (2) that violation of any of the subsections would result in imposition of a maximum fine of $500 for each violation; (3) that the bankruptcy court could rule such business practices to be fraudulent, unfair and deceptive; (4) that such practices could also be ruled as impermissible activities prohibited by law under § 110(k); and (5) that injunctive relief could be issued under § 110(j) in order to prohibit future conduct of activities that are detrimental to the consumer. The complaint filed by the United States Trustee in the underlying adversary proceeding clearly set forth the violations under the statute and the accompanying relief requested. Given the unambiguous language of the statute and the specifically pled complaint of the United States Trustee, Appellants had notice of the alleged violations and the relief requested and, as such, due process was met.

Appellants next contend that due process was violated because injunctive relief was issued under § 110(j). As authority for their proposition Appellants cite to Fulton v. McVay (In re Fulton).[138] The Fulton decision has no bearing on the issue raised by Appellants. First, Fulton deals with injunctive relief issued sua sponte by the bankruptcy court on an order to show cause if the petition preparers gave legal advice in the course of preparing petitions. In the Inmon case, the United States Trustee filed an adversary proceeding and complaint under Fed.R.Bank.P. 7003, 7004 and 7008 as incorporated by Fed.R.Civ. P. 8. The Appellants answered the complaint. Depositions of the parties were taken by both sides to this appeal. In other words, discovery was accomplished by all parties. Thus, due process for purposes of § 110(j) was achieved. This was not the case in Fulton, which is why the district court overturned the bankruptcy court's decision. Therefore, this line of argument by Appellants has no merit.[139]

B. Appellants Have No Right to A Jury Trial.

Appellants incorrectly argue that they were entitled to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment to the United States Constitution.[140] As the Graves court noted, "[t]here is a Seventh Amendment right to trial by jury in suits at common law where the amount in controversy exceeds $20.00."[141] In Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Norbert,[142] the U.S. Supreme Court discussed certain factors that determine whether a party has a Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial in a matter pending before a bankruptcy court.[143] Applying those factors to the instant case, (1) no causes of action similar to the cause of action brought here were tried by juries at English common law;[144] (2) the claims against the Appellants are [143] Jury trial factors: (1) the statutory action asserted is similar to actions required to be tried before a jury in the English courts of law in the latter 18th century, when the Seventh Amendment to the Constitution was adopted; (2) the remedy sought by Plaintiff is legal, rather than equitable, in nature; (3) the cause of action involves "private" rather than "public" rights; and (4) Congress has not validly assigned resolution of the claim to a non-Article III adjudicative body that does not use a jury as a fact finder.

[144] Section 110 is a consumer protection statute enacted in 1994 to regulate bankruptcy petition preparers. No similar consumer protection laws existed in 18th century England when the Seventh Amendment was adopted.

"equitable" in nature;[145] (3) the adversary proceeding involves a "public" rather than a "private" right;[146] and (4) Congress properly assigned oversight of the conduct of bankruptcy petition preparers to the bankruptcy courts.[147]

The Graves court went on to state that the phrase "suits at common law" denotes suits in which "legal" rights are ascertained and determined, as opposed to those where "equitable" remedies are administered. It includes statutory causes of action that are similar to common law actions that were ordinarily decided in English law courts in the late 1700's, as opposed to those customarily heard by courts of equity or admiralty. Statutory causes of action that are either "equitable" or "legal" but involve "public rights" are not entitled to jury trial.[148] The Graves court held that there is no constitutional right to a jury trial for a § 110(j) injunction, and there is nothing in the text of § 110(j) or its enacting statute which indicates Congress meant to create a statutory jury trial for these injunctions.[149]

The Appellants also cite to Fulton v. McVay[150] as authority for injunctive relief being set aside. Again, the Fulton court reversed an injunction under § 110 because the injunction was issued sua sponte by the court as opposed to the injunction having been issued through the course of an adversary proceeding. The case at bar deals with an adversary proceeding, not a sua sponte show cause order issued by the bankruptcy court under § 105. Therefore, Appellants' argument with respect to this particular issue has no merit.

Section 157(b)(2) contains a non-exhaustive list of "core proceedings" which Article I bankruptcy judges may adjudicate. Section 157(b)(2)(A) provides for "matters concerning the administration of the estate" as a core item which can be heard by a bankruptcy judge.

[145] The injunctive remedies are naturally "equitable" in nature. It should also be noted that the fines under §110(b) B (h) are equitable and not legal in nature because they are not intended to make a debtor whole but rather to supplement the injunctive provisions which serve as future deterrents.

[146] The U.S. Trustee is a statutory official acting in his official capacity to enforce a consumer protection statute. Appellants are not asserting a tort or contract action on behalf of private parties or individual debtors. The financial harm caused individual debtors in this case is not related to the relief that was requested. Moreover, the government's interest is in seeing that the laws enacted by Congress are adhered to.

[147] The bankruptcy court is a non-Article III adjudicative body that does not use a jury as a fact finder; s*ee also* section II of the U.S. Trustee's brief.

Bankruptcy judges may "hear and determine all cases under title 11 and all core proceedings arising under title 11." As discussed earlier, there is no question that § 110 actions are actions that are "under" the Bankruptcy Code and are "core." Additionally, there is no more fundamental matter concerning the administration of the estate than truthful bankruptcy statements and schedules. In light of the language of § 157 and the consequences that stem from fraudulent and misleading statements and schedules, the statute authorizes bankruptcy courts to hear matters under § 110.

Lastly, even if Appellants had a right to a jury, a party demanding trial by jury must comply with the Rules of Civil and Bankruptcy Procedure in order to perfect their right to jury trial.[151] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 38 incorporated herein by Fed.R.Bankr.P. 9015, requires that a party must "demand a trial by jury of any issue triable of right by a jury in writing at any time after the commencement of the action and not later than 10 days after the service of the last pleading directed to such issue[.]"[152] "The failure of a party to serve and file a demand as required by this rule constitutes a waiver by the party of trial by jury."[153]

A review of the answer filed by Appellants does not show a demand for a jury trial. A review of the items designated for appeal does not show a motion for demand of a jury trial. The Appellants' objection filed June 8, 2004, to the bankruptcy court's pretrial order makes no demand for a jury trial. The transcripts on appeal do not show an oral motion for a jury trial. In order for the issue of a jury trial to be properly before a bankruptcy court, a request for a jury trial must be made. [154] The Appellants cannot make a last minute jury demand via an argument in a brief. Something more affirmative must be done. The Appellants' jury demand is late and, therefore, untimely under Fed.R.Civ.P. 38.

This notation is insufficient); U.S. Leather, Inc. v. Mitchell Mfg. Group, Inc., 276 F.3d 782, (6thCir.2002) (the Court did not find persuasive the claim by Mitchell Corp. that its demand was timely because it was filed within 10 days of the magistrate judge's report and recommendation; defendants may not wait six months before filing a demand for jury trial).

Consequently, Appellants have waived their right to a jury trial.[155]

V. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ERR WHEN IT DETERMINED THAT THE FEE CHARGED BY WE THE PEOPLE PURSUANT TO 11 U.S.C. § 110(f)(1) IS EXCESSIVE.

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it held that the value of the services rendered by Appellants was limited to $30.[156] Courts addressing this issue as well have rejected Appellants argument that their services are not in excess of the value of the services rendered.[157] Section 110(h)(2) provides "[t]he court shall disallow and order the immediate turnover to the bankruptcy trustee of any fee referred to in paragraph (1) found to be in excess of the value of services rendered for the documents prepared. An individual debtor may exempt any funds so recovered under section 522(b)." Appellants' violation under this subsection warranted the finding by the court.

The $30 charge was also appropriate given (1) Appellants engaged in the unauthorized practice of law and should not be rewarded for the monetary benefits they received out of their improper and illegal actions, (2) Appellants continued to implement the We the People-USA business model and charge $199 for such services despite rulings from bankruptcy courts that identified unauthorized practice of law problems existing within their business practices, (3) the defective and erroneous nature of Appellants' Workbook; and (4) the systemic alteration of information in the Workbook without the knowledge, consent or permission of the debtors.

The bankruptcy petition preparer bears the burden of establishing entitlement to the fees once the question of reasonableness has been raised.[158] Before determining the reasonableness or "value of services rendered," the Court must first address the issue of whether such services were permissible and authorized by law. In other words, if the Court finds that Appellants were engaged in the unauthorized practice of law then the fees are in excess of the value of services rendered and should be turned over. The bankruptcy court for the Southern District of California in In re Kaitangian[159] found the preparer to have engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. Consequently, the petition preparer was ordered to disgorge all fees as they were the "fruits of illegal and improper action."[160] The same is true with Appellants in this case. The conduct of Appellants should not be rewarded by excessive compensation.

Courts have rejected Appellants' argument and have uniformly held that scrivener services are an appropriate measure of compensation for the services rendered by a bankruptcy petition preparer.[161] The evidence showed that a certified paralegal charged no more than $30 per hour for completing statements and schedules.[162] Appellants offered no rebuttal evidence in this regard. Appellants cannot bill for providing the Workbook and Overview or any "discussions" they may have with the debtors. Appellants are prohibited from rendering services connected with this type of deceptive and illegal activity and, therefore, cannot be compensated for providing these services.[163] The statute is clear that the bankruptcy court shall disallow and order the immediate turnover to the bankruptcy trustee of any fee referred to in paragraph (1) of the subsection found to be in excess of the value of services rendered. The Appellants were on notice disgorgement would occur in the event a bankruptcy court deemed their Apreparation@ of documents to be in excessive of the value of services rendered. VI. WE THE PEOPLE-USA IS A PETITION PREPARER AS DEFINED UNDER 11 U.S.C. §110(a).

The Appellant, We the People-USA claims it is not a bankruptcy petition preparer under § 110(a) because We the People-USA does not prepare for compensation a document for filing, and there is no privity between the franchisor and the customer of the franchisee.[164] Section 110(a) provides that a "bankruptcy petition preparer means a person, other than an attorney or an employee of an attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing." Subsection (b) of § 110 defines "document for filing" as "a petition or any other document prepared for filing by a debtor in a United States bankruptcy court or a United States district court in connection with a case under this title." Appellant does linguistic gymnastics in its brief in order to avoid liability under the term "preparation." The franchisor tries to escape responsibility by indicating that § 110(b) and (c) uses the words "prepare" rather than type. This argument rings hollow in the face of the myriad of information that is provided to consumers who pay the fee to Appellants for "preparation" of their documents.[165] Appellee Gould testified that "[t]he organization will prepare the petition."[166] As the evidence shows Appellant We the People-USA furnishes the franchisee with a packet of information to be provided to debtors.[167] Throughout the material We the People-USA uses its logo, a bell as its symbol and words "We the People" Appellants train the franchisee on how to utilize those documents.[168] We the People-USA controls the actual typing of the petition; the franchisee is not provided any software for typing or allowed to contract with any other party.[169] We the People-USA disclosed in the Statement of Assistance of Non-Attorney that it was a person or firm that assisted the debtor in connection with this bankruptcy case.[170] The bankruptcy court found We the People-USA receives a portion of WTP Nashville's gross profits.[171] We the People-USA is a petition preparer as defined under 11 U.S.C. § 110(a).[172] In the Shoup[173] case, the court found We the People-USA met the statutory definition of "bankruptcy petition preparer."[174] We the People-USA is undeniably a bankruptcy petition preparer under § 110(a). The bankruptcy court in Inmon correctly found Appellant, We the People-USA to be bankruptcy petition preparer who violated § 110.

Appellants raise an additional assertion in this portion of their argument that the bankruptcy court imposed fines on the franchisee, Gould and WTP-USA for improperly advertising in violation of § 110(f)(1), and for which there is no evidence in the record that supports the fine or even the use of the number "44-LEGAL"[175] This statement by Appellants is blatantly wrong. The Appellants stipulated to a list of six advertising items the bankruptcy court points to in rendering its opinion.[176] Additionally, Ms. Inmon had separate recall of the number "44-LEGAL."[177]

Section 110(f)(2) unambiguously states that a bankruptcy petition preparer shall be fined no more than A$500 for each violation.@ Clearly, seven violations occurred and the bankruptcy court correctly imposed a $3,500 fine on each Appellant.[178]

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it held that the conduct of Appellants, which rose to the level of a fraudulent, unfair and deceptive act, constituted the unauthorized practice of law ("UPL") in violation of § 110(k). In making such a decision the Inmon bankruptcy court looked at a number of cases, some dealing with Appellants, which held that the unauthorized practice of law constitutes a fraudulent, unfair or deceptive act under § 110(i).[179] Appellants are incorrect in their belief that the bankruptcy court must make some inquiry as to whether Appellants' practices were "likely to mislead" a consumer. No such standard exists under § 110. Courts holding that We the People's actions are misleading review the evidence, which is usually the Overview and Workbook provided by We the People-USA and their franchisees.[180] Appellants' business model along with the conduct of Appellant Gould are business practices that rose to the level of the unauthorized practice of law in Tennessee under T.C.A. § 23-3-101 et seq.

Section 110(k) provides "[n]othing in this section shall be construed to permit activities that are otherwise prohibited by law, including rules and laws that prohibit the unauthorized practice of law." The bankruptcy court properly found Appellants engaged in conduct in violation of state law and enjoined them accordingly.[181]

In cases in which the unauthorized practice of law has been alleged, bankruptcy judges have been held to have the inherent authority to regulate the unauthorized practice of law by non-lawyers in their courts.[182] Numerous bankruptcy courts around the country have made UPL determinations under § 110 by looking to state law and regulations.[183] Tennessee's law on the unauthorized practice of law is not substantively different from other state jurisdictions which have held We the People to have engaged in the unauthorized practice of law.[184]

Tennessee law provides that the "law business" includes "the advising or counseling for a valuable consideration of any person, or the drawing or procuring of or assisting in the drawing for valuable consideration of any paper, document or instrument affecting or relating to the secular rights or the soliciting of a client directly or indirectly to provide such services."[185] Similarly, the "[p]ractice of law" is defined as "the drawing of papers, pleadings or documents or the performance of any act in such capacity in connection with proceedings pending or prospective before any court."[186] In addressing the relationship between the various statutory subsections, the Tennessee Court of Appeals indicates that both of the aforementioned statutory provisions must be read in conjunction with Tenn.S.Ct.R. § 8.[187] "Thus, the acts included in Tenn. Code Ann. § 23-1-101 constitute the unauthorized practice of law if performed by a non-lawyer only when performing those acts requires the professional judgment of a lawyer." [188]

In the UPL case of Fifteenth Judicial District Unified Bar Association v. Glasgow,[189] the Tennessee appellate court concluded Ms. Glasgow was engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. Ms. Glasgow's conduct, in part, is similar to Appellants'. Ms. Glasgow obtained information from clients using a questionnaire that provided her with customer information. The information concerned such matters as custody agreements, child support, division of the parties' real and personal property. It was from this information that Ms. Glasgow would then "type" divorce papers. Her clients "attested" that they did not receive legal advice in the rendering of her services. The appellate court nonetheless affirmed the trial court's finding that Ms. Glasgow's conduct was the unauthorized practice of law. The court acknowledged that Ms. Glasgow:

> [was] not simply reducing her clients' words to writing or filling in blanks on pre-printed forms at the specific direction of her clients. Rather, she [was] preparing legal documents that require more legal knowledge than is possessed by ordinary lay persons. She is eliciting information from her clients and then incorporating the information into unique legal documents that she creates.[190]

This is exactly what Appellants' practice is in the bankruptcy context. We the People interprets information that is given to them from a Workbook onto Official Forms. The customer never sees the Official Forms during the time he or she provides information to the franchisee. Rather, the Official Forms are presented to the customer only when the information has been processed onto the statements and schedules for final review. The customer never has an opportunity to compare the Official Forms with the Workbook he or she is provided to fill in at the beginning of the process.[191] The Moore bankruptcy court perceptively pointed out that somewhere between the debtor's completed questionnaire and the transferring of the information to the Official Statements and Schedules, decisions were made by We the People that went beyond the services of an outside typist.[192] It is no different in this case. Under the scenario in the Inmon case, the Appellants undoubtedly engaged in the unauthorized practice of law because legal judgment was used in changing and transforming the information in the Workbook onto a complete set of Official Forms without obtaining Ms. Inmon's approval of the changes. Such judgment calls for the professional skill, training and character of a lawyer, and the bankruptcy court was correct to consider this issue.

On July 8, 2004, Appellant We the People-USA and their Knoxville franchisee, Motley 4, LLC, requested the Supreme Court of Tennessee to exercise original jurisdiction over matters involving the authorized practice of law relative to their business practices. On August 26, 2004, the Court issued its per curiam order refusing to exercise original jurisdiction and denied a stay stating that the "case should proceed in the trial court."[193] The bankruptcy court, being a trier of facts, had authority to hear and decide matters dealing with the unauthorized practice of law and did not abuse its discretion in this regard.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE REGION 2 : AFFIRMATION

AFFIRMATION IN OPPOSITION TO APPELLANT GEORGE WYNN'S MOTION FOR SUMMARY REVERSAL

CHRISTINE H. BLACK, pursuant to title 28, United States Code, section 1746, affirms under penalty of perjury:

1. I am an attorney with the Department of Justice and act as an Assistant United States Trustee for Region 2. I am one of the attorneys responsible for representing the United States in this appeal. I submit this affirmation in opposition to pro se Appellant George S. Wynns's motion for summary reversal. I make this affirmation based upon my personal knowledge obtained through my review of the files maintained in my office in the ordinary course of business and based upon my communication with my colleagues who litigated this case.

2. Mr. Wynns's motion should be denied. The findings of the courts below that Mr Wynns violated sections 110(b), 110(e), and 528 of title 11, and that injunctive relief was appropriate, are supported by the law and facts established at trial.

3. Mr. Wynns is a bankruptcy petition preparer, and a debt relief agency, based in California. His conduct in these professions are governed by 11 U.S.C. § 110 (governing bankruptcy petition preparers) and 11 U.S.C. § § 526-528 (governing debt relief agencies). He has a law degree, but he is not licensed to practice law. Mot. at 3. Through his web site, he agreed to help Jeffrey Giordano, a "debt consultant" in New York, prepare petitions for Mr. Giordano's clients. Mot. at 3. Two of those petitions are at issue in this case.

4. The United States Trustee for Region 2 investigated Mr. Giordano's and Mr. Wynns's conduct as bankruptcy petition preparers and debt relief agencies.[1] This led her to file a complaint with 12 causes of action against multiple parties, including Mr. Wynns. Ex. at 11-60. Six of those causes of action, including violations of sections 110(b), 110(e), and 528 of title 11, were directed against Mr. Wynns. Ex. at 46, 47, 50, 55-57. None of the other defendants elected to go to trial.

5. Mr. Wynns, represented by counsel, went to trial. The bankruptcy court found that he had violated sections 110(b), 110(e), and 528 of the Bankruptcy Code.

6. Mr. Wynns had violated section 110(b)(2) of title 11 because he did not provide his clients with the written notices required by the Code before he began work on their petitions. 11 U.S.C. § 110(b)(2). It also found that Mr. Wynns violated section 528 because he did not execute a written contract with his clients. 11 U.S.C. § 528. Adams v. Giordano (In re Clarke), 426 B.R. 443, 456 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2009).

"obligation to execute and enforce the bankruptcy laws"). Among other duties, United States Trustees are authorized to commence "proceedings in the bankruptcy courts in particular cases in which a particular action taken or proposed to be taken deviate[d] from the standards established by the . . . bankruptcy code." H.R. Rep. No. 95-989 at 88, 109 (1977) (quoted in In re A-1 Trash Pickup, 802 F.2d 774, 775 (4th Cir. 1986)). See also 11 U.S.C. § 307.

7. In addition, the bankruptcy court found that Mr. Wynns had also violated 11 U.S.C. § 110(e) by providing legal advice. In re Clarke, 426 B.R. at 456. It also found that he engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. Id. Finally, it decided that a tailored injunction under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(1) against Mr. Wynns was necessary to prevent him from violating the Bankruptcy Code in the future. Id.

8. Mr. Wynns, proceeding pro se, appealed to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York. On appeal he did not challenge the section 110(b) and section 528 convictions. Wynns v. Adams, 426 B.R. 457, 461 (E.D.N.Y. 2010). Instead Mr. Wynns disagreed only with the court's conclusions 1) that he had violated 11 U.S.C. § 110(e) by giving legal advice and engaging in unauthorized practice of law; 2) that the bankruptcy court had personal jurisdiction over him; 3) that the United States Trustee had violated his due process rights; 4) that a limited injunction was necessary; and 5) that the statutory fines were warranted. Id.

9. Mr. Wynns did not appeal the bankruptcy court findings that he violated 11 U.S.C. § 110(b)(2) and 11 U.S.C. § 528 to the district court. Id. This was significant because the two section 110(b)(2) violations independently and fully justified the $750 in fines that the bankruptcy court imposed upon him and the $4,000 in damages that it ordered him to pay the debtors. In re Clarke, 426 B.R. at 456; see also 11 U.S.C. § 110(l)(I) (allowing $500 for each violation of section 110); 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1)(B) (stating that the court "shall" order the bankruptcy petition preparer to pay each debtor $2,000 or twice the fee paid to the bankruptcy petition preparer – whichever is greater).

10. On appeal, the United States Trustee asked the district court to affirm, with one exception. It asked the court to vacate the award of $2,000 in attorney fees to the United States Trustee because section 110(i)(2) does not allow attorney fees to be paid to the United States Trustee. See Adams, 426 B.R. at 465.

11. The district court upheld the injunction, $4,000 in statutory damages and $750 in statutory fines. It also agreed with the United States Trustee and reversed the $2,000 attorney fee award the bankruptcy court had made to her. Id. at 466-67.

12. Mr. Wynns appealed to this Court. He submitted a 51-page opening brief that was received by this Court on November 15, 2010. Fed. R. App. P. 31-32. Dkt. #40. The United States Trustee's opposition brief is due March 15, 2011. Dkt. #45.

13. On January 13, 2011 this Court's Clerk's Office received a 24-page "Motion by Appellant for Summary Reversal Of Final Judgment/Order of District Court and Judgment/Order of Bankruptcy Court; Motion for Attorney's Fees, Costs and Sanctions." The motion is supported by 134 pages of exhibits, which includes a ten-page affidavit. Dkt #s 53, 56.

14. For the reasons set out below, the United States Trustee requests that this Court deny Mr. Wynns's motion for summary reversal and deny his motion for sanctions against the United States Trustee.

Discussion

15. Appellate courts can decide cases summarily. Fed. R. App. P. 2 (allowing an appellate court to suspend procedural rules to "expedite its decision or for other good cause"); Joshua v. United States, 17 F.3d 378, 380 (Fed. Cir. 1994) (collecting cases); Groendyke Transport, Inc. v. Davis, 406 F.2d 1158, 1161-62 (5th Cir. 1969) (holding an appellate court has the power to render summary dispositions). This Court also has the inherent authority to dismiss an appeal that presents "no arguably meritorious issues for . . . consideration." Pillar v. INS, 45 F.3d 14, 17 (2d Cir. 1995) (per curiam); IOP 32.1.1 (explaining use of summary orders).

16. Summary disposition is, however, "a rare exception to the completion of the appeal process." United States v. Davis, 598 F.3d 10, 13 (2d Cir. 2010); United States v. Fortner, 455 F.3d 752, 754 (7th Cir. 2006) (stating summary affirmance is only appropriate in "certain limited circumstances"). The party seeking summary disposition bears a heavy burden to demonstrate that further consideration of the case is not necessary. Taxpayers Watchdog, Inc. v. Stanley, 819 F.2d 294, 297-98 (D.C. Cir. 1987).

17. In this circuit, summary disposition is only available when a party has made arguments that are "truly 'frivolous.'" See Davis, 598 F.3d at 13; United States v. Bonilla, 618 F.3d 102, 108 (2d Cir. 2010). An appeal is frivolous if "the position of one party is so clearly correct as a matter of law that no substantial question regarding the outcome of the appeal exists." Joshua, 17 F.3d at 380; Fortner, 455 F.3d at 754 (allowing summary affirmance when the arguments in the opening brief are "incomprehensible or completely insubstantial").

18. Furthermore, summary reversal, as requested here, is almost never warranted. Cf. Sills v. Bureau of Prisons, 761 F.2d 792, 793-94 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (granting summary reversal of the district court's sua sponte dismissal of an inmate's constitutional claim without explanation or waiting for a response from the government). It is appropriate only where the merits are "so clear, plenary briefing, oral argument, and the traditional collegiality of the decisional process would not affect [the Court's] decision." Id.

19. Mr. Wynns's motion for summary reversal should be denied for three reasons.

20. First, Mr. Wynns has already filed his opening brief. Dkt. #40. He has chosen to litigate a full appeal. He should not now be permitted to open a second line of attack by filing a motion for summary reversal to refine and expand his opening brief. Fortner, 455 F.3d at 754 (reprimanding the appellee for filing a motion for summary disposition while reserving the right to file a full merits brief should the motion be denied).

21. Mr. Wynns's motion is largely a re-hash of the arguments in his opening brief. Compare Opening Br. Table of Contents, Dkt. #40, at 1-2 with Motion for Summary Reversal, Dkt. #53, at i-ii. Both argue that 1) the bankruptcy court did not have subject matter jurisdiction; 2) the United States Trustee did not prove that an injunction was necessary; 3) jurisdiction cannot be waived; 4) because the United States Trustee did not prove the injunction was necessary, she had not established the existence of a case or controversy. Id.

22. Submitting a revised brief under the guise of a Motion for Summary Reversal violates the procedural rules of this Court. It is an end-run around this Court's order that Mr. Wynns submit his opening brief by November 15, 2010. Dkt. #32.

23. This motion also abuses the purpose of summary disposition, which is to streamline court procedures. Groendyke Transport,, 406 F.2d at 1161-62. Instead, Mr. Wynns is duplicating the work of this Court by seeking both consideration of his brief and motion for summary reversal. Fortner, 455 F.3d at 754.[2]

24. Mr. Wynns has a legal education. There is no reason for this Court to condone Mr. Wynns's gamesmanship in filing this motion to reargue the positions in his opening brief. He should not be allowed to "compel [this Court] to sacrifice either the rights of other waiting suitors [litigants], its own irreplaceable judge time, or administrative efficiency" by considering his arguments multiple times. Groendyke Transport, 406 F.2d at 1162.

[2] To the extent that Mr. Wynns raises new arguments in his Motion for Summary Affirmance, they are waived for the purposes of deciding the merits of this case. The United States Trustee will respond to the arguments made in Mr. Wynns opening brief in her opposition brief, which is due to be filed March 15, 2011.

25. Second, none of the arguments that the United States Trustee has made are "frivolous." The United States Trustee prevailed in the bankruptcy court, and the statutory fines and the injunction were affirmed by the district court. Logically, a winning argument cannot be frivolous. Cf. Matthew Bender & Co., Inc. v. West Pub. Co., 240 F.3d 116, 122-23 (2d Cir. 2001) (holding that a losing argument that prevailed in another court and which several judges supported in dissent cannot be frivolous).

26. Furthermore, the legal arguments Mr. Wynns advocates in this motion are not "so clearly correct that no substantial question regarding the outcome of the appeal can exist." Joshua, 17 F.3d at 380. Far from it. They are simply wrong.

27. First, the Bankruptcy Code authorizes bankruptcy courts to "enjoin a bankruptcy petition preparer from engaging in any conduct in violation of this section" if that bankruptcy petition preparer has "engaged in conduct in violation of this section or of any provision of this title." 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(1)-(2)(i)(I). In this case, Mr. Wynns was a bankruptcy petition preparer who violated section 110(b) and 110(e). The United States Trustee requested injunctive relief. 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(1). Those undisputed facts provided sufficient grounds for the bankruptcy court to issue its tailored injunction. Indeed, by not appealing the section 110(b) and section 528 violations, Mr. Wynns implicitly concedes that he engaged in the misconduct the bankruptcy court found he had committed.

28. Mr. Wynns's jurisdictional argument is also incorrect. Bankruptcy courts have jurisdiction over "all cases under title 11, and all core proceedings arising under title 11." 11 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1). A proceeding under section 110(j) is a "core proceeding to be heard and determined by a bankruptcy judge under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1)." Demos v. Brown (In re Graves), 279 B.R. 266, 271 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2002). The same is true for a section 528 violation because it involves misconduct by Mr. Wynns in the bankruptcy case.

29. Furthermore, Mr. Wynns is also wrong that the United States Trustee did not have standing to bring the case against him. Mot. at 4, 8. The United States Trustee "may raise any issue and be heard in any case or proceeding under title 11." 11 U.S.C. § 307. This grant of authority makes it "difficult to conceive of a statute that more clearly signifies Congress's intent to confer standing." In re Columbia Gas Sys., 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994). Congress gave the United States Trustees such broad standing because they are "responsible for 'protecting the public interest and ensuring that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law.'" Adams v. Zarnel (In re Zarnel), 619 F.3d 156, 162 (2d Cir. 2010) (quoting In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d 498, 499 (6th Cir. 1990)). Section 110(j) injunction actions fall within the purview of the United States Trustee's standing. In re Graves, 279 B.R. at 272.

30. Were there any doubt, the text of section 110 would dispel it because it explicitly authorizes United States Trustees to file proceedings against bankruptcy petition preparers like Mr. Wynns. See e.g., 11 U.S.C. § 110(h)(4) (authorizing United States Trustees to file motions against bankruptcy petition preparers for overcharging); 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1) (authorizing United States Trustees to seek damages for any violation of section 110).

31. At the very least, the language of the statute and case law demonstrate that Mr. Wynns is not "clearly correct." Therefore, his motion should be denied.

Sanctions

32. Mr. Wynns seeks sanctions against the United States because he believes that Justice Department attorneys engaged in misconduct in the conduct of their civil prosecution before the bankruptcy court. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011; 28 U.S.C. § 1927. He asks this Court to award sanctions. This Court should deny Mr. Wynns's motion because "[e]xcessively zealous claims that adversary counsel should be sanctioned will not be accorded a friendly reception by this Court." Davis, 598 F.3d at 14 (citation omitted).

33. This motion for sanctions should be denied for six reasons.

34. First, Mr. Wynns seeks to sanction the United States for winning its case. The bankruptcy court ruled Mr. Wynns violated sections 110 and 528 of title 11. Mr. Wynns did not even appeal some of those violations. So he cannot now seek to obtain Rule 9011 sanctions when the government's pleadings were appropriately filed.

35. Second, Mr. Wynns now openly asks this Court to impose Rule 9011 sanctions.[3] This is impossible. See Positive Software

[3] In his opening brief, Mr. Wynns states that he "only recently became aware of the protections that Rule 9011(b) is supposed to provide." Br. at 41. His argument that the United States violated Rule 9011 is supposed to "illustrate" that the suit against him was "unreasonable." Id. He stops short of requesting sanctions, however, but he notes that this Court could award him fees if it were to issue an Order to Show Cause on its own initiative. Id. (citing Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c)(1)(b)).

Solutions, Inc. v. New Century Mortgage Corp., 619 F.3d 458, 461 (5th Cir. 2010) (holding that the district court could not sanction actions that neither occurred before it nor violated its orders). Complaints of misconduct must be brought before the court where the alleged inappropriate actions took place. See Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 44 (1991) (stating that courts may sanction behavior to control the litigation before it). Here that is the bankruptcy court where this case was tried.

36. Third, Mr. Wynns has waived his chance to allege misconduct because he has not followed the Rule 9011 procedures which required him to give the United States Trustee an opportunity to rectify the allegedly offending action by withdrawing the complaint. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c)(1)(A) (requiring a party to serve a Rule 9011 motion 21 days before filing it to give the other party time to withdraw or amend it). Mr. Wynns never complied with this requirement. Because the provision requiring a party to notify its opponent about its intention to file Rule 9011 sanctions is mandatory, Mr. Wynns's motion cannot be considered. See Elliott v. Tilton, 64 F.3d 213, 216 (5th Cir. 1995) (reversing Rule 9011 sanctions because the movant had not complied with the safe harbor provision).

37. Fourth, Mr. Wynns was represented by counsel at trial, who certainly would have taken steps to protect his client's interests, had there been any indication that the United States Trustee was acting improperly.

38. Fifth, Rule 9011 required that Mr. Wynns's motion "be made separately from other matters or requests." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c)(1)(A). This motion was commingled with his request for summary reversal and his request for section 1927 sanctions. Therefore, it is procedurally improper.

39. Finally, this Court cannot impose sanctions under its own procedures because Mr. Wynns has not alleged any misconduct before this Court. Fed. R. App. P. 46(c); Local Rule 46.2.

40. Mr. Wynns's request for sanctions under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 should also be denied. Unlike the Rule 9011 sanctions, however, Mr. Wynns at least mentioned sanctions under section 1927 in the district court, which found the claim to be "frivolous." Adams, 426 B.R. at 466. He has renewed his request in his opening brief to this Court. Br. at 49-50.

41. Mr. Wynns's request for section 1927 sanctions should be denied for three reasons.

42. First, Mr. Wynns did not raise the issue properly in the bankruptcy court, although he claims that he "requested attorneys' fees before the bankruptcy court." Br. at 50. Under the Bankruptcy Rules, requests for relief not governed by Rule 7001 (specifying matters that must be brought by complaint), are instituted by the filing of motion, which creates a contested matter. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9013 (governing motions) and 9014 (defining contested matters). Mr. Wynns never filed such a motion in the bankruptcy case. Cf. Capone v. Weeks, 326 Fed. App'x 46, 47 (2d Cir. 2009).

43. Nor did Mr. Wynns comply with the notice requirements necessary for seeking section 1927 sanctions. Gollomp v. Spitzer, 568 F.3d 355, 368 (2d Cir. 2009) (citation omitted). Because he did not properly seek section 1927 sanctions in the bankruptcy court, he has waived the opportunity to do so now.

44. Second, Mr. Wynns raises the section 1927 issue in his merits brief. Br. at 49-50. To the extent that this Court should consider his argument at all, it should do so in the context of the appeal itself. Mr. Wynns cannot use this motion for summary reversal to have an issue considered twice. Fortner, 455 F.3d at 754.

45. Third, as the district court noted, his claim is "frivolous." Adams, 426 B.R. at 466. In this circuit, section 1927 sanctions are awarded "when the attorney's actions are so completely without merit as to require the conclusion that they must have been undertaken for some improper purpose," and upon "a finding of conduct constituting or akin to bad faith." Gollomp, 568 F.3d at 368 (citation omitted); Oliveri v. Thompson, 803 F.2d 1265, 1273 (2d Cir. 1986).

46. The bankruptcy court found that Mr. Wynns violated sections 110(b), 110(e), and 528 of the Bankruptcy Code. In re Clarke, 426 B.R. at 456. Mr. Wynns did not even appeal the decision that he had violated section 110(b) and 528. Adams, 426 B.R. at 461. Therefore, he tacitly concedes that at least two of the United States Trustee's allegations were meritorious, foreclosing any grounds for sanctions under 28 U.S.C. § 1927.

Conclusion

47. The United States Trustee respectfully requests that:

1. This Court deny Mr. Wynns's Motion for Summary Reversal;
2. This Court deny Mr. Wynns's Motion for Sanctions;
3. This Court grant any other relief that it finds to be proper and just.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This appeal arises from a complaint filed against several bankruptcy petition preparers and debt relief agencies,[1] including Appellant George Wynns, for violating provisions of title 11 that regulate their practice. The United States Trustee[2] sought fines, statutory damages, and injunctive relief under sections 110 and 526 of the Bankruptcy Code. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over that complaint under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334, 157(b)(1), and (b)(2)(A).

[2] United States Trustees are officials of the Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589; In re Columbia Gas Sys., Inc., 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994) (explaining that United States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, 109 (1977)). "The United States Trustee is the 'watchdog' of the bankruptcy system, charged with preventing fraud and abuse and with 'fill[ing] the vacuum' caused by possible creditor inactivity." In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002) (alteration in original) (citations omitted). Section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes the United States Trustee to appear and be heard in this case. 11 U.S.C. § 307; In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) (stating that the United States Trustee may "intervene and appear at any level of the proceedings from the bankruptcy court on, 11 U.S.C. § 307, as either a party or an amicus") (quoting Bernard v. Coyne, 31 F.3d 842, 844 (9th Cir. 1994)).

After the United States Trustee and the other defendants settled, Mr Wynns exercised his right to proceed to trial. After trial, the bankruptcy court entered a final order against him on June 15, 2009, granting the United States Trustee's request for relief under 11 U.S.C. § 110 but exercising its discretion not to impose additional relief under 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(2). See e.g., In re Rodriguez, No. SA-06-CA-323-XR, 2007 WL 593582, at *3 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 20, 2007) (order finding violation of section 110 is final). Mr. Wynns timely appealed the order to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, which affirmed the judgment in part and reversed in part on March 30, 2010. 28 U.S.C. 158(a); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002. Mr. Wynns then timely appealed to this Court on May 24, 2010. Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(A). This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. §158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Did the bankruptcy court exceed its jurisdiction or abuse its discretion when it 1) ordered Mr. Wynns, a bankruptcy petition preparer, to pay fines and damages because he had violated 11 U.S.C. § 110; 2) issued a limited statutory injunction under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j); and 3) denied Mr. Wynns's request for attorneys fees and costs under 28 U.S.C. 1927?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews a district court's order in a bankruptcy appeal in plenary fashion, meaning that this Court undertakes an independent examination of the factual findings and legal conclusions of the bankruptcy court. In re Taylor, 243 F.3d 124, 128 (2d Cir. 2001). The bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error and its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. See In re Lehal Realty Assocs., 101 F.3d 272, 276 (2d Cir. 1996). This Court reviews a bankruptcy court's exercise of discretion for abuse. Id.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Statutory Framework

1. Purpose of 11 U.S.C. § 110.

In the Bankruptcy Reform Act in 1994,[3] Congress enacted section 110 to combat the "growing problem of bankruptcy preparers who abuse the system in the course of preparing documents for debtors to file in bankruptcy court." 140 Cong. Rec. S4504, S4506 (daily ed. Apr. 20, 1994) (statement of Senator Metzenbaum). Congress decided to regulate petition preparers, who "are not employed or supervised by any attorney," because "far too many of them also attempt to provide legal advice and legal services to debtors." H.R. Rep. No. 103-835, 56 (1994), reprinted in 1994 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3340, 3365. Congress determined that most of the "petition mills" were located in poor and minority communities, allowing preparers to "prey on the poor and unsophisticated." 140 Cong. Rec. S14597, S14597 (daily ed. Oct. 7, 1994) (statement of Senator Metzenbaum).

Section 110 defines a bankruptcy petition preparer as any "person, other than an attorney or an employee of an attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing" in a bankruptcy case. 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(1). A "document for filing" is a "petition or any other document prepared for filing by a debtor" in a bankruptcy or district court related to a bankruptcy case." 11 U.S.C. § 110(a)(2).

Congress expanded section 110 in 2005 as part of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005[4] because many bankruptcy petition preparers were continuing to give debtors legal advice. Cf. Milavetz, Gallop & Milavetz, P.A. v. United States, 130 S. Ct. 1324, 1329-30 (2010) (stating one purpose of BAPCPA was to regulate "professionals who provide bankruptcy assistance to consumer debtors"). The amendments added new disclosure requirements to make clear to debtors that bankruptcy petitioner preparers may provide very limited services.

2. Statutory provisions at issue in Mr. Wynns's case.

The United States Trustee's civil action against Mr. Wynns was grounded on two bankruptcy petition preparer provisions.

First, section 110(b)(2) requires a bankruptcy petition preparer to inform a debtor in writing that he is not an attorney and may not give legal advice "before preparing any document for filing or accepting any fees." 11 U.S.C. § 110(b)(2)(A)-(B). Both the bankruptcy petition preparer and debtor must sign this notice, which is filed with the bankruptcy court. 11 U.S.C. § 110(b)(2)(B)(iii).

Second, section 110(e)(2)(A), a 2005 provision, provides that bankruptcy petition preparers "may not offer a potential bankruptcy debtor any legal advice." A non-exclusive list of what constitutes "legal advice" follows, including a prohibition against advising the debtor about "bankruptcy procedures or rights." 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2)(B)(vii).

If a bankruptcy petition preparer violates any of section 110's requirements, or commits any "fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive act," after notice and hearing, the court "shall" order the preparer to pay to the debtor 1) actual damages; 2) the greater of $2,000 or twice the amount the debtor paid for the preparer's services; and 3) reasonable attorney fees. 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1)(A)-(C). Furthermore, the preparer can be fined up to $500 for each violation. 11 U.S.C. § 110(l)(1).

Section 110(k) is a savings clause that prevents section 110 from being construed to allow activities "that are otherwise prohibited by law, including rules and laws that prohibit the unauthorized practice of law." 11 U.S.C. § 110(k). The scope of "unauthorized practice of law" is determined by the state law where the bankruptcy court is sitting. In re McDonald, 318 B.R. 37 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2004); 2 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 110.12 (15th ed. 1997).

The United States Trustee's civil action against Mr. Wynns was also grounded on two debt relief agency provisions. A debt relief agency means "any person who provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person" for compensation or "who is a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A).

First, one of the requirements of section 528 is that the debt relief agency execute a written contract with the assisted person within five business days of commencing services, but before the petition is filed. 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(1). The contract must "clearly and conspicuously" describe the services that the debt relief agency will perform and the fees that will be charged. 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(1)(A)-(B). The assisted person must receive a copy of the executed contract. 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(2).

Second, if a debt relief agency violates section 528(a), the contract with the assisted person "shall be void." 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(1). Liability "shall" consist of fees collected from the assisted person, actual damages, and reasonable attorney fees and costs. Id. In addition to state law remedies, the "chief law enforcement officer of a state" may seek injunctive relief and, if successful, be awarded costs and reasonable attorney fees. 11 U.S.C. §§ 526(c)(3); see also 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(5) (describing circumstances under which the bankruptcy court, United States Trustee, or the debtor may also seek an injunction).

Section 110 also authorizes injunctive relief against petition preparers. A limited injunction enjoining specific actions may be issued if the preparer has violated section 110 or "engaged in any other fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive conduct" and if such "relief is appropriate to prevent the recurrence of such conduct." 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(1)-(2)(A). Second, a court "may enjoin [a] person from acting as a bankruptcy petition preparer" completely if a more tailored injunction "would not be sufficient to prevent" the bankruptcy petition preparer from interfering with "the proper administration of" the bankruptcy code. 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(2)(B).

II. Facts

1. Mr. Wynns's work as a bankruptcy petition preparer.

Mr. Wynns is a bankruptcy petition preparer based in California who solicits business through his website.[5] A. at 96-97, 102-03, 113 (admission by counsel). He markets his services primarily to attorneys but also prepares petitions for individuals. A. at 96, 100. He is a law school graduate, although he is not admitted to the bar because he has not submitted the application for moral character qualification. A. at 96. He has a paralegal certification from the National Association of Legal Assistants and a certificate in legal assisting from City College in San Francisco. Id.

In 2008, Jeffery Giordano, a non-attorney, who then operated a "debt consultancy business" in New York, contacted Mr. Wynns by phone after seeing Mr. Wynns's website to ask him to prepare bankruptcy petitions for some of Mr. Giordano's clients. A. at 96, 100. Mr. Wynns knew that Giordano was not an attorney. A. at 96. He nevertheless agreed to take on Mr. Giordano's business at the rate of $150 per petition. A. at 97, 100. The two did not have a written agreement. Id.

Mr. Giordano sent Mr. Wynns information via e-mail about Charles and Donalee Clarke and George and Theodora Najdek ("Clients"), the debtors in this case. A. at 100. Mr. Wynns accordingly prepared bankruptcy petitions and schedules for them. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 1 (petition) and Form 6 (schedules); A. at 100, 111. In both cases, Mr. Wynns sent the completed petition to Mr. Giordano electronically. A. at 100, 107-08. Mr. Wynns also testified that he sent Mr. Giordano the necessary disclosure forms and that he expected that Mr. Giordano would share them with the clients. A. at 97, 99, 102.

2. The Clarkes' deficient petition.

When Mr. Clarke filed the bankruptcy petition on behalf of himself and his wife, the clerk informed him that it was deficient because it was missing several disclosure documents. A. at 82. Mr. Clarke immediately contacted Mr. Giordano, who in turn informed Mr. Wynns. A. at 82, 98, 106. Approximately one week later, Mr. Wynns sent the Clarkes an instruction letter and four missing documents. A. at 88, 97. He apologized to the Clarkes, explaining that “I had instructed my computer to include these four forms but for some reason it didn’t pay attention to me, and I did not notice the omission.” A. at 151; A. at 82, 102.

First, Mr. Wynns provided a disclosure stating that a bankruptcy petition preparer may not provide legal advice. A. at 83, 102. Mr. Wynns admitted at trial that he knew that a bankruptcy petition preparer should provide this document before “before preparing any document for filing.”[6] A. at 99. He also admitted that he did not send this disclosure to the Clarkes until he tried to fix their deficient filing. A. at 100. He never sent the information to the Najdeks. A. at 110.

Second, Mr. Wynns provided the two disclosures that explained 1) the responsibilities debtors have under the Bankruptcy Code and 2) a debtor’s right to a written contract with the bankruptcy petition preparer.[7] Mr. Wynns explained "these [documents] are just for you to keep. You do not have to send them to the court." A. at 83.

Third, Mr. Wynns included the disclosure of his compensation for preparing their petition.[8] A. at 84-85, 103. He explained that the Clarkes did not have to sign it, but he asked them to file it with the court when they resubmitted the other documents. A. at 83, 102-03.

Finally, Mr. Wynns included his certification of compliance with the Bankruptcy Code requirements for petition preparers and the notice that bankruptcy petition preparers were required to provide to debtors about the scope of their services.[9] A. at 102. Mr. Wynns instructed the Clarkes to sign and date the second page of each form. A. at 83.

In his letter to the Clarkes, Mr. Wynns made three additional statements. He advised the Clarkes to 1) furnish their pay stubs from the last 60 days to the chapter 7 trustee; 2) furnish the chapter 7 trustee with a copy of their most recent tax return promptly; and 3) get their financial management certificate filed no later than 45 days after the creditors meeting. A. at 151. He also wrote that "fortunately the court has allowed us 15 days" to file the missing documents. Id. Mr. Wynns also provided a cover letter to the Clerk of the Court for Mr. Clarke to include with the documents. Id.

Mr. Clarke testified that without Mr. Wynns's letter and directions, he would not have known what to do with the documents and how to correct the deficient filing:

> Q: So without this letter you wouldn't have known what to do?
> A: Without this letter I would have just taken the paperwork he gave me everything down to the courthouse. That's correct. A. at 88.

Mr. Wynns also sent a second letter directly to the Clerk of the Court on May 1, stating that he "acted as bankruptcy petition preparer for the Clarkes who filed their Chapter 7 case on April 4, 2008." A. at 157-58. He represented to the bankruptcy clerk that the Clarkes had filed the missing forms when they filed their pay advices "around May 8 [sic]." A. at 157. However, "for some unknown reason" the required declarations were “not showing up on the electronic filing system [PACER].” A. at 82, 151.

3. The United States Trustee’s complaint.

On July 1, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a complaint under various sections of title 11 against Mr Giordano and several other defendants, including Mr. Wynns. A. at 9-57. The parts of the complaint relevant to Mr. Wynns alleged that he prepared the Clarkes’ and Najdeks’ bankruptcy petitions without timely disclosing his status as a non-attorney bankruptcy petition preparer, violating section 110(b)(2). A. at 43. It also alleged provided legal advice, in violation of section 110(e)(2), and engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. A. at 46-47. It alleged that he was liable under § 526(c)(2)(A) for not executing a written contract with his Clients, as required by section 528(a). A. at 47-48. It also alleged because he practiced law without a license, his actions were “fraudulent, deceptive, illegal and contrary to public policy.” A. at 51.

The complaint sought monetary relief against Mr. Wynns under section 110(i). A. at 53. It sought a statutory injunction against him under section110(j). A. at 44.

