"actual, necessary services rendered" and "actual, necessary expenses." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1). "The court may * * * award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2). In determining the appropriate amount of "reasonable compensation," Section 330 instructs bankruptcy courts to "consider the nature, the extent, and the value of [the professional's] services, taking into account all relevant factors." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). Illustrative factors "includ[e] — (A) the time spent on such services; (B) the rates charged for such services; (C) whether the services were necessary * * * ; (D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time * * * ; and (E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title." Ibid. By its terms, Section 330's list of factors is not exhaustive; courts are also required to consider other "relevant factors" in determining fees where appropriate. 11 U.S.C. § 102(3) ("including" in Title 11 is not a term of limitation).

B. Procedural Background

1. In December 1998, Commercial Financial Services, Inc., and its subsidiary CF/SPC NGU, Inc., ("the Debtors") filed voluntary petitions for chapter 11 reorganization. The U.S. Trustee appointed an Unsecured Creditors Committee and appointed the ABS Committee to represent creditors with asset-based securities.

On January 7, 1999, the bankruptcy court issued a standing order outlining procedures and guidelines for professional fee applications. The bankruptcy court found "good cause * * * for establishing an orderly and uniform procedure for professionals seeking compensation * * * from the estate," and the order intended to "inform professionals in advance as to the categories of fees and expenses the Court generally will or will not allow to be paid * * * so that professionals may make informed decisions." App. 39.

The January 1999 order prospectively required all professionals to file interim reports and prescribed that "[t]he rate charged for * * * service shall correspond to the expertise necessary to perform the task, rather than the ordinary rate charged by the person performing it." App. 40 (emphasis original). The order also declared that the United States Trustee Guidelines would be applicable. See 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A) (requiring the United States Trustee to adopt fee guidelines); 28 C.F.R. Pt. 58 App. A. Finally, under the heading "Criteria for Evaluating Fee Applications," the order stated:

> Hourly Rates. The primary criterion used to evaluate the reasonableness of the hourly rate charged will be the amount reasonably charged by a person possessing the skill, experience and expertise required to perform the given task. * * * [T]he rate charged for the > service shall correspond to the expertise necessary to perform the task, rather than the ordinary rate charged by the person performing it. * * *

>
> Locality. Professionals * * * may charge hourly rates consistent with those charged by a practitioner in the professional's geographic area possessing education, experience, expertise, and skills commensurate with the professional * * * seeking compensation.

Id. at 42 (emphasis original).

2. On February 3, 1999, the ABS Committee applied for approval under 11 U.S.C. § 1103 to employ Houlihan "as financial advisors." App. 44. The application asserted Houlihan's expertise in the field of "financial advisory services" and sought Houlihan's employment to perform "services of a financial advisor." Id. 50-51.

As required by Bankruptcy Rule 2014(a), the ABS Committee attached an affidavit from Houlihan's Managing Director, Michael A. Kramer, indicating that "[s]ubject to the Court's approval, Houlihan Lokey will charge the Debtors for its reasonable advisory services a financial advisory fee of $200,000 per month. In addition, Houlihan Lokey will reserve the right to seek, * * * subject to the approval of this Court, a [success or transaction] fee in excess of the monthly advisory fee at the conclusion of these cases." App. 65. The affidavit further represented that "[w]hen and if engaged herein, Houlihan Lokey intends to apply to the Court for allowance of compensation * * * in accordance with applicable provisions of the Bankruptcy Code." Id. at 66.

The U.S. Trustee and the Unsecured Creditors Committee objected to the ABS Committee's application, id. at 70-76, and the bankruptcy court held a hearing on March 9, 1999, id. at 265-323. During the hearing, Kramer testified that he understood that, "[s]ubject to approval of the Court, we [Houlihan] would receive a monthly payment in the amount of $200,000 per month * * * , obviously subject not only to our retention or employment in the matter, but also to final review by the Bankruptcy Court as to the relative fairness or whatever the exact standard is." Id. at 289. The bankruptcy court did not explicitly approve or mention any fee arrangement. Instead, the bankruptcy court clarified that, per the January 1999 order, Houlihan should record its time so that subsequent fee applications could be scrutinized by the court. Id. at 320.

On October 1, 1999, the bankruptcy court issued an order retroactively authorizing Houlihan's employment as a "financial advisor" from January 4, 1999, until June 30, 1999. App. 336-337. That order did not approve any fee arrangement concerning Houlihan's services, nor did the order mention a monthly rate or "success fee." Ibid.

3. On March 22, 2000, the ABS Committee applied for approval "to reemploy Houlihan as Financial Advisor." App. 339; accord id. at 338, 340, 341. The ABS Committee's March 2000 application acknowledged that Houlihan's ultimate fee award would be subject to court approval under Section 330:

> Subject to the [January 1999] Order Establishing Fee Application Procedure and Fee Guidelines for Professionals, and subject to the approval of this Court, Houlihan Lokey will charge: (i) a monthly fee of $75,000 plus expenses, * * * and (ii) a deferred transaction fee payable upon the successful conclusion of this case. Houlihan Lokey understands and agrees that the allowance and payment of the monthly fees, expenses and the deferred transaction fee are subject to the ultimate approval of this Court.

Id. at 340.

On April 4, 2000, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on the ABS Committee's application to reemploy Houlihan. App. 384-404. In describing its previous application to retain Houlihan under 11 U.S.C. § 1103(a), the ABS Committee explained that Houlihan's prior employment had been judicially approved "with the understanding, * * * notwithstanding the [$200,000 per month] terms of the engagement, that Houlihan, Lokey would have to keep time records * * * and that their ultimate compensation and reimbursement of expenses would be dependent upon the content of that application, the amount of time and the reasonableness of the expenses that were spent." Id. at 387. The ABS Committee acknowledged that Houlihan's proposed reemployment would also require Houlihan to keep time like other professionals in the case and to have its fee applications scrutinized by the court. Id. at 391. The ABS Committee did not request preapproval of any fee arrangement. Rather, the ABS Committee indicated its understanding that Houlihan would "not be paid absent the entry of an order by this Court approving the fees and expenses as reasonable." Ibid. The ABS Committee could not at that time describe particular hourly rates for Houlihan's employees, id. at 393, yet it represented to the court that, when Houlihan's service was complete, "the amount of time that is spent times an hourly rate that's charged by comparable professionals" would show "that the $75,000 fee that they're going to be asked to be paid is fair and reasonable." Id. at 394. "[T]heir fees are going to be comparable to what the other professionals are [sic] that have been employed by the Unsecured Creditor's Committee." Ibid. "We would hope that * * * [all parties] would support whatever sort of fee that Houlihan, Lokey might request at that time. All bets are off however, Your Honor. No guarantees have been made, no assurance has been made." Id. at 401.

At the hearing's conclusion, the bankruptcy court orally approved the ABS Committee's application to reemploy Houlihan. App. 403. The bankruptcy court declared that Houlihan "shall keep contemporaneous time records and documentation of expenses for which fees and reimbursement may be sought and shall comply with the [January 1999] order establishing fee application procedure[s] and fee guidelines for professionals * * * . The Court will expect that evidence as to the reasonableness of hourly rates will be presented in connection with the presentation of a fee application." Ibid.; see also id. at 404 (clarifying that Houlihan, not the court, must keep such records). On April 18, 2000, the bankruptcy court issued a written order adopting its oral ruling and approving Houlihan's reemployment as a "financial advisor." Id. at 350-351.

4. On October 18, 2001, Houlihan applied to the bankruptcy court for $1,920,967.74 in fees, covering both periods of employment.[4] For service from January 4, 1999, through June 30, 1999, Houlihan sought fees of $200,000 per month, totaling $1,174,193.55. App. 463. For service from March 22, 2000, through July 31, 2001, Houlihan sought $746,774.74 in fees based on "adjusted" monthly rates of $75,000, $50,000, and $25,000 per month. Ibid.; see also id. at 542 (detailing Houlihan's proposal). In its fee application, Houlihan argued that its proposed fees "are consistent with Houlihan Lokey's normal and customary billing practices for a case of this size and complexity and based on the services being provided during each specific retention period." Id. at 471. Houlihan also claimed that it "does not bill clients on an hourly basis for financial restructuring services." Ibid. Thus, Houlihan argued that its requested fees were "based on usual and customary rates and expenses charged in connection with professional services rendered for other clients on both bankruptcy and non-bankruptcy-related matters and were negotiated and agreed to at the times of each separate retention based upon the role and services to be provided during each retention period." Id. at 478.

The U.S. Trustee and Unsecured Creditors Liquidating Trust ("UCLT")[5] objected that Houlihan's fee application did not comply with the bankruptcy court's January 1999 order, and that Houlihan had not proved that its fees were reasonable under Section 330. See App. 853-854, 848-850, 869-873, 874-882, 971-979. On November 14, 2001, Houlihan supplemented and amended its fee application. Houlihan acknowledged that its application did not comply with the January 1999 order but claimed that it should be exempt from "administrative burdens" that such compliance would require. Id. at 603. Houlihan attached exhibits listing compensation paid in other bankruptcy cases to Houlihan, id. at 609, and its "competitors," id. at 611-612.

On March 26, 2002, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on Houlihan's fee request. Houlihan's Managing Director, David Hilty, was asked to compare Houlihan's activities in this case with those of financial advisory professionals retained by the Debtors and by the Unsecured Creditor's Committee. Hilty detailed the activities of those other professionals and noted, in several respects, that Houlihan provided similar services in advising the ABS Committee. See App. 1012 ("I think in some measure the services we provided really incorporated all the services that were provided by those different professionals.").[6]

In an oral decision, the bankruptcy court ruled that "the terms and conditions of [Houlihan's] employment were not unconditionally preapproved under Section 328(a)," and that therefore "all fees and expenses * * * are subject to review under Section 330." App. 1112-1113. The bankruptcy court also held that Houlihan's fee application did not comply with, and was not exempt from, the January 1999 standing order. Thus, the court denied the fee application without prejudice and instructed that "Houlihan Lokey must * * * demonstrate by competent evidence appropriate hourly rates, as required by the guidelines." 1114. On April 12, 2002, the bankruptcy court issued a written order incorporating the terms of its oral ruling. Id. at 987.

5. On May 24, 2002, Houlihan filed a "Third Supplement" to its fee application.[7] Per the court's January 1999 order, Houlihan subdivided its employees' time entries by task category. App. 1131-1231. Also, Houlihan attached a list of thirteen cases in which other bankruptcy courts had required Houlihan to maintain time records and had allowed Houlihan to receive some level of compensation. Id. at 1233. Houlihan described its "effective hourly rates" in those cases as ranging from $262 per hour to $3271 per hour. Ibid. Those "effective hourly rates" were calculated by dividing the total amount of Houlihan's compensation – including any "success or transaction fees" – by the total number of hours.

The U.S. Trustee and UCLT objected to Houlihan's fee request, App. 1238-1242, 1244-1248, noting that Houlihan's proposed "effective hourly rate" in this case was $750.79, whereas the maximum awarded to comparable financial advisors in this case as "reasonable compensation" ranged from $350 to $410 per hour. Id. at 1239.1 & n.4; id. at 1245, 1248. On June 18, 2002, the bankruptcy court conducted a hearing and took testimony from Richard Chesley, then-general counsel for Houlihan's financial restructuring group,[8] and Carmen R. Eggleston, a managing director for one of the Unsecured Creditors Committee's financial advisors. See id. at 1286-1422.

6. On January 10, 2003, the bankruptcy court awarded Houlihan $904,000 in fees. The bankruptcy court applied Section 330's standards for reasonable compensation and noted that Houlihan had the burden to prove that its proposed compensation was reasonable. Bankr. Op. 4, 10. "After considering the nature, extent, and the value of the services rendered by Houlihan Lokey" — including the five factors listed in Section 330(a)(3) — the bankruptcy court held that "the amount of compensation requested in this case has not been justified and is excessive." Id. at 11. The bankruptcy court accordingly exercised its discretion to grant fees "less than the amount of compensation that is requested." Ibid. (quoting 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(2)).

The bankruptcy court discussed the "financial advisory services" that Houlihan provided to the ABS Committee, and the court noted that the Debtors and the Unsecured Creditors Committee also employed entities providing "financial advisory services." Bankr. Op. 5-6. The bankruptcy court held that, "[a]lthough the services rendered by Houlihan Lokey * * * were not identical to the services rendered by other financial advisors in this case, the services were substantially comparable to other services rendered." Id. at 6. The bankruptcy court rejected Houlihan's efforts to distinguish itself as the only "investment banking firm" in this case because, according to testimony adduced at the June 2002 hearing, many "financial advisory services" rendered by Houlihan "were not uniquely in the nature of 'investment banking services.'" Id. at 6 n.6.

The bankruptcy court noted that every financial advisor in this case other than Houlihan had proffered "competent evidence of customary compensation charged by comparably skilled professionals." Bankr. Op. 6. The bankruptcy court likewise concluded that, "[i]n this instance, the amount of compensation awarded to Houlihan Lokey should be based on the time expended at an appropriate hourly rate." Id. at 11. Fees in this case for individuals with experience similar to two of Houlihan's four employees ranged from $350 to $410 per hour. Id. at 7-8. Fees for professionals with experience similar to other two Houlihan employees ranged from $120 to $375 per hour. Ibid. The bankruptcy court thus determined that reasonable rates for the Houlihan employees at issue were $400, $390, $300, and $275 per hour, thereby awarding fees at "the high end of rates allowed to other financial consulting professionals in this case." Id. at 11 n.17.

The bankruptcy court also found that its $904,000 award was reasonable by reference to thirteen bankruptcy engagements where other bankruptcy courts had determined fee awards for Houlihan. Houlihan's effective compensation rate in those engagements ranged from $262 to $3271 per hour. Bankr. Op. 9. The bankruptcy court noted that many of the thirteen engagements included a "transaction or success fee" as part of Houlihan's compensation. Id. at 11. The bankruptcy court found inclusion of such "success fees" inappropriate for comparison to this case (ibid.) because, as Houlihan's counsel had conceded, "[this] engagement failed; there's no question about that." App. 1412. Excluding success fees, Houlihan's compensation in the thirteen cases ranged from $160 to $2417 per hour, with an average of $409. Bankr. Op. 9. Under the bankruptcy court's $904,000 fee award, Houlihan's effective compensation rate in this case was $353.31 per hour for 2558.6 hours of work. Id. at 10-11.

Finally, the bankruptcy court rejected Houlihan's claim that its $1,920,967.74 fee request (an average of $750.79 per hour) was reasonable because its competitors charge monthly fees. The bankruptcy court noted that none of Houlihan's evidence demonstrated "customary compensation * * * in cases other than cases under this title," 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E), because all of the proffered cases concerning Houlihan's competitors arose in the context of bankruptcy proceedings. App. 1279. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court held that Houlihan "failed to establish that the services rendered in [its competitors'] matters were comparable to the services [Houlihan] rendered in this case." Ibid.

7. On January 21, 2003, Houlihan appealed. On September 3, 2003, the BAP affirmed. The BAP found no dispute that Section 330 governs this case, because the bankruptcy court did not preapprove Houlihan's fee agreements under Section 328. BAP Op. 18, 24. The BAP noted that appellate review of fee determinations under Section 330 requires "considerable deference," because "[t]he bankruptcy judge is on the front line, in the best position to gauge the ongoing interplay of factors and to make the delicate judgment calls which such a decision entails." Id. at 20 (internal quotation marks omitted). The BAP recognized that, although Section 330(a)(3) "includes a nonexclusive list of factors that a court may (or may not) consider," "the factors to be taken into account in determining reasonableness are within the discretion of the bankruptcy court, which is best positioned to determine what is 'relevant' in any given case." Id. at 21.

The BAP endorsed the bankruptcy court's analysis in this case, which "expressly considered, as it [was] compelled to do under 330(a)(3), the nature, extent and value of Houlihan's services." BAP Op. 22. The BAP held that the bankruptcy court's application of legal principle, and its decision to approve only $904,000 of Houlihan's fee request, did not constitute an abuse of discretion. Ibid. The BAP explained that the bankruptcy court, "acting well within its discretion," calculated an hourly rate for each Houlihan professional. Id. at 23. Those hourly rates were "appropriately influenced" by the hourly rates of other professionals with education, experience, and skill levels similar to those of Houlihan's professionals in this case. Ibid. The bankruptcy court's hourly rates were "set at the highest or higher end of approved hourly rates in the case," and the BAP held that such rates, like the rates of comparable professionals, adequately compensated Houlihan for its beneficial service to the estate. Ibid. Although Houlihan claimed that the bankruptcy court's award was too low to ensure quality professional services, the BAP noted the absence of "any evidence to support" that factual allegation. Id. at 26.

The BAP also rejected Houlihan's argument that a judicial award of $1,920,967.74 in fees was compelled by its contract with the ABS Committee for monthly charges. Under Section 330, the BAP held that the bankruptcy court "was not bound by the ABS Committee's retention agreements," because bankruptcy courts have an "independent duty" to evaluate whether proposed fees constitute "reasonable compensation." BAP Op. 24. The BAP found that "Houlihan's demand [to] be compensated on a monthly basis does not govern the bankruptcy court." Id. at 25. To contract for a fixed fee "is by no means a guarantee that the fees will be awarded in that fashion." Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted). Similarly, the BAP found that Houlihan's assertion that monthly fees are a common practice in the marketplace "may be a relevant factor in determining * * * reasonableness, but it does not preclude the bankruptcy court from independently * * * taking into account factors that it determines, in its discretion, to be relevant." Ibid.

The BAP denied that the bankruptcy court's award of $904,000 was "unfair" to Houlihan. Based on an "exhaustive review of the record," the BAP concluded that, inter alia, the bankruptcy court's January 1999 Order, the court's questions and comments at the March 1999 hearing, the April 2000 bench ruling, and the April 2000 written order "all put Houlihan on sufficient notice that although its approved engagement by the ABS Committee was based on a monthly fee, the court would evaluate the reasonableness of that fee when a fee application was filed," and also informed Houlihan "that a reasonableness inquiry would take into account the time Houlihan spent on the Debtors' cases as reflected in required time records." BAP Op. 27. The BAP found repeated indications in the record demonstrating that the ABS Committee, Houlihan's managers, the parties' attorneys, and the bankruptcy court understood that Houlihan's proposed fee would be judicially reviewed under Section 330 to determine whether the hours spent, and the effective rate of payment for those hours, was reasonable. Id. at 27-29.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

In prescribing "reasonable compensation" under Section 330, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by awarding Houlihan $904,000 in fees. Bankruptcy courts have broad authority under Section 330 to prescribe reasonable levels of professional compensation. Here, the bankruptcy court's award to Houlihan matched the compensation granted to financial professionals who did similar work in this case. That award reasonably compensated Houlihan and did not overcharge the Debtors' estate.

The bankruptcy court did not err in calculating Houlihan's compensation using an "effective hourly rate." The number of hours spent on a task is often vital to determining a reasonable level of compensation. Although Houlihan claims that it often contracts with clients for fixed monthly fees, the bankruptcy court's appointment orders under Section 1103(a) in this case did not approve such contractual terms of employment under Section 328. On the contrary, the bankruptcy court's standing order and subsequent rulings made clear that Houlihan's fee applications would be reviewed for reasonableness under Section 330(a) after services were complete. Thus, as in many bankruptcy cases, the court was required to evaluate whether the amount of Houlihan's proposed fees were objectively reasonable given the totality of case-specific circumstances. In conducting that reasonableness evaluation, the bankruptcy court relied on Houlihan's hours as a "relevant factor" in determining Houlihan's fee and in comparing Houlihan's fees to those of other professionals. The bankruptcy court awarded reasonable compensation that, in its view, adequately compensated Houlihan for its services without overcharging the estate. That decision was both reasonable and permissible.

Despite Houlihan's claim that its services were not comparable to those of other professionals in this case, the bankruptcy court's ruling is amply supported by the record and is not clearly erroneous. Houlihan also argues that the bankruptcy court's award impermissibly deviated from the "market rate" for Houlihan's services. Section 330, however, allows bankruptcy courts to determine and award only "reasonable compensation," not "average market rates." Section 330(a)(3) requires courts to consider all "relevant factors" in awarding fees, including the "value" of the professional services to the estate. Moreover, as an evidentiary matter, Houlihan's proof of "market rates" is flawed because it describes only judicial fee awards in bankruptcy cases with potentially different facts. The bankruptcy court in this case determined Houlihan's fee based on a detailed comparison of Houlihan's activities and compensation to those of comparably skilled and experienced practitioners. That ruling was not an abuse of discretion.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In an appeal from BAP decisions, this Court independently reviews the bankruptcy court's judgment. In re Lampe, 331 F.3d 750, 753 (10th Cir. 2003). A bankruptcy court's ultimate award of fees is reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re Anderson, 936 F.2d 199, 203 (10th Cir. 1991). In scrutinizing the factual and discretionary determinations "involved in calculating * * * fee awards," the Court gives "considerable deference to the bankruptcy court. Historically, bankruptcy courts have been accorded wide discretion * * * in regard to the terms and conditions of the engagement of professionals." In re Miniscribe Corp., 309 F.3d 1234, 1244 (10th Cir. 2002) (internal quotation marks omitted). "The bankruptcy judge is on the front line, in the best position to gauge the ongoing interplay of factors and to make the delicate judgment calls which such a decision entails." Ibid.

ARGUMENT

I. Bankruptcy Courts Have Substantial Discretion In Calculating Reasonable Professional Fees Under Section 330

The Bankruptcy Code requires bankruptcy courts to serve as gatekeepers that supervise professional employment and thereby protect estate assets and the bankruptcy system's integrity.

Under 11 U.S.C. § 1103, a creditors committee may only hire bankruptcy professionals "with the court's approval." Professionals thus employed may be paid only if, and insofar as, such payment is legally "reasonable" after consideration of all "relevant factors," including the "value" of professional services to the estate. 11 U.S.C. §§ 328, 330.

The Bankruptcy Code provides two mechanisms for compensating professionals. Section 328, which is not relevant to this appeal,[9] allows bankruptcy courts to preapprove specific, reasonable terms of employment, which may include employment "on a retainer," such as a monthly fee, "on an hourly basis, or on a contingent fee basis." 11 U.S.C. § 328. When, as here, the bankruptcy court does not preapprove specific terms of employment, Section 330 allows bankruptcy courts to determine and award only "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services" after professional employment is complete. 11 U.S.C. § 330. To protect the estate from overbilling, Section 330 provides that "[i]n determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded, the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors." Ibid. (emphasis added).

[9] Appellant's brief does not cite, much less rely on, Section 328 as a basis for its fee request. See Appellant's Br. 26 (conceding the bankruptcy court's determination that this case is "governed by Section 330," not Section 328); cf. BAP Op. 18. ("It is uncontested that this case is governed by § 330.").

Section 330 provides an illustrative list of relevant factors, "including – (A) the time spent on such services; (B) the rates charged for such services; (C) whether the services were * * * beneficial at the time at which the services were rendered toward the completion of a case under this title; (D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time * * * ; and (E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). The word "including" clarifies that bankruptcy courts' analysis of reasonable fees may, indeed must, consider factors other than those enumerated where they are "relevant." See 11 U.S.C. § 102 ("In this title * * * 'includes' and 'including' are not limiting.").

As the BAP held (Op. 21), bankruptcy courts not only determine the weight of particular factors under Section 330; decisions about the factors to "be taken into account in determining reasonableness are [also] within the discretion of the bankruptcy court, which is best positioned to determine what is 'relevant' in any given case." Ibid. Through its approach to determining "reasonable fees," Section 330 balances the need for reasonable professional compensation against the risk that estate assets could be abused by private agreements that, although consensual between the parties, are not reasonable given the totality of circumstances, including the services' value to the estate.[10] Section 330's requirements regarding reasonable compensation are particularly important in the context of creditors committees because any professional fees are paid by the bankruptcy estate, not the committee members. 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(3); cf. In re Thermadyne Holdings Corp., 283 283 B.R. 749 (8th Cir. BAP 2002).

II. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion In Determining Houlihan's Effective Hourly Rate

Under the Bankruptcy Code, applicants for professional fees have long borne the evidentiary burden of proving that their requested fees are reasonable. See, e.g., Zolfo, Cooper & Co. v. Sunbeam-Oster Co., 50 F.3d 253, 261 (3d Cir. 1995); In re Kenneth Leventhal & Co., 19 F.3d 1174, 1177 (7th Cir. 1994). In this case, the bankruptcy court found that Houlihan carried that [10] Houlihan misunderstands Section 330 in its claim (Br. 7, 10, 25, 33-36) that the bankruptcy court "approved" Houlihan's fee agreement in October 1999 and April 2000, when the bankruptcy court authorized Houlihan's retention under 11 U.S.C. § 1103. In a case governed by Section 330, scrutiny and "approval" of fees necessarily occurs after "actual, necessary services" have been "rendered." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A). The bankruptcy court thus considered the reasonableness of Houlihan's proposed fees under Section 330 for the first time when Houlihan filed its fee application in October 2001. See BAP Op. 26-28; Bankr. Op. 4; App. 1110-1113.

Furthermore, as the BAP noted, many factors – including the bankruptcy court's January 1999 standing order, the bankruptcy court's retention orders and statements on the record, and representations to the court by the ABS Committee and Houlihan employees – indicated that, in this case, Houlihan's fees would be evaluated and determined under Section 330 after its services were complete. BAP. Op. 27-28.

burden only with respect to $904,000 of its requested fees. The bankruptcy court evaluated the time and expertise required to perform Houlihan's financial advisory services, and the court prescribed a rate of compensation that both represented the fair value of Houlihan's services and was reasonable compared to other professionals who performed substantially similar work. The bankruptcy court's approach was not an abuse of discretion, and its underlying factual findings were not clearly erroneous.

A. The Bankruptcy Court's Determination That Houlihan's Services In This Case Were Substantially Comparable To Services Of Other Financial Professionals Was Not Clear Error

Throughout its employment in this case, Houlihan was authorized to act as a "financial advisor" to the ABS Committee.[11] Similarly, the bankruptcy court authorized employment of other financial advisors and financial professionals by the Unsecured Creditors Committee and the Debtors. The Unsecured Creditors Committee hired Policiano & Manzo, L.L.C., and InteCap, Inc. (formerly Technology & Dispute Resolution Consulting, Inc.) as "financial advisors," and Asset Backed Solutions, L.L.C., as a "Securitization Consulting Expert." App. 442, 587, 684, 712, 732. The Debtors retained Development Specialists, Inc. ("DSI"), as a "financial consultant." Id. at 615.

The bankruptcy court held, in the face of conflicting evidence, that "[a]lthough the services rendered by Houlihan Lokey * * * were not identical to the services rendered by other financial advisors in this case, the services were substantially comparable to other services rendered." Bankr. Op. 6. That conclusion was not clearly erroneous. On the contrary, the bankruptcy court heard testimony and considered numerous documents regarding professionals' activities in this case, including evidence in applications for professional employment[12] and requests for fees.[13]

Most importantly, the bankruptcy court heard testimony directly comparing Houlihan's services in this case to those of other financial advisors and professionals. During the March 2002 hearing, Houlihan's Managing Director, David Hilty, testified that "in some measure really the services we provided really incorporated all the services that were provided by those different professionals. For example, * * * [Policiano Manzo] was monitoring the debtor's financial performance and evaluating its financial performance. That was an activity we did." App. 1012. Hilty also explained that "other professionals retained by the [Unsecured Creditors Committee] were then looking at the Asset-Based Trust, * * * looking at the value of the securities * * * [and] at potential claims * * * from those trusts. That was something we did at the beginning of the case as well as all through the case." Ibid. Despite Hilty's testimony that "DSI was involved in * * * running the company day-to-day which is something we don't do," Hilty also stated that DSI "looked at selling various noncore assets of the estate * * * [which] was really the same process we were looking at as part of the debtor's overall sale process for the servicing trust." Id. at 1013. Hilty acknowledged that DSI was "looking at trying to bring the – Asset-Backed Committee and the Unsecured Committee together * * * in trying to reach a settlement. We were attempting to do the same thing, but representing our client, the Asset-Based Holders." Id. at 1016.

Hilty explained that professionals representing various economic constituencies in this case worked with one another in "going through the different scenarios and the different analyses, * * * negotiating the different pieces of the settlement proposal, and actually structuring the proposal," especially concerning "how [assets] would be distributed between the trusts and things of that nature." Ibid. Houlihan's efforts concerning servicing agreements required "really the same process" performed by DSI in selling noncore assets (id. at 1013), but Hilty also suggested that marketing servicing agreements was "[t]he one area where I believe we were the only professional providing that," id. at 1098 (emphasis added); cf. id. at 1059-1060, 1081-1082. Hilty conceded that no evidence showed how much of Houlihan's time was spent on that allegedly "unique" service. Id. at 1060.

During the June 2002 hearing, Richard Chesley, then-general counsel for Houlihan's financial restructuring group,[14] testified that, although he did not think other professionals in this case typically compete with Houlihan, he had no significant knowledge "as to what [such professionals] did in this case" aside from the contents of relevant fee applications. App. 1359. When the bankruptcy court observed that Chesley's attempts to distinguish the work performed by Houlihan were "directly inconsistent" with Hilty's account of similarities between Houlihan's services and those of other professionals, id. at 1367-1370, Chesley admitted that other financial professionals provided "bits and pieces of services that Houlihan provided all of," and that "if we were to look at the total compensation of all four of those professionals, that might be one away to evaluate [reasonable fees]." Id. at 1371. The bankruptcy court ultimately used such a comparison between Houlihan's and other professionals' work to calculate Houlihan's $904,000 fee award. Bankr. Op. 6-11.

Carmen R. Eggleston, a managing director for InteCap, testified on behalf of the Unsecured Creditors Committee that there was no substantial difference between Houlihan's services in this case and those provided by Policiano, Asset-Backed Solutions, and DSI. App. 1381. Even as to the servicing agreements, Eggleston testified that Houlihan's time sheets revealed that no substantial or overwhelming amount of time was spent on such activities. Id. at 1382. Eggleston explained that "[i]t was all in the role of a financial advisor. * * * The types of analysis that were performed by the various professionals were very similar. Houlihan Lokey had a greater number of constituents * * * but the underlying analyses were substantially the same." Id. at 1381-1382.

Houlihan argues (Br. 43) that the bankruptcy court's comparison of Houlihan to other financial professionals erroneously compared "apples to oranges." But Houlihan overlooks the specific and substantial evidence that supports the bankruptcy court's conclusion. Compare supra pages 27-30, with Appellant's Br. 45 ("[T]here was no evidence presented that the four firms * * * provided substantially comparable services."). Although Houlihan claims that its services in this case were "unique" and "not comparable" to those of other professionals, e.g., Appellant's Br. 2, 4, 21-22, 25, 37, 39, such assertions are inadequate given the bankruptcy court's contrary factual determination.

It is untrue that the bankruptcy court "ignored" the services provided by Houlihan Lokey. E.g., Appellant's Br. 22, 37, 49. The bankruptcy court described Houlihan's activities in detail, Bankr. Op. 5, and held that they were similar in kind to other financial professionals' services, which the bankruptcy court held were of comparable value to the progress of this case. The bankruptcy court rejected Houlihan's claim that it merited different treatment as the "only investment banking firm in this case." Bankr. Op. 6 n.6; cf. Appellant's Br. 50. As Eggleston's testimony showed, Houlihan's services in this case "were not uniquely in the nature of 'investment banking services,'" but rather were "financial advisory services" that were substantially similar to other financial professionals' services. Bankr. Op. 6 n.6; see App. 1379-1383. Indeed, throughout this case, Houlihan has been viewed as providing to the ABS Committee "financial advisory services," rather than any unique form of "investment banking services." See App. 44, 50-51, 336-341, 350-351, 386-387, 468, 473, 476, 601, 602, 1119, 1128; Bankr. Op. 5-6. Houlihan's self-characterization (Br. 50) as the "lone investment banking/financial advisory firm during the totality of these cases" lacks support in light of the bankruptcy court's contrary finding. The bankruptcy court properly determined Houlihan's fees based on its specific activities in this case, not based on general characterizations of its business elsewhere.

All of the financial professionals in this case, including Houlihan, were undeniably "highly competent and qualified" (Appellant's Br. 46-47), and Houlihan admits that DSI in particular "was heavily involved in a number of critical * * * matters" (ibid.), as were other financial professionals. Nonetheless, Houlihan seeks to distinguish its work from that of other professionals by stressing minor details, such the length of other professionals' retention (id. at 48-49), and by overbroad characterizations of professionals' work in other cases (id. at 47). Such arguments cannot unseat the bankruptcy court's specific and supported factual determination that Houlihan's services in this case "were not identical to the services rendered by other financial advisors in this case, [but] were substantially comparable to other services rendered." Bankr. Op. 6.

B. The Bankruptcy Court's Comparison Of Houlihan Employees To Individuals With Similar Experience And Credentials Was Not Clear Error

The bankruptcy court compared the experience and credentials of the four Houlihan employees in this case to financial professionals employed by other entities in this case. The two relatively senior Houlihan employees were college graduates with between eight and ten years of experience. Bankr. Op. 7 & n.10. The bankruptcy court found those employees comparable to four high-level individuals who worked for other financial firms. The non-Houlihan individuals had twenty-five years of experience, twenty-three years of experience, seventeen years of experience, and eight years of experience, and they received "reasonable compensation" under Section 330 at hourly rates of $405, $360, $410, and $350. Id. at 8. One of Houlihan's more junior employees held a masters degree in business with six years of experience, while the other was a college graduate with three years of experience. Ibid. The bankruptcy court held that financial professionals with comparable experience and skills received "reasonable compensation" in this case at rates between $120 and $375 per hour. Ibid.

Houlihan does not directly dispute the above findings. Instead, Houlihan claims that the bankruptcy court's analysis "was factually irrelevant and legally unsound" because it "ignored the * * * determination of the actual services that the individuals and their firms provide." Appellant's Br. 49. On the contrary, the bankruptcy court's analysis of Houlihan's individual employees is based on its determination that Houlihan performed services comparable to those of other financial professionals in this case. Notably, although Houlihan's "Third Supplement" included time sheets for its four employees, App. 1131-1231, Houlihan introduced no specific testimony or evidence to distinguish its individual employees' activities from the services of equally credentialed individuals who advised the Debtors and the Unsecured Creditors Committee. Most importantly, Houlihan has not shown any clear error in the bankruptcy court's judgment that Houlihan and non-Houlihan employees were comparably skilled and credentialed, or in the bankruptcy court's holding that they performed substantively comparable services on behalf of different economic constituencies in this case.

C. The Bankruptcy Court's Use Of Hourly Rates To Compare Houlihan and Non-Houlihan Employees Was Not An Abuse of Discretion

1. Houlihan offers two reasons that the bankruptcy court's use of hourly data was erroneous as a "matter of law." Appellant's Br. 24, 33. First, Houlihan suggests that the bankruptcy court erred in holding that reasonable fees under Section 330 must be calculated using hourly rates. Appellant's Br. 27. As the BAP explained, the bankruptcy court held no such thing. "An hourly analysis was not mandated by the bankruptcy court." BAP Op. 24 (emphasis added). Rather, "acting well within its discretion," the bankruptcy court chose to calculate Houlihan's effective hourly rates as an important factor in "evaluat[ing] whether the requested monthly fee-based compensation was reasonable" and in "determin[ing] a lesser, reasonable compensation as permitted under § 330(a)(2)." Id. at 23-24.

The bankruptcy court's decision to calculate an "effective hourly rate" by dividing Houlihan's total requested fees by its total hours of work was not an abuse of discretion. This Court routinely relies on hourly rates as a measure of appropriate professional fees. See, e.g., In re Miniscribe Corp., 309 F.3d 1234, 1243-1244 (10th Cir. 2002). Under Section 330, bankruptcy courts are required to consider the "extent" of a professional's service, including the "time spent on such services." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3). Similarly, courts must determine the "value" of such services, ibid., which is often determined by reference to a reasonable hourly rate. Indeed, to ignore a professional's hours in fee determinations would seriously weaken judicial oversight and would risk imposing unreasonable fee awards upon the estate. As Hilty testified, Houlihan would have charged the same monthly fee if it "had worked twice as many hours." App. 1028. Less scrupulous professionals might have sought the same monthly fee if they had worked half as many hours, or no hours at all. In cases governed by Section 330, bankruptcy courts have an "independent duty" (BAP Op. 24) to scrutinize proposed professional compensation, and hourly data can be critical to executing that responsibility. Proper analysis of "reasonable compensation" and "value" under Section 330 may often require the comparison of a professional's total fee to its total hours of work, and the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by making that comparison here.

The bankruptcy court also determined effective hourly rates in order to compare Houlihan's compensation to that of other professionals, who were paid on an hourly basis. Houlihan's argument seems to imply that bankruptcy courts cannot compare two professionals' compensation unless they happen to bill in similar formats. That mistaken claim is unsupported by the statutory text. As the BAP held, a "demand [to] be compensated on a monthly basis does not govern the bankruptcy court," and to contract for a fixed fee "is by no means a guarantee that the fees will be awarded in that fashion." BAP Op. 24 (internal quotation marks omitted). Bankruptcy courts have ample discretion to demand hourly information, and to calculate effective hourly rates, where doing so is useful to compare different professionals' compensation and thereby determine reasonable fees.

Houlihan is correct that Section 330 allows bankruptcy courts to employ "flexible approaches to professional compensation." Appellant's Br. 24. That flexibility works against Houlihan here, however, because it confirms that bankruptcy courts have broad discretion and must exercise their own judgment in determining fees under Section 330. In a proper case, a bankruptcy court might choose not to use hourly rates, cf. id. at 27 (collecting bankruptcy court decisions), and Section 330 would be satisfied if the resultant compensation were reasonable. Yet Houlihan offers no statutory or appellate authority to support its stronger claim (Br. 37) that the bankruptcy court was forbidden from acting as it did in this case, i.e., using hourly rates as a significant and relevant factor to determine Houlihan's reasonable professional fees under Section 330. Given bankruptcy courts' significant flexibility to supervise bankruptcy professionals and their fees, the bankruptcy court's use of hourly data in this case was not an abuse of discretion.

2. Houlihan also claims that the bankruptcy court erred as matter of law because its $904,000 award did not represent the "market rate" that Houlihan and its competitors receive in other bankruptcy engagements. As a preliminary matter, Houlihan misreads Section 330 by assigning undue importance to "market rates." Section 330 prescribes that courts may award only "reasonable compensation" and that courts "shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A), (3)(A) (emphasis added). All of those requirements remain applicable even where a totality of "relevant factors" yields compensation different from alleged "market prices." Thus, Houlihan misapplies Section 330(a)(3) by giving supremacy to subsection (E), even though it is, by its statutory terms, only one of a non-exhaustive set of factors warranting judicial consideration in determining reasonable compensation in a particular case.

a. Houlihan is correct that one relevant factor under Section 330 is "the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E). But there is no indication in Section 330 or its legislative history that that enumerated factor should trump other factors, from Section 330's non-exhaustive list or otherwise, that the bankruptcy court deems "relevant." Nor is Houlihan correct to imply that professionals are entitled to their contractual fees even if those fees are deemed unreasonable and do not represent fair value in a particular case. Insofar as Congress enacted Section 330 to sustain quality professional services, it is important that Congress chose "reasonable compensation" – not "market rate" – as striking the appropriate balance, with proper attention to the services' "value" to the estate. In this case, for example, Houlihan "did not produce any evidence" that the bankruptcy court's $904,000 fee award was too low to procure high-quality professional representation. BAP Op. 26. On the contrary, Houlihan "has * * * [failed] to refute the bankruptcy court's finding" that similarly skilled financial advisors were available in this case to serve at that rate. Ibid.

In any event, Section 330(a)(3)(E) does not support Houlihan's argument here because Houlihan has proffered no evidence of "customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(3)(E) (emphasis added). At most, Houlihan has introduced proof of its competitors' charges in other bankruptcy cases. See App. 609 (listing bankruptcy engagements involving other entities). As the BAP explained, Houlihan "introduced no evidence" of comparably skilled practitioners' "nonbankruptcy professional compensation, [whether] hourly rate or otherwise." BAP Op. 26. Because Houlihan admits that none of its evidence concerns other entities' performance outside the bankruptcy context, Appellant's Br. 42 n.5, the bankruptcy court was correct that Section 330(a)(3)(E) by its terms has no relevance to this case, Bankr. Op. 11.

Even insofar as "market rates" are relevant under Section 330, judicial fee awards in other bankruptcy cases do not necessarily reveal true "market" rates. And Section 330 does not require a bankruptcy court to award fees that seem unduly high or low just because other courts have made similar fee awards in potentially dissimilar factual circumstances. Each bankruptcy court under Section 330 has an independent duty to consider "all relevant factors," 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), including not only awards to professionals in comparable cases (if such there be), but also awards to comparable professionals in the case at hand and the services' "value" to the estate. That is the approach the bankruptcy court followed here.

The bankruptcy court found Section 330(a)(3)(E) irrelevant on the facts of this case because Houlihan "failed to establish that the services rendered" by its competitors in other bankruptcy cases "were comparable to the services [Houlihan] rendered in this case." Bankr. Op. 11; see App. 609. Although Houlihan refers (Br. 24-25) to allegedly "undisputed evidence" of its competitors' "similar restructuring engagements" (emphasis added), that characterization lacks support given the bankruptcy court's factual finding, which is not clearly erroneous. Houlihan's list of its competitors' engagements (App. 609) does not demonstrate whether any of those cases was factually similar to this case, involved comparable professional services, or required a similar dedication of personnel or hours. Id. at 1084-1085 (no reliable evidence of competitors' services); id. at 1316, 1347, 1392 (no reliable evidence of competitors' hours). Without those details, mere evidence that other entities have used a monthly fee structure does not prove that the fee amounts in those cases should determine Houlihan's reasonable fee here, nor does it indicate the value of Houlihan's services to the estate.[15]

Houlihan claims that its list of competitors' bankruptcy engagements (App. 609) should nonetheless be credited under Section 330(a)(3)(A) because "non-bankruptcy evidence on effective hourly rates does not exist." Appellant's Br. 42 n.5, That response is incomplete. Regardless of competitors' hourly rates, Houlihan has not offered, and cannot explain the lack of, evidence even of competitors' non-hourly compensation in comparable non-bankruptcy cases. Moreover, Houlihan does not explain whether bankruptcy courts have required its competitors to keep comprehensive time records, as Houlihan has done in at least thirteen cases. See App. 1233. In the bankruptcy court,

[15] Another factor that differentiates the proffered engagements involving Houlihan's competitors is that some, if not all, of those fee awards involved terms of employment that were specifically preapproved by the bankruptcy court, often with explicit reference to Section 328. See, e.g., App. 4570-4571, 4645-4646, 4740, 4902. As discussed supra, this case involves the approval of fees under Section 330 after professional services are complete, and that requires a significantly different analysis of final fee applications.

it was Houlihan's burden to demonstrate its requested fees' reasonableness, and the BAP was correct that "Houlihan failed to * * * [produce] evidence of 'comparable compensation' of nonbankruptcy investment bankers." BAP Op. 26. Whatever explanation might be proffered, Houlihan "cannot fault the bankruptcy court for failing to consider what it did not have before it." Ibid. Houlihan's efforts to reverse the bankruptcy court's evaluation of the record, which rests on analysis of all available evidence and is not clearly erroneous, must fail.

b. Houlihan is also mistaken that the bankruptcy court was legally required to grant its $1.9 million fee request simply to match Houlihan's compensation in other bankruptcy cases. As with the argument concerning competitors' data, Houlihan has not established that any of its own prior bankruptcy engagements was substantively similar to this case. Nor has Houlihan offered evidence concerning Houlihan's charges in non-bankruptcy cases where fees are not judicially prescribed, as would be necessary to demonstrate true "market prices." If anything, Houlihan's fee awards in prior bankruptcy cases primarily demonstrate the broad range of fees that a bankruptcy court may permissibly award in any given case.

Based on testimony from Eggleston (App. 1387, 1390-1391), the bankruptcy court here determined that Houlihan's fee should not be compared to compensation in cases that include "success fees" because the reorganization here resulted in liquidation, not "success." Bankr. Op. 9, 11. That judgment was not an abuse of discretion. Houlihan claims that the bankruptcy court was required to include its success fees because "it is this 'package' of compensation that ordinarily defines Houlihan Lokey's compensation." Appellant's Br. 41 n.4. That argument misses the point. The bankruptcy court held that cases that include a "success fee" were not valid bases for comparison here, because this case involved no "success" that would merit that form of compensation. The bankruptcy court thus determined that appropriate "reasonable compensation" might differ substantially depending on whether the reorganization results in success or liquidation. That judgment regarding the proper frame of comparison lies within the bankruptcy court's discretion to evaluate fees under Section 330.

Excluding success fees from Houlihan's thirteen other bankruptcy cases yields effective hourly rates from $160 to $2417. Bankr. Op. 9. That data confirms the breadth of bankruptcy court discretion to award different levels of "reasonable compensation." It also confirms that the award in this case – whose effective hourly rate was $353.31 – falls well within the range of reasonable fees awarded to Houlihan in other cases.[16]

Houlihan seems to assume that any fee award that is less than its "average" is, by that fact alone, potentially unreasonable as a matter of law. That is incorrect. Under Section 330, bankruptcy professionals are entitled to an award of "reasonable compensation," based on a totality of "relevant factors," regardless of whether the resultant figure is greater or lesser than an aggregate "average" amount of past fee awards. The bankruptcy court correctly stated in its January 1999 order that "the rate charged for [professional] services shall correspond to the expertise necessary to perform the task, rather than the ordinary rate charged by the person performing it." App. 42. In awarding Houlihan a $904,000 fee, the bankruptcy court properly evaluated the skill and expertise of Houlihan's employees and awarded a reasonable level of compensation relative to that of comparable professionals in the case. The bankruptcy court's observation that the $904,000 fee was "consistent with," though not identical to, "the average hourly rate paid to Houlihan Lokey in bankruptcy engagements in which no transaction fee was paid" only corroborates the reasonableness of that fee.

[16] Indeed, the bankruptcy court's award is reasonable even under Houlihan's analysis of reasonable fees – ranging from $262 to $3271 per hour – which improperly inflates past awards by including "success fees." Appellant's Br. 41.

Bankr. Op. 11. The fact that the bankruptcy court's award differs from Houlihan's average effective hourly rate in other cases in no way renders that award an abuse of discretion.

D. The Bankruptcy Court's Award Of $904,000 Does Not Violate Any Provision Of The Bankruptcy Code

Houlihan claims that the bankruptcy court's decision not to grant its full $1.9 million fee request "violates all notions of fundamental fairness and equity that underlie the Bankruptcy Code." Appellant's Br. 33. Houlihan did not raise that argument before the bankruptcy court. Cf. March v. IRS, 335 F.3d 1186, 1189 (10th Cir. 2003) (finding an argument waived because it was not presented to the bankruptcy court). Moreover, Houlihan cites no statutory or judicial authority for reversing an otherwise proper award under Section 330, based solely on a litigant's contested claim of "unfairness." Such unstructured "second-guessing" seems contrary to the typically deferential appellate review applied in this context. In re Miniscribe Corp., 309 F.3d at 1244.

In any event, the BAP considered Houlihan's argument and correctly found it "wholly unsupported." BAP Op. 26. Houlihan claims that the Bankruptcy Code required that its $1.9 million fee request be granted because: (i) Houlihan requested that amount, (ii) the bankruptcy court approved such fees when it initially authorized Houlihan's employment, and (iii) the parties expected payments of that amount.

First, with respect to Houlihan's request, bankruptcy professionals compensated under Section 330 are entitled only to fees that the bankruptcy court deems "reasonable," after considering all "relevant factors" such as the services' value. The amount that a professional requests is not, without more, relevant to that inquiry. Also irrelevant is whether the parties contracted for the proposed fee. BAP Op. 24 (collecting cases). The Bankruptcy Code does not allow parties, merely by contracting for professional services, to override bankruptcy courts' federal statutory responsibility for appointing professionals under 11 U.S.C. § 1103, and, under Section 330, determining the "value" of professional services and the amount of compensation that would be "reasonable." Without court approval, a creditors committee cannot even employ a bankruptcy professional, and contractual terms that are not approved under Section 328 cannot bind a bankruptcy court to award an unreasonable and unfair fee. The Code cannot countenance any suggestion that private parties can "agree" to contractual terms, and thereby bind the court to award fees that it deems unfair or unreasonable. Especially because bankruptcy professionals under Section 330 are paid from assets of the estate, 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(3), bankruptcy courts have a critical "independent duty" (BAP Op. 24) to ensure that such fees are reasonable based on a totality of circumstances.

Second, Houlihan is incorrect that the bankruptcy court's decision to authorize Houlihan's employment "approved" the amount of Houlihan's fees. In a case such as this one, which is governed by Section 330, scrutiny and "approval" of fees necessarily occurs after the "actual, necessary services" have been "rendered." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1)(A); see supra note 10. That requirement remains effective even though many professionals, like Houlihan, seek approval for their employment, under 11 U.S.C. § 1103, long before fees are ever considered. Neither of the bankruptcy court's orders authorizing Houlihan's employment in this case provided any indication that the monthly fee was "approved." See App. 336-337, 350-352. Indeed, the April 2000 order explicitly provided that Houlihan "must keep contemporaneous records of the time spent on this engagement" and that Houlihan's "entitlement to the allowance of fees" would be subsequently evaluated pursuant to the court's January 1999 order. Id. at 351. This case exemplifies the ordinary distinction, under Section, 330 between initial decisions to authorize employment and subsequent decisions to determine fees. That distinction is neither unfair nor inequitable under the Code.

Third, the BAP correctly noted numerous indications in the record that the parties (and the court) expected Houlihan's fees to be evaluated after the fact for reasonableness, and that is exactly what happened. The bankruptcy court's January 1999 order, which predated Houlihan's employment, stated that "Hourly Rates" would be a primary basis for evaluating fees and that "the rate charged * * * shall correspond to the expertise necessary * * * , rather than the ordinary rate charged by the person performing it." App. 42. The bankruptcy court clarified at the March 1999 hearing that Houlihan would have to record its time because such hourly data would be important to the judicial evaluation of Houlihan's final fee requests. Id. at 320. In its April 2000 order, the bankruptcy court reiterated the need for Houlihan to provide hourly data. Id. at 403-404, 350-351.

In supporting the ABS Committee's application to retain Houlihan, Kramer represented to the court that Houlihan's contracted monthly fee was "obviously subject not only to [Houlihan's] retention or employment in the matter, but also to final review by the Bankruptcy Court as to the relative fairness or [reasonableness]" under Section 330. App. 289. Counsel for the ABS Committee also repeatedly indicated that Houlihan's contractual fee would be reviewed for reasonableness using time records. E.g., id. at 387, 390-391, 394, 401. That view corresponded with the apparent consensus of the Unsecured Creditors Committee, the Debtors, and the U.S. Trustee that Houlihan's monthly fees would be substantively evaluated by the bankruptcy court after service was complete. E.g., App. 289, 318, 398-399, 401, 971-979. Houlihan overlooks all of this evidence and argues, without support, that there was never "any contemplation" that Houlihan's effective hourly rates might be used in determining its final fee award under Section 330. Appellant's Br. 34. Houlihan also fails to rebut the BAP's detailed analysis rejecting claims of unfairness after an "exhaustive review of the record." BAP Op. 26-29.

In sum, the bankruptcy court properly exercised its substantial authority under Section 330 by awarding Houlihan fees of $904,000 based on individual rates of $400, $390, $300, and $275 per hour. Houlihan's fee award compared favorably to the fees awarded to similarly credentialed financial professionals who made "substantially comparable" contributions to this case. Bankr. Op. 6. As the BAP correctly held, the bankruptcy court's judgment was not an abuse of discretion.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should affirm the BAP's judgment.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON

In re

MARTIN W. HOWSER,

Appellant,

v.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE,

Appellee.

Case No. 2:09-cv-00228-FVS

[BK Case No. 09-02439-PCW11]

REPLY
MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE'S MOTION TO DISMISS APPEAL

The Acting United States Trustee, by and through his attorney, Gary W. Dyer, replies to the opposition and response to the motion to dismiss this appeal.

Mr. Howser appealed the order of the bankruptcy court refusing to approve the employment of a specific law firm to represent Mr. Howser in his chapter 11 bankruptcy case because the proposed firm had actual conflicts of interest and therefore, did not qualify for employment under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). The United States Trustee argued that this appeal must be dismissed because it was taken from an interlocutory order without leave of this Court and because Mr. Howser no longer has any interest in getting court approval of the firm's employment. Not only is Mr. Howser no longer proceeding under chapter 11, but he has now dismissed his bankruptcy case altogether. Therefore, as explained in the United States Trustee's motion, Mr. Howser no longer has a legally-cognizable interest in the outcome of this appeal and the appeal is moot.

Mr. Howser agrees in his response that the order he appeals from "was an interlocutory one, and that standing alone, it is moot." Response Memorandum at 4 (emphasis omitted). However, Mr. Howser asserts that the jurisdictional defects in his appeal have been cured by subsequent events in his bankruptcy case. Specifically, he argues that the fact that he recently appealed the decision of the bankruptcy court not to award fees to his attorneys[1] and purportedly filed a motion to consolidate the two appeals[2] means that this appeal is no longer moot or an appeal from an interlocutory order.

Mr. Howser does not explain why his second appeal would revive his

[1] As Mr. Howser admits, the bankruptcy court has not yet entered an order on this issue. Therefore, Mr. Howser's appeal of the fees decision is premature. In addition, Mr. Howser is the wrong party to appeal the bankruptcy court's decision regarding fees because Mr. Howser's attorneys, rather than Mr. Howser are the ones with the interest in being paid.

[2] As of November 9, 2009, the United States Trustee has not been served with a motion to consolidate, nor does the docket in this appeal reflect that such a motion has been filed.

interest in obtaining court approval to hire attorneys to represent him in a now-defunct chapter 11 case. It does not. The appeal is still moot.

Mr. Howser relies upon the case of Nicholson v. Schafe, 558 F.3d 1266 (11th Cir. 2009), but that case does not address the mootness issue and is inapposite as to the lack of finality of Mr. Howser's appeal. The Nicholson case involved an appeal of an order that granted attorney's fees in an undetermined amount subject to proof of reasonable fees. The circuit court questioned whether that portion of the appeal was premature, given that the lower court had yet to quantify the award of attorney's fees. While the appeal was pending, the district court determined the amount of attorney's fees awarded and the appellant appealed that order. The circuit court found that the consolidation of the two appeals mooted its question about its jurisdiction to review an award of unquantified fees, presumably because the fees were no longer unquantified. Nicholson, 558 F.3d at 1270.

That is not the situation in this case. The two appeals in this case are taken from orders involving different issues. This appeal is from the order disqualifying Mr. Howser's law firm from employment because of conflicts of interest. It concerns whether Mr. Howser is entitled to employ specific attorneys to represent him in his terminated chapter 11 bankruptcy case. Mr. Howser's second appeal, by contrast, is from the bankruptcy court's decision to deny the disqualified law firm's fees for their representation of Mr. Howser during his chapter 11 proceeding. Unlike the first order appealed from in Nicholson, the bankruptcy court's order denying approval for employment left nothing unresolved for the court to decide later. Also unlike Nicholson, the second order appealed from in this case denying fees did not complete the employment order or affect it in any way.[3] Therefore, the second appeal can not "cure" the interlocutory nature of the first appeal.

Because this appeal remains moot and impermissibly seeks review of an interlocutory order without leave of this Court, the United States Trustee requests that the appeal be dismissed.

[3] While prior court approval of employment is a prerequisite to the award of fees, the bankruptcy court does not revisit the propriety of the employment order in the context of the fee application.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES TO BE PRESENTED

1) Whether the Bankruptcy Court's findings that Mr. Hughes's discharge should be denied for failure to keep adequate records of his financial transactions was clearly erroneous?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The issues raised in this appeal are principally questions of fact. The Bankruptcy Court's findings of fact may only be set aside if clearly erroneous. Fed. R. Bank. P. 8013. To any extent there are issues of law, this Court reviews them de novo. Matter of Pengo Industries, Inc., 962 F.2d 543 (5th Cir. 1992), Matter of Luce, 960 F.2d 1277 (5th Cir. 1992).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Mr. Hughes filed his voluntary Chapter 7 petition under 11 U.S.C. §301 and §701 et seq. on October 5, 2005 (Rec. Page 81). The United States Trustee timely filed a complaint seeking to deny the Debtor's discharge (Rec. Page 55). Trial was held, and on August 21, 2006, the Bankruptcy Court entered its Memorandum Opinion indicating that Mr. Hughes's discharge should be denied because he failed to keep or preserve adequate records from which his financial condition or business transactions could be ascertained (Rec. Page 711). The Court then entered judgment denying the discharge (Rec. Page 755). The Debtor moved for, but was denied a new trial (Rec. Pages 757 and 761). Mr. Hughes now appeals the denial of his discharge.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Mr. Hughes filed his voluntary Chapter 7 (liquidation) bankruptcy petition on October 5, 2005 (Rec. Page 81). With this petition, he sought to discharge all debts he owed prior to filing. One requirement for receiving this discharge is that Mr. Hughes have kept adequate books and records from which his financial transactions could be ascertained.

For many years prior to filing the case, Mr. Hughes, along with his partner, Gordon Todd, were general contractors of “high-end” homes (Rec. Pages 713, 917 et seq.). They operated through a series of entities which usually bore the name of the two partners in some fashion (Rec. Pages 918 et seq., 714). Various setbacks to each succeeding entity resulted in the accumulation of millions in unpaid debts on which both Todd and Hughes were personally liable (Rec. Pages 921, 714-715). The partners had a “falling-out”, (Rec. Pages 936, 938, 719), and Mr. Hughes eventually began working for a company his wife owns, H. Hughes Properties, Inc. (Rec. Pages 936, 940, 720). This company is also a general contractor of “high-end” homes.

For approximately 15 years prior to filing bankruptcy Mr. Hughes operated on a “cash basis” and had no bank accounts (Rec. Pages 928-929). Any checks he received during this time were negotiated into cash, which was then spent in any way he saw fit. He did this to avoid persistent garnishments by creditors. This cash practice continued while he was an employee of his wife’s company.

Mr. Hughes’s bi-weekly pay checks from H. Hughes Properties were based on $6,910.00/month gross salary,[1] (Rec. Pages 95, 871-872, 848), and he received $5,000.00 each month after withholdings (Rec. Pages 95, 848, 960, 722-723). He cashed these checks at local banks (Rec. Pages 881, 762). After receiving $5,000.00 in cash, he placed $2,000.00 in a drawer at home which he and his wife used to pay some of their family’s expenses, including pool maintenance, housekeepers, and their children’s tuition at Jesuit and Hockaday Academy (Rec. Pages 962-963, 722-723). Mr. Hughes did not keep or maintain any records of how either this $2,000.00 or the remaining $3,000.00 was spent (Rec. Pages 810-811, 882-884, 961-963, 722-723).

After Mr. Hughes filed bankruptcy, the United States Trustee began inquiring about his affairs

[1] Judge Jernigan believed there were many reasons to question the veracity of this amount. There were manifest discrepancies between a) what was shown on the Debtor’s bankruptcy Schedules for income in the period prior to filing, b) his W-2 forms, his tax returns, and (depending on whether or not he decided to cash his check in any given period) c) the amount the Debtor actually received. See, e.g., Rec. Pages 853-857, 724-727. The most consistent amount identified at trial, and the amount the Bankruptcy Court used for its analysis were the $6,900.00 and $5,000.00 figures.

(Rec. Pages 799 et seq.). It was learned that Mr. and Mrs. Hughes[2] reported $307,618.00 of wage and salary income on their 2004 federal income tax return (Rec. Page 385). Mr. Hughes's original 2004 W-2 reported that H. Hughes Properties had paid him $210,000.00 (Rec. Page 400). An amended W-2 reported him receiving only $100,000.00 (Rec. Pages 398-399). When asked about the manifest discrepancy, Mr. Hughes deferred to his accountant and disavowed any knowledge about the reasons for the change (Rec. Pages 181, 849-850, 856, 726-727). When asked for documents to explain this, he had none. Mr. Hughes testified that H. Hughes Properties provides him with a company car and pays the related expenses (Rec. Page 901). But when asked why his W-2 does not reflect the income that must be recognized for that vehicle, he again deferred to his accountant to explain (Rec. Pages 901-902).

Mr. Hughes also disavowed knowledge about many other specific items, including the 2004 sale of stock in a company his wife previously owned and another company she previously worked for. When asked for documents to explain these, he had none (Rec. Pages 857-858, 860-861). Shortly after being asked about his family's $13,445.00 of monthly expenses shown on Schedule J,[3] (Rec. Page 96), he amended Schedule J to show monthly expenses of $19,060.00 (Rec. Page 120). When asked about the difference he simply explained he did not focus on them the first time he prepared the Schedule (Rec. Pages 803, 806-807, 974-975). When asked for documents to verify the amounts on Schedule J, he only had a few checks signed by his wife on her account (Rec. Pages 825-828), a few grocery receipts, and a check for his children's tuition (Rec. Pages 801-802, 829, 723). He testified he has no knowledge of how the money in the drawer is spent other than the fact that his wife uses it to pay various bills. See, e.g., Rec. Pages 901-902. He could not explain whether certain expenses he listed on Schedule J (Rec. Page

[2] Mrs. Hughes did not file for bankruptcy. However, her income and share of the family's expenses can be considered for purposes on Mr. Hughes case and, therefore, must be disclosed.

[3] Schedule J requires debtors to report and itemize their monthly personal living expenses. It must be completed by all debtors, and must include information about a spouse's expenses, even if the spouse did not file bankruptcy.

120) for his daughter's vehicle and insurance were paid from money he put in the drawer (Rec. Page 902). There was also no explanation or documentation explaining why he originally reported $45,000.00 of year-to-date income on his Statement of Financial Affairs ("SOFA") (Rec. Page 99), why he amended that to $83,000.00, (Rec. Page 121), why both amounts conflicted with various pay stubs, (Rec. Pages 418-425), and why these amounts also conflicted with what he should have made in those periods if he was paid $6,900.00/month as his Schedule I[4] reported[5] (Rec. Pages 871-879).

Because of Mr. Hughes's failure to keep any records of his cash dealings, and the many mistakes he made in completing his bankruptcy schedules,[6] the United States Trustee filed a complaint asking the Bankruptcy Court to deny Mr. Hughes's discharge. At trial, Mr. Hughes admitted that no records of his cash dealings were ever kept (Rec. Pages 882-883). His only explanation was that it had been his practice to deal in cash to avoid creditors' collection efforts.

Judge Jernigan denied Mr. Hughes's discharge. Her Opinion notes that the record-keeping requirement of Bankruptcy Code §727(a)(3) is intended to insure there is a trail from which parties can follow a debtor's financial history, and that this trail must give credibility to a debtor's oral explanations (Rec. Page 739). She applied the principle that once a prima facie case for no records was made, the burden fell to Mr. Hughes to justify his not having records (Rec. Page 736). The Opinion recognized that a debtor's records need not be perfect or impeccably kept (Rec. Page 736), and that the quality and [4] Schedule I requires debtors to report their monthly income. Like Schedule J it must be completed by all debtors and must include their spouse's income, regardless of whether the spouse filed bankruptcy.

[5] Multiplying $6,900.00/month times 9 months means Mr. Hughes should have been reported approximately $62,100.00 in year-to-date gross income on his SOFA, which conflicts with both the original and amended SOFA.

[6] Believing that the Debtor had failed to satisfactorily account for the loss of assets, and that the number of mistakes made in completing his Schedules and Debtor's evasiveness in explaining them was tantamount to a false or account, see The Cadle Company v. Mitchell (In re Mitchell),102 Fed. Appx. 860 (5th Cir. 2004), United States Trustee v. Moschella, (In re Moschella), Adv. No. 04-4055 (Unpublished Memorandum Opinion, (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004) the United States Trustee's Complaint also sought to deny the discharge under §727(a)(4)(A) and (a)(5). However, the Bankruptcy Court found the Debtor's explanations for these mistakes sufficiently exculpatory so as to deny relief on those causes.

quantity of records can be commensurate to a debtor's sophistication, motivation, and other circumstances (Rec. Page 738).

Implementing these principles in Mr. Hughes's case, Judge Jernigan found that the United States Trustee had unequivocally established a prima facie case that Mr. Hughes had no records (Rec. Page 741). When she turned to Mr. Hughes, the only justification he gave was that it had been his practice for some time, and that it was instigated in an effort to avoid creditors (Rec. Pages 741-742). She rejected this as an appropriate justification (Rec. Pages 742-743), noting that his income and expenses was a material matter worthy of being investigated. The targets of such an investigation included:

> a) the $110,000.00 discrepancy in income reported on Mr. Hughes's 2004 original and amended 2004 W-2 forms;
> b) the $38,000.00 discrepancy between the original and amended year-to-date income Mr. Hughes disclosed in his bankruptcy schedules;
>
> c) the discrepancy between what Mr. Hughes reported on Schedule I as his monthly income and the amounts shown for year-to-date income on both the original and amended Statement of Financial Affairs; and > d) the questionable reliability of the information the Hughes gave their accountant for his preparation of their tax returns.

(Rec. Pages 744-745). She expressed particular interest in having these matters investigated because she was unwilling to rely on Mr. Hughes's oral explanations about his income and expenses. She noted that even if Mr. Hughes's W-2 forms were 100% accurate, this still did not adequately document his disbursements of $5,000.00 each month, especially when his only justification for not keeping records or having a bank account was to avoid creditors (Rec. Pages 743-744). Because Mr. Hughes is a sophisticated and educated businessman (Rec. Page 744), Judge Jernigan believed he should be kept to a higher record keeping standard (Rec. Page 744). She then held that his failure to keep records rendered him ineligible for a discharge.

I

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION BY DENYING THE DEBTOR'S DISCHARGE FOR FAILURE TO KEEP ADEQUATE RECORDS

The sole issue in this appeal is whether or not the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion or was clearly erroneous in denying Mr. Hughes's discharge for unjustifiably failing to keep any books or records of his cash dealings. Under 11 U.S.C. §727(a):

> The court shall grant the debtor a discharge, unless....
> (3) the debtor has....failed to keep....any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, from which the debtor's financial condition or business transactions might be ascertained, unless such act or failure to act was justified under all of the circumstances of the case;

This obligation to keep adequate records exists to insure that parties-in-interest get a true picture of a debtor's financial affairs. In re Womble, 289 B.R. 836 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2003); Clean Cut Tree Service, Inc. v. Costello (In re Costello), 299 B.R. 882 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2003). See also, Phillips v. Nipper (In re Nipper), 186 B.R. 284 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1995); Nof v. Gannon (In re Gannon), 173 B.R. 313 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1994). The initial test under §727(a)(3) is primarily objective. All that must be shown is that a debtor failed to keep and maintain adequate books and records. Once a prima facie case is established that inadequate records were kept, it is incumbent on debtor to justify that failure. Krohn v. Cromer (In re Cromer), 214 B.R. 86 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1997), Chemical Bank, et. al. v. Hecht (In re Hecht), 237 B.R. 7 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1999). Culpability for inadequate records is not dependent on an intent to conceal financial information. State Bank of India, et al. v. Sethi (In re Sethi), 250 B.R. 831 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 2000). All that is required is that there be no justification for not having adequate records.

What constitutes adequate records under §727(a)(3) and whether there is justification for not having them is somewhat more subjective. It is, therefore, left to the trial court's discretion, and can only be overturned upon a showing of clear error and/or an abuse of discretion. In re Dennis, 330 F.3d 696 (5th Cir. 2003). Section 727(a)(3) does not require perfect financial records that would pass muster under generally accepted accounting principles. However, there must be some records, and they must be kept in an intelligent fashion which allows for a reasonable reconstruction of the debtor's financial condition. In re Womble, supra. The adequacy of the debtor's records is examined case by case, see United States v. Trogdon (In re Trogdon), 111 B.R. 655 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1990), and includes consideration of a debtor's occupation, financial structure, education, experience, sophistication, nature of the business, and any other circumstances that serve the interests of justice. In re Trogdon, supra, Chicago Title Ins. Co. Inc. v. Mart (In re Mart), 87 B.R. 206, 210 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1988). Sophisticated business debtors are held to a higher standard of accountability in record keeping. Meridian Bank v. Alten (In re Alten), 958 F.2d 1226 (2nd Cir. 1992).

There is no dispute that Mr. Hughes did not keep records of his day-to-day expenditures of either the $3,000.00 he allotted himself each month or the $2,000.00 going into and out of the drawer each month in the years before filing (Rec. Pages 810-811, 961-963, 722-723). This undisputed fact established the prima facie case that adequate records were not kept, and shifted the burden to Mr. Hughes for him to justify the failure to keep records.

Mr. Hughes attempts to justify his failure by casting himself as an average consumer who otherwise would not be asked to document his personal transactions. In other words, he would have had the Bankruptcy Court believe that his having no records at all of his personal expenses was totally excusable. However, the Bankruptcy Code's requirement for keeping records is not limited to only business debtors. Indeed, §727(a)(3) employs the disjunctive "or" between "financial condition" and "business transactions", clearly indicating that all debtors must have adequate records, not just business debtors. The lack of any records at all is per se disqualifying absent an appropriate justification.

Mr. Hughes would also like this Court to apply a relaxed standard of record keeping because the transactions in question were average consumer expenses. But Judge Jernigan found that Mr. Hughes is _not_ an average consumer. He has a bachelors degree from the University of Oklahoma, with a major in finance (Rec. Pages 846, 713). He is a sophisticated businessman accustomed to complicated transactions in millions of dollars (Rec. Page 744), and confessed that his election to deal in cash was intended to evade creditors' efforts. He testified and reported on Schedule I that he received $5,000.00 in cash each month, or approximately $60,000.00 per year. Under his system, Mr. Hughes should have received $45,000.00 in cash during the period between January 1st and September 30, 2005. This is in excess of 72% of his personal year-to-date income, and almost 20% of what the family's salaried income was in 2004. But because he kept no records, neither the Trustee nor parties-in-interest have any way to trace, confirm, refute, and/or challenge the Debtor's statements that this $5,000.00 each month was simply spent on daily expenses. Without records, Mr. Hughes essentially asks parties-in-interest to rely on his statement that: "Here's what happened to the money, and if you don't believe it, just ask me." These are not the circumstances of an average consumer debtor, and this is precisely the scenario §727(a)(3) intends to prevent. Christy et al. v. Kowalski (In re Kowalski), 316 B.R. 596 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 2004).

Moreover, the Court pointed out that a need to investigate Mr. Hughes's income clearly existed (Rec. Pages 724-728). Mr. Hughes's original SOFA reported year-to-date income of $45,000.00, whereas his amended SOFA reported $83,000.00. Assuming Mr. Hughes really earns $6,900.00 per month, he would have been paid $64,100.00 in the calendar year he filed bankruptcy. But this was not what he reported in response to Question No. 1 on either his original or amended SOFA (Rec. Pages 99 and 121). When extrapolated, it also differs with what he reported on the original and amended SOFA's for income in 2004.

Mr. Hughes also made a 30% change in what he reported on his original Schedule J to be his family's monthly expenses - going from $13,445.00/month to $19,060.00/month. He provided no excuse for the increase other than he apparently got them wrong the first time he completed the Schedule. More importantly, he had no records to back-up his changes or confirm his explanations. When this discrepancy is combined with those on the his original and amended 2004 W-2 statements, there were more than adequate facts from which Judge Jernigan could find a compelling reason to investigate his income and expenses. This, however, cannot be done to any degree of certainty without records.

Given the amounts involved, his sophistication, the discrepancies in his Schedules and tax returns, and his motivation for dealing in cash, the Bankruptcy Court was clearly within its discretion to find that Mr. Hughes's lack of records was unjustified under the circumstances.

II

CASE LAW SUPPORTS THE NECESSITY FOR ADEQUATE RECORDS OF PERSONAL INCOME AND EXPENSES

Other courts concur with the necessity for a debtor to maintaining records of personal spending. Just as in this case, the Debtors in Meridian Bank v. Alten, supra, kept few records of what were almost exclusively cash transactions that began in an effort to thwart creditors. Acknowledging that having sufficient records was prerequisite to receiving a discharge, the Alten Court found that a fear of liens and other collection efforts was not sufficient justification for failing to keep records of cash transactions. Alten at 1234. See also, Superior National Bank et al. v. Schroff (In re Schroff), 156 B.R. 250 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1993)(discharge denied when debtor had not had a bank account for over three years, was paid by wholly-owned corporations in cash, received unspecified gambling winnings and loans from his roommate, and operated both his business and personal affairs without records of the cash dealings); Peninsula Bank v. French (In re French), 338 B.R. 668 (C.D. Fla. 2006)(debtor disposed of all personal records when he moved); Structured Asset Services, L.L.C. v. Self (In re Self), 325 B.R. 224 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2005)(producing a few bank statements and cancelled checks did not constitute adequate records even for a debtor with only a high school education); Matter of Silverman, 10 B.R. 727 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y.

1981)(discharge denied when bankrupt[7] could produce virtually no records of his personal spending); Soloman v. Barman (In re Barman), 244 B.R. 896 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2000)(discharge denied when Debtor, a professional gambler, kept no records of his winnings, losses, or spending); Matter of Horton, 621 F.2d 968 (9th Cir. 1980)(bankruptcy court properly denied a discharge where bankrupt[8] dealt in cash because of his dislike of banks and kept no records of how he spent his salary).

III

THE CASES MR. HUGHES CITES ARE BOTH FACTUALLY DISTINGUISHABLE AND NOT CONTROLLING

Mr. Hughes cites a number of cases decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 in an attempt to create the perception that record keeping has never been required for personal spending. He mistakenly cites In re McCrea, 161 F. 246 (2nd Cir. 1908), where the Court does not state that records of personal transactions are never required - only that a lack of records was not indicative of fraudulent intent. He also cites In re Weisman, 1 F.Supp. 723 (S.D. N.Y. 1932); In re Rios, 27 F.Supp. 744 (S.D. N.Y. 1939); In re Goldman, 37 F.Supp. 761 (E.D. N.Y. 1941); In re Perkins, 40 F.Supp. 114 (D. N.J. 1941); In re Margolin, 64 F.Supp. 213 (E.D. N.Y. 1946); and In re Collins, 45 F.Supp. 990 (E.D. N.Y. 1942), which are all factually distinguishable because, unlike the present case, the bankrupts in those cases had not owned or operated their own businesses for many years (in Margolin the bankrupt had a personal business for only two weeks)(in Collins the Court only stated in dicta that records of personal expenses were unnecessary - the Court sustained the denial of discharge for lack of business related records). Mr. Hughes also cites Goff v. Russell Co. (Matter of Goff), 495 F.2d 199 (5th Cir. 1974), wherein the Court upheld the denial of discharge for failure to keep records of a business, and only alluded in a footnote to [7] The Debtor in this case filed for Title 11 relief under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, wherein petitioners were referred to as “bankrupts” rather than “debtors”. The provision in the Act requiring debtors to keep adequate records was closely comparable to §727(a)(3).

the proposition that "....normal people ....[with] uncomplex [sic] financial affairs....do not require books or substantial records." Goff at 202, note 12.

Mr. Hughes also cites cases under the Bankruptcy Code which are distinguishable from the present. The Court found in In re Shoup, 214 B.R. 166 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1997), that unlike this case, the Debtor's having bank statements and not the actual checks were sufficient records. He also cites Martin Marietta Materials Southwest, Inc. et al v. Lee (In re Lee), 309 B.R. 468 (Bankr.W.D. Tex. 2004), where, unlike here, the debtor had some bank statements, checks, and other documents from which the liquidation of investments could be traced. The Lee Court found credible the debtor's explanation that was spent on day laborers hired to repair storm damage, and it was not an uncommon practice for such transactions to go undocumented.

All of Mr. Hughes cases are either factually distinguishable from the present or not controlling. More importantly, to any extent these cases are factually analogous to the present, they do nothing to show how Judge Jernigans's findings in this case were clearly erroneous. Because her findings are not clearly erroneous, they should not be altered.

CONCLUSION

The Bankruptcy Court neither abused her discretion nor made clearly erroneous findings in concluding that Mr. Hughes unjustifiably failed to keep adequate records from which his financial circumstances could be ascertained. Because they are not clearly erroneous, she was within her discretion to deny his discharge under §727(a)(3). The Bankruptcy Court's decision should be affirmed in all respects.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES TO BE PRESENTED

1) Did the district court abuse its discretion in affirming the bankruptcy court's decision to deny the Debtor/Appellant's discharge under 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(3) for failing to keep adequate books and records from which his financial affairs might be ascertained?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Appellant attempts to characterize this appeal as involving issues of law. However, findings regarding a debtor's financial record keeping are issues of fact. Goff v. Russell Co. (In re Goff), 495 F.2d 199, 202 (5th Cir. 1974). Findings of fact are within the trial court's discretion and should not be set aside unless clearly erroneous. Fed. R. Bank. P. 8013. To any extent there are issues of law, this Court reviews them de novo. Robertson v. Dennis (In re Dennis), 330 F. 3d 696, 701 (5th Cir. 2003), In re Pengo Industries, Inc., 962 F.2d 543, 545 (5th Cir. 1992); In re Luce, 960 F.2d 1277, 1280 (5th Cir. 1992). Mixed questions of law and fact are also reviewed de novo. Bass v. Denney (Matter of Bass), 171 F.3d 1016, 1021 (5th Cir. 1999).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

James Hughes ("Debtor") filed his voluntary chapter 7 petition under 11 U.S.C.

§301 and §701 et seq. on October 5, 2005. (Rec. at 81).[1] The United States Trustee timely filed a complaint under 11 U.S.C. §727 seeking to deny the Debtor a discharge. (Rec. at 55). Trial was held on August 21, 2006, and on November 6, 2006, the bankruptcy court issued a memorandum opinion[2] denying the Debtor a discharge under 11 U.S.C. §727 for failing to keep or preserve adequate records from which his financial condition could be ascertained. (Rec. at 711). The court then entered judgment denying the discharge. (Rec. at 755). The Debtor moved for, but was denied a new trial. (Rec. at 757, 761). He timely filed a notice of appeal to the district court. (Rec. at 1).

The bankruptcy court subsequently denied the Debtor's discharge in a separate action brought by the Cadle Company, co-appellee. (Cadle Rec. 40). The Debtor also timely filed a notice of appeal in that case.[3] (Cadle Rec. at 1). The Debtor moved the district court for and was granted consolidation of those appeals. (Cadle Dis. Ct. at 95). On March 27, 2008, the district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's denial of a discharge in both proceedings.[4] (UST Dis. Ct. Rec. at 104). The Debtor now appeals to this Court. (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 116).

STATEMENT OF FACTS

The Debtor filed his voluntary chapter 7 (liquidation) bankruptcy petition on October 5, 2005. (Rec. at 81). With his petition, he sought to discharge all debts he owed prior to filing. As a prerequisite to receiving a discharge, the Bankruptcy Code requires a debtor to have kept adequate books and records from which his financial transactions can be ascertained. 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(3). Failing to have kept such records serves as a basis to deny the discharge. 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(3).

The Debtor holds an undergraduate degree in finance and business from the University of Oklahoma. (Rec. at 846). He played professional football from 1977 to 1981. (Rec. at 918). During the 1970s and 1980s he was one of two business partners in a multi-million dollar contracting firm that built "high-end" homes in the Dallas area. (Rec. at 713, 918 et seq.). He and his partner operated through a series of entities. (Rec. at 714, 918 et seq.). Various setbacks to each succeeding entity left the Debtor personally liable on millions in unpaid debts. (Rec. at 714-715, 921). The partners had a "falling-out," (Rec. at 719, 936, 938), and in 2002 the Debtor began working for his wife's firm, also a general contractor of "high-end" homes. (Rec. at 717).

[4] United States Trustee v. Hughes, 386 B.R. 624 (N.D. Tex. 2008).

According to his Schedules, the Debtor owed $41,808,513 in unsecured obligations to eleven creditors. See Schedule F. (Rec. at 692). The vast majority of this debt was incurred and/or connected to his housing/real estate development businesses. Id. (Although the Official Forms asks for the dates debts were insurred, the Debtor did not schedule those dates).

For approximately fifteen years prior to filing bankruptcy, the Debtor operated on a "cash basis" to avoid garnishments by creditors . (Rec. at 929-930). In recent years, his wife's company paid him $6,910 /month gross salary[5] (Rec. at 95, 848, 871-872), and he received $5,000/month net after withholdings. (Rec. at 95, 722, 848, 960). His $5,000 net salary was paid by check, which the Debtor negotiated into cash at local banks. (Rec. at 722, 881). He then took the cash and placed $2,000 of it in a drawer at home which he and his wife used to pay family expenses, including pool maintenance, housekeepers, and tuition at their children's expensive private schools (Hockaday Academy and Jesuit Preparatory Academy). (Rec. at 722-723, 962-963). With the exception of several checks from his wife's bank account (which was separate property pursuant to a partition agreement) and several grocery receipts, the Debtor kept no records reflecting how either this $2,000 or the remaining $3,000 was spent each month. (Rec. at 722-723, 810-811, 882-884, 961-963).

The Debtor's bankruptcy disclosures revealed that he and his wife[6] reported $307,618 of wage and salary income on their joint 2004 federal income tax return. (Rec. at 385). The Debtor's original 2004 IRS Form W-2 ("W-2") reported a salary of $210,000 from his wife's company. (Rec. at 400). An amended W-2, however, reported only $100,000. (Rec. at 398-399). At trial, the Debtor disavowed any knowledge regarding this discrepancy in figures, and deferred to his accountant. (Rec. at 181, 726-727, 856). Despite several requests, he could produce no documents explaining the change. The Debtor also could not explain or document why his W-2 did not recognize income which should have been imputed to him based on his use of his wife's company car and the other "perks" (e.g., cell phone and credit card) his wife's company provided him. In response to inquiries about these perks, Debtor again deferred to his accountant. (Rec. at 901-902).

Also, the Debtor's bankruptcy Schedules and Statement of Financial Affairs, Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Forms 6 and 7, were replete with other inconsistencies he was either unwilling or unable to explain or document. These included:

a) the 2004 sale of stock in a company his wife previously owned and another company she previously worked for (Rec. at 860-861);

b) the amendment of his original Schedule of Expenses[7] increasing his monthly expenses from $13,445 (Rec. at 96) to $19,060 (Rec. at 120);[8]

c) the specifics of how the money in the drawer is spent, see, e.g., Rec. at 901-902, including whether the expense listed on the Schedule of Expenses (Rec. at 120) for his daughter's vehicle and insurance were paid from money in the drawer (Rec. at 902); and

d) the discrepancies between:

> 1) the $45,000 year-to-date income as was originally reported on his Statement of Financial Affairs (Rec. at 99);
>
> 2) the $83,000 reported on an amended Statement of Financial Affairs, (Rec. at 121);
>
> 3) the amounts shown on various pay stubs, (Rec. at 418-425); and
> 4) the amount he should have been paid if the $6,900/month of income reported on Schedule I[9] was accurate (Rec. at 871-

[7] The Schedule of Expenses, Schedule J, requires debtors to report and itemize their monthly personal living expenses. It must be completed by all debtors, and must include information about a spouse's expenses, even if the spouse did not file bankruptcy.

[8] His only explanation was that he failed to focus on scheduling correct amounts for those expenses when he first completed the form. (Rec. at 803, 806-807). The only documents he produced were a few checks signed by his wife on her account (Rec. at 825-828), a few grocery receipts and cashier's checks for his children's tuition. (Rec. at 723, 801-802, 829).

The Debtor's failure to keep records of his cash transactions and his many mistakes in completing his bankruptcy schedules led the United States Trustee[11] to file a complaint under 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(3) seeking an order from the bankruptcy court denying his discharge.[12] (Rec. at 55). At trial, the Debtor admitted to keeping no

The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. To this end Congress has provided that "[t]he United States Trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. 307. See In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000).

[12] The complaint also alleged under §727(a)(4)(A) and (a)(5) that Mr. Hughes a) failed to satisfactorily account for the loss of assets, and b) that the numerous errors made in completing the Schedules and Statement of Financial Affairs and his evasiveness in explaining them was tantamount to a false oath or account. See The Cadle Company v. Mitchell (In re Mitchell),102 Fed. Appx. 860 (5th Cir. 2004), United States Trustee v. Moschella, (In re Moschella), Adv. No. 04-4055 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2004)(unpublished memorandum opinion). However, the bankruptcy court found the Debtor's explanations for these mistakes sufficiently exculpatory so as to deny relief on those counts. The United States Trustee did not appeal the bankruptcy court's order regarding these counts.

records of his cash dealings (Rec. at 882-883), and explained only that it had been his practice to deal in cash to avoid creditors. (Rec. at 928).[13]

The bankruptcy court denied the Debtor's discharge, noting that the record-keeping requirement of Bankruptcy Code §727(a)(3) is intended to ensure a credible trail for parties to follow in an attempt to verify a debtor's oral explanations concerning his financial history. (Rec. at 739). The bankruptcy court found that the United States Trustee made a prima facie showing that there were no records (Rec. at 741), and that Debtor thereafter failed to carry his burden to justify the lack of records. (Rec. at 742). The bankruptcy court recognized that the quality and quantity of records required is commensurate with a debtor's sophistication, motivation, and other circumstances (Rec. at 738), and that a debtor's records need not be perfect or impeccably kept. (Rec. at 736). Because of his experience and education, the bankruptcy court held the Debtor to a higher standard for record keeping, (Rec. at 744), and rejected his efforts to avoid creditors as appropriate justification for failing to keep records. (Rec. at 741-743). The bankruptcy court identified Debtor's income and expenses as matters of material interest requiring investigation because of:

> a) the $110,000 discrepancy between the Debtor's original and amended 2004 W-2 forms reported on he and his wife's joint 2004 tax return;

[13] The Debtor was subject to garnishments, such as the one involving a bank account which held the last $500,000 of Debtor's "Cowboy money," which had been set aside for his retirement. U.S. Trustee v. Hughes, 353 B.R. at 494.

b) the $38,000 discrepancy between the original and amended year-to-date income the Debtor disclosed in his bankruptcy schedules;

c) the discrepancy between what the Debtor reported on the Schedule of Income as his monthly income and the amounts shown for year-to-date income on both the original and amended Statement of Financial Affairs; and

d) the questionable reliability of the financial information the Debtor gave his accountant for preparation of the joint tax returns.

(Rec. at 744-745). The bankruptcy court refused to accept the Debtor's oral explanations, noting that even assuming the W-2 forms were 100% accurate, his disbursements of $5,000 each month were still not adequately explained or documented. (Rec. at 745). Accordingly, the bankruptcy court rejected his explanations as exculpatory and held that his failure to keep records rendered him ineligible to receive a discharge. (Rec. at 743-745).

In his appeal to the district court, the Debtor challenged two aspects of the bankruptcy court's decision. First, he challenged whether there was an adequate showing on the second element of §727(a)(3) - that the lack of records prevented an understanding of his financial condition. (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 53). On this issue, the district court ruled the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the Debtor's inability to:

a) account for the $2,000 put into the drawer each month;

b) account for the $400-$500 he personally spent each month; and

c) verify his earnings during the relevant year, including his personal use of his spouse's company car, cell phone, and credit card adequately demonstrated how the lack of records prevented an understanding of the Debtor's financial history. (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 108).

Second, Hughes challenged the standard for record keeping which the bankruptcy court applied to him. (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 48). He asserted that 1) the bankruptcy court required "precise" records, and 2) case law precedent does not require an individual to keep records for personal expenses. (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 49). The district court rejected this challenge as misstating the bankruptcy court's use of the term "precise". (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 109). The district court noted that the term "precise" was aimed at the employer's records as they pertained to Debtor's income (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 109), rather than what records the bankruptcy court expected from the Debtor for his cash spending. (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 110). The district court also agreed that the Debtor's education, sophistication, and business acumen distinguished his case from those in which unsophisticated debtors were not required to have personal records. (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 111). Although the district court agreed that the trial court could find the Debtor's explanations credible, it held that the bankruptcy court's rejection of those explanations did not constitute clear error. The district court also found that "[§727(a)(3)] impose(d) a duty on (him) to justify, not merely explain, his failure to maintain adequate records." United States Trustee v. Hughes, 386 B.R. at 630.

ARGUMENT

I

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION BY DENYING THE DEBTOR'S DISCHARGE FOR FAILURE TO KEEP ADEQUATE RECORDS

A.

Preliminary Statement

In a chapter 7 liquidation case, a debtor who satisfies the conditions set forth in §727(a) of the Bankruptcy Code may receive an order discharging his debts. 11 U.S.C. §727(a). A discharge granted under this section frees the debtor from all debts that arose before the bankruptcy case commenced other than those excepted from discharge under Section 523 of the Code. 11 U.S.C. §727(b).

B.

The Legal Standard for Record Keeping

The sole issue in this appeal is whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion or was clearly erroneous in denying Debtor's discharge for unjustifiably failing to keep any books or records of his cash dealings. Under 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(3):

> The court shall grant the debtor a discharge, unless . . .
> the debtor has . . . failed to keep . . . any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, from which the debtor's financial condition or business transactions might be ascertained, unless such act or failure to act was justified under all of the circumstances of the case[.]

11 U.S.C. §727(a)(3). This obligation to keep adequate records ensures that parties-in-interest get a true picture of a debtor's financial affairs. Robertson v. Dennis, supra; Pher Partners v. Womble (In re Womble), 289 B.R. 836 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 2003), aff'd, 108 Fed.Appx. 993 (5th Cir. 2004); Clean Cut Tree Serv., Inc. v. Costello (In re Costello), 299 B.R. 882 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2003); See also, Phillips v. Nipper (In re Nipper), 186 B.R. 284 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1995)(debtor's discharge denied because he failed to maintain adequate records of corporation for which he was officer and sole shareholder); Nof v. Gannon (In re Gannon), 173 B.R. 313 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1994)(debtor's discharge denied based on his failure to account for diamonds and inadequate record keeping).

The initial test under §727(a)(3) is primarily objective. It requires a prima facia showing that a debtor failed to keep and maintain adequate books and records, and that this lack of records prevented an understanding of the debtor's financial affairs. Goff v. Russell Co. (In re Goff), 495 F.2d 199 (5th Cir. 1974). The bankruptcy court has "wide discretion" in its inquiry when deciding whether a debtor maintained adequate books and records. Dennis, 330 F.3d at 701. Such findings can only be overturned if there was clear error or an abuse of discretion. Id. An intent to conceal financial information is not a prerequisite to finding that records were inadequate, State Bank of India v. Sethi (In re Sethi), 250 B.R. 831, 837 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 2000), nor is a lack of records justified by an honest belief that records do not need to be kept. Miller v. Pulos (In re Pulos), 168 B.R. 682 (Bankr. D. Minn.1994). All that §727(a)(3) requires is that there be a just reason for having inadequate records.

Once a prima facie case is made, the burden shifts to the debtor to justify the inadequacy of records. Robertson v. Dennis, 330 F.3d at 703; Krohn v. Cromer (In re Cromer), 214 B.R. 86 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1997); Chemical Bank, et. al. v. Hecht (In re Hecht), 237 B.R. 7 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1999). Justification is also a discretionary factual finding made case-by-case and cannot be set aside absent clear error or abuse of discretion. Meridian Bank v. Alten (In re Alten), 958 F.2d 1226 (2nd Cir. 1992)("[t]he bankruptcy court's determination that all the factual circumstances of the case amounted to justification for inadequate record keeping by the Altens is an ultimate fact").

Section 727(a)(3) does not require perfect financial records that would pass muster under generally accepted accounting principles. However, there must be adequate records, and they must be kept in an intelligent fashion which allows for a reasonable reconstruction of the debtor's financial condition. Womble, 289 B.R. at 856. A court's measure for adequacy may include a debtor's occupation, financial structure, education, experience, sophistication, nature of business, motivation for not keeping records, and any other circumstances that serve justice. United States v. Trogdon (In re Trogdon), 111 B.R. 655, 658 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1990); Chicago Title Ins. Co. Inc. v. Mart (In re Mart), 87 B.R. 206, 210 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1988). Sophisticated debtors can be held to a higher standard of accountability in record keeping. Alten, 958 F.2d at 1231.

C.

The Records the Debtor Produced Do Not Support a Finding that the Bankruptcy Court Abused its Discretion in Ruling the Debtor Failed to Rebut the United States Trustee's Prima Facia Case

There is no dispute that the Debtor kept virtually no records of how he spent $5,000 of cash each month. (Rec. at 722-723, 810-811, 882-884, 961-963). The bankruptcy court found that to be the case, U.S. Trustee v. Hughes, 353 B.R. at 501, and the district court determined that this finding was not clearly erroneous. U.S. Trustee v. Hughes, 386 B.R. at 629. In this appeal, Debtor challenges the findings made by those courts.

To justify his failure to keep or maintain records, the Debtor argues that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by finding that the retirement plan, insurance policies, partition agreement, copies of judgments, property tax records, corporate records, checks from his wife's account, judgment abstracts, and other papers he produced did not adequately portray his financial condition. (Appellant's Brief at 33). These documents, though, simply do not provide any "paper trail" to the cash which went into and then from the Debtor's drawer at home.

These documents and the others the Debtor produced were irrelevant to his cash distributions, i.e., where hundred of thousands of dollar went, and why it was not available to help pay his $41.8 million debt. (Appellant's Brief at 32). Most of those documents were either forms or contracts prepared by other persons and were not records he generated. While the documents all detailed matters to which the Debtor was a party, they neither memorialized his $5,000 cash transactions each month nor verified his testimony concerning those distributions. Only his pay stubs and tax returns had any relevance to this inquiry, and they did not disclose where the money went. Moreover, the bankruptcy court found these documents to be highly suspect and without effect in explaining the many discrepancies. United States Trustee v. Hughes, 353 B.R. at 503. While the Debtor produced: a) one Discover bill (Rec. at 158), b) two cashier's checks for private school tuition (Hockaday Academy and Jesuit Preparatory School) (Rec. at 829), and c) several grocery receipts — those few documents neither clarified nor verified the substantive inconsistencies, nor explained where the vast bulk of the Debtor's income went. Given his motivation for not having records, his argument that the trial court abused its discretion by refusing to find that these materials adequately documented his affairs, is without merit.

Thus, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in this regard because the evidence adduced at trial supports both the bankruptcy court's and district court's conclusions that the lack of underlying records perpetuated the uncertainty concerning his financial condition. The record reflects too many unanswered questions. Did the Debtor secrete unspent cash? (Rec. at 909-910). It is impossible to ascertain that given the absence of financial records.

Nor are there records to explain why the original information and subsequent amendments to his Schedules I and J regarding his income and expenses are so radically different. (Rec. at 26-27, 48, 801, 803-805, 871-879). Why could the Debtor not reconcile the discrepancies between the income shown on his Statement of Financial Affairs, his amended Statement of Financial Affairs, his tax returns, and his Schedule I? (Rec. at 20-25, 807-809, 842, 871-879). The record also reflects Debtor's inability to explain the discrepancies in his reported income in 2004. (Rec. at 25, 41, 842, 853-857). Nor were there any records to explain whether all of Debtor's reportable income was disclosed or whether there existed any residual tax claims against the estate for unreported income. (Rec. at 25, 842, 899-902), (Dis. Ct. Rec. at 108, Rec. at 24-25). And the Debtor admitted in his testimony that he listed income of $5,000 per month, or approximately $60,000 per year, on his bankruptcy schedules. Based on this figure, he should have received $45,000 in that portion of the calendar year immediately preceding his filing.[14] But because he kept no records, neither the bankruptcy court, nor any party-in-interest could trace, confirm, refute or challenge Debtor's putative receipts or his alleged use of 72% of his personal year-to-date income (almost 20% of the family's salaried income in 2004) for daily expenses. Without records, Hughes essentially asked his creditors to accept his self-serving explanation - Here's what happened to the money, and if you don't believe it, just ask me. This situation is precisely the scenario §727(a)(3) was designed to prevent, and the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by denying a discharge on this record. See Christy v. Kowalski (In re Kowalski), 316 B.R. 596, 602 (Bankr. N.D. N.Y. 2004).

The bankruptcy court also did not abuse its discretion in finding that the Debtor's oral explanations were inadequate to justify his utter lack of financial records. (Rec. at 724-728). His original Statement of Financial Affairs reported year-to-date income of $45,000, whereas his amended Statement of Financial Affairs reported $83,000. If the Debtor really earned $6,900 per month as he testified, simple arithmetic dictates that he would have been paid $64,100 in the calendar year before filing bankruptcy. Yet what he reported in response to Question No. 1 on both his original and his amended Statement of Financial Affairs (Rec. at 99, 121) was entirely different. When extrapolated, the figure to which the Debtor testified as his earnings also differed from what he reported on the original and amended Statement of Financial Affairs for income in 2004. This inconsistency was magnified when he increased by 30% the expenses originally reported on Schedule J.[15] The Debtor provided no excuse for the increase in his expenses other than his failure to focus on them when completing the Schedule J. More importantly, he offered no records to validate his explanations.

Other than a few cashier's checks and some grocery receipts, the Debtor was unable to produce any documents showing how he spent his money. There were no bank statements, canceled checks, ledgers, diaries or receipts for the cash coming out of the drawer for household expenses. He was unable to produce any documentation regarding the manner in which he disposed of approximately $400 to $500 in spending money each month. United States Trustee v. Hughes, 353 B.R. at 494. "Failure to justify why he did not track the receipt and expenditure of literally thousands of dollars each month is not justified. His oral testimony of how the funds were spent is not sufficient." Id. at 503.

Section 727(a)(3) exists to ensure creditors receive documents so they can ascertain a debtor's financial situation for themselves. The Bankruptcy Code does not require creditors to accept a debtor's word at every turn. See Krohn v. Cromer, (In re Cromer), 214 B.R. 86, 98 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1997); Structured Asset Serv., L.L.C. v. Self (In re Self), 325 B.R. 224, 240 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2005). When, as here, the Debtor has no supporting documentation, when discrepancies were not explained and when manifest uncertainty remained, it is not an abuse of discretion to deny a discharge.

D.

The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse Its Discretion In Concluding This Debtor Could Reasonably be Expected to Maintain More

Financial Records Than He Did

The Debtor alternatively contends the lower courts erred by applying to him a record-keeping standard more appropriate for business debtors than individual debtors. (Appellant's Brief at 20). In effect, he asks this Court to absolve him from any responsibility for having any records of his personal expenses. The Bankruptcy Code's requirement for record-keeping is not limited to business debtors. Indeed, §727(a)(3) employs the disjunctive "or" between "financial condition" and "business transactions". It requires all debtors to keep and preserve adequate records, not just business debtors. The lack of any records at all per se disqualifies a debtor from receiving a discharge absent an appropriate justification. For this reason alone, the Debtor's argument fails.

Assuming arguendo there is an exception that excuses a consumer debtor from record keeping, the Debtor urges this Court to apply this relaxed standard to him because the transactions in question were consumer expenses. (Appellant's Brief at 22). However, even a consumer debtor must have records of personal spending if they expect to receive a discharge. For example, the debtors in Meridian Bank v. Alten (In re Alten), 958 F.2d 1226 (2nd Cir. 1992), like this Debtor, kept few records and used almost exclusively cash transactions. Alten at 1228. Acknowledging that having sufficient records was a prerequisite to receiving a discharge, the Alten Court found that even a fear of liens and other collection efforts was not sufficient justification for failing to document cash transactions. Alten at 1234. See also, Superior Nat'l Bank v. Schroff (In re Schroff), 156 B.R. 250 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1993)(discharge denied when debtor had not had a bank account for over three years, was paid by wholly-owned corporations in cash, received unspecified gambling winnings and loans from his roommate, and operated both his business and personal affairs without records of the cash dealings); Structured Asset Serv., L.L.C. v. Self (In re Self), 352 B.R. 224 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2005)(producing a few bank statements and cancelled checks did not constitute adequate records even for a debtor with only a high school education); In re Silverman, 10 B.R. 727 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1981)(discharge denied when the bankrupt[16] could produce virtually no records of his personal spending); Solomon v. Barman (In re Barman), 244 B.R. 896 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2000)(discharge denied when debtor, a professional gambler, kept no records of his winnings, losses, or spending); Stewart Enterprises, Inc. v. Horton (In re Horton), 621 F.2d 968 (9th Cir. 1980)(bankruptcy court properly denied a discharge where the bankrupt dealt in cash because of his dislike of banks and kept no records of how he spent his salary).

In this case, there also was ample evidence that this Debtor was not just a consumer debtor. The bankruptcy court noted that Hughes has an undergraduate degree in finance and business from the University of Oklahoma (Rec. at 846, 713). He had previously been involved in the construction and sale of "high end" homes ("$200,000 to $300,000 range, some of them on speculation and some custom homes in the Richardson/North Dallas area"). United States Trustee v. Hughes, 353 B.R. at 490. He is a sophisticated businessman accustomed to complicated transactions in millions of dollars (Rec. at 744). He amassed $41.8 million in debts arising out of his ventures. (Rec. at 692). He had been personally involved in sophisticated legal proceedings (Rec. at 904). He fashioned means to evade creditors, and maintained that evasion for many years (Rec. at 929-930). The evidentiary record amply supports these specific findings, and Hughes is unable to identify any factual error in that regard. Thus, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that this Debtor's virtual absence of financial records for years prior to his bankruptcy filing justified a denial of a discharge.

II

DEBTOR'S AUTHORITIES ARE DISTINGUISHABLE FROM THE PRESENT CASE

The Debtor relies heavily on Goff v. Russell Co. (In re Goff), 495 F.2d 199 (5th Cir. 1974), as authority that consumer debtors need not maintain financial records. However, as already explained, §727 requires all debtors to maintain records. Goff does not hold otherwise. Instead, in Goff this Court upheld the denial of discharge for failure to keep records of a business, and merely alluded in a footnote that ". . . normal people . . . [with] uncomplex [sic] financial affairs...do not require books or substantial records." Goff at 202, n. 12. Here, the district court noted this Debtor-businessman's sophistication, experience, and record- keeping abilities were at least as high as the debtor in Goff

> "(b)ecause normal people in these classifications do not have lawn and pool maintenance expenses, housekeeping expenses, and children in private school, Hughes's financial affairs are not comparable to a small farmer, traveling salesman, or student. He is a sophisticated business man with a degree in finance who kept no records of his expenditures and provided unreliable documentation of his income."

United States Trustee v. Hughes, 386 B.R. at 629. (Dis. Ct. Rec. At 110-111). Since Mr. Hughes cannot point to a factual error in the lower Courts' findings that he was not a "....normal [person]....[with] uncomplex [sic] financial affairs....", the lower courts's findings that this Debtor was not an unsophisticated wage earner is not clearly erroneous. Id.

The Debtor relies on Chemoil Inc. v. Pfeifle (In re Pfeifle), 154 Fed. Appx. 432 (5th Cir. 2005), for the proposition that a debtor's oral explanation of cash expenditures may be adequate without supporting records. However, the facts in Pfeifle are diametric to this case. There, the bankruptcy court exercised its discretion to find that the debtor was unable to maintain adequate records. Pfeifle at 435. This contrasts with this case, where the bankruptcy court held that Mr. Hughes could maintain records, but simply did not. United States Trustee v. Hughes, 353 B.R. at

502. In addition, this Debtor produced even fewer documents than the debtor in Pfeifle. Moreover, in Pfeifle, there was no suggestion that the records were in any way suspect, or that the lack of cash accounting was motivated by an effort to avoid creditors. Finally, the fact that the court in Pfeifle exercised its discretion to grant a discharge in the absence of such circumstances does not mean it was an abuse of discretion for this bankruptcy court to deny the discharge. That is the essence of an abuse of discretion standard of review. Trial courts retain broad latitude to evaluate the facts of specific cases and make findings based upon them. Where, as here, there is substantial support for the findings, they should be affirmed in all respects.

The Debtor also cites a number of ancient cases decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898[17] in an attempt to create the perception that record keeping has never been required for personal spending. (Appellant's Brief at 24). The Debtor's reliance upon In re McCrea, 161 F. 246 (2nd Cir. 1908) is misplaced because that court did not state that records of personal transactions are never required - only that a lack of records was not indicative of fraudulent intent. McCrea at 217. He also cites In re Weisman, 1 F.Supp. 723 (S.D. N.Y. 1932); In re Rios, 27 F.Supp. 744 (S.D. N.Y. 1939); In re Goldman, 37 F.Supp. 761 (E.D. N.Y. 1941); In re Perkins, 40 F.Supp. 114 (D. N.J. 1941); In re Margolin, 64 F.Supp. 213 (E.D. N.Y. 1946); and In re Collins, 45

[17] The Bankruptcy Act of 1898 was replaced in its entirety in 1978 by the Bankruptcy Code.

F.Supp. 990 (E.D. N.Y. 1942). All of these cases are factually distinguishable. Unlike the present case, the bankrupts in those cases had not owned or operated businesses over many years (in Margolin the bankrupt had a personal business for only two weeks)(in Collins the court only stated in dicta that records of personal expenses were unnecessary - the court sustained the denial of discharge for lack of business - related records). In contrast, this Debtor was involved in the construction and home building business from the late 1970s through the early 1990s. He was a sophisticated businessman who dealt with multi-million dollar transactions on a regular basis during that time and incurred $41.8 million in losses — money he owes to third party creditors. (Rec. at 692).

The Debtor also relies on cases decided under the Bankruptcy Code as supporting approval for a lack of personal records. These are also factually distinguishable. He cites In re Shoup, 214 B.R. 166 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1997) for the proposition that the production of bank statements in lieu of the actual checks was sufficient. Shoup at 176. In this case, however, the Debtor did not have a checking account. (Rec. at 871). The Debtor also relies upon Martin Marietta Materials Southwest, Inc. v. Lee (In re Lee), 309 B.R. 468 (Bankr.W.D. Tex. 2004). In that case (unlike here), the debtor had some bank statements, checks, and other documents from which the liquidation of investments could be traced. Lee at 479. In Lee, the court found credible the debtor's explanation that cash was spent on day laborers hired to repair storm damage, and that it was not an uncommon practice for such transactions to go undocumented. Lee at 479-80. The Debtor also relies upon PNC Bank v. Buzzelli (In re Buzzelli), 246 B.R. 75 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2000), and the quotation therein from Collier on Bankruptcy, that his failure to keep records should be vindicating because "few" other consumers do so. Buzzelli at 98, citing 6 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 727.03[3][g] at 727-36 (Bender 1999). This commentary and the Debtor's reliance thereon appears premised on the theory that most consumer debtors do not maintain extensive books and records beyond bills, receipts, and cancelled checks. Buzzelli at 98. However, both the debtor in Buzzelli (an ophthalmologist with a solo practice) and Hughes are sophisticated businessmen compared with average consumer debtors. See Buzelli at 86. Furthermore, the trial court has broad discretion to view a debtor's sophistication, motivation, and all the circumstances of a case to determine whether a lack of records is justified. The Debtor's cases are either factually distinguishable from the present or are not controlling.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the orders entered below.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BRIEF FOR INTERVENOR-APPELLEE

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

Appellant brought this action seeking to discharge his educational loans. See 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8). The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over Appellant's action pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1334(b) and 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(I). The district court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the bankruptcy court under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

On August 15, 2008, the district court entered a final judgment against Appellant. No post-judgment motion was filed. Appellant filed a timely Notice of Appeal on August 18, 2008. This court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

1. Whether the Bankruptcy Code's student loan non-dischargeability provision, 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8), and the statutory provision authorizing the Secretary of Education to recoup collection costs from defaulting borrowers, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a, violate Due Process, Equal Protection, and a number of other constitutional protections.