On August 26, 2008, Mr. Wynns, who was represented by counsel at the time, filed a one-page answer to the complaint, asserting he did not act as a bankruptcy petition preparer because he only prepared a draft of the petition. A. at 59. This was followed by an amended answer five months later. A. at 61-76. In these pleadings, Mr. Wynns denied that he had violated section 110, but he did not assert any objection to personal jurisdiction. He first raised the personal jurisdiction issue in a motion for summary judgment filed on January 30, 2009. Adams v. Giordano, No. 08-8133 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y., filed Jan. 30, 2009), Dkt. #16, p. 4.

All the other defendants settled with the United States Trustee. Mr Wynns refused to agree to any sanction, arguing that his role was too small to justify any penalty. A. at 78.

4. The bankruptcy court decision.

On May 31, 2009, Judge Robert E. Grossman issued his decision (revised to correct footnotes on June 15, 2009). A. at 5A-6. The bankruptcy court found that Mr. Wynns did not provide the required disclosures as required by section 110(b) and the written contract required under section 528. Adams v. Giordano (In re Clarke), 426 B.R. 443, 452 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2009).[10] Furthermore, it found that "he engaged in the unauthorized practice of law." Id. at 454. Specifically, it found that Mr. Wynns improperly "exercised his judgment as to how best [to] simplify the legal process for [the] Clarke[s]." Id. at 453.

The bankruptcy found that the letter Mr. Wynns sent Mr. Clarke "went beyond listing the [missing] documents and attaching them." Id. at 453-54. Instead, Mr. Wynns advised Mr. Clarke how to rectify the problem of the missing documents and also told Mr. Clarke "he must file additional documents such as pay stubs, certificates, and tax returns, information which was not in the Notice of Deficient Filing."

[10] The bankruptcy court's decision is included in the United States Trustee's appendix at pages 117 to 136.

Id. at 454. The court found this advice constituted the improper practice of law under New York state law. Id.

The bankruptcy court imposed three kinds of sanctions against Mr. Wynns. First, the bankruptcy court fined him $750 for his failure to comply with the disclosure requirements in the Clarke and Najdek cases and for engaging in the unauthorized practice of law in the Clarkes' case. Id. at 456 (relying on 11 U.S.C. § 110(l)(1).

Second, it ordered him to pay damages to the Clarkes and the Najdeks of $2,000 each under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1). Id. In addition, the bankruptcy court ordered Mr. Wynns to pay a total of $2,000 in attorney fees and damages to the United States Trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(2). Id.

Finally, the bankruptcy court entered a limited statutory injunction under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(2)(A), which authorizes bankruptcy courts to enter injunctions to prevent bankruptcy petition preparers from repeating the sanctioned behavior. Id. at 455-56.

The bankruptcy court also found that Mr. Wynns violated the debt relief agency provisions of the Bankruptcy Code because he did not enter into a written contract with his client, something those statutes require. Id. at 456; 11 U.S.C. § 528 (requiring debt relief agencies to give their clients written contracts); 526(c)(2) (mandating that contracts that do not comply with section 528 "shall be void"). Despite this liability finding, the bankruptcy court did "not believe that additional relief should be granted" and exercised its discretion not to sanction Mr. Wynns for violating the debt relief agency provisions. Id.

Mr. Wynns filed a timely notice of appeal on June 11, 2009, appealing the bankruptcy court's decision that he had engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, thus violating section 110(e)(2). A. at 192-197. He also appealed the bankruptcy court's rejection of his claims that it did not have personal jurisdiction over him and that the United States Trustee had violated his due process rights. He also appealed the bankruptcy court's grant of limited injunctive relief. He did not, however, appeal or argue on appeal to the district court, that the part of the bankruptcy court's order entering judgment for violation of section 110(b) was wrongfully decided. A. at 198-210 (statement of issues on appeal and amended statement of issues).

Because the bankruptcy court did not award any relief for his violation of sections 526 and 528 requiring a debt relief agency to execute a written contract with the debtor, he did not include that issue on appeal. Id. The United States Trustee did not appeal or cross-appeal from the bankruptcy court's exercise of discretion under sections 526 and 528.

5. The district court decision.

Judge Joanna Seybert affirmed in part and reversed in part. Wynns v. Adams, 426 B.R. 457 (E.D.N.Y. 2010).[11] The district court's order affirmed all the relief that the bankruptcy court had imposed upon Mr. Wynns, except that part of the order directing Mr. Wynns pay $2,000 to the United States Trustee. A. at 137. On appeal, the United States Trustee asked that this aspect of the order be reversed because she was not eligible for costs or attorneys' fees under 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(2) or (j)(4). The district court did that. Id.

The district court did affirm the bankruptcy court's determination that Mr. Wynns had violated section 110(e) by giving the Clarkes legal advice. Id. at 465. The district court also agreed that the bankruptcy court had personal jurisdiction over Mr. Wynns, id. at 461, and that the United States Trustee had not violated his due process rights or acted improperly by prosecuting the case. Id. at 462-63.

The district court nevertheless decided that the bankruptcy court "erred" in equating the prohibition in section 110(e)(2)(A) against bankruptcy petition preparers giving "any legal advice" with a prohibition against the "practice of law." Wynns, 426 B.R. at 462. According to the district court, legal advice is only one aspect of the practice of law. Id. Therefore, Mr. Wynns could only violate section 110(e)(2)(A) by giving legal advice – not by any other activity that would fall under the broader rubric of "unauthorized practice of law." Id. at 463. Accordingly, the district court decided that two of Mr. Wynn's actions – preparing petitions and writing the bankruptcy court clerk – did not fall under the prohibition of providing "legal advice." Id. at 465.

But the district court concluded, however, that Mr. Wynns had provided legal advice when he advised the Clarkes to send copies of their tax returns to the chapter 7 trustee "promptly." Id. at 464.

Accordingly, the district court "affirmed the bankruptcy court's finding that Mr. Wynns violated § 110(e)(2)(A) but on more limited factual and legal grounds than the bankruptcy court held." Id. at 465.

The district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's issuance of a statutory injunctive relief under section 110(j)(2)(A)(ii). Id. at 465. It also affirmed the bankruptcy court's imposition of fines and statutory damages under sections 110(l)(1) and 110(i)(1). Id. at 465-56. Finally, it affirmed the bankruptcy court's rejection of Mr. Wynns's claim for attorney's fees under 28 U.S.C. § 1927. Id. at 466.

Mr. Wynns, proceeding pro se, filed a timely appeal to this Court. After he filed his opening brief, Mr. Wynns also filed a motion for summary reversal, which the United States Trustee opposed. No. 10-2138, Dkt. #s 53, 60, 61.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Mr. Wynns has not demonstrated any basis to disturb the judgment below. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that he did not provide the required disclosures to his Clients, thus violating 11 U.S.C. § 110(b). It also did not clearly err in finding that he provided legal advice to the Clarkes, thus violating section 110(e). During the appellate process, Mr. Wynns has abandoned all of his challenges to the bankruptcy court's findings that he violated the Bankruptcy Code. With the exception of the bankruptcy court's imposition of a statutory injunctive relief under section 110(j)(2)(A)(ii), there is no issue left from the bankruptcy court's order for this Court to review.

The bankruptcy court did not err in awarding statutory damages and fines against Mr. Wynns. Section 110(i) states that a bankruptcy court "shall" impose statutory damages of $2,000, payable to the debtor, if a bankruptcy petition preparer "violates this section." It is no longer disputed that Mr. Wynns violated two sections of 110 – more than once. The bankruptcy court was obligated under the statute to assess damages of $2,000 for both the Clarkes and Najdeks against Mr. Wynns. The court did exercise its discretion, as it was entitled to do, by only assessing half of the fines allowed under section 110(l)(1).

Finally, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in imposing a limited statutory injunction against Mr. Wynns, prohibiting him from future violations of section 110. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in balancing Mr. Wynns's violations of the Bankruptcy Code with his limited involvement with Mr. Giordano and indication of "some remorse" to determine that a limited injunction was appropriate.

Mr. Wynns rests his appeal on three arguments unrelated to the merits of the bankruptcy case: the bankruptcy court had no subject matter or personal jurisdiction and his due process rights were violated. These arguments are without merit.

First, the bankruptcy court had subject matter jurisdiction over the United States Trustee's civil action under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a). A request for an injunction under section 110 is a core proceeding and bankruptcy judges may "hear and determine all [core] cases. 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b)(1); 157(b)(2)(A), (O). There is no credible argument that the bankruptcy court lacked jurisdiction over the United States Trustee's civil action.

Mr. Wynns confuses the elements of proof needed to obtain an injunction – which he asserts the United States Trustee did not show – with the bankruptcy court's subject-matter jurisdiction over any request to enjoin a bankruptcy petition preparer under section 110(j). The Supreme Court has disapproved decisions that conflate jurisdiction with failure to state a claim as "drive-by jurisdictional rulings" that should not be given any precedential value.[12] As the Supreme Court has rejected the blurring of the line between jurisdiction and the elements of a cause of action, this Court should do likewise.

Furthermore, Mr. Wynns's assertion that there is no "case or controversy" between him and the United States Trustee makes no sense. The United States Trustee made a colorable claim nearly three years ago that Mr. Wynns violated the Bankruptcy Code, and thus an injunction was necessary to prevent further misdeeds. The parties have been litigating the issue ever since.

Second, the bankruptcy court did not err in exercising personal jurisdiction over Mr. Wynns. He established minimum contacts with New York by conducting business with Mr. Giordano, corresponding with the Clarkes, and contacting the clerk of the bankruptcy court.

[12] Arbaugh v. Y&H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 512 (2006).

Even if that were insufficient to establish personal jurisdiction, Mr. Wynns waived the argument by not bringing it up until after he had filed his answer and amended answer.

Third, the United States Trustee's decision to file a civil action against Mr. Wynns did not violate his due process rights. Mr. Wynns has tacitly conceded that he violated the Code. He did not appeal the bankruptcy court's order imposing liability under section 110(b) to the district court. He has also abandoned before this Court his challenge to the bankruptcy court's finding that he gave legal advice under section 110(e). Mr. Wynns does not explain how a successful civil action with no evidence of misconduct by the United States Trustee could violate his due process rights. Mr. Wynns may not like the result, but the United States Trustee acted properly in her capacity as the "watchdog" of the bankruptcy system.

Finally, Mr. Wynns's claims for sanctions are frivolous. He implicitly acknowledges that his request that this Court impose sanctions on the United States Trustee under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy 9011 is untimely. See Br. at 41. Furthermore, this Court has its own rules for imposing attorney discipline and cannot apply the rules of the bankruptcy court de novo.

Mr. Wynns presents no evidence that the United States Trustee conducted her case against him improperly or in bad faith. He simply complains that she did not consult with him before including him in her complaint. Br. at 39-40. The district court did not abuse its discretion when it rejected his request for attorneys fees and costs under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 as "frivolous."

ARGUMENT

I. Mr. Wynns Has Abandoned Any Challenge to the Bankruptcy Court's Findings that He Gave Legal Advice and that He Failed to Provide the Mandatory Disclosures, so that this Court Must Affirm the Monetary Relief Imposed by the Bankruptcy Court under 11 U.S.C. §§ 110(l)(1) and 110(i).

Mr. Wynns has either not appealed, or neglected to challenge, the bankruptcy court's finding that he violated sections 110(b) and (e) of title 11. If an appellant does not appeal an issue, it is not before the appellate court. Hermann v. Moore, 576 F.2d 453, 455 (2d Cir. 1978). If an appellant does not press an issue on appeal, it is abandoned. See Norton v. Mathews, 427 U.S. 524, 531, n.8 (1976) (noting statutory claim was preserved in statement of issues but not briefed and therefore abandoned); City of New York v. Minetta, 262 F.3d 169, 180-81 (2d Cir. 2001) (citing cases including one holding that "argument not mentioned in the brief [is] waived"). Here, Mr. Wynns has abandoned his claim that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in ordering him to pay fines and damages.

The bankruptcy court based its decision that Mr. Wynns should pay fines and damages on two factual findings. First, Mr. Wynns did not notify his clients that he was not an attorney and could only provide typing services. 11 U.S.C. § 110(b)(2); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9009; Frankfort Digital Servs., Ltd. v. Kistler (in re Reynoso), 477 F.3d 1117, 1125 (9th Cir. 2006). Second, Mr. Wynns improperly gave his clients Mr. and Mrs. Clarke legal advice. 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2).

Mr. Wynns has not asserted that the bankruptcy court clearly erred in making these findings. In fact, he did not even appeal to the district court the bankruptcy court's judgment that he failed to provide mandatory disclosures to his clients under section 110(b). A. at 198-210; Wynns, 426 B.R. at 461; 11 U.S.C. § 110(b)(2). By not appealing that issue, Mr. Wynns is precluded from raising it now. Moore, 576 F.2d at 455. Nor does he attempt to do so.

The district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's finding that Mr. Wynns provided legal advice, thus violating section 110(e). Mr. Wynns's notice of appeal is not entirely clear, but he appealed to this Court all aspects of the district court decision "which affirmed portions of the Final Order of the bankruptcy court entered on or about June 15, 2009." A. at 1-2. Therefore, he did appeal the part of the bankruptcy court's order finding he gave improper legal advice to the Clarkes. Wynns, 426 B.R. at 465; 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2);

In his opening brief, however, Mr. Wynns did not raise the section 110(e) issue.[13] He does not cite section 110(e) in his brief. See Br. at 5 (list of statutes in Table of Authorities). Therefore, Mr. Wynns has abandoned the issue of whether he gave legal advice. See LoSacco v. City of Middletown, 71 F.3d 88, 92-93 (2d Cir.1995) (holding that when a litigant, even if proceeding pro se, raises an issue before the trial court but does not raise it on appeal, it is abandoned). Furthermore, arguments may not be raised for the first time in a reply brief even if the issue has been raised below. Knipe v. Skinner, 999 F.2d 708, 710-11 (2d Cir. 1993).

Mr. Wynns has abandoned any argument that the bankruptcy court committed clear error in finding he failed to provide the Najdeks and Clarkes with required disclosure forms. 11 U.S.C. § 110(b). He has [13] There is some dispute as to whether Mr. Wynns engaged in the unauthorized practice of law, which is addressed in section V of this brief. However, the district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's finding that Mr. Wynns gave the Clarkes legal advice, thus violating 11 U.S.C. § 110(e), when he advised them to submit their tax returns to the trustee. Wynns, 426 B.R. at 465.

abandoned any argument that the bankruptcy court committed clear error in finding he provided the Clarkes with improper legal advice. 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2)(B)(vii) (prohibiting advice on bankruptcy procedures).

The bankruptcy court imposed monetary relief on Mr. Wynns because he violated sections 110(b) and 110(e) of the Bankruptcy Code. A. at 116. Mr. Wynns has abandoned his appeal of the legal basis for the bankruptcy court's decision. No grounds remain upon which this Court could reverse the decision below and it must be affirmed.

II. The Bankruptcy Court Correctly Applied 11 U.S.C. § 110(i) and (l) when Computing the Damages and Fines Imposed Against Mr. Wynns.

The bankruptcy court's award of damages to the debtors was mandated by 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1) and should be affirmed. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it imposed fines under 11 U.S.C. § 110(l).

If a bankruptcy petition preparer violates section 110, the bankruptcy court must impose statutory damages. Section 110(i) mandates that the court "shall order" the bankruptcy petition preparer to pay the debtor his actual damages, plus no less than $ 2,000. 110 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1); see Marshall v. Bourque (In re Hartman), 208 B.R. 768, (Bankr. D. Mass 1997) ("The use of the term 'shall' [in § 110(g)(2)] indicates that once the Court has found a violation, a fine is mandatory.").

The bankruptcy court found that Mr. Wynns violated 11 U.S.C. § 110(b) in both the Clarkes' and the Najdeks' cases because he did not give them mandatory disclosure forms before preparing their petitions. Adams, 426 B.R. at 452. And it found he contravened section 110(e) by giving the Clarkes legal advice. Id. at 454. These actions triggered a mandatory damage award of $2,000 to both debtors. 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1); see A. at 111 (warning by judge to Mr. Wynns that section 110 had "very draconian consequences"). The bankruptcy court did not err in ordering Mr. Wynns to pay a $4,000 damage award.

In addition, a bankruptcy petition preparer who violates any of subsections (b) through (h) of section 110 "may be fined" not more than $500. 11 U.S.C. § 110(l). Mr. Wynns violated section 110 three times by failing to give both the Clarkes and Najdeks disclosure forms and giving the Clarkes legal advice. He was subject to fines of up to $500 each, or a total of $1,500. 11 U.S.C. § 110(l). The bankruptcy court exercised its discretion by only fining Mr. Wynns $750. Adams, 426 B.R. at 456. The bankruptcy court did not abuse that discretion by fining him half the statutory amount.

Mr. Wynns argues that the court erred by following the plain language of section 110(i), which mandates damages when a bankruptcy petition preparer "violates this section, or commits any act that the court finds to be fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive" (emphasis added). 11 U.S.C. § 110(i)(1). Mr. Wynns contends that "slavish dedication to the literal words of a statute" would create an absurd result. Br. at 28. Instead, he argues that both a statutory violation and a deceptive act are required to trigger the mandatory $2,000 fine because "any other reading would reduce the reference to deceptive acts to "'mere surplusage.'" Br. at 35.

Mr. Wynns's argument fails for at least three reasons. First, Congress made section 110(i)(1) disjunctive, creating two grounds for a damage award: 1) violation of the statute; or 2) deceptive acts. Terms connected in the disjunctive must be given separate meanings. Garcia v. United States, 469 U.S. 70, 74 (1984). Under this canon of statutory construction "violation of the statute" is an independent ground for awarding damages. Mr. Wynns violated section 110. Therefore, he is liable to each of his Clients for at least $2,000 in damages. The bankruptcy court properly applied the statute as written. See Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 524, 536 (2004).

Second, a plain reading does not create a surplusage and is not absurd. Not every violation of section 110 is "fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive." Conversely, not every deceptive act violates section 110. Therefore, Congress needed both phrases to cover all forms of wrong-doing.

Nor is it absurd to read section 110(i) to mandate the same damage award for "any violation of this section" or a "fraudulent, unfair or deceptive" act. Br. at 32. Mr. Wynns reads "violation" to mean a "minor" mistake or a "technical violation," i.e. a lesser offense. See Br. at 28. But the plain language of the statute does not limit damages to circumstances that a petition preparer subjectively believes is egregious. The statute creates the liability standard, not the petition preparer. In re Jarvis, 351 B.R. 894, 898 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 2006) ("Having determined that Mr. Mayton is in violation of §§ 110(b)(2)(A) and (h)(2) [disclosure provisions], §§ 110(i)(1) and (l)(1) mandate the imposition of sanctions."); Ross v. Smith (In re Gavin), 181 B.R. 814, 824 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1995) (interpreting identical language in the 1995 version of section 110) (stating that section 110(i) penalties are "triggered if the bankruptcy petition preparer violates the section, i.e. § 110").

The rule is simple. A bankruptcy court is to award damages under section 110(i) for "any violation of § 110. In re Evans, 413 B.R. 329 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 2009) (emphasis in the original). If a bankruptcy petition preparer offers legal advice to a debtor, as Mr. Wynns did here, then the bankruptcy court must award damages to the debtor. In re Jay, – B.R – , No. 09-07138, 2010 WL 3259381, at *20 (Bankr. E.D. Va. Aug. 7, 2010) (stating that the Code "mandates" a $2,000 damage award when a bankruptcy petition preparer gives legal advice).

And Congress knew how to sanction certain violations more severely than others when it deemed it necessary. Section 110 singles out four particular circumstances in which a bankruptcy court "shall" triple the fine assessed against the bankruptcy petition preparer. 11 U.S.C. § 110(l)(2).[14] Congress did not, however, create a hierarchy in section 110(i)(1) under which only fraudulent acts would be subject to the $2,000 damages provision.

Congress wanted to regulate bankruptcy petition preparers more closely; Mr. Wynns's reading of the statute achieves the opposite effect. His idea that the statute should be read to allow one or two "technical violations" of the Bankruptcy Code, see Br. at 28, does not comport with the language of the statute or congressional intent.

Finally, Mr. Wynns's argument that the $2,000 damages award applies only to "fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive" conduct does not help him here. Giving legal advice in and of itself constitutes an unfair practice under section 110. In re Moore, 283 B.R. 852, 857 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2002). Mr. Wynns has abandoned his contention that he did not give legal advice. Therefore, under the logic of his own argument, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in requiring him to pay $4,000 in statutory damages.

[14] The four circumstances are when a bankruptcy petition preparer 1) advises a debtor to exclude assets from his schedules; 2) advocates the use of a false social security number; 3) fails to tell the debtor that he is applying for bankruptcy relief; and 4) the bankruptcy petition preparer hides his identity. 11 U.S.C. § 110(l)(2)(A)-(D).

III. The Statutory Injunction Ordered by the Bankruptcy Court under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(2)(A)(ii) was Proper.

The United States Trustee sought to enjoin Mr. Wynns from acting as a bankruptcy petition preparer. 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(3) (creating a permanent statutory injunction); A. at 51-52. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion when it issued a limited statutory injunction prohibiting Mr. Wynns from violating section 110 in the future. 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(2)(A); United States v. W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629, 633 (1953) (stating that an injunction cannot be disturbed unless it had "no reasonable basis"). Mr. Wynns argues that imposing the statutory injunction is improper because "the possibility of any future violations by WYNNS was very remote." Br. at 48.

Mr. Wynns misstates the applicable legal standard for injunctive relief under section 110(j)(2)(A). Br. at 44. Under section 110(j)(2)(A), a bankruptcy court must find that 1) a violation of the statute has occurred and 2) a limited injunction would be "appropriate" to prevent "recurrence" of the improper actions. 11 U.S.C. 110(j)(2)(A)(ii). If so, it can enter that statutory injunction.

The bankruptcy court considered Mr. Wynns's defenses, including the fact that he broke off working with Mr. Giordano and had expressed "some remorse and reflection." Adams, 426 B.R. at 455. It therefore rejected the United States Trustee's request for an injunction stopping Mr. Wynns from working as a bankruptcy petition preparer because "Wynns's wrongful conduct could be halted by an injunction against improper conduct itself rather than a permanent injunction." Id. at 455-56.

The facts established at trial demonstrate that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in deciding that it would be "appropriate" to issue a limited statutory injunction. When the bankruptcy court issued the statutory injunction, Mr. Wynns still intended to work as a bankruptcy petition preparer. He was still advertising bankruptcy petition preparer work on his website. See A. at 159-191. He had earned his living providing legal support services for twenty years and nothing in the record suggested he was going to change careers. Adams, 426 B.R. at 449.

Mr. Wynns had violated multiple provisions of the Bankruptcy Code but had only expressed "some" remorse for his actions. In re Hennerman, 351 B.R. 143, 156 (Bankr. D. Colo. 2006) (stating an "intransigent attitude" indicates that a permanent injunction is warranted). He admitted that he knew he was supposed to give his clients the required disclosures before preparing their petitions but had not done so. A. at 91-92, 99, 110. He has consistently blamed his troubles on the United States Trustee. Br. at 8-9, 11, 26, 39-41. The bankruptcy court had a "reasonable basis" in concluding that a limited statutory injunction was appropriate.

Finally, the cases Mr. Wynns cites to show the standard for injunctive relief are not on-point. He cites no bankruptcy cases. Rather, he relies on three cases interpreting unrelated statutes. Gwaltney v. Chesapeake Bay Fdn., 484 U.S. 49, 67 (1987) (citizen suit under Clean Water Act); United States v. Oregon Medical Soc., 343 U.S.

326 (1952) (Sherman Anti-trust Act); United States v. W.T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629 (1953) (Clayton Act). None of these statutes have language comparable to 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(2)(A), and Mr. Wynns does not explain why section 110(j) should be construed identically to these statutes.

IV. Mr. Wynns's Legal Arguments Have No Merit.

1. The bankruptcy court had subject matter jurisdiction over the United States Trustee's complaint against Mr. Wynns.

Mr. Wynns argues at great length that the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction over his case because it did not have grounds upon which to enter an injunction. Therefore, it had no case or controversy to adjudicate. This argument misunderstands basic jurisdictional principles.

First, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over Mr. Wynns's case, which was based on the United States Trustee's civil action alleging violation of several provisions of title 11. Federal district courts have "original and exclusive jurisdiction over all cases under title 11." 28 U.S.C. § 1334(a). District courts may refer "any or all cases under title 11 and any or all proceedings arising under title 11" to the "bankruptcy judges of the district." 28 U.S.C. § 157(a).

Bankruptcy courts have jurisdiction over "all cases under title 11, and all core proceedings arising under title 11." 11 U.S.C. §§ 157(b)(1), (b)(2)(A), (O). An injunctive proceeding under section 110(j) is a "core proceeding to be heard and determined by a bankruptcy judge under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(1)." Demos v. Brown (In re Graves), 279 B.R. 266, 271 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2002); Ferm v. United States Trustee (In re Crowe), 243 B.R. 43, 49 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2000).

Mr. Wynns argues that a court's error of law – here allegedly issuing a statutory injunction without grounds – divests it of jurisdiction over the case. Br. at 13-22. The Supreme Court has rejected this. Arbaugh v. Y&H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 510 (2006) ("Jurisdiction . . . is a word of many, too many, meanings") (citation omitted). In Arbaugh, the Supreme Court held that the employee-numerosity requirement for establishing that an employer was subject to Title VII was an element of the plaintiff-petitioner's claim for relief – not a jurisdictional requirement. Id. at 503. The Court rejected the trial court's decision, affirmed by the Fifth Circuit, that the case had to be dismissed. The district court incorrectly decided that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction because the defendant-employer did not have 15 employees, the minimum necessary to be subject to a discrimination suit under Title VII. Id.

Mr. Wynns makes the same error as the district court did in Arbaugh. The United States Trustee had to prove specific elements to obtain injunctive relief. If she had failed to do so, then her claim would have been without merit. Whether she succeeded or failed in her civil action is irrelevant to the question of whether the bankruptcy court had subject-matter jurisdiction over the claim itself. See id. at 511 (disapproving as "unrefined dispositions" judicial decisions that do not distinguish between lack of subject-matter jurisdiction and failure to state a claim"); accord Da Silva v. Kinsho Intern. Corp., 229 F.3d 358, 361 (2d Cir. 2000).

The United States Trustee and Mr. Wynns have been disputing his culpability under section 110 of the Bankruptcy Code since the United States Trustee filed her civil action on July 1, 2008. After nearly three years of litigation, it is hard to fathom Mr. Wynns's argument that there is no "case or controversy" between the two parties.

A case or controversy exists when "conflicting contentions of the parties . . . present a real, substantial controversy between parties having adverse legal interests, a dispute definite and concrete, not hypothetical or abstract." Babbitt v. United Farm Workers Nat. Union, 442 U.S. 289, 298 (1979) (citations omitted). Mr. Wynns argues that the bankruptcy court did not have subject matter jurisdiction because the only "'controversy' between WYNNS and the UNITED STATES TRUSTEE when she filed suit was the one that she imagined to exist, based upon her failure to make a reasonable inquiry." Br. at 14. But that is how all lawsuits start: one party imagines it has been injured and attempts to prove the injury in court. Whether the party's sense of injury is proven to be real has nothing to do with the court's jurisdiction over the matter.

Here, the United States Trustee alleged that Mr. Wynns violated several provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.[15] After a trial, the bankruptcy court agreed, and the district court affirmed on appeal. It is hard to imagine a more classic case "arising under . . . the laws of the United States" and a "controvers[y] to which the United States [is] a party." Const. Art. III, sec. 2.

2. The bankruptcy court had personal jurisdiction over Mr. Wynns.

Mr. Wynns argues that the bankruptcy court erred by exercising personal jurisdiction over him because he, as a resident of San Francisco, did not establish "minimum contacts" with the Eastern District of New York. Br. at 24. The argument is untenable because 1) it has been waived and 2) it misinterprets basic constitutional law.

Mr. Wynns is incorrect that he preserved his objection to personal jurisdiction because he raised it in his motion for summary judgment.

[15] Mr. Wynns asserts that the United States Trustee "brought suit solely under section 110(j), since that is the only subsection of section 110 which provides for an action for injunctive relief." Br. at 22. This is untrue. The United States Trustee based her complaint on all of section 110, and sections 105, 526(c)(2) and 528 of the Bankruptcy Code. A. at 11-12.

and his closing memorandum after trial. Bankr. Dkt. #s 16, 22. Before he filed his motion for summary judgment, Mr. Wynns filed an answer and an amended answer to the United States Trustee's complaint, neither of which raised personal jurisdiction. A. at 59-76. By not objecting to personal jurisdiction in his initial pleading, he waived his right to raise the issue. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7012; Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1) (providing that defense based on lack of personal jurisdiction is waived if not asserted prior to the filing of a responsive pleading); see generally Cargill, Inc. v. Sabine Shipping & Trading Co., 756 F.2d 224, 228 (2d Cir. 1985) (same).

Mr. Wynns's objection to personal jurisdiction is without merit. Under 11 U.S.C. § 110(j), an enforcement action may be brought either in the home district of the petition preparer or, as was done here, in the home district of any debtor on whose behalf relief was sought. 11 U.S.C. § 110(j)(1).

Section 110(j) does not violate Mr. Wynns's due process rights. It is well-established that when a non-resident defendant has "purposefully directed his activities at residents of the forum, his contacts with the forum are sufficient to support personal jurisdiction in any litigation that results from the alleged injuries that arise out of or relate to those activities." Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 472 (1985).

In this case, Mr. Wynns knowingly and purposefully directed his activities towards the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of New York. He solicited business through the internet. See A. at 159-61. He entered into a verbal agreement with Mr. Giordano to prepare petitions for New York debtors and in fact did so. A. at 96. He sent a letter to Mr. Clarke, a resident of New York, instructing him how to fix a deficient filing. A. at 151-52. He sent a letter to the bankruptcy court clerk of the Eastern District of New York on the same subject. A. at 157-58.

Mr. Wynns admits he has legal training. He was familiar with the provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 110 when he took these actions. A. at 99. Accordingly, Mr. Wynns was on notice that his actions could eventually require him to respond to a complaint in the Eastern District of New York. The United States Trustee's decision to seek relief in that venue does not offend notions or fair play or substantial justice.

3. The United States Trustee did not violate Mr. Wynns's due process rights in filing her civil action.

Mr. Wynns argues that the United States Trustee has violated his due process rights by filing a civil action against him. Br. 11, 25. Mr. Wynns provides no authority for this contention. Nor could he. Mr. Wynns does not have a due process right to avoid liability for violations of the Bankruptcy Code he considers to be insignificant. Nor did the United States Trustee act unreasonably in holding him accountable for an allegedly minor violation of federal law. Cf. Investors Equity Gp. v. Universal Symetrics Corp., 53 F.3d 159, 163 (6th Cir. 1995) (reversing finding of no liability for a "technical" violation of the Michigan securities statute that had "little practical import").

4. Mr. Wynns should not be awarded any fees, costs, or sanctions.

The district court found Mr. Wynns's claim for sanctions under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 to be "frivolous." Wynns, 426 B.R. at 466. This conclusion is justified for both procedural and substantive reasons. Mr. Wynns did not file a motion seeking sanctions, as required by the bankruptcy rules. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001, 9013; cf. Capone v. Weeks, 326 Fed. App'x 46, 47 (2d Cir. 2009). He also ignored the applicable notice requirements. Gollomp v. Spitzer, 568 F.3d 355, 368 (2d Cir. 2009) (citation omitted).

In addition, Mr. Wynns has no evidence that the United States Trustee's actions were "so completely without merit as to require the conclusion that they must have been undertaken for some improper purpose." Id.; Oliveri v. Thompson, 803 F.2d 1265, 1273 (2d Cir. 1986). He complains that the United States Trustee should have consulted with him before filing her complaint. Br. at 39-40. But he offers no legal basis on which failing to follow a defendant's suggested pre-litigation procedure could be a basis for sanctions under 28 U.S.C. § 1927.

Finally, Mr. Wynns raises Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 9011 to "illustrate" that the suit against him was "unreasonable." Br. at 41. He hints that this Court could award him sanctions it were to issue an Order to Show Cause on its own initiative. Id. (citing Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011(c)(1)(b)).

This veiled claim for sanctions should "not be accorded a friendly reception by this Court." United States v. Davis, 598 F.3d 10, 14 (2d Cir. 2010). It has no legal basis because the alleged improper actions did not take place before this Court. See Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 44 (1991) (stating that courts may sanction behavior to control the litigation before it). It is merely an excuse to repeat baseless allegations against the United States Trustee.

V. The District Court Incorrectly Interpreted Section 110 as Only Prohibiting Bankruptcy Petition Preparers from Giving "Legal Advice;" Section 110(k) Prohibits Unauthorized Practice of Law as Defined by State Law.

The district court affirmed Mr. Wynns's violation of section 110(e) on a mistakenly narrow interpretation of that section. Wynns, 426 B.R. at 462-63, 465. This error did not affect the judgment in the case and thus the United States Trustee did not cross-appeal. California v. Rooney, 483 U.S. 307, 310 (1987). However, it is "an inveterate and certain rule" that an appellee may attack the reasoning of the lower court's decision. Mass. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Ludwig, 426 U.S. 479, 480-81 (1976) (per curiam); Jenkins v. City of New York, 478 F.3d 76, 86 (2d Cir. 2007). And this Court conducts its own independent review of the factual findings and legal conclusions of the bankruptcy court. In re Manville Forest Prods. Corp., 896 F.2d 1384, 1388 (2d Cir. 1990). Therefore, for the sake of clarity, this Court should affirm based on the bankruptcy court's interpretation of section 110.

The district court is correct that the language of section 110(e) prohibits bankruptcy petition preparers from giving "legal advice" and that section 110(e) does not contain the phrase "unauthorized practice of law." 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2)(A). The district court is also correct that "legal advice" is not the same thing as "practice of law."[16] Wynns, 426 B.R. at 462.

But the conclusion that the district court drew – that Mr. Wynns could only be sanctioned for giving advice – misreads 11 U.S.C. § 110(k).

[16] Bankruptcy courts do not limit violations of section 110(e) to giving personal legal advice, as the district court did here. See e.g., In re Bagley, 433 B.R. 325, 333-34 (Bankr. D. Mont. 2010) (soliciting information through a website and choosing exemptions violated 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)); United States Trustee v. Brown (In re Martin), 424 B.R. 496, 507 (Bankr. D.N.M 2010) (finding preparer violated § 110(e)(2) by "practicing law" by, among other things, "applying exemptions to Debtor's property [and] classifying debts as secured or unsecured and priority"). In these cases, the bankruptcy petition preparer did not advise the debtor but took action on the debtor's behalf – much as Mr. Wynns did here when he contacted the bankruptcy court regarding the Clarkes' petition.

That section states: “Nothing in this section shall be construed to permit activities that are otherwise prohibited by law, including rules and laws that prohibit the unauthorized practice of law.” 11 U.S.C. § 110(k). Section 110(k) “makes clear” that bankruptcy petition preparers may not engage in the unauthorized practice of law. In re Payne, 414 B.R. 111, 114 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 2009). Therefore, section 110(e)(2) “must be understood as a general prohibition against the practice of law by bankruptcy petition preparers except where otherwise permitted by applicable law.” In re Bernales, 345 B.R. 206, 215 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2006).

Section 110(e) creates a federal cause of action for improper “legal advice” by bankruptcy petition preparers. 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2)(A). It contains a non-exclusive list of prohibited advice to stop the kind of activity that concerned Congress. 11 U.S.C. § 110(e)(2)(B); Bernales, 345 B.R. at 215 (stating § 110(e)(2)(B) is not exclusive).

The Bankruptcy Code’s prohibition of “legal advice” does not put other aspects of the unauthorized practice of law beyond the reach of bankruptcy courts, however. A petition preparer “may not use § 110 as a ‘safe harbor’ if his action is prohibited under the applicable state’s definition of unauthorized practice of law.” In re Gabrielson, 217 B.R. 819, 826 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 1998). See also In re Reynoso, 477 F.3d at 1125 (“We look to state law for guidance in determining whether Frankfort has engaged in the unauthorized practice of law.”); In re Martinez, 72 Fed. App’x 138, 140-141 (5th Cir. 2003) (adopting the district court conclusion that any service beyond typing “is not permitted under state unauthorized practice of law statutes, and so is also not authorized by § 110”).

Therefore, the district court’s interpretation of section 110 would only be correct if Mr. Wynns’s actions that were not “legal advice,” such as advocating for the Clarkes to the bankruptcy court clerk, were allowed under New York law. In re Tomlinson, 343 B.R. 400, 407 (E.D.N.Y. 2006). They are not.

Practice of law in New York includes giving instructions and advice about the preparation of legal instruments. In re Gaftick, 333 B.R. 177, 186 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2005) (citing New York County Lawyers’ Assoc. v. Dacey, 283 N.Y.S. 2d 984, 989, 28 A.D. 2d 161, 165 (1st Dep’t 1967), rev'd on other grounds, 21 N.Y.2d 694, 234 N.E.2d 459, 287 N.Y.S. 2d 422 (1967)). See also Sussman v. Grado, 192 Misc. 2d 628, 633, 746 N.Y.S.2d 548, 553 (Nassau County Ct. 2002) (stating that when a layman prepares legal documents, that person is practicing law). When a non-attorney simplifies the bankruptcy process for a debtor, that also constitutes the unauthorized practice of law. Gaftick, 333 B.R. at 188.

That is precisely what Mr. Wynns did in this case. He told the Clarkes how to rectify a deficient filing. He told them which documents to keep and which to file. He wrote them a cover letter for the bankruptcy court clerk. He independently contacted the clerk to submit the missing documents. All of these actions amounted to an exercise of Mr. Wynns's judgment on how best to fix the deficiency. This "in turn inevitably crosse[d] the line" into the unauthorized practice of law. Id. (quotation omitted). Because of section 110(k), the bankruptcy court did not err in sanctioning Mr. Wynns for the unauthorized practice of law.

The United States Trustee raises this point because it is important that courts understand the interplay between sections 110(e) and 110(k). Bankruptcy courts, no less than other courts, must not allow non-attorneys to engage in the unauthorized practice of law in cases before it, something section 110(k) makes clear.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee requests that the Court affirm the decisions below.

TITLE 11 - BANKRUPTCY
CHAPTER 1 - GENERAL PROVISIONS

§ 110. Penalty for persons who negligently or fraudulently prepare bankruptcy petitions

(a) In this section—

(1) "bankruptcy petition preparer" means a person, other than an attorney for the debtor or an employee of such attorney under the direct supervision of such attorney, who prepares for compensation a document for filing; and

(2) "document for filing" means a petition or any other document prepared for filing by a debtor in a United States bankruptcy court or a United States district court in connection with a case under this title.

(b) (1) A bankruptcy petition preparer who prepares a document for filing shall sign the document and print on the document the preparer's name and address. If a bankruptcy petition preparer is not an individual, then an officer, principal, responsible person, or partner of the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be required to—

(A) sign the document for filing; and

(B) print on the document the name and address of that officer, principal, responsible person, or partner.

(2) (A) Before preparing any document for filing or accepting any fees from a debtor, the bankruptcy petition preparer shall provide to the debtor a written notice which shall be on an official form prescribed by the Judicial Conference of the United States in accordance with rule 9009 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure.

(B) The notice under subparagraph (A)—

(i) shall inform the debtor in simple language that a bankruptcy petition preparer is not an attorney and may not practice law or give legal advice;

(ii) may contain a description of examples of legal advice that a bankruptcy petition preparer is not authorized to give, in addition to any advice that the preparer may not give by reason of subsection (e)(2); and

(iii) shall—

(I) be signed by the debtor and, under penalty of perjury, by the bankruptcy petition preparer; and

(II) be filed with any document for filing.

(c) (1) A bankruptcy petition preparer who prepares a document for filing shall place on the document, after the preparer's signature, an identifying number that identifies individuals who prepared the document.

(2) (A) Subject to subparagraph (B), for purposes of this section, the identifying number of a bankruptcy petition preparer shall be the Social Security account number of each individual who prepared the document or assisted in its preparation.

(B) If a bankruptcy petition preparer is not an individual, the identifying number of the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be the Social Security account number of the officer, principal, responsible person, or partner of the bankruptcy petition preparer.

(d) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall, not later than the time at which a document for filing is presented for the debtor's signature, furnish to the debtor a copy of the document.

(e) (1) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall not execute any document on behalf of a debtor.

(2) (A) A bankruptcy petition preparer may not offer a potential bankruptcy debtor any legal advice, including any legal advice described in subparagraph (B).

(B) The legal advice referred to in subparagraph (A) includes advising the debtor—

(i) whether—

(I) to file a petition under this title; or

(II) commencing a case under chapter 7, 11, 12, or 13 is appropriate;

(ii) whether the debtor's debts will be discharged in a case under this title;

(iii) whether the debtor will be able to retain the debtor's home, car, or other property after commencing a case under this title;

(iv) concerning—

(I) the tax consequences of a case brought under this title; or

(II) the dischargeability of tax claims;

(v) whether the debtor may or should promise to repay debts to a creditor or enter into a reaffirmation agreement with a creditor to reaffirm a debt;

(vi) concerning how to characterize the nature of the debtor's interests in property or the debtor's debts; or

(vii) concerning bankruptcy procedures and rights.

(f) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall not use the word "legal" or any similar term in any advertisements, or advertise under any category that includes the word "legal" or any similar term.

(g) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall not collect or receive any payment from the debtor or on behalf of the debtor for the court fees in connection with filing the petition.

(h)

(1) The Supreme Court may promulgate rules under section 2075 of title 28, or the Judicial Conference of the United States may prescribe guidelines, for setting a maximum allowable fee chargeable by a bankruptcy petition preparer. A bankruptcy petition preparer shall notify the debtor of any such maximum amount before preparing any document for filing for a debtor or accepting any fee from the debtor.

(2) A declaration under penalty of perjury by the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be filed together with the petition, disclosing any fee received from or on behalf of the debtor within 12 months immediately prior to the filing of the case, and any unpaid fee charged to the debtor. If rules or guidelines setting a maximum fee for services have been promulgated or prescribed under paragraph (1), the declaration under this paragraph shall include a certification that the bankruptcy petition preparer complied with the notification requirement under paragraph (1).

(A) The court shall disallow and order the immediate turnover to the bankruptcy trustee any fee referred to in paragraph (2) found to be in excess of the value of any services—

(i) rendered by the bankruptcy petition preparer during the 12-month period immediately preceding the date of the filing of the petition; or

(ii) found to be in violation of any rule or guideline promulgated or prescribed under paragraph (1).

(B) All fees charged by a bankruptcy petition preparer may be forfeited in any case in which the bankruptcy petition preparer fails to comply with this subsection or subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), or (g).

(C) An individual may exempt any funds recovered under this paragraph under section 522 (b).

(4) The debtor, the trustee, a creditor, the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) or the court, on the initiative of the court, may file a motion for an order under paragraph (2).[1]

(5) A bankruptcy petition preparer shall be fined not more than $500 for each failure to comply with a court order to turn over funds within 30 days of service of such order.

(i)

(1) If a bankruptcy petition preparer violates this section or commits any act that the court finds to be fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive, on the motion of the debtor, trustee, United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any), and after notice and a hearing, the court shall order the bankruptcy petition preparer to pay to the debtor—

(A) the debtor’s actual damages;

(B) the greater of—

(i) $2,000; or

(ii) twice the amount paid by the debtor to the bankruptcy petition preparer for the preparer’s services; and

(C) reasonable attorneys’ fees and costs in moving for damages under this subsection.

(2) If the trustee or creditor moves for damages on behalf of the debtor under this subsection, the bankruptcy petition preparer shall be ordered to pay the movant the additional amount of $1,000 plus reasonable attorneys’ fees and costs incurred.

(j) (1) A debtor for whom a bankruptcy petition preparer has prepared a document for filing, the trustee, a creditor, or the United States trustee in the district in which the bankruptcy petition preparer resides, has conducted business, or the United States trustee in any other district in which the debtor resides may bring a civil action to enjoin a bankruptcy petition preparer from engaging in any conduct in violation of this section or from further acting as a bankruptcy petition preparer.

(2) (A) In an action under paragraph (1), if the court finds that—

(i) a bankruptcy petition preparer has—

(I) engaged in conduct in violation of this section or of any provision of this title;

(II) misrepresented the preparer’s experience or education as a bankruptcy petition preparer; or

(III) engaged in any other fraudulent, unfair, or deceptive conduct; and

(ii) injunctive relief is appropriate to prevent the recurrence of such conduct, the court may enjoin the bankruptcy petition preparer from engaging in such conduct.

(B) If the court finds that a bankruptcy petition preparer has continually engaged in conduct described in subclause (I), (II), or (III) of clause (i) and that an injunction prohibiting such conduct would not be sufficient to prevent such person’s interference with the proper administration of this title, has not paid a penalty imposed under this section, or failed to disgorge all fees ordered by the court the court may enjoin the person from acting as a bankruptcy petition preparer.

(3) The court, as part of its contempt power, may enjoin a bankruptcy petition preparer that has failed to comply with a previous order issued under this section. The injunction under this paragraph may be issued on the motion of the court, the trustee, or the United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any).

(4) The court shall award to a debtor, trustee, or creditor that brings a successful action under this subsection reasonable attorneys’ fees and costs of the action, to be paid by the bankruptcy petition preparer.

(k) Nothing in this section shall be construed to permit activities that are otherwise prohibited by law, including rules and laws that prohibit the unauthorized practice of law.

(l) (1) A bankruptcy petition preparer who fails to comply with any provision of subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), or (h) may be fined not more than $500 for each such failure.

(2) The court shall triple the amount of a fine assessed under paragraph (1) in any case in which the court finds that a bankruptcy petition preparer—

(A) advised the debtor to exclude assets or income that should have been included on applicable schedules;

(B) advised the debtor to use a false Social Security account number;

(C) failed to inform the debtor that the debtor was filing for relief under this title; or

(D) prepared a document for filing in a manner that failed to disclose the identity of the bankruptcy petition preparer.

(3) A debtor, trustee, creditor, or United States trustee (or the bankruptcy administrator, if any) may file a motion for an order imposing a fine on the bankruptcy petition preparer for any violation of this section.

(4)

(A) Fines imposed under this subsection in judicial districts served by United States trustees shall be paid to the United States trustees, who shall deposit an amount equal to such fines in the United States Trustee Fund.

(B) Fines imposed under this subsection in judicial districts served by bankruptcy administrators shall be deposited as offsetting receipts to the fund established under section 1931 of title 28, and shall remain available until expended to reimburse any appropriation for the amount paid out of such appropriation for expenses of the operation and maintenance of the courts of the United States.

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. Whether, under Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B), a Chapter 11 bankruptcy trustee is an "officer" of the United States.

2. Whether, under Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B), the United States, through the United States Trustee, is a "party" to this appeal.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This Chapter 11 bankruptcy appeal involves a dispute between the Chapter 11 trustee, Jeffrey A. Schreiber, and a creditor, Yamaha Motor Corporation, over the validity of Yamaha's lien on a number of golf carts and Schreiber's sale of those cars.[1] Since Yamaha filed its appeal 48 days from the district court's entry of judgment, this Court has jurisdiction of the appeal only if, under Fed. R. App. P. 4(a), the applicable time period for filing a notice of appeal was 60 rather than 30 days. The 60-day period applied only if (1) Schreiber were an "officer" of the United States, or (2) the United States, through the United States Trustee, were a "party" to this appeal. This brief addresses solely the matter of jurisdiction.

I. Course Of Proceedings

A. Bankruptcy Court

In the bankruptcy court, Schreiber instituted an "adversary proceeding" by filing a complaint against Yamaha disputing the validity of the security interest that Yamaha claimed to hold in 72 golf carts owned by the debtors. App. 1. The bankruptcy court found that Yamaha did not have a perfected security interest. Id. at 134. Schreiber then filed a motion seeking permission to sell the golf carts. Id. at 199. Yamaha objected to the proposed sale, thereby commencing a separate "contested matter." App. 204. The bankruptcy court approved the sale. Id. at 208. Yamaha appealed to the district court the adverse decisions in the adversary proceeding and the contested matter.

[1] This Court has consolidated this case with Yamaha's appeal (No. 01-1841) from the district court's denial of Yamaha's motion to stay the judgment.

B. District Court

The district court, having consolidated Yamaha's two appeals “for all purposes,” rendered a judgment in favor of Schreiber on both matters. Yamaha then filed the present appeal. Subsequently, the firm filed a second notice of appeal, appealing the district court's denial of Yamaha's motion to stay the judgment pending appeal.

C. Proceedings In This Court

This Court directed Yamaha to show cause why its appeal of the district court's judgment on the adversary proceeding and contested matter should not be dismissed for failing to file a notice of appeal within thirty days as required by Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(A). Subsequent to the filing of responses by Yamaha and Schreiber, we filed on behalf of the United States Trustee a memorandum addressing the jurisdictional issue. This Court then entered an order, per Judge Selya, in which it concluded that an arguable basis exists for holding that there was jurisdiction. Accordingly, the Court authorized the appeal to proceed and instructed the parties to brief the jurisdictional issue.

Subsequently, this Court ordered that Yamaha's two appeals be consolidated for purposes of briefing and oral argument.

II. The Role Of The United States Trustee

The United States Trustee's Office is an agency of the United States. See Joelson v. United States, 86 F.3d 1413, 1417 (6th Cir. 1996) ("parties * * * do not dispute that the U.S. Trustee's Office is an agency within the definition of the Administrative Procedure Act"); In re Gideon, Inc., 158 B.R. 528, 530-31 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1993); 20 Moore's Federal Practice §304.11[2] at 26 (3d ed. 1997). Cf. In re Plaza de Diego Shopping Ctr., Inc., 911 F.2d 820, 824 (1st Cir. 1990). United States Trustees are officials of the Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General and charged with appointing trustees in bankruptcy cases and supervising the administration of bankruptcy cases.[2] 28 U.S.C. 581-89.

The United States Trustee oversees the bankruptcy process, protects the public interest, and ensures that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law. See generally United States Tr. v. Columbia Gas Sys., Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Sys., Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994). To accomplish this objective, "the United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this title * * *." 11 U.S.C. 307.

[2] Thus, the United States Trustee and the Assistant United States Trustee are "officers" of the United States.

Under 28 U.S.C. 586, establishing the duties of the United States Trustee, the United States Trustee is directed to "establish, maintain, and supervise a panel of private trustees that are eligible and available to serve as trustees in cases under chapter 7 of title 11." 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(1). These trustees owe a fiduciary duty to the bankruptcy estate, not to the government, as would a government official. See 11 U.S.C. 323(a). Further, they are privately compensated, receiving neither compensation nor benefits from the government.

III. Nature Of A Bankruptcy Case

"[B]ankruptcy cases typically involve numerous controversies bearing only a slight relationship to each other." In re G.S.F. Corp., 938 F.2d 1467, 1473 (1st Cir. 1991). Thus, "[t]he Bankruptcy Rules recognize three distinct types of proceedings within a bankruptcy case: adversary proceedings, administrative proceedings, and contested matters." Estancias La Ponderosa Dev. Corp. v. Harrington (In re Harrington), 992 F.2d 3, 6 n.3 (1st Cir. 1993). Cf. Kowal v. Malkemus (In re Thompson), 965 F.2d 1136 (1st Cir. 1992) (discussing the differences between the underlying bankruptcy case and an adversary proceeding).

"Adversary proceedings are most like ordinary civil actions; contested matters are substantially similar; whereas most administrative proceedings are quite dissimilar to ordinary civil actions." Ponderosa, 992 F.3d at 5 n.3. There are, however, significant differences between adversary proceedings and contested matters. Compare Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014 (discussing contested matters) with Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001 (defining by exclusion what is an adversary proceeding).

A. Adversary Proceedings

An adversary proceeding, which receives a docket number separate from the main bankruptcy case, is commenced by the filing of a complaint naming specific defendants. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7003. Parties may commence such proceedings to litigate only those matters specified in Bankruptcy Rule 7001. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001. A complaint in an adversary proceeding is adjudicated the same way any piece of litigation is litigated within the federal system. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001, et seq. (specifying those matters that constitute adversary proceedings and establishing rules for litigating adversary proceedings). Adversary proceedings include "a proceeding to determine the validity, priority, or extent of a lien or other interest in property, other than a proceeding under Rule 4003(d)." See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001(2).

B. Contested Matters And Sales Of Bankruptcy Estate Property

A contested matter arises when someone files a motion in a case, or files an objection to some proposed course of conduct. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014; United States v. Laughlin (In re Laughlin), 210 B.R. 659, 661 (Bankr. 1st Cir. 1997) ("[w]hen a party files an objection to an administrative matter (such as a professional fee application or notice of sale), it becomes a contested matter (citations omitted)." If an objection is filed, a hearing must be held to adjudicate it. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 6004(e).

The procedures specified in the bankruptcy rules for litigating contested matters are less formal than those specified for adversary proceedings. See Toma Steel Supply Co., Inc. v. Transamerican Natural Gas Corp. (In re Transamerican Natural Gas Corp.), 978 F.2d 1409, 1416 (5th Cir. 1992) ("[u]nlike adversary proceedings, which we have described as 'full blown federal lawsuits within the larger bankruptcy case,' and which are governed by all of the rules in Part VII of the Bankruptcy Rules, contested matters are 'subject to the less elaborate procedures specified in Bankruptcy Rule 9014'"), cert. denied, 509 U.S. 923 (1993). Contested matters do not receive separate docket numbers, there is no complaint, and parties are not formally named. See State Bank of S. Utah v. Gledhill (In re Gledhill), 76 F.3d 1070, 1077 (10th Cir. 1996) ("[i]n general, a party who brings an action designated as an adversary proceeding under Rule 7001 must file a complaint with the bankruptcy court, and serve the adverse party with a summons and a copy of the complaint. See Rule 7003; Rule 7004. In contrast, in a contested matter, relief shall be requested by motion." (internal quotations omitted)).

The proposal by a case trustee to sell property of the estate may give rise to a contested matter. Section 363(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 363(b), allows trustees to sell estate assets outside the ordinary course of business. It requires prior notice to parties in interest, who may then object. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2002(a)(2) (specifying the content of notices). Bankruptcy Rule 6004(b) authorizes parties who wish to oppose proposed sales to file objections with the court. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 6004(b). The rule provides that filing such an objection commences a contested matter "governed by Rule 9014."

IV. Federal Rules Of Appellate Procedure

Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B) provides that:

> "[w]hen the United States or its officer or agency is a party, the notice of appeal may be filed by any party within 60 days after the judgment or order appealed from is entered.

V. Facts Of This Case

In the course of the Perry Hollow Golf Club, Inc. and Perry Hollow Management Co., Inc. consolidated chapter 11 bankruptcy case, two disputes arose in the bankruptcy court - - one, an adversary proceeding instituted, under Bankruptcy Rule 7001, by Jeffery A. Schreiber, the chapter 11 trustee, and the other, a contested matter brought, under Bankruptcy Rule 9014, by Yamaha. App. 305-07.

On July 7, 2000, Schreiber instituted an adversary proceeding against Yamaha disputing the validity of a security interest Yamaha claimed to hold in 72 golf carts. Id. at 1. The trustee's complaint asked the court to rule that Yamaha's security interest was unperfected. The Assistant United States Trustee for the District of New Hampshire, Geraldine Karonis, did not participate in this proceeding. On October 17, 2000, after a hearing, the bankruptcy court ruled in Schreiber's favor. Id. at 134.

Then, on October 30, 2000, Schreiber filed a motion seeking permission to sell the golf carts. Id. at 199. Yamaha objected, thereby commencing the contested matter. Id. at 204. Karonis filed no pleadings in the contested matter, but did attend the hearing. There, she neither supported nor opposed the sale, but did ask two questions pertaining to whether the potential purchaser had sufficient financial resources to purchase the golf carts. Id. at 237-38. Ultimately, the bankruptcy court approved the sale. Id. at 208.

Yamaha appealed to the district court both the order in the adversary proceeding and that in the contested matter. By order entered January 8, 2001, the court consolidated Yamaha's appeals "for all purposes." App. 253. The United States Trustee did not enter an appearance in the district court. Nor did the United States Trustee file briefs, motions, or other pleadings. The court's docket sheet listed Yamaha as "appellant," and Schreiber in two separate capacities, as "appellee" and as "trustee," but listed Karonis only as "trustee." On March 27, 2001, the court entered a judgment and order affirming the bankruptcy court’s rulings. Id. at 303-04. On May 7, 2001, the district court issued an order declining to stay its judgment pending appeal. Id. at 331.

On May 14, 2001, forty-eight days after entry of the district court's judgment, Yamaha filed a notice of appeal from the judgment affirming the bankruptcy court's rulings. And then, on June 6, 2001, the firm filed a second notice, appealing the district court’s denial of the stay. Subsequently, this Court directed Yamaha to show cause why its appeal from the March 27 judgment of the district court should not be dismissed for failing to file a notice of appeal within thirty days as required by Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(A).[3]

On January 9, 2002, this Court, per Judge Selya, issued an order concluding that there was "an arguable basis for applying the 60-day appeal period" and "permit[ting] this appeal to proceed in the normal course." The order noted that "[a]lthough the Office of the United States Trustee states that, apart from [3] Yamaha filed a memorandum in which it argued that the rule's 60-day time limit was applicable. Schreiber, responded to the court of appeals' show cause order by stating that he "d[id] not object to Yamaha's response to the Court's Show Cause Order." We filed a memorandum, addressing the arguments raised by Yamaha, which memorandum concluded that the 30-day limit applied.

appointing Jeffrey Schreiber as the Chapter 11 trustee, it took no other action in connection with this case and neither appeared nor filed pleadings in the proceedings, the record indicates that AUST Karonis appeared at a November 14, 2000 hearing on a motion by trustee Schreiber to sell the Yamaha golf carts and, in fact, Karonis cross-examined one of the witnesses." The Court's order instructed the parties to "brief the jurisdictional issue along with the merits issues."[4]

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

In our memorandum addressing this Court's jurisdiction, we concluded that the U.S. Trustee was not a party to this appeal. As explained below, however, in light of the participation by Assistant U.S. Trustee Karonis in the contested matter, as highlighted in this Court's subsequent order, we have now concluded that the U.S. Trustee is party to this appeal. We have reached this conclusion because first, Karonis "appear[ed]" in the contested matter pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 307, and second, the district court thereafter consolidated for all purposes the contested matter with the adversary proceeding involving that is directly at issue in this Court. Absent either of these circumstances, the U.S. Trustee would not have been a party.

[4] In this regard, Yamaha's brief states that "[o]n or about January 9, 2002 the First Circuit Court of Appeals ordered that the March 27, 2001 appeal was timely and that the case is now before this Honorable Court." Yam. Br. 8. Schreiber's brief does not address the issue of jurisdiction.

The 1967 Advisory Committee notes to Rule 4(a) of the Federal Rules Of Appellate Procedure suggest that the rule's drafters contemplated that the 30-day limit for filing an appeal would ordinarily apply in bankruptcy cases. Our analysis confirms that expectation, but establishes that the circumstances of this case warrant applying the 60-day limit, thus establishing the jurisdiction of this Court.

The simple fact that case trustees are selected by the United States Trustee does not make them "officers" of the United States, so as to trigger the 60-day rule in the high percentage of bankruptcy cases in which there is a case trustee. A case trustee is a "private trustee" (28 U.S.C. 586(a)(1)), who is privately compensated and owes a fiduciary duty solely to the estate. _See_ 11 U.S.C. 323(a). Thus, Schreiber, as Chapter 11 trustee, is not an "officer" of the United States under Fed. R. App. P. 4(a).

Since the Office of the United States Trustee is an agency of the United States, its participation as a party in a bankruptcy case would trigger the 60-day period for filing an appeal. But such participation is discretionary, and the mere _potential_ of the Office to become a party is insufficient to trigger that extended period, which otherwise, and contrary to the intent of Rule 4(a), would apply to all bankruptcy cases.

The United States Trustee becomes a party to a "[bankruptcy] case or proceeding" _only_ by the exercise of its right to "raise * * * appear * * * and be heard on any issue." 11 U.S.C. 307.

The keying of the party status of the United States Trustee to the exercise of the power granted by Section 307 implements the philosophy underlying Rule 4, not to create traps for the unwary. This goal is realized by making clear to the participants in the bankruptcy proceeding, the instances in which the United States Trustee has become party.

Here, in the contested matter, the UST was “heard” on the issue as to the sale of the golf carts in that Karonis questioned the prospective buyer of the carts. Accordingly, Karonis, and through her the UST, was a "party" to the contested matter in the bankruptcy court, and thereby became a party to the subsequent appeal of that matter. Importantly, this exercise of discretion to participate affords no basis per se on which to hold that the UST thereby become a party to such other distinct controversies within the overall bankruptcy case, much less the case as a whole.

But here, the district court consolidated the two closely related appeals of the contested matter and the adversary proceeding (the existence of Yamaha's lien being central to both) "for all purposes" (emphasis supplied). This Court has recognized that where two cases are so consolidated they may be treated as one for purposes of appealability. Thus, the effect of the district court's consolidation order was to make Karonis (and through her the UST) parties in the district court. This in turn means that the 60-day rule applied to Yamaha's notice of appeal, and rendered it timely.

ARGUMENT

The 1967 Advisory Committee notes to Rule 4(a) of the Federal Rules Of Appellate Procedure suggest that the drafters of the rule expected the 30-day time limit for filing a notice of appeal to apply in most bankruptcy cases, i.e., that ordinarily the United States, via the United States Trustee, would not be a party so as to trigger the 60-day limit. See Fed. R. App. P. 4(a) advisory committee's notes ("[e]xcept in cases to which the United States or an officer or agency thereof is a party, the change [resulting from application of Rule 4(a)(1)] is a minor one, since a successful litigant in a bankruptcy proceeding may, under [existing law], oblige an aggrieved party to appeal within 30 days after entry of judgment"); See also In re Serratto, 117 F.3d 427, 428-29 (9th Cir. 1997) (citing treatise passages suggesting that 30 days is the typical time for taking an appeal in bankruptcy cases).

The analysis below confirms the expectation of the advisory committee. Nevertheless, the analysis further establishes that the circumstances here are such that Karonis (and through her, the United States Trustee) were parties in the district court, so that the 60-day period applied and Yamaha's appeal was timely.

I

THE CHAPTER 11 TRUSTEE, SCHREIBER, IS NOT AN "OFFICER" OF THE UNITED STATES UNDER Fed. R. App.

P. 4(a), SO AS TO MAKE IT A PARTY TO THIS APPEAL[5]

If private trustees were "officers" of the United States for purposes of Rule 4(a), then almost all bankruptcy cases would be subject to the 60-day deadline (Chapter 11 cases, in which a case trustee is not ordinarily utilized, being only a small percentage of all bankruptcy cases). But this is not the case. Under 28 U.S.C. 586, establishing the duties of the United States Trustee, the United States Trustee is directed to "establish, maintain, and supervise a panel of private trustees that are eligible and available to serve as trustees in cases under chapter 7 of title 11" (emphasis supplied). 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(1).

These trustees owe a fiduciary duty to the bankruptcy estate, not to the government, as would a government official. See 11 U.S.C. 323(a). Further, they are privately compensated, receiving neither compensation nor benefits from the government. Under these circumstances, the simple fact that Schreiber was appointed by the Office of the United States Trustee does not make him an "officer" of the United States within the meaning of Fed. R. App. P. 4(a). In re Serratto, 117 F.3d 427, 428-29 (9th Cir. 1997); In re Greene, 980 F.2d 590, 597 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 1039 (1994).[6] [5] This part of our argument largely duplicates material contained in the memorandum that we filed in connection with this Court's order to show cause.

[6] See California State Bd. of Equalization v. Sierra Summit, Inc., 490 U.S. 844, 849-50 (1989)("bankruptcy trustee is 'the representative of the estate [of the debtor],' 11 U.S.C. § 323(a)[] * * *, not 'an arm of the Government,'" (quoting

II.

THE EMPOWERMENT OF THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE TO "RAISE," "APPEAR" AND "BE HEARD ON ANY ISSUE" IN ANY BANKRUPTCY CASE (11 U.S.C. 307) DOES NOT ITSELF MAKE THE UNITED STATES A "PARTY" (Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)) TO THIS APPEAL

The United States Trustee's Office is an agency of the United States. See Joelson v. United States, 86 F.3d 1413, 1417 (6th Cir. 1996) ("parties * * * do not dispute that the U.S. Trustee's Office is an agency within the definition of the Administrative Procedure Act"); In re Gideon, Inc, 158 B.R. 528, 530-31 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1993); 20 Moore's Federal Practice §304.11[2] at 26 (3d ed. 1997). Cf. In re Plaza de Diego Shopping Ctr., Inc., 911 F.2d 820, 824 (1st Cir. 1990).[7] Thus its participation as a party in a bankruptcy case would trigger the 60-day period for filing an appeal.

Such participation is discretionary, however, in that, under

Department of Employment v. United States, 385 U.S. 355, 359-360 (1966); Allnutt v. Department of Justice, 99 F. Supp. 2d 673, 678 (D. Md. 2000)(FOIA did not require United States Trustee to turn over records under control of private bankruptcy trustee); Wells v. United States, 98 B.R. 806 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (bankruptcy trustee not agent of United States for purposes of collecting withholding taxes); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 196 F.R.D. 57, 62 n.9 (S.D. Ohio 2000) (bankruptcy trustee "'"not an officer, agent or instrumentality of the United States"'" for purposes of determining whether seized materials were in custody of the United States). But see United States v. Lowell, 215 F.3d 1331, No. 99-3683, 2000 WL 51927 *1 (7th Cir.)(unpublished) (trustee a government officer for purposes of applying United States Sentencing Guidelines), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 891 (2000).

[7] By the same token, the United States Trustee and the Assistant United States Trustee are "officers" of the United States.

11 U.S.C. 307, "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this title * * *" (emphasis supplied). For purposes of a private party, such as Yamaha, invoking the 60-day period of Rule 4(a), the mere potential of the United States Trustee to become a party is insufficient. Otherwise, the 60-day period would apply to all bankruptcy cases, a result that, as shown above, was not contemplated by rule 4(a).

III.

THE SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES OF THIS CASE MAKE THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE A "PARTY" (Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)) TO THIS APPEAL

A. The UST Was "Heard" On The "Issue" (11 U.S.C. 307) In The Contested Matter, And Therefore Became A Party To That Matter

The Office of the United States Trustee becomes a party to a "[bankruptcy] case or proceeding" only by the exercise of its right to right to "raise * * * appear * * * and be heard on any issue."[8] 11 U.S.C. 307. See In re Lloyd Carr & Co., 617 F.2d

[8] We note that this analysis applies only to participation in contested matters or adversary proceedings. The United States Trustee routinely participates in administrative proceedings that do not involve an adversary process.

882, 883 n.1 (1st Cir. 1980) ("government's participation here was sufficiently active for Abrahams to invoke the 60-day limit of Rule 4(a)"). The keying of the party status of the United States Trustee to the exercise of the power granted by Section 307 furthers the philosophy underlying Rule 4, that this basic rule for defining when a notice of appeals must be filed should not be construed to create traps for the unwary. See Advisory Committee Notes to Rule 4. This goal is realized by making clear to the participants in the bankruptcy proceeding the instances in which the United States Trustee has become party. To require more than having been "heard" would create potential traps because it would require a difficult judgment to decide whether the extent participation by the United States Trustee sufficed to trigger the 60-day rule.

Here, in the contested matter, the UST was "heard" on the issue as to the sale of the golf carts in that Karonis questioned the prospective buyer of the carts. App. 237-238. Accordingly, Karonis, and through her the UST, became a "party" to the contested matter in the bankruptcy court, and thereby became a party to the subsequent appeal of that matter. See Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B).

B. That Karonis Was "Heard" In One Contested Matter Did Not Per Se Make The United States Trustee A "Party" To Any Other Such Matter Or Proceeding Within The Bankruptcy Case

As this Court has recognized, a bankruptcy case typically encompasses numerous distinct controversies. And, in appropriate cases, appeals may be taken with respect to final decisions reached in a contested matter or adversary proceedings without waiting for a resolution of the overall bankruptcy case. See Ponderosa, 992 F.2d at 5-6. The United States Trustee may exercise discretion to participate in one or more of such distinct controversies (11 U.S.C. 307).

But where, as is normally the case, the controversy or controversies in which the UST elects to participate are distinct from the other controversies within the same bankruptcy case, there is no warrant for holding that the UST has thereby become a party to such other controversies, much less the bankruptcy case as a whole. To hold otherwise would unjustifiably expand the applicability of the 60-day rule in bankruptcy cases. See In re Lloyd Carr & Co., 617 F.2d 882, 883 n.1 (1st Cir. 1980) ("the mere fact that the United States was a tax creditor in a civil bankruptcy proceeding would not, by itself, assure that the 60-day limit would be appropriate"); Serratto, 117 F.3d at 428 ("[i]t would substantially undermine Rule 4(a) to allow a party to subpoena the U.S. Trustee, however improperly, and thereby gain an additional 30 days in which to file a notice of appeal. As far as Rule 4(a) is concerned, the U.S. Trustee had no involvement in this litigation").

C. The District Court's Consolidation Of The Appeal In The Contested Matter, Where Karonis Was A Party, With That In The Closely Related Adversary Proceeding, Where Karonis Was Not A

Party, Made The United States Trustee A Party For Purposes Of Rule 4(a)

Although the U.S. Trustee did not participate in the district court's proceeding, it did not thereby lose its party status in the district court with respect to the contested matter. See United States v. LTV Corp., 746 F.2d 51, 53 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (per curiam) ("[p]arties to the [district court] record include the original parties and those who have become parties by intervention, substitution, or third-party practice"). And here, the district court consolidated "for all purposes" (emphasis supplied) Yamaha's appeals of the bankruptcy court's orders in the contested matter and the adversary proceeding.[9]

This Court has held that cases "consolidated for purposes of convenience and judicial efficiency" are treated as separate for purposes of appealability. But the Court has distinguished "cases consolidated into one action for all purposes." Bay State HMO Mgmt., Inc. v. Tingley Sys., Inc., 181 F.3d 174, 178-79 n.3 (1st Cir. 1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1187 (2000). Thus, by operation of the district court's consolidation order, Karonis (and through her the UST), who was a party to the contested

[9] Indeed, there was a close relationship between the contested matter, in which we consider Karonis to have been a party, and the adversary proceeding, in which she had no part. The issue of whether Yamaha had a lien on the 72 golf carts was germane to both disputes in that only a "party in interest" may object to a proposed sale by the case trustee. 11 U.S.C. 363(b). Thus, the order of the district court treats the existence of the lien as the core issue in the case.

matter, became a party to the entire consolidated case (which included the adversary proceeding)in the district court. Accordingly, the 60-day rule applied to Yamaha's notice of appeal, which was timely.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court has appellate jurisdiction in this case.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania

BRIEF OF APPELLEE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over this case under 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(1). The appellants timely appealed the bankruptcy court's final order dismissing their bankruptcy case to the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania. The district court had jurisdiction over that appeal under 28 U.S.C. 158(a)(1). The appellants timely filed a notice of appeal from the district court's order affirming the dismissal, and this Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. 158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Did the bankruptcy court err in dismissing the Yanickos' bankruptcy petition pursuant to section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

A. Nature of the Case.

The Yanickos challenge the dismissal of their chapter 7 bankruptcy case. The bankruptcy court dismissed their case pursuant to section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code after concluding it would be a substantial abuse of the Code to wipe away the Yanickos' debts given their conduct and given their ability to repay their creditors. On appeal, the district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision in all respects. This appeal followed.

B. Factual Background and Proceedings Below.

Daniel R. Yanicko, Jr. is a self-employed orthopedic surgeon. A43; A205.[1/] Dr. Yanicko lives with his wife, Cynthia J. Yanicko, in Sharon, Pennsylvania (A11), a town of 17,000 persons located within the Youngstown, Ohio Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area. Sharon has a low cost of living. The area's median home costs rank 123rd out of 129 SMSAs. See Median Home Prices Across the USA, Money, May 13, 1997, available in WESTLAW, Allnewsplus file (Youngstown SMSA's $72,100 median home price is 60% of the $119,400 national average).

In 1995, Dr. Yanicko earned $353,570 from his medical practice. A142. In 1994, he earned $317,947. A59. He earned $344,161 in 1993 (A61), and $461,741 in 1992 (A63). Mrs. Yanicko lists her occupation as housewife; she does not work outside the home. A43; A282.

The Yanickos experienced financial difficulties because they did not timely pay their federal income taxes. A251-A253. This occurred after Dr. Yanicko, who is self-employed, stopped withholding enough money from his draw to pay the taxes as they became due. In 1992, he withheld $107,600 in estimated taxes. A64. In 1993, he reduced this to $58,300. A62. In 1994, he reduced it to $4,000. A60. In 1995, he withheld nothing. A143. Because of his large 1992 withholdings, the Yanickos owed only $21,444 in taxes and penalties for 1992. A64. As he stopped withholding adequate amounts to meet his tax burdens, the Yanickos' tax liabilities increased to $41,886 for tax year 1993 (A62), $106,833 for 1994 (A60), and $113,498 for 1995 (A143).

The Yanickos met with bankruptcy counsel in November 1994. A330. Within a short period of time thereafter, they incurred $16,000 in credit card debt for consumer purchases (A258-A260; A321); within approximately two months that amount reached $30,000 (A330).

On June 29, 1995, the Yanickos filed a petition seeking protection under the debt liquidation provisions of chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. A11-A64. Their schedules listed assets of $567,364 and liabilities of $788,941. A13. The Yanickos filed an amended chapter 7 petition on October 19, 1995; it was not significantly different from their initial petition.[2] A65-101.

Much of the Yanickos' general unsecured debt arose from credit card purchases and consumer loans. A82-A88. They owed money on five different American Express accounts, an AT&T Universal card, a Chase Advantage card, a Chemical Bank Shell MasterCard, a Citibank Visa card, a Discover card, an Express Gold card, an MBNA America-MasterCard, an MBNA America-Visa card, and a GM card. Id. Their schedule of unsecured claims lists seventeen additional debts arising from consumer purchases. Id.

The Yanickos' bankruptcy schedules evidenced an intent to live lavishly while in bankruptcy. A44. In them, the Yanickos claimed they needed $16,945 monthly for living expenses, including $635 each month for clothing and $1,500 a month for food. Id. Their schedules reveal they owned four vehicles, a Cadillac DeVille, a Chevrolet Suburban, an Oldsmobile Cutlass, and a GMC Sierra truck. A21. The Yanickos stated in their petition that they intended to keep and maintain all four. A216-

[2] The Yanickos subsequently prepared an amended Schedule J, which lists expenditures, but did not file it prior to the evidentiary hearing on the motion to dismiss their case. A201.

A218; A26; A46; A47. They also owned two homes, one of which they sought to sell, and a parcel of land. A209-A211; A14.

The Yanickos’ petition revealed their intention to reaffirm the indebtedness securing their houses and cars, and their list of expenditures included debt service for them. A44; A26; A46; A47; A217-A218. On the other hand, the Yanickos’ general unsecured creditors, who are owed $244,921 (A40; A325), would receive nothing because the Yanickos’ secured and priority unsecured debts of $544,020 (A29; A31; A324-A325) exceed their $481,548 in nonexempt assets[3/] (A13; A26; A324). A chapter 7 discharge would, however, free the Yanickos from these debts because general unsecured claims in a chapter 7 case are paid from pre-petition “property of the estate,” not post-petition income, regardless of how substantial that income may be. 11 U.S.C. 541, 726, 727(b).

While in bankruptcy, the Yanickos maintained a lavish lifestyle. They employed full-time domestic help. A226-A228; A320. They remodeled their house. A212; A328. They maintained their country-club privileges — at a cost of $200 a month plus a $200 minimum quarterly dining charge plus assessments. A219; A245-A246; A309; A319. They kept four cars. A216-A218; A309. Mrs. Yanicko spent more than $1,700 for clothes at one store alone. A323. The family spent at least another $4,500 for clothes. A324. The Yanickos spent more than $1,300 on what they termed "mother's day[s] out." Id. They spent more than $800 purchasing videotapes rather than watching cable or borrowing videos from the local library. A274-A275; A281-A282; A322. They maintained two cellular phones. A211-A212. They spent $800 on jewelry. A277; A279; A280; A323. They spent approximately $1,750 on toys. A271-A274; A278; A280-A281; A322. They spent $1,500 each month on food. A44; A271. Between November 1995 and May 1996 they spent more than $2,000 on their dogs. A323.

The Yanickos also preferred certain pre-petition unsecured creditors by making selective post-petition payments to them. A224-A226; A298-A299; A329. These included Mellon Bank and Visa. Id.

On October 20, 1995, the United States Trustee moved to dismiss the Yanickos' bankruptcy case pursuant to section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code.[4/] A102-A104. The debtors opposed the Section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes dismissal of a chapter 7 case if a debtor has primarily consumer debts — a fact the Yanickos concede, and if it would constitute substantial abuse to give the debtor chapter 7 relief. The Yanickos allege the record does not support the bankruptcy court's finding of substantial abuse. Although this Court has not had occasion to construe this term, the Fourth, Sixth, Eighth and Ninth circuits have. These courts employ slightly different tests, but that is not significant to this appeal because the bankruptcy court concluded the Yanickos' case constitutes substantial abuse under all of them, and because this case is a textbook example of substantial abuse. The Yanickos sought to discharge their lawful debts even though they have the ability to repay them; they went on a buying spree before filing bankruptcy; they filed schedules that evidenced their intent to continue living lavishly; they lived extravagantly while in bankruptcy; and they tried to prefer some of their pre-petition creditors.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court acted appropriately in dismissing the Yanickos' petition for substantial abuse. Section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 707(b), authorizes a bankruptcy court, upon its own motion or upon that of the United States Trustee, to dismiss a debtor's chapter 7 petition if two conditions are met. First, the debts must be primarily consumer debts. This prong is not at issue in this case. A325. The Yanickos acknowledge they have "primarily consumer debts" (A12; A66) and their trial counsel conceded "[t]here is no dispute that these are consumer debts" (A300).

Section 707(b) allows the dismissal of a consumer debt case if "granting of relief would be a substantial abuse of the provisions of this chapter." Section 707(b) establishes a presumption in favor of granting the relief sought by the debtor.

Neither the Bankruptcy Code nor its legislative history define substantial abuse. Green v. Staples (In re Green), 934 F.2d 568, 570-71 (4th Cir. 1991). See also In re Ontiveros, 198 B.R. 284, 288 (C.D. Ill. 1996) (describing the absence of meaningful legislative history).

This Court has not had occasion to interpret this term. Other circuits have created three tests to help determine whether a case constitutes substantial abuse. The Eighth and Ninth Circuits hold that the "primary factor" evidencing substantial abuse is a "bankrupt [who has an] ability to pay his debts out of his income." United States Trustee v. Harris, 960 F.2d 74, 76 (8th Cir. 1992); Zolg v. Kelly (In re Kelly), 841 F.2d 908, 914-15 (9th Cir. 1988). These courts will dismiss a case based solely upon a debtor's ability to use future income to repay a substantial portion of its debt. Id. They espouse this test because it preserves "the bankruptcy courts' ability to dismiss cases filed by debtors who are not dishonest, but who also are not needy." Harris, 960 F.2d at 76 (quoting In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981, 983 (8th Cir. 1989)). This test also has the advantage of relying upon objective data. It measures a debtor's income stream against the amount of its debt.

The Fourth Circuit prefers a more subjective test, which it characterizes as a totality of the circumstances test. Green, 934 F.2d at 572. It places greater emphasis on determining whether a debtor has acted appropriately in seeking bankruptcy protection. In determining whether substantial abuse exists, the Fourth Circuit will consider, among other things, whether the bankruptcy is a product of sudden illness, calamity, disability, or unemployment; whether the debtor has made consumer purchases far in excess of its ability to repay; whether the debtor's proposed family budget is excessive or unreasonable; whether the debtor's schedules and statement of current income and expenses are reasonable and accurate; and whether the petition has been filed in good faith.[6] Id.

The Fourth Circuit agrees with the Eighth and Ninth circuits, however, that a court may consider a debtor’s ability to repay. Id. (court may consider “the relation of the debtor’s future income to his future necessary expenses”). See In re Smurthwaite, 149 B.R. 409, 410 (Bankr. N.D.W. Va. 1992) (Green “gave considerable weight to the debtor’s ability to repay as a factor which it should consider”).

The Sixth Circuit allows courts to consider a debtor’s conduct and its ability to repay. In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123, 126-27 (6th Cir. 1989) (court may consider a number of factors, including: the ability to repay — and “that factor alone may be sufficient to warrant dismissal”; “eve of bankruptcy purchases”; whether unforeseen or catastrophic events caused the bankruptcy; whether the debtor has a “stable source of future income”; whether the debtor’s schedules evidence good faith; and whether expenses can be reduced significantly).

[6] The Fourth Circuit does not require that all five criteria be analyzed in every case. Instead, courts must reach decisions on a “case-by-case basis.” Green, 934 F.2d at 572. Accord Kestell v. Kestell (In re Kestell), 99 F.3d 146, 149-50 (4th Cir. 1996) (dismissing pursuant to section 707(b) for lack of good faith because the debtor “sought to avoid paying what he owe[d] to [one specific creditor,] his former wife[,]” without analyzing the other four Green factors).

It not necessary for this Court to adopt one of these tests to determine this appeal because the bankruptcy court held the Yanickos' case constitutes substantial abuse "[u]nder any test we might use." A327. The court found that their misconduct and their ability to repay their debts each justified dismissal.[7] A325-A331.

The bankruptcy court properly dismissed the Yanickos' petition based upon the evidence before it. The Yanickos "suffered no sudden illness, calamity, disability, or unemployment which forced them into bankruptcy." A330. See Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (citing this as a factor justifying dismissal); Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (same).

Their irresponsible eve of bankruptcy spending spree justified the dismissal of their case. A330. See Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (citing such purchases as meriting dismissal); Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (same). So did their proposed budget, which was "unreasonable and excessive." A331. See Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (citing this as a factor justifying dismissal). Rather than demonstrating an intent to rectify their financial problems, the [7] The United States Trustee believes bankruptcy courts should be free to consider all relevant factors but should dismiss a case whenever a debtor has an ability to substantially repay its debts. There is no wisdom in denying repayment to a creditor of an affluent but honest debtor while allowing recovery to a creditor whose debtor is no more well-to-do but is less reputable. Both creditors have the same losses and their debtors have the same ability to alleviate them.

Yanickos' "budget reflect[ed] their intent to continue to live in [lavish] fashion." A331.

The Yanickos' extravagant expenditures while in bankruptcy similarly called their good faith into question. A331. See Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (citing bad faith as a basis for dismissal). This fashionable lifestyle included full-time domestic help (A226-A228; A320); remodeling (A212; A328); country-club privileges (A219; A245-A246; A309; A319); four cars (A216-A218; A309); excessive clothing purchases[8] (A323; A324); $1,300 for "mother's day[s] out" (A324); purchasing hundreds of dollars of videotapes rather than watching cable or borrowing tapes from the local library, and purchasing $1,700 in toys[9] (A271-A274; A274-A275; A278; A280-A281; A281-A282; A322); maintaining cellular phones (A211-A212); buying jewelry (A277; A279; A280; A323); spending $1,500 a month on food[10] (A44; A271); and spending more than $2,000 on their dogs (A323).

While in bankruptcy, the Yanickos also preferred certain unsecured creditors over others. A224-A226; A298-A299. "A major purpose of the bankruptcy process is the equitable distribution of a bankrupt's assets among creditors." Kestell, 99 F.3d at 150. In Kestell, the court dismissed under section 707(b) for bad faith because a debtor tried to avoid lawful payments to his former wife while paying all other creditors. Id. The Yanickos' attempt to prefer some creditors similarly evidences bad faith, and buttresses the bankruptcy court's decision to dismiss their case.

The bankruptcy court also dismissed the Yanickos' case because they have the ability to repay their creditors. A327-A331. The court found the Yanickos have monthly take-home pay of $13,416 after payment of their tax liabilities.[11/] A327-A328. The court concluded the Yanickos could reasonably reduce their monthly expenses to $7,378 by cutting costs nine ways. A329-A330.

Their ability to reduce expenses means there is "no question that the Debtors have an ability to repay creditors." A330. By making reasonable cutbacks in their lifestyle, the Yanickos can pay their creditors more than $6,000 a month, more than $72,000 a year. A327-A330. After June 1998, when they will satisfy their [11/] The Internal Revenue Service's claim for back taxes (A81) is a priority unsecured claim that survives discharge. See 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(1)(A) and 507(a)(8). To meet this obligation, the Yanickos worked out a voluntary non-binding repayment plan with the IRS. A232; A294. The bankruptcy court found, however, that "the only reason [they are] making an effort to pay the IRS is that it has greater powers than any other creditor." A311.

prior tax liabilities — and thereby reduce their debt by well more than $100,000 (A31), the Yanickos will have an additional $5,000 a month to pay to creditors (A316; A327-A328; A329-A330), bringing that total up to $130,000 a year. Thus, given the Yanickos' assets and liabilities (A324-A325), they can fully repay all their debts within a few years — even assuming they neither extend the life of their debt service nor negotiate any forgiveness of debt.[12] A330.

The Yanickos are the masters of their financial future. They can repay their debts. A330. They can seek relief under the debt reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Code if they need breathing room to reorganize their debts. A330. Indeed, the bankruptcy court did not bar them from filing another chapter 7 petition (A310), and they could do so if their financial circumstances worsen.

[12] The Yanickos allege the bankruptcy court dismissed their case based upon an erroneous belief they could file a chapter 13 proceeding. Appellants' brief at 12-16. This misstates the record. The bankruptcy court indicated at the hearing that it was unsure whether the Yanickos qualified for chapter 13. A303-A305; A310. Moreover, the court's opinion relied upon Fonder v. United States, 974 F.2d 996, 999 (8th Cir. 1992) to hold that "a debtor need not be eligible for Chapter 13 relief before his Chapter 7 case can be dismissed under §707(b)." A330; see also MO5(rejecting the Yanickos' argument on this point). Accord Krohn, 886 F.2d at 127 ("inability to qualify under Chapter 13 should not be dispositive of whether" to dismiss under 707(b)). Fonder and Krohn accurately state the law; no provision in the Code conditions dismissal upon an ability to obtain chapter 13 relief.

But this case should have been, and properly was, dismissed. "At no point in the [Yanickos'] history, either before or after filing for chapter 7 relief, ha[ve] the debtor[s] shown a sincere resolve to repay [their] obligations and/or to reduce [their] monthly expenses." Krohn, 886 F.2d at 127. The Yanickos will profit as much as their creditors from some "good, old-fashioned belt tightening." Id.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the decisions of the bankruptcy and district courts dismissing the Yanickos' bankruptcy case.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b), and 1334(a) to issue its final order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss the Debtors' chapter 7 bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(1) and (b)(3)(B). The bankruptcy court issued its order granting the United States Trustee's motion on October 23, 2009. The Debtors filed a notice of appeal on October 30, 2009, which is timely under 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a) and (c)(2). This Court has appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), a statutory provision under which district courts have jurisdiction to hear appeals from final judgments, orders, and decrees of bankruptcy judges.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

On appeal "conclusions of law are reviewed de novo, findings of fact are reviewed for clear error, and mixed questions of law and fact are reviewed de novo." In re National Gypsum Co., 208 F. 3d 498, 503 (5th Cir. 2000).

In determining whether providing chapter 7 relief to a debtor would constitute abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3), bankruptcy courts apply a "totality of the circumstances" test to the debtor's financial situation. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). The "totality of the circumstances" test is a "fact-intensive determination" which is reviewed on appeal for abuse of discretion. Cf. Hebbring v. U.S. Trustee, 463 F.3d 902, 907-08 (9th Cir. 2006) (pre-2005 Act case).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED

The sole issue in this appeal is whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in finding that the filing of this bankruptcy case was abusive under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On May 31, 2009, the Debtors sought chapter 7 bankruptcy relief in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Texas. See 11 U.S.C. § 701 et seq. On August 13, 2009, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss the Debtors' case for abuse under 11 U.S.C.§§ 707(b)(1) and (b)(3)(B). See 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(1) and (b)(3)(B). On September 2, 2009, the Debtors filed a response to the motion to dismiss. On October 23, 2009, the bankruptcy court entered an order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. This appeal followed.

STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

I. Relief Available to Individual Debtors

The Bankruptcy Code establishes two primary forms of bankruptcy relief for individual debtors – chapter 7 and chapter 13. Under chapter 7, "an individual debtor receives an immediate unconditional discharge of personal liability for certain debts in exchange for relinquishing his or her nonexempt assets to a bankruptcy trustee for liquidation and distribution to creditors." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10, as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 701-727. Under chapter 13, "a debtor commits to repay some portion of his or her financial obligations" over a specified period "in exchange for retaining nonexempt assets and receiving a broader discharge of debt than is available under chapter 7." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 1321-1330.

The difference between chapter 7 and 13 is dramatic. In chapter 7 cases, creditors may look solely to debtors' pre-bankruptcy, non-exempt assets for payment. See 11 U.S.C. § 541 (limiting property of the estate to debtors' pre-petition assets). Debtors' post-bankruptcy income is not subject to creditor claims. Id. Subject to narrow exceptions, debtors receive a complete discharge of all their pre-petition debts in a chapter 7 case. See 11 U.S.C. § 727(b).

Chapter 13 is different because debtors must use post-petition income to fund a chapter 13 payment plan. See 11 U.S.C. § 1306(a)(2) (property of the bankruptcy estate also includes post-petition income); 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b) (projected disposable income applied to make payments to unsecured creditors). In chapter 13, debtors typically receive a discharge only after they have completed their chapter 13 repayment plans. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 1328(a) and (c); see also 11 U.S.C. § 1328(b) (listing exceptions to this rule).

II. Former Section 707(b): Dismissal of Chapter 7 Cases for Substantial Abuse

Since 1984, Congress has enacted a series of tests that have allowed courts to dismiss chapter 7 cases to prevent the unjust discharge of pre-petition debts. In 1984, Congress amended chapter 7 to permit dismissal of a chapter 7 bankruptcy petition under § 707(b) if a court found "substantial abuse." Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-353, § 312, 98 Stat. 333, 335. Congress enacted this amendment to respond "to concerns that some debtors who could easily pay their creditors might resort to chapter 7 to avoid their obligations." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12 (internal quotation omitted). Two years later, Congress again amended this provision to authorize the United States Trustee to seek dismissal of chapter 7 petitions for "substantial abuse." Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-554, § 21, 100 Stat. 3088, 3101.

After twenty years' experience, Congress found that these amendments were insufficient to control abuse of chapter 7. Congress identified, among other problems, the "inherent[] vague[ness]" of the "substantial abuse" standard, which led to disagreement in the courts about whether a debtor's ability to repay a significant portion of his or her debts out of future income constitutes substantial abuse, meriting dismissal. H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12. Another problem was that the Bankruptcy Code established "a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor," which influenced courts' decisions whether to find substantial abuse. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (2000 suppl. 4); See H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 12.

Responding to these perceived shortcomings of the Bankruptcy Code, Congress held hearings over five years to identify what reforms it could adopt "to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 2, 12. The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (the "2005 Act"), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, implemented the reforms Congress identified.

III. Changes Under the 2005 Act

On October 17, 2005, most provisions of the 2005 Act took effect, thereby implementing significant changes to the Bankruptcy Code. In enacting the 2005 Act, Congress:

> concluded that the complete overhaul of § 707(b) was necessary, with clear, non-discretionary requirements imposed on the bankruptcy court to reject the notion that debtors were entitled to a discharge as a matter of right without regard to their ability to pay and to assure that in practice those with the ability to pay would not be entitled to chapter 7 relief.

146 Cong. Rec. S11700 (December 7, 2000) (citing, Sen. Rep. No. 253, 105th Cong., 2nd Sess., and Sen. Rep. No. 540, 105th Cong., 2nd Sess.); see also 151 Cong. Rec. S1856 (Mar. 1, 2005). Congress enacted the section 707(b) amendments to curb bankruptcy abuse by, inter alia, dismissing chapter 7 cases filed by debtors seeking to have their debts discharged despite having the ability to repay their creditors. See 151 Cong. Rec. S1856 (Mar. 1, 2005) (statement of Sen. Charles Grassley).[1] To effectuate this goal, Congress took four important steps.

First, Congress repealed the statutory presumption in favor of granting relief to the debtor.

[1] In his statement, Senator Grassley explained the purpose behind the section 707(b) amendments as follows: "[i]t is this simple: if repayment is possible, then [a debtor] will be channeled into chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code which requires people to repay a portion of their debt. . . ." Id.

Compare 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (1986) with 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (2005).

Second, Congress lowered the standard for dismissal under all subsections of new section 707(b) from "substantial abuse" to mere "abuse." See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) (cases are now dismissed for "abuse"); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) (subjecting cases to dismissal for abuse); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) (same).

Third, Congress authorized dismissal when a mathematical formula, known as the "means test," yields monthly disposable income that exceeds a statutory threshold. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

Fourth, Congress enacted new § 707(b)(3). This section allows courts to dismiss cases based upon either a debtor's bad faith, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or the totality of a debtor's financial circumstances, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). Thus, even if a presumption of abuse does not arise or is rebutted under section 707(b)(2), a chapter 7 petition should still be dismissed for abuse under section 707(b)(3) when "bad faith" is demonstrated or "the totality of the circumstances . . . of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A) and (B); In re Ross-Tousey, 549 F.3d 1148, 1161-62 (7th Cir. 2008).

Sections 707(b)(3)(A) and (B) of the 2005 Act represent a significant departure from old section 707(b) because they clarify that cases can be dismissed either solely for misconduct, under subsection 707(b)(3)(A), or solely based upon the totality of the circumstances of a debtor's financial situation, under section 707(b)(3)(B).

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

On May 31, 2009, the Debtors filed a voluntary petition for relief under the liquidation provisions of chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Texas. See Appellee's Designation of Record (hereinafter "Appellee R.") No. 2. The Debtors own real property located in Littleton, Colorado valued at $185,000. See Appellee R. 6. The Debtors do not live there. See Appellee R. 2, 6. Instead, one of the Debtors' parents does. See Appellee R. 6. The Debtors spend $1,560.39 each month to cover two mortgages on the Colorado home. See Appellee R. 3. Beyond supporting that house, the Debtors also spend $2,415.25 each month to lease an apartment in Austin, Texas. See Appellee R. 6.

Mr. Yuan is an Investment Analyst with Employees' Retirement System of Texas. See Appellee R. 6. He earns roughly $7,500 in gross monthly income. See Appellee R. 6. His wife chooses not to work. See Appellee R. 6. They have one dependent child. See Appellee R. 6.

Based on these factors, among others, the United States Trustee, on August 13, 2009, filed a motion to dismiss the Debtors' bankruptcy case for abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(1) and (3) because the totality of the Debtors' financial situation demonstrated they could maintain a different lifestyle while repaying a meaningful portion of their debts.[2] See Appellee R. 4. Shortly thereafter, on September 2, 2009, the Debtors opposed the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. See Appellee R. 5.

On October 22, 2009, the bankruptcy court conducted a hearing on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. See Appellee R. 11. At that hearing, the parties stipulated as to the following facts regarding the Debtors' case:

- Mr. Yuan is currently employed as an investment analyst with the Employees Retirement System of Texas;

---

[2] The United States Trustee's motion was not brought under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). See Appellee R. 4.