2. Whether the bankruptcy court erred in granting extensions of time to and engaging in ex parte communication with the United States and denying Plaintiff's motion for class certification.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Nature of the Case

Paul Hupp ("Plaintiff" or "Appellant") filed suit against the Educational Credit Management Corporation ("ECMC") in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of California seeking to discharge educational loans pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8). Plaintiff also argued that the non-dischargeability provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and the collection costs authorized by 20 U.S.C. § 1091a violate various constitutional provisions. The United States intervened to defend the constitutionality of the challenged statutory provisions.

After a trial, the bankruptcy court determined that Plaintiff was not entitled to discharge his educational loans. On appeal, the District Court for the Southern District of California affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision declaring Plaintiff's student debt non-dischargeable. In addition, the district court upheld the constitutionality of 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a. Hupp appealed, and is litigating this case in a pro se capacity.

II. Statutory and Regulatory Background

A. 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8)

While "[o]ne of the primary purposes of the Bankruptcy Act" is to grant debtors "a new opportunity in life" through the discharge of preexisting debts, Local Loan Co. v. Hunt, 292 U.S. 234, 244 (1934), the right to discharge has never been absolute, see Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 287 (1991). Indeed, the Bankruptcy Code, like the Bankruptcy Act before it, has long contained non-dischargeability provisions that reflect Congress's decision "to exclude from the general policy of discharge certain categories of debts." Id.

Educational loans are one such category of debt. Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8), "an individual debtor" may not discharge an educational loan in bankruptcy "unless excepting such debt from discharge under this paragraph would impose an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor's dependents."[1] When originally enacted, § 523(a)(8) provided that student loan debts were non-dischargeable for five years. See Education Amendments of 1976, Pub. L. No. 94-482, § 127(a), 90 Stat. 2081. Congress subsequently extended the period of non-dischargeability to seven years in 1990, see Pub. L. No. 101-647, 104 Stat. 4865, 4964-65 (1990), and in 1998 Congress provided for an indefinite period of non-dischargeability, see Pub. L. No. 105-244, 112 Stat 1581, 1837 (1998).

Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) in response to a "rising incidence" of consumer bankruptcies among former students, many of whom were declaring bankruptcy immediately upon graduation. See Report of the Commission on the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, House Doc. No. 93-137, Pt. I, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973) at 140 n. 14. This provision was thus designed "to prevent abuses in and protect the solvency of" federal educational loan programs. In re Merchant, 958 F.2d 738, 742 (6th Cir. 1992); see also In re Pena, 155 F.3d 1108, 1111 (9th Cir. 1998); In re Pelkowski, 990 F.2d 737, 743 (3d. Cir. 1993); In re Brunner, 46 B.R. 752, 753-54

[1] Under the prevailing law of this court, a debtor must satisfy a three-part test to demonstrate undue hardship: (1) the debtor must establish "'that she cannot maintain, based on current income and expenses, a minimal standard of living . . . if forced to repay the loans;'" (2) the debtor must show that "'this state of affairs is likely to persist for a significant portion of the repayment period of the student loans;'" and (3) the debtor must demonstrate that he "'has made good faith efforts to repay the loans.'" In re Pena, 155 F.3d 1108, 1111 (9th Cir. 1998) (quoting In re Brunner, 831 F.2d 395, 396 (2d Cir. 1987)).

(Bankr.D.C.N.Y.1985). Indeed, "Congress, by excepting educational loans from discharge, has determined that the continued solvency of educational funding and financial aid programs override the need to provide debtors with a fresh start in their financial affairs." Merchant, 958 F.2d at 742; see also Grogan, 498 U.S. at 287 (noting that non-dischargeability provisions reflect Congress's judgment that, for certain categories of debt, "the creditors' interest in recovering full payment" outweighs "the debtors' interest in a complete fresh start").

B. 20 U.S.C. § 1091a

The other statutory provision at issue in this case, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a, states that "a borrower who has defaulted" on a federal educational loan, "shall be required to pay . . . reasonable collection costs." See 20 U.S.C. § 1091a(b)(1). This provision ensures that "the borrowers themselves, [and] not the taxpayers, should bear the reasonable costs of collecting student loans in default." Black v. Educational Credit Management Corp., 459 F.3d 796, 800 (7th Cir. 2006); see also H.R. Rep. No. 99-383, at 41 (1985) (noting that 20 U.S.C. § 1091a(b)(1) was enacted in order to "reduce collection costs").

The Secretary's regulations implementing 20 U.S.C. § 1091a(b)(1) confirm the statute's focus on properly allocating collection costs. The regulations state that the holder of a student loan "shall charge a borrower an amount equal" to the "reasonable costs" of "collecting a loan on which the agency has paid a default or bankruptcy claim." 34 C.F.R. § 682.410(b)(2). "These costs may include, but are not limited to, all attorney's fees, collection agency charges, and court costs." Id.; see also 34 C.F.R. § 30.60 (providing a list of "costs associated with the collection of a particular debt" that the Secretary of Education may charge a debtor).

III. Statement of Facts and Proceedings Below

A. Background and Procedural History

1. Plaintiff attended San Diego State University from 1986 to 1990, earning a bachelor's degree in education. See Complaint ¶¶ 6-7, at A31.[2] To finance his education, Plaintiff obtained three federally-subsidized student loans totaling $7,300. See District Court Opinion ("Op.") at A2.[3] Plaintiff later consolidated these three loans into a single loan. Op. at A2.

From approximately May 1987 until 1998, Plaintiff successfully requested forbearance or deferment of his educational debts. Op. at A2. Plaintiff's forbearance or deferments ended on January 1, 1998, when Plaintiff determined he could not pay the consolidated loan. Id. Plaintiff's loan then went into default. Op. at A2.

[2] For the Court's convenience, we have included excerpts of Plaintiff's Complaint as an addendum to this brief. The Complaint is docket #1 in Plaintiff's bankruptcy court adversary proceeding, Hupp v. ECMC, No. 06-00198 (Bankr. S.D. Cal.).

[3] For the Court's convenience, we have included a copy of the district court's opinion as an addendum to this brief.

2. On February 8, 2006, Plaintiff commenced this adversary proceeding against ECMC[4] in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of California in order to determine the dischargeability of his student loan debt. Op. at A4. In his complaint, Plaintiff asserted that he owed approximately $60,000 on his defaulted student loans. Op. at A4.

Plaintiff subsequently filed a motion for summary judgment. Op. at A4. Plaintiff argued that his student debts constituted an "undue hardship" and that he was thus entitled to discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8). Plaintiff also argued that the non-dischargeability provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and the collection costs authorized by 20 U.S.C. § 1091a violated various constitutional protections. The United States intervened to defend the constitutionality of the challenged statutory provisions. See 28 U.S.C. § 2403(a).

The bankruptcy court denied Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment without opinion, and entered an order specifying that Plaintiff's trial would be "limited to the issue of undue hardship under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8)." Op. at A5. After a trial, the court ruled that Plaintiff's loans do not constitute an undue hardship, and that Plaintiff was therefore not entitled to a discharge of his educational debts. Op. at A5. Plaintiff timely appealed the bankruptcy court's decision to the district court. See 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

[4] Plaintiff initially filed suit against United Student Aid Funds ("USAF"), Inc. See Op. at A4. ECMC filed the Answer to Plaintiff's Complaint, however, since USAF was in the process of transferring all of its student loans to ECMC, and ECMC was the real party in interest in the case. See Op. at A4.

3. Before the district court, Plaintiff reasserted that he was entitled to discharge his educational loans as an "undue hardship" under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8), and he again raised numerous challenges to the constitutionality of both 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a. Additionally, Plaintiff also challenged a number of the bankruptcy court's "discovery rulings, procedural decisions, and scheduling orders." See Op. at A15.

As it did in the bankruptcy court, the United States filed a brief as an intervenor defending the constitutionality of both 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a. In its briefing, the United States also argued that Plaintiff's procedural claims implicating the United States were meritless.

B. The District Court's Decision

The district court rejected all of Plaintiff's claims and "affirm[ed] in its entirety the decision of the bankruptcy court." Op. at A17. In so doing, the court concluded that the Plaintiff had "failed to establish that being forced to repay his student loans would constitute an undue hardship under" 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8). Op. at A7. The district court thus affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision to deny the plaintiff a discharge of his educational debts.

The district court also rejected Plaintiff's various constitutional arguments, starting with the claim that § 523(a)(8) violates the Fifth Amendment's Due Process and Equal Protection guarantees. Noting that there is "'no constitutional right to obtain a discharge of one's debts,'" Op. at A10 (quoting United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434, 446 (1973)), the court held that § 523(a)(8) neither infringes a fundamental right nor discriminates against a suspect class, Op. at A10-A11. The court thus evaluated the constitutionality of the provision using rational basis review, and concluded that § 523(a)(8) was rationally related to Congress's legitimate interests in "prevent[ing] abuses in" and "protect[ing] the solvency" of federal student loan programs. Op. at A12.

The court rejected Plaintiff's three other challenges to the constitutionality of § 523(a)(8). First, the court determined that the 1990 and 1998 amendments to § 523(a)(8) were not impermissibly retroactive legislation, since the amendments altered "no rights that had vested in Plaintiff." Op. at A13. Moreover, the court noted that, even if the amendments were retroactive, "the Constitution only forbids the retroactive application of penal legislation and civil legislation that is so punitive as to be quasi-penal," and "§ 523(a)(8) does not qualify as such a law." Op. at A13. Second, the court concluded that § 523(a)(8) was not void for vagueness, since "ordinary civil" statutes are "only susceptible to challenge on vagueness grounds" if they are "substantially incomprehensible." Op. at A13 (internal quotations omitted). Third, the court found "no support" for the Plaintiff's argument that "the Constitution . . . renders a loan contract unenforceable" if there is no mutuality of contract, and similarly rejected Plaintiff's arguments that his student loan contract was unconstitutionally unconscionable, and that "the government interfered with Plaintiff's ability to repay his loan." Op. at A12, A14.

The district court also determined that 20 U.S.C. § 1091a does not violate the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment, since § 1091a does not serve "punitive purposes" and the Excessive Fines Clause only limits "the government's ability 'to extract payments . . . as punishment.'" Op. at A14 (quoting Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 609-10 (1993)) (emphasis in original).

Finally, the district court affirmed all of the bankruptcy court's "discovery rulings, procedural decisions, and scheduling orders," including those that implicated the United States. Op. at A15-A17. In particular, the court concluded that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in granting the United States extensions of time or denying Plaintiff's motion for class certification. See Op. at A15-A16. The court also rejected Plaintiff's claim that an "administrative" discussion between the United States and a member of the bankruptcy court's staff comprised an improper ex parte communication, finding that Plaintiff did not "allege, much less prove, that any improper communication occurred" between the United States and the trial court "regarding the merits of a pending case." Op. at A17.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

I. The United States intervenes to defend the constitutionality of the Bankruptcy Code's student loan non-dischargeability provision, 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8), and the statutory provision authorizing the Secretary of Education to recoup collection costs from defaulting borrowers, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a, against the constitutional challenges advanced in Plaintiff's brief. As we demonstrate below, each of Plaintiff's numerous challenges is meritless. Both provisions are fully constitutional, and the district court was correct to uphold them.

A. Plaintiff's primary claim is that 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a violate the Fifth Amendment's Equal Protection and Due Process guarantees. This argument fails, however, because both 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a constitute economic legislation that neither infringes on a protected right nor discriminates against a protected class. And since these provisions are both related to the legitimate governmental goals of preventing abuses in and protecting the solvency of federal student loan programs, they easily satisfy rational basis review.

B. Plaintiff also incorrectly claims that 11 U.S.C. §

523(a)(8)'s "undue hardship" standard violates constitutional prohibitions on vague and overbroad legislation. As this Court has noted, there is a settled judicial interpretation of the "undue hardship" standard, see In re Pena, 155 F.3d 1108, 1111 (9th Cir. 1998), and § 523(a)(8) can thus hardly be termed "substantially incomprehensible" and void for vagueness. Likewise, § 523(a)(8) infringes none of Plaintiff's fundamental rights, and is therefore not substantially overbroad.

C. Plaintiff's numerous challenges to the constitutionality of 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its implementing regulations are also mistaken. These provisions authorize lenders to charge debtors for the "reasonable costs incurred" in collecting a loan. See 34 C.F.R. § 682.410(b)(2). As such, the provisions serve a remedial, not a punitive, purpose, and Plaintiff's Ex Post Facto Clause and Eighth Amendment Excessive Fines Clause challenges must therefore fail. Additionally, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its associated regulations do not violate Plaintiff's procedural due process rights, as they provide a debtor with notice and a hearing before allowing a creditor to offset tax refunds or garnish wages.

D. Finally, Plaintiff erroneously claims that the provisions at issue here violate a number of common law contract doctrines – mutuality of contract, unconscionability, and unclean hands - and that these contractual violations render the provisions unconstitutional. Not only are the contractual doctrines on which Plaintiff relies without constitutional significance, but Plaintiff's contractual arguments also fail on their own terms.

II. In addition to his substantive constitutional claims, Plaintiff challenges numerous procedural decisions made by the bankruptcy court, three of which implicate the United States. These claims are meritless. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in granting the United States extensions of time or denying Plaintiff's motion for class certification, and the court engaged in no improper ex parte communications with the United States. The district court correctly rejected Plaintiff's procedural claims.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A district court's ruling on the constitutionality of an act of Congress is subject to de novo review by this Court. United States v. Serang, 156 F.3d 910, 913 (9th Cir. 1998).

ARGUMENT

I. BOTH 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) AND 20 U.S.C. § 1091a ARE CONSTITUTIONAL.

A. 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a Do Not Violate the Fifth Amendment's Due Process or Equal Protection Guarantees.

Plaintiff's primary constitutional argument is that 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a violate the Fifth Amendment's Due Process and Equal Protection guarantees. This argument is mistaken: neither of these provisions infringe a fundamental right or discriminate against a protected class, and both provisions easily satisfy rational basis review.

1. Rational Basis Review Applies As Neither 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) Nor 20 U.S.C. § 1091a Infringes a Fundamental Right or Discriminates Against a Suspect Class.

Plaintiff argues that this Court should apply strict scrutiny in reviewing his Fifth Amendment challenge to 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a. But strict scrutiny is appropriate only if a challenged statute infringes a fundamental right or discriminates against a suspect class. See Kadrmas v. Dickinson Pub. Sch., 487 U.S. 450, 457-58 (1988). The provisions at issue in this case do neither.

a. Neither 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) nor 20 U.S.C. § 1091a infringes on Plaintiff's fundamental constitutional rights. As discussed above, 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) excepts student loan debts from discharge in bankruptcy unless doing so would cause undue hardship to the debtor and his dependents. Thus, for certain debtors, Section 523(a)(8) limits a statutorily granted right, not a fundamental constitutional right. Indeed, as the Supreme Court has held, "[t]here is no constitutional right to obtain a discharge of one's debts." United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434, 446 (1973).

Likewise, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a provides that "a borrower who has defaulted" on a federal educational loan, "shall be required to pay . . . reasonable collection costs." Fees of this sort – which require an individual to reimburse the government for monies spent due to the individual’s actions – are entirely commonplace, and clearly do not infringe on any fundamental constitutional rights. See Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 721 (1997) (stating that a fundamental constitutional right must not only be “deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition,” but also “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,” so that “neither liberty nor justice would exist if [it] were sacrificed”).

While plaintiff contends that these provisions violate his fundamental right to the "basic necessities of life", see Appellant’s Brief at 12, it is important to recall that the Supreme Court has recognized that legislation affecting “the most basic economic needs of impoverished human beings” often involves “‘practical’” trade-offs between competing societal interests. Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 485 (1970) (quoting Metropolis Theatre Co. v. City of Chicago, 228 U.S. 61, 69-70 (1913)). Federal courts thus have “no power to impose . . . their views of what constitutes wise economic or social policy” when reviewing such legislation. Id. at 486; see also San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 29-39 (1973).

Moreover, even if such a putative right to “basic necessities” did exist, it would not be infringed by the provisions at issue here. As the district court recognized, the very purpose of § 523(a)(8)’s “undue hardship” exception is to guarantee a discharge for those who truly cannot obtain the “basic necessities of life” if their student loan debt is not discharged. See Comm'n on the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, Report, H.R. Doc. No. 93-137, pt. II, at 140-41 n.17 (1973) (stating that discharge should be allowed if a debtor cannot maintain a "minimal standard of living" for himself and his dependents); Collier on Bankruptcy § 523.14 (Alan J. Resnick & Henry J. Sommer eds., 15th ed. 2006). In other words, the Bankruptcy Code's student loan non-dischargeability provision honors the very "right" Plaintiff claims it violates.

Plaintiff's reliance on Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969) is also misplaced. In Shapiro, the Supreme Court applied strict scrutiny to a durational residency requirement, not because the regulation affected the "basic necessities of life," but because it infringed the right to interstate travel. Id. at 637; see also Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 499 (1999); Dandridge, 397 U.S. at 484 n. 16. That right is plainly not implicated here.

b. Nor do 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) or 20 U.S.C. § 1091a discriminate against a suspect class. Plaintiff argues that these provisions should be subjected to strict scrutiny because they discriminate based on "wealth." See Appellant's Br. at 12-13. But the Supreme Court has long held that the indigent are not a suspect class, see Kadrmas, 487 U.S. at 458; Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 322-23 (1980); Rodriguez v. Cook, 169 F.3d 1176, 1179 (9th Cir. 1999), and, regardless, as the district court noted and we discuss above, the "undue hardship" exception actually benefits impoverished individuals. See Op. at A10-A11.

Plaintiff’s argument that 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a discriminate based on race also fails. Plaintiff notes that neither provision references race in any way, but he claims that the provisions should be subjected to strict scrutiny regardless, since they “can be traced to a racially discriminatory purpose.” See Appellant’s Brief at 13 (citing Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976)). But Plaintiff produces no evidence that Congress was motivated by a discriminatory purpose in passing either 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) or 20 U.S.C. § 1091a other than reports demonstrating that loan default rates vary based on race. See id. at 13-18.

As the district court correctly held, Plaintiff’s statistical evidence “fall[s] far short” of triggering strict scrutiny. See Op. at A11. The Supreme Court has long held that “naked statistical” evidence is insufficient, except in extremely rare instances, to demonstrate discriminatory purpose. See Jefferson v. Hackney, 406 U.S. 535, 548 (1972); see also Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266 (1977). Indeed, evidence of statistical disparity must be so “stark” to trigger strict scrutiny, Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 266, that the data must be “tantamount for all practical purposes to a mathematical demonstration” that the relevant government officials acted with a discriminatory purpose. See Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 340-41 (1960) (finding that a state legislature violated equal protection when it altered city boundaries "from a square to an uncouth twenty-eight-sided figure" in order to exclude 395 of 400 black voters without excluding a single white voter); see also Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886) (holding a laundry permitting scheme unconstitutional when all but one of the white applicants received permits, but none of the over 200 Chinese applicants did). The statistical data presented by Plaintiff here simply does not demonstrate the same "stark" pattern of discriminatory impact as the data presented by the plaintiffs in Gomillion or Yick Wo.

2. 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a Are Rationally Related to a Legitimate Government Purpose.

Since the Bankruptcy Code's student loan non-dischargeability provisions neither infringe upon a fundamental right nor discriminate against a protected class, the provisions must satisfy rational basis review to be constitutional. See, e.g., Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 319-320 (1993). Under rational basis review, legislation "is presumed to be valid" and will be sustained if it "is rationally related to a legitimate state interest." City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Ctr., 473 U.S. 432, 440 (1985). Further, the heavy burden of negating every conceivable rational basis for the challenged statute falls upon the plaintiff. FCC v. Beach Communications, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 314-15 (1993).

Here, Plaintiff is unable to meet that burden. In passing 11

U.S.C. § 523(a)(8), Congress responded to a "rising incidence" of consumer bankruptcies among former students by limiting the discharge of student debts. See Report of the Commission on the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, House Doc. No. 93-137, Pt. I, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973) at 140 n. 14. Congress thus sought to limit the dischargeability of student debts in order to "forestall students . . . from abusing the bankruptcy system," In re Pena, 155 F.3d 1108, 1111 (9th Cir. 1998) (internal quotations omitted), and to "protect the solvency" of the federal student loan program, In re Merchant, 958 F.2d 738, 742 (6th Cir. 1992). Section 523(a)(8) - and its subsequent amendments - therefore represent a rational Congressional decision to prioritize the government's legitimate interests in providing low-cost loans to frequently underprivileged students over the interest of some individuals in obtaining a discharge of their student debts through bankruptcy. See, e.g., Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 287 (1991).

Likewise, in passing 20 U.S.C. § 1091a(b)(1), Congress made the rational judgment that the defaulting "borrowers themselves . . . should bear the reasonable costs of collecting student loans in default." Black v. Educational Credit Management Corp., 459 F.3d 796, 800 (7th Cir. 2006). This provision therefore not only reduces the overall cost of the student loan program to the government, see H.R. Rep. No. 99-383, at 40-41 (1985), but it also ensures that the costs of default are not borne by non-defaulting student debtors (in the form of higher rates) or taxpayers in general, see Black, 459 F.3d at 800. These are both legitimate goals, and § 1091a(b)(1) easily survives rational basis review.

Plaintiff challenges the rationality of 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a on two fronts. Both of Plaintiff's arguments misunderstand the nature of rational basis review, however. Plaintiff first contends that § 523(a)(8) and § 1091a were not supported by "valid and reliable" evidence, and that Congress instead passed the legislation based on "wild speculation and anecdotal evidence" and without sufficient debate. See Appellant's Brief at 19, 21-22. But, as the Supreme Court has recognized, a legislative choice is not subject to courtroom fact-finding and the choice may be based on rational speculation unsupported by evidence or empirical data. See, e.g., Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93, 111 (1979); Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, 348 U.S. 483, 487 (1955) (stating that it is the role of the "legislature, not the courts, to balance the advantages and disadvantages" of economic legislation). Indeed, both the nature and extent of Congress's deliberations and the congressional record are irrelevant to rational basis review, see Beach Communications, 508 U.S. at 315, as the government is not even required to show that Congress actually considered the rationale for a statute that the government is advancing before the court, see Heller, 509 U.S. at 320; Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 15 (1992). Instead, Plaintiff must counter all possible rationales for the statute "whether or not the basis has a foundation in the record." Heller, 509 U.S. at 320-21. As demonstrated above, this is a burden Plaintiff cannot carry.

Second, Plaintiff claims that the Bankruptcy Code's student loan non-dischargeability provisions are overbroad and more "draconian" than necessary to protect the solvency of the student loan program and deal with the problem of abusive student loan discharges. See Appellant's Brief at 19-22. This argument ignores, however, the fact that legislation "is not required to resort to close distinctions or to maintain a precise, scientific uniformity with reference" to its goals in order to survive rational basis review. Allied Stores of Ohio, Inc. v. Bowers, 358 U.S. 522, 527 (1959). As the Supreme Court has made clear, legislation "does not offend the Constitution simply because . . . [it] 'is not made with mathematical nicety,'" Dandridge, 397 U.S. at 485 (quoting Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U.S. 61, 78 (1911)).

Moreover, this is true even if Plaintiff is correct that 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a did not on their own "lead to a significant increase in the availability of private student loans." Appellant's Brief at 20. The cost of student loans is undoubtedly affected by many factors – both within and outside the control of Congress – and rational basis review simply does not "require[]" legislation to eradicate "all evils of the same genus" to be constitutional. See Ry. Express Agency, Inc. v. New York, 336 U.S. 106, 110 (1949).

B. 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) Is Neither Void for Vagueness Nor Overbroad.

Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8), a debtor may only discharge an educational loan in bankruptcy if "excepting such debt from discharge . . . would impose an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor's dependents." Plaintiff argues that this provision is unconstitutionally vague and overbroad because "[t]here is absolutely no way to determine" what the "'undue hardship' term encompasses." See Appellant's Brief at 23. Plaintiff's arguments are mistaken.

First, as the district court correctly recognized, 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) is not void for vagueness. As this Court has noted, civil statutes as reviewed for "'vagueness with somewhat greater tolerance than [statutes] involving criminal penalties,' because the consequences of imprecision are less severe." Craft v. National Park Service, 34 F.3d 918, 922 (9th Cir. 1994) (quoting United States v. 594,464 Pounds of Salmon, 871 F.2d 824, 829 (9th Cir. 1989)). Thus, vagueness review of civil statutes is "fairly lenient," Doe v. Staples, 706 F.2d 985, 988 (6th Cir. 1983), particularly where, as here, the challenged statute does not "threaten[] to inhibit the exercise of constitutionally protected rights," Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, 455 U.S. 489, 499 (1982). Indeed, a court will only invalidate an ordinary civil statute on vagueness grounds if it is “substantially incomprehensible,” Staples, 706 F.2d at 988; Exxon Corp. v. Busbee, 644 F.2d 1030 (5th Cir. 1981), or "so vague and indefinite as really to be no rule or standard at all,” A.B. Small Co. v. American Sugar Refining Co., 267 U.S. 233, 239 (1925).

Given these standards, § 523(a)(8) is plainly not void for vagueness. This Court and other circuit courts, as well as the “bankruptcy and district courts” in nearly every federal circuit, all use the three-part Brunner test for determining when a debtor is entitled to an “undue hardship” discharge of his student loans. See supra note 2; see also In re Pena, 155 F.3d 1108, 1111 (9th Cir. 1998) (detailing all of the federal courts that employ the Brunner test); but see In re Long, 322 F.3d 549, 554 (8th Cir. 2003) (employing a totality of the debtor’s economic circumstances test rather than the Brunner test). While the Brunner test does leave some room for judges to make discretionary determinations regarding a debtor’s financial means, § 523(a)(8)’s “undue hardship” term can hardly be termed “incomprehensible” or “no standard at all” in light of such a settled judicial interpretation.

Second, 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) is not overbroad. See Plaintiff’s Brief at 23. As this Court has recognized, the “overbreadth doctrine requires that the enactment reach ‘a substantial amount of constitutionally protected conduct. If it does not, then the overbreadth challenge must fail.'" Craft, 34 F.3d at 921 (quoting United States v. Austin, 902 F.2d 743, 744 (9th Cir.)); see also Hoffman Estates, 455 U.S. at 494. As discussed earlier, "[t]here is no constitutional right to obtain a discharge of one's debts," Kras, 409 U.S. at 446, and Plaintiff does not successfully argue that § 523(a)(8) infringes on any of his other fundamental rights, see supra at I.A.1. Plaintiff's overbreadth challenge must therefore fail.

C. Plaintiff's Remaining Challenges to the Constitutionality of 20 U.S.C. § 1091a Fail.

In his briefing, Plaintiff advances numerous challenges to the constitutionality of 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its implementing regulations. As we demonstrate below, each of Plaintiff's claims fails.

1. Plaintiff first argues that 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its supporting regulations were put into place "after he took out his student loans in 1986, 1987, and 1988," and that the provisions therefore violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. See Appellant's Brief at 24. This claim is baseless: even if we assume that the challenged provisions do post-date Plaintiff's student loans – which is by no means certain[5] – these provisions do not violate the

[5] According to Plaintiff's complaint, he took out educational loans on April 26, 1986, April 7, 1987, and November 7, 1988; and consolidated these loans on December 27, 1991. See Complaint ¶¶ 9-12, at A31. Thus, all of Plaintiff's loans post-date the original statutory provision stating that "borrower[s] who ha[ve] defaulted"

Ex Post Facto Clause. See Landgraf v. USI Film Products, 511 U.S. 244, 267-68 (1994) (noting that retroactive legislation "often serve[s] entirely benign and legitimate purposes," such as "simply [giving] comprehensive effect to a new law Congress considers salutary").

Indeed, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its supporting regulations do not even implicate the Ex Post Facto Clause. As the Supreme Court has stated, the Ex Post Facto Clause only prohibits the retroactive application of penal, and not civil, legislation, unless the regulatory scheme is "so punitive either in purpose or effect as to negate" the intention to deem it civil. Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84, 92 (2003) (internal quotations omitted); see also Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 100 (1997) (requiring "the clearest proof" to transform "a civil remedy into a criminal penalty"); Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 361 (1997) (deferring to the legislature's intent as to whether legislation is civil). And 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its supporting laws are clearly remedial, not punitive, in both "purpose and effect." Indeed, the provisions are designed to appropriately allocate the costs of default, Black, 459 F.3d at on student loans "shall be required to pay . . . reasonable collection costs." See Pub. L. No. 99-272, 100 Stat. 356, at Title XVI, § 16033 (April 7, 1986). Thus, it is unclear precisely what aspects of the regulatory scheme established by 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its implementing regulations Plaintiff contests. Indeed, at the time Plaintiff took out his loans, he should have been on notice that a defaulting borrower would be required to pay reasonable collection costs.

800, and reduce the cost of the student loan program to the government, see H.R. Rep. No. 99-383, at 41 (1985), rather than impose any sort of criminal penalty or punishment. Moreover, in effect, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its implementing regulations only allow the government to recoup "reasonable collection costs" from defaulting borrowers. See 20 U.S.C. § 1091a(b)(1); see also Black, 459 F.3d at 800-01 (upholding the Secretary's regulations used to calculate "reasonable collection costs"). This is hardly punitive, and the Ex Post Facto Clause thus does not apply.

2. Plaintiff also incorrectly claims that the collection costs authorized under 20 U.S.C. § 1091a are excessive under the Eighth Amendment. See Appellant's Brief at 25-29. The Excessive Fines Clause limits the ability of the government "to extract payments, whether in cash or in kind, 'as punishment for some offense.'" Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 609-10 (1993) (quoting Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 265 (1989)) (emphasis in original). Accordingly, a plaintiff must establish that a fine constitutes "punishment" to successfully bring an Eighth Amendment claim. See Op. at A14.

This Plaintiff is unable to do. The actual purposes served by a fine determine whether the fine is remedial or punitive. See United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 447 n. 7 (1989) (noting that whether a fine constitutes punishment is not "determined from the defendant's perspective"). And, as discussed above in the context of Plaintiff's Ex Post Facto Clause challenge, the purposes of § 1091a are remedial. See supra at 25-26. Indeed, the collection costs authorized by § 1091a bear none of the hallmarks of punishment, as they are not "imposed at the culmination of a criminal proceeding" or in any way linked to criminal wrongdoing. See United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 328 (1998).

Moreover, even if this Court does find that the collection costs imposed by § 1091a constitute punishment, Plaintiff is still unable to demonstrate that the costs violate the Excessive Fines Clause. The Supreme Court has stated that a fine must be "grossly disproportionate" to the offense to be excessive, id. at 326, and the collection costs authorized by § 1091a do not rise to that level. While there are no "rigid set of factors" that define when a fine is grossly disproportional, United States v. Mackby, 339 F.3d 1013, 1016 (9th Cir. 2003), the provisions at issue here link the collection costs charged to a defaulting debtor to the "reasonable costs incurred . . . in collecting a loan," see 34 C.F.R. § 682.410(b)(2). Such an effort to recoup the collection costs expended by the Department of Education, Black, 459 F.3d at 800, is not disproportionate, let alone grossly so.

3. Plaintiff's argument that 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its implementing regulations violate the "Liberty of Contract" protected by the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause also fails.

See Appellant's Brief at 25. "Acts adjusting the burdens and benefits of economic life come to the Court with a presumption of constitutionality, and . . . the burden is on one complaining of a due process violation to establish that the legislature has acted in an arbitrary and irrational way." Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining, Co., 428 U.S. 1, 15 (1976) (finding that an Act which required coal mines to compensate disabled mine-workers who terminated their employment prior to the enactment of the act did not violate due process). As discussed earlier, Plaintiff is unable to make such a showing, because § 1091a is a reasonable regulation designed to more appropriately allocate the costs of default while reducing the overall cost of the student loan program to the government. See supra I.A.2.

4. Finally, Plaintiff claims that 20 U.S.C. § 1091a and its supporting regulations must be "struck down," since they allowed for Plaintiff's wages and tax refunds to be garnished without a "court order or due process." See Appellant's Brief at 25 (citing Sniadich v. Family Finance Corp., 395 U.S. 337 (1969)). Whatever the precise nature of Plaintiff's factual allegations concerning his wages and tax refunds, this claim is based on a faulty premise. As the Supreme Court made clear in Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976), the procedural protections required by due process vary based on context, and a pre-deprivation "court order" is certainly not required in all instances. Id. at 332-35 (noting that Sniadich, while requiring "some type of pretermination hearing," "said nothing" about whether a judicial proceeding was required). Here, the regulations allowing a creditor to garnish wages or offset tax refunds clearly provide for notice and a pre-termination hearing. See 34 C.F.R. § 682.410(b)(6)(ii) (stating procedures necessary to offset tax refunds); id. § 682.410(b)(9) (same for garnishing wages). These provisions thus plainly satisfy Mathews's balancing approach.

D. Plaintiff's Contractual Arguments Have No Basis in the Constitution and Also Fail On Their Own Terms.

Plaintiff argues that the Bankruptcy Code's student loan non-dischargeability provisions violate a number of common law contract doctrines – mutuality of contract, unconscionability, and unclean hands - and that these contractual violations render the provisions unconstitutional.[6] As the district court recognized, Plaintiff's claims are without merit. Not only are the contractual doctrines on which Plaintiff relies without constitutional significance, but Plaintiff's contractual arguments also fail on their own terms.

1. Plaintiff first argues that the non-dischargeability of his student loans violates a constitutionally-imposed requirement of "mutuality of contract." See Appellant's Brief at 22.

[6] While 28 U.S.C. § 2403(a) allows the United States to intervene to defend the constitutionality of a federal statute, the United States addresses the substance of Plaintiff's contractual claims because Plaintiff presents these arguments in a constitutional guise.

Plaintiff’s claim appears to be based on the fact that his creditor faces “no time limit” in enforcing his loan contract, while Plaintiff faces a strict statute of limitations as to when he can “sue government actors.” See id.

Even leaving to the side whether Plaintiff has accurately characterized the remedies available to creditors and debtors under the federal student loan program, Plaintiff’s claim is baseless. Plaintiff’s argument has no basis in the Constitution, and regardless, "the law does not require that the parties [to a contract] have similar remedies in case of breach . . . ." See Restatement (Second) of Contracts, § 363 (1979). As such, Plaintiff’s claim is without foundation in either the Constitution or contract law.[7]

2. Plaintiff next argues that the penalties imposed by the terms of his student loan contract are unconscionable, and that 20 U.S.C. § 1091a is therefore unconstitutional. See Appellant's Brief at 24. But Plaintiff again neglects to tether his argument to any provision in the Constitution, or point to any case in which a court has struck down a federal statute based upon the contractual doctrine of unconscionability. Moreover, as discussed earlier, 20 U.S.C. § 1091a does not violate the constitutional provision that does target disproportionately harsh penalties, the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on excessive fines. See supra at 26-27. Thus, given that collection costs and penalties are commonly imposed on debtors who are in default, Congress's decision to impose collection costs cannot be viewed as unconscionable, let alone unconstitutionally so.[8]

[7] Plaintiff incorrectly claims that this Court upheld the doctrine of “mutuality of contract” in Espinosa v. United Student Aid Funds, Inc., 553 F.3d 1193 (9th Cir. 2008). While Espinosa does involve questions concerning the dischargeability of student loans, it speaks not at all of “mutuality of contract.” Instead, Espinosa’s primary focus is on whether a “student loan debt[] can be discharged by way of a Chapter 13 plan if the creditor does not object, after receiving notice of the proposed plan.” Id. at 1205.

3. Plaintiff also argues that the government should be enjoined from preventing discharge of his student loan because it interfered with his ability to repay his loan. See Appellant's Brief at 25 (arguing that the government has "unclean hands"). Whatever the legal or constitutional basis for this claim, Plaintiff produces no evidence demonstrating that the United States in any way frustrated his ability to repay his loan. Instead, Plaintiff's claim appears to be that the California Commission on Teacher Credentialing, a state body, has made it more difficult to repay his loan by denying him a teaching credential. See Appellant's Brief at 2-3; Op. at A14. Even if Plaintiff's argument had any basis in law or fact, the United States is not responsible for the actions of a state. Indeed, it is unclear how the actions of a state – even if Plaintiff's claims were true - can render an act of Congress unconstitutional.

II. PLAINTIFF'S PROCEDURAL CLAIMS IMPLICATING THE UNITED STATES ARE MERITLESS.

Plaintiff alleges that the bankruptcy court committed numerous procedural errors, and that these errors violated Plaintiff's "basic procedural due process rights." See Plaintiff's Brief at 7-12. Three of Plaintiff's procedural claims implicate the United States, and each of the claims is meritless.

1. Plaintiff first alleges that the bankruptcy court erred in granting extensions of time to the United States. See id. at 10-11. As the district court already recognized, this claim is baseless. See Op. at A15. Extensions of time granted by the court under Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(b) are reviewed for abuse of discretion, Kyle v. Campbell Soup Co., 28 F.3d 928, 930 (9th Cir. 1994), and, although Plaintiff argues that the extensions given to the United States caused him unnecessary expense, he does not explain how the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in granting the extensions or how the extension affected the outcome of the proceeding.

2. Plaintiff next alleges that the bankruptcy court engaged in improper ex parte contacts with the United States when the court's courtroom deputy contacted the government's trial counsel to schedule a hearing regarding Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment. See Appellant's Brief at 10. But, ex parte communication with a party is prohibited only when it concerns the merits of a pending lawsuit. Drobny v. CIR, 113 F.3d 670, 680 (7th Cir. 1997); In re School Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d 764, 789 (3d Cir. 1992) ("[Ex parte communications] are tolerated of necessity, however, where related to non-merits issues, for administrative matters, and in emergency circumstances."). As such, "a phone call from a member of a judge's staff regarding an administrative matter does not constitute an impermissible ex parte communication." See Op. at A16-A17. Indeed, as the district court noted, "Plaintiff does not allege, must less prove, that any improper communication occurred regarding the merits" of his case. Id. at A17.

3. Finally, Plaintiff alleges that the bankruptcy court erred in denying his motion to certify a class so that the Secretary of Education would be enjoined from enforcing 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a against "virtually all other student loan debtors." See Appellant's Brief at 10-11. But, as the district court noted, "a court's 'decision to certify a class is subject to very limited review and will be reversed only upon a strong showing that the . . . decision was a clear abuse of discretion.'" Op. at A16 (quoting Duke v. Wal-Mart, Inc., 509 F.3d 1168, 1175 (9th Cir. 2007)). Plaintiff has made no such showing here.

In particular, Plaintiff offers no argument as to how he would "fairly and adequately protect the interests" of the putative class. Id. (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4)). Indeed, pro se litigants are prohibited from representing a class of plaintiffs.

See Fymbo v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 213 F.3d 1320, 1321 (10th Cir. 2000); Phillips v. Tobin, 548 F.2d 408, 413 (2d Cir. 1976); Oxendine v. Williams, 509 F.2d 1405, 1407 (4th Cir. 1975); United States ex rel. Schwartz v. TRW Inc., 118 F. Supp. 2d 991 (C.D. Cal. 2000); see also Thompson v. Poindexter, 798 F.2d 471 (6th Cir.1986) (applying this rule to pro se prisoners). Plaintiff "may bring his own claims to federal court without counsel, but not the claims of others." Fymbo, 213 F.3d at 1321.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should dismiss Plaintiff's challenges to the constitutionality of 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) and 20 U.S.C. § 1091a, as well as Plaintiff's procedural claims implicating the United States.

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

Under Bankruptcy Code § 726(b), at the conclusion of a chapter 7 case that was converted from chapter 11, payment of allowed administrative expense claims incurred while in chapter 11 "shall be made pro rata" when there is not enough money to pay them in full. Did the Bankruptcy Court err in allowing three of the debtor's professionals to retain more than their pro rata share of their allowed chapter 11 administrative expense claims – thus ensuring that everyone else with allowed chapter 11 administrative expense claims would receive less than their pro rata share?

STATEMENT OF APPLICABLE STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

The bankruptcy court's legal findings are reviewed de novo, as are its conclusions involving mixed questions of law and fact. Debold v. Case, 452 F.3d 756, 761 (8th Cir. 2006). The bankruptcy court's findings regarding statutory interpretation are also subject to de novo review. Huisinga v. Carter (In re Juhl Enters., Inc.), 921 F.2d 800, 802 (8th Cir. 1990). The bankruptcy court's factual findings are reviewed for clear error. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013. Matters left to the bankruptcy court's discretion are reviewed for abuse of that discretion. In re Farmland Indus., Inc., 397 F.3d 647, 651 (8th Cir. 2005). "The bankruptcy court abuses its discretion when it fails to apply the proper legal standard or bases its order on findings that are clearly erroneous." Id.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND OF THE FACTS

I. STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

This appeal deals with the interpretation of 11 U.S.C. § 726 (“§ 726(b)”),[1] which governs the distribution of estate property in a chapter 7 liquidation case. Specifically, this appeal involves the statutorily-mandated equality of distribution among administrative expense claims allowed under 11 U.S.C. § 503(b) (“§ 503(b)”), which include professional fees awarded under 11 U.S.C. § 330 (“§ 330(a)”).

A. Priority and Distribution of Bankruptcy Estate Property

Congress established a priority-based system for the distribution of estate assets in a liquidation case under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 701 et seq. Section 726(a) ranks six categories of claims and interests to which estate property is to be distributed at the conclusion of a chapter 7 case, with first priority afforded “claims of the kind specified in, and in the order specified in,” 11 U.S.C. § 507(a) (“§ 507(a)”). Section 507(a), in turn, prioritizes nine types of elite claims that Congress accorded top priority for distribution. First priority under § 507(a) is shared by “administrative expenses allowed under [§ 503(b)], and any fees and charges assessed against the estate under chapter 123 of title 28." See 11 U.S.C. § 507(a)(1).[2]

---

[1] As this case was filed prior to October 17, 2005, the changes to the Bankruptcy Code made by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (“BAPCPA”), S. 256, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23, do not apply. In any event, the BAPCPA did not alter any of the statutory provisions relevant to this appeal.

A party seeking administrative expense treatment must file a timely request for payment. See 11 U.S.C. § 503(a). Not every payment made by a trustee or chapter 11 debtor in possession gives rise to a § 503(b) administrative expense claim, however; only those "allowed" by the bankruptcy court "[a]fter notice and a hearing" are subject to § 503(b). For example, statutory fees paid under chapter 123 of title 28 are not subject to court approval after a noticed hearing, and are not § 503(b) "administrative expense claims." Similarly, payments made in the ordinary course of business pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(c)(1) are not subject to court approval after a noticed hearing, and thus are not § 503(b) "administrative expense claims."

At the end of a chapter 7 case, the trustee makes payments on all outstanding claims in the order established by §§ 507(a) and 726(a) until all estate assets are distributed. If the estate lacks sufficient funds to pay in full all claims in the last category to receive any payment, § 726(b) mandates that the last group of claims "shall be paid pro rata." See 11 U.S.C. § 726(b). Once all property of the estate is fully distributed in this manner, claims in any subordinate categories receive nothing.

When a chapter 7 case has been converted from chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, § 726(b) subordinates all allowed § 503(b) administrative expense claims incurred during chapter 11 to those allowed § 503(b) administrative expense claims incurred after conversion to chapter 7. As allowed § 503(b) administrative expense claims are paid before all other classes of claims, this subordination becomes relevant only in "administratively insolvent" cases in which the estate contains insufficient funds at the end of the case to cover both chapter 7 and chapter 11 allowed § 503(b) administrative expense claims. This appeal deals with such a case.

[2] In some cases certain unpaid secured claims are given "superpriority" under 11 U.S.C. § 507(b).

B. Professional Employment and Compensation

The importance of professionals to the bankruptcy system is underscored by the high priority, "administrative expense" status granted to professional fees awarded under § 330. See 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(2). On the other hand, the number of provisions regulating the employment and compensation of estate professionals recognizes the unique potential for abuse by these professionals (by, for example, attempting to get paid from estate funds to the detriment of other claimants). Thus, bankruptcy courts rigorously supervise the employment and compensation of estate professionals.

For example, under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) ("§ 327(a)") an estate professional must not "hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate" and must be a "disinterested person" as defined by 11 U.S.C. § 101(14). In addition, the bankruptcy court reviews proposed terms of employment for reasonableness under 11 U.S.C. § 328(a). Once a professional has rendered services, the court applies criteria prescribed by § 330(a) to determine the amount to award as "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered" and as "reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses." The compensation and reimbursement so awarded is accorded administrative expense status by § 503(b)(2).

Unlike other § 503(b) administrative expense claimants, professionals may seek court approval to receive interim disbursements under 11 U.S.C. § 331 ("§ 331"). Such interim payments do not become final until the end of the case, however, and the court may order the return to the estate of interim compensation that exceeds the final compensation awarded to the professional. See 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(5).

The Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure also impose strict demands on professionals employed in bankruptcy cases, which, if they are not complied with, may result in denial or disgorgement of compensation. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014 (requirements for employment application); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016 (requirements for compensation application).

II. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Hyman Freightways, Inc. (the "Debtor") filed a petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on July 23, 1997. (Voluntary Petition, App. at 130-42). At the time it filed, the Debtor was a trucking company employing over 300 people. (Motion to Dismiss or Convert, App. at 210-11). The day after it filed, the Debtor sought authority to pay certain necessary expenses, including $1,980,000 for pre-petition employee wages and expenses and $600,000 for pre-petition amounts due to cartage companies. (Motion to Pay Certain Necessary Exp., App. at 143-49). No party objected to this motion, which was granted after a noticed hearing. (Order Authorizing Payment of Necessary Exp., App. at 154-55). The Debtor subsequently made the authorized payments on pre-petition amounts due to its employees and cartage companies. (Fredrikson Mem. In Opp. to Motion for Disgorgement, App. at 443).

On July 31, 1997, the Debtor requested court permission to employ Merical Associates, Inc. ("Merical") as financial advisor. (Appl. to Employ Bankr. Consultant, App. at 156-62). The Debtor sought permission to pay Merical weekly, although Merical would apply for court approval of its fees every 60 days. Id. The Debtor also requested court approval of a $30,000 retainer paid to Merical. Id. The application did not seek permission to transfer title of the retainer to Merical, but instead sought permission to apply the retainer against Merical's fees. Id. A supporting Unsworn Declaration of Burton W. Merical proposed that the retainer be applied to Merical's weekly billings. (Unsworn Decl. of Burton W. Merical, App. at 159-61).

The bankruptcy court authorized the Debtor to employ Merical under § 327(a) by order entered August 1, 1997. (Order Approving Empl. of Consultant, App. at 163-64). The court ordered, however, that the Debtor pay no fees to Merical "except as provided in 11 U.S.C. §§ 330 and 331." Id. The court further ordered that the time for filing a § 331 interim fee application would be shortened from 120 days to 60 days. Id. The court did not approve either the weekly payment to Merical, the $30,000 retainer, or the request to allow Merical to draw upon the retainer without court order.

Within the next few weeks, the Debtor filed applications to employ Fredrikson & Byron, P.A. ("Frederickson") as its chapter 11 counsel and Kalina, Wills, Gisvold &

Clark ("Kalina") as special counsel for litigation, regulatory, and union matters. (Appl. to Employ Attorneys, App. a 165-72; Amended Appl. to Employ Special Counsel, App. at 197-204). The Debtor sought approval of a $75,000 retainer to Fredrikson and a $20,000 retainer to Kalina. Id. at 166 and 198. The applications did not seek permission to transfer title of the retainers to the law firms, but instead sought permission to apply them against fees. Id. The Debtor agreed that Fredrikson could hold $25,000 of its retainer to apply against its final fee award, but would seek court approval of this agreement in its first fee application. Id. at 166.

In support of the Fredrikson application, the Debtor filed an Unsworn Declaration of James L. Baillee, which disclosed that Fredrikson actually held a retainer of $58,993.50, plus an additional $20,000 retainer to pay experts if necessary. (Unsworn Decl. of James L. Baillee, App. at 168). In support of the Kalina application, the Debtor filed an Unsworn Declaration of Andrew Clark, which disclosed that Kalina was owed $17,837 for pre-petition services. (Unsworn Decl. of Andrew Clark, App. at 201).

The bankruptcy court authorized the Debtor to employ Fredrikson as bankruptcy counsel under § 327(a) by order entered August 6, 1997, (Order Approving Empl. of Attorneys, App. at 205-06), and Kalina as special counsel under § 327(e) by order entered August 14, 1997, (Order Approving Empl. of Attorneys, App. at 207-08). Neither order approved the firms' retainers or authorized them to draw upon the retainers without court order.

The Debtor operated its business in chapter 11 for only a few months. On November 12, 1997, the bankruptcy court granted a motion filed by the United States Trustee[3] and converted the case to a chapter 7 liquidation case. (Order Converting Case, App. at 236-38). The United States Trustee appointed Thomas F. Miller to serve as chapter 7 trustee ("Trustee"). (Appointment of Trustee, App. at 239). The Debtor operated as a chapter 11 debtor in possession for fewer than 120 days and never filed the disclosure statement and plan contemplated by 11 U.S.C. §§ 1121 through 1129.[4]

Before the case was converted, Merical filed its first fee application seeking $43,700 in compensation and $1,010.71 in expenses. (Appl. for Fees and Exp., App. at 240-44). By order entered October 10, 1997, the bankruptcy court awarded Merical compensation of $43,700 and reimbursement of $987.51 in expenses, for a total award of $44,687.51. (Order Allowing Fees and Exp., App. at 245-46). The court authorized Merical to apply its remaining $22,617[5] retainer to its allowed fees and authorized the

[3] The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice, charged by statute with the duty to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. See 28 U.S.C. § 586(a). Congress expressly granted standing to the United States Trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 307 to raise and be heard on the issues raised in this appeal. See Morgenstern v. Revco D.S., Inc. (In re Revco D.S., Inc.), 898 F.2d 498, 499-500 (6th Cir. 1990) (appellate standing of United States Trustee).

[4] During its short chapter 11 case, the Debtor made certain payments in the ordinary course of business as authorized by 11 U.S.C. §§ 363(c), 1107 and 1108. Unlike § 503(b) administrative expense claims, however, ordinary course payments do not require court approval at a noticed hearing.

[5] Apparently, Merical already had applied part of its $30,000 retainer to fees for pre-petition services provided to the Debtor.

Debtor to pay the balance. Id. Thereafter, Merical applied the retainer and the Debtor paid the balance of Merical's interim award. (Appl. for Fee and Exp., App. at 247-57). Later, Merical filed a second fee application seeking approval of additional fees of $37,100 and reimbursement of $1,774.75 in expenses for the period from September 8, 1997, through the conversion date. Id. In the application, Merical acknowledged that it did not know "whether there [would] be sufficient funds to pay all administrative expenses," and it requested that these fees and expenses be addressed in the Trustee's final report and accounting.[6] Id. Thus, Merical has already received $44,687.51, or over 53% of its total allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claim of $83,562.26.

After the case converted to chapter 7, Kalina filed a fee application requesting approval of compensation of $48,291 and reimbursement of $851.15 in expenses. (Appl. by Special Counsel for Fees and Exp., App. at 258-62). In requesting approval of its fees, Kalina represented that it "believe[d] that sufficient sums ha[d] been and continue[d] to be generated by the liquidation to pay chapter 7 and chapter 11 administrative expenses." Id. Kalina acknowledged that it was "not requesting payment of its claim in full, but simply wishe[d] to apply the retainer to the debt." Id. By order entered March 19, 1998, the court approved the compensation and expenses sought by Kalina for a total award of $49,142.15, and authorized Kalina to apply its $20,000 retainer to the allowed fees.

[6] See Local Rule 3002-2 (requiring holders of administrative expense claims incurred after commencement of a chapter 11 case but before conversion to chapter 7 to file a request for payment and serve the request upon the chapter 7 trustee).

(Order Allowing Fees and Appl. of Retainer, App. at 263-64). Kalina subsequently applied the retainer, and accordingly has already received almost 41% of its allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claim.