- Ms. Eichhorst is unemployed;
- The Debtors’ gross monthly income is $7,500.00;
- The Debtors’ net take home income is $5,728.78;
- The Debtors’ monthly rent expense for their apartment located at 801 W. 5th St., Austin, TX, is $2,415.25;
- The Debtors spend an additional $1,560.39 per month for two mortgages on a Colorado home in which Mr. Yuan’s parents live;
- The Debtors’ monthly rental expense is 32% of their gross monthly income, and 42% of their net take home income;
- When the Debtors’ rental expense is combined with their Colorado mortgage expenses, the Debtors spend 53% of their gross monthly income on housing, and 69% of their net monthly take home income on housing;
- The Debtors’ unsecured debt totals $413,150.82;
- The Debtors’ credit card debt totals $201,305.00, or nearly half of the Debtors’ unsecured debt; and
- The Debtors’ $202,786.54 secured debt results from the two mortgages the Debtors’ placed on the Colorado home in which Mr. Yuan’s parents live.

See Appellee R. 11, at 5:13-7:25.[3] The Debtors also proffered testimony from Mr. Yuan, regarding, inter alia, the facts and circumstances leading to the Debtors’ bankruptcy filing, their support of Mr. Yuan’s parents, and Mr. Yuan’s status as co-guardian of his niece. See Appellee R. 11, at 8:5-8:23; 9:3-9:12.

After considering the facts before it, as well as Mr. Yuan’s proffered testimony, the bankruptcy court found that the Debtors’ case constituted an abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§

[3] The parties stipulations of fact were also filed with the bankruptcy court on or about the time of the hearing on the motion to dismiss. See Appellee R. 7.

707(b)(1) and (3), and that the dismissal of the Debtors' case was proper. See Appellee R. 11, at 27:6-36:20. The bankruptcy court based its ruling on lifestyle choices made by the Debtors affecting their ability to repay their creditors. See Appellee R. 11, at 29:4-29:9. Specifically, the bankruptcy court identified Mr. Yuan's support for his family in Colorado, and his decision to live in a downtown rental in Austin, as choices taking up a significant component of the Debtors' income. See Appellee R. 11, at 30:5-31:8. In considering these lifestyle choices, the bankruptcy court noted that the overriding theme it was tasked with looking at was "whether or not at the end of the day it's appropriate for the creditors to take a complete hit and not be paid a penny, not be paid a dime on the debts that were incurred in this case because the Debtors made choices about supporting parents in Colorado, about living in downtown Austin. . . ." See Appellee R. 11, at 32:6-32:11. The bankruptcy court found that "regrettably for the Debtors at the end of the day if I were to put those on a scale, the portion of the scale that I think tips more is in favor of the creditors." See Appellee R. 11, at 32:12-32:14. In doing so, the bankruptcy court expressed its belief that the Debtors "could make alternative choices and at the end of the day pay something to their creditors." See Appellee R. 11, at 34:2-34:4 (emphasis added). Thus, the bankruptcy court concluded that it was not appropriate to allow the Debtors to proceed in chapter 7 and obtain a discharge.[4] See Appellee R. 11, at 34:6-34:10. On October 30, 2009, the Debtors timely appealed that decision to this Court. See Appellee R. 8.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court's order dismissing the Debtors' chapter 7 petition should be

[4] A copy of the bankruptcy court's order dismissing the Debtors' case is appended to the Debtors' October 30, 2009 motion for leave to appeal. See Case No. A09-CA-833SS, Dkt. No. 2.

affirmed. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding abuse under section 707(b)(3)(B)'s "totality of the financial situation" inquiry, and that the Debtors have and did have an ability to make alternative lifestyle choices and thereby pay something to their creditors. In making these findings, the bankruptcy court properly applied the statutory framework of new section 707(b)(3)(B) when it found that the totality of the circumstances of the Debtors' financial situation demonstrated abuse. The court considered all circumstances pertinent to the Debtors' financial situation and correctly concluded that they have the financial ability to repay a portion of their unsecured debts. The Debtors' challenges to the bankruptcy court's dismissal are premised upon an incorrect understanding of section 707(b)(3)(B) and lifestyle choices that the bankruptcy court properly determined to be unacceptable in light of the Debtors' request for a discharge of all of their unsecured debts.

ARGUMENT

I. Under the New Section 707(b)(3)(B), the Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion in Relying upon the "Totality of the Debtors' Financial Situation" to Dismiss the Debtors' Chapter 7 Petition

Under new section 707(b)(3)(B), a court deciding whether to dismiss a chapter 7 case must consider whether "the totality of the circumstances (including whether the debtor seeks to reject a personal services contract and the financial need for such rejection as sought by the debtor) of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B). By inserting the phrase "financial situation" in the 2005 Act, Congress signaled a departure from, and narrowing of, the old totality of the circumstances test. See Connecticut Nat'l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253 (1992) (stating that the interpretation of a statute should not render any word superfluous).

Two changes in the statutory language are particularly significant. First, the presumption against a finding of abuse is gone. Compare 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (1986) with 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)

(2005); In re Wolf, 390 B.R. 825, 831-32 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2008). Second, the standard for finding abuse has been lowered from "substantial abuse" to mere "abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1)-(3). Accordingly, the best reading of new section 707(b)(3)(B) is: if the debtor's financial circumstances demonstrate an ability to pay a meaningful portion of his debts to his creditors, that fact should lead a court to dismiss a chapter 7 case for abuse.

This is consistent with most pre-2005 Act circuit court decisions interpreting old section 707(b). They opined, a debtor's ability to repay a meaningful portion of debt, standing alone, justified dismissal under the heightened test prescribed by the old statute. See, e.g., In re Stewart, 175 F.3d 796, 809 (10th Cir. 1999); In re Kornfield, 164 F.3d 778, 784 (2d Cir. 1999); In re Lamanna, 153 F.3d 1, 4-5 (1st Cir. 1998); In re Kelley, 841 F.2d 908 (9th Cir. 1998); In re Koch, 109 F.3d 1285, 1288 (8th Cir. 1997); In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123 (6th Cir. 1989). No less is true under new section 707(b)(3)(B), in which Congress lowered the bar for dismissing cases.

While Congress did not define the term "financial situation" in new section 707(b)(3)(B), this Court should give it its ordinary meaning. Asgrow Seed Co. v. Winterboer, 513 U.S. 179, 187 (1995) (citations omitted). Both the ordinary meaning and the case law interpretation of 'financial situation' demonstrate that a bankruptcy court should dismiss a chapter 7 case under new section 707(b)(3)(B) when the financial factors of a debtor's income, expenses, assets, and liabilities so warrant.

As a starting point, a debtor's "financial situation" consists of the debtor's reasonable income and expenses. Ross-Tousey, 549 F.3d at 1162 (court may consider actual income and expenses); In re Mestemaker, 359 B.R. 849, 854-55 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007). Within this inquiry, however, a court must determine and balance "multiple factors," constrained only to the extent that those factors must be economic. In re Wolf, 390 B.R. at 832; In re Haar, 373 B.R. 493, 500 (N.D.

The "financial situation" factors that a bankruptcy court may consider include: the debtor's assets, liabilities, expenses, and expected future income, and whether any of the debtor's obligations are secured by unnecessary luxury goods. In short, financial factors that are relevant to the determination of the debtor's ability to pay creditors should fall under the bankruptcy's scrutiny. Wolf, 390 B.R. at 833 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2008) ("The plain meaning of "financial situation" must necessarily include the debtor's ability to pay creditors."); Haar, 373 B.R. at 500.

The intent behind the enactment of the statute bolsters this reading. The 2005 amendments were designed to "respond to many of the factors contributing to the increase in consumer bankruptcy filings, such as lack of personal financial accountability, the proliferation of serial filings, and the absence of effective oversight to eliminate abuse in the system." Perlin v. Hitachi Capital Am. Corp., 497 F.3d 364, 371 (3d Cir. 2007) (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 109-31(I), at 2). By specifying "financial situation," Congress underscored its concern that chapter 7 be reserved for debtors who truly could not repay their creditors by amending the statute. United States v. Am. Trucking Ass'ns, 310 U.S. 534, 543 (1940) (stating that the words of a statute are the best indication of its purpose). This is borne out by the legislative history that expressed that "debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 2, 12.

The bankruptcy court below did not ignore any financial factors in its analysis. Indeed, it carefully considered the Debtors' income, assets, liabilities, and expenditures as required under section 707(b)(3)(B). See Appellee R. 11, at 27:6-36:20. The record before the bankruptcy court demonstrated, inter alia, that:

- Mr. Yuan is currently employed as an investment analyst with the Employees Retirement System of Texas. See Appellee R. 11, at 6:13-6:14; Appellee R. 7.

- Mr. Yuan's gross monthly salary is $7,500.00, and he nets $5,728.78 per month. See Appellee R. 11, at 6:14-6:15; Appellee R. 7.

- The Debtors' monthly rent expense for their Austin apartment is $2,415.25, representing 32% of Mr. Yuan's gross monthly income, 42% of his net take home income, and twice the IRS mortgage or rent allowance for a family of three in Travis County, Texas. See Appellee R. 11, at 7:4-7:5, 7:14-7:17; Appellee R. 7.

- The Debtors spend an additional $1,560.39 per month for two mortgages on a Colorado home in which Mr. Yuan's parents live. See Appellee R. 11, at 6:4-6:6, 7:1-7:3; Appellee R. 6, 7.

- When the Debtors' rental expense is combined with their Colorado mortgage expenses, the Debtors spend 53% of their gross monthly income on housing, and 69% of their net monthly take home income on housing. See Appellee R. 11, at 7:5-7:7; Appellee R. 7.

- The Debtors' unsecured debt totals $413,150.82, of which nearly half is credit card debt. See Appellee R. 11, at 6:6-6:8; Appellee R. 6, 7.

Each of these financial factors tipped the scale in favor of a finding of abuse in the Debtors' case. See Appellee R. 11, at 27:6-36:20. While the Debtors do not agree with how the bankruptcy court balanced these factors with the factors they presented to the court, that does not mean that the bankruptcy court was wrong to consider them, see, e.g., In re Crink, 402 B.R. 159 (Bankr. M.D. N.C. 2009) (considering excessive housing costs as part of a section 707(b)(3)(B) analysis),[5] and it certainly does not mean that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in finding abuse. Rather, because the bankruptcy court properly reviewed the totality of the Debtors' financial circumstances, as required under section 707(b)(3)(B), its order should be affirmed.

II. The Debtors' Legal Arguments are Unavailing

A. Section 707(b)(2)'s "Means Test" Is Irrelevant to the Totality of the Financial Circumstances Analysis under Section 707(b)(3)(B)

The 2005 Act creates a two-step financial analysis for determining if a chapter 7 petition should be dismissed. The first is a mechanical calculation under section 707(b)(2), known as the "means test." The second is a subjective analysis under section 707(b)(3)(B). The plain language of the statute demonstrates that these subsections perform two distinct functions in determining whether a debtor is eligible for a discharge.

The means test, namely the calculations mandated by section 707(b)(2)(A)(i)-(iv), reflects congressional intent that there be an "easily applied formula" to create a presumption of abuse. In re Henebury, 361 B.R. 595, 602-03 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007). "Passing the means test" merely means that the court will not "presume abuse exists;" it is not a determination that the debtor is entitled to relief under chapter 7. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(i); In re Lenton, 358 B.R. 651, 660-61 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 2006); In re Booker, 399 B.R. 662, 666 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 2009) (stating that the results of the "means test" are "not dispositive").

The means test does more than identify abusive chapter 7 debtors. In re Fowler, 349 B.R. 414, 420 (Bankr. D. Del. 2006). It also establishes the burden of proof between the debtor and the moving party, usually the United States Trustee. Lenton, 358 B.R. at 660. If the debtor passes the means test, then the United States Trustee has the burden of proof to show abuse. In re Parada, 391

Moreland, case No. 05-10519, 2005 WL 1925460 (Bankr. M.D. N.C. Aug. 3, 2005) (same).

B.R. 492, 496 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2008). In contrast, debtors who fail the means test must show that a special circumstance exists that would make them eligible for chapter 7 relief. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B)(I). Therefore, the Debtors' argument that certain provisions of the means test are somehow incorporated into section 707(b)(3)(B)'s totality of the circumstances analysis[6] is incorrect. See Ross-Tousey, 549 F.3d at 1161-62 (ruling cases that pass section 707(b)(2)(A)'s means test remain subject to dismissal under new section 707(b)(3)(B)).

Instead, the "developing body of case law" confirms a relationship between the means test and section 707(b)(3)(B) that amounts to an objective evaluation of a debtor's financial circumstances followed by a more subjective, flexible consideration of whether discharge is appropriate considering the financial circumstances. See In re McGillis, 370 B.R. 720, 747 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 2007).

The means test is a mechanical, objective application to determine only whether there is a presumption of abuse. Morse v. Rudler (In re Rudler), 576 F.3d 37, 51 (1st Cir. 2009). It is not meant to be a conclusive or comprehensive analysis of whether granting the debtor relief would be an abuse of chapter 7. Toward that end, Congress designed section 707(b)(3)(B) to be a subjective look at the totality of the debtor's financial circumstances. See In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123, 126-27 (6th Cir. 1989) (broad-ranging analysis).

As the Debtors' correctly suggest, section 707(b)(2)'s means test, under appropriate circumstances, allows debtors to deduct secured debt and support related expenses in calculating whether a presumption of abuse arises. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II) (providing, inter alia, that a debtor may deduct actual expenses that are reasonable and necessary for the care and support of an elderly member of the debtor's immediate family); 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) (providing that a debtor may deduct her average monthly secured debt payments scheduled as contractually due during the 60 months following the date of the petition). However, neither section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II) or section 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) are referenced anywhere in section 707(b)(3)(A). If Congress uses particular language in one section of the statute but not in another, it is "generally presumed that Congress acts intentionally and purposely in the disparate inclusion or exclusion." Russello v. United States, 464 U.S. 16, 23 (1983) (citation omitted). Accordingly, this Court should conclude that the inclusion of secured debt and support related expenses in section 707(b)(2)'s means test has no bearing on section 707(b)(3)(B)'s totality of the financial circumstances analysis.

Indeed, the Seventh Circuit, in a post-2005 Act case, rejected the Debtors' reading of section 707(b)(3)(B) on similar grounds. See Ross-Tousey, 549 F.3d at 1161-62 (ruling that passing the means test does not foreclose a section 707)(b)(3)(B) analysis). See also Crink, 402 B.R. at 168-69 (reaching same conclusion as Ross-Tousey); Booker, 399 B.R. at 666 (same); In re Baeza, 398 B.R. 692, 697-98 (Bankr. B. In the Context of a Section 707(b)(3)(B) Analysis, the Debtors' Moral Obligations to Their Family Members Do Not Alter the Text of Section

707(b)(3)(B) or Their Legal Obligations to Their Creditors Under the Bankruptcy Code

The Debtors suggest that, in the context of a section 707(b)(3)(B) analysis, their moral obligations to their family members should somehow trump their legal obligations to their creditors. See Appellant's Br. at 12-14. While the Debtors' decision to support their family members (in the form of continued mortgage payments for a home in Colorado in which Mr. Yuan's parents live but the Debtors do not) is commendable, it is not supported by the law in the context of a section 707(b)(3)(B) analysis. See, e.g., In re Siemen, 294 B.R. 276, 279 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2003) (debtors cannot subsidize family members at expense of creditors); In re Staub, 256 B.R. 567, 570 (Bankr. M.D. Pa. 2000) (same); In re Haddad, 246 B.R. 27, 32 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 2000) (same); In re Duncan, 201 B.R. 889, 897 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 1996) (same); In re Mastromarino, 197 B.R. 171, 178-79 (Bankr. D. Me. 1996) (citing eight cases in support of same conclusion). The bankruptcy court below recognized this, and properly rejected this argument. See Appellee R. 11, at 32:4-32:14. This Court should conclude similarly.[7]

In construing section 707(b)(3)(B), this Court must apply the text of the statute as written. See Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1, 6 (2000) ("when the statute's language is plain, the sole function of the courts–at least where the disposition required by the text is not absurd–is to enforce it according to its terms.") (internal quotations omitted). As previously explained, the text of section 707(b)(3)(B) requires the dismissal of a chapter 7 case for abuse if the debtor's "financial situation" demonstrates an ability to repay. See United States Trustee's Br., supra, at 10. A personally held moral belief is not a "financial situation." Id. at 11

[7] This position is also supported by the legislative history to the 2005 Act, which states that in enacting the 2005 Act Congress sought "to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 2, 12.

(discussing factors court may consider in reviewing a debtor's "financial situation"). Therefore, the bankruptcy court below did not err in construing section 707(b)(3)(B).

Indeed, while many of the Debtors' creditors might believe that the "moral" thing for the Debtors to do is to repay their debts, section 707(b)(3)(B) simply does not consider such moral questions. If a court finds that a debtor's "financial situation" supports an abuse finding it may dismiss. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) and (b)(3)(B). The bankruptcy court below made such a finding. It was not clearly erroneous. Therefore, it should be affirmed.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the order entered by below.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The present appeal involves an issue that has arisen following Congress' enactment of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA"). Lower courts have divided over how to dispose of a case when a debtor fails to comply with Section 109(h), the new law's credit counseling requirement. The view of a substantial majority of courts -- and that of the United States Trustee[1] ("U.S. Trustee") -- is that where, as here, debtors have not obtained credit counseling or qualified for a temporary waiver of the requirement, their cases should be dismissed. In this case, however, the bankruptcy court denied the U.S. Trustee's motions to dismiss and struck debtors' cases. Because that decision is contrary to the Bankruptcy Code and congressional intent, and will cause substantial uncertainty in bankruptcy proceedings, the U.S. Trustee appealed to the district court. As demonstrated in our opening brief, the district court erred by dismissing the U.S. Trustee's appeal for lack of standing, and, in the alternative, affirming the bankruptcy court's decision on the merits.

1. As Amicus acknowledges (Br. 11-15), the U.S. Trustee has standing to appeal the bankruptcy court's denial of her motions to dismiss. Congress, in Section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code, expressly provided U.S. Trustees with standing to "raise and appear and be heard in any case or proceeding” arising under the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 307. As the courts of appeals that have addressed the issue have unanimously agreed, the U.S. Trustee therefore need not meet the “person aggrieved” standard applicable to private parties’ appellate standing.

2. Although Amicus agrees with the U.S. Trustee that the present appeal is justiciable, he suggests that, absent the exception to the mootness doctrine for cases that are "capable of repetition, yet evading review," this Court would lack jurisdiction. The present case is not moot. To the contrary, a ruling in the U.S. Trustee’s favor would affect the legal rights of the debtors and fully redress the U.S. Trustee’s injury.

3. The bankruptcy court’s decision to strike, rather than dismiss, debtors’ cases is contrary to the Bankruptcy Code and congressional intent, and will cause significant uncertainty in future bankruptcy proceedings. In contrast, the position of the U.S. Trustee that where, as here, a debtor fails to comply with Section 109(h), a court must dismiss the case, reflects a proper interpretation of the Bankruptcy Code, advances congressional intent, and avoids confusion. When an individual files a petition under Section 301, she has commenced a case and triggered the automatic stay. If and when the bankruptcy court later decides that the individual is ineligible to be a debtor under Section 109, the court should dismiss the case for cause.

ARGUMENT

I. THIS COURT HAS JURISDICTION TO DECIDE THE U.S. TRUSTEE'S APPEAL.

A. Standing

As noted, court-appointed Amicus concurs with the U.S. Trustee's contention that she has appellate standing. See Amicus Br. 11-15. We therefore rest on our opening brief on standing.

B. Mootness

Amicus suggests that the present appeal is moot, but falls within the exception to the mootness doctrine for cases that are "capable of repetition, yet evading review." Amicus Br. 15-18. This Court need not reach whether that exception applies, however, because the present appeal is not moot.

Under Article III of the Constitution, a case is moot only where a court is unable to grant the party alleging injury any effective relief. See Church of Scientology of Cal. v. United States, 506 U.S. 9, 12 (1992). So long as the court "can fashion some form of meaningful relief, even if it only partially redresses the grievances of the prevailing party, the appeal is not moot." In re United Artists Theatre Co., 315 F.3d 217, 226 (3d Cir. 2003) (internal quotations omitted). Indeed, "when an appellant retains an interest in a case so that a favorable outcome could redound in its favor, the case is not moot." In re Flanagan, 503 F.3d 171, 178 (2nd Cir. 2007).

Relying on the Seventh Circuit's nonprecedential order in In re Thompson, 249 Fed. Appx. 475 (7th Cir. 2007), Amicus contends (Br. 15-16), however, that if the U.S. Trustee prevails in the present appeal, "there will be no actual effect for either Debtors or their creditors." As set forth below, a ruling in the U.S. Trustee's favor would both affect the legal rights of the debtors and fully redress the U.S. Trustee's injury.

1. Affording Relief To The U.S. Trustee Would Affect Debtors' Rights Under The Bankruptcy Code.

If the U.S. Trustee prevails in this appeal, it would affect debtors' legal rights. First, the automatic stay would terminate after 30 days in any bankruptcy case that any of the debtors files within a year from the bankruptcy court's entry of dismissal on remand unless the debtor demonstrates good faith in the subsequent case. Second, the requested relief would make clear that the debtors must report the present case in any future bankruptcy proceeding in the next eight years.

2. Granting Relief To The U.S. Trustee Would Affect The Debtors' Statutory Right To An Automatic Stay.

a. Under BAPCPA, Congress Limited Application Of The Automatic Stay Where Debtors Had A Case Pending In The Prior Year That Was Dismissed.

As set forth in our opening brief (Br. 43), when Congress enacted BAPCPA, it amended 11 U.S.C. § 362, the automatic stay provision. Specifically, Congress provided for limited application of the automatic stay where a "single or joint case of the debtor was pending within the preceding 1-year period but was dismissed[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3) (emphasis added). In such cases, the automatic stay terminates on the 30th day after the debtor files the subsequent case unless the debtor "demonstrates that the filing of the later case is in good faith as to the creditors to be stayed." 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3)(A),(B). In addition, Congress provided that if "2 or more single or joint cases of the debtor were pending within the previous year but were dismissed," the automatic stay will not go into effect at the outset of the debtor's subsequent case unless the debtor can demonstrate that the later case is filed in good faith. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(4)(A),(B) (emphasis added).

As we explained (Br. 43-44), because the plain language of Section 362(c) applies solely to debtors whose prior cases were "dismissed," where a bankruptcy court strikes the petition and rules that a case never commenced, that proceeding likely would not count as a "case" "pending" in the prior year that was "dismissed" for the purposes of determining in a later case whether and when the automatic stay is triggered. In fact, in Thompson, the bankruptcy court, after determining that it would strike debtors' petition rather than dismiss their case, acknowledged that if the Thompsons did file a petition within a year, the "petition filed under this cause number will not count as a 'case pending and dismissed'" under Section 362(c). In re

Thompson, 344 B.R. 899, 908 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2006), aff'd, In re Thompson, No. 06-1033 (S.D. Ind. Dec. 4, 2006), vacated as moot, 249 Fed. Appx. 475 (7th Cir. 2007). In the present case, this Court therefore can afford the U.S. Trustee effective relief by reversing the district court decision, thereby requiring the bankruptcy court to dismiss debtors' cases on remand.

If this Court rules in the U.S. Trustee's favor, it thus will not only afford her effective relief, but will also affect debtors' legal status under the Bankruptcy Code. If any of the debtors files a bankruptcy petition within a year from the entry of dismissal on remand, she will need to seek affirmative relief from the bankruptcy court in order to continue the automatic stay for more than 30 days in the later case. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3). Debtors' creditors would also be affected, since they would not have to go to the time and expense of moving for relief from the stay after 30 days have expired in the later case.

The statutory collateral effects on the debtors and their creditors that would result from a court order granting the U.S. Trustee relief demonstrate that the present appeal is not moot, and provide the debtors with "a stake in the outcome of this litigation." See A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787, 790 & n.4 (7th Cir. 2004). These statutory effects are particularly significant in light of debtors' history of bankruptcy filings: (1) when debtor Diana Finlay filed her petition in the present case, it was her third bankruptcy filing within a year (see Op. 5, Appendix ("A")-17); (2) debtor Shayna Zarnel's husband had filed five bankruptcy petitions since January 2004 (Op. 6, A-18); and (3) debtor Lena Elmendorf filed another Chapter 7 petition after the bankruptcy court struck the present case. See Docket, In re Elmendorf, No. 06-35926 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.) (case closed without discharge for failure to file Official Form 23). And whether or not they file for bankruptcy within a year from when a dismissal is ultimately entered on remand, debtors' legal status with respect to filing a petition under the Bankruptcy Code, at least in the following year, will have changed.

b. Debtors' Cases Remain "Pending" Within The Meaning Of Section 362(c) Of The Bankruptcy Code.

Amicus argues (Br. 15-16), however, that the one-year period in which Section 362 limits applicability of the stay has already expired – i.e., it expired one year after the bankruptcy court issued its order striking debtors' cases. In its nonprecedential order in Thompson, the Seventh Circuit reached the same conclusion without analysis. See 249 Fed. Appx. at 476. This Court should reject that interpretation of Section 362(c) because it conflicts with the plain language of the statute; in particular, the definition of the word "pending." Section 362(c) expressly refers to cases that were "pending within the preceding 1-year period but w[ere] dismissed[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3). Debtors' cases commenced when they filed their petitions, and remain pending to this day. The cases are currently "pending" before this Court, since the U.S. Trustee timely appealed the bankruptcy court's orders to the district court, and timely appealed the district court's judgment to this Court.

1. Although the Bankruptcy Code does not define "pending," under the ordinary meaning of the term, a case is "pending" when it has not been finally resolved. Indeed, Black's Law Dictionary defines "pending" as "[r]emaining undecided; awaiting decision." Black's Law Dictionary, 8th Ed. (2004) at 1169; C.F. Trust, Inc. v. Tyler, 318 B.R. 795, 806 (E.D. Va. 2004) (phrase "'pending litigation' plainly encompasses all matters that were then 'pending'" in the case, "whether in the Court of Appeals or the district court"; case is "'pending' if it remains unresolved").

The Supreme Court has applied the ordinary meaning of "pending" in the context of time limits for filing federal petitions for habeas corpus. See Carey v. Saffold, 536 U.S. 214, 219-220 (2002). In Carey, the Court addressed the meaning of the term "pending" in 28 U.S.C. § 2244(d)(2), which provides that "time during which a properly filed application for State post-conviction or other collateral review with respect to the pertinent judgment or claim is pending shall not be counted toward any period of limitation under this subsection." 28 U.S.C. § 2244(d)(2) (emphasis added). The Court held that a prisoner's application for state collateral review remains "pending" within the meaning of Section 2244(d)(2) "as long as the ordinary state collateral review process is 'in continuance,'" which includes the "interval between a lower court's entry of judgment and the timely filing of a notice of appeal (or petition for review) in the next court." 536 U.S. at 219-220. As the Court explained, its interpretation was consistent with the ordinary meaning of "pending": "The dictionary defines 'pending' * * * as 'in continuance' or 'not yet decided.'" Id. at 219. Thus, the Court reasoned, until a prisoner's application for review "has achieved final resolution through the State's post-conviction procedures, by definition it remains 'pending.'" Id. at 220.

Under this reasoning, debtors' cases remain "pending" while on appeal before the district court and the court of appeals. Because the bankruptcy court's orders striking debtors' cases and denying the U.S. Trustee's motions to dismiss did not finally resolve debtors' cases in light of the U.S. Trustee's timely appeals, such cases remain "pending" within the meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 362(c).

2. To support its interpretation, Amicus does not address the plain meaning of the term "pending." Rather, Amicus argues (Br. 16-17) that the U.S. Trustee's interpretation would be inconsistent with Congress's purpose because "a debtor would be forced to endure the restrictions on the automatic stay long after the bankruptcy court resolved the petition and for a period with no correlation to the prior filing."

As an initial matter, such a policy argument cannot trump the plain language of the statute. Connecticut Nat'l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253-54 (1992) ("[w]e have stated time and again that courts must presume that a legislature says in a statute what it means and means in a statute what it says there"); Collazos v. United States, 368 F.3d 190, 199 (2d Cir. 2004). In any event, the U.S. Trustee's interpretation of Section 362(c) is entirely consistent with Congress's purpose in enacting BAPCPA. By amending Section 362 to limit application of the automatic stay when a debtor had a prior case dismissed in the preceding year, Congress intended to discourage debtors from "bad faith repeat filings." H.R. Rep. No. 31(I), 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 69 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 138. At the same time, however, Congress recognized that such limitations could prove overly harsh as applied in particular cases and therefore provided a debtor who had a prior case dismissed in the preceding year with the opportunity to obtain a continuation of the stay if she demonstrates that she filed the subsequent case in "good faith." 11 U.S.C. §§ 362(c)(3)(B);(c)(4)(B).

Thus, if a debtor has a prior dismissal in the preceding year only because her earlier case was pending for several years due to another party's appeal, she could file a motion for continuation of the stay, which the bankruptcy court could grant if it found that she was acting in good faith in the new bankruptcy proceeding. See In re Seaman, 340 B.R. 698, 709 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2006) (Congress, through enactment of provision allowing debtor to seek continuance of automatic stay in subsequent case, "intended that in appropriate circumstances, a debtor or other party in interest could move promptly to reinstate the protections of the automatic stay").

3. Granting Relief To The U.S. Trustee Affects Debtors' Reporting Requirements In Subsequent Bankruptcy Cases.

In addition, even apart from any impact on the automatic stay, if this Court grants the U.S. Trustee's requested relief, it will affect debtors' reporting requirements in any subsequent bankruptcy filings within the next eight years. See Gov't Br. 48. Official bankruptcy forms require debtors to inform the court of all prior bankruptcy "cases" filed in the past eight years. See Voluntary Petition Official Form 1 at 2. Absent relief from this Court, debtors could believe that because their cases were stricken, and because the bankruptcy court held that they never commenced a case, they are not required to report the present case when they file a subsequent petition. In contrast, if this Court reverses the district court, holds that a case "commenced," and remands for an entry of dismissal by the bankruptcy court, it will be clear that debtors must report the present case. This reporting requirement helps the U.S. Trustee monitor bankruptcy proceedings for abuse by repeat filers. And requiring debtors to report the dismissed case could affect their rights in subsequent bankruptcy cases with respect to, for example, any issue that arises regarding good faith where their history of prior filings is relevant.[2]

4. The U.S. Trustee Is Acting To Protect The Public Interest In Bankruptcy Proceedings, And She Has Suffered An Injury In That Capacity That May Still Be Fully Redressed.

The U.S. Trustee's appeal also satisfies the requirement that the party seeking relief has an injury that can be redressed. As noted, the U.S. Trustee moved to dismiss debtors' cases. The bankruptcy court denied the U.S. Trustee's motions, and the district court affirmed. A reversal by this Court would make clear that the bankruptcy court lacked authority to strike the petition, and would require dismissal of debtors' cases on remand. The U.S. Trustee, who is acting to protect the public interest by ensuring that bankruptcy proceedings are conducted in accordance with the Code, has therefore suffered an injury that can be fully redressed by a favorable decision by this Court.

[2] In discussing the merits of whether a bankruptcy court should strike a petition or dismiss a case where a debtor has not complied with the credit counseling requirement, Amicus argues (Br. 30 n.11) that the "form accompanying bankruptcy filings could – and, indeed, post-BAPCPA probably should – be changed to seek information about the number of 'petitions' filed." The fact remains, however, that over two years have passed since BAPCPA was enacted, and the form still refers to "cases." Speculation about whether the form could or should be changed does not affect the mootness question.

The U.S. Trustee’s appeal is thus distinguishable from cases in which a plaintiff or appellant no longer has a stake in the litigation, and the Court is accordingly unable to provide effective relief. Unlike, for example, a student who has graduated from school and no longer has a cognizable interest in school policies or regulations, a prisoner who has been released from prison, or a company that has sold its business, the U.S. Trustee’s stake in the present litigation has not changed: she is acting to advance the public interest and to ensure proper and consistent interpretation of the Code.[3]

The Supreme Court recognized this distinction when it held that a school desegregation case that otherwise would have become moot when plaintiff students graduated presented a live case or controversy because the United States had intervened. Pasadena City Bd. Of Educ. v. Spangler, 427 U.S. 424 (1976). Like the present case, where Congress conferred standing on the U.S. Trustee to raise and appear “on any issue” in “any case or proceeding” under the Bankruptcy Code (11 U.S.C. § 307), in Pasadena City Bd., the United States had a statutory right to intervene in the students’ private action. See 427 U.S. at 430 (citing 42 U.S.C. § 2000h-2). In such circumstances, even if the plaintiffs who originally filed that private action could no longer obtain effective relief, the United States, which had a public interest stake in ensuring that municipal school boards did not violate students' constitutional rights, could continue with the litigation. See id.

It is in her role in ensuring that bankruptcy proceedings are conducted in accordance with the Code that the U.S. Trustee is injured. And this injury is not in any sense moot, since an order from this Court reversing the district court, thereby requiring dismissal of debtors' cases on remand, would afford effective relief. At the same time, the U.S. Trustee's injury in this case is specific to debtors, as debtors failed to comply with Section 109(h) of the Bankruptcy Code, and their cases therefore should have been dismissed as set forth in the U.S. Trustee's motions in bankruptcy court. Those motions were clearly adverse to debtors in bankruptcy court, and, as outlined above, the U.S. Trustee's appeal remains adverse to debtors' interests.[4] The relief that the U.S. Trustee seeks on appeal would require debtors to file a motion demonstrating good faith in any subsequent bankruptcy case that they file within a year

[4] Contrary to Amicus' suggestion (Br. 18 n.6), the U.S. Trustee thus is not arguing that, in light of its public interest standing, there need not be a case or controversy under Article III. As we have demonstrated, this case satisfies Article III requirements because a decision in the U.S. Trustee's favor on appeal would fully redress its injury and would affect debtors' statutory rights under the Bankruptcy Code.

from entry of dismissal on remand in order to extend the automatic stay past 30 days; without such relief, debtors are free to file a petition within a year without prejudice. The requested relief would also make clear that debtors must report the present case in any future bankruptcy proceeding in the next eight years, thus making the U.S. Trustee's enforcement and monitoring role easier and more accurate with respect to debtors.

In sum, this case is not moot "because [appellant] has a stake in the outcome of the proceeding and a federal court can effectuate relief should [appellant] prevail on the merits." Church of Scientology, 506 U.S. at 18 n.11.

5. If This Court Disagrees, And Determines That The Appeal Is Moot, It Should Vacate The Decisions Of The Lower Courts.

As demonstrated above, this appeal is not moot. This Court therefore need not reach Amicus' contention (Br. 17-18) that the appeal falls within the exception to the mootness doctrine for cases that are "capable of repetition yet evading review." Should this Court disagree with the U.S. Trustee and Amicus that the case is justiciable, however, it should vacate the decisions of both the district court and the bankruptcy court. See United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., 340 U.S. 36, 39-40 (1950) ("established practice" of Supreme Court when case becomes moot on appeal is to vacate judgment of lower courts); Van Wie v. Pataki, 267 F.3d 109, 115 (2d Cir. 2001).

II. WHERE, AS HERE, DEBTORS FAIL TO COMPLY WITH SECTION 109(h) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE, THE BANKRUPTCY COURT MUST DISMISS, RATHER THAN STRIKE, THE CASE.

As we demonstrated in our opening brief, when a debtor does not comply with the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h) of the Code, the bankruptcy court should dismiss the case rather than strike the case or petition. Indeed, there is no authority in the Bankruptcy Code for striking a petition or case in these circumstances. The U.S. Trustee’s position that a bankruptcy court should dismiss such cases is consistent with the Bankruptcy Code, congressional intent, and the holdings of a substantial majority of courts that have addressed the issue.[5] Amicus advances several arguments in support of its position that the bankruptcy court had authority to strike debtors’ petitions rather than dismiss their cases. None of these arguments is persuasive, however.

A. Debtors Commenced Cases Within The Meaning Of Section 301 Of The Bankruptcy Code.

Amicus argues that bankruptcy courts should strike petitions of ineligible debtors because such debtors cannot commence cases

[5] See Gov’t Br. 31-32 & n.16. Since we filed our brief, three additional bankruptcy courts have determined that dismissal of the case is the appropriate disposition where a debtor has failed to comply with the credit counseling requirement. In re Francisco, – B.R. –, 2008 WL 244172 (Bankr. D. N.M. 2008); In re Falcone, 370 B.R. 462 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2007); In re Gossett, 369 B.R. 361 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007). One district court has affirmed a bankruptcy court’s decision to strike a petition. Wyttenbach v. Commissioner, 382 B.R. 726 (S.D. Tex. 2008), appeal pending, 5th Cir. No. 08-40321.

under Section 301 of the Code.[6] Pursuant to Section 301, a "voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 301(a). Amicus argues (Br. 19-21) that there were no "cases" for the bankruptcy court to dismiss because, under Section 301, a case commences only where a petition is filed under a chapter of the Bankruptcy Code by an entity "that may be a debtor under such chapter." Amicus contends (Br. 19-20) that an individual who files a petition without complying with Section 109(h) "may not be a debtor" under the Bankruptcy Code, and thus cannot commence a case under Section 301.

1. Although Amicus purports to rely on the plain language of the Code to support its interpretation, neither the term "may" nor the phrase "may be a debtor" is defined in the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 101 (definitions). It is therefore appropriate to refer to the ordinary usage of the term "may," which "as used in § 301 of the Bankruptcy Code means 'might' or is meant to express a 'possibility.'" In re Tomco, 339 B.R. 145, 159 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2006).

Amicus argues (Br. 21), however, that in Section 109,

[6] Although the bankruptcy court below struck debtors' cases, Amicus advocates striking debtors' petitions, and "understands the bankruptcy court to have struck the petitions" despite the clear language of the court's orders striking the cases. A-49-51.

Congress defined the phrase "may be a debtor" for purposes of Section 301 "to exclude individuals that do not comply with the credit-counseling requirements." Contrary to Amicus' argument, Section 109 nowhere defines the sense in which Congress used the term "may" or the phrase "may be a debtor" in Section 301. Rather, Section 109 delineates who "may be a debtor" for purposes of determining eligibility for bankruptcy relief under various chapters of the Bankruptcy Code once a case has already commenced; it does not delineate who can commence a case for purposes of Section 301. Because determining whether an individual is eligible to be a debtor under the various subsections of Section 109 (including 109(h)) is often unclear from the face of the petition and may involve disputed issues of fact and law, a debtor who files a petition "may be a debtor" for purposes of commencing a case under Section 301, but nonetheless may subsequently be found ineligible for bankruptcy relief under Section 109. In re Ross, 338 B.R. 134, 138 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2006); Tomco, 339 B.R. at 159; Seaman, 340 B.R. at 707; In re Flores, 291 B.R. 44, 61 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003). Otherwise, numerous bankruptcy cases would be legal nullities, even if they had remained pending for years due to a legal or factual dispute over eligibility under Section 109.

In fact, Amicus' interpretation of how Section 109 limits the phrase "entity that may be a debtor" in Section 301 would apply equally to other subsections of Section 109, because that section as a whole -- not solely subsection (h) –- covers "who may be a debtor" under particular chapters of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 109. Such a result is unworkable because of the uncertainty that it would create in bankruptcy proceedings. E.g., Seaman, 340 B.R. at 707 (striking case would cause questions about "existence and willfulness of an automatic stay violation, and the validity of an action against property taken by a creditor of a petitioner who appears ineligible to be a debtor but later is determined to be eligible"); Ross, 338 B.R. at 140. Creditors and other parties "will not know whether a valid case exists without investigation," and "even if bankruptcy courts can fashion doctrines to avoid unfair results in such void ab initio situations, the fact remains that substantial uncertainty will cloud every transaction related to a bankruptcy case." Ross, 338 B.R. at 140-141; In re Jones, 352 B.R. 813, 823-824 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2006) (Section 349 of Code addresses effects of dismissals, not effects of striking of petition).

Amicus acknowledges (Br. 21-22) that there may be "proceedings in the bankruptcy court prior to a definitive ruling on whether an individual is eligible to commence a case," but contends that this is no different from the determinations a court must make to decide whether it has subject matter jurisdiction. Amicus' analogy to determinations of subject matter jurisdiction is telling. As noted (Gov't Br. 28-29), when a federal court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, it dismisses the case, it does not strike the complaint or case as a nullity.[7]

Moreover, when a court dismisses a case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, it is clear that in a subsequent case, the jurisdictional ruling has preclusive effect. A "dismissal for lack of jurisdiction precludes relitigation of the issue actually decided, namely the jurisdictional issue." Perry v. Sheahan, 222 F.3d 309, 318 (7th Cir. 2000); Insurance Corp. Of Ir., Ltd. v. Compagnie des Bauxites de Guinee, 456 U.S. 694, 702 n.9 (1982). In contrast, if every time a court held that it lacked jurisdiction (or, by analogy, if every time a court held that a debtor is ineligible), the entire proceeding became a legal nullity, then the applicability of doctrines such as res judicata and issue preclusion would become highly uncertain.[8] In short, contrary to Amicus' assertion (Br. 30), striking a petition on the ground that a debtor who is ineligible under Section 109(h)

[7] E.g., Makarova v. United States, 201 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2000); Close v. State of New York, 125 F.3d 31 (7th Cir. 1997) (same); see Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(3).

[8] See, e.g., Ross, 338 B.R. at 140 (if "there is a case before the court," then "[d]octrines of waiver or res judicata provide potential legal bases for fair resolution" of problems that might arise in case filed by ineligible debtor; however, such doctrines "may be unavailable if the case is void ab initio"); Jones, 352 B.R. at 824 (questions that arise from holding that petition filed by ineligible debtor is nullity include "when and how" issue decided prior to striking petition "becomes res judicata").

cannot commence a case does create uncertainty and the potential for prejudice to parties to bankruptcy proceedings.[9]

2. In addition, the position of Amicus and the courts below that a debtor who has not complied with Section 109(h) cannot commence a case under Section 301 would apply equally to situations in which individuals file a petition under the wrong chapter of the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 109. Section 301 expressly provides that a "voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 301 (emphasis added). If Amicus' argument that Section 109 defines the term "may be a debtor" for purposes of Section 301 were adopted, then a petition filed by an individual who is eligible to be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code, but files a petition under the wrong chapter, would be a legal nullity. That is because under Amicus' interpretation of the plain language, that debtor would not commence a case because

[9] Moreover, as we explained (Br. 47-48), striking petitions and holding that an ineligible debtor does not commence a case could cause various practical problems involving reporting requirements, filing fees and compensation of trustees. Whether or not these problems could be resolved by changing a bankruptcy form, or by ruling a particular way (cf. Amicus Br. 30 n.11), the point remains that if the U.S. Trustee's position is adopted, bankruptcy courts would not even have to raise such questions, much less answer them: A case would exist until a court determines that the debtor is ineligible, at which time the court would dismiss the case, thus making it clear how such case should be treated for purposes of both limitations on the automatic stay in future cases and for reporting requirements.

she is not an "entity that may be a debtor under such chapter."

Indeed, if adopted, Amicus' argument would extend to a debtor who files a petition under Chapter 13 but is ineligible under Section 109(e). Could a court still convert the Chapter 13 petition to a Chapter 7 petition rather than strike it? The answer provided by the Bankruptcy Code is yes: Section 1307(c) states that "on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title." 11 U.S.C. § 1307(c). And, as courts have recognized, ineligibility under Chapter 13 is a valid ground for conversion to Chapter 7. See, e.g., Rudd v. Laughlin, 866 F.2d 1040, 1041 (8th Cir. 1989) (where debtor files Chapter 13 petition but is ineligible under Section 109(e), court has jurisdiction to convert to Chapter 7 and case is not legal nullity); In re Jones, 129 B.R. 1003, 1009 (Bankr. N.D. Ill.) ("the converted case is commenced by the filing of the petition even if the debtor was not eligible for relief under the chapter named in the petition"), aff'd, 134 B.R. 274 (N.D. Ill. 1991).[10]

Under Amicus' logic, however, the bankruptcy court would be

[10] As the Jones court observed in response to the argument that the filing of a petition by a debtor ineligible under Section 109(e) did not commence a case, "it is metaphysical to argue that there is no 'case' here. If there is no 'case,' then what are the parties doing here and what is that thick file doing in the Clerk's office?" 129 B.R. at 1010.

required to strike the petition as a legal nullity in such circumstances because it did not commence a case. That result demonstrates the flaw in Amicus' purported "plain language" argument -- according to Amicus' interpretation of the phrase "may be a debtor," in Section 301, in order to commence a case, an individual must be eligible pursuant to the particular chapter under which she filed her petition. Otherwise, the petition does not commence a case, and if there is no "case" to dismiss, presumably there is no "case" to convert.

3. Moreover, the "words 'entity that may be a debtor'" that appear in Section 301 "have been in the [Bankruptcy Code] from the outset." In re Francisco, -- B.R. –, 2008 WL 244172 (Bankr. D. N.M. 2008) at *6. There is thus "a usage for that language that predates the enactment of § 109(h)(1) and does not mandate striking the petition for a violation of § 109(h)(1)." Id. Indeed, before the enactment of the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h), courts routinely dismissed, not struck, cases where the debtor was ineligible under other subsections of Section 109.[11] When Congress enacted BAPCPA, it therefore "was legislating against a background of (1) cases under various chapters dismissed for ineligibility pursuant to § 109," and "(2)

cases not found void ab initio for violations of § 109(g)." Id. at *7. Congress did not indicate that the newly-enacted credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h) should be treated any differently from the other eligibility requirements in Section 109. Id.; In re Gossett, 369 B.R. 361, 373-374 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007) ("[t]here is no indication that Congress intended to treat § 109(h) ineligibility any different than any other form of ineligibility in § 109"; thus, dismissal is proper disposition where debtor has failed to comply with § 109(h)).

B. Amicus' Position That The Bankruptcy Court Had Authority To Strike Debtors' Petitions Finds No Support In The Bankruptcy Code And Is Contrary To Congressional Intent.

1. Amicus contends (Br. 25-26) that the U.S. Trustee's reliance on pre-BAPCPA cases that routinely dismiss cases filed by debtors who are ineligible under Section 109 is unsound because "until recently, courts had little reason to be concerned with whether an ineligible debtor's petition should be stricken or his case should be dismissed," whereas after BAPCPA, the results of dismissal can lead to limitation of the automatic stay in future cases. This argument is unavailing. Indeed, "the fact that the consequences of a dismissal are potentially more dire does not by itself warrant a change in what leads to dismissals." Francisco, – B.R. –, 2008 WL 244172 at *7. Moreover, Amicus' position conflicts with Congress's purpose in enacting BAPCPA; indeed, "various provisions of BAPCPA * * * belie any notion that Congress wrote BAPCPA to benefit debtors."[12] Id.

2. In the alternative, Amicus contends (Br. 26) that, in any event, "it was far from universal before BAPCPA that a bankruptcy court would dismiss a case upon the filing of a petition by an ineligible debtor." In support of this argument, Amicus cites two cases for the proposition that pre-BAPCPA, "several courts struck petitions filed by debtors" found ineligible under Section 109(g). Amicus Br. 26 (citing Rowe v. Ocwen Fed. Bank & Trust, 220 B.R. 591 (E.D. Tex. 1997), aff'd, 178 F.3d 1290 (5th Cir. 1999); In re Keziah, 46 B.R. 551 (Bankr. W.D.N.C. 1985)). But only Keziah involves the striking of a petition (46 B.R. at 555); contrary to Amicus' suggestion, the district court in Rowe repeatedly refers to the bankruptcy court's "dismissal, with prejudice" of debtor's petition because he was ineligible under Section 109(g). Rowe, 220 B.R. at 592-595 (emphasis added). By citing one pre-BAPCPA case in which a court struck a petition, Amicus has failed to cast doubt on the U.S. Trustee's point, and that of the bankruptcy courts upon which she relied, that a substantial majority of courts dismissed, not struck, cases in which debtors were found ineligible under Section 109 pre-BAPCPA. Moreover, Keziah says

[12] For example, as noted (Gov't Br. 43), in BAPCPA, Congress sought to prevent repeat bankruptcy filers from abusing bankruptcy proceedings by limiting application of the automatic stay where the debtor had a prior case dismissed in the preceding year. 11 U.S.C. §§ 362(c)(3), 362(c)(4).

nothing about Section 301 and the meaning of "entity that may be a debtor" thereunder, nor does it cite any Code provision that authorizes striking a petition as opposed to dismissing the case.