Fredrikson filed an application on April 29, 1998, requesting approval of the following fees: (i) unpaid fees of $5,488.50 and expenses of $26.69 related to pre-petition services; (ii) compensation of $282,729.60 and expenses of $25,607.67 for services rendered during chapter 11; and (iii) compensation of $6,269.50 and expenses of $1,785.47 for services rendered during chapter 7. (Appl. for Allowance of Fees and Exp. App. at 265-73). Fredrikson admitted that it did not know "whether there [would] be sufficient funds to pay all administrative expenses," that it was only seeking authority to apply its retainers, and that it was requesting that the court either approve its fees or defer approval until the Trustee's final report and accounting. Id. at 266. By order entered May 21, 1998, the court approved Fredrikson's request for compensation and expenses totaling $8,054.97 as a chapter 7 administrative expense claim. (Order Allowing Fees and Appl. of Retainer, App. at 274-76). The court also authorized Fredrikson to apply its retainers, but deferred determination of Fredrikson's chapter 11 fee award until a later date. Id. Fredrikson applied $74,796.86 of its retainer to its chapter 11 fees and expenses. (Fredrikson Mem. In Opp. to Motion for Disgorgement, App. at 442). Thus, Fredrikson has already received 24% of its total allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claim of $308,337.27.

In anticipation of preparing a final report and account, on January 12 and February 27, 2006, the Trustee filed motions seeking to disgorge chapter 11 compensation paid to Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson. (Motion for Disgorgement, App. at 277-92 and 293-302). The United States Trustee joined the Trustee's motions. (Joinder of U.S. Trustee, App. at 303-07 and 308-66). The Trustee represented that, while the estate had sufficient funds to pay all chapter 7 § 503(b) administrative expense claims, there would only be $357,785 left to pay chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims totaling approximately $3,516,000.[7] (Motion for Disgorgement, App. at 277-79 and 293-96). Id. None of the $37 million in claims subordinate in priority to administrative claims will receive payment, as the estate is administratively insolvent. Id.

The Trustee's motion estimated that the distribution to chapter 11 administrative expense claimants would be 10%. Id. By that measure, if Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson were ordered to disgorge the entire $139,484.37 sought by the Trustee, chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants (including Merical, Kalina, and [7] Although it was not part of the record before the bankruptcy court, the Trustee's Interim Report and Proposed Distribution listing 750 chapter 11 administrative expense claims was filed on June 28, 2006. (Trustee's Interim Report and Proposed Distribution, App. at 496-714). In addition to the unpaid portions of Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson's chapter 11 § 503(b) claims, these claims include amounts owed to approximately 500 of the Debtor's employees who were not paid in full for work performed during chapter 11, as well as claims of professionals employed under 11 U.S.C. § 1103 by the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors ("Committee") appointed by the United States Trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 1102. (Notice of Appointment of Creditors' Committee, App. at 173-74; Orders Authorizing Employment of Committee Professionals, App. at 193-96). Unlike Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson, the Committee's professionals received no retainers or payments for services rendered during the chapter 11 case.

Fredrikson) would each receive a pro rata distribution of approximately 14%.[8] If the as-yet unpaid portions of Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson's allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims share with the other unpaid chapter 11 administrative expense claimants, these Debtor professionals will ultimately receive even more of their claims than the 53%, 41%, and 24% respectively, they have received to date.[9]

In support of the Trustee's motion the Trustee and United States Trustee argued that, because Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson had received substantially more than a pro rata share of their chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims, disgorgement of these funds was mandatory to ensure compliance with § 726(b). (Mem. in Support of Motion for Disgorgement of Professional Payments, App. at 280-81, 297-98, 303-04, 308-09). The Trustee and United States Trustee further argued that a failure require to the return of the funds would create a "superpriority" status for estate professionals separate from other chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants, a status not grounded in [8] According to the Trustee Interim Report and Proposed Distribution filed on June 28, 2006, chapter 11 administrative expense claims will actually receive 17.3% with no disgorgement; if the funds are disgorged, the distribution will increase to 21.3%. (Trustee's Interim Report and Proposed Distribution, App. at 496-714).

[9] Based on the disbursement proposed in the Trustee Interim Report and Proposed Distribution filed on June 28, 2006, unless disgorgement is ordered Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson will ultimately receive distributions during the case totaling 62%, 51%, and 37% of their total allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims. (Trustee's Interim Report and Proposed Distribution, App. at 496-714).

any language of the Bankruptcy Code. Id. Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson opposed returning their disproportionate share to the Trustee.

A hearing was held on March 22, 2006, after which the bankruptcy court denied the motions. (Order Denying Motions to Refund Fees, App. at 715-22). In a reported decision,[10] the bankruptcy court held that neither § 726(b) nor any other Bankruptcy Code provision authorizes the Trustee to recover administrative expenses previously paid to Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson. Id. The bankruptcy court further held that the requested disgorgement was "patently inequitable," due in part to the millions of dollars in ordinary course payments made while the Debtor was in chapter 11. Id. at 720. The bankruptcy court highlighted this alleged inequity by noting that the Trustee had not sought to recover moneys paid during the chapter 11 case to the United States Trustee (for quarterly fees pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6)) and parties paid in the ordinary course of business (pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(c)). Id. at 721. Finally, the bankruptcy court decreed that a 3% increase in the distribution to allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants would be insignificant given the time expended by the parties during the case and the length of time that case has been pending. Id. at 722.

The United States Trustee appealed the bankruptcy court's ruling to this Court. (Notice of Appeal, App. at 723-24 and U.S. Trustee Election, App. at 726).

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

By allowing Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson to retain interim compensation on their allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims, the bankruptcy court has allowed them to receive distributions on their claims to date of 53%, 41%, and 24%, respectively. In so doing, the bankruptcy court essentially ruled that all other allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants should receive distribution of the 10% referenced in the Trustee's motion. This decision was erroneous as a matter of law, as it violated both the letter and intent of § 726(b).

The bankruptcy court's decision was also erroneous in that it creates a priority for the Debtor's professionals that is not supported by the Bankruptcy Code. In addition, the bankruptcy court was apparently swayed by equitable and policy considerations that should be left to Congress, not applied on a case-by-case basis by bankruptcy courts. Finally, the bankruptcy court's decision was based on erroneous interpretations of statutory provisions other than § 726(b).

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S DECISION IS CONTRARY TO THE PLAIN LANGUAGE OF § 726(b) AND CONGRESSIONAL INTENT

An analysis of the plain language of § 726(b) reveals that, in cases converted from chapter 11 to chapter 7, Congress mandated pro rata distribution among allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims that remain unpaid at the end of the chapter 7 case. As the bankruptcy court's decision failed to effect pro rata distribution among all outstanding allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims, it was erroneous as a matter of law and must be reversed.

A. Pro Rata Distribution is Mandatory in Light of the Statutory Language and Equal Distribution Objective of § 726(b)

1. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision is Contrary to the Plain Meaning of the Statutory Language

As this appeal involves the interpretation of § 726(b), this Court's analysis must begin with the language of the statute itself. See, e.g., United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 241 (1989). Section 726(b) provides that payments to claimants of similar priority "shall be made pro rata." 11 U.S.C. § 726(b) (emphasis added). Congress's use of the term "shall" in a statute "normally creates an obligation impervious to judicial discretion." Lexecon, Inc. v. Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach, 523 U.S. 26, 35 (1998). Thus, the bankruptcy court is afforded no discretion by § 726(b): All persons with allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims must receive the same percentage distribution on their claims. Any other interpretation of § 726(b) is invalid in light of the plain meaning of the statutory language.

In the only circuit court decision to have addressed the issue in this appeal, the Sixth Circuit found that "11 U.S.C. § 726(b) plainly mandates pro rata distribution of assets among creditors in the same statutory class." Specker Motor Sales Co. v. Eisen, 393 F.3d 659, 662 (6th Cir. 2004). The Sixth Circuit further found that "[t]he use of the word 'shall' with the pro rata requirement in § 726(b) indicates that such distribution is not discretionary." Id. The Sixth Circuit therefore ordered debtor's counsel to disgorge previously awarded interim compensation so that all chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants could receive the pro rata distribution mandated by § 726(b). Id. at 663-64.

As the bankruptcy court's decision ensures that chapter 11 administrative expense claimants will not share pro rata as mandated by § 726(b), it was erroneous as a matter of law and must be reversed.

2. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision is Contrary to the Intent of Congress

The Eighth Circcit has analyzed § 726(b) in another context, and has determined that the statutory language is unambiguous. Huisinga v. Carter (In re Juhl Enters., Inc.), 921 F.2d at 803. When a statute is unambiguous, "'the sole function of the courts is to enforce it according to its terms.'" United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. at 241 (quoting Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 485 (1917)). The only exceptions to the literal application of unambiguous statutory language are the "rare cases [in which] the literal application of a statute will produce a result demonstrably at odds with the intentions of its drafters," in which case Congress's intent controls. Griffin v. Oceanic Contractors, Inc., 485 U.S. 564, 571 (1982). Absent a clear indication that Congress intended differently, however, § 726(b) cannot be read to allow some chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants to receive a higher percentage of their claims than other similarly situated claimants.

The Supreme Court has stated that "[e]quality of distribution among creditors is a central policy of the Bankruptcy Code [according to which] creditors of equal priority should receive pro rata shares of the debtor's property." Begier v. Internal Revenue Service, 496 U.S. 53, 58 (1990) (citing § 726(b)). In light of "the equal distribution objective underlying the Bankruptcy Code," any question regarding the meaning of a Code provision "is best resolved in accord with the Bankruptcy Code's equal distribution aim." Howard Delivery Service, Inc. v. Zurich American Insurance Co., ___ U.S. ___, 126 S.Ct. 2105, 2116 (2006). The Eighth Circuit has reiterated that statutory provisions are not to be interpreted in such a way as to "undermine the carefully crafted equality-of-distribution scheme fundamental to the operation of the Bankruptcy Code." Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Magna Bank, N.A. (In re Hen House Interstate, Inc.), 177 F.3d 719, 723 (8th Cir. 1999) (en banc), aff'd sub nom, Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1 (2000).

Section 726(b) must therefore be interpreted so as to give effect to Congress's "equal distribution" intent. Indeed, in considering the issue before this Court, the Sixth Circuit found that "[e]quality of distribution would be vitiated if one equally situated administrative claimant – [debtor's counsel] – received more than his pro rata share." Specker Motor Sales Co. v. Eisen, 393 F.3d at 664.

Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson, along with over 750 other claimants, have outstanding chapter 11 administrative expense claims that have been allowed under § 503(b). According to the Trustee's motion, each of these claimants is entitled under § 726(b) to a distribution totaling approximately 14% of their claims. The bankruptcy court's decision, however, ensures that Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson will receive at least 53%, 41%, and 24% of their claims, respectively, while all other chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants will receive, according to the Trustee's motion, 10% of their claims. Indeed, if Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson share in this distribution as well, their total recovery will be 62%, 51%, and 37%, respectively – percentages that dwarf the recovery of their similarly-prioritized fellow chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants. The interpretation of § 726(b) urged by the United States Trustee would ensure that all similarly-situated claimants receive a pro rata distribution; this interpretation is not "demonstrably at odds with," but rather gives effect to, the intent of Congress. While the bankruptcy court's decision purports to be based on a literal interpretation of § 726(b), the decision is in fact demonstrably at odds with Congress's "equal distribution" intent. The bankruptcy court's decision is therefore based on an invalid interpretation of § 726(b) and must be reversed.

B. Disgorgement is Mandatory When Necessary to Effectuate the Equal Distribution Scheme Embodied in § 726(b)

The majority of courts have held that disgorgement of interim compensation at the end of a chapter 7 case is mandatory when necessary to effectuate the priority distribution scheme created by Congress. See, e.g., Specker Motor Sales Co. v. Eisen, 393 F.3d at 664 ("[W]e find that interim compensation must be disgorged when necessary to achieve pro rata distribution."); In re Lockwood Corp., 2006 WL 2038660 at *1 (Bankr. D. Neb. Apr.

26, 2006) ("The case law is clear that pro rata distribution among administrative claimants is mandated by § 726(b)[.]"); In re Chewning & Frey Security, Inc., 328 B.R. 899, 923 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2005) ("[T]he language of § 726 is mandatory, thereby preventing the Court from exercising discretion or contemplating the equities of the circumstances."); In re Saathoff, 2005 WL 1139893 at *2 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. Apr. 12, 2005) ("[F]ailure to order disgorgement would ignore the mandatory distributive provisions of the Bankruptcy Code," leaving the bankruptcy court with "no discretion to consider the equitable arguments offered by counsel[.]"); In re Kingston Turf Farms, Inc., 176 B.R. 308, 310 (Bankr. D.R.I. 1995) ("[D]isgorgement is required as a matter of law, just to adhere to the mandatory payment scheme of the Code, i.e. to ensure that all creditors of the same class share [pro rata] in the available pool of funds.").

The bankruptcy court's decision was based, in part, on its observation that § 726(b) does not expressly provide for the recovery of non-pro rata distributions. The absence of such an express provision should not, however, lead to a result that violates the core equal distribution principle embodied in § 726(b). If no mechanism exists to recover non-pro rata payments, then § 726(b) is reduced from a Congressional mandate to a mere aspiration. The bankruptcy court used Congress's silence as a lever to pry apart the tightly crafted distribution scheme embodied in § 726(b), but "[t]here is a basic difference between filling a gap left by Congress' silence and rewriting rules that Congress has affirmatively and specifically enacted." Mobil Oil Corp. v. Higginbotham, 436 U.S. 618, 625 (1978).

Congress's use of the word "shall" indicates that § 726(b) is no mere guideline; if at the end of the case the court finds that a non-pro rata distribution was made during the case, then it must be unmade. Any other interpretation of § 726(b) would read the word "shall" right out of the statute. Such legislation from the bench is not appropriate.

The Eighth Circuit has held that § 726 must be read so as to give effect to the clear meaning of the statute. In Stuart v. Carter (In re Larsen), 59 F.3d 783, 787 (8th Cir. 1995), the Eighth Circuit interpreted § 726(a)(1) as affording § 507(a) priority only to administrative expenses incurred in a pending case, but not to administrative expenses incurred in a prior case by the same debtor. Id. While the plain language of § 726 does not expressly contain such a qualification, the Eighth Circuit interpreted the statute in that manner so as to give effect to the plain statutory language and "the overarching objective of creditor equality" embodied in § 726. Id. Similarly, in the instant appeal the Eighth Circuit could be expected to interpret § 726(b) so as to require disgorgement to the extent necessary to give effect to the statute's letter and intent.

Even if authority to disgorge is not found within § 726(b), the bankruptcy court is certainly empowered by 11 U.S.C. § 105(a) ("§ 105(a)") to "issue any order, process, or judgment that is necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of [the Bankruptcy Code]." Whether under § 726(b) or § 105(a), courts have found the power to order disgorgement where necessary to effect the equal distribution intent of § 726(b). See, e.g., Matz v. Hoseman, 197 B.R. 635, 640 (N.D. Ill. 1996) ("Regardless of whether this authority stems from 11 U.S.C. § 105 . . . or is simply an inherent power of the court in its effort to effectuate the distribution scheme outlined by § 726(b) . . . it is without cavil that the bankruptcy court has the power to disgorge interim professional fees."); Shaia v. Durrette, Irvin, Lemons & Bradshaw, P.C. (In re Metropolitan Elec. Supply Corp.), 185 B.R. 505, 512 (Bankr. E.D. Va. 1995) ("[W]hile § 726(b) does not specifically permit the Court to require disgorgement, the authority for that action is found in 11 U.S.C. § 105."); Guinee v. Toombs (In re Kearing), 170 B.R. 1, 7 (Bankr. D.D.C. 1994) ("Although section 726(b) does not specifically authorize the recapture of administrative payments made pursuant to orders allowing the payment of interim compensation, such authority can be found in section 105.").

Without recourse to disgorgement, § 726(b) would be rendered toothless, despite Congress's clear intent to mandate pro rata distribution among similar claimants. As the bankruptcy court's interpretation of § 726(b) precludes the recovery of non-pro rata distributions, it is erroneous as a matter of law and must be reversed.

C. The Bankruptcy Court's Interpretation of § 726(b) Changes the Priorities Established by Congress

The bankruptcy court's decision was based, in part, on its impression that the United States Trustee's interpretation of § 726(b) unfairly singled out the Debtor's professionals for disparate treatment. This impression was mistaken, as the United States Trustee seeks only to ensure equal distribution among all those with allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) claims. The Trustee's motion only addressed professionals because only professionals received partial payment on their chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims. In fact, the Trustee's motion was not unfairly aimed at professionals as a group, as the professionals employed by the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors would benefit from the Trustee's motion.

Indeed the bankruptcy court's decision treats the Debtor's professionals differently than similarly prioritized claimants, as it has allowed Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson to receive to date 53%, 41%, and 24%, respectively – amounts that dwarf the expected distribution to all other allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) claims. Such a decision is not only wrong as matter of law; it is patently inequitable.

The bankruptcy court's decision essentially creates a superpriority for the debtor's professionals. See Specker Motor Sales Co. v. Eisen, 393 F.3d at 664 ("failure to order disgorgement gives interim compensation superpriority"); Shaia v. Durrette, Irvin, Lemons & Bradshaw, P.C. (In re Metropolitan Elec. Supply Corp.), 185 B.R. at 512 ("To the extent [debtor's professionals] retain amounts in excess of that intended by § 726(b), they are granting themselves a superpriority over other administrative claimants."). No statutory justification exists for allowing the Debtor's professionals to receive far more of their claims than similarly-situated claimants. That their interim compensation was paid pursuant to § 331 is no reason to allow them to keep their excessive distribution, as interim compensation is always subject to final approval at the conclusion of a case. See 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(5); see, e.g., In re Regan, 135 B.R. 216, 218 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1992) ("Interim allowances under the Bankruptcy Code remains [sic] a payment on account of an ultimate final allowance, in order that the administration of a debtor's estate may be carried on. Final allowances under Section 330 . . . are ordinarily to be determined at the conclusion of the case, since only then is a thorough analysis of the various factors enumerated in Section 330 possible.") (emphasis added).

Unlike Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson, most chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claimants in this case could not receive advances on their claims in the form of § 331 interim compensation. Most administrative expense claimants have had to wait since 1997 to receive any distribution on their chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims, and now the bankruptcy court has effectively told them that they will receive only the 10% distribution referred to in the Trustee's motion. On the other hand, the Debtor's professionals, who received interim payments while the other claimants were forced to wait, seek to retain several times that amount on their identically prioritized claims.[11]

The Supreme Court has stated that "preferential treatment of a class of creditors is in order only when clearly authorized by Congress." Howard Delivery Service, Inc. v. Zurich American Insurance Co., ___ U.S. ___, 126 S.Ct. at 2109 (emphasis added). As a result, statutory provisions establishing priority among claimants "must be tightly construed." Id. at 2116. In addition, the Eighth Circuit has stated that "as a matter of policy, statutory priorities should be strictly construed in the bankruptcy context[.]"

[11] Although some of the holders of allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) administrative expense claims may have received payment on pre-petition unsecured claims, that is irrelevant. Section 726(b) only requires pro-rata distribution among the last class of claims to receive payment, which in this case is chapter 11 administrative expense claims allowed under § 503(b). No other claims enter into the calculus.

Northwest Financial Express, Inc. v. JWD, Inc. (In re Northwest Financial Express, Inc.), 950 F.2d 561, 563 (8th Cir. 1991). As the bankruptcy court created a new distribution scheme in which the Debtor's professionals are preferred, its decision violated the priority distribution scheme created by Congress, and constitutes an error of law that must be reversed.

D. Policy Considerations Cannot be Used to Circumvent the Plain Meaning of the Statutory Language

In drafting the Bankruptcy Code, Congress balanced policy considerations related to the deference to be accorded certain claims and expenses with policy considerations regarding the fair and equitable distribution of bankruptcy estates. The result, embodied in § 726(b), was a system for liquidating chapter 7 cases that ranks expenses and claims by class and systematically distributes estate funds to each class in order of priority, but provides for pro rata payment within a class that cannot be paid in full.

While policy or equitable arguments might be advanced in favor of a non-literal application of § 726(b), courts must presume that Congress took all relevant equitable and policy considerations into account when drafting § 726(b). As the Eighth Circuit has held, "[p]olicy considerations and equitable concerns . . . are impermissible bases for statutory interpretation when, as here, the language of the statute is clear and unambiguous." Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Magna Bank, N.A. (In re Hen House Interstate, Inc.), 177 F.3d 719, 723 (8th Cir. 1999) (en banc), aff'd sub nom, Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1 (2000). In addition, while some may think § 726(b) produces an inequitable result, the courts are not "licensed to attempt to soften the clear import of Congress' chosen words whenever [they] believe those words lead to a harsh result." United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84, 95 (1985). Thus, "[i]f Congress enacted into law something different from what it intended, then it should amend the statute to conform it to its intent." Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 541 (2004).

Indeed, Congress recently overhauled the Bankruptcy Code as part of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, and it presumably was aware of the Sixth Circuit's Specker decision and similar cases mandating disgorgement to ensure pro rata distribution. That Congress made no changes to § 726(b) indicates that Congress saw no need to soften the mandatory language of § 726(b) or to otherwise clarify that disgorgement is not available to assist in carrying out the required pro rata distribution.

The bankruptcy court's decision was also based, in part, on the court's apparent conclusion that a 10% distribution is just as good as a 14% distribution to the chapter 11 administrative expense claimants in this case. The unpaid administrative expense claimants include truck drivers and other employees to whom several thousand dollars could make a world of difference. The bankruptcy court was apparently upset by the age of the case, but these administrative expense claimants have been more affected than anyone by waiting since 1997 for payment. The bankruptcy court cited no case to support its determination that the difference between 10% and 14% is immaterial as a matter of law. Furthermore, as a matter of policy it hardly seems appropriate to favor the interests of professionals, who undertook employment in this case fully aware of the risks of nonpayment, over those of truck drivers who stayed on the job with a reasonable expectation that their wages would be paid.

To the extent that the bankruptcy court was swayed by policy and equitable considerations, its decision was an error of law that should be reversed.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S ANALYSIS OF OTHER STATUTORY PROVISIONS IS ERRONEOUS

The bankruptcy court's decision was based not only on its misinterpretation of § 726(b), but also on its misinterpretation of several other statutory provisions. For example, the bankruptcy court did not seem to appreciate what constitutes an "allowed § 503(b) claim" for § 726(b) purposes. The bankruptcy court suggested that Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson "do not hold administrative expenses" for the claims on which they received interim compensation, despite the fact that they have yet to receive final payment on their compensation awards (which were awarded under § 330, and are thus currently outstanding § 503(b)(2) claims). Similarly, the bankruptcy court suggested that payments made in the ordinary course and quarterly fees paid to the United States Trustee were "chapter 11 administrative expenses," despite the fact that such payments are not "allowed" administrative expense claims under § 503(b), and thus have nothing to do with a § 726(b) analysis. In light of the bankruptcy court's mistakes regarding the applicability of other statutory provisions, its decision was erroneous as a matter of law, and must be reversed.

A. Section 541 Cannot be Read in Such a Way as to Render § 726(b) a Nullity

The bankruptcy court viewed the Trustee's motion as an attempt to bring property into the estate in contravention of 11 U.S.C. § 541 ("§ 541"). In re Hyman Freightways, Inc., 342 B.R. at 579. In actuality, the Trustee's motion was an attempt to ensure that estate property is distributed in the way Congress mandated in § 726(b). There can be no question that, when the interim compensation requests were granted, the retainers used to pay them were property of the estate.[12] See, e.g., In re Brick Hearth Pizza, Inc., 302 B.R. 877, 883 (Bankr. D. Minn. 2003); In re Fitzsimmons Trucking, Inc., 124 B.R. 556, 560 (Bankr. D. Minn. 1991). "In any event . . . the characterization of an interim fee payment as a 'retainer' does not magically protect it from disgorgement." Matz v. Hoseman, 197 B.R. at 641 n.8.

Section 726(b) governs the distribution of property of the estate. If, during the administration of the estate, property of the estate was distributed in a way that violates § 726(b), that property must be subject to recovery by the Trustee. The bankruptcy court's juxtaposition of §§ 541 and 726(b) would emasculate § 726(b); the only way the bankruptcy court's analysis is correct is if § 726(b) is read to mean "payments of estate property shall be made pro rata, unless they have already been made some other way." Fundamental tenets of statutory construction require that a statutory provision must not be interpreted so as to render another statutory provision a nullity. Cf. United Sav. Ass'n of Texas v. Timbers of Inwood Forest Assocs., Ltd., 484 U.S. 365, 375 (1988) (rejecting interpretation of one Bankruptcy Code provision when it would render another provision "a practical nullity and a theoretical absurdity"). The bankruptcy court cited no case supporting its interpretation of § 541. For the foregoing reasons, the court's reliance on that statute was an error of law.

B. Section 549 is Not Relevant to a § 726(b) Analysis

The bankruptcy court also stated that, as 11 U.S.C. § 549 ("§ 549") does not allow the Trustee to recover the payments made to Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson, "the negative implication . . . is that postpetition payments authorized by the court or the Code are not recoverable by the trustee." In re Hyman Freightways, Inc., 342 B.R. at 579. This assertion is false as a matter of statutory interpretation, as § 549 by its terms addresses only certain unauthorized post-petition transfers that a trustee "may" avoid. It does not prohibit the trustee from recovering post-petition transfers that were authorized, but that are subsequently found to have been unlawful or inequitable. In addition, unlike § 549, which is a general statute pursuant to which a trustee "may" act, § 726(b) specifically mandates what a trustee "shall" do. As a result, § 549 cannot preclude the Trustee from carrying out the § 726(b) mandate. Cf. Guidry v. Sheet Metal Workers Nat'l

Pension Fund, 493 U.S. 365, 375 (1990) ("It is an elementary tenet of statutory construction that where there is no clear intention otherwise, a specific statute will not be controlled or nullified by a general one.") (internal quotations omitted). In any event, there is no suggestion in the Bankruptcy Code, legislative history, or case law that § 549 is relevant to a § 726(b) analysis. See, e.g., Matz v. Hoseman, 197 B.R. at 640 (§ 549 not applicable where subject matter of dispute is court-authorized professional compensation, not avoidable transfer); Shaia v. Durrette, Irvin, Lemons & Bradshaw, P.C. (In re Metropolitan Elec. Supply Corp.), 185 B.R. at 511 (same). The bankruptcy court cited no case supporting its interpretation of § 549. For the foregoing reasons, the court's reliance on that statute was an error of law.

C. Section 363(c) Ordinary Course Payments are Not "Allowed § 503(b) Claims"

The bankruptcy court also suggested that ordinary course transactions under 11 U.S.C. § 363(c) ("§ 363(c)") result in "chapter 11 administrative expenses" of a kind that share pro rata with allowed § 503(b) claims under § 726(b). In re Hyman Freightways, Inc., 342 B.R. at 579. This fundamentally misstates the nature of the allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) claims to which § 726(b) applies.

Pursuant to § 726(b), "[p]ayment on claims of a kind specified in [§ 507(a)(1)] shall be made pro rata." 11 U.S.C. § 726(b) (emphasis added). Section 507(a)(1), in turn, specifies only the following claims: "administrative expenses allowed under [§ 503(b)], and any fees and charges assessed against the estate under chapter 123 of title 28." 11

U.S.C. § 507(a)(1) (emphasis added). Section 503(b) lists several administrative expenses, all of which are "allowed" only "[a]fter notice and a hearing." After conversion of a case from chapter 11 to chapter 7, § 726(b) subordinates "a claim allowed under [§ 503(b)]" for chapter 11 administrative expenses to "a claim allowed under [§ 503(b)]" for chapter 7 administrative expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 726(b) (emphasis added).

Thus, at the end of a chapter 7 case, when the trustee is required to distribute money derived from the liquidation of estate assets, § 726(b) mandates distribution pro rata among all outstanding claims that have been allowed administrative expense status after a noticed hearing. Anything that is not a "claim" at the end of the case, or was not "allowed" under § 503(b), does not enter into the § 726(b) calculus for determining pro rata distribution.

Unlike § 503(b) administrative expense claims, § 363(c) ordinary course payments (i) are made under § 363(c) and 11 U.S.C. § 1108, not § 503(b); (ii) are made without court approval, and without notice and a hearing; and (iii) are fully satisfied upon payment, so they do not result in a "right to payment." The recipients of ordinary course payments therefore never have "claims" as defined in 11 U.S.C. § 101(5). Thus, while ordinary course payments are authorized by the Bankruptcy Code, they are not "allowed § 503(b) claims." If, upon conversion to chapter 7, an obligation that arose in the ordinary course of business has not yet been paid, then pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 348 the unpaid amount – and only the unpaid amount – becomes a general unsecured claim (unless it is the kind of claim specified in § 503(b), in which case it remains a chapter 11 administrative expense claim).

As they are not "allowed § 503(b) claims," ordinary course payments made under § 363(c) have no place in a § 726(b) pro rata distribution analysis. See, e.g., In re Lochmiller Indus. Inc., 178 B.R. 241, 249 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1995) ("disgorgement may not be had of claimants paid in the ordinary course"); Guinee v. Toombs (In re Kearing), 170 B.R. at 7 (same). As a result, the bankruptcy court erred to the extent its decision was based on the Trustee's decision not to seek disgorgement from "suppliers and other vendors, providers of services, [and] employees." In re Hyman Freightways, Inc., 342 B.R. at 580.

D. Quarterly Fees Payable to the United States Trustee Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) are Not Allowed § 503(b) Claims

Similarly, the bankruptcy court expressly stated that disgorgement by the Debtor's professionals would be inequitable given that the Trustee had not sought disgorgement from "the United States Trustee." In re Hyman Freightways, Inc., 342 B.R. at 580. The Eighth Circuit, however, has rejected the argument that everything paid during the chapter 11 portion of a case constitutes a "chapter 11 administrative expense claim" under § 503(b) subject to the priority distribution scheme of § 726(b): "The bankruptcy court's attempt to lump the [United States] Trustee's payments with [debtor's counsel's] Chapter 11 legal expenses on the basis of their common origin in a Chapter 11 proceeding finds no support in the statutes." See Huisinga v. Carter (In re Juhl Enterprises, Inc.), 921 F.2d 800, 803 (8th Cir. 1990).

As they arise under chapter 23 of title 28, quarterly fees payable to the United States Trustee under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) share first priority under § 507(a) with – but are distinct from – § 503(b) administrative expense claims. Id. As quarterly fees are not § 503(b) claims, the Eighth Circuit held that in a converted case they share pro rata with chapter 7 § 503(b) claims, not with chapter 11 § 503(b) claims. Id. Thus, in the instant case, any unpaid quarterly fees will be paid in full along with chapter 7 administrative claims. As a result, disgorgement of previously paid quarterly fees is not relevant, and the bankruptcy court erred to the extent it based its decision on the Trustee's failure to seek to recover previously paid quarterly fees.

E. Sections 329 and 330 are Not the Sole Bases For Disgorgement

The bankruptcy court suggested that 11 U.S.C. § 329 and § 330 are the only vehicles pursuant to which disgorgement may be ordered from the Debtor's professionals. In re Hyman Freightways, Inc., 342 B.R. at 579-80. Those provisions afford the bankruptcy court discretion to order disgorgement where the professional has been paid an amount that exceeds the value of its services. Such discretionary disgorgement is distinguishable from the disgorgement sought by the Trustee's motion, which is mandated by Congress's intent to ensure a fair division of estate assets.

Under the bankruptcy court's interpretation, disgorgement may only be had when the professional receives interim compensation that "exceeded the reasonable value of the total services." Id. at 580. Bankruptcy courts, however, do not limit disgorgement to cases under §§ 329 and 330. See, e.g., In re Wilson-Seafresh, Inc., 263 B.R. 624, 631 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 2001) (directing disgorgement to fund payment to claimant with a 11 U.S.C. § 507(b) superpriority); Tate v. NationsBanc Mortgage Corp. (In re Tate), 253 B.R. 653, 669 (Bankr. W.D.N.C. 2000) (directing disgorgement of unreasonable 11 U.S.C. § 506(b) secured creditor attorney's fee).

As the bankruptcy court clearly had the power under § 105(a) to order disgorgement where necessary to carry out the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code that do not expressly refer to disgorgement, its decision was erroneous as a matter of law and must be reversed.

F. Payment of Interim Compensation Under § 331 Does Not Mean Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson Have no "Claims" for § 726(b) Purposes

The bankruptcy court also stated that, to the extent Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson received payment on their interim compensation awards, they "do not hold administrative expenses." In re Hyman Freightways, Inc., 342 B.R. at 579. All professional compensation is awarded under § 330, however; § 331 only permits interim payment of § 330 awards. As the Eighth Circuit has noted, "Section 503(b)(2) provides that compensation awarded under § 330(a) 'shall be allowed administrative expenses.'" In re Farmland Indus., Inc., 397 F.3d at 651.

Even if the awards to Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson were not expressly styled "interim" awards, it would not matter. The only way professionals can receive payment of their allowed chapter 11 § 503(b) claims before the end of the case is through § 331 – otherwise, they would have to wait until the end of the case like everyone else. As they received payment before the end of the case, the payments had to have been made pursuant to § 331 whether they were styled as such or not. See, e.g., Stumpf v. Creel & Atwood, P.C. (In re Lockwood Corp.), 216 B.R. 628, 637 (Bankr. D. Neb. 1997); Shaia v. Durrette, Irvin, Lemons & Bradshaw, P.C. (In re Metropolitan Elec. Supply Corp.), 185 B.R. at 510.

As interim compensation is always subject to disgorgement until the end of the case, Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson have outstanding § 330 claims, and thus have outstanding § 503(b)(2) claims until they receive their final payment. See United States Trustee v. Johnston, 189 B.R. 676, 677-78 (N.D. Miss. 1995) (rejecting argument that interim compensation award is paid in full, and thus no longer a "claim," as interim award "is not final and is therefore reviewable at any time before the case is ultimately closed"). As insufficient funds exist to pay Merical, Kalina, and Fredrikson's § 330 awards in full, the entire amount of their awards must be added into the § 726(b) pro rata calculation.

This treatment of professionals differs from the treatment of claimants who received payments from the Debtor in the ordinary course of its business but got stuck with an unpaid bill upon conversion to chapter 7. Ordinary course payments are not "allowed" under § 503(b), while professional compensation awards are allowed under § 503(b). Any changes to this statutory construct must be made by Congress, not by courts on a case-by-case basis.

CONCLUSION

For all of the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the Bankruptcy Court's decision be reversed.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A federal district court has jurisdiction to review decisions of a bankruptcy court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §158(a). Orders on employment and disqualification of professionals are reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re CIC Investment Corporation, 175 B.R. 52, 53 (9th Cir.BAP 1994). A bankruptcy court's disallowance of attorney's fees is reviewed for abuse of discretion. In re Mednet, 251 B.R. 103, 106 (9th Cir. BAP 2000). A court abuses its discretion when the record contains no evidence to support its decision. MGIC Indemnity Corp. v. Moore, 952 F.2d 1120, 1122 (9th Cir. 1991).

____Findings are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard. Fed.R.Bankr.P. 8013.

III.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND RELEVANT FACTS

Appellant appeals the bankruptcy court's decision that revoked its order appointing Appellant as counsel for the Debtors, denied allowance of all fees, and ordered disgorgement of Appellant's $25,000 retainer. The court's order was based on Appellant's series of conflicting disclosures regarding the terms of employment, particularly whether the $25,000 retainer had been kept intact or used to pay for pre-petition debt owed by Debtors to counsel. Frustrated by counsel's lack of candor and finding that counsel had not adequately disclosed the disposition of the retainer and lacking evidence to the contrary, the court disqualified counsel, vacated the order employing them and denied them all fees.

Max Robert Moses, MD and Marlene Ellen Moses, (“Moses” or “Debtors”), husband and wife, filed their voluntary Chapter 11 petition on March 9, 2001. E.R.,[1] 2. An employment application seeking court approval for the employment of Lon B. Isaacson Associates to represent the Debtors in their bankruptcy proceeding was filed on March 22, 2001. E.R., 4. The employment application did not make reference to or include a copy of any written retainer agreement entered into by Appellant and the Debtors.

The supporting declaration of Appellant in that employment application disclosed that within one year of the Debtors’ Chapter 11 filing, the firm has been paid a total of $25,000 of which $8,336.08 was applied as a Chapter 11 retainer and $16,663.92 had been applied for pre-filing legal services and costs. E.R.,

4, page 10, ¶4.

On April 26, 2001, the bankruptcy court entered its order authorizing the employment of Lon B. Isaacson Associates as counsel for the Debtors and Debtors-in-Possession. E.R., 6.

The Debtors' Chapter 11 petition was ultimately dismissed by an order entered on July 3, 2002 because the only plan of reorganization the Debtors were willing to propose was unconfirmable. E.R., 25.

On June 26, 2002, prior to the entry of the order dismissing the Debtors' Chapter 11 case, Appellant filed its request for final fees pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §330, requesting allowance and authorization for payment of fees and costs incurred pre-petition as well as post-petition.[2] E.R., 26. In Appellant's initial fee application, Appellant indicated that the Debtors had paid to date, $25,000 for pre- and post-petition Chapter 11 work. E.R. 26, page 13, lines 17 and 18. The declaration filed in support of Appellant's fee application reflected that the Debtors had written to Appellant requesting a refund of a portion of the $25,000 true retainer. E.R. 26, page 19, ¶3.

[2] Appellant's initial fee application requested $61,634.50. E.R., 26, page 16. Subsequently, Appellant filed a fee application identifying the firm's post-petition fees and costs as $44,326.98. E.R., 30, page 5, lines 12 to 16. In a supplemental pleading, Appellant requested that the bankruptcy court confine its ruling to post-petition fees. E.R., 33, page 9, line 21. Such request was consistent with the firm's order of employment entered by the Court that compensation would be fixed by the Court for post-filing fees and costs. E.R., 6, page 2.

Appellant subsequently amended its final fee application requesting allowance and authorization for payment of additional post-petition fees and costs. E.R., 30, pages 5 and 6. See also E.R., 33, page 23, ¶11. The United States Trustee filed objections to Appellant's fee application. E.R., 27. See also E.R., 31. The Debtors also filed their objections to Appellant's fee application. E.R., 28. Included in Debtors' objection, was their request to the bankruptcy court that it disregard their retainer agreement with the Appellant; this being the first reference that a retainer agreement had been entered into between the Debtors and the Appellant. E.R., 28, page 8, lines 20 and 21. Also included in the Debtors' objection was a copy of a June 4, 2002 letter addressed by Appellant to the Debtors stating that the firm would not refund any portion of the true retainer previously paid to the firm based on the Debtors’ agreement in that retainer agreement that the $25,000 true retainer was non-refundable and was earned upon receipt by the firm. E.R., 28, Exhibit A.

In addition, Appellant’s response to the objections filed by the United States Trustee suggested that the court simply reduce from the $25,000 retainer received by the firm, its fees incurred pre-petition in calculating the amount to award to the firm for post-petition services. E.R., 29, page 3, ¶5. The response also indicated that Appellant reserved its rights to calculate the pre-petition costs to be reduced from the $25,000 retainer. E.R., 29, page 3, ¶5.

Based on the above, the United States Trustee added in its supplemental objection to Appellant’s request for fees and expenses that Appellant’s revelations suggested that the firm had not drawn down on its pre-petition retainer for fees and costs incurred prior to the filing of the Debtors’ Chapter 11 petition, thereby raising the issue of Appellant’s lack of disinterestedness.[3]. E.R. 31. See also E.R. 36, Exhibit C, page 4, ¶3.

The hearing on Appellant's final fee application was continued a number of times for various reasons. Appellant's response filed on September 4, 2002 further stated that Appellant had maintained intact the $25,000 retainer and that the firm would "gladly deduct from the $25,000 retainer the sums earned pre-petition". E.R., 33, page 22, ¶8. See also E.R., 33, page 9, lines 21 to 23. Ultimately, the United States Trustee filed her motion to disqualify counsel and for disgorgement of the retainer paid to Appellant. E.R., 36.

In Appellant's opposition to the United States Trustee's motion to disqualify the firm, the firm acknowledged that it had initially treated the $25,000 retainer paid by the Debtors as a true retainer, earned [3] Appellant's various declarations submitted in support of its fee application revealed for the first time that at the time the bankruptcy petition was filed, Appellant had not drawn down on its retainer for pre-petition fees incurred. As a result, on the date the petition was filed, Appellant was a creditor of the debtor and therefore not disinterested and not eligible to be employed as general counsel. E.R., 29, page 3, ¶5. See also E.R., 33, page 22, ¶8.

upon receipt and non-refundable. E.R., 37. Thereafter, Appellant argued that on or about the date of the Debtors’ Chapter 11 filing in March 2001, the firm waived the provisions of the initial retainer agreement requiring that the $25,000 retainer be treated as a true retainer and applied the fees incurred pre-petition against the retainer leaving a balance of $8,336.08 as the Chapter 11 pre-petition retainer. Neither the above history regarding Appellant’s treatment of the $25,000 initial retainer nor a copy of the firm’s retainer agreement which also was attached in Appellant’s opposition to the United States Trustee’s motion to disqualify the firm had been previously revealed to the bankruptcy court. The firm also argued that it had consistently waived the true retainer provision of its contract with the Debtors. E.R., 37, page 9, line 16. In reply to Appellant’s opposition, the United States Trustee directed the bankruptcy court’s attention to Appellant’s June 4, 2002 letter to the Debtors addressing their insistence upon a refund. In that letter, Appellant sternly reminded the Debtors that they had agreed that the $25,000 retainer was a true retainer, earned upon receipt by the firm and non-refundable. This position clearly was inapposite to the firm's contention that a novation had occurred over a year earlier. E.R., 38, page 3, lines 4 to 23. A subsequent surreply was filed by Appellant which tried in vain to explain away the June 4, 2002 letter. E.R., 39. At the final hearing on the U.S. Trustee's motion to disqualify the firm, the bankruptcy court pointed to the inconsistent pleadings and positions taken by Appellant in addressing the United States Trustee's motion. E.R., 40. Moreover, Appellant, in responding to how the firm treated the proceeds of the $25,000 retainer, represented at one point that the entire $25,000 had initially been deposited into the firm's general account and that the firm had no accounting to reflect drawdowns. Yet, later on, Appellant represented to the bankruptcy court that $8,336.00 was put into trust when the Chapter 11 was filed. E.R., 40, pages 38, 39, and 53. The bankruptcy court further noted the failure of Appellant to submit bank statements which would have objectively demonstrated exactly how the firm treated the $25,000.00 retainer on the date of the Debtors' bankruptcy filing. E.R.,40, page 6, lines 20 to 25.

The bankruptcy court ultimately granted the United States Trustee's motion to disqualify counsel and vacated Appellant's order of employment. The Court also ordered disgorgement of Appellant's entire retainer of $25,000 because Appellant failed to demonstrate adequately that it was not a creditor on the date of filing and therefore not disinterested as required by 11 U.S.C. §327. Furthermore, the bankruptcy court cited to Appellant's lack of adequate disclosure of the terms of its employment in its employment application. E.R., 42. See also E.R., 40, pages 55 and 56.

After vacating the order granting Appellant's employment, the bankruptcy court then denied Appellant's application for final fees and reimbursement of expenses. E.R., 41. See also E.R., 40, page 56 and 57. Because the court had vacated the order authorizing Appellant's employment, Appellant was no longer eligible to be paid fees pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330.

Two orders were prepared in accordance with the bankruptcy court’s rulings. One order denied the application for final fees and expenses, entered on November 1, 2002, and a second order finding that Appellant was disqualified from representing the Debtors, vacated the order granting Appellant’s employment and ordered disgorgement of the $25,000 retainer. This order was entered on November 4, 2002.

Appellant filed a motion to reconsider the order vacating employment on November 8, 2002. E.R., 43. The court denied the reconsideration motion by order entered on February 21, 2003. E.R., 55.

IV. ARGUMENT

A. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN DENYING FEES BECAUSE OF THE LACK OF ADEQUATE DISCLOSURE AND OMISSION OF APPELLANT’S RETENTION AGREEMENT WITH DEBTORS.

Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure 2014 requires, in pertinent part, disclosure of a professional’s proposed arrangement for compensation. Coy or incomplete disclosures which require the bankruptcy court to ferret out pertinent information from other sources are not sufficient. Full and complete disclosure includes disclosure of all the details of fee arrangements with the debtor so the court can assess conflicts that may give rise to disqualification. In re Independent Engineering Co., Inc., 232 B.R. 529 (1st Cir.BAP 1999) aff'd 197 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 1999). Courts have long recognized that failure to disclose the terms of one's employment, including the nature of the fee arrangement with the debtor, is a sufficient basis for disqualification or disgorgement. Id. at 532. See also, In re Park-Helena Corp., 63 F.3d 877 (9th Cir. 1995), In re Downs, 103 F.3d 472 (6th Cir. 1996).

In this case, many of the terms of Appellant's retention agreement with the Debtors were not included or revealed to the bankruptcy court in Appellant's employment application. E.R., 38, pages 4 to 6. Appellant erroneously claims the retainer agreement terms did not need to be included. E.R., 39, pages 2 to 4 and 7 to 12. The omissions included the following provisions:

1) assignment of the Debtors' case to attorneys not affiliated with the firm[4],

2) lien rights and receiving a general power of attorney,[5] and

3) post-petition retainers.[6]

[4] Retainer language states:

You agree to allow our firm the right to assign your case or matter (or any portion thereof) to any attorney licensed to practice law in California, including but not limited to temporary attorneys and independent contractor attorneys not affiliated with our firm. Our case load and (sic) is such that Mr. Isaacson or any regularly assigned affiliated attorney may be unavailable to try or work on your case, in which event you grant us sole authority to select any attorney we deem appropriate to your representational or legal service needs. E.R., 37, Exhibit "1" thereto.

[5] Retainer language states:

Client agrees that our firm shall have a lien for services rendered and costs advanced on any sums recovered whether by way of settlement or judgment on the account of the aforesaid matters of client. Client grants firm and Lon B. Isaacson a General Power of Attorney and instructs the firm to use that power to execute any check, payment instrument or document as the firm determines appropriate, whether to protect its interest or the client's, or both. E.R., 37, Exhibit "1" thereto.

[6] Retainer language states:

. . . As we work on your matter, and both the hours we expend and the hours we project will be consumed, become known or anticipated, you grant us the authority to fix, charge and collect another retainer (and yet further other retainers as appropriate) from you. . . . E.R., 37, Exhibit "1" thereto.

The existence of these undisclosed provisions and others demonstrate Appellant's lack of candor with the court. See also E.R., 40, pages 41 to 43.

Appellant urged the bankruptcy court to accept its explanation that it had clearly disclosed in its initial employment application that the firm would retain sole discretion to assign attorneys employed by and supervised by the firm to make appearances on behalf of the firm and that the provision regarding assignment of the Debtors' case to other attorneys set forth in the retainer agreement clearly reflected that intent. E.R., 39, pages 2 and 3. However, a plain reading of the retainer agreement does not clarify or suggest the explanation provided. E.R., 37, Exhibit "1" thereto. See also E.R., 40, pages 10 and 11. Appellant then argued that the other disclosure deficiencies resulted in "no harm, no foul" to the administration of the estate as these provisions were never effectuated. E.R., 39, pages 3 and 4. Unfortunately for Appellant, "no harm, no foul" is not the standard used by the courts.

More importantly, Appellant's initial disclosure did not disclose the fact that it had not been paid for its prepetition work because it had not drawn down on its prepetition retainer.

Appellant described in its employment application that Debtors had provided a $25,000 retainer of which $16,663.92 had been applied for pre-filing legal services and costs with $8,336.08 retainer remaining. E.R., 4, page 10, ¶4. As set forth in Appellant’s subsequent pleadings, this assertion was apparently not true. E.R., 33, page 22, ¶8. See also E.R., 33, page 9, lines 21 to 23. Nonetheless, because of the assertion that Appellant had been paid its prepetition claim, Debtors’ request to employ Appellant was granted by entered order dated April 26, 2001.

Prior to the entry of the order dismissing the Debtors’ case on July 3, 2002, Appellant filed an application requesting court approval of fees and reimbursement of expenses. In response to an objection raised by the Office of the United States Trustee to Appellant’s fee application, Appellant revealed for the first time that it had maintained intact the full amount of the $25,000 retainer and in turn would deduct the sums earned pre-petition to the extent the bankruptcy court was inclined to limit its review of Appellant's fee application to post-petition fees and expenses. E.R., 33, page 22, ¶8. See also E.R., 33, page 9, lines 21 to 23.

Based on Appellant's new representation that it had not drawn down on its pre-petition retainer for services rendered prior to the filing of the Debtors' bankruptcy petition, the United States Trustee filed her motion to disqualify Appellant as Debtors' bankruptcy counsel.

Subsequent papers filed by Appellant indicated that Appellant had initially entered into an agreement with the Debtors characterizing the $25,000 retainer as "earned upon receipt" and "non-refundable," what Appellant deemed a "true retainer." E.R., 37, page 15, ¶2. Appellant later argued in the bankruptcy court that through a novation occurring at or about the date of Debtors' chapter 11 filing, the earlier agreement had been changed and that Appellant had re-characterized the retainer as a general retainer and had reduced the amount of the retainer received by $16,663.92 for pre-petition fees incurred and earmarked the remainder of $8,336.08 to be applied for post-petition bankruptcy services. E.R., 37, pages 15 and 16, ¶3 and 5. See also E.R., 40, pages 17 and 18. Nowhere in Appellant's employment application did Appellant disclose the history of Appellant's financial arrangement with the Debtors. Only after inquiry by the bankruptcy court did Appellant attempt to explain the history -explanations which are self-contradictory. E.R., 40.

As the bankruptcy court correctly pointed out ". . what needs to happen is that counsel disclose every element of the employment arrangement, and the Court can determine what's important and what is not important." E.R. 40, p. 4. Truthful disclosure is required because it is ultimately the court that must determine the propriety of employment of a professional. In re Park-Helena Corp. at 880 ("To facilitate the court's policing responsibilities, the Bankruptcy Code and Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure impose several disclosure requirements on attorneys who seek to represent a debtor and who seek to recover fees.") See also 11 U.S.C. §327.

At no time has Appellant fully disclosed the required information. In response to the United States Trustee's motion to disqualify Appellant as Debtors' bankruptcy counsel, Appellant indicated that $8,336.08 of the initial $25,000 retainer received from the Debtor was held in trust for post-petition services. E.R., 40, page 53, lines 23 to 25. Contrarily, at other times Appellant argued that the entire retainer had been deposited into Appellant's general account[7] and that no monies were ever segregated in the firm's trust account. E.R., 37, page 6, lines 11 to 15. At yet other times, Appellant seemingly retreated back to characterizing the retainer as a "true retainer" which was earned upon receipt. E.R., 28, Exhibit A thereto, on page 2 of Exhibit A. This inconsistency alone puts in question whether Appellant has ever fully disclosed the required elements to be deemed "disinterested."

[7] If there was a novation in Appellant's retention agreement with the Debtors, Appellant's failure to segregate those funds in a trust account as advances for fees and costs appears to run afoul of Rule 4-100 of the State Bar of California Rules of Professional Conduct.

Negligent or inadvertent omissions do not vitiate the failure to disclose. In re Park-Helena Corp. at 881. Similarly, a disclosure violation may result in sanctions "regardless of actual harm to the estate." Id. Such failure may result in a denial of all requested fees. Id. at 882.

The bankruptcy court was justified in discounting Appellant's explanations based on the plain meaning of the terms set forth in Appellant's retainer agreement. Clearly the bankruptcy court's holding that it is not counsel's decision to determine what is or is not significant but that proposed counsel fully disclose all terms of its proposed employment so that a court is able to make an informed decision, comports with the standards applied by courts in the Ninth Circuit and elsewhere. See In re Park-Helena Corp., 63 F.3d 877 (9th Cir. 1995). See also In re Independent Engineering Co., Inc., 232 B.R. 529 (1st Cir.BAP 1999) aff'd 197 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 1999).

____The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion by denying Appellant's entire request for fees based on Appellant's failure to fully comply with the disclosure requirements of Rule 2014. In re Park-Helena Corp. at 882. (Ninth Circuit affirms bankruptcy court's order denying an entire fee request even though failure to disclose ultimate source of pre-petition retainer may not have created an actual conflict of interest). In re Kisseberth, 273 F.3d 714 (6th Cir. 2001) (Sixth Circuit affirms bankruptcy court order disgorging substantially all fees received based on counsel's failure to strictly adhere to the disclosure requirements of 11 U.S.C. §329 and F.R.B.P. 2016(b)). In re Downs, 103 F.3d 472 (6th Cir. 1996)(Sixth Circuit finds bankruptcy court erred in refusing to compel counsel to disgorge retainer in toto based on intentional failure to disclose financial arrangements under 11 U.S.C. §329 and F.R.B.P. 2016 and remands case with instructions to order a disgorgement of all fees paid to bankruptcy counsel).

B. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN DENYING APPELLANT'S FEE REQUEST ON EQUITABLE GROUNDS.

Appellant also requests that this Court reverse the bankruptcy court's order denying its fee application on equitable grounds. In support of its contention, Appellant cites to the holding by the Ninth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel in In re CIC Inv. Corp., 192 B.R. 549 (9th Cir.BAP 1996). CIC Investment Corporation is distinguishable, however, because in that case, the court found that counsel had fully disclosed all potential conflicts and dealings with the debtor. In CIC Investment Corporation, the appellate court held that where a professional's employment was approved by the bankruptcy court after full disclosure of all potential conflicts, subsequent denial of compensation for the professional's failure to be disinterested is within the court's discretion. Id. at 553.