Amicus and the courts below contend, however, that 11 U.S.C. 105(a) provides the bankruptcy court with authority to strike debtors' petitions. Specifically, Amicus argues (Br. 27) that Section 105(a) of the Code allows the bankruptcy court to "effectuate the plain language of § 301 and fill in the interstices of the Code by striking the petition." But as we have shown (Gov't Br. 33-34), Section 105(a), which grants the bankruptcy court authority to "issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of [the Code]," by its terms limits the bankruptcy court's equitable power to "carrying out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, rather than to further the purposes of the Code generally, or otherwise to do the right thing." In re Dairy Mart Convenience Stores, Inc., 351 F.3d 86, 92 (2d Cir. 2003). While provisions of the Code authorize the dismissal of cases for cause, the Code does not provide for the striking of a case or petition. Gov't Br. 29-31, 33-34. Amicus and the courts below thus err by relying on Section 105, because it does not allow the bankruptcy court to take an action that is not authorized under the provisions of the Code.[13] In re Mason, 2007 WL 433077 at *3.

C. Amicus Bases Its Position That The Automatic Stay Is Triggered Even If A Case Does Not Commence On An Additional Error Of Statutory Interpretation.

Amicus parts ways with the bankruptcy court below by arguing that the automatic stay is invoked by a debtor who files a petition without complying with Section 109(h).[14] Amicus Br. 22-

[13] Nor do Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 and 7012(b) advance Amicus' argument. Amicus acknowledges (Br. 28) that neither rule "provides express authorization for the striking of a petition," but claims that they show that "striking a petition is within a bankruptcy court's arsenal of remedies." But as we demonstrated (Gov't Br. 34-35), these rules give the bankruptcy court authority to strike a pleading or portion thereof under specific, limited circumstances that are inapplicable here. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 (authority to strike unsigned filing if, after receiving notice, party fails to promptly correct omission of signature); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7012(b) (incorporating Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(e),(f) in adversary proceedings).

[14] Amicus agrees with our position (Gov't Br. 39 n.18) that this Court's pre-BAPCPA decision in In re Casse, 198 F.3d 327 (2d Cir. 1999) does not cast doubt on the conclusion that the automatic stay is invoked. As Amicus states (Br. 25), in Casse, "this Court implicitly recognized that, while an ineligible debtor's filing of a petition triggers the automatic stay, it can be annulled under § 362 on a case-by-case basis[.]"

We disagree with Amicus, however, with respect to his contention (Br. 24) that the Court in Casse concluded "that the ineligible debtor's case was void ab initio (in essence, that the debtor had never commenced a case)[.]" Casse did not discuss whether a case commenced under Section 301. In any event, as we explained (Gov't Br. 39 n.18), Casse is distinguishable. First, it did not involve the statutory restriction on eligibility in Section 109; rather, it involved a case in which the debtor violated a prior court order, issued pursuant to the bankruptcy court's authority under Sections 349(a) and 105(a), barring him from filing a subsequent petition. Second, Casse was decided pre-BAPCPA, before Congress's enactment of Section 362(b)(21)(A) made clear its understanding that, in the absence of an express statutory exception to the stay, a petition filed under Section 24; Thompson, 344 B.R. at 906. Amicus' position that the stay is invoked is in significant tension with his position that a petition filed by a debtor ineligible under Section 109 does not commence a case under Section 301. If a petition is a legal nullity that should be stricken from the record, how can it invoke the automatic stay? Like the bankruptcy court in Thompson (344 B.R. at 906), Amicus attempts to reconcile his contradictory positions by arguing that, under Section 362, the mere "filing of a petition operates as a stay" -- regardless of whether the petition commences a case. Amicus Br. 23.

By arguing that the automatic stay is triggered even if a case does not commence under Section 301, Amicus and the Thompson bankruptcy court introduce an additional error of statutory interpretation. Under Section 362(a), "[e]xcept as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a petition filed under section 301, 302 or 303 of this title * * * operates as a stay." 11 U.S.C. § 362(a). Thus, Section 362(a) expressly refers to petitions filed under Sections 301, 302 or 303, which in turn set forth when voluntary, joint or involuntary cases commence under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. §§ 301, 302, 303; see Bankr. Op. 17, A-29. If a case commences, the automatic stay thus takes effect; conversely, if a case does not commence, the automatic stay is not triggered. It is illogical to argue, as Amicus does, that a petition that should be stricken as a legal nullity nonetheless has the substantial legal effect of invoking the protection of the automatic stay.

Moreover, by taking the position that a petition filed by a debtor ineligible under Section 109(h) does not commence a case but nonetheless triggers the automatic stay, Amicus manages not only to conflict with courts that have held that a case commences when an ineligible debtor files a petition, but also with the bankruptcy court below.[15] Bankr. Op. 17, A-29 ("[a] straightforward reading of § 362(a) indicates that the automatic stay comes into existence only when a case is filed in accordance with §§ 301, 302 or 303 of the BAPCPA"). This inconsistency among courts that advocate striking is also exemplified by the conflict between Wyttenbach v. Commissioner, 382 B.R. 726 (S.D. Tex. 2008), appeal pending, 5th Cir. No. 08-40321, upon which Amicus relies (Br. 24, 28 n.10), and Amicus' position regarding whether the automatic stay is invoked. See Wyttenbach, 382 B.R. at 730 (relying on bankruptcy court holding that striking petition appropriate because stay would not be invoked if petition were struck as legal nullity).

[15] Amicus' reliance on In re Brown, 342 B.R. 248 (Bankr. D. Md. 2006) illustrates this conflict. Although Brown supports Amicus' position on the automatic stay, it does not support Amicus' argument that there is no "case" to dismiss when a debtor is ineligible. To the contrary, in Brown, the court dismissed debtor's case when it found that her certification of credit counseling was insufficient. 342 B.R. at 250.

That there is no unified view of the effect of a court’s striking of a case or petition underscores the uncertainty caused by the bankruptcy court’s decision below to strike, rather than dismiss, debtors’ cases. In contrast, the U.S. Trustee’s position that the filing of a petition by a debtor ineligible under Section 109(h) commences a case and invokes the automatic stay is consistent with the plain language of Section 362(a) and with the numerous courts that have held that dismissal is appropriate where a debtor is ineligible under Section 109(h).

* * * * * *

In short, the U.S. Trustee’s position, and that of the majority of courts that have addressed the issue, is consistent with the Bankruptcy Code, reflects congressional intent in enacting BAPCPA and avoids confusion. Thus, this Court should hold that the filing of a petition with the bankruptcy court commences a case under Section 301 and invokes the automatic stay. If and when the bankruptcy court ultimately decides that an individual is ineligible to be a debtor, the court should dismiss the case, and the stay will then terminate.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The present appeal involves an issue that has arisen following Congress' enactment of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA"). Lower courts have divided over how to dispose of a case when a debtor fails to comply with Section 109(h), the new law's credit counseling requirement. The view of a substantial majority of courts -- and that of the United States Trustee[1] ("U.S. Trustee") -- is that where, as here, debtors have not obtained credit counseling or qualified for a temporary waiver of the requirement, their cases should be dismissed. In this case, however, the bankruptcy court denied the U.S. Trustee's motions to dismiss and struck debtors' cases. Because that decision is contrary to the Bankruptcy Code and congressional intent, and will cause substantial uncertainty in bankruptcy proceedings, the U.S. Trustee appealed to the district court. As demonstrated in our opening brief, the district court erred by dismissing the U.S. Trustee's appeal for lack of standing, and, in the alternative, affirming the bankruptcy court's decision on the merits.

1. As Amicus acknowledges (Br. 11-15), the U.S. Trustee has standing to appeal the bankruptcy court's denial of her motions to dismiss. Congress, in Section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code, expressly provided U.S. Trustees with standing to "raise and appear and be heard in any case or proceeding” arising under the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 307. As the courts of appeals that have addressed the issue have unanimously agreed, the U.S. Trustee therefore need not meet the “person aggrieved” standard applicable to private parties’ appellate standing.

2. Although Amicus agrees with the U.S. Trustee that the present appeal is justiciable, he suggests that, absent the exception to the mootness doctrine for cases that are "capable of repetition, yet evading review," this Court would lack jurisdiction. The present case is not moot. To the contrary, a ruling in the U.S. Trustee’s favor would affect the legal rights of the debtors and fully redress the U.S. Trustee’s injury.

3. The bankruptcy court’s decision to strike, rather than dismiss, debtors’ cases is contrary to the Bankruptcy Code and congressional intent, and will cause significant uncertainty in future bankruptcy proceedings. In contrast, the position of the U.S. Trustee that where, as here, a debtor fails to comply with Section 109(h), a court must dismiss the case, reflects a proper interpretation of the Bankruptcy Code, advances congressional intent, and avoids confusion. When an individual files a petition under Section 301, she has commenced a case and triggered the automatic stay. If and when the bankruptcy court later decides that the individual is ineligible to be a debtor under Section 109, the court should dismiss the case for cause.

ARGUMENT

I. THIS COURT HAS JURISDICTION TO DECIDE THE U.S. TRUSTEE'S APPEAL.

A. Standing

As noted, court-appointed Amicus concurs with the U.S. Trustee's contention that she has appellate standing. See Amicus Br. 11-15. We therefore rest on our opening brief on standing.

B. Mootness

Amicus suggests that the present appeal is moot, but falls within the exception to the mootness doctrine for cases that are "capable of repetition, yet evading review." Amicus Br. 15-18. This Court need not reach whether that exception applies, however, because the present appeal is not moot.

Under Article III of the Constitution, a case is moot only where a court is unable to grant the party alleging injury any effective relief. See Church of Scientology of Cal. v. United States, 506 U.S. 9, 12 (1992). So long as the court "can fashion some form of meaningful relief, even if it only partially redresses the grievances of the prevailing party, the appeal is not moot." In re United Artists Theatre Co., 315 F.3d 217, 226 (3d Cir. 2003) (internal quotations omitted). Indeed, "when an appellant retains an interest in a case so that a favorable outcome could redound in its favor, the case is not moot." In re Flanagan, 503 F.3d 171, 178 (2nd Cir. 2007).

Relying on the Seventh Circuit's nonprecedential order in In re Thompson, 249 Fed. Appx. 475 (7th Cir. 2007), Amicus contends (Br. 15-16), however, that if the U.S. Trustee prevails in the present appeal, "there will be no actual effect for either Debtors or their creditors." As set forth below, a ruling in the U.S. Trustee's favor would both affect the legal rights of the debtors and fully redress the U.S. Trustee's injury.

1. Affording Relief To The U.S. Trustee Would Affect Debtors' Rights Under The Bankruptcy Code.

If the U.S. Trustee prevails in this appeal, it would affect debtors' legal rights. First, the automatic stay would terminate after 30 days in any bankruptcy case that any of the debtors files within a year from the bankruptcy court's entry of dismissal on remand unless the debtor demonstrates good faith in the subsequent case. Second, the requested relief would make clear that the debtors must report the present case in any future bankruptcy proceeding in the next eight years.

2. Granting Relief To The U.S. Trustee Would Affect The Debtors' Statutory Right To An Automatic Stay.

a. Under BAPCPA, Congress Limited Application Of The Automatic Stay Where Debtors Had A Case Pending In The Prior Year That Was Dismissed.

As set forth in our opening brief (Br. 43), when Congress enacted BAPCPA, it amended 11 U.S.C. § 362, the automatic stay provision. Specifically, Congress provided for limited application of the automatic stay where a "single or joint case of the debtor was pending within the preceding 1-year period but was dismissed[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3) (emphasis added). In such cases, the automatic stay terminates on the 30th day after the debtor files the subsequent case unless the debtor "demonstrates that the filing of the later case is in good faith as to the creditors to be stayed." 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3)(A),(B). In addition, Congress provided that if "2 or more single or joint cases of the debtor were pending within the previous year but were dismissed," the automatic stay will not go into effect at the outset of the debtor's subsequent case unless the debtor can demonstrate that the later case is filed in good faith. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(4)(A),(B) (emphasis added).

As we explained (Br. 43-44), because the plain language of Section 362(c) applies solely to debtors whose prior cases were "dismissed," where a bankruptcy court strikes the petition and rules that a case never commenced, that proceeding likely would not count as a "case" "pending" in the prior year that was "dismissed" for the purposes of determining in a later case whether and when the automatic stay is triggered. In fact, in Thompson, the bankruptcy court, after determining that it would strike debtors' petition rather than dismiss their case, acknowledged that if the Thompsons did file a petition within a year, the "petition filed under this cause number will not count as a 'case pending and dismissed'" under Section 362(c). In re

Thompson, 344 B.R. 899, 908 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2006), aff'd, In re Thompson, No. 06-1033 (S.D. Ind. Dec. 4, 2006), vacated as moot, 249 Fed. Appx. 475 (7th Cir. 2007). In the present case, this Court therefore can afford the U.S. Trustee effective relief by reversing the district court decision, thereby requiring the bankruptcy court to dismiss debtors' cases on remand.

If this Court rules in the U.S. Trustee's favor, it thus will not only afford her effective relief, but will also affect debtors' legal status under the Bankruptcy Code. If any of the debtors files a bankruptcy petition within a year from the entry of dismissal on remand, she will need to seek affirmative relief from the bankruptcy court in order to continue the automatic stay for more than 30 days in the later case. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3). Debtors' creditors would also be affected, since they would not have to go to the time and expense of moving for relief from the stay after 30 days have expired in the later case.

The statutory collateral effects on the debtors and their creditors that would result from a court order granting the U.S. Trustee relief demonstrate that the present appeal is not moot, and provide the debtors with "a stake in the outcome of this litigation." See A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787, 790 & n.4 (7th Cir. 2004). These statutory effects are particularly significant in light of debtors' history of bankruptcy filings: (1) when debtor Diana Finlay filed her petition in the present case, it was her third bankruptcy filing within a year (see Op. 5, Appendix ("A")-17); (2) debtor Shayna Zarnel's husband had filed five bankruptcy petitions since January 2004 (Op. 6, A-18); and (3) debtor Lena Elmendorf filed another Chapter 7 petition after the bankruptcy court struck the present case. See Docket, In re Elmendorf, No. 06-35926 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.) (case closed without discharge for failure to file Official Form 23). And whether or not they file for bankruptcy within a year from when a dismissal is ultimately entered on remand, debtors' legal status with respect to filing a petition under the Bankruptcy Code, at least in the following year, will have changed.

b. Debtors' Cases Remain "Pending" Within The Meaning Of Section 362(c) Of The Bankruptcy Code.

Amicus argues (Br. 15-16), however, that the one-year period in which Section 362 limits applicability of the stay has already expired – i.e., it expired one year after the bankruptcy court issued its order striking debtors' cases. In its nonprecedential order in Thompson, the Seventh Circuit reached the same conclusion without analysis. See 249 Fed. Appx. at 476. This Court should reject that interpretation of Section 362(c) because it conflicts with the plain language of the statute; in particular, the definition of the word "pending." Section 362(c) expressly refers to cases that were "pending within the preceding 1-year period but w[ere] dismissed[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3). Debtors' cases commenced when they filed their petitions, and remain pending to this day. The cases are currently "pending" before this Court, since the U.S. Trustee timely appealed the bankruptcy court's orders to the district court, and timely appealed the district court's judgment to this Court.

1. Although the Bankruptcy Code does not define "pending," under the ordinary meaning of the term, a case is "pending" when it has not been finally resolved. Indeed, Black's Law Dictionary defines "pending" as "[r]emaining undecided; awaiting decision." Black's Law Dictionary, 8th Ed. (2004) at 1169; C.F. Trust, Inc. v. Tyler, 318 B.R. 795, 806 (E.D. Va. 2004) (phrase "'pending litigation' plainly encompasses all matters that were then 'pending'" in the case, "whether in the Court of Appeals or the district court"; case is "'pending' if it remains unresolved").

The Supreme Court has applied the ordinary meaning of "pending" in the context of time limits for filing federal petitions for habeas corpus. See Carey v. Saffold, 536 U.S. 214, 219-220 (2002). In Carey, the Court addressed the meaning of the term "pending" in 28 U.S.C. § 2244(d)(2), which provides that "time during which a properly filed application for State post-conviction or other collateral review with respect to the pertinent judgment or claim is pending shall not be counted toward any period of limitation under this subsection." 28 U.S.C. § 2244(d)(2) (emphasis added). The Court held that a prisoner's application for state collateral review remains "pending" within the meaning of Section 2244(d)(2) "as long as the ordinary state collateral review process is 'in continuance,'" which includes the "interval between a lower court's entry of judgment and the timely filing of a notice of appeal (or petition for review) in the next court." 536 U.S. at 219-220. As the Court explained, its interpretation was consistent with the ordinary meaning of "pending": "The dictionary defines 'pending' * * * as 'in continuance' or 'not yet decided.'" Id. at 219. Thus, the Court reasoned, until a prisoner's application for review "has achieved final resolution through the State's post-conviction procedures, by definition it remains 'pending.'" Id. at 220.

Under this reasoning, debtors' cases remain "pending" while on appeal before the district court and the court of appeals. Because the bankruptcy court's orders striking debtors' cases and denying the U.S. Trustee's motions to dismiss did not finally resolve debtors' cases in light of the U.S. Trustee's timely appeals, such cases remain "pending" within the meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 362(c).

2. To support its interpretation, Amicus does not address the plain meaning of the term "pending." Rather, Amicus argues (Br. 16-17) that the U.S. Trustee's interpretation would be inconsistent with Congress's purpose because "a debtor would be forced to endure the restrictions on the automatic stay long after the bankruptcy court resolved the petition and for a period with no correlation to the prior filing."

As an initial matter, such a policy argument cannot trump the plain language of the statute. Connecticut Nat'l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253-54 (1992) ("[w]e have stated time and again that courts must presume that a legislature says in a statute what it means and means in a statute what it says there"); Collazos v. United States, 368 F.3d 190, 199 (2d Cir. 2004). In any event, the U.S. Trustee's interpretation of Section 362(c) is entirely consistent with Congress's purpose in enacting BAPCPA. By amending Section 362 to limit application of the automatic stay when a debtor had a prior case dismissed in the preceding year, Congress intended to discourage debtors from "bad faith repeat filings." H.R. Rep. No. 31(I), 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 69 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 138. At the same time, however, Congress recognized that such limitations could prove overly harsh as applied in particular cases and therefore provided a debtor who had a prior case dismissed in the preceding year with the opportunity to obtain a continuation of the stay if she demonstrates that she filed the subsequent case in "good faith." 11 U.S.C. §§ 362(c)(3)(B);(c)(4)(B).

Thus, if a debtor has a prior dismissal in the preceding year only because her earlier case was pending for several years due to another party's appeal, she could file a motion for continuation of the stay, which the bankruptcy court could grant if it found that she was acting in good faith in the new bankruptcy proceeding. See In re Seaman, 340 B.R. 698, 709 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2006) (Congress, through enactment of provision allowing debtor to seek continuance of automatic stay in subsequent case, "intended that in appropriate circumstances, a debtor or other party in interest could move promptly to reinstate the protections of the automatic stay").

3. Granting Relief To The U.S. Trustee Affects Debtors' Reporting Requirements In Subsequent Bankruptcy Cases.

In addition, even apart from any impact on the automatic stay, if this Court grants the U.S. Trustee's requested relief, it will affect debtors' reporting requirements in any subsequent bankruptcy filings within the next eight years. See Gov't Br. 48. Official bankruptcy forms require debtors to inform the court of all prior bankruptcy "cases" filed in the past eight years. See Voluntary Petition Official Form 1 at 2. Absent relief from this Court, debtors could believe that because their cases were stricken, and because the bankruptcy court held that they never commenced a case, they are not required to report the present case when they file a subsequent petition. In contrast, if this Court reverses the district court, holds that a case "commenced," and remands for an entry of dismissal by the bankruptcy court, it will be clear that debtors must report the present case. This reporting requirement helps the U.S. Trustee monitor bankruptcy proceedings for abuse by repeat filers. And requiring debtors to report the dismissed case could affect their rights in subsequent bankruptcy cases with respect to, for example, any issue that arises regarding good faith where their history of prior filings is relevant.[2]

4. The U.S. Trustee Is Acting To Protect The Public Interest In Bankruptcy Proceedings, And She Has Suffered An Injury In That Capacity That May Still Be Fully Redressed.

The U.S. Trustee's appeal also satisfies the requirement that the party seeking relief has an injury that can be redressed. As noted, the U.S. Trustee moved to dismiss debtors' cases. The bankruptcy court denied the U.S. Trustee's motions, and the district court affirmed. A reversal by this Court would make clear that the bankruptcy court lacked authority to strike the petition, and would require dismissal of debtors' cases on remand. The U.S. Trustee, who is acting to protect the public interest by ensuring that bankruptcy proceedings are conducted in accordance with the Code, has therefore suffered an injury that can be fully redressed by a favorable decision by this Court.

[2] In discussing the merits of whether a bankruptcy court should strike a petition or dismiss a case where a debtor has not complied with the credit counseling requirement, Amicus argues (Br. 30 n.11) that the "form accompanying bankruptcy filings could – and, indeed, post-BAPCPA probably should – be changed to seek information about the number of 'petitions' filed." The fact remains, however, that over two years have passed since BAPCPA was enacted, and the form still refers to "cases." Speculation about whether the form could or should be changed does not affect the mootness question.

The U.S. Trustee's appeal is thus distinguishable from cases in which a plaintiff or appellant no longer has a stake in the litigation, and the Court is accordingly unable to provide effective relief. Unlike, for example, a student who has graduated from school and no longer has a cognizable interest in school policies or regulations, a prisoner who has been released from prison, or a company that has sold its business, the U.S. Trustee's stake in the present litigation has not changed: she is acting to advance the public interest and to ensure proper and consistent interpretation of the Code.[3]

The Supreme Court recognized this distinction when it held that a school desegregation case that otherwise would have become moot when plaintiff students graduated presented a live case or controversy because the United States had intervened. Pasadena City Bd. Of Educ. v. Spangler, 427 U.S. 424 (1976). Like the present case, where Congress conferred standing on the U.S. Trustee to raise and appear "on any issue" in "any case or proceeding" under the Bankruptcy Code (11 U.S.C. § 307), in Pasadena City Bd., the United States had a statutory right to intervene in the students' private action. See 427 U.S. at 430 (citing 42 U.S.C. § 2000h-2). In such circumstances, even if the plaintiffs who originally filed that private action could no longer obtain effective relief, the United States, which had a public interest stake in ensuring that municipal school boards did not violate students' constitutional rights, could continue with the litigation. See id.

It is in her role in ensuring that bankruptcy proceedings are conducted in accordance with the Code that the U.S. Trustee is injured. And this injury is not in any sense moot, since an order from this Court reversing the district court, thereby requiring dismissal of debtors' cases on remand, would afford effective relief. At the same time, the U.S. Trustee's injury in this case is specific to debtors, as debtors failed to comply with Section 109(h) of the Bankruptcy Code, and their cases therefore should have been dismissed as set forth in the U.S. Trustee's motions in bankruptcy court. Those motions were clearly adverse to debtors in bankruptcy court, and, as outlined above, the U.S. Trustee's appeal remains adverse to debtors' interests.[4] The relief that the U.S. Trustee seeks on appeal would require debtors to file a motion demonstrating good faith in any subsequent bankruptcy case that they file within a year

[4] Contrary to Amicus' suggestion (Br. 18 n.6), the U.S. Trustee thus is not arguing that, in light of its public interest standing, there need not be a case or controversy under Article III. As we have demonstrated, this case satisfies Article III requirements because a decision in the U.S. Trustee's favor on appeal would fully redress its injury and would affect debtors' statutory rights under the Bankruptcy Code.

from entry of dismissal on remand in order to extend the automatic stay past 30 days; without such relief, debtors are free to file a petition within a year without prejudice. The requested relief would also make clear that debtors must report the present case in any future bankruptcy proceeding in the next eight years, thus making the U.S. Trustee's enforcement and monitoring role easier and more accurate with respect to debtors.

In sum, this case is not moot "because [appellant] has a stake in the outcome of the proceeding and a federal court can effectuate relief should [appellant] prevail on the merits." Church of Scientology, 506 U.S. at 18 n.11.

5. If This Court Disagrees, And Determines That The Appeal Is Moot, It Should Vacate The Decisions Of The Lower Courts.

As demonstrated above, this appeal is not moot. This Court therefore need not reach Amicus' contention (Br. 17-18) that the appeal falls within the exception to the mootness doctrine for cases that are "capable of repetition yet evading review." Should this Court disagree with the U.S. Trustee and Amicus that the case is justiciable, however, it should vacate the decisions of both the district court and the bankruptcy court. See United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., 340 U.S. 36, 39-40 (1950) ("established practice" of Supreme Court when case becomes moot on appeal is to vacate judgment of lower courts); Van Wie v. Pataki, 267 F.3d 109, 115 (2d Cir. 2001).

II. WHERE, AS HERE, DEBTORS FAIL TO COMPLY WITH SECTION 109(h) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE, THE BANKRUPTCY COURT MUST DISMISS, RATHER THAN STRIKE, THE CASE.

As we demonstrated in our opening brief, when a debtor does not comply with the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h) of the Code, the bankruptcy court should dismiss the case rather than strike the case or petition. Indeed, there is no authority in the Bankruptcy Code for striking a petition or case in these circumstances. The U.S. Trustee's position that a bankruptcy court should dismiss such cases is consistent with the Bankruptcy Code, congressional intent, and the holdings of a substantial majority of courts that have addressed the issue.[5] Amicus advances several arguments in support of its position that the bankruptcy court had authority to strike debtors' petitions rather than dismiss their cases. None of these arguments is persuasive, however.

A. Debtors Commenced Cases Within The Meaning Of Section 301 Of The Bankruptcy Code.

Amicus argues that bankruptcy courts should strike petitions of ineligible debtors because such debtors cannot commence cases

[5] See Gov't Br. 31-32 & n.16. Since we filed our brief, three additional bankruptcy courts have determined that dismissal of the case is the appropriate disposition where a debtor has failed to comply with the credit counseling requirement. In re Francisco, – B.R. –, 2008 WL 244172 (Bankr. D. N.M. 2008); In re Falcone, 370 B.R. 462 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2007); In re Gossett, 369 B.R. 361 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007). One district court has affirmed a bankruptcy court's decision to strike a petition. Wyttenbach v. Commissioner, 382 B.R. 726 (S.D. Tex. 2008), appeal pending, 5th Cir. No. 08-40321.

under Section 301 of the Code.[6] Pursuant to Section 301, a "voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 301(a). Amicus argues (Br. 19-21) that there were no "cases" for the bankruptcy court to dismiss because, under Section 301, a case commences only where a petition is filed under a chapter of the Bankruptcy Code by an entity "that may be a debtor under such chapter." Amicus contends (Br. 19-20) that an individual who files a petition without complying with Section 109(h) "may not be a debtor" under the Bankruptcy Code, and thus cannot commence a case under Section 301.

1. Although Amicus purports to rely on the plain language of the Code to support its interpretation, neither the term "may" nor the phrase "may be a debtor" is defined in the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 101 (definitions). It is therefore appropriate to refer to the ordinary usage of the term "may," which "as used in § 301 of the Bankruptcy Code means 'might' or is meant to express a 'possibility.'" In re Tomco, 339 B.R. 145, 159 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2006).

Amicus argues (Br. 21), however, that in Section 109,

[6] Although the bankruptcy court below struck debtors' cases, Amicus advocates striking debtors' petitions, and "understands the bankruptcy court to have struck the petitions" despite the clear language of the court's orders striking the cases. A-49-51.

Congress defined the phrase “may be a debtor” for purposes of Section 301 “to exclude individuals that do not comply with the credit-counseling requirements.” Contrary to Amicus’ argument, Section 109 nowhere defines the sense in which Congress used the term “may” or the phrase “may be a debtor” in Section 301. Rather, Section 109 delineates who “may be a debtor” for purposes of determining eligibility for bankruptcy relief under various chapters of the Bankruptcy Code once a case has already commenced; it does not delineate who can commence a case for purposes of Section 301. Because determining whether an individual is eligible to be a debtor under the various subsections of Section 109 (including 109(h)) is often unclear from the face of the petition and may involve disputed issues of fact and law, a debtor who files a petition “may be a debtor” for purposes of commencing a case under Section 301, but nonetheless may subsequently be found ineligible for bankruptcy relief under Section 109. In re Ross, 338 B.R. 134, 138 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2006); Tomco, 339 B.R. at 159; Seaman, 340 B.R. at 707; In re Flores, 291 B.R. 44, 61 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2003). Otherwise, numerous bankruptcy cases would be legal nullities, even if they had remained pending for years due to a legal or factual dispute over eligibility under Section 109.

In fact, Amicus’ interpretation of how Section 109 limits the phrase “entity that may be a debtor” in Section 301 would apply equally to other subsections of Section 109, because that section as a whole -- not solely subsection (h) -- covers "who may be a debtor" under particular chapters of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. § 109. Such a result is unworkable because of the uncertainty that it would create in bankruptcy proceedings. E.g., Seaman, 340 B.R. at 707 (striking case would cause questions about "existence and willfulness of an automatic stay violation, and the validity of an action against property taken by a creditor of a petitioner who appears ineligible to be a debtor but later is determined to be eligible"); Ross, 338 B.R. at 140. Creditors and other parties "will not know whether a valid case exists without investigation," and "even if bankruptcy courts can fashion doctrines to avoid unfair results in such void ab initio situations, the fact remains that substantial uncertainty will cloud every transaction related to a bankruptcy case." Ross, 338 B.R. at 140-141; In re Jones, 352 B.R. 813, 823-824 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2006) (Section 349 of Code addresses effects of dismissals, not effects of striking of petition).

Amicus acknowledges (Br. 21-22) that there may be "proceedings in the bankruptcy court prior to a definitive ruling on whether an individual is eligible to commence a case," but contends that this is no different from the determinations a court must make to decide whether it has subject matter jurisdiction. Amicus' analogy to determinations of subject matter jurisdiction is telling. As noted (Gov't Br. 28-29), when a federal court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, it dismisses the case, it does not strike the complaint or case as a nullity.[7]

Moreover, when a court dismisses a case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, it is clear that in a subsequent case, the jurisdictional ruling has preclusive effect. A "dismissal for lack of jurisdiction precludes relitigation of the issue actually decided, namely the jurisdictional issue." Perry v. Sheahan, 222 F.3d 309, 318 (7th Cir. 2000); Insurance Corp. Of Ir., Ltd. v. Compagnie des Bauxites de Guinee, 456 U.S. 694, 702 n.9 (1982). In contrast, if every time a court held that it lacked jurisdiction (or, by analogy, if every time a court held that a debtor is ineligible), the entire proceeding became a legal nullity, then the applicability of doctrines such as res judicata and issue preclusion would become highly uncertain.[8] In short, contrary to Amicus' assertion (Br. 30), striking a petition on the ground that a debtor who is ineligible under Section 109(h)

[7] E.g., Makarova v. United States, 201 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2000); Close v. State of New York, 125 F.3d 31 (7th Cir. 1997) (same); see Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(3).

[8] See, e.g., Ross, 338 B.R. at 140 (if "there is a case before the court," then "[d]octrines of waiver or res judicata provide potential legal bases for fair resolution" of problems that might arise in case filed by ineligible debtor; however, such doctrines "may be unavailable if the case is void ab initio"); Jones, 352 B.R. at 824 (questions that arise from holding that petition filed by ineligible debtor is nullity include "when and how" issue decided prior to striking petition "becomes res judicata").

cannot commence a case does create uncertainty and the potential for prejudice to parties to bankruptcy proceedings.[9]

2. In addition, the position of Amicus and the courts below that a debtor who has not complied with Section 109(h) cannot commence a case under Section 301 would apply equally to situations in which individuals file a petition under the wrong chapter of the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 109. Section 301 expressly provides that a "voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 301 (emphasis added). If Amicus' argument that Section 109 defines the term "may be a debtor" for purposes of Section 301 were adopted, then a petition filed by an individual who is eligible to be a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code, but files a petition under the wrong chapter, would be a legal nullity. That is because under Amicus' interpretation of the plain language, that debtor would not commence a case because

[9] Moreover, as we explained (Br. 47-48), striking petitions and holding that an ineligible debtor does not commence a case could cause various practical problems involving reporting requirements, filing fees and compensation of trustees. Whether or not these problems could be resolved by changing a bankruptcy form, or by ruling a particular way (cf. Amicus Br. 30 n.11), the point remains that if the U.S. Trustee's position is adopted, bankruptcy courts would not even have to raise such questions, much less answer them: A case would exist until a court determines that the debtor is ineligible, at which time the court would dismiss the case, thus making it clear how such case should be treated for purposes of both limitations on the automatic stay in future cases and for reporting requirements.

she is not an "entity that may be a debtor under such chapter."

Indeed, if adopted, Amicus' argument would extend to a debtor who files a petition under Chapter 13 but is ineligible under Section 109(e). Could a court still convert the Chapter 13 petition to a Chapter 7 petition rather than strike it? The answer provided by the Bankruptcy Code is yes: Section 1307(c) states that "on request of a party in interest or the United States trustee and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under this chapter to a case under chapter 7 of this title." 11 U.S.C. § 1307(c). And, as courts have recognized, ineligibility under Chapter 13 is a valid ground for conversion to Chapter 7. See, e.g., Rudd v. Laughlin, 866 F.2d 1040, 1041 (8th Cir. 1989) (where debtor files Chapter 13 petition but is ineligible under Section 109(e), court has jurisdiction to convert to Chapter 7 and case is not legal nullity); In re Jones, 129 B.R. 1003, 1009 (Bankr. N.D. Ill.) ("the converted case is commenced by the filing of the petition even if the debtor was not eligible for relief under the chapter named in the petition"), aff'd, 134 B.R. 274 (N.D. Ill. 1991).[10]

[10] As the Jones court observed in response to the argument that the filing of a petition by a debtor ineligible under Section 109(e) did not commence a case, "it is metaphysical to argue that there is no 'case' here. If there is no 'case,' then what are the parties doing here and what is that thick file doing in the Clerk's office?" 129 B.R. at 1010.

required to strike the petition as a legal nullity in such circumstances because it did not commence a case. That result demonstrates the flaw in Amicus' purported "plain language" argument -- according to Amicus' interpretation of the phrase "may be a debtor," in Section 301, in order to commence a case, an individual must be eligible pursuant to the particular chapter under which she filed her petition. Otherwise, the petition does not commence a case, and if there is no "case" to dismiss, presumably there is no "case" to convert.

3. Moreover, the "words 'entity that may be a debtor'" that appear in Section 301 "have been in the [Bankruptcy Code] from the outset." In re Francisco, -- B.R. –, 2008 WL 244172 (Bankr. D. N.M. 2008) at *6. There is thus "a usage for that language that predates the enactment of § 109(h)(1) and does not mandate striking the petition for a violation of § 109(h)(1)." Id. Indeed, before the enactment of the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h), courts routinely dismissed, not struck, cases where the debtor was ineligible under other subsections of Section 109.[11] When Congress enacted BAPCPA, it therefore "was legislating against a background of (1) cases under various chapters dismissed for ineligibility pursuant to § 109," and "(2)

cases not found void ab initio for violations of § 109(g)." Id. at *7. Congress did not indicate that the newly-enacted credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h) should be treated any differently from the other eligibility requirements in Section 109. Id.; In re Gossett, 369 B.R. 361, 373-374 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2007) ("[t]here is no indication that Congress intended to treat § 109(h) ineligibility any different than any other form of ineligibility in § 109"; thus, dismissal is proper disposition where debtor has failed to comply with § 109(h)).

B. Amicus' Position That The Bankruptcy Court Had Authority To Strike Debtors' Petitions Finds No Support In The Bankruptcy Code And Is Contrary To Congressional Intent.

1. Amicus contends (Br. 25-26) that the U.S. Trustee's reliance on pre-BAPCPA cases that routinely dismiss cases filed by debtors who are ineligible under Section 109 is unsound because "until recently, courts had little reason to be concerned with whether an ineligible debtor's petition should be stricken or his case should be dismissed," whereas after BAPCPA, the results of dismissal can lead to limitation of the automatic stay in future cases. This argument is unavailing. Indeed, "the fact that the consequences of a dismissal are potentially more dire does not by itself warrant a change in what leads to dismissals." Francisco, – B.R. –, 2008 WL 244172 at *7. Moreover, Amicus' position conflicts with Congress's purpose in enacting BAPCPA; indeed, "various provisions of BAPCPA * * * belie any notion that Congress wrote BAPCPA to benefit debtors."[12] Id.

2. In the alternative, Amicus contends (Br. 26) that, in any event, "it was far from universal before BAPCPA that a bankruptcy court would dismiss a case upon the filing of a petition by an ineligible debtor." In support of this argument, Amicus cites two cases for the proposition that pre-BAPCPA, "several courts struck petitions filed by debtors" found ineligible under Section 109(g). Amicus Br. 26 (citing Rowe v. Ocwen Fed. Bank & Trust, 220 B.R. 591 (E.D. Tex. 1997), aff'd, 178 F.3d 1290 (5th Cir. 1999); In re Keziah, 46 B.R. 551 (Bankr. W.D.N.C. 1985)). But only Keziah involves the striking of a petition (46 B.R. at 555); contrary to Amicus' suggestion, the district court in Rowe repeatedly refers to the bankruptcy court's "dismissal, with prejudice" of debtor's petition because he was ineligible under Section 109(g). Rowe, 220 B.R. at 592-595 (emphasis added). By citing one pre-BAPCPA case in which a court struck a petition, Amicus has failed to cast doubt on the U.S. Trustee's point, and that of the bankruptcy courts upon which she relied, that a substantial majority of courts dismissed, not struck, cases in which debtors were found ineligible under Section 109 pre-BAPCPA. Moreover, Keziah says

[12] For example, as noted (Gov't Br. 43), in BAPCPA, Congress sought to prevent repeat bankruptcy filers from abusing bankruptcy proceedings by limiting application of the automatic stay where the debtor had a prior case dismissed in the preceding year. 11 U.S.C. §§ 362(c)(3), 362(c)(4).

nothing about Section 301 and the meaning of "entity that may be a debtor" thereunder, nor does it cite any Code provision that authorizes striking a petition as opposed to dismissing the case.

Amicus and the courts below contend, however, that 11 U.S.C. 105(a) provides the bankruptcy court with authority to strike debtors' petitions. Specifically, Amicus argues (Br. 27) that Section 105(a) of the Code allows the bankruptcy court to "effectuate the plain language of § 301 and fill in the interstices of the Code by striking the petition." But as we have shown (Gov't Br. 33-34), Section 105(a), which grants the bankruptcy court authority to "issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of [the Code]," by its terms limits the bankruptcy court's equitable power to "carrying out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, rather than to further the purposes of the Code generally, or otherwise to do the right thing." In re Dairy Mart Convenience Stores, Inc., 351 F.3d 86, 92 (2d Cir. 2003). While provisions of the Code authorize the dismissal of cases for cause, the Code does not provide for the striking of a case or petition. Gov't Br. 29-31, 33-34. Amicus and the courts below thus err by relying on Section 105, because it does not allow the bankruptcy court to take an action that is not authorized under the provisions of the Code.[13] In re Mason, 2007 WL 433077 at *3.

C. Amicus Bases Its Position That The Automatic Stay Is Triggered Even If A Case Does Not Commence On An Additional Error Of Statutory Interpretation.

Amicus parts ways with the bankruptcy court below by arguing that the automatic stay is invoked by a debtor who files a petition without complying with Section 109(h).[14] Amicus Br. 22-

[13] Nor do Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 and 7012(b) advance Amicus' argument. Amicus acknowledges (Br. 28) that neither rule "provides express authorization for the striking of a petition," but claims that they show that "striking a petition is within a bankruptcy court's arsenal of remedies." But as we demonstrated (Gov't Br. 34-35), these rules give the bankruptcy court authority to strike a pleading or portion thereof under specific, limited circumstances that are inapplicable here. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 (authority to strike unsigned filing if, after receiving notice, party fails to promptly correct omission of signature); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7012(b) (incorporating Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(e),(f) in adversary proceedings).

[14] Amicus agrees with our position (Gov't Br. 39 n.18) that this Court's pre-BAPCPA decision in In re Casse, 198 F.3d 327 (2d Cir. 1999) does not cast doubt on the conclusion that the automatic stay is invoked. As Amicus states (Br. 25), in Casse, "this Court implicitly recognized that, while an ineligible debtor's filing of a petition triggers the automatic stay, it can be annulled under § 362 on a case-by-case basis[.]"

We disagree with Amicus, however, with respect to his contention (Br. 24) that the Court in Casse concluded "that the ineligible debtor's case was void ab initio (in essence, that the debtor had never commenced a case)[.]" Casse did not discuss whether a case commenced under Section 301. In any event, as we explained (Gov't Br. 39 n.18), Casse is distinguishable. First, it did not involve the statutory restriction on eligibility in Section 109; rather, it involved a case in which the debtor violated a prior court order, issued pursuant to the bankruptcy court's authority under Sections 349(a) and 105(a), barring him from filing a subsequent petition. Second, Casse was decided pre-BAPCPA, before Congress's enactment of Section 362(b)(21)(A) made clear its understanding that, in the absence of an express statutory exception to the stay, a petition filed under Section 24; Thompson, 344 B.R. at 906. Amicus' position that the stay is invoked is in significant tension with his position that a petition filed by a debtor ineligible under Section 109 does not commence a case under Section 301. If a petition is a legal nullity that should be stricken from the record, how can it invoke the automatic stay? Like the bankruptcy court in Thompson (344 B.R. at 906), Amicus attempts to reconcile his contradictory positions by arguing that, under Section 362, the mere "filing of a petition operates as a stay" -- regardless of whether the petition commences a case. Amicus Br. 23.

By arguing that the automatic stay is triggered even if a case does not commence under Section 301, Amicus and the Thompson bankruptcy court introduce an additional error of statutory interpretation. Under Section 362(a), "[e]xcept as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a petition filed under section 301, 302 or 303 of this title * * * operates as a stay." 11 U.S.C. § 362(a). Thus, Section 362(a) expressly refers to petitions filed under Sections 301, 302 or 303, which in turn set forth when voluntary, joint or involuntary cases commence under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. §§ 301, 302, 303; see Bankr. Op. 17, A-29. If a case commences, the automatic stay thus takes effect; conversely, if a case does not commence, the automatic stay is not triggered. It is illogical to argue, as Amicus does, that a petition that should be stricken as a legal nullity nonetheless has the substantial legal effect of invoking the protection of the automatic stay.

Moreover, by taking the position that a petition filed by a debtor ineligible under Section 109(h) does not commence a case but nonetheless triggers the automatic stay, Amicus manages not only to conflict with courts that have held that a case commences when an ineligible debtor files a petition, but also with the bankruptcy court below.[15] Bankr. Op. 17, A-29 ("[a] straightforward reading of § 362(a) indicates that the automatic stay comes into existence only when a case is filed in accordance with §§ 301, 302 or 303 of the BAPCPA"). This inconsistency among courts that advocate striking is also exemplified by the conflict between Wyttenbach v. Commissioner, 382 B.R. 726 (S.D. Tex. 2008), appeal pending, 5th Cir. No. 08-40321, upon which Amicus relies (Br. 24, 28 n.10), and Amicus' position regarding whether the automatic stay is invoked. See Wyttenbach, 382 B.R. at 730 (relying on bankruptcy court holding that striking petition appropriate because stay would not be invoked if petition were struck as legal nullity).

[15] Amicus' reliance on In re Brown, 342 B.R. 248 (Bankr. D. Md. 2006) illustrates this conflict. Although Brown supports Amicus' position on the automatic stay, it does not support Amicus' argument that there is no "case" to dismiss when a debtor is ineligible. To the contrary, in Brown, the court dismissed debtor's case when it found that her certification of credit counseling was insufficient. 342 B.R. at 250.

That there is no unified view of the effect of a court's striking of a case or petition underscores the uncertainty caused by the bankruptcy court's decision below to strike, rather than dismiss, debtors' cases. In contrast, the U.S. Trustee's position that the filing of a petition by a debtor ineligible under Section 109(h) commences a case and invokes the automatic stay is consistent with the plain language of Section 362(a) and with the numerous courts that have held that dismissal is appropriate where a debtor is ineligible under Section 109(h).

* * * * * *

In short, the U.S. Trustee's position, and that of the majority of courts that have addressed the issue, is consistent with the Bankruptcy Code, reflects congressional intent in enacting BAPCPA and avoids confusion. Thus, this Court should hold that the filing of a petition with the bankruptcy court commences a case under Section 301 and invokes the automatic stay. If and when the bankruptcy court ultimately decides that an individual is ineligible to be a debtor, the court should dismiss the case, and the stay will then terminate.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

This is an appeal from an order and judgment issued in these consolidated cases by the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Brieant, J.). See Special Appendix ("SPA") 1-14.[1] The ruling below is not reported, but is available App. P. 30 and Circuit Rule 30. When a document does not appear in the special appendix or the appendix, the citation will be to the applicable bankruptcy court record number (Zarnel Record “ZR”; Finlay Record “FR”; Elmendorf Record “ER”) or district court record number for the lead district court case, 06-6039(D.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

On July 28, 2006, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York entered final orders striking the cases of debtors-appellees Shayna H. Zarnel, Diana M. Finlay and Lena M. Elmendorf (collectively “debtors”), thereby denying the relief sought by the Acting United States Trustee (“U.S. Trustee”) in her motions to dismiss the cases. Appendix (“A”) 49-51. The U.S. Trustee filed timely notices of appeal of the bankruptcy court’s orders on July 28, 2006. ZR 36, FR 21, ER 18;[2] see Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002.

The district court had jurisdiction to hear the U.S. Trustee’s appeals pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a). On November 8, 2006, the district court entered a final judgment dismissing the U.S. Trustee’s appeals for lack of standing, and, in the alternative, affirming the bankruptcy court’s orders on the merits. SPA-14. The U.S. Trustee filed timely notices of appeal on January 5, 2007. A–52-62; see Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(1)(B).

Ct. R.), and page or paragraph within the document cited.

[2] As the district court docket sheets reflect, the U.S. Trustee, in an abundance of caution, had previously filed notices of appeal in each of the three cases from the bankruptcy court’s opinion, since that opinion contained language ordering the cases stricken. See A–1, A-3, A-5. The U.S. Trustee subsequently filed a second notice of appeal in each of the three cases after the bankruptcy court entered separate orders striking the respective cases. A-7, A-9, A-11.

This Court has jurisdiction over the consolidated appeals pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 1291.[3]

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. Whether the district court erred by dismissing the U.S. Trustee's appeals for lack of standing.

2. Whether the district court erred by, in the alternative, affirming the bankruptcy court's decision to strike, rather than dismiss, debtors' cases for failure to obtain the requisite credit counseling under Section 109(h) of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 109(h).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Debtors Shayna Zarnel and Diana Finlay filed petitions under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, and debtor Lena Elmendorf filed a petition under Chapter 7 of the Code in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York. ZR 1; FR 1; ER 1. None of the debtors had obtained the requisite credit counseling under 11 U.S.C. § 109(h), nor had they qualified for a temporary waiver of the requirement. See Bankruptcy Court slip opinion ("Bankr. Op.") at 4-7, A-16-19.[4] The U.S. Trustee filed motions to dismiss on this ground under Sections 1307(c) in the Zarnel and Finlay cases, and under Section 707(a) in the Elmendorf case. Id.; op. 13, A-25. The bankruptcy court (Morris, J.), considered the motions to dismiss the three cases jointly. Id. at 1-30, A-13-42. Although no party had opposed the U.S. Trustee's motions to dismiss, the court decided to strike, rather than dismiss, the debtors' cases for failure to comply with Section 109(h). Id.

The U.S. Trustee filed timely notices of appeal of the bankruptcy court's orders striking the cases to the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. ZR 36, FR 21, ER 18. The district court dismissed the U.S. Trustee's appeals, and, in the alternative affirmed the bankruptcy court's orders on the merits. Judgment, SPA-14.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory Framework[5]

1. The U.S. Trustee Program is a component of the Department of Justice that administers and enforces the Bankruptcy Code. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-89. U.S. Trustees are senior Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General who "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within their respective regions. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 581(a), 586(a)(3). As Congress explained, U.S.

[5] Pertinent statutory provisions are set forth in the Special Appendix attached to this brief.

Trustees “serve as enforcers of the bankruptcy laws by bringing proceedings in bankruptcy courts in particular cases in which a particular action taken or proposed to be taken deviates from the standards established by the proposed Bankruptcy Code.” H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. at 109 (1977), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 6070. Congress has expressly granted the U.S. Trustee standing to “raise and * * * appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding” arising under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 307.

2. On April 20, 2005, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (“BAPCPA”), which took effect on October 17, 2005. See Pub. L. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005). Congress enacted BAPCPA “to improve bankruptcy law and practice by restoring personal responsibility and integrity in the bankruptcy system and ensure that the system is fair for both debtors and creditors.” H.R. Rep. No. 31(I), 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 2 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89.

As relevant to the present case, BAPCPA amended Section 109 of the Code by adding the requirement that an individual receive credit counseling during the 180-day period before filing a bankruptcy petition. 11 U.S.C. § 109(h)(1).[6] Section 109 of the

[6] Specifically, Section 109(h) requires that an individual, “during the 180-day period preceding the date of filing of the petition * * * receive[] from an approved nonprofit budget and credit counseling agency described in section 111(a) an individual or group briefing (including a briefing conducted by

Bankruptcy Code sets forth “who may be a debtor” under applicable chapters of the Code. 11 U.S.C. § 109. These eligibility rules include, for example, the requirement that only those individuals who receive “regular income” and who owe less than statutorily-specified amounts in debt, may qualify as debtors under Chapter 13 (11 U.S.C. § 109(e)), and, after BAPCPA, the credit counseling requirement of Section 109(h).

Congress mandated pre-petition credit counseling so that debtors would “make an informed choice about bankruptcy, its alternatives, and consequences.” H.R. Rep. No. 31(I), 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 2, reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 89. Under Section 109(h), an individual is ineligible to be a debtor if he does not receive such credit counseling, unless the U.S. Trustee determines that counseling is not reasonably available in the individual’s district, or the individual qualifies for a temporary waiver from the court. 11 U.S.C. § 109(h)(2),(3). To obtain a waiver, the debtor must certify, in a manner “satisfactory to the court,” that (1) exigent circumstances “merit a waiver of” the pre-petition credit counseling requirement, and (2) he requested credit counseling from an approved agency, but was unable to obtain it within 5 days of his request. 11 U.S.C. § 109(h)(3)(A). If the debtor fulfills these telephone or on the Internet) that outlined the opportunities for available credit counseling and assisted such individual in performing a related budget analysis.” 11 U.S.C. § 109(h).

conditions, the court can grant a temporary waiver, which can extend until no later than 30 days after the petition is filed, “except that the court, for cause, may order an additional 15 days” for the debtor to obtain credit counseling. 11 U.S.C. § 109(h)(3)(B).

In addition, section 521(b)(1) requires the debtor to file with the court a “certificate from the approved nonprofit budget and credit counseling agency” that provided the required credit counseling. 11 U.S.C. § 521(b)(1).

3. Under Section 301 of the Code, a “voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter.” 11 U.S.C. § 301(a). In the present case, debtor Lena Elmendorf filed a petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. Section 707 of the Code provides that a bankruptcy court “may dismiss a case” under Chapter 7 “for cause” after notice and a hearing. 11 U.S.C. § 707(a). Debtors Shayna Zarnel and Diana Finlay filed petitions under Chapter 13 of the Code. Section 1307 of that chapter provides that a bankruptcy court may convert a Chapter 13 case to a case under Chapter 7 or “may dismiss” the case, “whichever is in the best interests of creditors and the estate, for cause” after notice and a hearing. 11 U.S.C. § 1307(c).

Section 362, the “automatic stay” provision of the Bankruptcy Code, provides that the filing of a petition under Section 301 “operates as a stay” of certain collection and other actions by creditors against the debtor. 11 U.S.C. § 362(a). When it enacted BAPCPA, to discourage debtors from “bad faith repeat filings,” Congress amended Section 362 to limit application of the automatic stay where, in the previous year, a debtor’s case has been “dismissed” by the bankruptcy court. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3); H.R. Rep. No. 31(I), 109th Cong., 1st Sess. at 69, reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 138.

Accordingly, as amended, Section 362 provides that if a debtor filing a petition under Chapter 7, 11 or 13 had a prior petition dismissed during the preceding year, the automatic stay “shall terminate with respect to the debtor on the 30th day after the filing of the later case.” 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3)(A). The debtor may move for a continuation of the stay, and the bankruptcy court may grant the motion if the debtor “demonstrates that the filing of the later case is in good faith as to the creditors to be stayed.” 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3)(B). Congress further provided, however, that the debtor’s later case “is presumptively filed not in good faith (but such presumption may be rebutted by clear and convincing evidence to the contrary)” if the debtor had “more than 1 previous case” pending within the prior year, or had a previous case dismissed during the preceding year “after the debtor failed to * * * file or amend the petition or other documents as required by this title or the court without substantial excuse (but mere inadvertence or negligence shall not be a substantial excuse unless the dismissal was caused by the negligence of the debtor's attorney)." 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3)(C)(i)(I),(II)(aa).

In addition, the automatic stay will not go into effect at the outset of the case if the debtor had two or more bankruptcy petitions dismissed within the previous year unless the debtor can demonstrate that its later case is filed in good faith. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(4)(A),(B). However, the later case is presumed not to be filed in good faith if the debtor either had two or more cases pending in the past year, or had a previous case dismissed in the preceding year for failure to "file or amend the petition or other documents as required by this title or the court without substantial excuse (but mere inadvertence or negligence shall not be a substantial excuse unless the dismissal was caused by the negligence of the debtor's attorney)[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(4)(D)(i)(I),(II).

B. The Present Litigation

1. Shayna H. Zarnel

On March 13, 2006, debtor Shayna H. Zarnel, proceeding pro se, filed a petition under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, and a motion to extend time to seek credit counseling under Section 109(h). ZR 1, 2; Bankr. Op. 6-7, A-18-19. Although this was Zarnel’s first bankruptcy petition, her husband had filed five bankruptcy petitions since January, 2004. Bankr. Op. 6 & n.7, A–18 & n.7. On April 3, 2006, Zarnel filed a certificate reflecting that she received credit counseling eight days after she filed her petition. ZR 13, Bankr. Op. 7, A-19. The U.S. Trustee filed a motion to dismiss Zarnel’s petition for cause under Section 1307(c), because she had failed to comply with the mandatory pre-petition credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h). ZR 16, Bankr. Op. 7, A-19. On May 23, 2006, the bankruptcy court denied Zarnel’s extension request because she had failed to demonstrate exigent circumstances as required by 11 U.S.C. § 109(h)(3)(A). ZR 18, Bankr. Op. 7, A-19. The court held a hearing on the U.S. Trustee’s motion to dismiss and determined that it would rule on the motion in conjunction with the Finlay and Elmendorf cases. Bankr. Op. 7-8, A–19-20.

2. Diana M. Finlay

On April 3, 2006, Diana M. Finlay, proceeding pro se, filed a petition under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, and a motion to extend time to seek credit counseling under Section 109(h). FR 1, 2; Bankr. Op. 5, A-17. Two days later, the bankruptcy court denied Finlay’s motion, on the ground that she had failed to comply with the requirement in Section 109(h)(3)(A)(ii) that the debtor certify that she had requested credit counseling from an approved agency, but had been unable to obtain it within five days of her request. FR 6, Bankr. Op. 5, A–17.

Finlay had filed two prior petitions within the preceding year. Bankr. Op. 5, A-17. Because those cases were dismissed, the bankruptcy court found that “no stay came into effect upon the filing of the current petition in accordance with 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(4)[.]” Id. at 6, A–18. On May 3, 2006, the U.S. Trustee also moved to dismiss Finlay’s petition for cause under Section 1307(c), because she had failed to comply with Section 109(h). FR 11, Bankr. Op. 6, A-18. The court deferred ruling on the U.S. Trustee’s motion so that it could consider it in conjunction with the Zarnel and Elmendorf cases. Bankr. Op. 6, A–18.

3. Lena M. Elmendorf

On November 29, 2005, Lena M. Elmendorf, who was represented by counsel, filed a petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. ER 1, Bankr. Op. 4, A-16. Elmendorf failed to file either a certificate indicating compliance with the credit counseling requirement or a request for a temporary waiver of the requirement. See Bankr. Op. 4, A-16. On February 1, 2006, the U.S. Trustee filed a motion to dismiss Elmendorf’s petition under Section 707(a) for failure to comply with Section 109(h). ER 7, Bankr. Op. 4-5, A-16-17. The court held a hearing on the U.S. Trustee’s motion, and deferred ruling on it so that it could decide the case together with Zarnel and Finlay. Bankr. Op. 5, A–17.

4. Bankruptcy Court Decision

On July 18, 2006, the bankruptcy court issued an opinion addressing the U.S. Trustee's motions to dismiss in the Zarnel, Finlay and Elmendorf cases. Op. 1-30, A-13-42. At the outset, the court recognized that "[c]redit counseling is an absolute pre-requisite to individual bankruptcy eligibility." Id. at 11, A-23. In the court's view, however, failure to comply with that requirement alone is not "cause" to dismiss a case. Id. at 3-4; 15-27, A-15-16; A-27-39. Rather, consistent with its prior decision in In re Rios, 336 B.R. 177 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 2005), the court held that if a debtor fails to obtain credit counseling, her case should be stricken, not dismissed, in the absence of other circumstances indicating that the failure to obtain counseling is "not due to ignorance but as part of a larger scheme to delay or hinder creditors." Id. at 3-4, A-15-16.

Although the court acknowledged (Op. 14, A-26) that the "tide of judicial opinion is against" it, since "almost all cases published subsequent to [its prior decision in] Rios dismiss for 'cause' cases filed by debtors ineligible for relief by virtue of Section 109(h)," it nonetheless held that it was appropriate to strike, rather than dismiss, a case in which the debtor failed to obtain credit counseling. The court also ruled that the automatic stay under Section 362 did not go into effect where an individual has neither obtained credit counseling nor received a temporary waiver of the requirement. Id. at 17, A-29. According to the court, a debtor's ineligibility for relief in such circumstances is "incurable," and Congress intended that "incurably ineligible debtors not be permitted to enjoy the protections of the automatic stay." Id. at 23, A-35.

In response to the U.S. Trustee's argument that it lacked authority under the Bankruptcy Code to strike a case, the court stated that "where Congress has not explicitly directed bankruptcy courts to a required outcome, the Court may act within its discretion." Op. 25, A-37. Relying on Section 105(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, which provides bankruptcy courts with authority to "issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title" (11 U.S.C. § 105(a)), and its "inherent docket management powers," the court denied the U.S. Trustee's motions to dismiss and struck the Elmendorf, Finlay and Zarnel cases.[7] Op. 26-29, A-38-41.

[7] The bankruptcy court sua sponte certified its orders in the three cases to this Court for direct appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(2). As we informed the Court, the U.S. Trustee did not request such certification; rather, the U.S. Trustee believed that the issue in the cases would benefit from further litigation before the district court prior to any appeal to this Court. Accordingly, the U.S. Trustee filed timely notices of appeal to the district court, and did not petition this Court for permission to appeal. On November 17, 2006, this Court consolidated and dismissed the appeals because "[n]either the debtors nor the United States Trustee have filed a petition for permission to appeal, pursuant to Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 5(a)" and "the bankruptcy court is not a "party" within the meaning of Fed. R. App. P. 5(a)." November 17, 2006 Order, Second Circuit Nos. 06-3521, 06-3524, 06-3530.

5. District Court Decision

The district court consolidated the Zarnel, Finlay and Elmendorf cases for decision. D. Ct. Op. 1, SPA-1. On November 8, 2006, the district court entered judgment dismissing the U.S. Trustee's appeals for lack of standing, and, in the alternative, affirming the bankruptcy court's orders "in all respects." SPA-14. The court's ruling that the U.S. Trustee lacked appellate standing appeared to rest on its view that the Trustee was not "substantively aggrieved" by the district court's order. See D. Ct. Op. 6-7, SPA-6-7. Although the court acknowledged that "[o]ne would think that since the United States Trustee has unquestioned standing to move to dismiss a petition, he or she would also have standing to appeal from the denial of such a motion," the court ruled otherwise, based on the "person aggrieved" standard that this Court has applied to private parties' standing to appeal bankruptcy court orders. Id.

The court found it "difficult" to "perceive that the [U.S.] Trustee is aggrieved under the circumstances of these cases." D. Ct. Op. 7, SPA-7. The court stated that "[w]here the Trustee had engaged in the sale of property or some other substantive event, very likely the recourse to a motion to strike as opposed to a motion to dismiss might constitute an abuse of discretion by the Court and might or might not have an adverse effect on some interlocutory action taken by the Trustee in connection with the administration of the estate prior to the striking." Id. However, the court found that since no such actions were taken in the present cases, and no "creditor's rights were limited or affected in any way" by the bankruptcy court's orders, "consideration of the issue must await the proper case." Id. Nonetheless, "[h]aving no great confidence" in its ruling on standing, the court proceeded to decide the merits. Id.

The court agreed with the bankruptcy court that, where, at the time she files a petition, an individual has neither obtained the requisite credit counseling nor qualified for a temporary waiver of the requirement, the automatic stay does not take effect. D. Ct. Op. 8-9, SPA 8-9. The court also held that the bankruptcy court had "an historic and inherent power" to strike a petition in its entirety "for good cause."[8] Id. at 10, SPA-10. The court relied on Bankruptcy Code Section 105(a), which authorizes the bankruptcy court to issue orders that are "'necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions'" of the Code. Id. at 10-11, SPA 10-11 (quoting 11 U.S.C. § 105(a)). The court found that Congress "has not explicitly directed Bankruptcy Courts to a required outcome" regarding whether a case should be

[8] The district court erroneously framed the issue as whether the bankruptcy court had the authority to strike a petition, when in fact the bankruptcy court struck all three cases. Indeed, the court appears to misquote the U.S. Trustee's statement of the issue. Compare D. Ct. Op. 5, SPA–5, with U.S. Trustee Br., D. Ct. R. 6 at 1.

stricken or dismissed for failure to comply with Section 109(h), and thus the bankruptcy court did not act "ultra vires" by striking "the pleadings in these cases." Id. at 11, SPA-11.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. The district court erred by dismissing the U.S. Trustee's appeals for lack of standing. Section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code expressly confers standing on the U.S. Trustee to "raise and * * * appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding" arising under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 307. As the courts of appeals that have addressed the issue have unanimously held, the U.S. Trustee thus need not meet the "person aggrieved" standard to have appellate standing. In the present case, the U.S. Trustee seeks to advance the public interest and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted consistent with the Code, and therefore has appellate standing regardless of whether she has a pecuniary interest in the appeal.

2. The district court erred by affirming the bankruptcy court's decision to strike debtors' cases. After BAPCPA was enacted, an important issue has arisen regarding the proper manner in which to dispose of a case where, as here, the debtors have failed to comply with the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h). A substantial majority of courts have agreed with the U.S. Trustee's position that a bankruptcy court must dismiss a case when it determines that debtors are ineligible for bankruptcy relief due to failure to satisfy the credit counseling requirement.

The U.S. Trustee’s position reflects a proper interpretation of the Bankruptcy Code, advances congressional intent, and avoids uncertainty and confusion in bankruptcy proceedings. While the Bankruptcy Code specifically provides the court with authority to “dismiss” cases for “cause,” and sets forth the effect of such a dismissal on the parties, it does not authorize the striking of a case or petition for failure to meet the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h). Accordingly, prior to the passage of BAPCPA, courts routinely dismissed -- not struck –- cases for debtors’ failure to meet eligibility requirements under other subsections of Section 109.

Dismissal of cases for failure to comply with Section 109(h) also helps implement Congress’s purpose in amending Section 362 to limit applicability of the automatic stay in cases that are filed within a year of a prior dismissal. Congress intended to deter repeat filers from abusing bankruptcy proceedings, and the decisions of the courts below circumvent this purpose by striking the petition rather than dismissing the case, thereby allowing a debtor to avoid such limits if he files a subsequent petition.

Indeed, the U.S. Trustee’s position provides the only workable and consistent reading of the Code. Under this majority view, when an individual files a petition under Section 301, he has commenced a case, and the automatic stay is triggered. If and when the bankruptcy court later decides that the individual is ineligible to be a debtor under Section 109, the court should dismiss the case for cause. In contrast, the minority of courts that have rejected the U.S. Trustee's position have divided over issues such as whether to dismiss the petition or the case, and whether the automatic stay is invoked by the filing of a petition by an individual who is ineligible for bankruptcy relief under Section 109(h). For this reason, and because the Code does not provide any guidance on the consequences of a bankruptcy court order striking a petition or case, the decisions of the courts below will cause significant uncertainty and potential prejudice to the parties in bankruptcy proceedings.

STATEMENT OF THE STANDARD OF REVIEW

1. Whether the U.S. Trustee has appellate standing is a legal question that this Court reviews de novo. See Mid-Hudson Catskill Rural Migrant Ministry, Inc. v. Fine Host Corp., 418 F.3d 168, 173 (2d Cir. 2005).

2. This Court, like the district court, reviews de novo the bankruptcy court's legal conclusions, including its construction of the Bankruptcy Code. In re Momentum Mfg. Corp., 25 F.3d 1132, 1136 (2d Cir. 1994). Whether the bankruptcy court had authority under the Bankruptcy Code to strike, rather than dismiss, debtors' cases for failure to comply with Section 109(h) is a legal question subject to de novo review.

ARGUMENT

I. THE U.S. TRUSTEE HAS STANDING TO APPEAL THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S ORDERS STRIKING DEBTORS' CASES.

The district court dismissed the U.S. Trustee's appeals for lack of standing because the U.S. Trustee did not meet the "person aggrieved" standard that this Court applies to determine a private party's standing to appeal a bankruptcy court order. In doing so, however, the court acknowledged that it had "[n]o great confidence" in its ruling. D. Ct. Op. 6-7, SPA-6–7. This lack of confidence is understandable, since, as set forth below, the district court's holding conflicts with well-established case law addressing the U.S. Trustee's appellate standing.

A. In Section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code, Congress conferred standing on the U.S. Trustee to "raise and * * * appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding" arising under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 307. As the Third Circuit has observed, "[i]t is difficult to conceive of a statute that more clearly signifies Congress's intent to confer standing." In re Columbia Gas Sys., Inc., 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994). Accordingly, while this Court has not addressed the issue, the courts of appeals that have addressed it have unanimously held that the U.S. Trustee need not have a pecuniary interest in a bankruptcy case to have standing to appeal. See, e.g., In re United Artists Theatre Co., 315 F.3d 217, 225 (3d Cir. 2003); Columbia Gas, 33 F.3d at 296-99; In re Clark, 927 F.2d 793, 795-96 (4th Cir. 1991); In re Plaza de Diego Shopping Ctr., 911 F.2d 820, 824 (1st Cir. 1990); In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d 498, 499-500 (6th Cir. 1990).

Here, the district court erroneously relied on the "person aggrieved" standard, applicable to private parties' standing in bankruptcy appeals, in determining that the U.S. Trustee lacked standing. D. Ct. Op. 6-7, SPA-6-7. As the Fourth Circuit explained, although courts "traditionally have used the 'person aggrieved' test to determine appellate standing in bankruptcy cases," under which a party generally must be "directly and adversely affected pecuniarily," that standard does not apply to U.S. Trustees.[9] Clark, 927 F.2d at 795 (internal quotations omitted).

Indeed, courts have recognized that under Section 307, the Trustee has standing to protect the public interest. E.g., Columbia Gas, 33 F.3d at 296-99; Clark, 927 F.2d at 795-96; Revco, 898 F.2d at 499-500. In so holding, courts have relied on the legislative history of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 and the Bankruptcy Act of 1986, in which Congress described the U.S. Trustee's role in protecting the public interest and "'ensuring [9] Although the "person aggrieved" test was originally codified in Section 39(c) of the Bankruptcy Act, Congress repealed that section in 1978, and the test no longer appears in the statute. Clark, 927 F.2d at 795. Courts have nonetheless continued to apply the test to private parties' appeals. Id.

that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law.'" Revco, 898 F.2d at 500 (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong. 2d Sess. at 109 (1977), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5787, 6070); Clark, 927 F.2d at 795 (same). As Congress made clear,"'[t]he U.S. Trustee is given standing to raise, appear, and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under title 11, U.S. Code." Columbia Gas, 33 F.3d at 296 (quoting H.R. Rep. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 24, 27 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5227, 5240 (emphasis added by court)).

This grant of authority includes standing to appeal the denial of a motion to dismiss; without such standing, the U.S. Trustee Program would be unable to perform its core function of ensuring that bankruptcy proceedings are conducted in accordance with the Code.[10] See Clark, 927 F.2d at 795-96 (U.S. Trustee has standing to appeal denial of § 707(b) motion to dismiss). Even the district court below acknowledged that "[o]ne would think that since the United States Trustee has unquestioned standing to move to dismiss a petition, he or she would also have standing to appeal from the denial of such a motion." D. Ct. Op. 6, SPA–6. In fact, Section 1109(a) of the Code, which provides that the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) may "raise and may [10] Data maintained by the U.S. Trustee Program indicates that in fiscal year 2006, U.S. Trustees filed over 7,000 motions under Sections 707(a) and 1307(c) alone, which are the provisions under which the U.S. Trustee moved to dismiss before the bankruptcy court.

appear and be heard on any issue in a case under this chapter [Chapter 11], but * * * may not appeal from any judgment, order, or decree entered in the case," demonstrates that Congress can and will expressly limit a government agency's appellate standing when it deems appropriate. 11 U.S.C. § 1109(a). Because neither Section 307 nor any other provision of the Code limits the U.S. Trustee's appellate standing, Congress's intent that the U.S. Trustee have such standing is apparent.

Thus, that this Court has applied the "person aggrieved" standard to determine whether private parties have standing to appeal in bankruptcy cases is not controlling here. See, e.g., International Trade Adm'n v. Rensselaer Polytechnic Inst., 936 F.2d 744, 747 (2d Cir. 1991) (applying "person aggrieved" standard to private litigant). The district court's reliance (Op. 6, SPA-6) on International Trade Adm'n is therefore misplaced. The "persons aggrieved" standard is "not the only test"; to the contrary, "a public interest may also give a sufficient stake in the outcome of a bankruptcy case to confer appellate standing." Revco, 898 F.2d at 499. Where, as here, the U.S. Trustee is attempting "to enforce the law in the public interest," she has appellate standing regardless of whether she can meet the "person aggrieved" standard applicable to private parties. Clark, 927 F.2d at 796; Revco, 898 F.2d at 500.

Based on analogous reasoning, this Court rejected an argument that the United States lacked standing in a civil RICO suit because it had not alleged or demonstrated an injury caused by defendant. United States v. Sasso, 215 F.3d 283, 292 (2d Cir. 2000). As this Court explained, a statutory provision, 18 U.S.C. § 1964(b), "authorizes the government to bring suit under § 1964," and "Section 1964(a) contains no requirement that the government show that it was injured." Id.

Nor does the district court's observation (Op. 7. SPA-7) that "[n]o present creditor's rights were limited or affected in any way by the Orders appealed from" change the analysis. Indeed, without directly addressing the pecuniary interest point, the Ninth Circuit has also affirmed the U.S. Trustee's standing to appeal an issue under Section 307, even when creditors had no interest in the appeal.[11] See, e.g., In re Donovan Corp., 215 [11] In any event, the district court's statement that "[n]o present creditor's rights were limited or affected in any way" by the bankruptcy court's decision to strike, rather than dismiss, the debtors' cases, is inaccurate. As we explain, infra pp. 43-49, striking rather than dismissing a case prejudices the rights of such creditors, by causing uncertainty regarding debtors' status and the existence of the automatic stay in any future cases filed by the debtors. Indeed, one of the debtors, Lena Elmendorf, did file a subsequent petition. See infra n.21. Had the bankruptcy court dismissed the present case, the stay in that case would have terminated after 30 days absent a motion from Elmendorf establishing good faith. See 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3). As demonstrated in the text, however, the U.S. Trustee's standing does not depend on whether any creditor is substantively aggrieved. By enacting Section 307, Congress gave the U.S. Trustee a legal right to participate in bankruptcy proceedings to advance the public interest and ensure that bankruptcy laws are properly applied. That right exists regardless of whether creditors' interests are harmed in these or future cases.

F.3d 929, 929-30 (9th Cir. 2000) (although creditors had "expressed no interest" in appeal, U.S. Trustee had standing under Section 307 to "be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under title 11"); see also In re Pillotex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246, 250 (3d Cir. 2002) (U.S. Trustee has standing to appeal law firm's retention as counsel even though "none of the parties in interest to the bankruptcy objected" to retention of firm).

Applying these principles, the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky recently held that the U.S. Trustee had standing to appeal a bankruptcy court's decision to strike debtors' petitions, rather than dismiss their cases, where, as here, debtors failed to comply with Section 109(h).[12] In re Mason, 2007 WL 433077 at *1 (E.D. Ky. Feb. 5, 2007). The court rejected reliance on the "person aggrieved" standard, and ruled that U.S. Trustees "have broad appellate standing" to protect the public interest. Id. As the court explained, the purpose of the U.S. Trustee's appeal "is to ensure that bankruptcy courts choose the appropriate remedy when a debtor is ineligible for bankruptcy relief because of his or her failure to obtain credit [12] In another case raising the same merits question, In re Thompson, No. 06-1033 (S.D. Ind. Dec. 4, 2006), the district court expressed doubts, in dicta, regarding the U.S. Trustee's standing, but declined to decide the issue. See Thompson Order at 4 (attached as Addendum). The U.S. Trustee has appealed the district court's decision in Thompson to the Seventh Circuit. That appeal, which addresses both the standing and merits questions at issue in the present case, is currently pending. In re Thompson, Seventh Cir. No. 07-1240.

counseling," and this purpose "falls within the Trustee's power to ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to the law." Id. This reasoning applies equally to the present case.

B. Supreme Court precedent further supports the U.S. Trustee's appellate standing. As the Court has emphasized, "[e]very government, intrusted by the very terms of its being with powers and duties to be exercised and discharged for the general welfare, has a right to apply to its own courts for any proper assistance in the exercise of the one and the discharge of the other, and it is no sufficient answer to its appeal to one of those courts that it has no pecuniary interest in the matter." In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564, 584 (1895).

In SEC v. United States Realty & Improvement Co., 310 U.S. 434 (1940), for example, the Supreme Court held that the SEC had standing to appeal an order under the Bankruptcy Act even though it had no pecuniary interest in the case; rather, its "only interest" was "a public one." Id. at 460. In fact, the U.S. Trustee has a stronger basis for standing than did the SEC in United States Realty, because Section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code gives the U.S. Trustee the express right to "raise," "appear," and "be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding" arising under the Bankruptcy Code (11 U.S.C. § 307), while the SEC had to rely on Fed. R. Civ. P. 24 provisions for intervention under Chapter XI of the Bankruptcy Act, since it had a statutory right to appear only in Chapter X proceedings. See 310 U.S. at 458. Despite the lack of a statutory right to appear in Chapter XI proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act, the Court ruled that the SEC could intervene and appeal the adverse order allowing a debtor to proceed under Chapter XI because the Commission was "charged with the performance of important public duties in every case brought under Chapter X, which will be thwarted, to the public injury, if a debtor may secure adjustment of his debts in a Chapter XI proceeding when * * * he should be required to proceed, if at all, under Chapter X." Id. at 458-59.[13]

And, as the Supreme Court more recently made clear, its precedent establishes that consistent with Article III of the Constitution, Congress has the authority to confer standing on a federal agency to protect the public interest by ensuring that the statutes that it administers are properly enforced. Director, Office of Workers' Comp. Programs v. Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co., 514 U.S. 122, 133 (1995). As the [13] United States Realty is also instructive on the more specific issue of when an agency has standing to appeal. The Supreme Court noted that although the SEC had statutory a right to participate in proceedings under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, Congress had provided that the Commission could "not appeal or file any petition for appeal" in such proceedings. 310 U.S. at 461. Nonetheless, because the appeal at issue was in the context of Chapter XI proceedings, the Court held that the statutory limitation on appeals did not apply. Id. Here, in contrast, Congress has placed no such limitation on the U.S. Trustee's ability to appear in appeals under any chapter of the Bankruptcy Code.

Court explained, its prior cases "certainly establish that Congress could have conferred standing upon the Director without infringing Article III of the Constitution" (id. at 134); indeed, "the United States Code displays throughout that when an agency in its governmental capacity is meant to have standing, Congress says so." Id. at 129. Because Congress has expressly conferred such public interest standing on the U.S. Trustee under the Bankruptcy Code, neither Article III nor the "person aggrieved" standard applicable to private parties poses any bar to allowing the U.S. Trustee to appeal.

II. WHERE, AS HERE, DEBTORS FAIL TO COMPLY WITH SECTION 109(h) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE, THE BANKRUPTCY COURT MUST DISMISS, RATHER THAN STRIKE, THE CASE.

The district court's holding that the bankruptcy court had authority to strike, rather than dismiss, debtors' cases raises an important recurring legal issue regarding how a court should dispose of a case when a debtor has not complied with Section 109(h). As we demonstrate below, the majority view that courts should dismiss cases in which debtors fail to comply with Section 109(h) is correct, and provides the only workable interpretation of the Code.

A. Dismissal Is The Only Proper Disposition Of Debtors' Cases Under The Bankruptcy Code.

The district court erred by affirming the bankruptcy court's decision to strike debtors' cases for failure to comply with the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h). That failure to meet this requirement rendered debtors ineligible to obtain bankruptcy relief does not mean that their cases were legal nullities. To the contrary, even when a court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, it dismisses a case, it does not strike it.[14] E.g., Makarova v. United States, 201 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2000) (affirming district court's dismissal of case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction); Close v. State of New York, 125 F.3d 31 (7th Cir. 1997) (same); Electronics Commun'cns Corp. v. Toshiba Am. Consumer Prod., Inc., 129 F.3d 240 (2d Cir. 1997) (affirming dismissal for failure to state a claim); see Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(3) (whenever "it appears * * * that the court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter, the court shall dismiss the action") (emphasis added). Moreover, if failure to exhaust administrative remedies causes a plaintiff to be ineligible to file suit under a federal statute, the court dismisses, rather than strikes, the case or complaint. E.g., Polera v. Board of Educ. Of Newburgh Enlarged City Sch. Dist., 288 F.3d 478, 491 (2d Cir. 2002) (remanding to district court with instructions to dismiss complaint because plaintiff failed to exhaust administrative remedies); Davenport v. Harry N. Abrams, Inc., 249 F.3d 130, 136 (2d Cir. 2001) (affirming district court's dismissal of action for failure to exhaust administrative remedies).

[14] Under the reasoning of the Supreme Court's decision in Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 126 S. Ct. 1235 (2006), the eligibility requirements in Section 109, while mandatory, are not jurisdictional. See id. at 1244-45 ("when Congress does not rank a statutory limitation on coverage as jurisdictional, courts should treat the restriction as nonjurisdictional in character"). Even prior to Arbaugh, courts of appeals that directly addressed the issue held that the eligibility requirements in Section 109 are not jurisdictional. In re McCloy, 296 F.3d 370, 375 (5th Cir. 2002); In re Hamilton Creek Metropolitan Dist., 143 F.3d 1381, 1385 n.2 (10th Cir. 1998); In re Montgomery, 37 F.3d 413, 415 n.5 (8th Cir. 1994); but cf. Matter of Estate of Medcare HMO, 998 F.2d 436, 447 (7th Cir. 1993) (affirming district court's dismissal of Chapter 11 petition for lack of jurisdiction because debtor ineligible under Section 109(b)(2) without addressing whether Section 109 requirements are jurisdictional). Notably, the bankruptcy court and district courts below agreed that the eligibility requirement in Section 109(h) is not jurisdictional. Bankr. Op. 18, A–30; D. Ct. Op. 12, SPA–12. In any event, this Court need not decide the question, since, as shown in the text, regardless of whether the eligibility requirements in Section 109 are jurisdictional, the proper course is for the court to dismiss a case where, as here, a debtor is ineligible for relief.

Nothing in the Bankruptcy Code indicates that the procedure should be any different with respect to failure to comply with Section 109(h). As the Supreme Court has made clear, when a court interprets the Bankruptcy Code, its inquiry "begins where all such inquiries must begin: with the language of the statute itself." United States v. Ron Pair Enterpr., Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 241 (1989). Numerous Code provisions refer to dismissals of cases. Various chapters of the Bankruptcy Code, including Chapter 7 and Chapter 13, provide the bankruptcy court with authority to dismiss a case for cause. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(a); 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b); 11 U.S.C. § 1208; 11 U.S.C. § 1307(c).

As relevant to this case, both Section 707 and Section 1307 provide that a bankruptcy court “may dismiss a case” after notice and a hearing, for cause, “including” under certain enumerated circumstances. 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(a), 1307(c) (emphasis added). The Bankruptcy Code expressly provides that use of the word “including” in Title 11 is “not limiting” (11 U.S.C. § 102(3)), and this Court and other courts thus have recognized that the list of examples of “cause” for dismissal is not exhaustive.[15] See, e.g., In re C-TC 9th Ave. P’ship, 113 F.3d 1304, 1311 (2d Cir. 1997); In re Padilla, 222 F.3d 1184, 1191 (9th Cir. 2000); In re Huckfeldt, 39 F.3d 829, 831 (8th Cir. 1994).

Other provisions of the Code refer to dismissals as well, including Section 349, which explains the effects of a dismissal on the rights of parties to the bankruptcy proceeding. 11 U.S.C. § 349. In addition, Section 362, the automatic stay provision, sets forth the effect of prior dismissals on operation of the automatic stay in subsequent cases filed by the same debtor. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3),(4).

In contrast, the Bankruptcy Code does not provide for the striking of a case or petition. Accordingly, prior to the enactment of the credit counseling requirement in Section 109(h), courts, including this Court, routinely dismissed cases where the debtor was ineligible for relief under other subsections of Section 109. See, e.g., In re Mazzeo, 131 F.3d 295, 301 (2d Cir. 1997) (affirming dismissal of Chapter 13 proceeding based on debtor’s ineligibility under § 109(e)); In re C-TC 9th Ave. P’ship, 113 F.3d at 1313 (affirming dismissal of case on grounds that debtor ineligible for relief under § 109(d)); Matter of Estate of Medcare HMO, 998 F.2d 436, 447 (7th Cir. 1993) (affirming dismissal of petition based on ineligibility under § 109(b)(2)); In re Seaman, 340 B.R. 698, 707 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2006) (“[d]ismissal is the result in nearly all of the cases filed by petitioners who are ineligible under other subsections of Section 109"); see Bankr. Op. 24, A-36 (one of arguments made against striking is that “[w]hen a debtor ineligible for bankruptcy relief by virtue of other subsections of Section 109 files for relief, the bankruptcy courts have almost unanimously dismissed or converted those cases”).

It is therefore unsurprising that, since the enactment of BAPCPA, a substantial majority of courts have dismissed, not stricken, cases in which a debtor was found to be ineligible for failure to obtain the requisite credit counseling under Section 109(h). See, e.g., In re Seaman, 340 B.R. at 706 n.3 (as of March 30, 2006, thirty-one of thirty-four decisions addressing ineligibility under Section 109(h) “have resulted in dismissal”); In re Wilson, 346 B.R. 59, 64 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 2006) (“much greater number of courts to visit the issue have concluded that dismissal of the case is the only appropriate remedy”); Bankr. Op. 3, A-15 (acknowledges “great wave of judicial opinion” against striking case for failure to comply with Section 109(h)). The majority view includes two district court decisions issued after the judgment of the court below in the present case. Clippard v. Bass, – B.R. –, 2007 WL 913929 at *5-*6 (W.D. Tenn. March 13, 2007); In re Mason, 2007 WL 433077 (E.D. Ky. Feb. 5, 2007).[16] This majority view correctly interprets the Code, and is consistent with congressional intent. As we demonstrate below, the decisions of the minority of courts,[17] including the courts below, to strike, rather than dismiss, a case or petition, lack any basis in the Bankruptcy Code, are contrary to congressional intent, and would result in significant confusion and uncertainty among the parties.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Lacks Authority To Strike A Case For Failure To Comply With Section 109(h).

The sole provision of the Bankruptcy Code upon which the courts below relied was Section 105(a), which provides the bankruptcy court with authority to "issue any order, process or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of [the Code]." 11 U.S.C. § 105(a); see D. Ct. Op. 11, SPA-11; Bankr. Op. 25-26, A–37-38. Reliance on Section 105(a), however, begs the question of whether the Code allows the bankruptcy court to strike a case for failure to comply with the credit counseling requirement. As this Court has held, Section 105 "[b]y its very terms * * * limits the bankruptcy court's equitable powers, which 'must and can only be exercised within the confines of the Bankruptcy Code.'" FDIC v. Colonial Realty Corp., 966 F.2d 57, 59 (2d Cir. 1992) (quoting Norwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988)). Thus, Section

As noted supra n.12, the U.S. Trustee's appeal of the district court's decision in Thompson is pending in the Seventh Circuit. In re Thompson, Seventh Cir. No. 07-1240.

105 “‘cannot be used in a manner inconsistent with the commands of the Bankruptcy Code.’” Id. (quoting In re Plaza de Diego, 911 F.2d at 830-31). Accordingly, the bankruptcy court’s equitable power under Section 105(a) “is the power to exercise equity in carrying out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, rather than to further the purposes of the Code generally, or otherwise to do the right thing.” In re Dairy Mart Convenience Stores, Inc., 351 F.3d 86, 92 (2d Cir. 2003).

As set forth above, the Code does not provide for the striking of the case, while numerous Code provisions provide for the dismissal of cases for cause. See In re Mason, 2007 WL 433077 at *3 (in reversing bankruptcy court decision to strike petition, district court holds that bankruptcy court was “acting outside its Section 105 discretion”). Thus, there is no authority for the bankruptcy court’s action under the Code. See, e.g., id. (“there is no support for the remedy of striking a debtor’s petition [for failure to comply with Section 109(h)] in the Bankruptcy Code”).

Nor does the district court’s reliance (Op. 9-10, SPA–9-10) on Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9011 and 7012(b), and Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f) provide any authority to strike a case or petition for failure to comply with the credit counseling requirement. While the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure provide authority for striking pleadings or portions thereof under specific, limited circumstances, they do not support the bankruptcy court’s decision here. Bankruptcy Rule 9011 allows a bankruptcy court to strike an unsigned filing if, after receiving notice, the party fails to promptly correct the omission of the signature. Determining that a petition is unsigned is clear from the face of the petition itself, and does not require either findings of facts, or legal interpretation of the Code. In contrast, determining whether an individual is eligible to be a debtor under the various subsections of Section 109 often is not clear from the face of the petition, and can involve both disputed factual and legal issues. Most important, Rule 9011(a) on its face does not extend beyond the particular circumstance of an unsigned pleading.

Apart from Rule 9011(a), the only other bankruptcy rule that addresses striking a pleading does not apply to debtors’ cases. Bankruptcy Rule 7012(b) incorporates Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(e) and (f) in adversary proceedings. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7012(b). But these consolidated cases are not adversary proceedings. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001. And, even if they were, Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(e), which allows a court to strike a pleading where the party who filed the pleading fails to amend it after the court grants a motion for more definite statement, and Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f), which allows a court to strike “from any pleading any insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter," do not provide the bankruptcy court with authority to strike a petition based on a party's ineligibility under Section 109.

C. The Courts Below Erred By Holding That Debtors' Filing Of Their Petitions Did Not Commence Cases Under Section 301.

1. Under Section 301 of the Code, a "voluntary case under a chapter of this title is commenced by the filing with the bankruptcy court of a petition under such chapter by an entity that may be a debtor under such chapter." 11 U.S.C. § 301(a). The bankruptcy and district courts below based their holdings in part on their finding that no "case" existed that could be dismissed, since, pursuant to Sections 301, a case commences only where a petition is filed by an entity or individual "'that may be a debtor under such chapter.'" See D. Ct. Op. 8, SPA-8; Bankr. Op. 15-17, A-27-29. The courts reasoned that if an individual files a petition without complying with Section 109(h), she has not commenced a case under Section 301 because she is ineligible to be a debtor under the Code. See id.

The decisions below misinterpret Section 301. As another bankruptcy court explained in reaching the opposite conclusion, in ordinary usage, "the word 'may' as used in § 301 of the Bankruptcy Code means 'might' or is meant to express a 'possibility.'" In re Tomco, 339 B.R. 145, 159 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2006). Moreover, the courts' analysis in the present case would apply equally to situations in which individuals file a petition under the wrong chapter of the Code, or otherwise in violation of Section 109, which delineates “who may be a debtor.” 11 U.S.C. § 109. For example, Section 109(e) conditions chapter 13 eligibility on debt and income thresholds. Whether a debtor meets such thresholds will not be immediately apparent in all cases. A debtor could conduct a case for weeks or months before the court determines that he is ineligible for bankruptcy relief. Under the district and bankruptcy courts’ logic, no case would have existed even though litigation would have proceeded for months. This view of Section 301 is unworkable, and conflicts with how that section was interpreted prior to BAPCPA.

2. In addition, the district and bankruptcy courts’ interpretation of Section 301 creates uncertainty regarding the applicability of Section 362, the automatic stay provision. The bankruptcy court explained that because Section 362(a) provides that “‘a petition filed under section 301, 302, or 303 of this title * * * operates as a stay,’” a “straightforward reading” of Section 362 “indicates that the automatic stay comes into existence only when a case is filed in accordance with §§ 301, 302 or 303[.]” Bankr. Op. 17, A–29 (quoting 11 U.S.C. § 362(a) (emphasis added by court)). The bankruptcy court thus held that the automatic stay is not invoked where an individual files a petition without complying with the credit counseling requirement because “[w]hen read together, §§ 109(h), 301 and 362(a) establish that no stay can exist for debtors who fail to obtain the required credit counseling or qualify for an exception." Id.; see also In re Salazar, 339 B.R. 622, 626 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2006), debtors' request for permission to appeal directly to Fifth Circuit denied on other grounds, 193 Fed. Appx. 281, 2006 WL 1877284 (5th Cir. 2006).

But viewing the filing of a petition by a debtor whom the court subsequently determines is ineligible as a legal nullity that does not invoke the automatic stay renders superfluous a provision of BAPCPA. In BAPCPA, Congress amended Section 362 to provide that the filing of a petition "does not operate as a stay" of "any act to enforce any lien against or security interest in real property" if the "debtor is ineligible under section 109(g) to be a debtor in a case under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 362(b)(21)(A). Section 109(g) provides that an individual is ineligible to be a debtor if he was a debtor in a pending case in the prior 180 days and (1) that case was "dismissed by the court for willful failure of the debtor to abide by orders of the court, or to appear before the court in proper prosecution of the case," or (2) the debtor "requested and obtained the voluntary dismissal of the case following the filing of a request for relief from the automatic stay[.]" 11 U.S.C. § 109(g). If a filing by a debtor ineligible under Section 109(g) "were void ab initio and did not result in an automatic stay under existing law, such an amendment would not have been necessary."[18] In re Ross, 338 B.R. 134, 139 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2006); In re Racette, 343 B.R. 200, 203 (Bankr. E.D. Wisc. 2006).

In fact, attempting to avoid the problem of rendering Section 362(b)(21)(A) surplusage, the bankruptcy court in In re

[18] This Court's pre-BAPCPA decision in In re Casse, 198 F.3d 327 (2d Cir. 1999) does not cast doubt on this conclusion. In Casse, this Court ruled that a bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to vacate a foreclosure sale that occurred after a debtor filed a petition in violation of a prior court order barring him from future filings under the Code. 198 F.3d at 332, 341-42. Although the Court characterized the bankruptcy court's "treatment of the debtor's [petition] as void ab initio," (id. at 342), "neither the bankruptcy court nor the Court of Appeals held or implied that there was no automatic stay" in that filing. In re Flores, 291 B.R. 44, 58 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); see Ross, 338 B.R. at 138 n.6. Indeed, the bankruptcy court dismissed the case "'nunc pro tunc'" to the date of filing, thus retroactively abrogating the stay. See Casse, 198 F.3d at 332, 342; Flores, 291 B.R. at 58. And, in ruling that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion, this Court relied upon a case in which the bankruptcy court "used its authority under 11 U.S.C. § 362(d) to lift the automatic stay ab initio." Casse, 198 F.3d at 342 (internal quotations omitted). Thus, this Court held that where a debtor files a petition in violation of a court order, the bankruptcy court does not abuse its discretion by retroactively lifting the stay; it did not rule that, even absent the bankruptcy court's nunc pro tunc dismissal, the stay would not have been triggered. Id. In any event, even if the Casse Court had held that the case was "void ab initio" in the sense that, even absent the bankruptcy court's nunc pro tunc order, the stay would not have taken effect, it would be distinguishable. First, it did not involve the statutory restriction on eligibility in Section 109; rather, it involved a case in which the debtor violated a prior court order, issued pursuant to the bankruptcy court's authority under Sections 349(a) and 105(a), barring him from filing a subsequent petition. Second, Casse was decided pre-BAPCPA, before Congress's enactment of Section 362(b)(21)(A) made clear its understanding that, in the absence of an express statutory exception to the stay, a petition filed under Section 109(g) "commences a case and results in an automatic stay." Ross, 338 B.R. at 139.

Thompson, which, like the courts below, held that debtors who file a petition without complying with Section 109(h) do not commence a case under Section 301, nonetheless held that the automatic stay was invoked under such circumstances.[19] See 344 B.R. 899 (Bankr. S.D. Ind. 2006), aff'd, In re Thompson, No. 06-1033 (S.D. Ind. Dec. 4, 2006), appeal pending, 7th Cir. No. 07-1240. The Thompson court reasoned that, under Section 362, the "event triggering the stay is the filing of a petition" under section 301 or 302 -- not the commencement of a case under those sections of the Code. Id. at 906. The court found that Sections 301 and 302 "allow for petitions to be filed by ineligible debtors, they just don't allow cases to be commenced by petitions filed by ineligible debtors," and thus, "it is possible for the stay to be imposed without a case having been commenced." Id.

The Thompson bankruptcy court's analysis introduces a further error of statutory interpretation, however. The court

[19] The bankruptcy court in the present case did not believe that her interpretation rendered Section 362(b)(21)(A) superfluous because, in her view, Section 109(h) is distinguishable from Section 109(g) because the failure to obtain credit counseling or qualify for an exemption under Section 109(h) is "incurable," and thus, in contrast to cases involving Section 109(g), the automatic stay is never invoked where the debtor has not met that requirement. The wording of Section 109(g) is no less mandatory than that of Section 109(h), however: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, no individual * * * may be a debtor under this title" if he had a case pending during the prior 180 days (1) that was dismissed for the reasons set forth in the statute, or (2) in which he sought voluntary dismissal after a creditor filed a request for relief from the automatic stay. 11 U.S.C. § 109(g).

acknowledged that its holding conflicts with both those courts that have held that a case does commence when a debtor ineligible under Section 109(h) files a petition, and with those courts that have held that no case commences under such circumstances. This is not surprising; the Thompson court reached a contrary result only by misinterpreting Section 362 of the Bankruptcy Code. As the bankruptcy court in the present case recognized, under Section 362(a), "[e]xcept as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a petition filed under section 301, 302 or 303 of this title * * * operates as a stay." 11 U.S.C. § 362(a). Thus, Section 362(a) expressly refers to petitions filed under Sections 301, 302 or 303, which in turn set forth when voluntary, joint or involuntary cases commence under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. §§ 301, 302, 303; see Bankr. Op. 17, A-29. If a case commences, the automatic stay therefore takes effect; conversely, if a case does not commence, the automatic stay is not invoked.