In contrast, Appellant did not fully disclose the terms of employment in its employment application. It is only after inquiry did Appellant eventually provide additional information. Appellant's deficient contradictory disclosures in its employment application regarding its dealing with the Debtors ultimately resulted in the bankruptcy court's disqualification of Appellant and the court's order vacating the prior order allowing employment. E.R., 40, pages 55 and 56. See also E.R., 60, pages 18 to 20.

C. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION TO RECONSIDER ITS PRIOR ORDER AUTHORIZING APPELLANT'S EMPLOYMENT.

In In re Elias, 188 F.3d 1160 (9th Cir. 1999)("Elias II"), the Ninth Circuit addressed the issue of whether a bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it declined to reopen the case to set aside an employment order and whether the bankruptcy court acted improperly in declining to adjudicate professional fees. In the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel, the bankruptcy court's orders declining to reopen the case to set aside the employment order and to decline to adjudicate professional fees were affirmed on the basis that such additional relief may have been beyond the limited jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court or alternatively, that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion to review pending state court issues arising from disputed attorneys' fees. In re Elias, 215 B.R. 600 (9th Cir. BAP 1997)("Elias I").

Appellant's application and extension of the holding in Elias I to the case at hand is misplaced. In Elias I, the BAP held that resolving post-dismissal disputes regarding bankruptcy attorney's fees was "new relief," which was beyond the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction. However, the facts in Elias are clearly distinguishable from this case. In Elias, debtor's counsel sued the debtor in state court for his fees incurred during the debtor's bankruptcy proceeding. The state court referred the parties back to the bankruptcy court to adjudicate the fee dispute. It was only then in the bankruptcy court that motions to rescind debtor's counsel's order of employment were filed. By contrast, in this case, no other forum was ever used. The bankruptcy court solely reviewed Appellant's fees and expenses; the same court that reviewed and authorized its employment, the same court which ultimately reviewed its own order and proceedings regarding its rulings.

Moreover, in affirming the bankruptcy court's order in Elias II, the Ninth Circuit observed that the bankruptcy court generally has discretion regarding whether it should reopen proceedings to reconsider its prior orders as occurred in the instant case. Elias II at 1161. See also Post v. Ewing, 119 B.R. 566 (S.D.Ohio 1989). In fact, Appellant's reliance on Elias I is misplaced and inapposite herein. Given the holding in Elias II, the bankruptcy court did not exceed its jurisdiction in considering the United States Trustee's motion to vacate the order authorizing Appellant's employment in this case.

D. APPELLANT WAS NOT A DISINTERESTED PERSON.

Sections 327 and 328(c) of the Bankruptcy Code govern the determination of the propriety of professional fees arising during the course of a bankruptcy case. In particular, section 328(c) of the Bankruptcy Code provides, in pertinent part, that a court may deny allowance of compensation and reimbursement of expenses of a professional person employed under section 327, if at any time during such professional person's employment section 327, such professional person is not a disinterested person or represents or holds an interest adverse to the interest of the estate with respect to the matter on which such professional person is employed.

The term "disinterested person" is defined in the Bankruptcy Code, in pertinent part, as a person who is not a creditor. See 11 U.S.C. §101(14)(A). The term creditor is further defined in the Bankruptcy Code, in pertinent part, as an entity that has a claim against the debtor that arose at the time of or before the order for relief concerning the debtor. See 11 U.S.C. §101(10)(A). The commencement of a voluntary case under the Bankruptcy Code constitutes an order for relief under the Code. See 11 U.S.C. §301.

Appellant stated in its employment application that it was disinterested as that term is defined in 11 U.S.C. §101(14). E.R., 4, page 9, ¶3.

As a result of the subsequent disclosure that the prepetition retainer had not been drawn down, the United States Trustee made a motion to disqualify counsel and order disgorgement of all fees. E.R., 36. The motion was based upon Appellant's lack of disinterestedness at the time of the commencement of Debtors' bankruptcy case as Appellant was clearly a pre-petition creditor. The United States Trustee also requested disgorgement of Appellant's retainer if the bankruptcy court granted the United States Trustee's motion to disqualify.

Owing to Appellant's failure to adequately address the issues raised in the United States Trustee’s motion to disqualify the firm and because of Appellant’s inconsistent positions taken in its pleadings and oral argument, the bankruptcy court found that Appellant was not disinterested. E.R., 40, pages 55 and 56. See also E.R., 60, page 20. The bankruptcy court also found that Appellant’s request in its fee application that it reserve the right to augment its request for undetermined expenses reflected on Appellant as a pre-petition creditor notwithstanding Appellant’s later withdrawal of such request when confronted with its own folly. E.R., 40, page 25 to 28 and pages 42 and 43. In the end, the bankruptcy court determined that the amount of retainer still on hand was $25,000 because Appellant failed to adequately account for the pre-petition disposition of the retainer proceeds, thus rendering Appellant a pre-petition creditor. E.R., 40, page 56, lines 17 to 24.

Appellant would have this Court conclude, arguendo, that to the extent Appellant was a pre-petition creditor, Appellant did not lack disinterestedness because its fees and expenses were incurred solely for services rendered in contemplation of and in connection with the bankruptcy case. App.Brief[8] at page 21. Courts have not universally embraced the notion that professionals holding pre-petition claims incurred in direct relation to the filing of the bankruptcy petition may represent the debtor. See In re Eastern Charter Tours, Inc., 167 B.R. 995 (Bankr.M.D.Ga. 1994). See also United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138 (3rd Cir. 1994)(". . bankruptcy courts cannot use equitable principles to disregard unambiguous statutory language." citing In re Middleton Arms, 934 F.2d 723, 725 (6th Cir. 1991)(internal quotations and citations omitted)).

Whether or not all courts agree upon this principle, Appellant's own papers submitted in connection with this bankruptcy case indicate that not all the unpaid pre-petition work was bankruptcy related. Appellant's Rule 2016(b) statement states that the $25,000 retainer received by the firm included 'pre-petition non-bankruptcy fees and costs.' E.R., 2.

See also E.R., 37, page 19, ¶15. Moreover, nowhere in Appellant's retainer agreement is reference made that the Debtors' employment of the firm was solely limited to the filing of a bankruptcy petition. E.R., 37, Exhibit "1" thereto. This fact is underscored by Appellant's narrative in its fee application, which states that the Debtors initially consulted with Appellant in January 2001 desiring to protect their retirement account from seizure by the Internal Revenue Service. E.R., 26, page 5, lines 3 to 17. It was not until two months later, when the Debtors learned that the Internal Revenue Service sought to take immediate legal action, that Debtors filed their voluntary Chapter 11 petition. E.R., 26, page 5, lines 18 to 23. See also E.R., 2. Consequently, Appellant cannot claim that its services were solely in contemplation of a bankruptcy filing.

Therefore, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in determining that Appellant was not disinterested, and its orders should be affirmed.

E. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN DENYING APPELLANT'S APPLICATION FOR COMPENSATION FOLLOWING ITS ORDER VACATING APPELLANT'S ORDER OF EMPLOYMENT.

When the debtor is a debtor in possession, as in this case, Section 330 will allow compensation to an attorney for the debtor only if his employment is authorized pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §327. Court approval of the employment of counsel for a debtor in possession is the sine qua non to counsel getting paid. In re Shirley, 134 B.R. 940, 943 (9th Cir.BAP 1992), In re Weibel, Inc., 176 B.R. 209 (9th Cir.BAP 1994). See also In re Monument Auto Detail, Inc., 226 B.R. 219 (9th Cir.BAP 1998).

The language of §§327 and 330 of the Bankruptcy Code, when read together, provide a clear statutory scheme by which professionals are compensated. To ignore these interrelated provisions subverts the intent of the Bankruptcy Code.

In this case, the bankruptcy court vacated Appellant's previously entered order authorizing its employment, finding that Appellant failed to disclose fully how it treated its retainer, and consequently Appellant was a creditor of the debtor at the time the petition was filed, rendering it not disinterested as required by 11 U.S.C. § 101(14). E.R., 40, page 56.

Because Appellant was not eligible to be employed pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 327, it was not eligible to be paid pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) of the Bankruptcy Code. As a result, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying Appellant's request for final fees and reimbursement of its expenses.

F. APPELLANT'S POSSESSION OF AN ATTORNEYS' LIEN DOES NOT OBVIATE ITS OBLIGATION TO SATISFY THE EMPLOYMENT REQUIREMENTS OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE.

An attorney's lien can attach to property only when an attorney has some rights. A California attorney's lien can provide no rights other than that provided in the Bankruptcy Code. Sections 327, 328, 330, 503(b)(2), and 507(a)(1) provide a comprehensive federal scheme that sets forth attorneys' rights to payment of fees from estate property. This scheme preempts any other rights that might be created by state statutes.

Appellant argues that its attorney's lien, created by operation of California law, protected its interest in the $25,000 retainer for services rendered, even if it is not eligible for compensation under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). For this proposition, Appellant relies on In re Century Cleaning Services, Inc., 215 B.R. 18 (9th Cir. BAP 1997), reversed In re Century Cleaning Services, Inc., 195 F.3rd 1053 (9th Cir. 1999). The issue in Century Cleaning was whether debtor's counsel in a case converted to Chapter 7 from Chapter 11 could be compensated for work he performed in the Chapter 7. The bankruptcy court and the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel both determined that a change in the Bankruptcy Code rendered Chapter 7 debtor's attorneys ineligible for compensation pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). Instead, those courts decided that the attorney had a possessory attorney's lien on his pre-petition retainer and could take his fees from that fund of money. However, the Ninth Circuit reversed the BAP and determined that a Chapter 7 debtor's attorney could be paid for work he performed if that work benefitted the estate. The Ninth Circuit specifically declined to consider whether an attorney would be entitled to fees under Oregon's attorney's lien statute and vacated that award without prejudice. 195 F.3rd at 1061.

As the Ninth Circuit held, the reasoning of the lower courts was flawed. Appellant's interpretation of the effects of an attorney’s lien would render the employment and compensation requirements of the Bankruptcy Code and Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure meaningless. An attorney’s lien simply secures the amount of the underlying debt as determined by the bankruptcy court. In re Monument Auto Detail, Inc. at 225. (An attorney’s lien secures only the amount of the fees and costs specifically allowed by the bankruptcy court, not the amount of the entire retainer. Id.)

In addition, on facts very similar to this case, the court in Monument Auto, which was decided after the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel opinion, but before the Ninth Circuit opinion in Century Cleaning, further held that an attorney’s lien does not obviate an attorney’s obligation to satisfy the employment and compensation requirements of the Bankruptcy Code and Rules previously addressed above. In the instant case, the bankruptcy court vacated the order approving Appellant’s employment due to Appellant’s lack of disinterestedness and accordingly, disallowed all post-petition fees and reimbursement of expenses.

G. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT EXCEED ITS JURISDICTION TO CONSIDER THE MOTION SEEKING APPELLANT'S DISQUALIFICATION.

The broad grant of jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §1334 enables bankruptcy courts, which are created as adjuncts of the district court for the purpose of exercising jurisdiction, to dispose of controversies that arise in bankruptcy cases or under the bankruptcy code. In re Aheong, 276 B.R. 233, 245 (9th Cir.BAP 2002) citing Senate Report No. 95-989. The "arising under" jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §1334 does not depend on the present existence of an open case or a non-dismissed case. It depends solely on the existence of "civil proceedings arising under title 11." Id. Such civil proceedings also includes any disputes related to administrative matters in a bankruptcy case. Id. In the instant case, Appellant sought bankruptcy court approval of its fees and expenses. Awards of professional fees are core proceedings concerning administration of an estate. In re Meronk, Jr., 249 B.R. 208 (9th Cir.BAP 2000). Equally, issues relating to the employment of professionals are core proceedings concerning the administration of an estate. In re

Vettori, 217 B.R. 242 (Bankr.N.D.Ill. 1998).

Clearly the bankruptcy court's review of the dispute raised by the United States Trustee concerning Appellant's continued eligibility for employment falls squarely within the jurisdiction conferred under 28 U.S.C. §1334 to the court.

H. BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN ORDERING DISGORGEMENT OF APPELLANT'S RETAINER.

A bankruptcy court has discretion to hear ancillary matters after dismissal of a case. In re Elias at 188 F.3d 1162. The Ninth Circuit has held that bankruptcy courts may dispose of ancillary matters such as an application for an award of attorney's fees for services rendered in connection with the underlying case post-dismissal. In re Taylor, 884 F.2d 478 (9th Cir. 1989). In the instant case, the bankruptcy court exercised its ancillary jurisdiction in considering Appellant's final application for fees and reimbursement of expenses.

Appellant would have this Court find that the bankruptcy court lacked jurisdiction to order disgorgement of its retainer based upon 11 U.S.C.

§349(b)(3) and that as a result of the dismissal of the case, that retainer was vested in Appellant. However, Appellant submitted to the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court when it filed its employment application and when it requested an order directing payment of any approved compensation in excess of the retainer received. Assuming the bankruptcy court did not have jurisdiction over 'non-estate' funds following dismissal of the case, it is unclear from Appellant's position how the bankruptcy court could then order payment from the Debtors of compensation beyond the amount of the retainer received as requested by Appellant in its fee application. E.R., 26, page 16. Moreover, to the extent the bankruptcy court denied Appellant's request for compensation as it did in this case, or otherwise allowed compensation less than the retainer received, Appellant's position would effectively render such an order meaningless since Appellant claims a vested interest in that retainer.

Moreover, the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in ordering disgorgement of Appellant's entire retainer. Appellant's failure to adequately demonstrate that the retainer had been drawn down prior to the commencement of Debtors' bankruptcy case for pre-petition services as discussed above clearly contributed to the bankruptcy court's finding that the entire $25,000 remained property of the Debtor's bankruptcy estate on the date of filing. E.R., 40, page 56, lines 17 to 24.

The non-refundability provision advocated at different times by Appellant in the lower court with respect to the proceeds of the retainer have been found to be unenforceable in bankruptcy. See In re C & P Auto Transport, Inc., 94 B.R. 682 (Bankr.E.D.Cal. 1988).

Circuit courts have recognized repeatedly that disgorgement is appropriate when bankruptcy counsel are hired improperly or engage in misconduct. See generally In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246 (3rd Cir. 2002)(remanding a fee dispute for a review of the merits and imposition of an appropriate remedy, including possible disgorgement); United States Trustee v. First Jersy Securities, Inc., (In re First Jersey Securities, Inc.), 180 F.3d 504, 514, and n.9 (3rd Cir.

1999)(holding that where a debtor's counsel had received a preferential transfer, the bankruptcy court could take "further action" on remand and noting such action could include "not only disgorgement of the preference, but also [] the possible denial or reduction of compensation"(citation and internal quotation omitted)); Citicorp Venture Capital Ltd. v Committee of Unsecured Creditors, 160 F.3d 982, 986, 991-92 (3rd Cir. 1998)(allowing the pursuit of remedies against a fiduciary of a debtor, including disgorgement, upon remand in a chapter 11 case with a confirmed plan); United States Trustee v. Federated Department Stores, Inc., (In re Federated Department Stores, Inc.), 44 F.3d 1310, 1316 (6th Cir. 1995)(bankruptcy court could order disgorgement on remand); United States v. Richman (In re Richman), 124 F.3d 1201 (10th Cir. 1997)(ordering that on remand funds could be disgorged to a chapter 13 debtor who had a confirmed chapter 13 plan).

V. CONCLUSION

This Court should affirm the bankruptcy court's order vacating Appellant's order of employment due to Appellant’s failure to adequately comply with the disclosure requirements of Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 2014 or alternatively, on Appellant’s lack of disinterestedness or both. This Court should further affirm the bankruptcy court’s order disgorging Appellant’s retainer based on the lack of Appellant’s eligibility for compensation under the Bankruptcy Code arising from the bankruptcy court’s disqualification of the firm.

STATEMENT OF BASIS FOR APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Did the Bankruptcy Court err in denying without prejudice Appellant's motion seeking an order declaring invalid certain provisions of the United States Code on constitutional and other grounds, when Appellant failed to follow applicable Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure requiring that such a challenge be made by an adversary proceeding?

2. In light of Appellant's failure to follow procedural requirements, should issues of ripeness and justiciability be reserved for decision until such time as Appellant brings an appropriate proceeding using appropriate process?

STATEMENT OF STANDARD OF REVIEW

The standards of review on appeal are clearly erroneous as to findings of fact and de novo as to conclusions of law. In re Merry-G-Round Enter., Inc., 400 F.3d 219 (4th Cir. 2005). This appeal raises only issues of law.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. The Statutory and Legislative Background

On April 20, 2005, the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 ("BAPCPA"). The bulk of its provisions became effective on October 17, 2005. This legislation constitutes the most extensive overhaul of the United States Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 101 et seq. ("Bankruptcy Code") since its enactment in 1978. As indicated by its title, the BAPCPA has two primary goals: the prevention of bankruptcy abuse and the protection of consumers involved in the bankruptcy process. The consumer protection provisions consist, inter alia, of enhanced disclosure requirements and other safeguards pertaining to reaffirmations of dischargeable debt by bankruptcy debtors, penalties for abusive practices by creditors, requirements for credit counseling and debtor education, and the provisions pertaining to debt relief agencies. It is these last provisions that the appellant Shannon Denise Jackson ("Appellant") seeks to challenge in her bankruptcy case.

The Bankruptcy Code defines "debt relief agencies" to include persons that provide "legal representation" in bankruptcy proceedings. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 101(12A), 101(4A). The requirements imposed on debt relief agencies are for the benefit of persons "whose debts consist primarily of consumer debts and the value of whose nonexempt property is less than $150,000," 11 U.S.C. § 101(3), i.e., persons of moderate and less than moderate means. These requirements are set forth in three new sections of the Bankruptcy Code: §§ 526, 527 and 528. Section 526 prohibits debt relief agencies from: (i) misrepresenting to assisted persons the services to be provided to them or the risks attendant upon becoming a debtor; (ii) advising an assisted person to make untrue or misleading statements in bankruptcy filings; and (iii) advising an assisted person to incur more debt in contemplation of filing bankruptcy or for the purpose of paying an attorney or bankruptcy petition preparer for bankruptcy services. It also provides that any waiver of rights under §§ 526, 527 and 528 is unenforceable.

Section 527 requires debt relief agencies to provide assisted persons with certain information, notices and disclosures, including: (i) notice of the right to proceed pro se, hire an attorney or hire a bankruptcy petition preparer; (ii) information on how to complete the bankruptcy schedules, value assets and determine what property is exempt; and (iii) notice of the obligation of debtors to provide truthful and accurate information and the potential consequences of failing to do so.

Section 528 requires debt relief agencies to provide assisted persons a written contract explaining clearly and conspicuously the nature of services they will render, the amount of the fees or charges for such services, and the terms of payment. In addition, § 528 requires debt relief agencies to disclose in their advertising that they are debt relief agencies, that the assistance they provide may involve bankruptcy relief, and that they are in the business of helping people file for relief under the Bankruptcy Code.

II. Procedural History

On October 21, 2005, appellant Shannon Denise Jackson (“Appellant”) filed a voluntary petition under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. Because Appellant filed her case after October 17, 2005, the provisions of BAPCPA, including the debt relief agency provisions, were applicable to her case.

On November 8, 2005, Appellant filed her Motion of Debtor for Declaration that the Debt Relief Provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 are Invalid as Applied to Duly Admitted Members of the Bar Practicing Before the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of South Carolina (“Motion”). In the Motion, Appellant asked the Bankruptcy Court to declare that the debt relief provisions are invalid as applied to bankruptcy attorneys in South Carolina. The Motion stated that it sought declaratory relief pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201 and 2202. Motion, paragraph 6. It further stated that 11 U.S.C.

§ 526(c)(5) excused Appellant from the obligation to seek the declaratory relief by means of an adversary proceeding under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001.

On November 21, 2005, the Bankruptcy Court sua sponte entered the Order. The Bankruptcy Court found that the declaratory relief sought in the Motion could be properly sought only by way of an adversary proceeding filed pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001. The Bankruptcy Court further found that 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(2) did not apply, because no violation of the debt relief provision of BAPCPA had occurred. Finally, the Bankruptcy Court stated that the matter was not ripe as no actual or justiciable controversy had arisen in Appellant's case.

On December 1, 2005, Appellant filed with the Bankruptcy Court a timely notice of appeal from the Order.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court properly denied the Motion, as it sought relief that under applicable rules must be sought by an adversary proceeding.

Cases and related proceedings in United States Bankruptcy Courts are governed by the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure ("Rules"). The Rules distinguish between "contested matters" and "adversary proceedings." Under Rule 9014(a), a contested matter not otherwise governed by the Rules is initiated by the filing of a motion. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9014(a). Rule 7001 describes a series of proceedings denominated as "adversary proceedings" that are governed by Part VII of the Rules. Part VII of the Rules makes applicable to adversary proceedings, with some modifications, virtually all of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that apply to civil cases in the United States District Courts.

The important Rules for this case are Rules 7003 and 7004, which dictate how adversary proceedings are commenced and how defendants in adversary proceedings are to be served. Rule 7003 directly applies Fed. R. Civ. P. 3 to adversary proceedings; an adversary proceeding is commenced by filing a complaint with the court. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7003; Fed. R. Civ. P. 3. Rule 7004 incorporates, with some modifications not germane to the issues in this case, the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 4 that the complaint filed pursuant to Rule 7003 be served upon the defendants with a summons issued by the clerk of the court. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7004; Fed. R. Civ. P. 4. If, therefore, the relief sought by Appellant in the Motion was properly the subject of an adversary proceeding, Appellant should have filed a complaint with the clerk of the Bankruptcy Court, had the clerk issue a summons, and served the summons and complaint in compliance with the requirements of the Rules.

Rule 7001 provides in relevant part:

> An adversary proceeding is governed by the rules of this Part VII. The following are adversary proceedings:
>
> (7) a proceeding to obtain an injunction or other equitable relief . . .; [or]
>
> (9) a proceeding to obtain a declaratory judgment relating to any of the foregoing . . . .

Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7001(7) and (9).

That the relief sought in the Motion falls within the scope of Rule 7001 is not seriously subject to question. The Motion seeks declaratory relief that would effectively enjoin the enforcement of the debt relief agency provisions of BAPCPA against attorneys in South Carolina. Because the relief sought is both declaratory and equitable, it may be sought only through the filing of a complaint and the service of the complaint and a summons on all necessary parties defendant to the action.

In her brief, Appellant does not contend that Rule 7001 is inapplicable. Instead, she argues that, because the requirement that an adversary proceeding be commenced by complaint is not jurisdictional, this requirement is waivable. While the U.S. Trustee does not necessarily disagree with this as a general principle of law, the principle does not apply here. A “waiver” is an “intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege.” Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938). Neither the U.S. Trustee nor, to the best of his knowledge, any other party waived either expressly or impliedly the requirement that an adversary proceeding be brought in this case.

The cases cited by Appellant all stand for the proposition that the adversary complaint requirement may be voluntarily waived. In In re Pence, 905 F.2d 1107 (7th Cir. 1990), the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals noted that the debtor had expressly waived any objection to the fact that a complaint had not been filed. Id. at 1109. In In re Kmart Corp., 290 B.R. 601 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2002), the bankruptcy court noted that no party had raised the issue of whether the injunctive and declaratory relief sought should have been sought by way of a complaint instead of a motion. Finding that no party had been prejudiced by the failure to bring an adversary proceeding, and that the potential defendants had waived the requirement because of their failure to object, the court proceeded to decide the matter. Id. at 604. Finally, In In re Davis, 40 B.R. 934 (Bankr. D.S.D. 1984), the court noted that the party upon whom a motion seeking injunctive and declaratory relief had been served had not objected to the defective procedure, and therefore decided not to object to the defective procedure on its own motion. Id. at 936. Davis certainly does not stand for the proposition that a court cannot insist that parties bringing matters before it comply with applicable rules. The Bankruptcy Court in the case at bar quickly determined that the Motion was procedurally defective and took the initiative to dismiss it without prejudice. This action was well within the power of the court.

Appellant also argues that, because she seeks to vindicate rights that she characterizes and "vital" and "substantive," she should not be required to file an adversary proceeding. She bases this argument on the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Tennessee Student Assistance Corp. v. Hood, 541 U.S. 440 (2004). The court in Hood was faced with special circumstances that are not present here.

In Hood, a debtor filed an adversary proceeding against Tennessee Student Assistance Corporation ("TSAC"), which was a governmental corporation created by the State of Tennessee to administer student loan programs. In her complaint, the debtor sought a determination under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(8) that excepting certain student loan obligations from her bankruptcy discharge would impose an undue hardship on her. TSAC filed a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, asserting Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity. The Supreme Court held that, because the determination of whether a debt was dischargeable in bankruptcy is an in rem proceeding, the action against TSAC seeking such a determination was not a suit against a State for purposes of the Eleventh Amendment. Id. at 451.

The Supreme Court in Hood also dealt with the requirement of the Bankruptcy Rules that a proceeding to determine the dischargeability of a debt be brought by adversary proceeding. It was asserted that the service of a summons on TSAC would have sovereign immunity implications because the bankruptcy court would thereby acquire personal jurisdiction over the State. In response, the Supreme Court held that, because the debtor had the in rem right under the Bankruptcy Code to an undue hardship determination, the Bankruptcy Rules could not appropriately deny her that right by requiring that she serve a summons on the State. Id. at 454 (citing 28 U.S.C. § 2075 for the proposition that a bankruptcy rule may not abridge a substantive right). This case therefore bears no similarities to Hood. While Appellant asserts that it would be inconvenient for her to file an adversary proceeding, requiring her to follow the rules would not abridge any substantive rights she might have under the Bankruptcy Code or otherwise.

The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals insists on strict compliance with the adversary proceeding requirement. In In re Banks, 299 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. 2002), the Fourth Circuit held that a chapter 13 debtor could not rely on a provision in his confirmed plan to affect his obligations to continue to pay interest on a student loan. Rule 7001(6) requires that a proceeding to determine the dischargeability of a debt be brought by way of an adversary proceeding. The debtor asserted that because the creditor received notice of the plan provision under Rule 2002, the creditor was bound by the confirmed plan. The Fourth Circuit strenuously disagreed:

> We agree a bankruptcy court confirmation order generally is afforded a preclusive effect. But we cannot defer to such an order if it would result in a denial of due process in violation of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Piedmont Trust Bank v. Linkous (In re Linkous), 990 F.2d 160, 162 (4th Cir.1993). Where the Bankruptcy Code and Bankruptcy Rules specify the notice required prior to entry of an order, due process generally entitles a party to receive the notice specified before an order binding the party will be afforded preclusive effect. See id. (quoting Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank and Trust, 339 U.S. 306, 314, 70 S.Ct. 652, 94 L.Ed. 865 (1950)); Cen-Pen Corp. v. Hanson (In re Hanson), 58 F.3d 89, 93 (4th Cir.1995).
> In In re Linkous, the creditor received "notice" pursuant to Rule 2002, but was not served with a summons and motion as required under Rule 7004. Id. at 163. We held the notice was insufficient and refused to accord finality to the bankruptcy court's confirmation order. Specifically, we ruled due process entitled the creditor to receive notice of a hearing as provided by the Bankruptcy Rules. Id. In In re

> Hanson, we held where an adversary proceeding "is required to resolve the disputed rights of the parties, the potential defendant has the right to expect that the proper procedures will be followed." 58 F.3d at 93. In In re Deutchman, we confirmed that a Debtor's failure to give specific notice of his intent to discharge nondischargeable debts violates the creditor's due process rights and, as a result, the confirmation order discharging the debt will not be given preclusive effect. 192 F.3d at 461.

Id. at 302.

It is therefore clear that the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals does not treat compliance with the requirements of the Bankruptcy Rules as a matter to be taken cavalierly. This is precisely what Appellant has done in this case. She is seeking radical and far-reaching relief without observing the procedural requirements of the forum in which she has chosen to proceed. The Bankruptcy Court properly insisted that she comply with the Bankruptcy Rules and denied her Motion without prejudice.

II. Section 526(c)(5) of the Bankruptcy Code does not provide Appellant with a right that can be asserted by motion.

In the Motion, Appellant alleged that the matter did not have to be filed as an adversary proceeding because 11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(5) specifically allowed it to be brought by motion. Section 526(c)(5) provides:

> (5) Notwithstanding any other provision of Federal law and in addition to any other remedy provided under Federal or State law, if the court, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States trustee or the debtor, finds that a person intentionally violated this section, or engaged in a clear and consistent pattern or practice of violating this section, the court may –
> (A) enjoin the violation of such section; or
>
> (B) impose an appropriate civil penalty against such person.

11 U.S.C. § 526(c)(5). This statute therefore permits debtors and others to bring before the Bankruptcy Court by motion the issue of whether a debt relief agency has committed certain violations of the debt relief agency provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. The statute does not, however, give Appellant the right to challenge by motion the constitutionality and enforceability of the statutory scheme of which it itself is an integral part. The only motion a debtor is authorized to file under § 526(c)(5) is a motion alleging that a debt relief agency has failed to comply with the law. The Motion did not make any such allegations. The Bankruptcy Court therefore properly found that § 526(c)(5) did not excuse Appellant from the requirement that she file a proper adversary proceeding.

III. Issues of ripeness and justiciability should be reserved until Appellant brings her arguments before a proper court using appropriate pleadings and process.

In the Order, the Bankruptcy Court sua sponte found that because no actual or justiciable controversy had arisen in this case, the matter was not ripe. While much of Appellant's brief is addressed to this issue, this Court need not reach it. If Appellant is correct and a case or controversy exists, the Court nevertheless must affirm the Bankruptcy Court's denial of the Motion because of Appellant's failure to seek relief through an adversary proceeding. If, on the other hand, the Bankruptcy Court was correct in concluding that there was no case or controversy, Appellant will still have the right after affirmance of the denial of the Motion to file an appropriate proceeding in an appropriate forum against appropriate adverse parties. Whether that proceeding presents an actual case or controversy will be determined based upon the allegations of the complaint and the responses filed by the adverse parties.

CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, the U.S. Trustee requests that this Court enter an order affirming the Bankruptcy Court's denial of the Motion because of Appellant's failure to file an adversary proceeding in compliance with Part VII of the Bankruptcy Rules and granting such further relief as is appropriate under the circumstances.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED ON APPEAL

1. Whether the Bankruptcy Court erred in concluding that Quarles & Brady, LLP ("Quarles & Brady"), failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 327 and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014, where Quarles & Brady failed to disclose in its application for employment as counsel for eleven related chapter 11 debtors all of its connections with such debtors, to enable the Court to make an informed decision as to whether to approve such employment, and failed to supplement its application for employment at any time to disclose any connections of which Quarles & Brady became aware after the filing of its initial application.

2. Whether the Bankruptcy Court erred in concluding that Quarles & Brady was not a disinterested person under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a), where the Court found that Quarles & Brady simultaneously represented multiple debtors, among which actual or potential conflicts of interest existed.

3. Whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion in disqualifying Quarles & Brady as counsel for the debtors, denying all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, based on Quarles & Brady's initial and continuing violation of the disclosure rules, lack of disinterestedness, and injury resulting to the bankruptcy estates from its inability to evaluate independently the various claims, transfers, and interests in the related cases.

4. Whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion in denying Quarles & Brady's motions for reconsideration.

STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

In an appeal from an order or judgment of a bankruptcy court, an appellate court reviews the bankruptcy court's findings of fact for clear error, and reviews conclusions of law de novo. Electro-Wire Products, Inc. v. Sirote & Permutt, P.C. (In re Prince), 40 F.3d 356, 359 (11th Cir. 1994); Intru, Inc. v. Regency Realty Associates (In re Regency Realty Associates), 205 B.R. 317, 318 (M.D. Fla. 1997). The court reviews an award or refusal to award attorney's fees in a bankruptcy case for abuse of discretion. In re Celotex Corp., 227 F.3d 1336, 1338 (11th Cir. 2000). The court also reviews the disposition of a motion for reconsideration for abuse of discretion. Florida Association of Rehabilitation Facilities, Inc. v. State of Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services, 225 F.3d 1208, 1216 (11th Cir. 2000). A bankruptcy judge's discretion in awarding compensation for services performed during bankruptcy proceedings deserves great deference. In re Prince, 40 F.3d at 359. "An abuse of discretion occurs if the judge fails to apply the proper legal standard or to follow proper procedures in making the determination, or bases an award upon findings of fact that are clearly erroneous." *Stroock & Stroock & Lavan v. STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND OF THE FACTS[1]

Quarles & Brady appeals from an order entered by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Middle District of Florida ("Bankruptcy Court") on November 16, 2004, disqualifying Quarles & Brady as counsel for the eleven related debtors in the above-captioned chapter 11 bankruptcy cases, denying all fees requested by Quarles & Brady in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer received by Quarles & Brady ("Disqualification Order"). I. Statutory Framework and Relevant Bankruptcy Rules Governing Employment and Compensation of Professional Persons in Bankruptcy Cases

This appeal addresses the issues of whether Quarles & Brady (1) properly complied with its statutory obligations under the Bankruptcy Code (Title 11, U.S.C.) to disclose fully its connections with the debtors, creditors, and any other parties in interest in its application for employment as counsel for the debtors, and (2) met the statutory requirements for employment as counsel for the debtors in the chapter 11 cases.

Title 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) governs the procedure for obtaining bankruptcy court approval of the employment of attorneys and other professionals by trustees and debtors in possession[2] in bankruptcy cases, limiting such employment to persons "that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons."[3] A professional person's failure to comply with these requirements at any time during such professional person's employment under § 327 may result in a denial of compensation. See 11 U.S.C. § 328(c). Rule 2014(a), Fed. R.

[2] A debtor in a chapter 11 bankruptcy case is a "debtor in possession," except when a trustee is appointed in the case. See 11 U.S.C. § 1101(1). A debtor in possession has most of the rights, powers, and duties of a trustee serving in a chapter 11 case. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a).

[3] The Bankruptcy Code defines a "disinterested person," in pertinent part, as a "person that– (A) is not a creditor, an equity security holder, or an insider; ... and (E) does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors or equity holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor or any investment banker specified in subparagraph (B) or (C) of this paragraph, or for any other reason." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(A), (E).

Bankr. P., requires that an application for employment under § 327 shall include a statement, to the best of the applicant's knowledge, of "all of the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest, their respective attorneys and accountants, the United States trustee, or any person employed in the office of the United States trustee." Rule 2014(a) further provides that "[t]he application shall be accompanied by a verified statement of the person to be employed setting forth the person's connections" with any such other persons.[4]

Title 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) authorizes a bankruptcy court to award to a professional person employed under § 327 reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the professional person and reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses, after notice and a hearing. Under 11 U.S.C. § 331, professional persons may apply for interim compensation and reimbursement for expenses not more than once every 120 days, or more often if the court permits, after notice and a hearing. Rule 2016(a), Fed. R. Bankr. P., provides that an entity seeking interim or final compensation for services or reimbursement of expenses shall file an application setting forth a detailed statement of the services rendered, time expended, and expenses incurred, and the amounts requested.

Title 11 U.S.C. § 329(a) and Rule 2016(b), Fed. R. Bankr. P., require debtors' attorneys to file with the court a statement of compensation paid or agreed to be paid within one year prior to the date of filing of the bankruptcy petition and the source of such compensation. A supplemental statement is required to be filed within 15 days after any payment or agreement not previously disclosed. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016(b). Title 11 U.S.C. § 329(b) authorizes the court to deny or require disgorgement of any such compensation to the extent excessive, if the compensation exceeds the reasonable value of the services rendered.

[4] Although Rule 2014(a) does not expressly require supplemental or continuing disclosure, § 327(a) implies a continuing duty of disclosure and requires professionals to reveal connections that arise after their retention. See In re Keller Financial Services of Florida, Inc., 248 B.R. 859, 898 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2000); In re Granite Partners, L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 35 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998).

II. Factual Background

Appellee, Brandon James Maxfield ("Maxfield"), the largest creditor in the chapter 11 cases, is an individual who was injured when a handgun designed by Bruce Lee Jennings ("Jennings"), manufactured by Bryco Arms, Inc. ("Bryco"), and distributed by B.L. Jennings, Inc. ("BLJ"), accidentally discharged and injured Maxfield. R.889, at 1-2. On May 23, 2001, Maxfield commenced an action against Jennings, Bryco, and BLJ in California Superior Court to recover damages for his personal injuries. R.889, at 2. Maxfield also sought to recover from the assets of Janice Kay Jennings ("Janice Jennings"), RKB Investments ("RKB"), the Kimberly K. Jennings California Trust, the Kimberly K. Jennings Nevada Trust, the Bradley A. Jennings California Trust, the Bradley A. Jennings Nevada Trust, the Rhonda D. Jennings California Trust, and the Rhonda D. Jennings Nevada Trust (collectively, the "Trust Debtors") any judgment liability obtained against Jennings, Bryco, and BLJ under joint venture/enterprise, partnership, constructive trust, alter ego, and other legal theories (collectively, the "Alter Ego Claims").[5] R.889, at 2. Maxfield served his complaint on Jennings in October 2001. R.889, at 2.

In January and February 2002, attorneys from Quarles & Brady, including one of Quarles & Brady's partners, Ned R. Nashban ("Nashban"), performed estate planning services for Jennings, including providing legal advice regarding "Florida residency, domicile, and exempt assets" and "home purchase, estate planning, possible bankruptcy options, and real estate mortgages." R.889, at 2-3; Ex. 11. On or about February 15, 2002, Jennings purchased a home in Daytona Beach, Florida, for $925,000 in cash. Ex. 28-29. On March 5, 2002, Jennings purchased a $500,000 annuity issued by Allianz Insurance Company. R.889, at 3; Ex.31.

On May 13, 2003, the California Superior Court entered judgment for damages in favor of Maxfield against Jennings, Bryco, and BLJ in the amount of $24,774,146.53. R.605, at 1; Ex.26.

On May 14, 2003, one day after the entry of the Maxfield judgments against Jennings, Bryco, and BLJ, but before any ruling on Maxfield's Alter Ego Claims, Quarles & Brady filed eleven voluntary chapter 11 bankruptcy petitions in the Bankruptcy Court on behalf of Jennings, Bryco, BLJ, Janice Jennings, RKB, and the six Trust Debtors (collectively, the "Debtors"). R.889, at 4.

[5] Jennings is the sole owner of BLJ. Janice Jennings is Jennings' former wife and the sole owner of Bryco. The beneficiaries of the Trust Debtors are the children of Jennings and/or Janice Jennings, who established all of the Trust Debtors and serve as the trustees for the Trust Debtors. RKB is a partnership formed by three of the Trust Debtors. R.889, at 2. Bryco was a firearm manufacturer, which sold the majority of its guns to BLJ. R.583, at 90.

On May 16, 2003, Quarles & Brady filed a complaint for declaratory relief in the Bankruptcy Court on behalf of RKB and the Trust Debtors seeking a determination that RKB and the Trust Debtors have no liability to Jennings, Bryco, or BLJ for any Alter Ego Claims asserted by Maxfield, as well as by other claimants with similar personal injury claims against Jennings, Bryco, and/or BLJ (Adversary Proceeding No. 03-203).[6] Ex.16.

On May 19, 2003, Quarles & Brady filed the Debtor's [sic] Application for Employment of Attorneys ("Application"), signed by Jennings on behalf of all of the Debtors, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). R.20; Ex.18. The Application included an Affidavit of Proposed Attorney for Debtor-in-Possession [sic], signed by Nashban, pursuant to Rule 2014(a) ("Affidavit"). R.20; Ex.18.

Paragraphs 6 and 8 of the Application provided as follows:

> 6. To the best of the Debtors' knowledge, [Quarles & Brady] has no connection with any creditors of the Debtors or any other party in interest, nor their respective attorneys.
>
> . . .
>
> 8. Quarles & Brady LLP represents no creditors of the estate nor any interest adverse to the Debtors as Debtors-in-possession or to the estate in the matters upon which it is to be engaged to perform legal services for the Debtors-in-possession, and its employment would be in the best interest of the estate.

R.20; Ex.18.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Affidavit provided as follows:

> 3. Benjamin R. Norris, a partner at Quarles & Brady LLP, and I will be the principal attorneys responsible for the representation of the Debtors. Neither > of us nor Quarles & Brady LLP hold or represent any interest adverse to the Estates and we are disinterested persons as required by 11 U.S.C. 327(a).

[6] On August 29, 2003, Quarles & Brady filed a similar complaint for declaratory relief in the Bankruptcy Court on behalf of Janice Jennings (Adversary Proceeding No. 03-345). Ex.17.

>
> 4. That such law firm has no connection with the Debtors herein, its [sic] creditors or any other party in interest or their respective attorneys or accountants. And that it represents no interest adverse to that of the Debtors in the above-captioned matter, except that it was owed legal fees for legal work done for one of the Debtors, Bruce Lee Jennings, pre-petition, which bill has been paid to the law firm prior to the commencement of this action.

R.20; Ex.18.

On May 28, 2003, the Bankruptcy Court entered, ex parte, an order approving the employment of Quarles & Brady as attorneys for the Debtors pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) ("Employment Order"). R.889, at 5. On that date, the Bankruptcy Court also entered an order authorizing joint administration of the Debtors' chapter 11 cases (for procedural purposes only) pursuant to Rule 1015(b), Fed. R. Bankr. P. R.24.

On June 20, 2003, Quarles & Brady filed bankruptcy schedules on behalf of Jennings. R.35; Ex.3. Jennings' schedules listed as assets two accounts receivable due to Jennings from BLJ for (1) back payroll in the amount of $875,000, and (2) loans in the amount of $2,000,000.[7] R.35: Ex.3 (Schedule B). Jennings' schedules listed exemption claims under Florida law in, inter alia, Jennings' residence in Daytona Beach, Florida, which he purchased in February 2002, and the annuity, which he purchased in March 2002. R.35; Ex.3 (Schedule C). Jennings' schedules listed only one general unsecured creditor, Maxfield. R.35; Ex.3 (Schedule F).

[7] On July 25, 2003, Quarles & Brady amended Jennings' schedules, revising the amount of the account receivable due to Jennings for loans from Jennings to BLJ to $1,404,000. R.137; Ex.3 (Amended Schedule B).

On June 23, 2003, Quarles & Brady filed schedules on behalf of BLJ. R.43; Ex.1. BLJ's schedules listed a secured claim held by Jennings for a personal loan from Jennings to BLJ in the amount of $1,404,000. R.43; Ex.1 (Schedule D). BLJ's schedules indicated that BLJ's total assets were $1,278,952.34, of which $1,117,336.50 represented inventory on hand. R.43; Ex.1 (Schedule B). BLJ's schedules also listed a claim held by Jennings for unpaid wages in the amount of $875,000. R.43; Ex.1 (Schedule E). BLJ's schedules listed a total of 58 general unsecured creditors, including Maxfield and 45 holders of contingent, unliquidated, and disputed litigation claims in an unknown amount. R.43; Ex.1 (Schedule F).

On June 23 and 24, 2003, Quarles & Brady filed schedules on behalf of Bryco and RKB, respectively. R.46; R.49; Ex.2. Bryco's schedules listed a general unsecured claim against RKB for "rental" in the amount of $81,000. R.46 (Schedule F). RKB's schedules listed an account receivable for "rental deposits" from "Knowleton Communities Property" in the amount of $300,000. R.49; Ex.2 (Schedule B). Bryco's schedules listed 108 general unsecured claims, R.46 (Schedule F), and RKB's schedules listed only 11 unsecured litigation claims, including Maxfield's, in an unknown amount. R.49; Ex.2 (Schedule F).

On February 11, 2004, Quarles & Brady filed its first application for interim compensation and reimbursement of expenses for the period from May 15, 2003, through August 31, 2003 ("Interim Fee Application").[8] R.410.

III. The Disqualification Motion

[8] Inexplicably, Quarles and Brady delayed filing its Interim Fee Application until nearly six months after the period for which compensation was requested.

On February 25, 2004, shortly after Quarles & Brady filed its Interim Fee Application, Maxfield filed a Motion to Disqualify Debtors' Counsel and for Disgorgement of Retainer ("Disqualification Motion").[9] R.423. On April 26, 2004, Quarles & Brady filed its response to the Disqualification Motion. R.526. On May 6, 2004, Maxfield filed a response to the Interim Fee Application. R.544.

The Bankruptcy Court conducted an extensive evidentiary hearing on the Disqualification Motion on April 29, 2004 and May 28, 2004, at which the Court heard testimony from both Nashban and Jennings. R.663; R.583, at 88-127. At the May 28, 2004 hearing, the Bankruptcy Court also heard testimony from Nashban on the Interim Fee Application. R.583, at 127-162. Counsel for Quarles & Brady, Maxfield, and the United States Trustee[10] participated at both hearings.

Significantly, at the May 28, 2004 hearing, the Bankruptcy Court admitted into evidence Quarles & Brady's engagement letter for representation of the Debtors in the proposed chapter [9] Prior to filing the Disqualification Motion, counsel for Maxfield sent to Nashban two letters dated June 26, 2003, and October 20, 2003, advising him of the existence of certain undisclosed conflicts of interest on the part of Quarles & Brady in connection with its joint representation of the Debtors, putting him on notice of Maxfield's intent to bring these matters to the Bankruptcy Court's attention, and affording him the opportunity to mitigate the firm's potential losses. R. 912 (Exhibits A and B); Ex.5.

[10] The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice, charged by statute with the duty to oversee and supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. See 28 U.S.C. § 586(a). Congress expressly granted standing to the United States Trustee under 11 U.S.C. § 307 to raise and be heard on any issue under Title 11, except that the United States Trustee may not file a plan of reorganization under Chapter 11. See United States Trustee v. McCormick, Barstow, Sheppard, Wayte & Carruth (In re Donovan Corp.), 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000). The United States Trustee's oversight duties include monitoring employment applications filed under 11 U.S.C. § 327 and monitoring and reviewing applications for compensation and reimbursement filed under 11 U.S.C. § 330. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A), (H).

11 cases, dated May 8, 2003, and signed by Nashban on behalf of Quarles & Brady, and by Jennings and Janice Jennings on behalf of the various Debtors ("Engagement Letter"), which Quarles & Brady had not disclosed previously to the Bankruptcy Court or the United States Trustee. R.583, at 115; Ex.47. The Engagement Letter made specific reference to Maxfield's lawsuit against the Debtors and other lawsuits in which Alter Ego Claims were asserted, and provided, inter alia, as follows:

> Since we may be filing multiple Chapter 11 cases and potentially consolidating the cases, either administratively or substantively, by executing this engagement letter, you also waive any potential conflicts among the parties that may arise. In addition, we shall be allowed to share attorney/client privilege information among all of the individuals and entities that we will be representing in the Chapter 11 proceedings without breaching any rules of confidentiality. However, if the Court does determine that there is a conflict that cannot be waived, we understand that and agree that it is your intention that we represent the various [Trust Debtors] and the real estate partnership [RKB] and the remaining parties will seek other counsel, subject to Court approval.

Ex.47, at 4 (emphasis added).

At the conclusion of the hearing on the Disqualification Motion, the Bankruptcy Court took the matter under advisement and instructed the parties, including the United States Trustee, to submit post-hearing briefs on the Disqualification Motion in lieu of oral argument. R.583, at 126-127. At the conclusion of the hearing on the Interim Fee Application, the Bankruptcy Court also requested the filing of any post-hearing submissions on the Interim Fee Application in lieu of oral argument. R.583, at 160-162.

Subsequently, the United States Trustee filed a post-hearing memorandum in support of the Disqualification Motion on June 28, 2004. R.603. Quarles & Brady filed supplemental briefs in support of the Interim Fee Application and in opposition to the Disqualification Motion on June 28 and 29, 2004, respectively. R.602; R.604. On June 29, 2004, Maxfield filed post-hearing memoranda in support of the Disqualification Motion and in opposition to the Interim Fee Application. R.605; R.607.

IV. Trial Testimony on the Disqualification Motion

At the evidentiary hearing on the Disqualification Motion, Nashban testified that he had reviewed the schedules for Jennings and BLJ, indicating Jennings' wage claim and secured claim against BLJ, but that he did not amend the Application or Affidavit to disclose this information. R.663, at 17-19, 33-34, 37. Nashban acknowledged that Jennings claimed a security interest in the assets of BLJ, including its inventory and accounts receivable, and that Jennings' claim exceeded the value of those assets, but that to date he had taken no action to protect Jennings' interest in such collateral. R.663, at 20-21, 24, 30-31. In addition, Nashban testified that he was aware of additional prepetition transfers from BLJ to Jennings in the year before the filing of the bankruptcy cases in the amount of $650,000, but he did not amend the Application or Affidavit to disclose this information either. R.663, at 37-39; Ex.15. When asked if he could have disclosed these connections and sought a determination from the Bankruptcy Court at that time as to whether he could continue to represent both debtors, Nashban responded that, "[i]f I thought there was some conflict of interest, I would have sought a determination." R.663, at 18. Nashban admitted that his simultaneous representation of Jennings as a secured creditor and BLJ as a borrower was a potential conflict of interest but not an actual conflict. R.663, at 33, 39.

Prior to October 2002, RKB owned Bryco's business premises in Costa Mesa, California, and had entered into a five-year lease with Bryco, commencing on January 1, 2001. R.889, at 3; Ex.37. In October 2002, RKB sold the property to Knowleton Communities, Inc. ("Knowleton"), and Knowleton entered into a new one-year lease with Bryco, commencing October 17, 2002. R.889, at 3; Ex. 38. Jennings testified that RKB posted a security deposit of $337,507.20, which Knowleton required under its lease to Bryco. R.583, at 95; Ex.39. Jennings further testified that, at that time, RKB and Knowleton entered into an agreement for an assignment of rents, which provided that as monthly rent payments were made by Bryco to Knowleton, Knowleton would in turn return the money to RKB. R.583, at 99; Ex.45. Jennings also testified that Bryco currently owed Knowlton $150,000 (and thus by extension, RKB) in unpaid postpetition rent. R.583, at 101-102; R.889, at 3. Nashban testified on this subject that Quarles & Brady was currently conducting an investigation into the issue of whether RKB had posted a security deposit on behalf of Bryco, but that he had made no written disclosure to the Bankruptcy Court regarding such matter. R.663, at 62.

When questioned regarding $500,000 in loans payable by RKB to Jennings, which RKB apparently removed from its financial statements and tax returns in 2002 even though no actual money changed hands, Nashban testified that "this is the first I'm learning of the $500,000, as of this moment."[11] R.663, at 44; Ex.19-21.

[11] However, the record reflects that Benjamin R. Norris, a Quarles & Brady partner and the other principal attorney responsible for the representation of the Debtors in the chapter 11 cases, was present and appeared on behalf of the Debtors at the deposition of the Debtors' accountant, Gary Genske, on February 4, 2004, at which these matters were discussed. Ex.19.

At the April 29, 2004 hearing, the Bankruptcy Court accepted the stipulation of the parties that Quarles & Brady had taken no actions on behalf of any of the Debtors to recover any prepetition asset transfers among the Debtors. R.663, at 57.

With respect to the Engagement Letter, Nashban testified that all of the Debtors are jointly and severally liable for payment of Quarles & Brady's fees for services incurred on behalf of the Debtors. R.583, at 114-115.

V. The Bankruptcy Court's Ruling on the Disqualification Motion

On November 16, 2004, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order granting the Disqualification Motion and denying the Interim Fee Application, except that the Court approved reimbursement of all expenses requested by Quarles & Brady (totaling $14,917.90), and entered detailed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. R.889; R890.

The Bankruptcy Court concluded that Quarles & Brady's Rule 2014 disclosure was "woefully insufficient" because it failed to make the following disclosures:

(1) That Jennings was a secured creditor of BLJ and also claimed over $875,000 in back wages from BLJ (of which Quarles & Brady was aware on June 20 and 23, 2004, when it filed bankruptcy schedules for Jennings and BLJ);

(2) The existence of the Alter Ego Claims against Janice Jennings, RKB, and the Trust Debtors, even though the consolidation of that litigation was the primary reason for filing the chapter 11 cases, and the Engagement Letter addressed specifically the possible conflict of interest in representing both sides of that litigation;

(3) The existence of possible claims between RKB and Bryco arising from the RKB/Bryco lease and/or the Knowleton/Bryco lease, the assignment of lease revenue rights thereunder to RKB, and the circumstances surrounding the payment of the $337,507.20 security deposit by RKB on Bryco's behalf (of which Quarles & Brady was aware no later than October 1, 2003, when Jennings testified regarding these matters at his Rule 2004 examination); and

(4) That Quarles & Brady had performed estate planning work for Jennings during 2002.

R.889, at 8. The Bankruptcy Court found that despite Quarles & Brady's awareness of these matters, it failed to disclose any of these matters in the Affidavit, amend the Affidavit, or seek a ruling from the Court concerning the continued propriety of representing the Debtors under the circumstances. R.889, at 8-9.

The Bankruptcy Court further concluded that Quarles & Brady was not a disinterested person as required under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) as a result of:

(1) Quarles & Brady's simultaneous representation of Jennings and BLJ, where BLJ's schedules indicated that Jennings held a secured claim of $1,404,000 against BLJ;

(2) Quarles & Brady's simultaneous representation of Jennings and RKB, where the firm had a fiduciary duty to investigate a $500,000 loan from Jennings to RKB, which RKB apparently removed from its financial statements and tax returns, even though no money changed hands and RKB had the funds to pay the obligation; and

(3) Quarles & Brady's simultaneous representation of RKB and Bryco, in light of the questions surrounding RKB's payment of the security deposit to Knowleton on Bryco's behalf and the fact that RKB is at minimum a creditor of Bryco and perhaps could assert an administrative claim in Bryco's case.

R.889, at 10-12.

The Bankruptcy Court ordered the disqualification of Quarles & Brady as counsel for the Debtors, denied all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and required disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, based on Quarles & Brady's initial and continuing violation of the disclosure rules, lack of disinterestedness, and injury resulting to the bankruptcy estates from its inability to evaluate independently the various claims, transfers, and interests in the related cases. R.889, at 12-14.

VI. The Motions for Reconsideration

On November 26, 2004, Quarles & Brady filed its Motions for Reconsideration and memorandum in support thereof. R.895-898. On November 30, 2004, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order directing any party opposing the Motions for Reconsideration to file a response in opposition to the relief requested within ten days. R.901. Maxfield and the United States Trustee filed responses in opposition to the Motions for Reconsideration on December 8 and 10, 2004, respectively. R.912; R.914. On December 16, 2004, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order denying the Motions for Reconsideration. R.921. On December 27, 2004, Quarles & Brady filed a notice of appeal from the Bankruptcy Court's orders granting the Disqualification Motion and denying the Motions for Reconsideration. R.945.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Bankruptcy Court properly concluded that Quarles & Brady failed to comply with the requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 327 and Rule 2014(a), Fed. R. Bankr. P., by failing to disclose all of its connections with the Debtors in the Application and Affidavit or to amend the Application or Affidavit at any time to disclose any such connections of which Quarles & Brady became aware after the entry of the Employment Order. The Bankruptcy Code and Rules mandate such disclosure to enable the bankruptcy courts to make informed decisions whether professional persons meet the statutory requirements for employment under § 327(a). Neither the Bankruptcy Court, the creditors, nor the United States Trustee had any obligation to search through voluminous documents in the file or to conduct a fact-finding investigation to seek out conflicts of interest that Quarles & Brady did not disclose in the Application or Affidavit. That duty fell solely on Quarles & Brady. By failing to comply with its statutory duties of disclosure, Quarles & Brady deprived the Bankruptcy Court of its ability to make a proper and timely determination of Quarles & Brady's eligibility for employment as counsel for the Debtors.

The Bankruptcy Court properly concluded that Quarles & Brady was not a "disinterested person" as required for employment as counsel for the Debtors under § 327(a) by reason of undisclosed potential or actual conflicts of interest among the various Debtors, which rendered Quarles & Brady unable to represent the respective bankruptcy estates impartially, and resulted in irreparable injury to the estates. As a result of Quarles & Brady's divided loyalties, it was unable to evaluate independently the various claims, transfers, and interests in the Debtors' chapter 11 cases or otherwise to ensure that the Debtors complied with their fiduciary obligations to their respective bankruptcy estates and creditors, to the prejudice of the creditors.

Based on the record in the chapter 11 bankruptcy cases, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in disqualifying Quarles & Brady as counsel for Debtors, denying all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, where it properly concluded that: (1) Quarles & Brady had failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of § 327 and Rule 2014(a); (2) Quarles & Brady was not a disinterested person as required under § 327(a); and (3) Quarles & Brady's inability to evaluate independently the various claims, transfers, and interests in the chapter 11 cases resulted in injury to the Debtors. The courts of appeal have recognized that bankruptcy courts have the discretion to disqualify counsel for the bankruptcy estate or deny all compensation for a failure to comply with the statutory disclosure requirements, even if such failure is negligent or inadvertent. In addition, the courts of appeal have acknowledged the bankruptcy courts' discretion to disqualify counsel or deny its compensation for lack of disinterestedness, based on potential, as well as actual, conflicts of interest. In arguing erroneously that the Bankruptcy Court lacked discretion to disqualify Quarles & Brady or deny its compensation based solely on potential conflicts, Quarles & Brady has misconstrued the provisions of 11 U.S.C. §§ 327(a), 327(c), and 328(c), and ignored established precedents from the circuits holding to the contrary.

Finally, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the Motions for Reconsideration, where Quarles & Brady failed to show a manifest error of law or fact, to present any newly discovered evidence, or to make any showing required under Rule 60(b), Fed. R. Civ. P.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Err in Concluding that Quarles & Brady Failed to Comply with the Disclosure Requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 327 and Rule 2014(a), Fed. R. Bankr. P.

The Bankruptcy Court properly recognized that the Bankruptcy Code and Rules impose a mandatory obligation on an attorney seeking employment by a chapter 11 bankruptcy estate to make a complete disclosure of his or her relationship to the debtor and of any potential conflicts involved in the representation. R.889, at 7-8. Proper disclosure is necessary to enable a court to make an informed decision as to whether the professional person meets the statutory requirements for employment under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a), i.e., that such person does not "hold or represent an adverse interest to the estate" and is a "disinterested person." See 11 U.S.C. § 327(a); Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877, 881 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049, 116 S.Ct. 712, 133 L.Ed.2d 667 (1996); In re Granite Partners, L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 35 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998).

To enable bankruptcy courts to determine properly whether attorneys or other professional persons comply with these requirements, Rule 2014(a), Fed. R. Bankr. P., sets forth the following requirements for applications for employment under § 327:

> An order approving the employment of attorneys, accountants, appraisers, auctioneers, agents, or other professional persons pursuant to § 327, § 1103, or § 1114 of the Code shall be made only on application of the trustee or committee. The application shall be filed and, unless the case is a chapter 9 municipality case, a copy of the application shall be transmitted by the applicant to the United States trustee. The application shall state the specific facts showing the necessity for the employment, the name of the person to be employed, the reasons for the selection, the professional services to be rendered, any proposed arrangement for compensation, and, to the best of the applicant's knowledge, all of the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest, their respective attorneys and accountants, the United States trustee, or any person employed in the office of the United States trustee. The application shall be accompanied by a verified statement of the person to be employed setting forth the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest, their respective attorneys and accountants, the United States trustee, or any person employed in the office of the United States trustee. [Emphasis added.]

Rule 2014(a) requires all attorneys and other professional persons employed under § 327 to disclose all known connections with the debtor, creditors, and other parties in interest both in the application for employment and in an accompanying verified statement. Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir. 1998).

Because a professional person's failure to comply with the requirements of § 327(a) at any time during such person's employment may result in a denial of compensation, see 11 U.S.C. § 328(c), the courts have held that the duty to disclose is a continuing duty that survives the initial filing of the application for employment and requires professionals to reveal connections that arise after their retention. See In re Keller Financial Services of Florida, Inc., 248 B.R. 859, 898 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2000); In re Bennett Funding Group, Inc., 226 B.R. 331, 334 (Bankr. N.D. N.Y. 1998); In re Granite Partners, L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 35 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998). "[T]he need for professional self-scrutiny and avoidance of conflicts of interest does not end upon appointment." Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 57-58 (1st Cir. 1994).

Under Rule 2014(a), "[t]he scope of disclosure is much broader than the question of disqualification ... The applicant and the professional must disclose all connections and not merely those that rise to the level of conflicts." Keller Financial Services, 248 B.R. at 897 (quoting In re Granite Partners, Inc., L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 35 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998)); accord, In re Gulf Coast Orthopedic Center, 265 B.R. 318, 323 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2001). "The professional must disclose all facts that bear on his disinterestedness, and cannot usurp the court's function by unilaterally choosing which connections impact on his disinterestedness and which do not." Keller Financial Services, 248 B.R. at 897.

The courts of appeals have recognized the importance of these disclosure requirements and the power of the bankruptcy courts to sanction attorneys for failing to comply with these requirements. See, e.g., Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir. 1998); Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877, 881-882 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049, 116 S.Ct. 712, 133 L.Ed. 2d 667 (1996); Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 59-60 (1st Cir. 1994). In Park-Helena, in which the debtor's attorney failed to disclose the source of a prepetition retainer, the Ninth Circuit acknowledged that the disclosure requirements of Rule 2014 are applied "strictly." Id. at 881. "All facts that may be pertinent to a court's determination of whether an attorney is disinterested or holds an adverse interest to the estate must be disclosed." Id. at 882. "The duty of professionals is to disclose all connections with the debtor, debtor-in-possession, insiders, creditors, and parties in interest ... They cannot pick and choose which connections are irrelevant or trivial ... No matter how old the connection, no matter how trivial it appears, the professional seeking employment must disclose it." Id. The Ninth Circuit further stated that "[t]he disclosure rules are applied literally, even if the results are sometimes harsh." Id. at 881. Negligent or inadvertent omissions "do not vitiate the failure to disclose." Id. The failure to comply with the disclosure rules is a sanctionable violation, even if proper disclosure would have shown that the attorney had not actually violated any Bankruptcy Code provision or Bankruptcy Rule. Id. at 880. Applying these strict standards, the Park-Helena court held that the attorney's failure to describe the circumstances of the payment of the retainer violated the disclosure requirements of Rule 2014, and that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying all the attorney's requested fees as a sanction for the attorney's failure to disclose.[12] Id. at 882; see also

[12] In Park-Helena, the Ninth Circuit also held that the debtor's attorney failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of Rule 2016(b), Fed. R. Bankr. P. 63 F.3d at 881. The Park-Helena court concluded that the undisclosed payment of the attorney's retainer by the debtor's president who was also a creditor was a connection within the meaning of Rule 2014(a) and that the attorney's failure to disclose that payment constituted a violation of both Rule 2014(a) and Rule

Crivello, 134 F.3d at 836 ("failure to disclose is sufficient grounds to revoke an employment order and deny compensation"); Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d at 59-60 (counsel's failure to make full and spontaneous disclosure of financial transactions between debtor and insiders provided sufficient ground for denial of compensation).

In the instant cases, the Bankruptcy Court correctly followed applicable law in concluding that Quarles & Brady failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of § 327 and Rule 2014(a) by failing to disclose its connections with the Debtors in the Application and Affidavit, and by failing to amend the Affidavit to disclose any additional connections of which Quarles & Brady subsequently became aware.

The Application disclosed that "[t]o the best of the Debtors' knowledge," Quarles & Brady had "no connection with any creditors of the Debtor or any other parties in interest" and that Quarles & Brady represented "no creditors of the estate nor any interest adverse to the Debtors as Debtors-in-possession or to the estate in matters upon which it is to be engaged to perform legal services for the Debtors-in-possession." R.20; Ex.18 (emphasis added).

Nashban's sworn Affidavit disclosed that he, Benjamin R. Norris, and Quarles & Brady did not "hold or represent any interest adverse to the estate" and were "disinterested persons as required by § 327(a)." The Affidavit further disclosed that Quarles & Brady had 2016(b). 63 F.3d at 880-882. In so holding, the Court noted that the fiduciary duties of disclosure under Rule 2014(a) and Rule 2016(b) are similar and overlapping ("The disclosure requirements of Rule 2014 are applied as strictly as the requirements of Rule 2016 and section 329 ..."). Id. at 881. Other courts of appeal have similarly required or upheld sanctions for attorneys' failure to comply with the disclosure requirements of Rule 2016(b). See In re Kisseberth, 273 F.3d 714, 721 (6th Cir. 2001); In re Independent Engineering Co., 197 F.3d 13, 17 (1st Cir. 1999); In re Downs, 103 F.3d 472, 479-480 (6th Cir. 1996); In re Prudhomme, 43 F.3d 1000, 1003-1004 (5th Cir. 1995).

“no connection with the Debtors herein, its [sic] creditors or any other party in interest” and that “it represents no interest adverse to that of the Debtors” except that it was owed fees “for legal work” done for Jennings prepetition, which bill was paid to Quarles & Brady prior to the commencement of the chapter 11 cases. R.20; Ex.18 (emphasis added).

The Application and Affidavit disclosed no connections between Quarles & Brady and the Debtors other than unspecified prepetition legal services performed for Jennings. The Bankruptcy Court correctly found that Quarles & Brady had failed to disclose in the Application and Affidavit, or to amend subsequently the Affidavit to disclose: (1) that Jennings was a secured creditor of BLJ and also claimed back wages from BLJ; (2) the existence of the Alter Ego Claims and the potential conflict in representing both sides of the litigation; (3) the existence of possible claims between RKB and Bryco arising from RKB’s payment of the $337,507.20 security deposit on behalf of Bryco and from the assignment of rents under the Knowleton/Bryco lease to RKB; and (4) that Quarles & Brady had performed estate planning work for Jennings during 2002. R.889, at 8.

While Quarles & Brady is quick to point out that neither the United States Trustee nor any other party in interest objected to the Application, and that the Court approved the Application on May 28, 2003, Appellant’s Brief, at 14, Quarles & Brady failed to disclose any of these connections in the Application and Affidavit. Nonetheless, Quarles & Brady insists that it had in fact disclosed all of these matters at various times during the proceedings, both before and after the Bankruptcy Court’s entry of the Employment Order on May 28, 2003, citing to innumerable references to such matters in the Debtors’ schedules and pleadings filed in the Bankruptcy Court, as well as testimony or argument at various hearings and the Debtors' meeting of creditors held (on June 24, 2003) pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 341(a) ("§ 341 Meeting"), during a period of over one year.[13] Appellant's Brief, at 8-22, 42-52.

In addressing attorneys' duties of disclosure under § 327(a) and Rule 2014(a), the courts have held that a bankruptcy court has no duty to search the file to ferret out information of actual or potential adverse interests or other evidence of noncompliance with § 327. See, e.g., In re Love, 163 B.R. 164, 169 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1993). "It is not ... the obligation of the bankruptcy court to search the record for possible conflicts of interest. That obligation belongs to the party who seeks employment by the estate ..." In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1317 (3rd Cir. 1991). The court has "no duty to rummage through files or conduct independent fact-finding investigations in order to determine whether prospective attorneys are involved in actual or potential conflicts of interest." In re Tinley Plaza Associates, L.P., 142 B.R. 272, 278-279 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1992).

[13] Significantly, on August 29, 2003, Nashban filed on behalf of BLJ an application under § 327 to employ Jennings as manager of BLJ, in order to obtain Bankruptcy Court authorization to pay him a postpetition salary of $25,000 per month (which he had accrued prepetition). Appellant's Brief, at 19, 46. The application and Rule 2014(a) statement signed by Jennings disclosed that Jennings was a creditor of BLJ. R.180. On October 16, 2003, the Court denied the application after Maxfield and the United States Trustee objected that Jennings was not disinterested and that the proposed salary was excessive. R.190; R.957, at 56-66, 70. Incredibly, Quarles & Brady cites to Jennings' employment application as an example of its disclosure of these facts to the Bankruptcy Court. That Nashban made these disclosures in Jennings' employment application, but failed to do so in Quarles & Brady's own Application, is inexcusable under the circumstances. In addition, Quarles & Brady states that it disclosed in its Rule 2016(b) statements filed in each of the Debtors' chapter 11 cases the fact that Jennings and BLJ paid Quarles & Brady's retainer on behalf of all of the Debtors. The source of payment of the retainer was a connection that Quarles & Brady was also required under Rule 2014(a) to fully disclose in the Affidavit, but did not. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881.

In In re Marine Outlet, Inc., 135 B.R. 154, 156 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1991), where the court held that special counsel for the chapter 11 estate had failed to disclose properly its representation of the debtor's principal, who also claimed to be a creditor of the debtor, the court stated as follows:

> There is no duty placed on the United States Trustee or on creditors to search the record for the existence, vel non, of a conflict of interest of a professional sought to be employed. On the contrary, there is a definite affirmative duty placed on a professional to disclose his and her connection with parties whose interest is or may be antagonistic or opposite to the interest of the general estate ...

Consistent with applicable law, the Bankruptcy Court properly recognized that the burden of bringing any actual or potential conflicts to the attention of the Court was Quarles & Brady's, and not Maxfield's, the United States Trustee's, or any other party's. R.889, at 9-10.

Notwithstanding Quarles & Brady's claim that the parties and the Bankruptcy Court were all aware of the Alter Ego Claims, the Bankruptcy Court and the United States Trustee did not become aware of Quarles & Brady's Engagement Letter until the May 28, 2004 hearing on the Disqualification Motion, over a year after Nashban signed the Engagement Letter. Only then did the Court and the United States Trustee first learn that the Debtors had expressly agreed to waive any potential conflicts on the part of Quarles & Brady and that Quarles & Brady would represent only the Trust Debtors and RKB if the Bankruptcy Court determined that Quarles & Brady had a non-waivable conflict arising from Quarles & Brady's representation of both sides of that litigation. Ex.47. The Bankruptcy Court, however, could not timely make this determination absent any proper disclosure of these conflicts by Quarles & Brady. In any event, a law firm that is not disinterested may not represent a debtor even if that debtor has consented to such representation and waived the conflict. See In re Granite Partners, L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 34 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998); In re American Printers & Lithographers, Inc., 148 B.R. 862, 867 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1992); In re Amdura Corp., 121 B.R. 862, 866 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1990).

Quarles & Brady's contention that it fully disclosed its prepetition legal work for Jennings is disingenuous, in that Quarles & Brady failed to disclose the nature or the timing of the services performed. Appellant's Brief, at 54-55. These prepetition legal services, i.e., estate planning services, have in fact become the subject of contested litigation in Jennings' chapter 11 case, arising from Maxfield's objection to Jennings' claim of an exemption in the $500,000 annuity purchased by Jennings (acting on Quarles & Brady's advice). Ex.9-10.

Quarles & Brady's argument that it sufficiently disclosed its connections with the Debtors is further betrayed by Nashban's own testimony that "[if I thought there was some conflict, I would have sought a determination." R.663, at 18. Quarles & Brady did not have the right to pick and choose which connections were worthy of disclosure. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. Nashban was aware of Jennings' status as a secured creditor and wage claimant of BLJ, which he admitted was at least a potential conflict, from the time that Quarles & Brady filed Jennings' and BLJ's bankruptcy schedules on June 20 and 23, 2003, at the latest, although Quarles & Brady indicates in its brief that it was aware of this relationship even prior to filing the Application. Appellant's Brief, at 42. Nashban became aware of the potential conflict between RKB and Bryco on or before June 23, 2003, when Quarles & Brady listed RKB as a creditor on Bryco's Schedules. Appellant's Brief, at 52. He was aware of the Alter Ego Claims, the Engagement Letter, and Quarles & Brady's prepetition engagement to perform estate planning services for Jennings at the outset of the chapter 11 cases; yet Quarles & Brady disclosed none of these connections in the Affidavit, nor did it at any time amend the Affidavit to disclose such matters. By failing to comply with its fiduciary duty to disclose all its connections with the Debtors, as required by § 327 and Rule 2014(a), Quarles & Brady deprived the Bankruptcy Court of its ability to make a proper and timely determination of Quarles & Brady's eligibility for employment as counsel for the Debtors in the chapter 11 cases.

II. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Err in Concluding that Quarles & Brady Was Not a Disinterested Person under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a).

Based on the record in this case, the Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that Quarles & Brady was not a disinterested person under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a).

Title 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) provides as follows:

> Except as otherwise provided in this section, the trustee,[14] with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys, accountants, appraisers, auctioneers, or other professional persons, that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title. [Emphasis added.]

The purpose of § 327(a) is to ensure impartiality in bankruptcy representation. Electro-Wire Products, Inc. v. Sirote & Permutt, P.C. (In re Prince), 40 F.3d 356, 360 (11th Cir. 1994). The requirements for employment of a professional person to represent the bankruptcy estate under § 327(a) are two-fold: (1) the professional person must "not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate"; and (2) the person must be a "disinterested person." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a).

[14] As used in § 327(a), "trustee" also includes a debtor in possession in a chapter 11 bankruptcy case. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a).

While the Bankruptcy Code does not define "hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate," the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has defined this phrase as follows:

> ... possessing, or serving as an attorney for a person possessing, either an "economic interest that would tend to lessen the value of the bankruptcy estate or that would create either an actual or potential dispute in which the estate is a rival claimant ... or ... a predisposition under the circumstances that render such a bias against the estate." [Emphasis added.]

Id. at 361; accord, Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 835 (7th Cir. 1998). Title 11 U.S.C. § 101(14) defines the term "disinterested person," as used in § 327(a), in pertinent part, as a "person that ... is not a creditor, an equity security holder, or an insider" and who "does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors or equity holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor ... or for any other reason." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(A), (E) (emphasis added); Prince, 40 F.3d at 360-361; Crivello, 134 F.3d at 835. Together, these statutory requirements of disinterestedness and no interest adverse to the estate "serve the important policy of ensuring that all professionals appointed pursuant to § 327(a) tender undivided loyalty and provide untainted advice and assistance in furtherance of their fiduciary responsibilities." Id. at 836 (quoting Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 58 (1st Cir. 1994)).

In In re Prince, the Eleventh Circuit reversed an award of attorneys' fees to the debtor's counsel after counsel had withdrawn from the case, and denied all fees, holding that the debtor's counsel could not qualify as a disinterested person, and thus could not receive any compensation pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 328(c). 40 F.3d at 361. There, the debtor's counsel initially failed to disclose its prepetition performance of estate planning services for the debtor and his wife, its representation of a corporation operated and controlled by the debtor, and its receipt of a potential preferential transfer from the debtor. Id. at 358. Within five months before the commencement of the debtor's chapter 11 bankruptcy case, the debtor's counsel performed estate planning services which resulted in a transfer of property worth approximately $600,000 from the debtor to his wife for no valuable consideration, which counsel also had failed to disclose. Id. Subsequently, counsel amended its application for employment, stating that it inadvertently failed to disclose its performance of prepetition estate planning services for the debtor, but failed to disclose fully the timing of such services and any impact of such services on the bankruptcy proceedings. Id. at 359. Later, counsel filed a second amendment stating that it inadvertently failed to disclose its prepetition representation of the debtor's wife in other matters unrelated to the bankruptcy proceedings. Id.

The Prince court concluded that the debtor's counsel could not qualify as a disinterested person under the facts of that case, and that whether counsel "inadvertently or intentionally neglected to inform the court of its conflicts is of no import." Id. at 361. The Eleventh Circuit stated that by representing the debtor in his bankruptcy case, it deprived the debtor of "a conflict-free, impartial independent evaluation of the potential claims of and against his estate," particularly in light of its inability to evaluate independently the $600,000 property transaction between the debtor and his wife and its possible effect on the debtor's estate. Id. at 360. The Eleventh Circuit noted that the actual prejudice to the debtor in Prince, as in the instant cases, was not counsel's failure to pursue claims, but its inability to independently evaluate claims for its client. Id. The court found, as in these cases, the debtor's counsel "was in the unfortunate position of having too many masters." Id. at 361.

Quarles & Brady mistakenly attempts to distinguish Prince; it contends that Prince involved only actual conflicts of interest, while conceding that its own conflicts in these cases are at least potential conflicts. Appellant's Brief, at 37-39, 55-56. In defining disinterestedness, however, the Eleventh Circuit recognized that it could arise from either an actual or potential conflict. Id. at 360-361. By mischaracterizing Prince as holding that only actual conflicts are actionable, Quarles & Brady wrongly suggests that the Eleventh Circuit is at odds with other circuits, which have permitted disqualification and denial of compensation based on potential conflicts, but it is not. See In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 476 (3rd Cir. 1998) (holding that bankruptcy court has discretion to disqualify any attorney who has potential conflict of interest); Interwest Business Equipment, Inc. v. United States Trustee (In re Interwest Business Equipment, Inc.), 23 F.3d 311, 316 (10th Cir. 1994) (holding that § 327(c) "does not preempt the more basic requirements of [§327(a)]").

Here, Quarles & Brady, like the debtor's counsel in Prince, failed to disclose that it performed prepetition estate planning services for the debtor.[15] As a result of prepetition estate planning services by Quarles & Brady, hastened by Maxfield's lawsuit against the Debtors,

[15] In Prince, however, unlike these cases, the debtor's counsel subsequently attempted to mitigate any harm to the estate by amending its application to disclose its prepetition estate planning services for the debtor and voluntarily withdrawing from the case. 40 F.3d at 359. Here, Quarles & Brady at no time amended the Application or Affidavit to disclose this connection or any other connection with the Debtors, nor did it ever offer to withdraw from representing any of the Debtors.

Jennings purchased a $925,000 homestead in Florida and a $500,000 annuity. After the commencement of the bankruptcy cases, on July 7, 2003, Maxfield filed an objection to Jennings' claim of an exemption in the annuity (but not in the homestead) on the grounds that Jennings converted non-exempt property to exempt property with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors.[16] Ex. 9. This matter has been the subject of contested litigation between Maxfield and the Jennings estate, which is still pending, and in which Quarles & Brady attorneys are potential witnesses. Quarles & Brady, however, failed to disclose in the Affidavit the nature and timing of its prepetition estate planning services, despite the relevance of those legal services to pending litigation in the bankruptcy proceedings. Whether Jennings ultimately prevails in the exemption litigation is irrelevant because Quarles & Brady's prepetition representation of Jennings in this matter would in any event taint its ability to represent independently and disinterestedly the Jennings estate, and the interest of its creditors (who would directly benefit [16] Maxfield alleged that the annuity exemption claim violated § 222.30(2), Fla. Stat., which provides that "[a]ny conversion by a debtor of an asset that results in the proceeds of the asset becoming exempt by law from the claims of a creditor of the debtor is a fraudulent asset conversion as to the creditor ... if the debtor made the conversion with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditor." Ex.9. Quarles & Brady asserts that "Florida law is clear that an individual debtor's pre-bankruptcy planning and maximization of available exemptions is permissible," citing Havoco of America, Ltd. v. Hill, 790 So.2d 1018 (Fla. 2001), for the proposition that a debtor may transfer non-exempt assets and take advantage of the unlimited homestead exemption even if such transfers were undertaken to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Appellant's Brief, at 55. Havoco is inapposite here and in no way condones Jennings' or Quarles & Brady's conduct in connection with Jennings' purchase of, or claim of an exemption in, the $500,000 annuity. In Havoco, the Florida Supreme Court, deciding an issue certified by the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals, held that because Florida's unlimited homestead exemption originates from the Florida Constitution, see Fla. Const., Art. X, § 4, it preempts any act of the Florida legislature and thus is not subject to forfeiture pursuant to any state statute, including § 222.30(2). Id. at 1029. Maxfield, however, objected only to Jennings' claim of an exemption in an annuity under § 222.21(2), Fla. Stat., which is subject to forfeiture under § 222.30(2). R.35; Ex.3 (Exhibit C); Ex. 9.

in the amount of $500,000 if the Bankruptcy Court sustains Maxfield's objection), in this litigation.[17]

Where a single law firm sought to represent multiple interrelated debtors in related chapter 11 cases, as in the instant cases, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the bankruptcy court's denial of the debtors' application for employment of the law firm as counsel for the debtors, holding that the firm failed to meet the minimum requirements of § 327(a). Interwest Business Equipment, Inc. v. United States Trustee (Interwest Business Equipment, Inc.), 23 F.3d 311, 318 (10th Cir. 1994). In Interwest, the law firm was seeking court approval to represent two related corporations, the sole shareholder of both corporations, and a fourth related entity, which received income from one of the corporations pursuant to a management contract and also made lease payments for that corporation. Id. at 313. Unlike here, however, the law firm in Interwest disclosed substantial intercompany debt among the debtors in its Rule 2014(a) affidavits, but the affidavits did not disclose any further information regarding the validity or amount of the intercompany debt or other information sufficient to address any of the conflicts involved in representing the separate estates. Id. at 314. The Tenth Circuit concluded that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding: (1) that the firm's simultaneous representation of each debtor in possession and one of the other estates as creditor constituted representation of an interest adverse to the estate, and that the firm was thus not disinterested; and (2) that the existence of a prepetition debt from one estate to the other created a disqualifying conflict of interest. Id. at 314, 318. In so holding, the court recognized the importance of the fiduciary duty of the debtor in possession, as trustee of the estate, and of counsel's obligation to serve the trustee independently. Id. at 317; see also In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1317-1318 (3d Cir. 1991) (affirming disqualification of counsel for multiple related bankruptcy estates of corporation and its two principals, where estates had claims against one another and counsel failed to disclose potential conflicts); In re Coal River Resources, Inc., 321 B.R. 184, 189 (W.D. Va. 2005) (affirming bankruptcy court's finding that single attorney could not represent interests of four related corporate debtors with intercompany debts, and in particular fiduciary obligation of each debtor to its own creditors); In re Wheatfield Business Park LLC, 286 B.R. 412, 418 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2002) ("Where a bankruptcy debtor is a creditor of a related debtor, it is presumptively improper for the same attorney ... to be general counsel for the related debtors"); In re Lee, 94 B.R. 172, 180 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1988) (counsel for two related debtors could not represent both estates, where debt existed between estates and counsel failed to disclose potential conflicts).

Here, in concluding that Quarles & Brady lacked disinterestedness, the Bankruptcy Court closely scrutinized actual or potential conflicts existing among the Debtors.

First, as a result of Jennings' $1,404,000 secured claim against BLJ, Quarles & Brady, as attorneys for both estates, had a fiduciary obligation to represent directly conflicting interests. Quarles & Brady was duty-bound to represent zealously both the interest of Jennings as secured creditor and that of BLJ as the borrower. Jennings' loan documents indicated that he asserted a prepetition security interest in all or substantially all of BLJ's assets, including accounts receivable and all firearms and other inventory. Ex.14. Even if Jennings' security interest extended to after-acquired property of BLJ, by operation of 11 U.S.C. § 552(a),[18] Jennings' security interest was cut off as of the date of the filing of BLJ's petition and thus did not extend to any inventory, accounts receivable, or other new assets acquired by BLJ after the filing of its petition. Based on BLJ's schedules, because BLJ's prepetition assets were listed with a value less than the amount of Jennings' secured claim, Jennings was an undersecured creditor. R.43; Ex.1 (Schedules B and D). Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(c) and (e), BLJ could not use this collateral without providing adequate protection to Jennings to protect his bankruptcy estate against any diminution in the value of the collateral.[19] As counsel for Jennings' bankruptcy estate, Quarles & Brady was obligated to take the necessary actions to protect the estate's interest in BLJ's inventory and other assets.

On the other hand, as counsel for BLJ's bankruptcy estate, Quarles & Brady recognized that BLJ needed to sell its firearm inventory to generate cash to stay in business. During the first month and a half after filing, BLJ consumed $266,019.50 in prepetition inventory. R.889, at 11; Ex.4. By November 2003, BLJ had sold all of its prepetition inventory subject to Jennings' prepetition lien, which BLJ valued at $1,117,336.50 in its schedules; and BLJ's estate had consumed all proceeds of such inventory. R.889, at 11; Ex.4. At no time did Quarles & Brady, in its dual role as counsel for Jennings' bankruptcy estate, seek any adequate protection from BLJ for Jennings' estate for the use of Jennings' collateral, which resulted in the dissipation of all or substantially all of Jennings' collateral, and thus direct injury to Jennings' bankruptcy estate. R.663, at 23-34. Because the creditor constituency of the Jennings estate is entirely different from that of BLJ, Jennings' creditor constituency suffered a material loss. R.889, at 11.

[18] Title 11 U.S.C. § 552(a) provides that "[e]xcept as provided in subsection (b) of this section, property acquired by the estate or the debtor after the commencement of the case is not subject to any lien resulting from any security agreement entered into by the debtor before the commencement of the case."

[19] Title 11 U.S.C. § 363(c) provides that the trustee may not use, sell, or lease cash collateral unless each entity that has an interest in such cash collateral consents or the court approves such use, sale, or lease of cash collateral, after notice and a hearing. Section 363(e) further provides that on request of an entity that has an interest in property used, sold, or leased by the trustee, the court shall prohibit or condition such use, sale or lease as is necessary to provide adequate protection of such interest. Title 11 U.S.C. § 361 provides examples of adequate protection required to be provided under § 363, in order to protect against a decrease in the value of an entity's interest in property, including periodic cash payments or an additional or replacement lien.

Quarles & Brady asserts mistakenly that during its representation of the Debtors, "all of the assets remained available for creditors, so no dollars left the universe of the BLJ or [Jennings] estates." Appellant's Brief, at 33-34. In fact, the Jennings estate suffered actual injury as a result of Quarles & Brady's divided loyalties in representing both the Jennings and BLJ estates. BLJ has ceased operations, and it has depleted all of its inventory and other assets. By operation of §552(a), Jennings' security interest did not extend to any assets which BLJ acquired postpetition, and thus Quarles & Brady's inaction resulted in extinguishing Jennings' lien. Quarles & Brady's suggestion that it can avoid injury to the Jennings estate by providing for the reinstatement of Jennings' lien through a plan of reorganization is completely without merit because there is nothing left to reinstate. Thus, the Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that Quarles & Brady's simultaneous representation of Jennings and BLJ rendered it not disinterested. R.889, at 10-12.

Second, in the year preceding the bankruptcy, RKB apparently removed a $500,000 debt to Jennings from its financial statements and tax returns, even though no money changed hands and RKB had the funds to the pay this obligation. R.889, at 12. As counsel for the Jennings bankruptcy estate, Quarles & Brady had a fiduciary duty to investigate the existence of the prepetition loan relationship and "cancellation of indebtedness." Conversely, as counsel for RKB's bankruptcy estate, Quarles & Brady had a duty to its client to defend this transfer. Because of its divided loyalties, Quarles & Brady placed itself in the untenable position of representing two clients with diametrically-opposed interests. Quarles & Brady's only response on this issue is that it did not improperly fail to disclose this matter since Nashban testified at the hearing on the Disqualification Motion on April 29, 2004, that he had no prior knowledge of this issue.[20] This is irrelevant, however, because the Bankruptcy Court did not find a lack of disclosure of this connection, but nonetheless correctly found that once this matter became known, Quarles & Brady had a duty to investigate the facts for the benefit of one estate to the detriment of the other. R.889, at 8, 12. Because Quarles & Brady would then be compelled to represent an interest of one estate materially adverse to the other, the Bankruptcy Court thus correctly concluded that Quarles & Brady's simultaneous representation of Jennings and RKB rendered it not disinterested. R.889, at 12.

[20] Notwithstanding Nashban's profession of ignorance, Quarles & Brady knew or should have known of this matter because its partner and co-counsel for the Debtors, Benjamin R. Norris, appeared on behalf of the Debtors at the deposition of the Debtors' accountant, Gary Genske, on February 4, 2004, at which Mr. Genske testified on this issue. Ex.19.

Third, in light of questions surrounding RKB's payment of the $337,520.77 security deposit to Knowleton on behalf of Bryco and the fact that RKB was at least a creditor of Bryco and could assert an administrative claim in Bryco's case, the Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that Quarles & Brady's simultaneous representation of RKB and Bryco rendered it not disinterested. R.889, at 12.

Nonetheless, despite its duty to represent vigorously the separate bankruptcy estates, each of which had different creditor constituencies, Quarles & Brady argues that hiring multiple sets of attorneys for the Debtors to permit them to assert claims against each other "made no sense and only would serve to deplete the estates." Appellant's Brief, at 35. That was not Quarles & Brady's decision to make, however; it was the Bankruptcy Court's. By failing to bring any potential conflict of interest to the Bankruptcy Court's attention so it could properly and timely decide these issues, Quarles & Brady usurped this decision-making process from the Bankruptcy Court.

III. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised its Discretion in Disqualifying Quarles & Brady as Counsel for the Debtors, Denying All of its Compensation in the Chapter 11 Cases, and Requiring Disgorgement of Any Prepetition Retainer, Based on Quarles & Brady's Failure to Disclose and Lack of Disinterestedness.

A. The Failure to Disclose by Itself Was Sufficient Grounds for Disqualification and Denial of Compensation.

The Bankruptcy Court correctly exercised its discretion in disqualifying Quarles & Brady as counsel for the Debtors, denying all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, based on both Quarles & Brady's failure to disclose its connections with the Debtors and its lack of disinterestedness.

Failure to disclose is sufficient grounds to revoke an employment order and deny compensation. Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir. 1998). The failure to disclose the professional person's relationships is sufficient in and of itself to require denial and disgorgement of all compensation separate and apart from any question that there is any actual conflict of interest. In re Gulf Coast Orthopedic Center, 265 B.R. 318, 323 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2001).

The courts of appeal have held that "[e]ven a negligent or inadvertent failure to disclose fully relevant information may result in a denial of all requested fees." In re Kisseberth, 273 F.3d 714, 721 (6th Cir. 2001); Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d at 877, 882 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049, 116 S.Ct. 712, 133 L.Ed.2d 667 (1996); see also In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1318 (3rd Cir. 1991) ("[n]egligence does not excuse the failure to disclose a possible conflict of interest"). In so ruling, the circuits courts have recognized that bankruptcy courts have broad and inherent authority to deny any and all compensation where an attorney fails to comply with the disclosure requirements for employment and compensation of attorneys. Kisseberth, 273 F.3d at 721; Law Offices of Nicholas A. Franke v. Tiffany (In re Lewis), 113 F.3d 1040, 1045 (9th Cir. 1997).

In Kisseberth, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the bankruptcy court's disgorgement and denial of fees for the failure of the debtor's attorney to disclose all payments received from the debtors as required under Rule 2016(b). 273 F.3d at 716. In that case, the debtor's attorney was an experienced bankruptcy practitioner who claimed that his failure to disclose resulted from negligence or inadvertence. Id. at 716, 718. Nonetheless, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the bankruptcy court's disgorgement of all but $2,288 in fees received and denied all other compensation requested by the attorney. 273 F.3d at 716; see also In re Downs, 103 F.3d 472, 479-480 (6th Cir. 1996) (bankruptcy court abused its discretion in not requiring disgorgement of all fees as result of attorney's willful failure to disclose retainer as required under Rule 2016(b)).

Similarly, in Park-Helena, the Ninth Circuit held that the bankruptcy court's denial of all the debtor's attorney's fees based upon his failure to disclose the source of a retainer as required under both Rule 2014(a) and Rule 2016(b) was within the bankruptcy court's discretion. 63 F.3d at 881; see also In re Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1045-1046 (Ninth Circuit affirmed order requiring attorney for chapter 11 debtor to disgorge all retainers received, where debtor's counsel misrepresented the timing of retainers received and failed to properly supplement his initial disclosure of compensation under Rule 2016(b)); BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d at 1318 (Third Circuit affirmed disqualification of counsel for trustee in multiple related bankruptcy cases, where counsel failed to disclose potential conflicts of interest, notwithstanding its claim of negligence); In re Jore Corporation, 298 B.R. 703, 726, 732 (Bankr. D. Mont. 2003) (court disqualified debtor's attorneys, disallowed all fees and costs incurred, and required disgorgement of all fees and costs previously received, based on attorneys' failure to disclose existence of limited conflicts waiver in its Rule 2014(a) statement, although attorneys claimed that failure to disclose was negligent or inadvertent).[21]

The First and Fifth Circuits have also upheld the complete denial of compensation for violations of the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure requirements. See In re Independent Engineering Co., 197 F.3d 13, 17 (1st Cir. 1999) (court affirmed disgorgement of all fees for attorney's failure to disclose postpetition draws and payments from debtor under Rule 2016(b)); In re Prudhomme, 43 F.3d 1000, 1003-1004 (5th Cir. 1995) (court affirmed disgorgement of all fees due to attorney's failure to disclose retainer under Rule 2016(b)).

Although Quarles & Brady claims that it "engaged in no active efforts to conceal any material facts," Appellant's Brief, at 38, in light of Nashban's more than 30 years of legal experience, Quarles & Brady's failure to comply with the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure rules was inexcusable. The Bankruptcy Court thus properly observed that it had the discretion to disqualify Quarles & Brady as counsel for the Debtors or to deny its compensation based on its [21] Quarles & Brady's failure to disclose the contents of the Engagement Letter, in which Quarles & Brady acknowledged "potential conflicts of interest," and confirmed the Debtors' agreement that the firm would represent only RKB and the Trust Debtors if the Bankruptcy Court were to find an actual non-waivable conflict, is similar to the non-disclosure in Jore. There, the bankruptcy court disqualified the debtor's counsel and disallowed and required disgorgement of all of its compensation and expenses for failing to disclose the terms of a limited conflicts waiver from the debtor's primary secured creditor, wherein the debtor's counsel agreed that it would not represent the debtor in "litigation directly adverse" to the creditor, despite counsel's assertion that the non-disclosure was negligent or inadvertent. In re Jore Corporation, 298 B.R. 703, 709, 726, 732 (Bankr. D. Mont. 2003). In both Jore and the instant cases, the bankruptcy courts were unable to make a timely determination regarding whether a non-waivable conflict existed because the attorneys failed to disclose properly the terms of the conflicts waivers and the attorneys' connections. Unlike Jore, where the court denied all fees and expenses, the Bankruptcy Court here exercised its discretion to allow Quarles & Brady's request for reimbursement of expenses. R.890; cf. Prince, 40 F.3d at 359, 361-362 (Eleventh Circuit denied all fees and expenses although counsel subsequently amended its employment application to disclose connections with debtor and his wife).

inadequate disclosure alone, but that the Court need not make that determination because the Court also found that the Quarles & Brady was not disinterested. R.889, at 10.

B. Lack of Disinterestedness Is Grounds for Disqualification and Denial of Compensation Based on Either Potential or Actual Conflicts of Interest.

Title 11 U.S.C. § 328(c) provides as follows:

> Except as provided in section 327(c), 327(e), or 1107(b) of this title, the court may deny allowance of compensation for services and reimbursement of expenses of a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103 of this title if, at any time during such professional persons' employment under section 327 or 1003 of this title, such professional person is not a disinterested person, or represents or holds an interest adverse to the interest of the estate with respect to the matter on which the professional person is employed. [Emphasis added.]

In Prince, the Eleventh Circuit held that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in awarding compensation to the debtor's counsel, where, as in the instant cases, counsel was not disinterested and had failed to disclose its connections with the debtor and other parties in interest. 40 F.3d at 361. Similarly, in these cases, like Prince, the Debtors' counsel had "too many masters." Id.

The Eleventh Circuit properly noted that § 328(c) is permissive; it permits a court to deny compensation to professionals found not to be disinterested persons but does not require a denial of fees in those instances. Id. at 359. The Prince court further noted that denial of fees is proper when actual injury to the debtor's estate occurs. Id. at 360. In this regard, the court stated:

> ... "[I]n exercising the discretion granted by statute we think the [bankruptcy] court should lean strongly toward denial of fees, and if the past benefit to the wrongdoer fiduciary can be quantified, to require disgorgement of compensation previously paid that fiduciary even before the conflict arose."

Id. at 360 (quoting Gray v. English, 30 F.3d 1319, 1324 (10th Cir. 1994). The Bankruptcy Court properly followed this legal standard in denying all Quarles & Brady's compensation, where actual injury to the Debtors' estates occured as a result of its simultaneous representation of the Debtors in these cases. As noted above, however, the Bankruptcy Court also had the discretion to deny Quarles & Brady's compensation and require disgorgement of its retainer due to its failure to comply with the disclosure requirements of § 327 and Rule 2014(a), even if negligent or inadvertent. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 882; Jore, 298 B.R. at 729; see also Kisseberth, 273 F.3d at 721 (affirming denial of compensation for failure to disclose payments under Rule 2016(b)).

Quarles & Brady's primary argument in this appeal is that the Bankruptcy Court mistakenly relied on Prince and failed to comply with 11 U.S.C. § 327(c) by disqualifying Quarles & Brady and denying its compensation based upon potential conflicts, which Quarles & Brady concedes it had. Appellant's Brief, at 37-39, 55-56. This contention misconstrues the Eleventh Circuit's holding in Prince and the meaning of §§ 327(a), 327(c), and 328(c), and ignores the important interrelationship among these provisions.

> In a case under chapter 7, 12 or 11 of this title, a person is not disqualified for employment under this section solely because of such person's employment by or representation of a creditor, unless there is objection by another creditor or the United States trustee, in which case the court shall disapprove such employment if there is an actual conflict of interest. [Emphasis added.]

Section 327(c) provides that a professional person's representation of a creditor, by itself, does not automatically disqualify such person from employment on behalf of the bankruptcy estate, unless the court determines that such person has an actual conflict of interest. Section 327(c) was not applicable to Prince, because the debtor's counsel in that case had already withdrawn from its representation of the debtor prior to the court's determination of counsel's application for compensation, and in any event, the decision does not indicate that the law firm had at any time represented a creditor of the debtor, prepetition or postpetition. In Prince, the Eleventh Circuit properly denied the counsel's fees under § 328(c) because it was not a disinterested person during the bankruptcy case, not because it had an actual conflict of interest. 40 F.3d at 361. As defined by the Prince court, disinterestedness may arise from either an actual or a potential conflict. Id. at 360-361. In the instant cases, the Bankruptcy Court properly applied the same disinterestedness standard in concluding that Quarles & Brady was not a disinterested person based on potential or actual conflicts of interest. R.889, at 6.

Consistent with Prince, the Tenth Circuit, in Interwest Business Equipment, Inc. v. United States Trustee (In re Interwest Business Equipment, Inc.), 23 F.3d 311, 315-316 (10th Cir. 1994), affirmed the bankruptcy court's denial of an application for employment of a single law firm as counsel for multiple related debtors with substantial intercompany claims, under § 327(a). There, the appellants erroneously argued, like Quarles & Brady here, that counsel's employment could be denied only under § 327(c), as opposed to § 327(a), where the debtors were creditors of one another. In rejecting this argument, the Tenth Circuit stated:

> The Appellants' conclusion reads § 327(c) too broadly. The requirements of subsection (a) are threshold requirements that must be met even if subsection (c) is implicated. Subsection (c) addresses the situation where dual representation of a creditor and debtor is the only reason advanced for disqualification and the professional is otherwise qualified ...

> Thus, § 327(c) does not end all inquiry simply because intercompany debts placed each estate, at some point, in a debtor/creditor relationship with another. In these cases, the dual representation of a creditor was not the only reason for concern, the bankruptcy judge was also concerned about the simultaneous representation of three debtors in possession. Thus, the bankruptcy court was additionally concerned with conflict between debtors in possession: with conflict between three separate estates, each of which must be represented by an independent fiduciary ...
> Since subsection (c) of § 327 does not preempt the more basic requirements of subsection (a), the bankruptcy and district courts properly focused on their responsibility to approve the fiduciary's choice of professionals only when that professional's judgment and advocacy would be unclouded by divided loyalty.

Id. at 316.

Fully consistent with the Tenth Circuit's holding in Interwest, the Third Circuit has held that notwithstanding the language of § 327(c), which, together with § 327(a), imposes a per se disqualification of any attorney or other professional person who has an actual conflict of interest because of such person's employment by or representation of a creditor, a bankruptcy court may within its discretion–pursuant to § 327(a) and consistent with § 327(c)–disqualify an attorney who has a potential conflict of interest. In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246, 251 (3rd Cir. 2002); In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 476 (3rd Cir. 1998); In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1315-1317 (3rd Cir. 1991). "Denomination of a conflict as 'potential' or 'actual' and the decision concerning whether to disqualify a professional in situations not yet rising to the level of an actual conflict are matters committed to the bankruptcy court's sound exercise of discretion." Id. at 1316-1317; see also In re Martin, 817 F.2d 175, 182 (1st Cir. 1989) ("The naked existence of a potential for conflict of interest does not render the appointment of counsel nugatory, but makes it voidable as the facts may warrant").

To support its position that § 327(c) requires an actual conflict, Quarles & Brady points to a number of lower court decisions that permit the simultaneous representation of multiple related debtors by one law firm.[22] Appellant's Brief, at 29-32. That there is no per se rule prohibiting such representation is not in dispute. Section 327(a) prohibits such multiple representation, however, where, as here, the single firm cannot provide impartial advice to the related debtors. Courts have generally declined to formulate bright-line rules concerning the criteria for disqualification and have determined the propriety of employment for multiple related debtors on a case-by-case basis, taking all circumstances into account. BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d at 1315. Factors that a court must consider include, but are not limited to, the nature of disclosure of the conflict made at the time of appointment, whether the interests of the related estates are parallel or conflicting, and the nature of the inter-debtor claims made. Id. at 1316. Thus, in a number of multiple-debtor cases, as here, after considering all of these factors, the courts have held that the inability of the professional to fulfill its role as an independent fiduciary on behalf of the estates warranted disqualification. See, e.g., Interwest, 23 F.3d at 316 (separate counsel required when intercompany debts placed each estate in creditor-debtor relationship with another); BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d at 1317-1318 (court properly exercised discretion in disqualifying counsel for multiple related bankruptcy estates for corporation and its two principals, where estates had claims against one another and counsel had negligently failed to disclose potential conflicts); In re Coal River Resources, Inc., 321 B.R. 184, 189 (W.D. Quarles & Brady's contention that the Bankruptcy Court could not disqualify Quarles & Brady in the absence of an actual conflict of interest is an improper attempt to deny bankruptcy courts the discretion that the Bankruptcy Code and the courts of appeal give them to disqualify counsel from employment in potential conflict cases. The Bankruptcy Court properly exercised its discretion to disqualify Quarles & Brady based on both its lack of disinterestedness and its failure to properly disclose its connections with the Debtors in the Application and Affidavit or to amend the Affidavit to disclose connections of which it became aware after the Bankruptcy Court approved its employment. R.889, at 13.

C. By Failing to Disclose it Connections with the Debtors, Quarles & Brady Risked Disqualification and Denial of All of its Compensation at Any Time During the Bankruptcy Proceedings.

Quarles & Brady further contends that the Bankruptcy Court's ruling is "unfair" because it came after Quarles & Brady incurred substantial fees in performing services which arguably benefited the estate.[23] Appellant's Brief, at 62-64. This problem, however, was one of Quarles & Brady's own making. Had Quarles & Brady properly disclosed its connections and potential or actual conflicts in the Application and Affidavit or in an amendment to the Affidavit, or otherwise requested the Bankruptcy Court to rule on the propriety of its continued employment by the Debtors in the initial stages of the bankruptcy proceedings, as Quarles & Brady was required to do under § 327 and Rule 2014(a), the Bankruptcy Court could have ruled on this issue prior to the incurrence of substantial fees, thus mitigating any loss to Quarles & Brady. See Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 59 (1st Cir. 1994) ("[A]s soon as counsel acquires even constructive knowledge reasonably suggesting an actual or potential conflict, ... a bankruptcy court ruling should be obtained" (emphasis added)).

[23] Here, Quarles & Brady asserts, in part, that a motion to disqualify counsel or deny fees for a failure to comply with § 327(a) can be estopped due to delay by the movant or the court. Appellant's Brief at 62-64. All of the authorities that Quarles & Brady cites in support of this contention, however, are inapposite and/or distinguishable. See In re Valley-Vulcan Mold Co., 237 B.R. 322, 337-338 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 1999) (motion to disqualify attorney for non-debtor defendant in fraudulent transfer action; § 327 inapplicable); Graham v. Lennington, 74 B.R. 963, 966 (S.D. Ind. 1987) (issue of conflict of interest of trustee's counsel was raised for first time on appeal of order setting aside transfers of real property; no objection to counsel's employment had been filed in bankruptcy court); Halperin v. Kissinger, 542 F.Supp. 829, 832 (D. D.C. 1982) (motion to disqualify counsel in non-bankruptcy litigation; § 327 inapplicable); In re A & T Paramus Co., 253 B.R. 606, 614-617 (Bankr. D. N.J. 1999) (motion to disqualify attorney for debtor's fuel vendor under non-bankruptcy law; § 327 inapplicable); In re Kliegl Bros. Universal Elec. Stage Lighting Co., 189 B.R. 874, 875, 877 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1995) (conflict and disclosure issues were raised for first time in objection to debtor's counsel's final fee application, heard more than five years after employment of counsel; no motion to disqualify counsel had been filed); In re Hurst Lincoln Mercury, Inc., 80 B.R. 894, 895-896 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1987) (creditor was estopped from objecting to debtor's counsel's fee application after creditor had voluntarily withdrawn prior motion to disqualify counsel brought on same grounds, following counsel's withdrawal from representation of debtor's sole shareholder).

As early as June and October 2003, Maxfield's counsel gave fair warning to Quarles & Brady of Maxfield's possible intent to move for disqualification of Quarles & Brady if it failed to mitigate any further harm to the Debtors' estates by making full disclosure or voluntarily withdrawing from representation of one or more of the Debtors. R.912 (Exhibits A and B). Quarles & Brady continued to incur fees, however, in connection with its representation of all the Debtors and made no effort whatsoever to bring these issues to the Bankruptcy Court's attention or otherwise to minimize any possible loss of compensation. It was not the obligation of the Bankruptcy Court to search the record for possible conflicts of interest; that obligation "belongs to the party who seeks employment by the estate." BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d at 1317. In failing to fulfill that obligation, Quarles & Brady took a calculated risk in deciding to proceed forward at that point. The Bankruptcy Court correctly observed that "attorneys who fail to disclose their representation of competing interests bear all of the responsibility and associated risks for making an inadequate Rule 2014 disclosure." R.889, at 9. "Though [Rule 2014] allows the fox to guard the proverbial hen house, counsel who fail to disclose timely and completely their connections proceed at their own risk because failure to disclose is sufficient grounds to revoke an employment order and deny compensation." Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir. 1998); see also Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d at 59 ("Absent the spontaneous, timely and complete disclosure required by § 327(a) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a), court-appointed counsel proceed at their own risk").