The conclusion of the courts below that a debtor's filing of a petition without complying with Section 109(h) does not commence a case thus presents problems of statutory interpretation regardless of whether the court holds that the automatic stay is triggered. Section 362(b)(21)(A) is rendered superfluous by holding that the stay is not invoked; while holding that the stay is invoked conflicts with a "straightforward reading" of Section 362(a). The U.S. Trustee's position, by contrast, does not suffer from either of these problems: a holding that a debtor who files a petition without complying with Section 109(h) does commence a case under Section 301, thereby invoking the automatic stay, is consistent with the plain language of Section 362(a) and does not render Section 362(b)(21)(A) superfluous.

Moreover, the conflict between the bankruptcy court below and the Thompson court regarding the automatic stay demonstrates that within the small minority of courts that have decided to strike a petition or case for failure to meet the credit counseling requirement, there is no unified view of the effect of the court’s action. In addition, such courts differ over whether to strike the petition or the entire case. Compare, e.g., Thompson, 344 B.R. at 906 (striking petition) with Bankr. Op. 28-29, A-40-41 (striking cases).

In contrast, the U.S. Trustee’s interpretation, adopted by the majority of courts, is consistent and provides the only workable interpretation of the Code. When a debtor files a petition under Section 301, that action both commences a case and triggers the automatic stay. If and when a bankruptcy court subsequently determines that the individual is not eligible to be a debtor, either under Section 109(h) or another subsection of Section 109, the court should dismiss the case for cause, and the automatic stay will terminate.

D. The Decisions Of The Courts Below Circumvent Congressional Intent And Will Cause Uncertainty And Confusion In Bankruptcy Proceedings.

1. The courts below further erred by circumventing Congress’s purpose when, as part of BAPCPA, it amended Section 362. In BAPCPA, Congress sought to prevent repeat bankruptcy filers from abusing bankruptcy proceedings by limiting application of the automatic stay where the debtor had a prior case dismissed in the preceding year. 11 U.S.C. §§ 362(c)(3), 362(c)(4). Pursuant to the amendment, if a debtor had a prior case dismissed during the preceding year, the automatic stay “shall terminate * * * on the 30th day after the filing of the later case,” unless the debtor “demonstrates that the filing of the later case is in good faith as to the creditors to be stayed.” 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3)(A),(B). And the automatic stay will not go into effect at the outset of the case if the debtor had two or more bankruptcy cases dismissed within the previous year unless the debtor can demonstrate that its later case is filed in good faith. 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(4)(A),(B).

The plain language of Section 362(c) applies only to debtors who had prior cases “dismissed.” Thus, if a debtor’s prior case or petition is stricken as a nullity, that case likely would not count as a “case” pending in the prior year that was “dismissed” for the purposes of determining, in a subsequent case, whether the automatic stay goes into effect, and how long it remains in effect. See Ross, 338 B.R. at 136 (in deciding to dismiss, not strike, court notes that “striking the petition on the ground that its filing does not commence a case means that, if the individual later files a case, the stricken petition will not count as a ‘pending case’ for purposes of applying § 362(c)”). Indeed, in Thompson, the bankruptcy court, after determining that it would strike debtors’ petition rather than dismiss their case, acknowledged that if the debtors filed a subsequent petition within a year, “the petition filed under this cause number will not count as a ‘case pending and dismissed’ for § 362(c)(3) and (4) purposes.” 344 B.R. at 908.[20]

This result is directly contrary to Congress’s intent in amending Section 362. In BAPCPA, Congress sought to prevent repeat bankruptcy filers from abusing bankruptcy proceedings by [20] In the present case, the district court stated (Op. 12, SPA–12) that “it is by no means clear to this Court that striking a Petition as an alternative to dismissal would necessarily be regarded in a future lawsuit as having the apparent benefit to the Debtor which the Bankruptcy Judge in these cases assumes it would have, or that it would exempt the would be Petitioners from the adverse statutory consequences imposed by BAPCA.” But as set forth in the text, based on the plain language of Section 362(c), it is difficult to see how a case or petition that the bankruptcy court strikes as a legal nullity would fall within the plain language of Section 362(c), which applies to pending “cases” that were “dismissed.” Nonetheless, the district court’s comment underscores the uncertainty caused by the bankruptcy court’s decision to strike debtors’ cases; had the court dismissed the cases, there would be no question about whether Section 362(c) would apply to a subsequent bankruptcy proceeding.

limiting application of the automatic stay.[21] See In re Seaman, 340 B.R. at 708 (citing legislative history of BAPCPA). Regardless of whether the courts below believe that these amended provisions impose overly-harsh penalties on debtors (see Bankr. Op. 2, 8, A–14, A-20; D. Ct. Op. 5, SPA–5), they lack the prerogative to create their own exceptions to Section 362(c) by striking, rather than dismissing, a case. See In re Hedquist, 342 B.R. 295, 300 (8th Cir. BAP 2006) (though several courts have commented that "new requirements in Section 109(h) can, in some circumstances, create harsh results," because "those requirements are mandatory, bankruptcy courts have no discretion but to dismiss the case" when debtor fails to comply).

Moreover, it is important to note that Congress provided debtors with the opportunity to avoid the penalties set forth in Sections 362(c)(3) and 362(c)(4) if they demonstrate that their prior dismissed case was filed in "good faith." See 11 U.S.C.

[21] Debtor Diana Finlay is an example of such a repeat filer, as the present petition was her third bankruptcy filing in the past year. See Bankr. Op. 5, A–17. And although this was debtor Shayna Zarnel's first bankruptcy petition, the bankruptcy court noted that Mrs. Zarnel's husband had filed five bankruptcy petitions since January 2004. Id. at 6, A–18. After the bankruptcy court struck her case, debtor Lena Elmendorf filed another Chapter 7 petition on September 13, 2006. Had the bankruptcy court dismissed, rather than struck, the present case, the stay in Elmendorf's subsequent case would have terminated after 30 days absent a motion from Elmendorf demonstrating good faith. See 11 U.S.C. § 362(c)(3). On February 27, 2007, the bankruptcy court closed Elmendorf's subsequent case without entry of a discharge for failure to file Official Form 23. Docket, In re Elmendorf, No. 06-35926 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.).

§§ 362(c)(3)(B);(c)(4)(B). And, as the bankruptcy court appeared to recognize, its ruling that the filing of a petition by a debtor who has not met the credit counseling requirement does not commence a case under Section 301, and the automatic stay is therefore not invoked, may prove just as harsh to debtors as would dismissing the case. See Op. 22 n.21, A–34 n.21 ("a debtor whose case is stricken may well face dispossession of assets because no stay was in place to protect them"). Under the holding of the courts below, if a creditor repossesses or forecloses on a debtor's assets after the petition is filed but prior to the striking of the case, the debtor will not be able to rely on the automatic stay. Thus, while a holding that a case did not commence where a debtor failed to comply with Section 109(h) may keep the case from counting as a dismissal in a subsequently filed case, "such 'protection' will be a pyrrhic victory if, in the meantime, a creditor has completed a repossession or foreclosure because of the absence of a stay in the void case." Ross, 338 B.R. at 139. Policy reasons, such as avoiding "draconian consequences" for debtors (D. Ct. Op. 5, SPA-5), therefore do not support the rulings of the courts below.

More important, regardless of whether the bankruptcy court's interpretation advances its policy objectives, its reading of Section 362 is incorrect. Indeed, "[t]he fact that a [bankruptcy] proceeding is equitable does not give the judge a free-floating discretion to redistribute rights in accordance with his personal views of justice and fairness, however enlightened those views may be." In re Kmart Corp., 359 F.3d 866, 871 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 543 U.S. 986 (1994) (internal quotations omitted).

2. The decision to strike a case or petition also creates substantial uncertainty and potential prejudice to the parties to bankruptcy proceedings. While the Bankruptcy Code is clear regarding the effects of dismissal, there are no corresponding instructions in the Code or elsewhere regarding the impact of striking a petition or case. In fact, one court found that "[p]erhaps the most compelling reason to dismiss the case rather than strike the petition is the confusion that would ensue." In re Racette, 343 B.R. at 203. And even a court that held that it was appropriate to strike a petition for failure to satisfy the credit counseling requirement acknowledged that its holding caused uncertainty: "In determining that an ineligible debtor does not invoke the protections of the automatic stay, an element of uncertainty is infused into the world of consumer bankruptcy." In re Salazar, 339 B.R. at 626. Indeed, as the split between this case and other bankruptcy courts that have decided to strike rather than dismiss illustrates, there is great uncertainty as to whether the automatic stay would apply -- both with respect to the case in which the debtors failed to comply with Section 109(h) and to subsequent cases filed by the same debtors.

The bankruptcy and district court’s ruling that debtors who file petitions without complying with Section 109(h) have not commenced a “case” under Section 301 of the Code also could create confusion or opportunism among debtors in the reporting that is required in bankruptcy filings. Debtors are required to inform the court of all prior bankruptcy “cases” filed in the past eight years. See Voluntary Petition Official Form 1 at 2. Because bankruptcy courts that have stricken cases or petitions have held that such cases never actually commenced, it is foreseeable that an individual could believe that where his petition was stricken, not dismissed, he is not required to report that case when he files a subsequent petition. In addition, “striking petitions would create new burdens and uncertainties for case administration,” and “[n]ew questions would arise,” such as, “whether filing fees should be returned to ineligible petitioners and whether Chapter 7 trustees may be compensated for work on cases that prove to be a nullity or void ab initio.” In re Seaman, 340 B.R. at 707; In re Jones, 352 B.R. 813, 823 (S.D. Tex. 2006) (same).

In contrast, “[t]reating an ineligible debtor’s case as filed and dismissing it avoids serious problems that treating a petition as void ab initio or as failing to establish jurisdiction creates.” In re Ross, 338 B.R. at 140; In re Tomco, 339 B.R. at 159 (same). Thus, this Court should join the majority of courts that have addressed the issue, and hold that the filing of a petition with the bankruptcy court commences a case under Section 301, which “is a case under title 11, unless and until the bankruptcy court determines that the debtor” is ineligible for bankruptcy relief under Section 109. In re Tomco, 339 B.R. at 161. That filing also invokes the automatic stay. If and when the bankruptcy court ultimately decides that an individual is ineligible to be a debtor, the court should dismiss the case, and the stay will then terminate. See id.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLANT

DECISION BELOW

The decision below was issued by Senior Judge Peter Dorsey. The opinions of the district court are reported at 352 B.R. 17 and 363 B.R. 660.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

Plaintiff invoked the jurisdiction of the district court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1331. A-5.[1] The district court entered final judgment on March 8, 2007. A-31. Defendant filed a notice of appeal on April 30, 2007, within the time provided by Fed. R.

App. P. 4(a)(1)(B). A-33. This Court has jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4), which provides that attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals should not advise clients to take on additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition, violates the First Amendment.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

As part of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005), Congress provided that attorneys and other professionals should not advise clients to take on additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4). Plaintiff, an attorney who represents consumer debtors in bankruptcy, filed this facial challenge to section 526(a)(4), urging that the provision violates the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment to plaintiff, concluding that section 526(a)(4) is unconstitutionally overbroad and potentially limits an attorney's ability to provide a client with the best advice.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory Background

1. In the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, Congress enacted "a comprehensive package of reform measures" designed "to improve bankruptcy law and practice by restoring personal responsibility and integrity in the bankruptcy system and ensure that the system is fair for both debtors and creditors." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 2 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89 ("House Report"). Described by Congress as "the most comprehensive set of [bankruptcy] reforms in more than 25 years," id. at 3, the Act both modifies the substantive standards for bankruptcy relief and adopts a variety of new measures intended to curb abusive practices that Congress concluded had come to pervade the bankruptcy system.

As part of this reform package, Congress established certain minimum standards of professional conduct for attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals — collectively termed "debt relief agencies" — who provide for-profit services to consumer debtors. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (definition of "debt relief agency").[2] Misleading and abusive practices by such professionals, Congress determined, had become a substantial cause of unnecessary bankruptcy petitions and, in some circumstances, jeopardized

[2] The term "debt relief agency" includes "any person" who, for a fee, "provides any bankruptcy assistance to an assisted person." 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance," in turn, is defined to include "providing legal representation." Id. § 101(4A). An "assisted person" is "any person whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $164,250." Id. § 101(3); cf. id. § 104(a) (adjustment of dollar figures).

debtors’ ability to obtain a discharge of their debts. For example, Congress heard evidence that a civil enforcement initiative undertaken by the United States Trustee Program had “consistently identified * * * misconduct by attorneys and other professionals” as among the sources of abuse in the bankruptcy system. House Report at 5 (citation omitted). Congress therefore responded in the 2005 Act by “strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases.” Id. at 17.

2. The new standards enacted by Congress are principally set forth in 11 U.S.C. §§ 707 and 526-528.[3] Section 707, as amended by the 2005 Act, now requires bankruptcy attorneys to make their own reasonable investigation into the circumstances giving rise to the debtor’s petition, including a specific inquiry into the veracity of the debtor’s debt and asset schedules. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). The legislation further requires that the attorney certify that he has determined that the petition does not constitute an “abuse” under section 707(b). See ibid.

Sections 527 and 528 set forth several interrelated disclosure requirements. Section 527 requires debt relief agencies to provide specific notices to clients, including a description of the different types of relief available in the bankruptcy system. Section 528 similarly requires debt relief agencies to provide clients with written contracts that clearly explain the services that will be provided and the fees that will apply. See 11 U.S.C. § 528(a)(1)-(2). Section 528 also requires debt relief agencies to make certain related disclosures in their advertisements to the public. See id. § 528(a)(3)-(4).

Section 526 lays down four basic rules of professional conduct. Section 526(a)(1) requires debt relief agencies to perform all promised services. Section 526(a)(2) prohibits debt relief agencies from advising an assisted person to make statements that are untrue or misleading in seeking bankruptcy relief. Section 526(a)(3) precludes debt relief agencies from misrepresenting the services they will provide, the benefits that will accrue, or the risks entailed in filing for bankruptcy.

Section 526(a)(4), the provision at issue in this appeal, states:

> A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title or to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for or representing a debtor in a case under this title.

11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

The primary remedy for violations of these sections is a civil action by the debtor, or by the relevant state attorney general, to recover "actual damages" to the debtor. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(2) & (c)(3). A bankruptcy court may impose an "appropriate civil monetary penalty" if it finds intentional violations of these provisions or a clear and consistent practice of violations. Id. § 526(c)(5).

B. Facts and Prior Proceedings

Plaintiff Zenas Zelotes, an attorney who represents consumer debtors in bankruptcy, filed this suit seeking a declaration that section 526(a)(4) is unconstitutional and an injunction prohibiting federal officials from enforcing its provisions. See A-5 (complaint). The district court denied the government's motion to dismiss, holding that the statute violates the First Amendment, and subsequently entered summary judgment for plaintiff. See Zelotes v. Martini, 352 B.R. 17 (D. Conn. 2006); Zelotes v. Adams, 363 B.R. 660 (D. Conn. 2007).[4]

The district court recognized that, in enacting the 2005 reform legislation, Congress sought to eliminate the "'loopholes and incentives [in the present bankruptcy system] that allow and — sometimes — even encourage opportunistic personal filings and abuse.'" See 352 B.R. at 23 (quoting House Report, at 5). The problem, the court stated, was that Congress had not sought to [4] The complaint named as the defendant Deirdre A. Martini, who at the time was the United States Trustee for Region 2 (which encompasses Connecticut). A-5. Diana G. Adams, the current U.S. Trustee for Region 2, was later substituted as defendant pursuant to Fed. R. App. P. 25(d). See 363 B.R. at 663 n.3.

"chang[e] the bankruptcy system by closing the loopholes," but instead "enacted § 526(a)(4), a prophylactic rule which prohibits attorneys from advising their clients to take on any additional debt in contemplation of bankruptcy, even when doing so would be lawful." Id. at 24.

The district court observed that, for example, a person contemplating bankruptcy might wish to "'refinanc[e] [debts] at a lower rate to reduce payments and forestall or even prevent entering bankruptcy.'" Ibid. (quoting Hersh v. United States, 347 B.R. 19, 24 (N.D. Tex. 2006), appeal docketed, No. 07-10226 (5th Cir.)). Alternatively, a debtor might "'tak[e] out a loan to obtain the services of bankruptcy attorney, to pay the filing fee in a bankruptcy case," or to "'refinanc[e] a mortgage" to pay off debts. Ibid. (quoting Olsen v. Gonzales, 350 B.R. 906, 916-17 (D. Or. 2006), appeal docketed, No. 07-35616 (9th Cir.)). The government explained that section 526(a)(4) would not prohibit advice about these lawful actions because the attorney would not be advising the client to incur additional debt solely "'in contemplation of filing for bankruptcy.'" 352 B.R. at 24 n.8. The court rejected that contention, declaring that the government's reading "would strain the text of the statute" because "[t]he text * * * indicates that regardless of what the other reasons for incurring debt might be, advising a client to take on more debt in contemplation of bankruptcy is prohibited." Ibid.

The district court concluded that "[b]y prohibiting lawyers from advising clients to take lawful, prudent actions as well as abusive ones, section 526(a)(4) is overbroad and restricts attorney speech beyond what is 'narrow and necessary' to further the governmental interest." Id. at 25 (quoting Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1075 (1991)). The district court subsequently entered a permanent injunction barring federal officials from enforcing the statute against plaintiff. See 363 B.R. at 667-68.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

In enacting the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, Congress sought to curb abuses of the bankruptcy system, both by debtors and by the professionals who represent them. Congress thus "strengthen[ed] professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases," H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 17 (2005), by adopting a range of new requirements for debtors and their representatives, including section 526(a)(4). That section provides that attorneys may not advise clients "to incur more debt in contemplation of" filing a petition for bankruptcy. 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4).

Section 526(a)(4) complements other provisions in the 2005 legislation that address the conduct of debtors who amass debt at the eleventh hour in order to take advantage of the Bankruptcy Code's discharge provisions or otherwise manipulate its protections. Among other measures, the 2005 Act restricts the ability of debtors to discharge such debt, and it expands the authority of bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions for abuse of the bankruptcy system — including in cases in which debtors abuse the Code by deliberately taking on additional debt in contemplation of filing a petition. In addition, the 2005 legislation imposes a new duty on bankruptcy attorneys to certify that the petitions filed by their clients do not constitute an abuse of the Code, and authorizes bankruptcy courts to impose sanctions on attorneys for violations of that duty.

Section 526(a)(4) precludes attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals from encouraging their clients to engage in the same type of abusive accumulation of debt that was the focus of Congress's concern in these provisions. The district court did not suggest that debtors can properly take on additional debt to manipulate the bankruptcy system, or that attorneys are constitutionally entitled to encourage them to do so. Nevertheless, the district court struck down section 526(a)(4) on its face because it believed that the provision would also encompass advice to engage in conduct consistent with the Bankruptcy Code and with the client's legitimate interests.

That reading extends section 526(a)(4) far beyond Congress's purpose. In precluding attorneys from urging their clients to take on additional debt "in contemplation of" a bankruptcy filing, Congress was concerned only with debt purposefully accumulated in order to manipulate the bankruptcy system. Neither the language of the statute nor the relevant legislative history warrants the district court's assumption that section 526(a)(4) would prevent a lawyer from offering candid advice on the legality of a debtor's proposed course of conduct, or that it would prohibit an attorney from urging a client to take actions consistent with the Bankruptcy Code and the client's best interests. A statute should be construed to avoid, rather than to invite, constitutional difficulties, and the court erred in failing to apply this principle in construing section 526(a)(4).

The district court's ruling also departed from fundamental principles of overbreadth analysis. Even under the court's mistakenly broad reading of the statute, section 526(a)(4) could be constitutionally applied in the category of cases at which the statute is actually aimed. In holding section 526(a)(4) facially overbroad, the district court mistakenly failed to consider whether the statute's assertedly impermissible applications would be substantial when judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A facial challenge to the constitutionality of a federal statute presents a question of law subject to de novo review. United States v. Dhafir, 461 F.3d 211, 215 (2d Cir. 2006).

ARGUMENT

CONGRESS CONSTITUTIONALLY REGULATED THE CONDUCT OF BANKRUPTCY PROFESSIONALS BY PRECLUDING THEM FROM ENCOURAGING CLIENTS TO ABUSE THE BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM BY TAKING ON ADDITIONAL DEBT IN CONTEMPLATION OF FILING A PETITION.

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 seeks to curb a variety of abusive practices by consumer debtors and their representatives. A principal concern of the legislation was to address the recurring problem of debtors attempting to exploit the Bankruptcy Code's discharge provisions, or otherwise manipulate the bankruptcy system, by purposefully accumulating additional debt prior to filing a petition for relief. Among other reforms, the 2005 Act expanded the authority of the bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions for such abuse and required bankruptcy attorneys affirmatively to certify that no basis exists for deeming their clients' petitions abusive.

Section 526(a)(4) complements these reforms by precluding bankruptcy professionals from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system by taking on additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition. Because the provision is an unexceptionable regulation of professional conduct that does not impinge upon the First Amendment rights of attorneys or their clients, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

A. The 2005 Act Addresses Abuses Of The Code By Debtors Who Incur New Debt In Anticipation Of Bankruptcy And By Attorneys Who Encourage Clients To Engage In Such Conduct.

1. Abuses Of The System By Debtors Incurring Additional Debt In Contemplation Of Bankruptcy.

Among the primary abuses addressed in the 2005 Act is the accumulation of new debt in contemplation of filing a petition for bankruptcy. Congress had long been aware that this practice poses a fundamental threat to the Code's twin goals of affording debtors a fresh start while providing an orderly and equitable system of resolving creditors' claims. For example, when Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(2)(C), which creates a presumption that certain eve-of-bankruptcy debts are not dischargeable, the accompanying Senate Report emphasized that "[e]xcessive debts incurred within a short period prior to the filing of the petition present a special problem: that of 'loading up' in contemplation of bankruptcy." S. Rep. No. 98-65, at 9 (1983). The report explained that "[a] debtor planning [to] file a petition with the bankruptcy court has a strong economic incentive to incur dischargeable debts for either consumable goods or exempt property," noting that "[i]n many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent." Ibid.

As the report concluded, "[n]ot only does this result in direct losses for the creditors that are the victims of the spree, but it also creates a higher absolute level of debt so that all creditors receive less in liquidation. During this period of insolvency preceding the filing of the petition, creditors would not extend credit if they knew the true facts." Ibid. Indeed, as early as 1973, Congress was informed that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge." Report of the Commission of the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, pt. 1, at 11 (July 1973).

In adopting the 2005 Act, Congress expressed concern that these earlier measures had not adequately restricted the ability of debtors to "knowingly load up with credit card purchases or recklessly obtain cash advances and then file for bankruptcy relief." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31, pt. 1, at 15 (2005) ("House Report"). Accordingly, Congress took a series of new steps in the 2005 Act to combat the problem of debts incurred in contemplation of filing for bankruptcy. Thus, the Act reduced the threshold amounts at which certain types of eve-of-bankruptcy debts, such as cash advances, become presumptively fraudulent and therefore nondischargeable.[5] See Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 310, 119 Stat. at 84 (amending 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(2)(C)).

More fundamentally, Congress greatly expanded the authority of the bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions for abuse of the bankruptcy system, including in cases in which debtors abuse the Code by purposefully incurring additional debt in contemplation of filing a petition. Even before the 2005 legislation, a bankruptcy court was authorized to dismiss a petition for "substantial abuse" under former 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1). See generally In re Kornfield, 164 F.3d 778, 781 (2d Cir. 1999). Moreover, it was established that, under the "substantial abuse" standard, a debtor's purposeful accumulation of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy could justify dismissal of the petition. See, e.g., In re Price, 353 F.3d 1135, 1139-40 (9th Cir. 2004) (describing factors relevant to a finding of substantial abuse, including "[w]hether the debtor has engaged in eve-of-bankruptcy purchases"); In re Charles, 334 B.R. 207, 222 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2005) ("It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case."); In re Rathbun, 309 B.R.

[5] One of the factors that bankruptcy courts consider in determining whether a debt is fraudulent and nondischargeable, moreover, is "[w]hether or not an attorney has been consulted concerning the filing of bankruptcy before the charges were made." In re Eashai, 87 F.3d 1082, 1087 (9th Cir. 1996); see also In re Mercer, 246 F.3d 391, 408 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("whether, prior to card-use, an attorney was consulted about bankruptcy").

901, 904 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004); In re Aiello, 284 B.R. 756, 761 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2002).[6]

In the 2005 Act, Congress reduced the threshold finding required under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) for a bankruptcy court to dismiss a debtor's petition as abusive, from "substantial abuse" to merely "abuse," see House Report at 48, and it repealed the statutory presumption in favor of granting the relief sought by the debtor, see id. at 49; Pub. L. No. 109-8, § 102, 119 Stat. at 27. Congress further made clear that, in determining whether a petition should be dismissed for abuse, a bankruptcy court may properly consider "whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith" and whether "the totality of the circumstances * * * of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). At the same time, Congress authorized any party in interest — including, for example, unsecured creditors aggrieved by a debtor's eleventh-hour accumulation of new debt — to file a motion for such relief. See id. § 707(b)(1). Under prior law, only the United States Trustee, or the court on its own motion, could seek to dismiss a petition as abusive. See In re Kornfield, 164 F.3d at 784.

---

[6] As the Supreme Court recently explained in the context of chapter 13 debtors, bad faith pre-petition conduct by the debtor justifies dismissal of the petition because such a debtor "is not a member of the class of 'honest but unfortunate debtor[s]' that the bankruptcy laws were enacted to protect." Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 127 S. Ct. 1105, 1111 (2007) (quoting Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 287 (1991)).

2. Abuses Of The System By Lawyers And Other Bankruptcy Professionals.

Congress also responded in the 2005 Act to evidence that attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals often played a critical role in abuse of the bankruptcy system. Citing data collected by the U.S. Trustee Program, the House Report noted that the study "consistently identified" among the sources of abuse "misconduct by attorneys and other professionals" and "problems associated with bankruptcy petition preparers." House Report at 5 (quoting Darling & Redmiles, Protecting the Integrity of the System: the Civil Enforcement Initiative, Am. Bankr. Inst. J. 12 (Sept. 2002)). See also 352 B.R. at 23 (citing report).

The need to address misconduct by bankruptcy professionals was made particularly urgent by the "principal consumer bankruptcy reform" in the 2005 legislation, which was the adoption of a "means testing" mechanism intended to restrict debtors who have the ability to repay at least some of their debts from obtaining a complete discharge under chapter 7. See House Report at 48; see also id. at 3 (describing means testing as the "heart" of the 2005 Act's reform provisions). Under the new means-testing provision, a debtor's petition for complete relief under chapter 7 is presumed to be abusive if the debtor's income exceeds his unsecured debts by a certain ratio. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(A). The effect of the means test is to ensure that debtors who have the ability to repay a portion of their debts are channeled into chapter 13, which provides an opportunity for a structured repayment plan.

As Congress recognized, however, the means test exacerbates the incentive for debtors to manipulate the system by "loading up" on debt in contemplation of filing a petition, because a higher debt ratio can allow an otherwise borderline debtor to avoid the burdens of a chapter 13 repayment plan and obtain a complete and immediate discharge under chapter 7. See Zelotes, 352 B.R. at 23 & n.7 (noting this incentive). Concern was expressed at the congressional hearings that attorneys would respond to the means test by counseling their clients simply to take on additional debt before filing for bankruptcy. As one bankruptcy judge testified, "[t]he more debt that is incurred prior to filing, the more likely the debtor will qualify for chapter 7." Thus, "[p]erverse as it may seem, I can envision debtor's counsel advising their clients to buy the most expensive car that someone will sell them, and sign on to the biggest payment they can afford (at least until the bankruptcy is filed) as a way of increasing their deductions under [the means test]." Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998: Part I, Hearing on H.R. 3150 before House Judiciary Comm., 105th Cong. 25 (1998) (testimony of Judge Randall Newsome); see also Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1999 (Part II), Hearing before House Judiciary Comm., 106th Cong. 30 (1999) (testimony of Judge William Brown).

Congress addressed these problems in the 2005 Act by "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases" in return for a fee. House Report at 17. Under the amended provisions of the Code, an attorney who represents a consumer debtor in filing a bankruptcy petition must make his own reasonable investigation into the circumstances giving rise to the debtor's petition, including a specific inquiry into the veracity of the debtor's debt and asset schedules. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). By signing the petition, the attorney personally certifies that he believes the petition is warranted by the facts, that he has no reason to believe the debtor's schedules are incorrect, and that he has determined that the petition does not constitute an "abuse" under section 707(b). See ibid. Congress thus effectively required bankruptcy attorneys to warrant that their clients' pre-petition conduct and financial circumstances — including any assumption of debt in contemplation of bankruptcy — do not provide grounds for dismissal of the petition as abuse of the bankruptcy system.

Two provisions of section 526(a) complement these requirements by precluding attorneys and other "debt relief agencies," see 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A) (definition), from advising consumer debtors to abuse the bankruptcy system. Section 526(a)(2) prohibits attorneys from encouraging clients to make false statements in a bankruptcy proceeding. Section 526(a)(4), at issue here, precludes attorneys from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system by taking on additional debt in contemplation of filing a bankruptcy petition.

B. Section 526(a)(4) Constitutionally Restricts Attorneys From Encouraging Clients To Take On Additional Debt In Contemplation of Bankruptcy.

1. The First Amendment Does Not Preclude Restrictions On Attorney Advice To Engage In Improper Conduct.

The district court did not suggest that the First Amendment bars Congress from restricting attorneys from encouraging their clients to abuse the bankruptcy system. Attorneys, like other professionals, are subject to various restrictions in urging their clients to undertake action. See, e.g., ABA Model Rules of Prof. Conduct R. 1.2(d) ("A lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent, but a lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client and may counsel or assist a client to make a good-faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning, or application of the law."); accord N.Y. Lawyer's Code Prof. Resp. DR 7-102(A)(7); Conn. R. Prof. Conduct 1.2(d); Vermont R. Prof. Conduct 1.2(d).

Regulations of professional ethics of this kind do not violate the First Amendment. See Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030, 1071-76 (1991) (discussing the standards governing regulation of attorney speech). Although the district court questioned whether section 526(a)(4) is properly regarded as a regulation of professional conduct, Congress clearly understood the regulation in this manner. See House Report at 17 (describing new provisions as "strengthening professionalism standards for attorneys and others who assist consumer debtors with their bankruptcy cases"). Indeed, the statute addresses conduct that has been held to fall squarely within the scope of Model Rule 1.2(d). See Attorney Grievance Comm'n of Maryland v. Culver, 381 Md. 241, 275-76 (2004) (attorney violated Rule 1.2(d) by advising a client to obtain credit card loans with the intent that the debt be discharged in bankruptcy).

2. Section 526(a)(4) Should Not Be Construed More Broadly Than Necessary To Achieve Congress's Purpose.

The district court nevertheless expressed concern that section 526(a)(4) "prevents lawyers from giving clients the best and most complete advice." 352 B.R. at 24. The court noted various potentially legitimate reasons for a debtor to incur new debt before filing a bankruptcy petition, such as borrowing money from friends or family to purchase an automobile that would allow the debtor to get to work, or refinancing a secured loan to obtain a better rate of interest and lower monthly payments. Ibid. Asserting that section 526(a)(4) would prohibit advice to engage in such "lawful, prudent actions as well as abusive ones," the court invalidated the statute on its face. Id. at 25.

Reading the statute in this manner expands its scope far beyond Congress's purpose to discourage "opportunistic personal filings and abuse." Id. at 23 (quoting House Report at 5). By providing that a debt relief agency shall not advise a client "to incur more debt in contemplation of such person filing a case under this title," § 526(a)(4) (emphasis added), Congress addressed only advice to a debtor to accumulate additional debt for the purpose of manipulating the bankruptcy system, such as by "loading up" on new debt in order to obtain a more advantageous discharge. Like section 526(a)(2), which precludes attorneys from advising clients to make false statements, section 526(a)(4) thus encompasses advice to engage in improper or abusive conduct.

That interpretation follows from Congress's unmistakable purposes in the 2005 Act. As already discussed, section 526(a)(4) represents only one of many measures in the 2005 Act aimed at preventing abuses of the bankruptcy system by debtors and their professional representatives. Among other significant amendments, Congress enhanced the authority of bankruptcy courts to dismiss petitions as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1), expanded the definition of "abuse" to take account of a debtor's bad faith in seeking bankruptcy relief, see id. § 707(b)(3), and specifically required bankruptcy attorneys to investigate the facts underlying a debtor's petition and to certify that no basis exists for dismissing the petition as abusive, see 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D). Against the background of such amendments, it is apparent that Congress intended the phrase "to incur more debt in contemplation of" bankruptcy in section 526(a)(4) as a reference to the recognized problem of debtors purposefully accumulating new debt in an effort to abuse the protections of the Bankruptcy Code. Cf. Report of the Commission of the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, pt. 1, at 11 (observing that "the most serious abuse of consumer bankruptcy is the number of instances in which individuals have purchased a sizable quantity of goods and services on credit on the eve of bankruptcy in contemplation of obtaining a discharge" (emphasis added)).

That understanding, moreover, is consistent with Congress's repeated references, in the legislative histories cited above, to debts incurred to manipulate the bankruptcy system as debts incurred "in contemplation of" bankruptcy. See S. Rep. No. 98-65, at 9 ("In many instances, the debtor will go on a credit buying spree in contemplation of bankruptcy at a time when the debtor is, in fact, insolvent" (emphasis added)); see also Consumer Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1998, S. Rep. No. 105-253, at 83 (1998) (minority views) ("Clearly, debtors should not incur debts with the intention not to repay them, e.g., if they know that they are going to file for bankruptcy," but "debts incurred within 90 days prior to filing may not have been incurred in contemplation of bankruptcy, and thus the isolation of these debts for special treatment is somewhat arbitrary."); cf.

18 U.S.C. § 152(7) (prohibiting the fraudulent transfer or concealment of property "in contemplation of a case under title 11"); In re Charles, 334 B.R. at 222 ("It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case.").

Section 526(a)(4) therefore has no application to the hypothetical conduct that troubled the district court. An attorney would be free, for example, to advise a client to refinance a loan at a lower interest rate, see 352 B.R. at 24, or to borrow money to purchase a means of transportation to work, see ibid., assuming all necessary disclosures were made to the lenders. In neither case would the attorney be advising the debtor to incur unnecessary debt for the purpose of abusing the bankruptcy system.[7] Cf. Culver, 381 Md. at 275-76 (attorney violated Rule 1.2(d) by advising a client to obtain credit card loans with the intent that the debt be discharged in bankruptcy).

In other contexts, the phrase "in contemplation of bankruptcy" may reflect the broad scope assumed here by the district court. E.g., Conrad, Rubin & Lesser v. Pender, 289 U.S. 472, 478 (1933) (interpreting bankruptcy provision regarding attorney compensation). Plainly, however, the same phrase also [7] The district court also did not explain its assumption that refinancing an existing debt — that is, exchanging one loan for another with the same principal balance but a different interest rate or repayment period — would constitute incurring "more debt" within the meaning of section 526(a)(4).

has an accepted narrower meaning. See Black's Law Dictionary 336 (8th ed. 2004) (defining "contemplation of bankruptcy" as "the thought of declaring bankruptcy because of the inability to continue current financial operations, often coupled with action designed to thwart the distribution of assets in a bankruptcy proceeding"); see also In re Mercer, 246 F.3d 391, 421 n.43 (5th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (describing "loading up" as the practice of "incurring card debt in contemplation of bankruptcy"); id. at 421 (referring to "a dishonest but patient debtor who intends to incur card-debt in contemplation of discharge").[8] As the text and purposes of the 2005 Act make clear, it is this narrower sense in which Congress used the phrase in section 526(a)(4).

In any event, the district court erred in adopting the broadest possible reading of the statute without regard to whether it was required by the statutory language and congressional intent. It is fundamental that when "an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems," a federal court must "construe the statute to avoid such problems unless such a construction would be plainly contrary to legislative intent." Field Day, LLC v. County of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 177 (2d. Cir. 2006) (quoting

[8] See also Webster's Third New International Dictionary 491 (1993) (defining "contemplation" to mean, inter alia, "the act of intending or considering a future event"); Random House Dictionary Unabridged 438 (2d ed. 1987) ("contemplate" means, inter alia, "to have as a purpose; intend").

Empire HealthChoice Assur., Inc. v. McVeigh, 396 F.3d 136, 144 (2d Cir. 2005) (quoting Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Fla. Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988))) (internal quotation marks omitted). The district court departed from this principle in failing to adopt — or even address — readings of section 526(a)(4) that would avoid the constitutional difficulties that it postulated.

3. Section 526(a)(4) Does Not Preclude A Candid Discussion Of Legal Options.

The district court also erred in assuming that section 526(a)(4) would preclude a bankruptcy attorney from providing a candid discussion of a client's legal options. Rules governing legal practice commonly distinguish between a circumstance in which an attorney "counsels" (or, in this case, "advises") a course of conduct, and a case in which an attorney simply discusses various options.

Thus, although the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct provide that "[a] lawyer shall not counsel a client to engage, or assist a client, in conduct that the lawyer knows is criminal or fraudulent," the same rule also provides that "a lawyer may discuss the legal consequences of any proposed course of conduct with a client and may counsel or assist a client to make a good-faith effort to determine the validity, scope, meaning, or application of the law." ABA Model Rule 1.2(d). The commentary to Model Rule 1.2 underscores the point: "There is a critical distinction between presenting an analysis of legal aspects of questionable conduct and recommending the means by which a crime or fraud might be committed with impunity." ABA Model Rule 1.2, cmt. 9. In section 526(a)(4), Congress intended the phrase "advise * * * to incur more debt" in the same sense of affirmative encouragement. Cf. Webster's Third New International Dictionary 32 (1993) (defining "advise" to mean, inter alia, "counsel" or "recommend").

Contrary to the district court's understanding, therefore, section 526(a)(4) does not "prevent[] lawyers from giving clients the best and most complete advice." 352 B.R. at 24. Like the model rules, section 526(a)(4) reaches only the conduct of an attorney in affirmatively urging ("advis[ing]") a client to pursue a particular course of conduct, without impairing the attorney's ability to offer a candid assessment of the client's legal options. Cf. ABA Model Rule 1.2, cmt. 9 (explaining that the prohibition against advising clients to engage in fraud "does not preclude the lawyer from giving an honest opinion about the actual consequences that appear likely to result from a client's conduct").

The restriction in section 526(a)(4) thus parallels that in section 526(a)(2), which provides that a debt relief agency shall not "counsel or advise any assisted person or prospective assisted person to make a statement in a document filed in a case or proceeding under this title, that is untrue and misleading."

Congress's concern in both provisions was not to proscribe ordinary legal advice, but to prevent attorneys and other bankruptcy professionals from becoming the affirmative engines of bankruptcy abuse, thereby both undermining the policies of the Code and jeopardizing their clients' petitions for relief.

4. The Remedies For Violations of Section 526(a)(4) Are Consistent With Its Purpose Of Restricting Encouragement To Engage In Abusive Conduct That Jeopardizes a Client's Interests.

The remedial provisions of the statute underscore the error of the district court's interpretation. Congress's intent in section 526(a)(4) was to protect consumer debtors from active encouragement by their representatives to engage in conduct that abuses the bankruptcy system and may result in the dismissal of their petition or other sanctions. Consistent with that intent, the principal remedy for a violation of section 526(a)(4) is a suit against the attorney to recover the debtor's "actual damages," as well as restitution of any fees paid by the debtor. See id. § 526(c)(2); see also id. § 526(c)(3)(B) (authorizing suits by state attorneys general to recover "actual damages" on debtor's behalf). The power of the bankruptcy court to impose an "appropriate civil penalty" is limited to cases of intentional violations and patterns of misconduct. See id. § 526(c)(5). Congress's emphasis in these provisions on the debtor's "actual damages" presupposes that the debtor has been injured by the attorney's conduct: advice that is in the debtor's best interests and fully consistent with the Bankruptcy Code does not trigger any remedial provision.

Quite apart from section 526(a)(4), moreover, an attorney faces sanctions under the Bankruptcy Code for actively encouraging a debtor to accumulate additional debt in order to facilitate a bankruptcy filing, because the 2005 Act requires attorneys to certify that the petitions filed by their clients are not abusive. As discussed above, the Act imposed a new duty on every bankruptcy attorney make a reasonable investigation into the factual basis for the debtor’s petition (including a reasonable inquiry into the veracity of the debtor’s debt and asset schedules) and to certify that, in the attorney’s judgment, the petition will not be subject to dismissal for abuse. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(4)(C)-(D); see also id. § 707(b)(4)(A)-(B) (authorizing civil monetary penalties against attorneys who make false certifications). At the same time, Congress lowered the standard for dismissing a petition as abusive, and it made clear that a bankruptcy court, in determining whether to grant such a motion, should consider whether the debtor has acted in bad faith. Id. §§ 707(b)(1), 707(b)(3); cf. In re Charles, 334 B.R. 207, 222 (Bankr. S.D. Tex 2005) (“It is settled law that a debtor's good faith should be questioned if the debtor makes purchases in contemplation of a bankruptcy case.”). Under these circumstances, it is highly unlikely that a bankruptcy attorney could encourage a client to incur unnecessary debts in order to buttress an anticipated bankruptcy filing without himself violating his obligations under the Code. Section 526(a)(4) addresses the increased risk of dismissal resulting from such unethical attorney advice and provides the debtor with remedies against attorneys who encourage abusive conduct.

C. The District Court Failed To Apply Basic Principles of Overbreadth Analysis.

Even outside the context of ethical rules governing attorneys and other closely regulated professions, a statute may not be invalidated on its face solely because of posited concerns raised by some of its potential applications. "[O]verbreadth of a statute must not only be real, but substantial as well, judged in relation to the statute's plainly legitimate sweep." Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 615 (1973). Thus, even when a restriction is assumed to inhibit some constitutionally protected speech, that assumption may not "'justify prohibiting all enforcement' of the law unless its application to protected speech is substantial, 'not only in an absolute sense, but also relative to the scope of the law's plainly legitimate applications.'" McConnell v. Federal Election Comm'n, 540 U.S. 93, 207 (2003) (quoting Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 120 (2003)).

The district court did not doubt that, even under its own broad reading of the statute, section 526(a)(4) would be constitutional in many of its applications. The court did not explain why it nevertheless believed facial invalidation was appropriate, even assuming that it was compelled to read the statute to cover instances in which an attorney's advice to encourage additional debt is fully consistent with the Bankruptcy Code and the client's interests.

The district court's error is highlighted by its invalidation of section 526(a)(4) in its entirety, without independently addressing that part of the statute that precludes an attorney from advising a client to incur additional debt in order to pay the attorney's own fees. See 11 U.S.C. § 526(a)(4) ("A debt relief agency shall not * * * advise an assisted person or prospective assisted person to incur more debt * * * to pay an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer fee or charge for services performed as part of preparing for representing a debtor in a case under this title."). The district court's willingness to strike down section 526(a)(4) on its face, without addressing this part of the statute, underscores the court's failure to recognize the nature of the issues presented by this facial challenge and to adopt a reading of the statute that avoids constitutional questions to the extent possible. Nothing in the record indicates that the attorneys-fee portion of section 526(a)(4) is fatally overbroad, and the district court identified no reason why that provision should be enjoined. Nor, as with its analysis of the remainder of the provision, did the district court explain why any posited defects could not be addressed by reading the provision to avoid any asserted constitutional difficulties.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted,

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLANT

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 157(a) and (b) to hear the underlying case, a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 1101, et seq. On February 10, 2000, the bankruptcy court entered its final order approving the applications for compensation and reimbursement of expenses (App.). The United States Trustee filed a notice of appeal to the district court from that order on February 22, 2000 (App.). The district court had jurisdiction to hear that appeal under 28 U.S.C. 158(a). The district court filed its final order dismissing that appeal on February 11, 2002 (App.); the order was entered on February 12, 2002 (App.). The United States Trustee filed a notice of appeal to the court of appeals from that order on April 11, 2002 (App.). This Court has jurisdiction to hear that appeal under 28 U.S.C. 158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Whether the district court properly dismissed as equitably moot the U.S. Trustee's appeal of a bankruptcy court order authorizing the payment of professional fees and expenses for work on behalf of the unofficial equity security holders committee, where reversal of the order would require only disgorgement of the fees and their redistribution under the bankruptcy plan, but would not require altering or unraveling of the plan itself.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Zenith Electronics Corporation filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 1101, et seq., seeking reorganization under a “prepackaged” plan. A number of shareholders then formed an unofficial committee, which moved the bankruptcy court to direct the United States Trustee to form an official committee of equity security holders. The bankruptcy court granted the motion, heard the official committee during a hearing on confirmation of the proposed plan, rejected the official committee’s objections to the plan, and then approved the plan. The bankruptcy court then granted $76,500 in fees for work performed by lawyers and accountants on behalf of the unofficial committee, plus $867.15 in expenses (App.).[1] The bankruptcy court made the fee award under 11 U.S.C. 503(b)(3)(D) and (b)(4), which permit professional fees and expenses when an party such as an unofficial committee "mak[es] a substantial contribution" to a bankruptcy case.

The U.S. Trustee appealed the fee award to the district court, but the district court dismissed the appeal under the "equitable mootness" doctrine. Under that doctrine, as the district court explained, "an appeal can be dismissed as moot 'when, even though effective relief could conceivably be fashioned, implementation of that relief would be inequitable.'" Order at 5 (App.), quoting In re Continental Airlines, 91 F.3d 553, 559 (3d Cir. 1996)(Continental I or Continental). The district court said that it relied most heavily on two factors cited by this Court in Continental: that the reorganization plan has been substantially consummated and that the U.S. Trustee had not sought a stay of the fee award. Order at 8 (App.).

STATEMENT OF FACTS

1. On August 23, 1999, Zenith Electronics Corporation filed

[1] The bankruptcy court also awarded fees and expenses for work on behalf of the official committee. Those fees are not in dispute on this appeal.

a voluntary petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 11.[2] The proposed plan was "prepackaged," with the details negotiated in advance between Zenith and its principal shareholder, LG Electronics (LGE), which owned 58% of Zenith's stock and which also had lent millions of dollars to Zenith. See 258 F.3d at 182. Under the plan, inter alia, all existing stock in Zenith would be cancelled for no consideration, and new stock would be issued to LGE alone, in exchange for debt relief. Ibid. Also, $103 million in existing bonds would be exchanged for $50 million in new bonds, bank debt would be refinanced, and debt owed to trade creditors would be unaltered. Ibid.

The minority shareholders, whose shares were proposed to be cancelled under the plan, objected to the plan. The largest minority shareholder, Nordhoff Investments, represented its own interests. The remaining minority shareholders formed an unofficial committee of equity security holders, which had been heavily involved with the negotiations that eventually led to the filing of the Chapter 11 petition. See 258 F.3d at 183. On August 26, 1999, just three days after the petition was filed, the unofficial committee moved the bankruptcy court to order the appointment of an official committee of equity holders under 11

[2] The underlying facts concerning the Zenith bankruptcy are laid out in greater detail in this Court's decision on a prior appeal in this case, Nordhoff Investments, Inc. v. Zenith Electronics Corp., 258 F.3d 180, 182-84 (3d Cir. 2001).

U.S.C. 1102(a)(2). District Court Order at 3 (App.).

At a hearing on August 27, the United States Trustee objected to the formation of an official committee, arguing that an official committee was unnecessary, since the company was hopelessly insolvent and thus all stock held by members of the proposed committee was to be cancelled under the reorganization plan. The bankruptcy court nevertheless granted the motion that same day and ordered the U.S. Trustee to appoint the official committee. Ibid. The U.S. Trustee filed a notice of appeal on August 31, and on September 8, 1999, she moved in the district court for a stay pending appeal of the order appointing the official committee.[3] The U.S. Trustee also appointed the official committee that same day. The district court denied the stay on September 13. Ibid. The U.S. Trustee's appeal to the district court of the appointment order nevertheless remained pending.