While a bankruptcy court has the discretion to determine what fees, if any, it should allow, it also has the discretion to deny all fees for a disclosure violation without inquiring as to the appropriate amount of the fee. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1046. Disclosure violations are sanctionable, "regardless of any actual harm to the estate." Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. Nonetheless, here, the Court properly exercised its discretion to deny all fees, where it found actual injury to the estate. See Prince, 40 F.3d at 360; cf. Woods v. City Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago, 312 U.S. 262, 268, 61 S.Ct. 493, 497, 85 L.Ed. 820 (1941) (Supreme Court reversed award of compensation to counsel for bondholders' committee, which also represented indenture trustee and other parties with interests in conflict with those of committee, holding that compensation should be denied where "claimant was serving more than one master or was subject to conflicting interests"). The record below reflects actual injury to the Jennings bankruptcy estate as a direct result of Quarles & Brady's failure to request adequate protection for Jennings' security interest in the assets of BLJ. BLJ has depleted those assets, both Bryco and BLJ have since shut their doors and ceased operating, and reorganization of the Debtors is no longer possible. In addition, despite Quarles & Brady's contention that its services resulted in a "substantial benefit" to all of the estates, Appellant's Brief, at 59-60, the record is replete with other instances where Quarles & Brady's conduct demonstrated its inability to fulfill its fiduciary duties to represent the respective bankruptcy estates independently and impartially.[24]

[24] For example, with respect to the sale of Bryco's assets, Quarles & Brady originally filed a motion for an auction sale in California, which it withdrew after Maxfield objected to the proposed auctioneer. R.257-258; R.266; R.409. Subsequently, Quarles & Brady proposed a private sale of the assets to an insider, Paul Jimenez, Bryco's former factory foreman, for $150,000, even though Bryco scheduled the assets with a value of $237,500. R.400; R.46 (Schedule B). Maxfield again objected, requesting, inter alia, that the Bankruptcy Court require an auction of the property to the highest bidder in order to maximize the value of the assets for the benefit of creditors, but Quarles & Brady continued to resist any effort to expose the property to competitive bidding. R.414; R.448; R.578; R.584. Initially, the Bankruptcy Court approved the sale for $150,000, but gave

Under the circumstances of these cases, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in disqualifying Quarles & Brady as counsel for the Debtors, denying all of its compensation, and requiring disgorgement of its retainer, based on Quarles & Brady's failure to disclose its connections with the Debtors and its lack of disinterestedness.

IV. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised its Discretion in Denying Quarles & Brady's Motions for Reconsideration.

The Bankruptcy Court properly exercised it discretion in denying Quarles & Brady's Motions for Reconsideration. Quarles & Brady filed the Motions for Reconsideration pursuant to Rules 9023, 9024, and 7062, Fed. R. Bankr. P., which incorporate by reference the provisions creditors an additional 20 days to object to the sale, noting that Quarles & Brady had failed to give adequate notice to creditors of the continued hearing. (Although the Bankruptcy Court previously entered an agreed order on April 22, 2004, continuing the sale hearing to June 17, 2004, establishing certain bidding procedures, and requiring Quarles & Brady to serve a copy of the order on all creditors, Quarles & Brady did not serve notice of the continued hearing until June 10, 2004.) R.591. Subsequently, after other creditors objected to the sale, the Bankruptcy Court set an auction for August 12, 2004, which resulted in Mr. Jimenez's increasing his offer to $510,000 (despite Quarles & Brady's continued insistence that Bryco's assets were not worth more than $150,000). R.632; R.634; R.644; R.687. Thus, the Bryco estate's ability to maximize the value of Bryco's assets for the benefit of creditors resulted primarily through the efforts of Maxfield and other creditors to expose the assets to competitive bidding, despite Quarles & Brady's calculated effort to sell the assets to an insider for the lowest possible price. Regarding the settlement of Cessna's secured claim against BLJ, Quarles & Brady initially stipulated to a priority administrative claim in favor of Cessna against BLJ's estate in the amount of $138,584. R.392, at 3. Cessna withdrew its demand for an administrative claim only after Maxfield objected on the grounds that the Cessna aircraft provided no benefit to BLJ's estate. R.395; R.419; R.503. Although Cessna's sale of the aircraft ultimately resulted in a small surplus to the BLJ estate after full satisfaction of Cessna's secured claim, R.656, at 2, this outcome raises additional questions regarding Quarles & Brady's judgment in stipulating to relief from the automatic stay in favor of Cessna on the joint representation that Cessna was undersecured. R.297; R.392. In addition, as set forth above, Quarles & Brady's actions in resisting Maxfield's objection to Jennings' exemption claim in the $500,000 annuity (which Jennings purchased prepetition in reliance on Quarles & Brady's "estate planning" advice), and in unsuccessfully seeking approval of an excessive postpetition salary for Jennings from BLJ in the amount of $25,000 per month, did not benefit the creditors of Jennings or BLJ, although they were intended to benefit Jennings personally. Supra, at 25 n.13, 32-33.

of Rules 59, 60, and 62, Fed. R. Civ. P., respectively. The Motions for Reconsideration included: (1) a motion for a new trial on the Disqualification Motion and Interim Fee Application pursuant under Rule 59(a); (2) a motion to alter, amend, or vacate the Bankruptcy Court's Disqualification Order under Rules 59(e) and 60(b); and (3) a motion for a stay of enforcement of the Disqualification Order pending resolution of the Motions for Reconsideration under Rule 62(b). R.895-897.

The grounds for both motions for a new trial under Rule 59(a) and motions to alter or amend a judgment under Rule 59(e) are the same. Both motions require a showing of: (1) manifest error of fact; (2) manifest error of law; or (3) newly discovered evidence. See In re Investors Florida Aggressive Growth Fund, Ltd., 168 B.R. 760, 768 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 1994) (motion for reconsideration denied); In re Tiffany Square Associates, Ltd., 104 B.R. 438, 442 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1989) (motion for rehearing denied); see also In re Kellogg, 197 F.3d 1116, 1120 (11th Cir. 1999) (party "may not use a Rule 59(e) motion to raise arguments available but not advanced at the [prior] hearing").

Courts may grant a motion for relief from a judgment under Rule 60(b) for the following reasons: (1) mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; (2) newly discovered evidence; (3) fraud; (4) the judgment is void; (5) the judgment has been satisfied, released, or discharged; or (6) any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b).

Pursuant to Rule 62(b), a court may stay the execution of a judgment pending the disposition of a motion for a new trial or to alter or amend a judgment made pursuant to Rule 59, or a motion for relief from a judgment or order made pursuant to Rule 60, "[i]n its discretion and on such conditions for the security of the adverse party as are proper." Fed. R. Civ. P. 62(b).

Quarles & Brady's Motions for Reconsideration merely reiterated the same arguments set forth in their responses in opposition to the Disqualification Motion, citing no new legal authority or newly discovered evidence. R.898.

The Bankruptcy Court promptly afforded any interested parties an opportunity to respond to the Motions for Reconsideration. R.901. The Bankruptcy Court considered Quarles & Brady's Motions for Reconsideration and supporting memorandum, as well as the responses submitted by Maxfield and the United States Trustee. R.921. The Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the Motions for Reconsideration under Rules 9023 and 9024, where Quarles & Brady failed to show a manifest error of law or fact, to cite to any new legal authority or newly discovered evidence, or to make any showing required under Rule 60(b). In addition, because the Bankruptcy Court promptly denied those motions, it properly denied as moot Quarles & Brady's motion for a stay pending resolution of the Motions for Reconsideration under Rule 62(b). R.921.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should affirm the Bankruptcy Court's orders granting the Disqualification Motion and denying the Motions for Reconsideration.

DATED: May 12, 2005.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This Court has jurisdiction under section 158(d) of title 28, United States Code, to review the District Court's order entered September 7, 2005, affirming the Bankruptcy Court's rulings below. The District Court had jurisdiction over the appeal of the Bankruptcy Court's rulings pursuant to section 158(a)(1).

The Bankruptcy Court's order granting the motion to disqualify appellant, Quarles & Brady, LLP ("Quarles"), and for disgorgement of its retainer, entered November 16, 2004, and order denying Quarles's post-trial motions, entered December 16, 2005, were final, appealable orders of that Court under section 158(a)(1). The District's Court's order entered September 7, 2005, was a final, appealable order under section 158(d). Quarles timely filed its notice of appeal from that order on September 13, 2005.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES ON APPEAL

1. Whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion in sanctioning the law firm of Quarles & Brady, LLP for violating mandatory bankruptcy disclosure requirements by not telling the Court and the parties to the bankruptcy case about Quarles's intricate web of relationships with eleven debtors at the time those debtors sought bankruptcy court permission to retain Quarles as their chapter 11 bankruptcy counsel.

2. Alternatively, whether the Bankruptcy Court and the District Court erred in concluding that Quarles was not a disinterested person under section 327(a), based on either actual or potential conflicts of interest in representing multiple debtors.

3. Whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion in disqualifying Quarles as counsel for the debtors, denying all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, based on Quarles's initial and continuing violation of the disclosure rules, lack of disinterestedness, and injury resulting to the bankruptcy estates from its inability to evaluate independently the various claims, transfers, and interests in the related cases.

4. Whether the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion in denying Quarles's post-trial motions.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE[1]

This is an appeal from a final order of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida ("District Court"), affirming a final order entered by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Middle District of Florida ("Bankruptcy Court"), disqualifying Quarles as counsel for the debtors in eleven related chapter 11 bankruptcy cases, denying all fees requested by Quarles in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer received by Quarles ("Disqualification Order"). The District Court also affirmed the Bankruptcy Court's order denying Quarles's post-trial motions to alter, amend, or vacate the Disqualification Order, for a new trial, and to stay enforcement of the Disqualification Order ("Post-trial Motions").

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. Statutory Framework and Relevant Bankruptcy Rules Mandating Full Disclosure by Professional Persons Employed in Bankruptcy Cases

Section 327(a) of title 11, United States Code, governs the procedure for obtaining a bankruptcy court's approval of the employment of attorneys and other professionals by trustees and debtors in possession[2] in bankruptcy cases, limiting such employment to persons "that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons."[3] A professional person's failure to comply with these requirements at any time during such professional person's employment under section 327 may result in denial of compensation. See 11 U.S.C. § 328(c). Rule 2014(a), Fed. R. App. P., requires that an application for employment under section 327 include a statement, to the best of the applicant's knowledge, of "all of the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest, their respective attorneys and accountants, the United States trustee, or any person employed in the office of the United States trustee." Rule 2014(a) further provides that "[t]he application shall be accompanied by a verified statement of the person to be employed setting forth the person's connections" with any such other persons.

[2] A debtor in a chapter 11 bankruptcy case is a "debtor in possession," except when a trustee is appointed in the case. See 11 U.S.C. § 1101(1). A debtor in possession has most of the rights, powers, and duties of a trustee serving in a chapter 11 case. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a).

[3] The Bankruptcy Code defines a "disinterested person," in pertinent part, as a "person that– (A) is not a creditor, an equity security holder, or an insider; ... and (E) does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors or equity holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor or any investment banker specified in subparagraph (B) or (C) of this paragraph, or for any other reason." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(A), (E).

II. Facts Specific to this Appeal

A. Quarles's Undisclosed Prepetition Connections with the Debtors

In January and February 2002, attorneys from Quarles, a law firm, including one of the firm's partners, Ned R. Nashban ("Nashban"), performed estate planning services for Bruce Lee Jennings ("Jennings"), including providing legal advice regarding "Florida residency, domicile, and exempt assets" and "home purchase, estate planning, possible bankruptcy options, and real estate mortgages." BR 889, at 2-3; Ex. 11. At that time, Jennings and entities related to him were defendants in a tort action in California state court. BR 889, at 1-2. These entities included B.L. Jennings, Inc., a gun distributor ("Distributor") owned by Jennings; Bryco Arms, Inc., a gun manufacturer ("Manufacturer") owned by Jennings' ex-wife, Janice Kay Jennings ("Janice Jennings"), also a defendant in the California lawsuit; six trusts established by Jennings and/or Janice Jennings for the benefit of their children (collectively, the "Trusts"); and RKB Investments, a partnership ("Partnership") formed by three of the Trusts, then the Manufacturer's landlord. BR 889, at 1-3; BR 583, at 90.

On or about February 15, 2002, Quarles' client, Jennings, purchased a home in Daytona Beach, Florida, for $925,000 in cash. Ex. 28-29. On March 5, 2002, Jennings purchased a $500,000 annuity issued by Allianz Insurance Company. BR 889, at 3; Ex. 31.

In October 2002, the Partnership sold the Manufacturer's business premises to Knowleton Communities, Inc. ("Knowleton"), which entered into a new lease with the Manufacturer commencing October 17, 2002, replacing the prior lease between the Partnership and the Manufacturer. The Partnership paid a $337,000 security deposit on the Knowleton lease on behalf of the Manufacturer; Knowleton, in turn, agreed to return the money to the Partnership as the Manufacturer made its monthly rent payments to Knowleton. BR 889, at 3; Ex. 39, 45. As a result of these transactions, the Manufacturer owed Knowleton, and by extension, the Partnership, $150,000 in unpaid rent. BR 583, at 101-102; BR 889, at 3.

On May 8, 2003, Quarles entered into an engagement letter to represent Jennings, Janice Jennings, the Manufacturer, the Distributor, the Partnership, and the Trusts in proposed chapter 11 bankruptcy cases ("Engagement Letter"). Nashban signed the Engagement Letter on behalf of Quarles. BR 583, at 115; Ex. 47. The Engagement Letter provided, inter alia, as follows:

> Since we may be filing multiple Chapter 11 cases and potentially consolidating the cases, either administratively or substantively, by executing this engagement letter, you also waive any potential conflicts among the parties that may arise. In addition, we shall be allowed to share attorney/client privilege information among all of the individuals and entities that we will be representing in the Chapter 11 proceedings without breaching any rules of confidentiality. However, if the Court does determine that there is a conflict that cannot be waived, we understand that and agree that it is your intention that we represent the various Trusts and the [Partnership] and the remaining parties will seek other counsel, subject to Court approval.

BR 889, at 4; Ex. 47, at 4 (emphasis added).

On May 14, 2003, one day after the California court entered a judgment against Jennings, the Manufacturer, and the Distributor in excess of $20,000,000, Quarles filed eleven voluntary chapter 11 bankruptcy petitions in the Bankruptcy Court on behalf of Jennings, Janice Jennings, the Manufacturer, the Distributor, the Partnership, and the Trusts (collectively, the “Debtors”). BR 889, at 4.

After Quarles filed the Debtors’ bankruptcy petitions, at no time did it ever disclose to the Bankruptcy Court any of these prepetition connections with the Debtors, including: (1) its prepetition estate/exemption planning work for Jennings, (2) the Engagement Letter, in which it acknowledged potential conflicts of interest in representing each of the Debtors in chapter 11 proceedings, and (3) the Partnership's possible claims against the Manufacturer. BR 889, at 8.

B. Quarles's Failure to Disclose its Connections in its Employment Application

On May 19, 2003, Quarles filed in the Debtors' chapter 11 cases the Debtor's [sic] Application for Employment of Attorneys ("Application"), signed by Jennings on behalf of all the Debtors, pursuant to section 327(a). BR 20; Ex.18. The Application included an Affidavit of Proposed Attorney for Debtor-in-Possession [sic], signed by Nashban, pursuant to Rule 2014(a) ("Affidavit"). BR 20; Ex.18.

Paragraphs 6 and 8 of the Application provided as follows:

> 6. To the best of the Debtors' knowledge, [Quarles] has no connection with any creditors of the Debtors or any other party in interest, nor their respective attorneys.
>
> . . .
>
> 8. Quarles & Brady LLP represents no creditors of the estate nor any interest adverse to the Debtors as Debtors-in-possession or to the estate in the matters upon which it is to be engaged to perform legal services for the Debtors-in-possession, and its employment would be in the best interest of the estate.

BR 20; Ex.18.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Affidavit provided as follows:

> 3. Benjamin R. Norris, a partner at Quarles & Brady LLP, and I will be the principal attorneys responsible for the representation of the Debtors. Neither of us nor Quarles & Brady LLP hold or represent any interest adverse to the Estates and we are disinterested persons as required by 11 U.S.C. 327(a).

> 4. That such law firm has no connection with the Debtors herein, its [sic] creditors or any other party in interest or their respective attorneys or accountants. And that it represents no interest adverse to that of the Debtors in the above-captioned matter, except that it was owed legal fees for legal work done for one of the Debtors, Bruce Lee Jennings, pre-petition, which bill has been paid to the law firm prior to the commencement of this action.

BR 20; Ex.18.

Although the Affidavit included a brief reference to unspecified prepetition legal work for Jennings, Quarles failed to disclose in the Application and Affidavit: (1) the nature, extent, and timing of its prepetition estate planning services for Jennings, (2) the existence and material terms of the Engagement Letter, and (3) any connections or conflicts arising from various claims among the Debtors. BR 889, at 8; BR 20; Ex. 18. In the absence of such disclosure, on May 28, 2003, the Bankruptcy Court entered, ex parte, an order approving the employment of Quarles as counsel for the Debtors pursuant to section 327(a) ("Employment Order"). BR 889, at 5; BR 26.

C. The Disqualification Motion

On February 25, 2004, shortly after Quarles filed its first application for interim compensation and reimbursement of expenses for the period from May 15, 2003, through August 31, 2003 ("Interim Fee Application"),[4] BR 410, appellee, Brandon

[4] Pursuant to the Interim Fee Application, Quarles requested interim fees of $322,471.75 and reimbursement for costs of $14,917.90. Inexplicably, Quarles delayed filing the Interim Fee Application until nearly six months after the period for which it requested compensation. BR 410.

James Maxfield ("Maxfield") filed a Motion to Disqualify Debtors' Counsel and for Disgorgement of Retainer ("Disqualification Motion"). BR 423. On April 26, 2004, Quarles filed its response to the Disqualification Motion. BR 526. On May 6, 2004, Maxfield filed a response to the Interim Fee Application. BR 544.

The Bankruptcy Court conducted an extensive evidentiary hearing on the Disqualification Motion on April 29, 2004 and May 28, 2004, at which the Court heard testimony from both Nashban and Jennings. BR 663; BR 583, at 88-127. At the May 28, 2004 hearing, the Bankruptcy Court also heard testimony from Nashban on the Interim Fee Application. BR 583, at 127-162. Counsel for Quarles, Maxfield, and the United States Trustee[5] participated at both hearings.

[5] The United States Trustee is an official of the United States Department of Justice, charged by statute with the duty to oversee and supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. See 28 U.S.C. § 586(a). Congress expressly granted standing to the United States Trustee to raise and be heard on any issue under title 11, except that the United States Trustee may not file a plan of reorganization under chapter 11. See 11 U.S.C. § 307; United States Trustee v. McCormick, Barstow, Sheppard, Wayte & Carruth (In re Donovan Corp.), 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000). The United States Trustee's oversight duties include monitoring employment applications filed under section 327 and monitoring and reviewing applications for compensation and reimbursement filed under section 330. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A), (H).

Significantly, at the May 28, 2004 hearing, the Bankruptcy Court admitted into evidence the Engagement Letter, which Quarles had failed to disclose previously to the Bankruptcy Court or the United States Trustee. BR 583, at 115; Ex. 47.

At the conclusion of the hearings on the Disqualification Motion and the Interim Fee Application, the Bankruptcy Court took the matter under advisement and instructed the parties, including the United States Trustee, to submit post-hearing briefs in lieu of oral argument. BR 583, at 126-127, 160-162. Subsequently, the parties filed post-hearing memoranda on the Disqualification Motion and the Interim Fee Application. BR 602-605, 607.

D. Quarles's Trial Testimony

At the evidentiary hearing on the Disqualification Motion, Nashban testified on behalf of Quarles that he had reviewed the schedules for Jennings and the Distributor, indicating Jennings's wage claim and secured claim against the Distributor, but that he did not amend the Application or Affidavit to disclose this information. BR 663, at 17-19, 33-34, 37. Nashban acknowledged that Jennings claimed a security interest in the assets of the Distributor, including its inventory and accounts receivable, and that Jennings's claim exceeded the value of those assets, but admitted that he had taken no action to protect Jennings's interest in such collateral. BR 663, at 20-21, 24, 30-31. Nashban testified that he was aware of additional prepetition transfers from the Distributor to Jennings in the year before the filing of the bankruptcy cases in the amount of $650,000, but he did not amend the Application or Affidavit to disclose this information either. BR 663, at 37-39; Ex. 15. When asked if he could have disclosed these connections and sought a determination from the Bankruptcy Court at that time as to whether he could continue to represent both debtors, Nashban responded that, "[i]f I thought there was some conflict of interest, I would have sought a determination." BR 663, at 18. Nashban admitted that his simultaneous representation of Jennings as a secured creditor and the Distributor as a borrower was a potential conflict of interest but not an actual conflict. BR 663, at 33, 39. Nashban also admitted that he had made no written disclosure to the Bankruptcy Court regarding the financial transactions involving the Manufacturer's leases with the Partnership and Knowleton, which resulted in possible claims between the Partnership and the Manufacturer. BR 663, at 62.

E. The Bankruptcy Court's Ruling on the Disqualification Motion

On November 16, 2004, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order granting the Disqualification Motion and denying the Interim Fee Application, except that the Court approved reimbursement of all expenses requested by Quarles, and entered detailed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. BR 889, 890.

The Bankruptcy Court concluded that Quarles's Rule 2014 disclosure was "woefully insufficient" because it failed to disclose: (1) that Quarles sought to represent simultaneously two debtors, Jennings and the Distributor, without disclosing that Jennings was a secured creditor of the Distributor and also claimed over $875,000 in back wages from the Distributor; (2) the existence of certain claims that three of Quarles's clients, Jennings, the Manufacturer, and the Distributor, held against eight other Quarles clients, Janice Jennings, the Partnership, and the Trusts, under joint venture/enterprise, partnership, constructive trust, alter ego, and other legal theories arising from the California lawsuit and similar litigation (collectively, the "Alter Ego Claims"); (3) the existence of possible claims between Quarles's Partnership client and Manufacturer client arising from the financial transactions involving the Manufacturer's leases with the Partnership and Knowleton; and (4) that Quarles had performed estate planning work for Jennings during 2002 that enabled Jennings to transfer significant assets beyond the reach of his creditors. BR 889, at 8. The Bankruptcy Court found that despite Quarles's awareness of these matters, it failed to disclose any of these matters in the Application and Affidavit, to amend the Affidavit to disclose such matters, or to seek a ruling from the Court concerning the continued propriety of representing the Debtors under the circumstances. BR 889, at 8-9.

Alternatively, the Bankruptcy Court concluded that Quarles was not a disinterested person as required under section 327(a) as a result of its simultaneous representation of: (1) Jennings and the Distributor, where Jennings held a secured claim of $1,404,000 against the Distributor; (2) Jennings and the Partnership, where the firm had a fiduciary duty to investigate a $500,000 loan from Jennings to the Partnership and subsequent "cancellation of indebtedness"; and (3) the Partnership and the Manufacturer, where the Partnership had possible claims against the Manufacturer arising from the Partnership's transactions with Knowleton. BR 889, at 10-12.

The Bankruptcy Court ordered the disqualification of Quarles as counsel for the Debtors, denied all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and required disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, based on Quarles's initial and continuing violation of the disclosure rules, lack of disinterestedness, and injury resulting to the bankruptcy estates from its inability to evaluate independently the various claims, transfers, and interests in the related cases. BR 889, at 12-14.

F. Post-Trial Motions

On November 26, 2004, Quarles filed the Post-trial Motions and memorandum in support thereof. BR 895-898. Maxfield and the United States Trustee filed responses in opposition to the Post-trial Motions. BR 912, 914. On December 16, 2004, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order denying the Post-trial Motions. BR 921. On December 27, 2004, Quarles & Brady filed a notice of appeal from the Bankruptcy Court's orders granting the Disqualification Motion and denying the Post-trial Motions. BR 945.

G. The District Court's Ruling on Appeal

On September 7, 2005, the District Court entered an order affirming the Bankruptcy Court's Disqualification Order and order denying the Post-trial Motions. DR 48. The District Court held that the Bankruptcy Court: (1) correctly concluded that Quarles failed to disclose adequately its prepetition exemption work on behalf of Jennings and failed to disclose its various connections; (2) did not err in disqualifying Quarles based on its initial and continued violation of the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure rules coupled with its lack of disinterestedness; (3) did not abuse its discretion in denying compensation to Quarles and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer; and (4) did not abuse its discretion in denying the Pre-trial Motions. DR 48, at 14, 23, 29, 30. Quarles appealed.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Both the Bankruptcy Court and the District Court properly concluded that Quarles failed to comply with the requirements of section 327(a) of the Bankruptcy Code and Rule 2014(a) by failing to disclose all its connections with the Debtors in the Application and Affidavit or to amend the Application or Affidavit at any time to disclose any such connections of which Quarles became aware after the entry of the Employment Order. In fact, Quarles never disclosed most of these connections at any time and made only passing references to two of these connections in a few documents, where this information was literally buried in hundreds of pages of bankruptcy schedules and over 1,000 docket entries. The Bankruptcy Court, the creditors, and the United States Trustee did not have any obligation to search through the record to seek out conflicts of interest that Quarles failed to disclose properly. That duty fell solely on Quarles. By failing to comply with its statutory duties of disclosure, Quarles deprived the Bankruptcy Court of its ability to make a proper and timely determination of Quarles's eligibility for employment as counsel for the Debtors.

Alternatively, the Bankruptcy Court and the District Court correctly concluded that Quarles was not a disinterested person under section 327(a), based on conflicts of interest that Quarles concedes are at least potential conflicts. Quarles's contention that the Bankruptcy Court could not disqualify or deny compensation to Quarles based on potential conflicts is incorrect and inconsistent with the plain language of the Bankruptcy Code and established precedents from this Court and other circuits.

Based on the record below, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in disqualifying Quarles as counsel for Debtors, denying all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, where it properly concluded that: (1) Quarles had failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of section 327 and Rule 2014(a); (2) Quarles was not a disinterested person as required under section 327(a); and (3) Quarles's inability to evaluate independently the various claims, transfers, and interests in the chapter 11 cases resulted in injury to the Debtors. The courts of appeal recognize that bankruptcy courts have the discretion to disqualify counsel for the bankruptcy estate or deny all compensation for a failure to comply with the statutory disclosure requirements, even if such failure is negligent or inadvertent. In addition, the courts of appeal acknowledge the bankruptcy courts' discretion to disqualify counsel or deny its compensation for lack of disinterestedness, based on potential, as well as actual, conflicts of interest.

Finally, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the Post-trial Motions, where Quarles failed to show a manifest error of law or fact, to present any newly discovered evidence, or to make any showing required under the applicable rules.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court and District Court Did Not Err in Concluding that Quarles Failed to Comply with the Disclosure Requirements of Section 327 and Rule 2014(a).

Quarles contends that it disclosed all its connections to the Bankruptcy Court in the Debtors' chapter 11 cases, but this argument does not reflect accurately the facts in these cases and ignores the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure requirements and circuit court precedent mandating strict compliance with such requirements.

Both the Bankruptcy Court and the District Court properly recognized that the Bankruptcy Code and Rules impose a mandatory obligation on an attorney seeking employment by a chapter 11 bankruptcy estate to make a complete disclosure of his or her relationship to the debtor and of any potential conflicts involved in the representation. BR 889, at 7-8; DR 48, at 10-11. Proper disclosure is necessary to enable a bankruptcy court to make an informed decision as to whether the professional person meets the statutory requirements for employment under section 327(a), i.e., that such person does not "hold or represent an adverse interest to the estate" and is a "disinterested person." See 11 U.S.C. § 327(a); Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877, 881 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049, 116 S.Ct. 712 (1996); In re Granite Partners, L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 35 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998).

To enable bankruptcy courts to determine properly whether attorneys or other professional persons comply with these requirements, Rule 2014(a), Fed. R. Bank. P., sets forth the following requirements for applications for employment under section 327:

> ... The application shall state the specific facts showing the necessity for the employment, the name of the person to be employed, the reasons > for the selection, the professional services to be rendered, any proposed arrangement for compensation, and, to the best of the applicant's knowledge, all of the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest, their respective attorneys and accountants, the United States trustee, or any person employed in the office of the United States trustee. The application shall be accompanied by a verified statement of the person to be employed setting forth the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest, their respective attorneys and accountants, the United States trustee, or any person employed in the office of the United States trustee. [Emphasis added.]

Rule 2014(a) requires all attorneys and other professional persons employed under section 327 to disclose all known connections with the debtor, creditors, and other parties in interest both in the application for employment and in an accompanying verified statement. Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir. 1998). As the Second Circuit has ruled, however, the duty to disclose "arises not solely by reason of the bankruptcy rules, but also is founded upon 'the fiduciary obligation owed by counsel for the debtor to the bankruptcy court.'" Futuronics Corp. v. Arutt, Nachamie & Benjamin (In re Futuronics Corp.), 655 F.2d 463, 470 (2nd Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 941, 102 S.Ct. 1435 (1982) (quoting In re Arlan's Department Stores, Inc., 615 F.2d 925, 937 (2nd Cir. 1979)).

Because a professional person's failure to comply with the requirements of section 327(a) at any time during such person's employment may result in a denial of compensation, see 11 U.S.C. § 328(c), the courts have held that the duty to disclose is a continuing duty that survives the initial filing of the application for employment and requires professionals to reveal connections that arise after their retention. See In re Keller Financial Services of Florida, Inc., 248 B.R. 859, 898 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2000); accord, I.G. Petroleum, L.L.C. v. Fenasci (In re West Delta Oil Co.), ___ F.3d ___, 2005 WL 3220291, at 6 (5th Cir. 2005). "[T]he need for professional self-scrutiny and avoidance of conflicts of interest does not end upon appointment." Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 57-58 (1st Cir. 1994).

Under Rule 2014(a), "[t]he scope of disclosure is much broader than the question of disqualification ... The applicant and the professional must disclose all connections and not merely those that rise to the level of conflicts." Keller Financial Services, 248 B.R. at 897 (quoting In re Granite Partners, Inc., L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 35 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998)); accord, In re Gulf Coast Orthopedic Center, 265 B.R. 318, 323 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2001). "The professional must disclose all facts that bear on his disinterestedness, and cannot usurp the court's function by unilaterally choosing which connections impact on his disinterestedness and which do not." Keller Financial Services, 248 B.R. at 897.

Although Quarles fails to cite to any relevant circuit court authority, the courts of appeals have recognized the importance of the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure requirements and the power of the bankruptcy courts to sanction attorneys for failing to comply with these requirements. See, e.g., I.G. Petroleum, L.L.C. v. Fenasci (In re West Delta Oil Co.), ___ F.3d ___, 2005 WL 3220291, at 6 (5th Cir. 2005); Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir. 1998); Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877, 881-882 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049, 116 S.Ct. 712 (1996); Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 59-60 (1st Cir. 1994).

In Park-Helena, in which the debtor's attorney failed to disclose the source of a prepetition retainer, the Ninth Circuit acknowledged that the disclosure requirements of Rule 2014 are applied "strictly." Id. at 881. "All facts that may be pertinent to a court's determination of whether an attorney is disinterested or holds an adverse interest to the estate must be disclosed." Id. at 882. "The duty of professionals is to disclose all connections with the debtor, debtor-in-possession, insiders, creditors, and parties in interest ... They cannot pick and choose which connections are irrelevant or trivial ... No matter how old the connection, no matter how trivial it appears, the professional seeking employment must disclose it." Id. The Ninth Circuit further stated that "[t]he disclosure rules are applied literally, even if the results are sometimes harsh." Id. at 881. Negligent or inadvertent omissions "do not vitiate the failure to disclose." Id. The failure to comply with the disclosure rules is a sanctionable violation, even if proper disclosure would have shown that the attorney had not actually violated any Bankruptcy Code provision or Bankruptcy Rule. Id. at 880. Applying these strict standards, the Park-Helena court held that the attorney's failure to describe the circumstances of the payment of the retainer violated the disclosure requirements of Rule 2014, and that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying all the attorney's requested fees as a sanction for the attorney's failure to disclose. Id. at 882; see also West Delta Oil Co., 2005 WL 3220291, at 6 (quoting Crivello, 134 F.3d at 836) ("failure to disclose is sufficient grounds to revoke an employment order and deny compensation"); Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d at 59-60 (counsel's failure to make full and spontaneous disclosure of financial transactions between debtor and insiders provided sufficient ground for denial of compensation).

Here, both the Bankruptcy Court and the District Court correctly followed applicable law in concluding that Quarles failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of section 327 and Rule 2014(a) by failing to disclose its connections with the Debtors in the Application and Affidavit, and by failing to amend the Affidavit to disclose any additional connections of which Quarles subsequently became aware.

The Application and Affidavit disclosed no connections between Quarles and the Debtors other than unspecified prepetition legal services performed for Jennings.[6] The Bankruptcy Court correctly found that Quarles had failed to disclose in the Application and Affidavit, or to amend subsequently the Affidavit to disclose: (1) that Jennings was a secured creditor of the Distributor and also claimed back wages from the Distributor; (2) the existence of the Alter Ego Claims and the potential conflict in representing both sides of the litigation; (3) the existence of possible claims between the Partnership and the Manufacturer arising from the financial transactions involving the Manufacturer's leases with the Partnership and Knowleton; and (4) that Quarles had performed estate planning work for Jennings during 2002. R.889, at 8.

The record in the bankruptcy cases reflects that at no time during the chapter 11 proceedings did Quarles ever disclose the: (1) claims between the Partnership and the Manufacturer; (2) nature, extent, and timing of Quarles's prepetition estate planning work for Jennings; or (3) existence and material terms of the Engagement Letter, which specifically addressed conflicts arising in connection with litigation of [6] Quarles argues that it disclosed its prepetition work for Jennings despite its failure to disclose any facts in the Affidavit regarding the nature, extent, or timing of such services. Appellant's Brief, at 10, 31. The District Court, however, properly concluded that this disclosure was inadequate as a result of Quarles's failure to disclose any specific facts concerning its prepetition representation of Jennings. DR 48, at 12-14.

the Alter Ego Claims. BR 889, at 8-9. The Bankruptcy Court and the United States Trustee did not become aware of the Engagement Letter until the May 28, 2004 hearing on the Disqualification Motion, over a year after Nashban signed the Engagement Letter. Only then did the Court and the United States Trustee first learn that the Debtors had expressly agreed to waive any potential conflicts on the part of Quarles and that Quarles intended to represent only the Trusts and the Partnership if the Bankruptcy Court determined that Quarles & Brady had a non-waivable conflict arising from Quarles & Brady's representation of both sides of that litigation.[7] Ex.47. The Bankruptcy Court, however, could not timely make this determination absent any proper disclosure of these conflicts by Quarles.

Although Quarles subsequently listed Jennings's claims against the Distributor on the Debtors' bankruptcy schedules, where this information was literally buried in hundreds of pages of schedules,[8] Quarles nonetheless failed to comply with its affirmative duty under the Bankruptcy Code to amend its employment documents to disclose properly these connections. Likewise, while Quarles may have filed a few pleadings that included some brief references to the Alter Ego Claims,[9] buried among the over 1,000 docket entries filed in the chapter 11 proceedings, Quarles never amended its employment documents to disclose the potential conflicts arising from those claims. BR 889, at 8. Quarles cites no legal authority from any circuit to support its contention that such "disclosure" satisfied the requirements of § 327(a) and Rule 2014(a).[10]

BR 43; Ex. 1. On July 25, 2003, Quarles amended Jennings' schedules, revising the amount of the account receivable due to Jennings for loans from Jennings to the Distributor to $1,404,000. [10] Quarles also argues that its isolated statements at one of countless hearings held in these cases constituted "disclosure" of these matters. Appellant's Brief, at 28. Quarles made such statements, however, in the context of completely different legal issues before the Bankruptcy Court at that time and not for the purpose of disclosing its connections or conflicts.

employment by the estate ..." In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1317 (3rd Cir. 1991). "Bankruptcy courts have neither the resources nor the time ... to root out the existence of undisclosed conflicts of interest." Crivello, 134 F.3d at 839; see also In re Marine Outlet, Inc., 135 B.R. 154, 156 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1991) ("there is no duty placed on the United States Trustee or on creditors to search the record for the existence, vel non, of a conflict of interest of a professional sought to be employed").

Consistent with applicable law, the Bankruptcy Court and District Court properly recognized that the burden of bringing any connections or actual or potential conflicts to the attention of the Court was Quarles's, and not the creditors', the United States Trustee's, or any other party's. BR 889, at 9-10; DR 48, at 10-11.

Quarles's contention that it sufficiently disclosed its connections with the Debtors is further betrayed by Nashban's own testimony that "[i]f I thought there was some conflict of interest, I would have sought a determination." BR 663, at 18. Quarles did not have the right to pick and choose which connections were worthy of disclosure. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. By failing to comply with its fiduciary duty to disclose properly all its connections with the Debtors, as required by section 327 and Rule 2014(a), Quarles deprived the Bankruptcy Court of its ability to make a proper and timely determination of Quarles's eligibility for employment as counsel for the Debtors.

II. Alternatively, the Bankruptcy Court and the District Court Did Not Err in Concluding that Quarles Was Not a Disinterested Person under Section 327(a), Based on Either Actual or Potential Conflicts of Interest.

A. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Applied the Bankruptcy Code and In re Prince in Basing its Decision to Disqualify and Deny Compensation to Quarles on Actual or Potential Conflicts.

The Bankruptcy Court and the District Court correctly concluded that Quarles was not a disinterested person under section 327(a), based on Quarles's simultaneous representation of the Debtors, where actual or potential conflicts of interest existed among the Debtors. BR 889, at 10-12; DR 48, at 22-23. Although Quarles concedes that all of these conflicts are at least potential conflicts, it argues that the Bankruptcy Court erred because it could only disqualify counsel or deny compensation based on actual, not potential, conflicts. Appellant's Brief, at 34-35, 41-42. In particular, Quarles argues that the Bankruptcy Court erred in basing its decision to disqualify and deny compensation to Quarles on this Court's holding in In re Prince because Prince mandates disqualification only if an actual conflict exists. Appellant's Brief, at 44-46. As the District Court correctly observed, however, this contention misconstrues this Court's holding in Prince and the meaning of sections 327(a), 327(c), and 328(c). DR 48, at 19.

In examining the courts' rulings below, it is first necessary to look to the plain meaning of the statutes themselves. See Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 534, 124 S.Ct. 1023, 1030 (2004) ("when the statute's language is plain, the sole function of the courts ... is to enforce it according to its terms"). Section 327(a) provides as follows:

> Except as otherwise provided in this section, the trustee,[11] with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys, accountants, appraisers, auctioneers, or other professional persons, that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title. [Emphasis added.]

The purpose of section 327(a) is to ensure impartiality in bankruptcy representation. Electro-Wire Products, Inc. v. Sirote & Permutt, P.C. (In re Prince), 40 F.3d 356, 360 (11th Cir. 1994). The requirements for employment of a professional person to represent the bankruptcy estate under section 327(a) are two-fold: (1) the professional person must "not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate"; and (2) the person must be a "disinterested person." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). While the Bankruptcy Code does not define "hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate," this Court has defined this phrase as follows:

> ... possessing, or serving as an attorney for a person possessing, either an "economic interest that would tend to lessen the value of the bankruptcy estate or that would create either an actual or potential dispute in which the estate is a rival claimant ... or ... a predisposition under the circumstances that render such a bias against the estate."

[11] As used in section 327(a), "trustee" also includes a debtor in possession in a chapter 11 bankruptcy case. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a).

Id. at 361 (emphasis added); accord, I.G. Petroleum, L.L.C. v. Fenasci (In re West Delta Oil Co.), ___ F.3d ___, 2005 WL 3220291, at 7 (5th Cir. 2005); Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 835 (7th Cir. 1998). Section 101(14) defines the term "disinterested person," as used in section 327(a), in pertinent part, as a "person that ... is not a creditor, an equity security holder, or an insider" and who "does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors or equity holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor ... or for any other reason." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(A), (E) (emphasis added); Prince, 40 F.3d at 360-361; West Delta Oil Co., 2005 WL 3220291, at 7; Crivello, 134 F.3d at 835. Together, these statutory requirements of disinterestedness and no interest adverse to the estate "serve the important policy of ensuring that all professionals appointed pursuant to § 327(a) tender undivided loyalty and provide untainted advice and assistance in furtherance of their fiduciary responsibilities." Id. at 836 (quoting Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 58 (1st Cir. 1994)).

Section 327(c) provides a limited exception to the requirements of section 327(a), where the professional seeking employment has previously represented a creditor of the bankruptcy estate, and states as follows:

> In a case under chapter 7, 12 or 11 of this title, a person is not disqualified for employment under this section solely because of such > person's employment by or representation of a creditor, unless there is objection by another creditor or the United States trustee, in which case the court shall disapprove such employment if there is an actual conflict of interest. [Emphasis added.]

Section 328(c) gives bankruptcy courts the discretion to deny compensation of a professional person if such professional is not a disinterested person and provides as follows:

> Except as provided in section 327(c), 327(e), or 1107(b) of this title, the court may deny allowance of compensation for services and reimbursement of expenses of a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103 of this title if, at any time during such professional persons' employment under section 327 or 1003 of this title, such professional person is not a disinterested person, or represents or holds an interest adverse to the interest of the estate with respect to the matter on which the professional person is employed. [Emphasis added.]

Quarles's arguments notwithstanding, Appellant's Brief, at 44-46, the Bankruptcy Court's sanction in these cases faithfully applied this Court's ruling in Electro-Wire Products, Inc. v. Sirote & Permutt, P.C. (In re Prince), 40 F.3d 356 (11th Cir. 1994). Indeed, Quarles's misconduct, although broader in scope, shares some similarities with the misconduct this Court sanctioned in Prince, where the debtor's counsel also failed to disclose fully prepetition estate planning services. Prince, 40 F.3d at 359-361.

In Prince, this Court reversed an award of attorneys' fees to the debtor's counsel after counsel had withdrawn from the case, and denied all fees, holding that the debtor's counsel could not qualify as a disinterested person, and thus could not receive any compensation under the Bankruptcy Code. 40 F.3d at 361. Like Quarles, the debtor's counsel in Prince initially failed to disclose a series of prepetition services for affiliated entities. Id. at 358 (counsel performed prepetition estate planning services for the debtor and his wife, represented a corporation operated and controlled by the debtor, and possibly obtained a preferential transfer from the debtor). Counsel failed to disclose any of this at the time it was retained to act as the debtor's counsel. Id. Subsequently, counsel amended its application for employment, stating that it inadvertently failed to disclose its performance of prepetition estate planning services for the debtor, but failed to disclose fully the timing of such services and any impact of such services on the bankruptcy proceedings. Id. at 359. Later, counsel filed a second amendment stating that it inadvertently failed to disclose its prepetition representation of the debtor's wife in other matters unrelated to the bankruptcy proceedings. Id.

In Prince, this Court denied compensation to the debtor's counsel under section 328(c) because it was not a disinterested person during the bankruptcy case. 40 F.3d at 361. In defining disinterestedness under section 327(a), this Court properly recognized that the term could encompass either actual or potential conflicts. Id. at 360-361.

In sanctioning Quarles for its misconduct, the Bankruptcy Court properly applied the same disinterestedness standard in concluding that Quarles was not a disinterested person based on potential or actual conflicts of interest. BR 889, at 6. By mischaracterizing Prince as holding that only actual conflicts are actionable, Quarles incorrectly suggests, Appellant's Brief, at 44-46, this Court's jurisprudence departs from that of all other circuits, which have consistently permitted disqualification and denial of compensation based on potential conflicts, but it does not. See In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 476 (3rd Cir. 1998) (holding that bankruptcy court has discretion to disqualify any attorney who has potential conflict of interest); Interwest Business Equipment, Inc. v. United States Trustee (In re Interwest Business Equipment, Inc.), 23 F.3d 311, 316 (10th Cir. 1994) (holding that § 327(c) "does not preempt the more basic requirements of [§ 327(a)]"); In re B H & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1317-1318 (3rd Cir. 1991) (court disqualified counsel for multiple related bankruptcy estates where counsel failed to disclose potential conflicts arising from claims among estates).

Here, Quarles, like the debtor's counsel in Prince, failed to disclose that it performed prepetition estate planning services for the debtor.[12] As a result of

[12] In Prince, however, unlike these cases, the debtor's counsel subsequently attempted to mitigate any harm to the estate by amending its application to disclose its prepetition estate planning services for the debtor and voluntarily withdrawing

prepetition estate planning services by Quarles, its client, Jennings, purchased a $925,000 homestead in Florida and a $500,000 annuity. After the commencement of the bankruptcy cases, on July 7, 2003, Maxfield filed an objection to Jennings's claim of an exemption in the annuity on the grounds that Jennings converted non-exempt property to exempt property with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors.[13] Ex. 9. Quarles now asserts that some courts have permitted exemption planning as part of the services rendered by a debtor's counsel to its client, Appellant's Brief, at 32, but fails to apprise this Court that the Bankruptcy Court recently entered an order in these cases sustaining Maxfield's objection to Jennings' exemption claim in the annuity, disallowing such exemption, and concluding that Jennings' purchase of the annuity in reliance on Quarles's legal advice was a fraudulent asset conversion. In vitiating Quarles' transaction for Jennings, the bankruptcy court freed up from the case. 40 F.3d at 359. Here, Quarles at no time amended the Application or Affidavit to disclose this connection or any other connection with the Debtors, nor did it ever offer to withdraw from representing any of the Debtors.

[13] Maxfield alleged that the annuity exemption claim violated section 222.30(2) of the Florida Statutes, which provides that "[a]ny conversion by a debtor of an asset that results in the proceeds of the asset becoming exempt by law from the claims of a creditor of the debtor is a fraudulent asset conversion as to the creditor ... if the debtor made the conversion with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditor." Ex.9. Quarles cites to two Florida bankruptcy court decisions permitting prepetition exemption planning involving the purchase of annuities, Appellant's Brief, at 32, but both cases were decided prior to the enactment of section 222.30 effective October 1, 1993. See In re Swecker, 157 B.R. 694, 696 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1993) (decided July 13, 1993); In re Levine, 40 B.R. 76, 82 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1984).

approximately $400,000 to help pay Jennings's creditors.[14] In any event, even if the Bankruptcy Court ultimately had allowed the exemption, Quarles performance of prepetition estate planning services for Jennings tainted its ability to represent independently and disinterestedly the Jennings estate and the interest of its creditors.

B. The Bankruptcy Court and District Court Correctly Concluded that Quarles Was Not a Disinterested Person Based on its Actual or Potential Conflicts of Interest in Representing Multiple Debtors.

The Bankruptcy Court and the District Court correctly concluded that Quarles was not a disinterested person under section 327(a), as a result of: (1) Jennings's secured claim against the Distributor; (2) Jennings's $500,000 loan to the Partnership and subsequent "cancellation of indebtedness"; and (3) the Partnership's possible claims against the Manufacturer arising from the financial transactions involving the

The United States Trustee also files herewith the United States Trustee's motion requesting leave to supplement the record on appeal or, in the alternative, requesting that the Court take judicial notice of such matters. True copies of the Bankruptcy Court's order sustaining Maxfield's objection to Jennings's exemption claim in the annuity and findings and conclusions thereon, entered September 22, 2005, are included in the United States Trustees' Supplemental Record Excerpts as SRE 1301 and SRE 1300, respectively. Manufacturer's leases with the Partnership and Knowleton. BR 889, at 10-12; DR 48, at 22-23.

Although Quarles suggests otherwise, the courts of appeal and other courts have found in similar circumstances that bankruptcy courts' concern for potential and actual conflicts, or counsel's lack of disinterestedness, authorized those courts to prohibit firms like Quarles from representing multiple debtors. See 11 U.S.C. 327(a) (giving courts discretion to retain firms only when they are disinterested and hold no adverse interest). For example, where a law firm sought to represent multiple interrelated debtors in related chapter 11 cases, as in the instant cases, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the bankruptcy court's denial of the firm's application for employment as counsel for the debtors, holding that the firm failed to meet the minimum requirements of section 327(a). Interwest Business Equipment, Inc. v. United States Trustee (Interwest Business Equipment, Inc.), 23 F.3d 311, 318 (10th Cir. 1994). In Interwest, the law firm was seeking court approval to represent two related corporations, the sole shareholder of both corporations, and a fourth related entity, which received income from one of the corporations pursuant to a management contract and also made lease payments for that corporation. Id. at 313. Unlike here, however, the law firm in Interwest disclosed substantial intercompany debt among the debtors in its Rule 2014(a) affidavits, but the affidavits did not disclose any further information regarding the validity or amount of the intercompany debt or other information sufficient to address any of the conflicts involved in representing the separate estates. Id. at 314. The Tenth Circuit concluded that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in finding: (1) that the firm's simultaneous representation of each debtor and one of the other estates as creditor constituted representation of an interest adverse to the estate, and that the firm was thus not disinterested; and (2) that the existence of a prepetition debt from one estate to the other created a disqualifying conflict of interest. Id. at 314, 318. In so holding, the court recognized the importance of the fiduciary duty of the debtor in possession, as trustee of the estate, and of counsel's obligation to serve the trustee independently. Id. at 317; see also In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1317-1318 (3d Cir. 1991) (affirming disqualification of counsel for multiple related bankruptcy estates of corporation and its two principals, where estates had claims against one another and counsel failed to disclose potential conflicts); In re Coal River Resources, Inc., 321 B.R. 184, 189 (W.D. Va. 2005) (affirming bankruptcy court's finding that single attorney could not represent interests of four related corporate debtors with intercompany debts, and in particular fiduciary obligation of each debtor to its own creditors); In re Wheatfield Business Park LLC, 286 B.R. 412, 418 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 2002) ("[w]here a bankruptcy debtor is a creditor of a related debtor, it is presumptively improper for the same attorney ... to be general counsel for the related debtors"); In re Lee, 94 B.R. 172, 180 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1988) (counsel for two related debtors could not represent both estates, where debt existed between estates and counsel failed to disclose potential conflicts).[15]

Here, the Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that Quarles lacked disinterestedness based on three conflicts of interest, which Quarles admits are at least potential conflicts:

(1) Jennings's secured claim against the Distributor: The Bankruptcy Court correctly found that an "actual dispute" arose because of Jennings's secured claim against the Distributor. BR 889, at 11-12; DR 48, at 22. As counsel for both estates, Quarles had a fiduciary obligation to represent directly conflicting interests, i.e., Jennings's interest as secured creditor and the Distributor's interest as borrower.

[15] The District Court correctly distinguished In re Global Marine, Inc., 108 B.R. 998 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 1987), in which the court exercised its discretion and approved counsel's representation of multiple debtors where the court found no actual conflict of interest based on the evidence of record, as well as other lower court cases upon which Quarles relies, which turn on findings based on the record in each particular case. DR 48, at 20. Quarles's reliance on In re Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., et al., Case No. 05-03817-3F1 (Bankr. M.D. Fla.), is similarly misplaced. Appellant's Brief, at 40-41. Unlike the Debtors here, the debtors in Winn-Dixie are a publicly-held parent corporation and 23 subsidiaries. Quarles cites selectively to only two docket items in massive reorganization proceedings with more than 4,000 docket entries filed. It is beyond the scope of this appeal to determine the correctness of the Bankruptcy Court's rulings in Winn-Dixie, vis-à-vis its rulings in the instant cases, when the record in Winn-Dixie is not properly before this Court. In any event, regardless of the ultimate outcome in Winn-Dixie, the Bankruptcy Court here did not abuse its discretion based on the record below.

Jennings's schedules indicated that he asserted a $1,404,000 secured claim against the Distributor's assets, valued at $1,278,952, including inventory worth $1,117,336. BR 889, at 5. Quarles could not effectively protect Jennings's collateral without inhibiting the Distributor's ability to operate; nor could Quarles advocate the Distributor's continued operations without impacting Jennings's security interest in the Distributor's prepetition assets. BR 889, at 10-12; DR 48, at 23. By November 2003, the Distributor had sold all of its prepetition inventory and had consumed all proceeds of such inventory, which resulted in direct injury to Jennings' bankruptcy estate.[16] BR 889, at 11, 13.

(2) Jennings's $500,000 loan to the Partnership and subsequent "cancellation of indebtedness": In the year preceding the bankruptcy, the Partnership apparently removed a $500,000 debt to Jennings from its financial statements and tax returns, even though no money changed hands and the Partnership had the funds to the pay this obligation. BR 889, at 12. Quarles could not investigate and pursue the recovery of funds for the Jennings estate while opposing these efforts on behalf of the Partnership's estate. The Bankruptcy Court thus correctly concluded that because of Quarles's divided loyalties, it could not comply with its fiduciary duty to represent each estate independently and impartially.[17] BR 889, at 12; DR 48, at 23.

[16] Quarles asserts mistakenly that during its representation of the Debtors, "all of the assets remained available for creditors, so no dollars left the universe of [the Distributor's] and [Jennings's] estates." Appellant's Brief, at 42. In fact, the Jennings estate suffered actual injury as a consequence of Quarles's divided loyalties in representing both Jennings's and the Distributor's estates. The Distributor has ceased operations and depleted all of its inventory and other assets, thus effectively terminating Jennings's lien. Quarles's suggestion that it could avoid injury to the Jennings estate by providing for the reinstatement of Jennings's lien through a plan of reorganization is completely without merit because there is nothing left to reinstate.

(3) The Partnership's possible claims against the Manufacturer: In light of the Partnership's possible claims against the Manufacturer arising from the financial transactions involving the Manufacturer's leases with the Partnership and Knowleton, the Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that Quarles's simultaneous representation of the Partnership and the Manufacturer rendered it not disinterested, where it could not independently investigate the claims of one client against the other. BR 889, at 12; DR 48, at 23.