The bankruptcy court held an expedited hearing on confirmation of the proposed reorganization plan, at which Nordhoff and the official committee objected that Zenith was worth far more than the value that was the basis for the plan; the debtor's expert valued the company at $300 million, but the minority shareholders contended that it was actually worth $1.05 billion. See 258 F.3d at 183. The bankruptcy court agreed with the debtor’s valuation and thus, on November 2, 1999, it approved the plan of reorganization. Ibid. The confirmation order included a provision dissolving all committees on November 9. District Court Order at 3 (App.).

On November 19, 1999, ten days after the official committee was dissolved, two law firms and an accounting firm applied for compensation and reimbursement of expenses out of the estate for work done (1) for the unofficial committee prior to September 8, in its efforts to obtain appointment of an official committee, and (2) for the official committee on and after September 8. The U.S. Trustee objected to the fees for the unofficial committee, arguing that the committee did not meet the statutory criteria for reimbursement of fees, namely that the professionals "mak[e] a substantial contribution" to the case. See 11 U.S.C. 503(b)(3)(D), (b)(4). The U.S. Trustee did not, however, object to the fee request for work performed on behalf of the official committee. On February 7, 2000, the bankruptcy court granted fees and expenses for both situations (App.). It allowed $76,500 in fees for work on behalf of the unofficial committee, plus $867.15 in expenses; and it allowed $437,250 in fees and $85,024.45 in expenses for work on behalf of the official committee (App.).

2. The district court consolidated the U.S. Trustee's appeals from the appointment order and from the fee order (as well as the debtor's appeal from the appointment order). It found first that the appeals from the appointment order are moot under Article III. Order at 4-5 (App.). It found that, since the stay was denied and the official committee was dissolved and no longer exists, the court could grant no effective relief on the appeal of the appointment order. It thus dismissed those appeals.[4]

The district court then dismissed the U.S. Trustee's appeal of the fee order on equitable mootness grounds. Equitable mootness, the court explained, is a doctrine that applies in bankruptcy cases, under which a claim is dismissed even though it is not constitutionally moot (that is, even though relief can still be granted). The court quoted the five factors listed by this Court, sitting en banc, in Continental Airlines, 91 F.3d at 560:

> (1) whether the reorganization plan has been substantially consummated, (2) whether a stay has been obtained, (3) whether the relief requested would affect the rights of parties not before the court, (4) whether the relief requested would affect the success of the plan, and (5) the public policy of affording finality to bankruptcy judgments.

The court then considered each factor in turn.

[4] The United States Trustee has decided not to raise on appeal this aspect of the district court’s order. As a result, our appeal from the order requiring the appointment of the official committee should no longer be considered to be pending.

On the first factor, the court briefly noted that in a prior decision,[5] it had already found that the reorganization plan was substantially consummated on November 9, 1999, by which time most transactions had been completed. Order at 6 (App.). On the second factor, the court noted that the U.S. Trustee had not sought a stay. Ibid. The court concluded on the third factor that no third parties would be affected by the appeal. Order at 6 (App.). The court found on the fourth factor that "the relief sought will probably not affect the success of the plan. * * * As the [U.S.] Trustee points out, the relief sought here can be granted without disrupting the entire reorganization plan." Order at 7 (App.). On the fifth factor, the court said first that the interest in finality "weighs in favor of dismissing the appeal," but then said that this factor "is arguably neutral." Order at 8 (App.). Although the first two factors weigh in favor of dismissal and the next two weigh against dismissal, the court explained that in Continental, this Court gave the first factor "'foremost consideration'" (Order at 8). The district court then set forth several other factors to support its decision: no party other than the U.S. Trustee has appealed; the U.S. Trustee has not explained why she rejected an attempt to agree to a stipulation; and even in the absence of equitable mootness, "fairness may dictate the payment of fees" since the professionals did not act to the detriment of the estate or otherwise improperly. Order at 9 (App.).

[5] In that prior decision, In re Zenith Electronics Corp., 250 B.R. 207 (D. Del. 2000), the same district court judge (Sleet, J.) had dismissed as equitably moot the appeals taken to the district court by Nordhoff and by the official committee of equity security holders from the bankruptcy court's order confirming the reorganization plan. The district court's discussion of the "substantial consummation" factor is at 250 B.R. at 213-14. As we explain in more detail in the argument, infra, the district court's analysis in the Nordhoff appeal discussed at great length the idea that a reversal of the confirmation order would require dismantling of the reorganization plan and that "[a]lthough some of the Plan transactions could conceivably be 'reversed,' this would not be easy to accomplish, and other transactions may not be reversible at all." 250 B.R. at 214. This Court then affirmed that order in Nordhoff, supra, finding that the district court "did not abuse its discretion in its analysis of this factor of the equitable mootness test." 258 F.3d at 186.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

If the United States Trustee’s appeal of the professional fee award in this case is successful, such a decision would only require the attorneys and accountants to disgorge their fees and pay them back to the estate. It thus would have no effect on the overall reorganization plan here, under which a large company changed its stock ownership, reissued its bonds, and refinanced its bank debt. Maintaining the appeal thus would not even remotely meet the standards established by this Court and other courts of appeals for dismissal of an appeal on equitable mootness grounds, under which such dismissal is available only if “‘[the] appeal, if successful, would necessitate the reversal or unraveling of the entire plan of reorganization’ * * * .” PWS

Holding, 228 F.3d at 237 (citation omitted). While this Court in Continental I, 91 F.3d at 560, identified five more-specific factors that the courts should consider when determining whether to dismiss for equitable mootness, the underlying issue that must be examined under each of the factors is the inequity of unraveling a plan of reorganization, long after many parties relied on the plan’s implementation. This appeal raises none of the concerns at issue under the five factors.

Under the first factor, whether the plan has been substantially consummated, the analysis does not end simply because the case meets the statutory definition of that term in 11 U.S.C. 1101(2), namely, that the property has been transferred to the estate and distribution has begun. Rather, this Court then looks at whether the appeal would “disturb the reorganization,” Continental, 91 F.3d at 561. This first factor thus weighs heavily against a finding of equitable mootness because the appeal here would not require that the reorganization be reversed or materially altered. Similarly, under the second factor, whether a stay was obtained, this Court’s concern in Continental again was that, in the absence of a stay, a reorganization plan will be implemented that will be difficult or inequitable to dismantle in the event of a reversal.

The district court itself found that the next two factors weigh against a finding of equitable mootness: whether the appeal would affect parties not before the court and whether it would affect the success of the plan. Indeed, the latter factor is essentially the concern that we have shown underlies all five factors. The district court's finding that this factor was not met should have all but ended the inquiry.

The fifth factor, the interest in finality, also is merely another way of explaining the underlying principle of all five factors, namely that the courts should not dismiss an appeal for equitable mootness unless the appeal, if successful, would unravel a complex bankruptcy reorganization plan upon which many parties have relied since its implementation.

The district court also relied on three other factors, but none of those other factors supports dismissal. First, while no party has appealed the fee award other than the U.S. Trustee, the U.S. Trustee has a special statutory "watchdog" function over matters like this under 11 U.S.C. 307. Congress wanted the U.S. Trustee to press issues involving violations of the Bankruptcy Code even when the creditors decide not to press them. Second, it was not proper for the district court to find that the U.S. Trustee's alleged failure to settle should be held against her. Finally, this Court should reject the district court's holding that it would be independently inequitable to require the professionals to refund their fees, even if the case were not equitably moot. This Court's equitable mootness doctrine is very detailed and complex. It should not add to that doctrine such an ad hoc additional equitable basis for dismissing an appeal.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In Continental, 91 F.3d at 560, this Court stated that “[b]ecause the [equitable] mootness determination we review here involves a discretionary balancing of equitable and prudential factors rather than the limits of the federal courts’ authority under Article III, using ordinary review principles we review that decision generally for abuse of discretion. * * * A particular case may also raise legal and/or factual issues interspersed with the prudential ones, and then the applicable review standard, plenary or clearly erroneous, will apply.” As we will show, the district court failed to follow the overarching principle for equitable mootness set forth by this Court in Continental: that relief must require the significant dismantling of a bankruptcy plan and doing so must be both highly impractical and unfair to other parties. This failure by the district court to follow the standard in Continental can most fairly be considered an error of law. In the alternative, it is still a basis for reversal by this Court as an abuse of discretion, either because the district court acted outside its range of discretion, or because it applied its discretion in a plainly incorrect way, by not following the analysis in Continental. Notably, in In re PWS Holding Corporation, 228 F.3d 224, 236-37

(3d Cir. 2000), when this Court affirmed the decision of the district court denying equitable mootness, it did not rely on an abuse of discretion analysis, but rather it looked at the merits of the question of whether a successful appeal would require unraveling of the reorganization plan.

ARGUMENT

THE U.S. TRUSTEE'S APPEAL IS NOT "EQUITABLY MOOT" BECAUSE REVERSAL WOULD NOT REQUIRE ANY DISMANTLING OF THE REORGANIZATION PLAN BUT RATHER ONLY THE DISGORGEMENT OF ATTORNEY'S FEES

The appeal by the United States Trustee raises a collateral matter in the context of the reorganization of a major corporation: the propriety of a $76,500 professional fee award, in a bankruptcy case involving a manufacturer which the bankruptcy court found to be worth $300 million as a going concern. See Nordhoff, 258 F.3d at 183. Reversal of the fee award would have no effect on the long-completed reorganization plan or on the operations of the reconstituted debtor, nor would it adversely affect any parties other than the attorneys and accountants who received the fees, and who the U.S. Trustee seeks to argue were not entitled to those fees under the Bankruptcy Code. All that would occur upon reversal would be that the professionals would reimburse the estate for the fees they have received, and the bankruptcy court would distribute those funds as appropriate under the plan (probably by simply giving the cash to the reorganized debtor as an ongoing concern).

Maintaining this appeal thus would not even remotely meet the standards established by this Court and other courts of appeals for dismissal of an appeal on equitable mootness grounds. Dismissal for equitable mootness is available only if "'[the] appeal, if successful, would necessitate the reversal or unraveling of the entire plan of reorganization' * * * ." PWS Holding, 228 F.3d at 237, quoting In re Continental Airlines, 203 F.3d 203, 210 (3d Cir. 2000)(Continental II). This Court used similar analysis in Nordhoff, an earlier appeal also raising a equitable mootness issue in regard to an appeal of the merits in the present case. "In effect," this Court explained, "the equitable mootness doctrine prevents a court from unscrambling complex bankruptcy reorganizations when the appealing party should have acted before the plan became extremely difficult to retract." 258 F.3d at 185. Significantly, the district court held that "the relief sought here can be granted without disrupting the entire reorganization plan. Indeed, * * * ordering the remittance of fees has a minimal effect on the reorganization plan." Order at 7 (App.). Those findings should have led the court to deny dismissal for equitable mootness.

The appeal in Nordhoff, by contrast, would indeed have been difficult to retract, as this Court went on to discuss at some length. See 258 F.3d at 185-91. In that appeal, the Official

Committee, as well as a large minority stockholder, actually wanted to unravel the Zenith reorganization plan, arguing that the company was worth three times as much as the plan assumed, and that therefore it was wrong to cancel the existing stock with no compensation. See 258 F.3d at 186 (describing steps that would be taken if appellants were successful). This Court quoted favorably the district court’s finding that, because reversing of the transactions would be either difficult or impossible, that "‘weighs heavily in favor of dismissal, at least to the extent that the court could not fashion relief that would not result in the dismantling of the plan.’" Ibid., quoting district court order.[6]

In PWS Holdings, this Court declined to order dismissal on equitable mootness grounds, noting that there were “intermediate options” that would require only “alterations to the plan rather than an unraveling of the reorganization.” 228 F.3d at 236-37. Thus, this Court has rejected equitable mootness under circumstances where the consequences of maintaining the appeal were far more significant than here – alterations of the plan itself that allowed it to still operate, as opposed to the mere disgorgement of a small attorney’s fee award in the present case.

[6] Because Nordhoff was an earlier appeal in the same underlying bankruptcy case, with the Official Committee of Equity Security Holders a party to that appeal as it is to this one, Nordhoff is not just binding Third Circuit precedent but it also is likely law of the case.

Indeed, this Court has repeatedly noted, in broader terms, that “the [equitable mootness] doctrine is ‘limited in scope and [should be] cautiously applied’ * * *.” PWS Holding, 228 F.3d at 236, quoting Continental, 91 F.3d at 559. Accord, Nordhoff, 258 F.3d at 185.

Many other circuits have adopted the equitable mootness doctrine, and they have routinely held that the doctrine exists to prevent litigation from undermining an approved and effected reorganization plan. See Mac Panel Co. v. Virginia Panel Corp., 283 F.3d 522 (4th Cir. 2002) (“[E]quitable mootness is * * * grounded in the notion that, with the passage of time after a judgment in equity and implementation of that judgment, effective relief on appeal becomes impractical, imprudent, and therefore inequitable.”).[7] And the courts have unanimously rejected equitable mootness as a defense where, as here, relief would require only a simple matter, such as repayment of a fee award to the estate. Thus, in In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp., 216 F.3d 882, 884 (9th Cir. 2000), the Ninth Circuit refused to dismiss an appeal from an attorney's fees order on equitable mootness grounds because "an order compelling disgorgement of [attorney's] fees and expenses would not require the bankruptcy court to unravel a complicated bankruptcy plan. Rather, it would require only that one party disgorge money it has received, money that then would be distributed pursuant to the bankruptcy court's final decree." See also In re AOV, 792 F.2d at 1149 (declining to apply equitable mootness where "the pending challenge to the fees awarded to White & Case [is] still capable of resolution, regardless of the degree of consummation") (emphasis added).[8]

While this Court, sitting en banc in Continental I, 91 F.3d at 560, identified five more-specific factors that the courts should consider when determining whether to dismiss for equitable mootness, the underlying issue that must be examined under each of the factors is the inequity of unraveling a plan of reorganization, long after many parties relied on the plan's implementation. This Court's stated rationale in Nordhoff that we just described at length is actually contained in its discussion of the first factor — substantial consummation of the plan. The other four factors similarly turn most importantly on whether relief on appeal would require unraveling of the plan. Failure to obtain a stay is critical because a stay could have prevented the plan from going into effect. Parties not before the court can be unfairly affected because they relied on the implementation of the plan. The fourth factor actually is whether the relief requested would affect the success of the plan. Finally, the public policy in favor of finality looks at whether third parties have relied upon the confirmation of the plan. Each of the factors circles back to the same premise: equitable mootness will be found only where relief on appeal are so complex or difficult to unwind that the doctrine of equitable mootness would apply."); In re Healthco, 136 F.3d at 49 ("Here, of course, * * * there has been no showing that any portion of the settlement proceeds disbursed * * * could not be recovered with relative ease. Accordingly, the equitable mootness doctrine does not bar the present appeal.").

would require the dismantling of a reorganization plan at a point in time when doing so would be too costly. We now turn to discussion of each of the five factors to show how the present appeal does not in any way raise such concerns.

1. Substantial Consummation of the Plan

In Continental, this Court stated that, of the five factors, “the foremost consideration has been whether the reorganization plan has been substantially consummated.” 91 F.3d at 560. But this Court’s analysis of this first factor does not end with the simple finding that the plan meets the technical definition of substantial consummation in the Code, which requires only a showing that substantially all of the property has been transferred to the estate, that the debtor or its successor has assumed the business or the management of substantially all of the property, and that distribution under the plan has commenced. See 11 U.S.C. 1101(2). In Continental, this Court explained that the appellants did not dispute that the plan had been substantially consummated, but the Court did not stop its analysis of the first factor at that point. Instead, it immediately looked at whether the appeal would “disturb the reorganization,” and it concluded that it would do so because the appellants’ claim “was inextricably intertwined with the implementation of the reorganization.” 91 F.3d at 561.

The Court explained that an important consideration under the “substantial consummation” factor was whether the plan “involved ‘many intricate and involved transactions’ and reversal of [the] plan’s confirmation ‘would knock the props out from under’ such transactions and ‘create an unmanageable, uncontrollable situation for the Bankruptcy Court’ * * *.” Ibid., quoting In re Roberts Farms, Inc., 652 F.2d 793, 797 (9th Cir. 1981). This Court found that the appeal met the first factor because “reversal of the order confirming the Plan likely would put Continental back into bankruptcy.” Ibid. In contrast, this Court denied dismissal for equitable mootness in PWS Holding, noting that “[t]he plan has been substantially consummated, but, as noted, the plan could go forward even if the releases were struck” and appellant “now seeks only alterations to the plan * * *.” 228 F.3d at 236-37.

In the present case, the plan does indeed meet the statutory definition of “substantial consummation,” since the property of debtor Zenith has been fully transferred to LGE, its successor, and distributions have not only begun but have been largely completed. The district court so held when it dismissed the appeal from the confirmation order as equitably moot, and this Court noted the facts underlying that conclusion, finding “little question that the plan has been substantially consummated.” 258 F.3d at 185. Presumably, when the district court returned to this factor on the present professional fees appeal and simply incorporated by reference its holding in the confirmation plan appeal (Order at 6, App.), it meant to invoke those findings.

But neither the district court nor this Court in the confirmation plan appeal stopped at the finding that this case meets the statutory definition of substantial consummation. Rather, as this Court's extensive discussion of the first factor shows, the principal matter both courts addressed under the first factor was whether the relief requested on that appeal — reversal of the reorganization plan — was practical. See 258 F.3d at 186. The district court found that reversal of the Zenith plan would not be as difficult as reversal of the Continental plan would have been, but it still found that this "'would not be easy to accomplish, and other transactions may not be reversible at all. This factor, therefore, weighs heavily in favor of dismissal * * *.'" Ibid., quoting district court order. This Court agreed, upholding the district court on the "substantial consummation" factor because "[a]ppellants have not offered any evidence that the plan could be reversed without great difficulty and inequity, and we have reason to believe that the bond redistribution is unretractable."

When the same analysis of the "substantial consummation" factor is applied to the U.S. Trustee's current appeal, the conclusion must follow that the appeal does not meet this first factor. Unlike the appeal by the Official Committee and Nordhoff from the confirmation order, the U.S. Trustee’s appeal will not require that the plan be reversed, nor that the bond redistribution be retracted. Nor will it require any other step even remotely as serious. All it will require will be disgorgement by the attorneys and accountants of a few thousand dollars in fees, and distribution of those funds in an appropriate manner. The acquisition of Zenith by LGE will stand, all other stock will remain cancelled, the bond exchange will be undisturbed, and the banks and other creditors will remain in the same situation. The first and most important factor, then, weighs heavily against a finding of equitable mootness.

2. Failure to Obtain a Stay

The second factor under Continental for determining whether to dismiss an appeal for equitable mootness is whether the appellant obtained a stay of the order it seeks to appeal. This Court’s analysis of this factor bears a strong relationship to its analysis of the first factor, because failure to obtain a stay pending appeal allows the plan to be substantially consummated. In other words, if the appellant does not seek a stay, or if its application for a stay is denied, the reorganization plan will proceed and a later reversal on appeal will require that the plan be dismantled. This second factor is thus merely the other side of the coin to the first factor. As this Court explained in Continental, “the district court had before it an unstayed bankruptcy reorganization plan, and many courts have based their prudential decisions to decline to consider challenges to bankruptcy court orders on the ground that there has been substantial consummation of a plan of reorganization in reliance upon an unstayed confirmation order." 91 F.3d at 561 (emphasis in original). The importance of the second factor, then, is that in the absence of a stay, a reorganization plan will be implemented that will be difficult or inequitable to dismantle in the event of a reversal on appeal.

No such concern should weigh against maintaining the U.S. Trustee's fee appeal here. As with the first factor, failure to obtain a stay of the fee award will not make it difficult or unfair to now reverse that award. Again, the reorganization plan will remain entirely intact. All that will happen on a reversal will be that the parties who were paid the fees will need to pay them back to the estate. That presents no practical difficulty or significant hardship that would have justified the granting of a stay. The law and accounting firms that received the fees are large. They handle considerable amounts of business for which they are paid fees well in excess of the $76,500 total that is at issue here. Indeed, the U.S. Trustee did not appeal from the bankruptcy court's award, in the same fee order, of well in excess of half a million dollars in fees and expenses to the same firms for the work they did for the Official Committee. Were they required to disgorge the fees here, the firms would suffer no grievous injury. And the reorganization plan would only be helped (albeit minimally at best), not harmed, by the receipt of the additional cash payment.

A stay under such circumstances would have been pointless (and would surely have been denied if sought). In S.S. Retail Stores, 216 F.3d at 884, the Ninth Circuit looked mostly at the stay issue when it refused to dismiss an appeal of a fee award on equitable mootness grounds. The court of appeals noted that "counsel was a party before the bankruptcy court and knew the appellant contested the award" and "that the award would be appealed * * *." Moreover, as we earlier noted, the court explained that reversal would require only disgorgement of the fees and their distribution, not the unraveling of the plan. Ibid. The same applies in the present case. Failure to obtain a stay is not a factor that should weigh in favor of dismissal of the U.S. Trustee's appeal on equitable mootness grounds.

3. Parties Not Before the Court

The district court agreed with the U.S. Trustee that the third factor under Continental – whether the appeal will affect the interests of third parties – does not support dismissal of the appeal. Order at 7 (App.). It is indeed impossible to see how this factor could support dismissal here. Reversal of the fee awards will adversely impact only the professional firms that received the fees, all of whom appeared before the bankruptcy court in connection with their fee applications. The district court nevertheless dismissed the appeal, reasoning that this factor (as well as the fourth factor, which we will discuss in a moment) is given less weight than the first two factors, substantial consummation and lack of a stay. Order at 8 (App.). Since the first two factors in fact do not support dismissal for equitable mootness, as we have just shown, this factor is not outweighed by any others.

4. The Success of the Plan

The fourth factor under Continental is whether maintaining the appeal will adversely affect the success of the reorganization plan. Again, the district court agreed with the U.S. Trustee that this factor does not support dismissal on equitable mootness grounds. Order at 7 (App.). Again, the district court concluded, however, that this factor carries less weight than the substantial-consummation and lack-of-a-stay factors. Order at 8 (App.). This conclusion was again in error.

We have already shown in great detail that the concept of whether the appeal would affect the success of the plan is already a necessary part of the analysis of the first two factors, and that if the plan would not be undermined or unraveled, those two factors are not met. At least in the circumstances presented by this case, the fourth factor serves only to reiterate and make explicit those concerns. It is not a wholly distinct factor that can weigh in a manner opposite to the first two factors, but rather it reinforces and explains those first two factors. As we said earlier in our discussion of why this concept is the most important factor underlying all of the others, see p. __, supra, the district court’s finding that an appeal of the fee award would not affect the success of the reorganization plan should have all but ended the inquiry and led to denial of the motion to dismiss the appeal.

5. Finality

The fifth and final factor under Continental is the interest in affording finality to bankruptcy judgments. Like the fourth factor, this factor is simply another way of articulating the underlying principle of the equitable mootness cases, namely that the courts should not impose the unusual remedy of dismissing an appeal that is not constitutionally moot unless the appeal, if successful, would unravel a complex bankruptcy reorganization plan upon which many parties have relied since its implementation. In Continental, this Court said that “[i]ndeed, the importance of allowing approved reorganization plans to go forward in reliance on bankruptcy court confirmation orders may be the central animating force behind the equitable mootness doctrine. * * * Where, as here, investors and other third parties consummated a massive reorganization in reliance on an unstayed confirmation order,” appellate review of the order “would likely undermine public confidence in the finality of bankruptcy confirmation orders and make successful completion of large reorganizations like this more difficult.” 91 F.3d at 565.

In other words, like the third and fourth factors, the finality factor is not an independent inquiry where a conflict among the factors could arise but rather an explanation of how and why the other factors have great weight. Courts will not hear appeals that could unravel a reorganization plan that has already been established and has been in operation for a period of time, because to do so would have a chilling effect on the public’s willingness to enter into business with the reorganized company out of fear that the plan will later be dismantled or heavily altered.

In the present case, by contrast, reversal of the fee award on appeal would not undermine the public expectation of finality of the Zenith reorganization. That plan will not be materially affected. Any reliance by the attorneys and accountants on the finality of the fee award would be both de minimus and unreasonable. No one would have taken any steps in reliance on this fee award, in any way comparable to an investor or a customer signing contracts or buying the company’s stocks or bonds in reliance on the representation that the debtor has reorganized and thus has emerged from bankruptcy as a new, healthy company. Rather, the firms that received the fee awards were simply seeking compensation for their past work, knowing that an issue exists over whether the fees are allowable under the Code, and that the U.S. Trustee has appealed the award. They have no identifiable interest in putting the fee question to a swift conclusion that would not allow time for an appeal. The interest in finality, like the other Continental factors, thus weighs heavily against dismissal for equitable mootness.

6. Other Factors

The district court also cited certain other factors in support of dismissal of the U.S. Trustee's appeal. Order at 8-9 (App.). The district court's first "other factor" was simply its weighing of the five Continental factors, which we have already discussed and need not again address. The district court then turned to several independent factors. None of these other factors supports the dismissal.

a. The district court noted in passing that "no interested party has appealed the fee order" other than the U.S. Trustee. Order at 8 (App.). This is not a reason to dismiss the appeal on equitable grounds. The court's remark here fails to recognize the United States Trustee's special and unique statutory role under section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 307, to serve as a "watchdog" for the bankruptcy system. See Morgenstern v. Revco D.S., Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498 (6th Cir. 1990). This responsibility is particularly strong on such procedural matters as the appointment of official committees and the award of professional fees. Thus, the U.S. Trustee has "public interest standing" under §307 which goes beyond mere pecuniary interest. See United States Trustee v.

Columbia Gas System, Inc. (In re Columbia Gas System, Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 295-96 (3d Cir. 1994). Indeed, Congress adopted §307 to ensure that someone would press claims to recover fees obtained in violation of the Code, since the creditors often are unable or unwilling to expend the resources necessary to pursue such claims. See Curry v. Castillo (In re Castillo), 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002)(U.S. Trustee is "charged with preventing fraud and abuse and with 'fill[ing] the vacuum' caused by possible creditor inactivity").

Nor is it relevant to the balance of equities that other parties (such as the debtor) chose not to join the appeal. The issue is whether it is inequitable to any party to maintain the appeal, not whether all parties have an interest in pursing the appeal. That Zenith did not join this appeal (as it did join the U.S. Trustee's constitutionally-moot appeal of the order appointing the official committee) does not show that the fee appeal is inequitable to it or any other party.

b. Next, the district court concluded that the equities are against the U.S. Trustee because, according to the equity committees, they sought to negotiate a stipulation with the U.S. Trustee but the U.S. Trustee has not explained why she did not agree to such a settlement, which if reached would avoid "expending valuable judicial resources * * *." Order at 8-9 (App.). We will put aside for now whether the equity committees have accurately described the settlement efforts; any settlement negotiations are, of course, off the record. We question, however, the propriety of a court ever basing an adverse ruling on a finding that a party acted inequitably simply by failing to reach a settlement. While there might be special circumstances where failure to settle should be held against a party, no such circumstances exist here. This is simply a matter where one party alleges that it tried to settle and that another party would not agree. While the courts do like to promote alternative dispute resolution, it cannot be that a party's failure to agree to a settlement should be a basis for throwing it out of court. The very job of the courts is to resolve disputes that the parties cannot agree to resolve among themselves. And, as we will discuss in more detail in the next section, it is contrary to the complex analysis developed by this Court to govern the very limited doctrine of equitable mootness that an additional ad hoc factor like failure to settle should be added to the analysis.

c. Finally, the district court held that "even where equitable mootness is inapplicable, fairness may dictate the payment of fees." Order at 9 (App.). The court reasoned that "the [U.S.] Trustee has provided no indication that these professionals acted to the detriment of the estate or that they otherwise acted inappropriately." Ibid. The court relied for this holding on the alternative holding of the Ninth Circuit in S.S. Retail Stores that, although disgorgement of the attorney's fees there would not justify dismissal on equitable mootness grounds, it would still be inequitable to order such disgorgement. See 216 F.3d at 885. This Court should not recognize this alternative equitable rationale.

As we have previously noted, this Court has consistently stated that "the [equitable mootness] doctrine is 'limited in scope and [should be] cautiously applied' * * *." PWS Holding, 228 F.3d at 236, quoting Continental, 91 F.3d at 559. Accord, Nordhoff, 258 F.3d at 185. The Court has thus devoted much effort to developing a detailed and sophisticated analysis of the factors to be applied when determining whether to dismiss a bankruptcy appeal on equitable grounds when it is not constitutionally moot. Continental was itself an en banc decision, and the subsequent cases have carefully considered the nuances of the majority's lengthy opinion. Many other circuits have joined in the effort to develop the law of equitable mootness, and they largely have followed the same analysis as this Court's. It would undermine this careful development of the doctrine of equitable mootness if the courts could find that the doctrine is not met in a particular case, but it could then dismiss an appeal anyway on some vague, ad hoc equitable basis, such as the concept in S.S. Retail Stores that disgorgement of the attorney's fees would be inequitable. This Court should not join the Ninth Circuit in recognizing such an additional equitable basis for dismissing a bankruptcy appeal.

S.S. Retail is also wrong to find an additional equitable ground for dismissing a fee appeal because its holding results in courts ignoring facially valid claims alleging violations of binding provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. The S.S. Retail panel declined to consider a ripe dispute, which the court freely conceded was neither constitutionally moot nor equitably moot. It did so because it concluded that the statutory arguments pressed by the U.S. Trustee, if correct, might produce an inequitable result. S.S. Retail nullified a claim alleging a violation of the Bankruptcy Code not on its merits but simply through inaction — a judicial refusal to adjudicate it. Such a practice does not accord proper weight to validly enacted statutes. In this appeal, the U.S. Trustee alleges that the appellees are not entitled to compensation under section 503 of the Code. If this Court finds this claim is not equitably moot, it should remand it for an adjudication of its merits.

At any rate, S.S. Retail is distinguishable. The Ninth Circuit cited two reasons for its conclusion. First, it said that counsel fully disclosed its potential conflict of interest and never acted improperly. See 216 F.3d at 885. Even assuming for sake of argument that this was somehow a relevant consideration there, it is not relevant here. The ground for the objection to fees there was that counsel was not qualified to represent the debtor because of the conflict of interest. The court of appeals was thus concluding that the merits of the appeal were weak since any ethical violation was in its view not of any real substance. Counsel's actual lack of improper conduct was thus thought there to be relevant to the merits. Here, we are arguing on the merits not that the professionals acted unethically but that they did not substantially contribute to the bankruptcy case. It is thus of no relevance that they did not act improperly. Moreover, their insistence on getting an unnecessary committee appointed, at great expense to the estate, did harm the estate.

The Ninth Circuit's second reason is even more easily distinguishable. The court of appeals reasoned that because the U.S. Trustee did not seek a stay, counsel continued to provide representation to the debtor in reliance on the bankruptcy court's appointment orders. Here, by contrast, the fees in dispute are for work on behalf of the unofficial committee while the bankruptcy court was still considering its motion to appoint an official committee. During that time period the professionals acted on their own initiative, without any reliance on court orders or the lack of a stay. Only after the bankruptcy court ordered the appointment of an official committee did counsel and the accountants have any reasonable expectation of a later fee award when they decided whether to provide professional services, and the U.S. Trustee does not challenge their right to receive fees as of that date.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed and the case should be remanded to the district court with instructions that the district court hear the U.S. Trustee's appeal of the fee award on its merits.

This Court has previously heard another appeal arising out of the same bankruptcy case, which also raised similar issues: Nordhoff Investments, Inc. v. Zenith Electronics Corp., Nos. 00-2250, 00-2249 (3d Cir., June 21, 2001), reported at 258 F.3d 180. Another case is pending before this Court that does not arise out of the same bankruptcy case but that also raises similar issues: In re: United Artists Theatre Company, No. 01-1351 (3d Cir.), argued December 4, 2001. In addition, a copy of the district court's decision in this case was submitted to the panel deciding In re Pillowtex, No. 01-2775, shortly before oral argument on June 10, 2002, in response to the panel's sua sponte inquiry about the effect of plan confirmation upon the attorney’s fee dispute at issue in that appeal. The merits of the Pillowtex appeal, however, do not concern equitable mootness.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF DELAWARE

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE APPELLANT

The Appeal Before the District Court was not Equitably Moot

1. It is "our deep-rooted historic tradition that each person should have his own day in court." Martin v. Wilks, 490 U.S. 755, 762 (1989) (citations and internal quotations omitted). This Court prevents the equitable mootness doctrine from unnecessarily denying litigants their day in court by mandating that the doctrine be “limited in scope and cautiously applied.” In re Continental Airlines, 91 F.3d 553, 559 (3d Cir. 1996) (en banc), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1057 (1997). Narrowly circumscribing equitable mootness coincides with the Supreme Court's construction of constitutional mootness, which allows dismissal only if it is "impossible for the court to grant any effectual relief whatever." Church of Scientology v. United States, 506 U.S. 9, 12 (1992) (citations and internal quotations omitted).

In this case, the United States Trustee presented an important issue to the district court, whether the bankruptcy court's award of compensation under Bankruptcy Code section 503(b)(3)(D) to Katten Muchen Zavis Rosenman, Ernst & Young, and Saul Ewing Remick & Saul, violated Lebron v. Mechem Fin. Inc., 27 F.3d 937, 944 (3d Cir. 1994) (narrowly construing section 503(b)(3)(D)).[1] Those Professionals charged an unofficial equity committee roughly $76,500 to help it obtain court approval for a formal committee. The bankruptcy court required the debtor to pay those fees, concluding the Professionals made a substantial contribution under 503(d)(3)(B). The United States Trustee took the position below that committee-formation work does not satisfy 503(d)(3)(B) as interpreted by Lebron because it benefits only the committee class, not the estate. This is a significant question because virtually every large chapter 11 case in [1/] Virtually all the expenses and fees under dispute are Katten's, Ernst's, and Saul's, although committee members also seek de minimis expenses. For ease of reference we refer to the claimants collectively as the Professionals.

Delaware has committees. The United States Trustee sought guidance from the district court in order to achieve clarity on this issue, and to avoid litigating the same issue in multiple bankruptcy cases.

2. The United States Trustee's opening brief explained why the equitable mootness doctrine does not bar district court review of this final, ripe, non-constitutionally moot appeal. In reply, the Professionals advance four principal arguments why the United States Trustee's appeal was properly dismissed: (a) dismissal was within the district court's broad discretion (Appellees' br. at 1-3); (b) the plan's substantial consummation justified dismissal (Appellees' br. at 10); (c) the absence of a stay of the plan of reorganization justified dismissal (Appellees' br. at 9-11); and (d) "the equities weigh against the United States Trustee" (Appellees' br. at 12-15).

The Professionals note correctly that this Court reviews equitable mootness dismissals under an abuse of discretion standard. In re Continental, 91 F.3d at 560. That discretion is limited, however, by Third Circuit precedent. The district court's failure in this case to properly apply that precedent constituted an error of law. United States v. Askari, 140 F.3d 536, 539 (3d Cir.1998) (en banc) ("By definition, a district court abuses its discretion when it makes an error of law." (quoting in part Koon v. United States, 518 U.S. 81, 100 (1996)), vacated on other grounds, 159 F.3d 774 (3d Cir.1998).

This Court has addressed equitable mootness in three decisions.[2] Two of them sanctioned dismissal because the appellants sought to unravel substantively consummated plans to the detriment of "non-adverse third parties"[3] who contributed the capital necessary to make confirmation possible. In re Continental, 91 F.3d at 560-61 (dismissing an appeal that would "knock the props out from under" the confirmed plan, and injure non-party investors whose "investment had been made" (citations and internal quotations omitted)); and Nordhoff, 258 F.3d at 189 (appellants sought to "dissolve the plan"). In the third, this Court refused to dismiss an appeal as equitably moot when the relief sought would have "altered" the plan and "affect[ed] the rights and liabilities of third parties," because that fell short of "unraveling . . . the reorganization." In re PWS, 228 F.3d at 236, 237. Finally, the only circuit decision to consider whether substantial consummation equitably moots an appeal from a compensation order, such as the one at issue here, specifically held it does not. S.S. Retail Stores Corp.

v. United States Trustee (In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp.), 216 F.3d 882, 884-85 (9th Cir. 2000).

Given this law, it was error for the district court to dismiss the United States Trustee's appeal. PWS constitutes a dividing line. Appeals seeking to alter rather than unravel plans are not equitably moot. Here, the United States Trustee's motion did not seek even to alter the plan, much less unravel it. It simply asked that a professional return improperly obtained fees to the debtor. No court of appeals has ever sanctioned the dismissal of an appeal as equitably moot on such flimsy grounds. Doing so would transform the doctrine from one cautiously applied and limited in scope to one that would have no discernable limits. Consistency, predictability, and basic fairness would suffer if district courts could slam shut the courthouse door in such an ad hoc fashion.[4]

3. Nor does substantial consummation of Zenith's plan necessitate dismissal of the United States Trustee's appeal.[5] Appellants' br. at 4-10. PWS makes that [4] An Addendum accompanying this brief provides a table comparing this Court's equitable mootness decisions. It demonstrates that this case falls outside those sets of facts under which this Court has allowed cases to be dismissed as equitably moot.

[5] Section 1101(2) defines substantial consummation:

(2) "substantial consummation" means-

(A) transfer of all or substantially all of the property proposed by the plan to clear. In re PWS, 228 F.3d at 235-36 (declining to dismiss an appeal in such a circumstance).

The United States Trustee Program, as the entity charged with administering bankruptcy cases, 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3), recognizes that this Court and other circuits agree that consummated plans are often best left unraveled, at least in the absence of significant public policy or financial considerations. But the United States Trustee does not request such far-reaching relief in this case, and there is no just reason for barring the United States Trustee's appeal merely because this plan has been substantially consummated.

Substantial consummation serves two specific purposes under the Code. Its primary purpose is to prohibit motions to modify substantially consummated plans. 11 U.S.C. 1127(b) (parties may "modify" a plan only "before substantial consummation of such plan").[6] This prohibition may help explain why circuit courts have consistently dismissed appeals, like Continental and Nordhoff, which

be transferred;

(B) assumption by the debtor or the successor to the debtor under the plan of the business or of the management of all or substantially all of the property dealt with by the plan; and

(C) commencement of distribution under the plan.

[6] In addition, section 1112(b)(7) permits dismissal or conversion of a chapter 11 case if the debtor is unable to "effectuate substantial consummation of a confirmed plan." 11 U.S.C. 1112(b)(7).

sought to unravel substantially consummated plans. Those decisions could not rely directly upon 1127(b) because the appellants sought to overturn plan confirmation itself, rather than permission to modify plans. Nevertheless, those attempts to unravel plans arguably conflicted with Congress' objective in section 1127(b) to protect innocent third parties who rely upon the often complex commercial transactions that produce substantially consummated plans.

That concern is absent here. As the Ninth Circuit held in S.S. Retail, challenges to fee awards do not unravel plans.[7] S.S. Retail Stores Corp., 216 F.3d at 884-85. To the contrary, when successful, they cause funds to be returned to reconstituted debtors for use in satisfying creditor claims as approved under the plan. Id. As the United States Trustee's opening brief explained, Opening br. at 19-22, this appeal will not knock the props out from under this plan, unwind complex commercial transactions, or create an unmanageable, uncontrollable situation for the bankruptcy court. In the absence of all of that, the United States

[7] The Ninth Circuit held that "an order compelling disgorgement of Gibson, Dunn's fees and expenses would not require the bankruptcy court to unravel a complicated bankruptcy plan. Rather, it would require only that one party disgorge money it has received, money that would then be distributed pursuant to the bankruptcy court's final decree." S.S. Retail Stores Corp., 216 F.3d at 884.

Trustee's appeal should be allowed to go forward.[8]

4. The Professionals also seek to justify dismissal on the basis that the United States Trustee did not obtain a stay of the plan of reorganization. Appellees' br. at 10-11. This misses the point. In Continental and Nordhoff the absence of a stay was relevant because the appellants appealed the order confirming the plan, alleged the plan was illegal, and asked that it be unraveled.[9] Given their attempts to unravel those plans, this Court determined their failure to obtain stays of the plans was an important part of its equitable mootness calculus. The absence of a stay has no significance here, however, because the United States Trustee appeals from a collateral order that will not unravel the plan. Indeed, it defies common sense to require the United States Trustee to seek to stay a complex plan of reorganization while it litigates a tangential $76,000 dispute.

Nor is it significant that the United States Trustee did not stay the order

[8] Indeed, the plan contemplates suits like the United States Trustee's. Under Article XI, secs. A and B of Zenith's plan, the bankruptcy court retains jurisdiction to adjudicate administrative claims and fee disputes. Even if that provision were absent from the plan, the availability of disgorgement ensures relief can be obtained from these Professionals without unraveling this plan. See footnotes 10 and 13 below, and accompanying text.

[9] In re Continental, 91 F.3d at 555 (party "appeal[ed]" from "Continental's revised second amended joint plan of reorganization"); Nordhoff, 258 F.3d at 182 (appeal from "the District Court's order approving the Bankruptcy Court's order confirming Zenith's bankruptcy and restructuring plan").

awarding fees to the Professionals. Stays are never sought, nor required, in these types of disputes because it is universally recognized that disgorgement is available if the United States Trustee succeeds on appeal. This Court and other circuits have adjudicated any number of similar fee disputes in the absence of stays; given the availability of disgorgement, none of those appeals were dismissed as constitutionally or equitably moot.[10] Given this well-settled law, there is no basis for dismissing the United States Trustee's appeal due to the absence of a stay.

[10] In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246 (3d Cir. 2002) (remanding a fee dispute for a review of the merits and imposition of an appropriate remedy); United States Trustee v. First Jersey Securities, Inc. (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504, 514, and n.9 (3d Cir. 1999) (holding that where a debtor's counsel had received a preferential transfer, the bankruptcy court could take "further action" on remand and noting such action could include "not only disgorgement of the preference, but also [] the possible denial or reduction of compensation" (citation and internal quotation omitted)); Citicorp Venture Capital Ltd. v. Committee of Unsecured Creditors, 160 F.3d 982, 986, 991-92 (3d Cir. 1998) (allowing the pursuit of remedies against a fiduciary of a debtor, including disgorgement, upon remand in a chapter 11 case with a confirmed plan); United States Trustee v. Federated Department Stores, Inc. (In re Federated Department Stores, Inc.), 44 F.3d 1310, 1316 (6th Cir. 1995) (case not equitably moot because bankruptcy court could order disgorgement on remand); United States v. Richman (In re Richman), 124 F.3d 1201 (10th Cir. 1997) (ordering that on remand funds could be disgorged to a chapter 13 debtor who had a confirmed chapter 13 plan). See also Harold & Williams Development Co. v. United States Trustee (In re Harold & Williams Development Co.), 977 F.2d 906, 909 n.1 (4th Cir.1992) (plan confirmation does not moot appeal involving a question whether professional was properly appointed under section 327 of the Code).

5. Finally, the Professionals allege that equity demands dismissal of the United States Trustee's appeal - but their brief never specifically says why. Appellees' br. at 12-15. They touch upon a number of issues relating to this bankruptcy case but never come out and say why any of them require dismissal.[11]

The Professionals do not contend the United States Trustee violated the Bankruptcy Code or committed an ethical lapse in litigating this dispute. To the contrary, the United States Trustee has merely pressed a straight forward legal question, whether section 503(b)(3)(D) of the Code allows their fees to be imposed upon the debtor. There is no evidence in the record below that the United States Trustee is pursuing this question of law for any reason other than its importance to the administration of Delaware bankruptcy cases. Given the absence of serious misconduct, there is no basis for determining that equity demands the dismissal of the United States Trustee's appeal.

[11] The Professionals do not contend, as the district court did, that unproductive settlement negotiations justify dismissal; nor do they rebut the United States Trustee's argument that she has express statutory authority under 11 U.S.C. 307 to pursue this claim in the absence of other appellants. On the latter point, this Court recently reaffirmed that section 307 confers standing to bring this type of claim. In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d at 255 n.7 (quoting United States Trustee v. Columbia Gas Sys. Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Sys. Inc.), 33 F.3d 294 (3d Cir.1994), in holding "[i]t is difficult to conceive of a statute that more clearly signifies Congress's intent to confer standing" to pursue claims against bankruptcy professionals).

The S.S. Retail Doctrine is not a Valid Alternative Ground for Dismissal

In S.S. Retail, the Ninth Circuit held that an appeal brought by the United States Trustee was not equitably moot, but nevertheless declined to reach the merits, and dismissed the appeal because "it would [have] be[en] inequitable to require [the professional] to disgorge" the fees and expenses it allegedly received in violation of a federal statute. In re SS Retail Stores Corp., 216 F.3d at 885. Although the Professionals encourage this Court to adopt S.S. Retail, their brief fails to say why. Appellees' br. at 15-16. The United States Trustee explained in her opening brief why this Court should not follow S.S. Retail, Opening br. at 30-33; those arguments are not repeated here.

The Professionals suggest the Sixth Circuit reached a similar result in United States Trustee v. Federated Department Stores, Inc. (In re Federated Department Stores, Inc.), 44 F.3d 1310 (6th Cir. 1995). Appellees' br. at 15-16. They are wrong. Federated is irreconcilable with S.S. Retail. In Federated, a bankruptcy professional asked the Sixth Circuit to dismiss an appeal brought by the United States Trustee.[12] The Sixth Circuit declined to do so and - significantly [12] Although it did not use the term equitable mootness, Federated rejected an equitable mootness challenge, as can be discerned by its analysis of an early equitable mootness decision, In re Roberts Farms, Inc., 652 F.2d 793 (9th Cir.1981). Federated, 44 F.3d at 1317.

- adjudicated the merits of the United States Trustee's appeal. After ruling for the United States Trustee on the merits, the court turned to the question of remedy. The Sixth Circuit found it significant that the legal issue presented in Federated had been unresolved within the Sixth Circuit during part of the time the professional provided services. In the midst of its representation, the Sixth Circuit resolved the underlying legal issue in In re Middleton Arms Ltd. Partnership, 934 F.2d 723 (6th Cir.1991) and subsequently reaffirmed Middleton in In re Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc., 999 F.2d 969 (6th Cir.1993). Federated, 44 F.3d at 1317-19. Given the law had been unclear before Middleton was decided, the court required the professional to disgorge all fees earned after Middleton but allowed it to retain the fees it earned prior to the Middleton decision. Federated, 44 F.3d at 1320 (holding that in light of the "peculiar and unique circumstances" where the law of the circuit was not "settled" prior to that date, "fairness and equity" required that the professional "be compensated at its agreed rate up to" the date Middleton Arms was decided).

Limiting a remedy is fundamentally different from refusing to adjudicate a ripe, final, non-constitutionally moot claim. To our knowledge the holding of S.S. Retail is unique. No other court has simply refused to adjudicate an appeal it had jurisdiction to hear in the absence of a widely recognized prudential doctrine. Nor is there any need to create a third mootness doctrine, particularly when S.S. Retail's holding draws upon no defining principle and has no discernable parameters.[13] [13] The Professionals suggest for the first time in a footnote in their brief that the United States Trustee's appeal may be constitutionally moot because there is no one to recover from. Appellees' br. at 3 n.1. That is wrong. First, the plan expressly provides that the bankruptcy court retains jurisdiction to decide administrative claims and fee disputes. See Plan, Article XI, secs. A, B. Second, someone does exist to recover from - Katten Muchin, Ernst & Young, and Saul Ewing. Each was specially awarded fees under the bankruptcy court order, each still exists, and each could be ordered to disgorge fees obtained in violation of section 503(b)(3)(D) and Lebron. Finally, individual members of the unofficial committee still exist and a similar remedy could be pursued against them as well.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be reversed and the case should be remanded to the district court with instructions that the district court hear the United States Trustee's appeal of the fee award on its merits.