Nonetheless, despite its duty to represent vigorously the separate bankruptcy estates, Quarles argues that hiring multiple sets of attorneys for the Debtors to permit them to assert claims against each other "made no sense and only would serve to deplete the estates." Appellant's Brief, at 44. That was not Quarles's decision to make, however; it was the Bankruptcy Court's. By failing to bring any potential conflicts of interest to the Bankruptcy Court's attention so it could properly and timely decide these issues, Quarles usurped this decision-making process from the Bankruptcy Court.

[17] Quarles responds on this issue that it did not improperly fail to disclose this matter since Nashban testified at the hearing on the Disqualification Motion on April 29, 2004, that he had no prior knowledge of this issue. Appellant's Brief, at 21-22, 42; BR 663, at 44. This is irrelevant, however, because the Bankruptcy Court did not find a lack of disclosure of this connection, but nonetheless correctly found that once this matter became known, Quarles had a duty to investigate the facts for the benefit of one estate to the detriment of the other. BR 889, at 8, 12.

III. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised its Discretion in Disqualifying Quarles as Counsel for the Debtors, Denying All of its Compensation in the Chapter 11 Cases, and Requiring Disgorgement of Any Prepetition Retainer, Based on Quarles's Failure to Disclose and Lack of Disinterestedness.

A. The Failure to Disclose by Itself Was Sufficient Grounds for Disqualification and Denial of Compensation.

The Bankruptcy Court correctly exercised its discretion in disqualifying Quarles as counsel for the Debtors, denying all of its compensation in the chapter 11 cases, and requiring disgorgement of any prepetition retainer, based on both Quarles's failure to disclose its connections with the Debtors and its lack of disinterestedness.

Failure to disclose is sufficient grounds to revoke an employment order and deny compensation. I.G. Petroleum, L.L.C. v. Fenasci (In re West Delta Oil Co.), ___ F.3d ___, 2005 WL 3220291, at 6 (5th Cir. 2005); In re Kisseberth, 273 F.3d 714, 721 (6th Cir. 2001); Kravit, Gass & Weber, S.C. v. Michel (In re Crivello), 134 F.3d 831, 836 (7th Cir. 1998); Mapother & Mapother, P.S.C. v. Cooper (In re Downs), 103 F.3d 472, 477 (6th Cir. 1996); accord, In re Gulf Coast Orthopedic Center, 265 B.R. 318, 323 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2001) ("failure to disclose the [professional's] relationships is sufficient in and of itself to require denial and disgorgement of all compensation separate and apart from any question that there was any actual conflict of interest").

The circuits courts recognize that bankruptcy courts have broad and inherent authority to deny any and all compensation where an attorney fails to comply with the disclosure requirements for employment and compensation of attorneys. See In re Kisseberth, 273 F.3d 714, 721 (6th Cir. 2001); Law Offices of Nicholas A. Franke v. Tiffany (In re Lewis), 113 F.3d 1040, 1045 (9th Cir. 1997). The Sixth and Ninth Circuits have held that "[e]ven a negligent or inadvertent failure to disclose fully relevant information may result in a denial of all requested fees." Kisseberth, 273 F.3d at 721 (Sixth Circuit affirmed disgorgement and denial of fees for attorney's failure to disclose all payments received from debtors under Rule 2016(b), where attorney claimed such failure was negligent or inadvertent);[18] Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d at 877, 882 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049, 116 S.Ct. 712 (1996) (Ninth Circuit upheld denial of all attorney's fees for failure to disclose the source of retainer under both Rule 2014(a) and Rule 2016(b)); see also In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1318 (3rd Cir. 1991) ("[n]egligence does not excuse the failure to disclose a possible conflict of interest"); In re Jore Corporation, 298 B.R. 703, 726, 732 (Bankr. D. Mont. 2003) (court disqualified debtor's attorneys and denied and required disgorgement of all fees and costs for attorneys' failure to disclose limited conflicts waiver, although attorneys claimed that such failure was negligent or inadvertent).

The First and Fifth Circuits have also upheld the complete denial of compensation for violations of the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure requirements. See In re Independent Engineering Co., 197 F.3d 13, 17 (1st Cir. 1999) (court affirmed disgorgement of all fees for attorney's failure to disclose postpetition draws and payments from debtor under Rule 2016(b)); In re Prudhomme, 43 F.3d 1000, 1003-1004 (5th Cir. 1995) (court affirmed disgorgement of all fees due to attorney's failure to disclose retainer under Rule 2016(b)).

Although Quarles claims that it "engaged in no active efforts to conceal any material facts," Appellant's Brief, at 45, this representation is not consistent with the facts in these cases. Quarles's complete failure to comply with the Bankruptcy Codes's disclosure rules was inexcusable under the circumstances. See Prince, 40 F.3d at 361 ("[w]hether [counsel] inadvertently or intentionally neglected to inform the court of its conflicts is of no import"). The Bankruptcy Court thus properly observed that it had the discretion to disqualify Quarles as counsel for the Debtors or to deny its compensation based on its inadequate disclosure alone, but that the Court need not make that determination because the Court also found that Quarles was not disinterested. BR 889, at 10.

Significantly, the Bankruptcy Court had discretion to order disgorgement even if Quarles's omissions are viewed as inadvertent rather than intentional. See Kisseberth, 273 F.3d at 721 (firm required to disgorge for negligent failures to disclose potential conflicts at employment application stage). Either way, the Bankruptcy Court's disgorgement order here is fully sustainable based solely on Quarles's failure to disclose, even assuming Quarles did not lack disinterestedness or hold an adverse interest under section 327(a).

B. Lack of Disinterestedness Is Grounds for Disqualification and Denial of Compensation Based on Either Potential or Actual Conflicts of Interest.

This Court, in Prince, held that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in awarding compensation to the debtor's counsel, where, as in the instant cases, counsel was not disinterested and had failed to disclose its connections with the debtor and other parties in interest. 40 F.3d at 361. This Court properly noted that section 328(c) is permissive; it permits a court to deny compensation to professionals found not to be disinterested persons but does not require a denial of fees in those instances. Id. at 359. This Court further noted that denial of fees is proper when actual injury to the debtor's estate occurs. Id. at 360. In this regard, this Court stated:

> ... "[I]n exercising the discretion granted by statute we think the [bankruptcy] court should lean strongly toward denial of fees, and if the past benefit to the wrongdoer fiduciary can be quantified, to require > disgorgement of compensation previously paid that fiduciary even before the conflict arose."

Id. at 360 (quoting Gray v. English, 30 F.3d 1319, 1324 (10th Cir. 1994)). The Bankruptcy Court properly followed this legal standard in denying all Quarles's compensation, where actual injury to the Debtors' estates occured as a result of its simultaneous representation of the Debtors in these cases. Here, like in Prince, the Debtors' counsel had "too many masters." Prince, 40 F.3d at 361. As noted above, however, the Bankruptcy Court also had the discretion to deny Quarles's compensation and require disgorgement of its retainer due to its failure to comply with the disclosure requirements of section 327 and Rule 2014(a), even if negligent or inadvertent. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 882; Jore, 298 B.R. at 729; see also Kisseberth, 273 F.3d at 721 (affirming denial of compensation for failure to disclose payments under Rule 2016(b)).

As set forth above, Quarles misreads Prince, where this Court denied compensation to the debtor's counsel based on a lack of disinterestedness, not the existence of an actual conflict. Supra, at 28-29, 33. Fully consistent with this Court's holding in Prince, the Third Circuit has held that notwithstanding the language of section 327(c), which, together with section 327(a), imposes a per se disqualification of any attorney or other professional person who has an actual conflict of interest because of such person's employment by or representation of a creditor, a bankruptcy court may within its discretion, pursuant to section 327(a) and consistent with section 327(c), disqualify an attorney who has a potential conflict of interest. See In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246, 251 (3rd Cir. 2002); In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 476 (3rd Cir. 1998); In re BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d 1300, 1315-1317 (3rd Cir. 1991). "Denomination of a conflict as 'potential' or 'actual' and the decision concerning whether to disqualify a professional in situations not yet rising to the level of an actual conflict are matters committed to the bankruptcy court's sound exercise of discretion." Id. at 1316-1317; see also In re Martin, 817 F.2d 175, 182 (1st Cir. 1989) ("[t]he naked existence of a potential for conflict of interest does not render the appointment of counsel nugatory, but makes it voidable as the facts may warrant").

To support its position that disqualification or denial of compensation requires an actual conflict, Quarles cites to lower court cases where the courts exercised their discretion to permit a single law firm to represent multiple related debtors. Appellant's Brief, at 35-39. That there is no per se rule prohibiting such representation is not in dispute. Sections 327(a) and 328(c) vest bankruptcy courts with the discretion to disqualify or deny compensation to counsel where, as here, the court determines in the exercise of its discretion that a law firm potentially cannot provide impartial advice to the related debtors. Courts have generally declined to formulate bright-line rules concerning the criteria for disqualification and have determined the propriety of employment for multiple related debtors on a case-by-case basis, taking all circumstances into account. BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d at 1315. Factors that a court must consider include, but are not limited to, the nature of disclosure of the conflict made at the time of appointment, whether the interests of the related estates are parallel or conflicting, and the nature of the inter-debtor claims made. Id. at 1316.

Thus, in a number of multiple-debtor cases, as here, after considering all of these factors, the courts have held that the inability of the professional to fulfill its role as an independent fiduciary on behalf of the estates warranted disqualification. See, e.g., Interwest, 23 F.3d at 316 (separate counsel required when intercompany debts placed each estate in creditor-debtor relationship with another); BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d at 1317-1318 (court properly exercised discretion in disqualifying counsel for multiple related bankruptcy estates for corporation and its two principals, where estates had claims against one another and counsel had negligently failed to disclose potential conflicts); In re Coal River Resources, Inc., 321 B.R. 184, 189 (W.D. Va. 2005) (court disqualified counsel from representing two of four related debtors at outset of case, where some debtors had intercompany debt against another); In re C & C Demo, Inc., 273 B.R. 502, 508 (Bankr. E.D. Tex. 2001) (court disqualified counsel for corporate chapter 11 debtor from representing corporation based on counsel's failure to disclose simultaneous representation of debtor's shareholders in their individual chapter 13 cases); In re Lee, 94 B.R. 172, 180 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1988) (counsel for two related debtors could not represent both estates where debt existed between estates and counsel failed to disclose potential conflicts).

Quarles's contention that the Bankruptcy Court could not disqualify Quarles in the absence of an actual conflict of interest is an improper attempt to deny bankruptcy courts the discretion that the Bankruptcy Code and the courts of appeal give them to disqualify counsel from employment in potential conflict cases. The Bankruptcy Court properly exercised its discretion to disqualify Quarles based on both its lack of disinterestedness and its failure to properly disclose its connections with the Debtors. BR 889, at 13; DR 48, at 23.

C. By Failing to Disclose its Connections with the Debtors, Quarles Risked Disqualification and Denial of All of its Compensation at Any Time During the Bankruptcy Proceedings.

Quarles suggests that the Bankruptcy Court's ruling is unfair because it came after Quarles incurred substantial fees in performing services which arguably benefited the estate. Appellant's Brief, at 34 n.13.[19] This problem, however, was one

[19] Here, Quarles asserts, in part, that a motion to disqualify counsel or deny fees for a failure to comply with section 327(a) can be estopped due to delay by the movant or the court. The cases that Quarles cites in support of this contention, however, are inapposite and/or distinguishable. See, e.g., Halperin v. Kissinger, 542 F.Supp. 829, 832 (D. D.C. 1982) (motion to disqualify counsel in non-bankruptcy of Quarles's own making. Had Quarles properly disclosed its connections and potential or actual conflicts in the Application and Affidavit or in an amendment to the Affidavit, or otherwise requested the Bankruptcy Court to rule on the propriety of its continued employment by the Debtors in the initial stages of the bankruptcy proceedings, as Quarles was required to do under section 327 and Rule 2014(a), the Bankruptcy Court could have ruled on this issue prior to the incurrence of substantial fees, thus mitigating any loss to Quarles. See Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 59 (1st Cir. 1994) ("as soon as counsel acquires even constructive knowledge reasonably suggesting an actual or potential conflict, ... a bankruptcy court ruling should be obtained" (emphasis added)).

As early as June and October 2003, Maxfield's counsel gave fair warning to Quarles of Maxfield's possible intent to move for disqualification of Quarles if it failed to mitigate any further harm to the Debtors' estates by making full disclosure or voluntarily withdrawing from representation of one or more of the Debtors. BR 912 (Exhibits A and B). Quarles continued to incur fees, however, in connection with its representation of all the Debtors and made no effort whatsoever to bring these litigation; section 327 inapplicable); In re Kliegl Bros. Universal Elec. Stage Lighting Co., 189 B.R. 874, 875, 877 (Bankr. E.D. N.Y. 1995) (conflict and disclosure issues were raised for first time more than five years after employment of counsel in objection to final fee application; no motion to disqualify counsel had been filed).

issues to the Bankruptcy Court's attention or otherwise to minimize any possible loss of compensation. It was not the obligation of the Bankruptcy Court to search the record for possible conflicts of interest; that obligation "belongs to the party who seeks employment by the estate." BH & P, Inc., 949 F.2d at 1317. In failing to fulfill that obligation, Quarles took a calculated risk in deciding to proceed forward at that point. The Bankruptcy Court correctly observed that "attorneys who fail to disclose their representation of competing interests bear all of the responsibility and associated risks for making an inadequate Rule 2014 disclosure." BR 889, at 9. "Though [Rule 2014] allows the fox to guard the proverbial hen house, counsel who fail to disclose timely and completely their connections proceed at their own risk because failure to disclose is sufficient grounds to revoke an employment order and deny compensation." West Delta Oil Co., 2005 WL 3220291, at 6 (quoting Crivello, 134 F.3d 831, 836); see also Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d at 59 ("[a]bsent the spontaneous, timely and complete disclosure required by § 327(a) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a), court-appointed counsel proceed at their own risk").

While a bankruptcy court has the discretion to determine what fees, if any, it should allow, it also has the discretion to deny all fees for a disclosure violation without inquiring as to the appropriate amount of the fee. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1046. Disclosure violations are sanctionable, "regardless of any actual harm to the estate."

Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. Nonetheless, here, the Court properly exercised its discretion to deny all fees, where it found actual injury to the estate. See Prince, 40 F.3d at 360; cf. Woods v. City Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago, 312 U.S. 262, 268, 61 S.Ct. 493, 497, 85 L.Ed. 820 (1941) (Supreme Court reversed award of compensation to counsel for bondholders' committee, which also represented indenture trustee and other parties with interests in conflict with those of committee, holding that compensation should be denied where "claimant was serving more than one master or was subject to conflicting interests"). The record below reflects actual injury to the Jennings bankruptcy estate as a direct result of Quarles & Brady's failure to protect Jennings's security interest in the assets of the Distributor. The Distributor has depleted those assets, both the Manufacturer and Distributor have since shut their doors and ceased operating, and reorganization of the Debtors is no longer possible.[20] [20] Quarles's brief neglected to apprise this Court that the Bankruptcy Court converted Jennings's chapter 11 case to a chapter 7 liquidation case on June 7, 2005, SRE 1268, or that the Bankruptcy Court entered an order on March 24, 2005, authorizing Maxfield to pursue malpractice claims against Quarles on behalf of Jennings's bankruptcy estate. SRE 1145. That litigation is currently pending in the District Court under Case No. 3:05-cv-00518-HLA-HTS. Despite Quarles's representation that it "achieved successful results" for the Debtors, Appellant's Brief, at 19-21, the Bankruptcy Court made no findings to support this contention. Although the Bankruptcy Court properly exercised its discretion to sanction Quarles without inquiring as to the appropriate amount of the fee, see Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1046, if this Court determines that findings regarding the value or benefit of Quarles's services are necessary or appropriate, this Court may remand this matter to the Bankruptcy Court with instructions to enter findings on this issue.

In these cases, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in disqualifying Quarles as counsel for the Debtors, denying all of its compensation, and requiring disgorgement of its retainer, based on Quarles's failure to disclose its connections with the Debtors and its lack of disinterestedness.

IV. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised its Discretion in Denying Quarles's Post-trial Motions.

The Bankruptcy Court properly exercised its discretion in denying Quarles's Post-trial Motions. Quarles filed the Post-trial Motions pursuant to Rules 9023, 9024, and 7062, Fed. R. Bankr. P., which incorporate by reference the provisions of Rules 59, 60, and 62, Fed. R. Civ. P., respectively. BR 895-897.

The grounds for both motions for a new trial under Rule 59(a) and motions to alter or amend a judgment under Rule 59(e) are the same. Both motions require a showing of: (1) manifest error of fact; (2) manifest error of law; or (3) newly discovered evidence. See In re Investors Florida Aggressive Growth Fund, Ltd., 168 B.R. 760, 768 (Bankr. N.D. Fla. 1994) (motion for reconsideration denied); In re Tiffany Square Associates, Ltd., 104 B.R. 438, 442 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1989) (motion for rehearing denied); see also In re Kellogg, 197 F.3d 1116, 1120 (11th Cir. 1999) (party "may not use a Rule 59(e) motion to raise arguments available but not advanced at the [prior] hearing").

Courts may grant a motion for relief from a judgment under Rule 60(b) for the following reasons: (1) mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; (2) newly discovered evidence; (3) fraud; (4) the judgment is void; (5) the judgment has been satisfied, released, or discharged; or (6) any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b).

Pursuant to Rule 62(b), a court may stay the execution of a judgment pending the disposition of a motion for a new trial or to alter or amend a judgment made pursuant to Rule 59, or a motion for relief from a judgment or order made pursuant to Rule 60, "[i]n its discretion and on such conditions for the security of the adverse party as are proper." Fed. R. Civ. P. 62(b).

Quarles's Post-trial Motions merely reiterated the same arguments set forth in their responses in opposition to the Disqualification Motion, citing no new legal authority or newly discovered evidence. BR 898.

The Bankruptcy Court promptly afforded any interested parties an opportunity to respond to the Post-trial Motions. BR 901. The Bankruptcy Court considered Quarles's Post-trial Motions and supporting memorandum, as well as the responses submitted by Maxfield and the United States Trustee. BR 921. The Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the Post-trial Motions under Rules 9023 and 9024, where Quarles failed to show a manifest error of law or fact, to cite to any new legal authority or newly discovered evidence, or to make any showing required under Rule 60(b). DR 48, at 29-30. In addition, because the Bankruptcy Court promptly denied those motions, it properly denied as moot Quarles's motion for a stay pending resolution of the Post-trial Motions under Rule 62(b). BR 921.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the orders entered below.

DATED: January __, 2006.

STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION[1]

This Court has jurisdiction to hear appeals "from final judgments, orders, and decrees." 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1);158(b)(1). The bankruptcy court's order granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss Jim Slemons Hawaii Inc.'s ("JSH") chapter 11 bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b) was a final order. Zolg v. Kelly (In re Kelly), 841 F.2d 908, 911 (9th Cir.1988). The order was entered on July 13, 2010 and timely appealed on July 27, 2010. 28 U.S.C. §158(c)(2); Fed. R. App. P. 8002(a).

The United States Trustee respectfully maintains its position that this court does not have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §158(c)(2) over the appeal of the bankruptcy court's order denying attorney fees to Mr. Anthony Loccrichio, counsel in the bankruptcy case, because the appeal was not timely. See United States Trustee Motion to Dismiss filed on August 26, 2010. [Doc. 009155961]. The bankruptcy court entered an order denying Mr. Loccrichio's application for professional compensation on June 29, 2010. This was a final order. In re

[1] The United States Trustee incorporates her arguments concerning lack of jurisdiction made in her motion to dismiss, filed with this Court on August 26, 2010. [009155961]. In the event that this Court continues to disagree with the United States Trustee's jurisdictional analysis, this brief explains the grounds upon which this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court.

Yermakov, 718 F.2d 1465, 1469 (9th Cir. 1983) (holding the bankruptcy court's determination regarding an attorney's application for compensation to be a final order). It was entered on June 29, 2010, giving Mr. Locricchio 14 days to file a notice of appeal. 28 U.S.C. §158(c)(2); Fed. R. App. P. 8002(a). This requirement is jurisdictional. Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. 205, 206, 213 (2007) (stating that if Congress establishes a time-limit for noticing an appeal, it is jurisdictional); Anderson v. Mouradick (In re Mouradick), 13 F.3d 326, 327 (9th Cir. 1994). The 14-day appeal clock expired on July 13, 2010. Mr. Locricchio's July 27 notice of appeal was therefore untimely to perfect an appeal from the June 29 order denying his application for professional compensation.

This Court denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss on the grounds that an interim fee order is not final and thus can always be reviewed. Doc. 9160870 (filed Oct. 25, 2010) (relying on Leitchy v. Neary (In re Strand), 375 F.3d 854, 858 (9th Cir. 2004)). Leitchy is, however, distinguishable. The Leitchy court approved an initial fee application, giving the attorney $22,012.50 but only authorizing payment of $16,510. Id. at 857. The attorney then filed a second, final fee request. The Ninth Circuit held it was proper for the bankruptcy court to adjust its first award when determining the final compensation amount. Id. at 858.

Here, there was no interim fee award. The bankruptcy court considered, and denied, a single fee application at the end of the case. See In re Mouradick, 13 F.3d at 327 (stating that appeal window for appeal of administrative matters is “rigid” because of the need for efficiency in bankruptcy proceedings) (citation omitted).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion when it dismissed Debtor’s chapter 11 bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b).

2. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in awarding Debtor’s counsel no fees under 11 U.S.C. §330 where counsel failed to prove that his services were reasonable and necessary, and the bankruptcy court found counsel’s services harmed the estate and the Debtor.

III.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

There are two separate issues before this Court. The first issue arises from the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss Debtor's chapter 11 case which was filed on April 26, 2010. The second issue concerns the fee application of Debtor's counsel, Anthony P. Locricchio, for $39,647.40 and expenses of $205. The bankruptcy court granted the motion to dismiss because the estate had been substantially diminished as a result of Mr. Locricchio's failure to assume a non-residential real property lease under 11 U.S.C. §365(d)(4), removing the possibility of a successful reorganization. In its decision, the bankruptcy court also denied Mr. Locricchio's request for fees and expenses because of his incompetence in not assuming the lease, which led to the estate losing its most valuable asset.

IV.

FACTS

A. Motion to Dismiss

Jim Slemons Hawaii, Inc. ("JSH") filed a voluntary petition for relief under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on August 10, 2009 to prevent it from being evicted from a commercial property located at 98-085 Kamehameha Highway, Aiea, Hawaii.[2] (A.E.R., A, p.4.) JSH had not paid rent to the owner of the property, Continental Investment Company, Ltd., since March 2009. (A.E.R., A, p.4; II L, p. 143; pp.225-226.)

At the time of the bankruptcy, JSH still had nine years remaining on the lease with monthly rent of $58,000 plus real property taxes of approximately $4,000. (A.E.R., A, p.4.) JSH subleased the property to five entities, collecting an aggregate monthly rent of $59,250.00. (A.E.R., A, pp.4-5.) Two of those companies stopped paying rent, creating a cash-flow problem for JSH, and generating a series of legal claims and counter-claims. (A.E.R., K, pp. 125-127.)

At the time of filing, however, the City of Honolulu appeared to be in the process of exercising its right of eminent domain to take over part of the Aiea property for a new fixed rail system. Id. at 10. Mr. Slemons testified at a November meeting of creditors that the condemnation claim arising out of the rapid transit project would affect approximately 200 feet of the front portion of JSH's leasehold but that no condemnation proceeding had yet been commenced by the City of Honolulu. (A.E.R., A, p.5.) Nevertheless, JSH assumed that part of its leasehold had increased earning potential as a rail parking area, which alone could potentially generate income of $50,000 per month. (A.E.R., K, p.130.) JSH had already explored with various parking companies sub-leasing the land it would control for the remaining nine years on the lease. Id.

On October 2, 2009, Mr. Loccrichio filed JSH's first monthly operating report ("MOR") for the period August 10-31, 2009 with the bankruptcy court. (A.E.R., A, p. 5; II O, pp. 237-252.) It indicated that JSH's plan of reorganization was premised on being able to 1) receive compensation from the City of Honolulu for the "fair market value of portion of leased land" and 2) "sublease of non-condemed [sic] land." as parking for rail commuters. (A.E.R., A, pp. 5-6; II O p. 250.)

Continental, the owner of the property leased by JSH, filed a motion on December 23, 2009 requesting that the bankruptcy court verify that JSH's lease had terminated because JSH had not timely assumed the lease, or asked for an extension, during the 120 days following the filing of its petition, as required by 11 U.S.C. § 365(d)(4). Continental asked the Court to order JSH to to surrender the premises and grant related relief. (A.E.R., II L, pp. 140-226). The bankruptcy court granted Continental's motion on the grounds that JSH's opportunity to assume or reject the lease under 11 U.S.C. §365(d)(4) expired on December 9, 2009, and JSH had neither filed a motion to assume the lease or requested an extension of time to do so. (E.R., 8, pp. 41-47.) The subsequent judgment was entered on March 3, 2010. JSH did not file an appeal. (A.E.R., B, pp. 39-41.)

Instead of appealing the judgment terminating the lease, Mr. Loccrichio filed a Motion to Recuse the bankruptcy judge from hearing any further matters pertaining to the case. (A.E.R., C, pp. 43-69.) The recusal motion hearing was held on April 26, 2010, and the denial order was entered on May 5, 2010. (A.E.R., D, pp. 71-85.)

On April 26, 2010, the United States Trustee filed a Motion to Dismiss the bankruptcy case under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b) because JSH had lost its primary asset – its leasehold on the Aiea property – and thus would not be able to propose a plan of reorganization based on income from commuter parking or possible condemnation compensation. (A.E.R., A, pp. 9-12.) In addition, JSH had not complied with the reporting and administrative requirements for a chapter 11 debtor-in-possession. (A.E.R., A, p. 6; 9; 16). Continental supported the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. (A.E.R., E, pp. 87-95.) JSH responded that it "took no position" and "does not intend to oppose Trustee's form of the Motion to Dismiss." (A.E.R., F, pp. 97,100.) Instead, the response made arguments related to preserving JSH's appeal rights. (A.E.R., F, pp. 100-101.)

After a hearing, the bankruptcy court granted the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, finding that because the Aiea lease had been "deemed rejected, the estate had been substantially diminished and there is no longer any prospect for a successful reorganization." (A.E.R., G, p. 104.) The order of dismissal was entered on July 13, 2010. (A.E.R., J, pp.118-119.) JSH filed a notice of appeal of the dismissal order on July 27, 2010.

B. Attorney Fees

JSH's counsel in this matter, Mr. Anthony Loccrichio, filed an application for employment on September 28, 2009 under 11 U.S.C. § 327. The United States Trustee objected to Mr. Loccrichio's appointment on numerous grounds. (A.E.R., II M, pp. 228-232.) First, Mr. Loccrichio did not file a compensation disclosure form with his application, which the staff of the United States Trustee later had to give to him. (A.E.R., K, pp. 122; 124-125; 133-134; II M, pp. 229-230; and II N, pp. 234-235.) Second, at the time of his application, Mr. Loccrichio had not filed a statement of financial affairs for JSH. (A.E.R., K, p. 134; II M, p. 231.) The United States Trustee also alleged that Mr. Loccrichio had 1) not opened a DIP account; 2) not applied for a Federal Tax identification number; and 3) not acquired a General Excise Tax license. (A.E.R., II M, p. 231.) Mr. Loccrichio did not deny any of these allegation in his response. (A.E.R., II P, p.254-278.)

The bankruptcy court, however, authorized employment on January 12, 2010. (A.E.R., II Q, p. 281-282.) Nevertheless at the hearing, the judge cautioned Mr. Loccrichio that representing a debtor-in-possession is "a specialized area of law practice . . . that's hard to do right." (A.E.R., K, p. 123.) The court advised him to "think about associating with somebody who does have more of the relevant experience." Id.

As explained above, Mr. Loccrichio did not file a motion to assume the lease on the Aiea property by the December 9, 2009, deadline. In addition, Mr. Mr. Loccrichio also failed to appear at a continued 341 meeting on October 22, 2009. (A.E.R., A, p. 5; 15.) He did not file any monthly reports on behalf of JSH after January 2010. (A.E.R., A, p. 5; 16.)

Mr. Loccrichio did, however, file an application for interim fees on February 4, 2010, asking for $ 39,647.40 for his services up to that point. (E.R., 1, pp. 1-8.) His breakdown included 34 hours described as "Meeting with Jim Slemons" and an additional 9.25 hours for "approximately 3 phone calls a week for 21 weeks each one lasting approximately 15 minutes, some more some less." Id. at 3-4. He also requested $24,978.20 for 73.9 hours of "[W]ork on documents on behalf of Jim Slemons." Id. at 3.

The United States Trustee objected to the fee request because it did not provide adequate information for the United States Trustee to assess Mr. Loccrichio's fee request under 11 U.S.C. § 330. (E.R. 2, pp. 9-11.)

The bankruptcy court denied the fee application "in its entirety." (A.E.R., G, pp. 107-108.) Because Mr. Loccrichio was responsible for filing a timely motion to assume the Aiea lease, the bankruptcy court found that he "missed the deadline and thus failed to fulfill a basic responsibility." (A.E.R., G, p. 107.) The court then found that this failure caused JSH to lose its most valuable assets, so that "it would be an understatement to say that counsel's services were not beneficial to the estate; in fact, counsel's services harmed the estate and the debtor." (A.E.R., G, p. 108.) The court concluded that the "reasonable amount of compensation for counsel's services in this case is zero." Id.

The bankruptcy court also found that Mr. Loccrichio's fee application did not comply with Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016, providing an independent ground for denying fees.[3] Id.

[3] On June 9, 2010, Mr. Loccrichio filed a notice with the bankruptcy court that JSH had terminated his services, effective June 4, 2010. (A.E.R., H, pp. 112-113.)

The order denying fees was entered on June 29, 2010. (A.E.R., I, pp. 115-116.)

Mr. Loccrichio filed a notice of appeal of the denial of fees on July 27, 2010 – 28 days after the bankruptcy court's order had been entered.

V.

STANDARD OF REVIEW: DISMISSAL OF CHAPTER 11 CASE

This Court reviews a bankruptcy court's decision to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 case under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b) for abuse of discretion. Marsch v. Marsch (In re Marsch), 36 F.3rd 825,828 (9th Cir. 1994). A bankruptcy court's conclusions of law are reviewed de novo and its findings of fact are reviewed for clear error. Price v. United States Trustee (In re Price), 353 F.3d 1135, 1138 (9th Cir. 2004).

VI.

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S FINDING OF CAUSE TO DISMISS WAS NOT AN ABUSE OF DISCRETION

Section 1112(b)(1) provides that a bankruptcy court "shall" convert or dismiss a case, whichever is in the best interests of creditors and the estate, if "cause" is established. Although Section 1112(b)(4) provides a list of findings that may constitute cause, that list is nonexclusive. See 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(4) ("[f]or the purposes of this subsection, the term 'cause' includes...") (emphasis added). As a result, Congress granted the bankruptcy courts great discretion to convert or dismiss a chapter 11 case for "cause" under Section 1112(b). In re Consol. Pioneer Mortgage Entities, 264 F.3d 803,806 (9th Cir. 2001); In re Marsch, 36 F.3d at 828. This Court should only reverse a bankruptcy court's dismissal for cause if it is "based on an erroneous conclusion of law or when the record contains no evidence on which [the bankruptcy court] rationally could have based that decision." Consol. Pioneer Mortgage Entities, 264 F.3d at 806-807 (citations omitted).

A. Cause to dismiss Debtor's chapter 11 bankruptcy case existed under 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(4)(A) where evidence before the bankruptcy court supports a finding of a continuing loss to or diminution of Debtor's estate

Under Section 1112(b)(4)(A), "substantial or continuing loss to or diminution of the estate and the absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation" constitutes cause to dismiss a chapter 11 case. The bankruptcy court did not clearly err when it found that "because the leases were deemed rejected, the estate has been substantially diminished, and there is no longer any prospect of a successful reorganization." (A.E.R., G, p. 104.) As set forth previously, it is undisputed that the Aiea, Hawaii lease was rejected by operation of law under 11 U.S.C. §364(d)(4). This was the primary asset of Debtor's estate. (A.E.R., A, p. 3; G, p. 103.) The bankruptcy court issued a final order confirming the rejection, and no appeal was taken by Debtor. (A.E.R., B, pp. 39-41; II R, pp. 284-290.) Without the lease, JSH could not generate potential rental income or pursue its alleged condemnation claim against the City of Honolulu.

In response to the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, JSH filed a pleading which took no position and did not otherwise dispute the merits of the motion. JSH specifically stated in its pleading that it "does not intend to oppose Trustee's form of the Motion to Dismiss, it should be clear that the Motion to Dismiss will be approved." (A.E.R., F, p. 100.) Debtor's only interest was preserving its appeal rights concerning the bankruptcy court's order denying Debtor's motion to recuse Bankruptcy Judge Robert J. Faris entered on May 5, 2010. (A.E.R., F, p. 98.) Because JSH did not raise any objection before the bankruptcy court, it has waived the issue on appeal. AlohaCare v. State of Hawaii, 572 F.3d 740, 744 (9th Cir. 2009) citing In re America West Airlines, Inc., 217 F.3d 1161, 1165 (9th Cir. 2000) (Absent exceptional circumstances, we generally will not consider arguments raised for the first time on appeal, although we have discretion to do so). This discretion may be exercised to "(1) prevent a miscarriage of justice; (2) when a change in the law raises a new issue while an appeal is pending; and (3) when the issue is purely one of law." In re AlohaCare, 572 F.3d at 744-745. (citations omitted). Since JSH did not oppose or otherwise refute any of the factual allegations raised in the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, it cannot now raise them before this Court; they have been waived. In re AlohaCare, 572 F.3d at 744-745.

Furthermore, Debtor's opening brief does not address the bankruptcy court's finding of cause and whether or not there was an abuse of discretion. Debtor seems to be focused on actions taken by Continental and subsequent rulings by the bankruptcy court after the case was dismissed. No argument has been made concerning this appeal to support reversal of the bankruptcy court's decision to dismiss the Debtor's chapter 11 case. The debtor cannot do so in its reply brief, as the issue is waived. In re AlohaCare, 572 F.3d at 744-745.

The United States Trustee has met her burden that Debtor's case should be dismissed. Under Sections 1112(b)(1) and (2), if the movant establishes cause, then the burden shifts to the debtor to prove the existence of "unusual circumstances" such that dismissal would be detrimental to the creditors and the estates. In re Prods. Int'l Co., 395 B.R. 101,109 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2008) (relying on 7 Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶1112.04[3], p. 1112-26, 1112-27 (15th ed. rev.))

In this case, Debtor is not eligible to attempt to make a Section 1112(b)(1) and (2) showing of unusual circumstances. These Code provisions require that a debtor show that " the grounds for granting such relief [denial of dismissal due to unusual circumstances] include an act or omission of the debtor other than under paragraph (4)(A). 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(2)(B) (emphasis added). The plain language of Section 1112(b) precludes overriding the establishment of cause to dismiss if that cause is diminution of the estate and unlikelihood of rehabilitation–the precise grounds for dismissing this case. Here, the bankruptcy court based its decision to dismiss on Section 1112(b)(4)(A). Therefore, Section 1112(b)(2)(B) prevents Debtor from raising an unusual circumstance defense to block dismissal.

Even if Debtor were eligible to make such an argument, it would fail. Debtor's brief does not address this provision of the statute that explains what a debtor must do to prevent dismissal even after a party in interest has established cause or lack of unusual circumstances. Debtor did not demonstrate that there was a reasonable likelihood that a plan would be confirmed within the time frames established by Sections 1121(e) and 1129(e) of the Code, or if these sections do not apply, a plan would be confirmed within a reasonable period of time. 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(2)(A).

Second, Debtor did not show that its acts or omissions that caused the grounds for dismissal are justifiable. 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(2)(B)(i).

Third, Debtor did not prove that it could cure the grounds that would justify dismissal. 11 U.S.C. §1112(b)(2)(B)(ii). Debtor has shown none of the foregoing, and did not oppose the request of the United States Trustee to dismiss the chapter 11 case.

As the bankruptcy court's findings of fact were based on the record, and Debtor did not oppose the relief requested, the bankruptcy court's decision to dismiss the Debtor's case was not an abuse of discretion and should be affirmed.

VII.

STANDARD OF REVIEW: DENIAL OF FEE APPLICATION

The question whether the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to award no fees to counsel is a question of law that is reviewed de novo; any actual findings are reviewed for clear error. In re Ferrell, 539 F.3d 1186, 1189 (9th Cir. 2008). This Court reviews the bankruptcy court's determination of the proper amount of attorney's fees for an abuse of discretion. In re Mednet, 251 B.R. 103, 106 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2000). A court abuses its discretion when the record contains no evidence to support its decision. MGIC Indemnity Corp. v. Moore, 952 F.2d 1120, 1122 (9th Cir. 1991). Findings are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013.

VIII.

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN DENYING ALL FEES TO COUNSEL BECAUSE IT COULD NOT FIND THAT THERE WAS ANY VALUE TO THE SERVICES WHICH PROVIDED A BENEFIT TO THE ESTATE

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion under 11 U.S.C. §330 when it did not award any fees to counsel in connection with the services he provided to the Debtor during the chapter 11 proceeding. Counsel bears the burden of proof to demonstrate entitlement to the requested fee, including providing documentation of time worked. Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. 424, 437 (1983). Therefore, a bankruptcy court is required to examine the nature, extent, and value of the services provided. 11 U.S.C. §330(a)(1)(A) and 11 U.S.C. §330(a)(3). Further, a bankruptcy court is prohibited from compensating an attorney for any services that were not reasonably likely to benefit the estate or were unnecessary for the administration of the case. 11 U.S.C. §330(a)(4)(A)(ii). In reviewing compensation requests, the bankruptcy court reviews what services the professional provided, and decides, in retrospect, after considering all of the salient factors, whether the fees requested are reasonable. In re Garcia, 335 B.R. 717, 723-725 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2005) (the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that counsel's services were not beneficial to the estate).

In this case, the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in finding that the value of counsel's services did not provided a benefit at the time at which the service was rendered towards the completion of the case. 11 U.S.C. §330(a)(3)(C).

There is no dispute that counsel failed to timely assume the Aiea, Hawaii lease or, at the very least, file a motion to extend the time for doing so. The lease and related sub-leases provided Debtor with its only potential source of monthly revenue. (A.E.R., A, pp. 4-5.) Debtor's leasehold interest also was a potential basis for a claim against the City of Honolulu in connection with its anticipated exercise of eminent domain. (A.E.R., A, p. 3; 5 and K, pp. 130-131.) With the lease rejected under 11 U.S.C. §365(d)(4), JSH lost its income stream and condemnation claim. These facts led the bankruptcy court to conclude, without clear error, that "it would be an understatement to say that counsel's services were not beneficial to the estate; in fact, counsel's services harmed the estate and the debtor." (A.E.R., G, pp. 107-108.) The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in deciding that the "reasonable amount of compensation for counsel's services in this case is zero." (A.E.R., G, p. 108.)

Second, the bankruptcy court found that counsel's billing records were inadequate to allow the bankruptcy court to make the findings necessary to compensate him from the bankruptcy estate pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016 and LBR 2016-1. The United State Trustee objected on these same grounds and requested that counsel amend his application to comport with the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code and Rules. Despite the fact that nearly three months lapsed between the time of the United States Trustee's objection and the hearing on the fee application, counsel failed to amend or request additional time to submit an amended fee application. Instead, counsel did nothing.

Mr. Loccrichio's opening brief describes the events at the May 24, 2010 hearing as an "ambush" and seeks permission from this Court to amend his fee application. Br. at 17. This characterization is simply not supported by the record because (1) the Tentative Decision on Motions Set for May 24, 2010 ("Tentative Decision") made it clear that the bankruptcy court's inclination to deny the fee application as moot due to granting the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss was subject to further oral argument (E.R., 9, pp. 48-49); (2) prior to the May 24, 2010 hearing, Continental filed and served on Mr. Loccrichio a response to the Tentative Decision which requested that the pending fee application be adjudicated (E.R., 10, pp. 53, 55, and 56.); (3) at the May 24, 2010 hearing, Mr. Loccichio made oral argument to the bankruptcy court as to why his fee application should not be adjudicated (A.E.R., II S, pp. 302-303.); (4) the bankruptcy court at the May 24, 2010 hearing allowed Mr. Locricchio the opportunity to file a supplemental statement regarding the adjudication of his fee application (A.E.R., II S, p. 303.) and (5) Mr. Loccrichio filed on May 25, 2010 an opposition to the bankruptcy court's Tentative Decision (A.E.R., II T, pp. 307-316.). In addition, the bankruptcy court found that counsel's failure to comply with Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016 and LBR 2016-1 was an independent ground to deny the application. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying counsel's fees for that reason.

The United States submits this brief under Fed. R. App. P. 29 as amicus curiae in support of affirmance of the bankruptcy court's order below.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This appeal involves a dispute over the interpretation of "projected disposable income" under 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b). This term determines when debtors meet their statutory obligation to dedicate their "projected disposable income" to paying creditors through their chapter 13 plans. By interpreting section 1325(b), this Court will determine the amount above-median-income chapter 13 debtors must pay their creditors in their chapter 13 plans. The United States has a direct interest in the proper construction of section 1325(b) because United States Trustees, who are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General, supervise the administration of chapter 13 cases and trustees, monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such plans in connection with plan confirmation hearings under section 1324 of the Bankruptcy Code. See 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(C). See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977), as reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6049 (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena.").

Given this interest, the United States submits this brief to share its views on the application of section 1325(b). See 28 U.S.C. § 517 (authorizing the Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States"). See also 11 U.S.C. § 307 ("The United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding.").

STATUTORY BACKGROUND

On April 20, 2005, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005. See Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005). The 2005 Act significantly altered how debtors obtain relief under chapters 7 and 13 of the Bankruptcy Code.

In a chapter 13 case, a debtor's unsecured creditors or trustee may insist the debtor devote all of his "projected disposable income" to pay creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1). Although "projected disposable income" is not defined, "disposable income" is defined as a net number: historical income less prescribed expenses. See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2).

Under the 2005 Act, above-median-income debtors, like the Johnsons, determine "disposable income" by first calculating gross historical income.[1] Next, they deduct permitted expenses, which include "amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2) and (3). Above-median-income chapter 13 debtors determine "amounts reasonably necessary to be expended . . . in accordance with" sections 707(b)(2)(A)(ii), (iii), and (iv) of the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(3) (incorporating those provisions). Deducting all allowed expenses from a debtor's gross historical income yields a net number – “disposable income.” Under current bankruptcy rules, debtors must file Official Form 22C setting forth their gross historical income and expenses in calculating “disposable income.”

[1] The term "current monthly income," which is used to calculate gross historical income, see 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2), is a defined term. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A)(defining "current monthly income" as the debtor's average monthly income for the six-month period preceding the month of the filing of the debtor's petition). "Current monthly income" has been broadly construed. See Blausey v. U.S. Trustee, 552 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2009).

Because a debtor must also file the traditional Schedules I and J setting forth their actual income and expenses, it often becomes apparent that there is a significant difference between an above-median debtor's uncommitted income under Schedules I and J and his historical “disposable income” under Form 22C. In some cases, like the Johnsons’, the use of Form 22C captures a temporary increase in a debtor’s “disposable income” that does not continue into the plan period, while in other cases the use of Form 22C results in a lower amount of “disposable income.” In these and other cases, it may become clear that the historical circumstances that produced a particular “disposable income” figure will change prospectively.

The merits of this appeal present the question whether the bankruptcy court correctly defined the word “projected” in section 1325(b)(1) in reaching its conclusion that the Johnsons’ plan committed all of their “projected disposable income” to making payments under their plan.

The 2005 Act amendments to section 1325 have created important interpretive questions about the proper way to understand “projected disposable income.” As the case law reflects, there are different ways that courts have interpreted and applied that statutory language in light of the amendments. The interpretation offered here by the trustee should be rejected, because it fails to take into account all of the language in the statute and yields inequitable results.

The trustee interprets the term “projected disposable income” to require use of a debtor’s historical “disposable income” figure throughout the chapter 13 plan period, regardless of the debtor’s actual income and expenses during that period. In this case, the Johnsons’ historical “disposable income” was artificially high because their gross historical income included $3,906.75 in monthly workers compensation payments received during the six-month period preceding the filing of their bankruptcy petition, but which ceased before their petition was filed. See Trustee’s Designation of Record No. 2 (Original Chapter 13 Statement of Current Monthly Income filed 5/12/08). The trustee’s interpretation does not account for the usual meaning of “projected” income or for the statutory phrases “to be received” and “will be applied to make payments” in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Mechanically extending into the future a gross historical income calculation, which may bear no relationship to actual income that the debtor will receive in the future, would either attribute to the debtor future income that does not exist (as in the case of the Johnsons), or, when the debtor has a financial change for the better after filing the petition, permit the debtor to avoid using income that does exist to repay creditors.

Like the bankruptcy court below, the Eighth and Tenth circuits, as well as most intermediate appellate courts, have rejected the construction of “projected disposable income” that the trustee advances here. And, while the Ninth Circuit’s decision in Kagenveama adopts the interpretation urged by the trustee, it should not be followed because it fails to take into account statutory language, and has led to inequitable results.

As the bankruptcy court below concluded, the proper meaning of the statutory phrase "projected disposable income" requires that the historical "disposable income" figure found on Form 22C be subject to adjustment to account for any increases or decreases in a debtor's income that are likely in a particular case. Such adjustments may be necessary in individual cases to ensure that the income attributed to a debtor in his chapter 13 plan is actually income that is "projected" and "to be received" and that "will be applied to make payments" to unsecured creditors. While a simple multiplication of the historical "disposable income" number by the relevant number of months is a presumptive starting point, the proper interpretation allows adjustments to be made in appropriate cases. This interpretation is also consistent with this Court's ruling in Ross-Tousey, and with the overall goals of chapter 13.

ARGUMENT

I. The Debtor's Historical "Disposable Income" Is The Starting Point In Determining "Projected Disposable Income" Under Section 1325, But Courts May Take Into Account Changes In The Debtor's Financial Condition If Necessary To Reflect The Debtor's Ability To Fund A Repayment Plan.

The 2005 Act amendments to section 1325 created a significant change in the law. Before these amendments were enacted, section 1325(b)(1) provided that if the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objected to the confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, the court was not permitted to approve the plan unless it provided that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the three-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments under the plan." 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1)(B) (pre 2005 Act). The term "disposable income" was defined as income received by the debtor that was "not reasonably necessary to be expended" for "maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent" or for necessary business expenses if the debtor was engaged in a business. 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2)(A) (pre 2005 Act). Under the former statute, a debtor's "projected disposable income" was calculated simply by subtracting the debtor's expenses on Schedule J from the debtor's income on Schedule I, two forms that a chapter 13 debtor was (and still is) required to file.

In contrast, under the 2005 Act section 1325(b)(1) now provides that:

> If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan –
>
> (B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1). Further, "disposable income" is now defined expressly to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor . . . less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses.[2] 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2).

[2] As previously noted, "current monthly income" means the debtor's average monthly income for the six-month period preceding the month of the filing of the debtor's petition. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(10A).

A. The Courts Have Offered Two Different Interpretations Of Section 1325.

1. The minority position taken in a number of bankruptcy court decisions, and the position advocated by the trustee here, is that section 1325 requires "projected disposable income" to be computed by taking the historical "disposable income" figure, as defined in section 1325(b)(2), and simply multiplying it by the number of months in the debtor's chapter 13 plan.[3] See Trustee's Brief, at 7-14. The Ninth Circuit is the only court of appeals to have adopted this interpretation. See Maney v. Kagenveama (In re Kagenveama), 541 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2008).

The underlying rationale for this position is that "disposable income" was defined for the first time in the 2005 amendments to the Bankruptcy Code, and is used nowhere other than in the phrase "projected disposable income" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Thus, the argument goes, "projected disposable income," while still undefined in the Bankruptcy Code, must mean nothing more than historical "disposable income" that is projected out through the plan period (i.e., the sum of a debtor's historical "disposable income" calculation multiplied by the number of months in her plan). See Kagenveama, 541 F.3d at 874 ("To get from the statutorily defined 'disposable income' to 'projected disposable income,' 'one simply takes the calculation . . . and does the math.'") (quoting In re Alexander, 344 B.R. 742, 749 (Bankr. E.D. N.C. 2006)); Mancl v. Chatterton (In re Mancl), 381 B.R. 537, 540-41 (W.D. Wis. 2008).

[3] This position has been labeled as the "conclusive approach" by the bankruptcy court below. See In re Johnson, 400 B.R. 639, 646 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2009).

2. Most courts read “projected disposable income” as allowing courts to reflect reality by using credible evidence of changes in income and expenses that are likely over the life of a debtor’s chapter 13 plan. See, e.g., Hamilton v. Lanning (In re Lanning), 545 F.3d 1269, 1278-82 (10th Cir. 2008), pet. for cert. filed No. 08-998 (Feb. 3, 2009); Coop v. Frederickson (In re Frederickson), 545 F.3d 652, 659-60 (8th Cir. 2008), pet. for cert. denied No. 08-950 (Mar. 23, 2009); Hildebrand v. Thomas (In re Thomas), 395 B.R. 914, 923 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2008); Hildebrand v. Petro (In re Petro), 395 B.R. 369, 377-78 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2008); Pak v. eCast Settlement Corp. (In re Pak), 378 B.R. 257, 262 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007), abrogated by Kagenveama, 541 F.3d at 868; Kibbe v. Sumski (In re Kibbe), 361 B.R. 302, 314-15 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007) (per curium); In re Johnson, 400 B.R. at 649-51.

And, while the bankruptcy court below further divided this camp into what it labeled the “presumptive” and “harmonizing” approaches, see Johnson, 400 B.R. at 648-49, that is a distinction without a difference. Under the “presumptive” approach, a debtor’s historical “disposable income” figure found on Form 22C is the starting point for calculating “projected disposable income,” and that figure is applied absent a party introducing evidence that changes in that figure are likely to occur over the life of a debtor’s chapter 13 plan. See, e.g., Lanning, 545 F.3d at1278-82; Frederickson, 545 F.3d at 659-60. Under the “harmonizing” approach advocated by the bankruptcy court below, a debtor’s historical “disposable income” figure found on Form 22C is not entitled to any presumptive weight, but a debtor is required to “supplement” his Form 22C with a “statement of any changes in the ‘current monthly income’ as reported in the form, and any changes in the expenses allowed, anticipated to take place during the applicable commitment period.” Johnson, 400 B.R. at 651. Thus, under both approaches, the courts allow for the consideration of credible evidence of changed circumstances to the extent such circumstances exist, and the end result is the same.

If anything, the sole difference between the “presumptive” approach and the “harmonizing” approach is the fact that the “presumptive” approach affords the historical “disposable income” figure found on Form 22C some presumptive weight unless a party introduces evidence of changes to income or expenses. However, even this difference is not the great divide the bankruptcy court makes it out to be. This is so because notwithstanding that nothing in section 1325(b) expressly creates a presumption of correctness in Form 22C’s historical “disposable income” figure, see Johnson, 400 B.R. at 648, the burden of proof on an objection under section 1325(b) remains a shifting one. See Education Assistance Corp. V. Zellner (In re Zellner), 827 F.2d 1222, 1226 (8th Cir. 1987) (party objecting under section 1325(b) has “initial burden of producing satisfactory evidence to support the contention that the debtor is not applying all of his disposable income”) (emphasis added); Itule v. Heath (In re Heath), 182 B.R. 557, 560-61 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1995) (citing Zellner for same); In re McNichols, 349 B.R. 160, 168 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2000) (describing burden shifting objection process under section 1325(b)); In re Barnes, 378 B.R. 774, 777 (Bankr. D.S.C. 2007) (same); In re Ehret, 238 B.R. 85, 87 (Bankr. D. N.J. 1999) (same); In re Fries, 68 B.R. 676, 685 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1986) (same).

While an objecting trustee or unsecured creditor is initially required to produce satisfactory evidence that a debtor is not devoting his "projected disposable income" to his chapter 13 plan, once that burden is met, the burden shifts to the debtor to demonstrate, by a preponderance of the evidence, compliance with section 1325(b). See McNichols, 349 B.R. at 168; Barnes, 378 B.R. at 777; Ehret, 238 B.R. at 87; Fries, 68 B.R. at 685. The "presumptive" approach merely articulates this long established practice by first considering a debtor's Form 22C, and then, where appropriate, shifting the burden to allow for the consideration of credible evidence of changed circumstances.[4]

B. Both The Trustee's Approach To Section 1325(b) And The Ninth Circuit's Decision In Kagenveama Are Flawed.

The trustee in this case argues "projected" does not allow proof that a debtor's income or expenses have or will change. She contends that section 1325 requires only a "mechanical application" of Form 22C for determining what must be paid to unsecured creditors. Trustee Brief, at 7. She recognizes that the Code fails to define "projected disposable income," Trustee Brief, at 9, but argues that it is no more than a multiple of historical "disposable income." Trustee Brief, at 7-8.

The Ninth Circuit adopted this approach in Kagenveama, 541 F.3d at 868, but this mechanical approach to section 1325 is flawed. To begin with, the Ninth Circuit's construction fails to consider the term "projected" in its proper context.

[4] This Court has previously observed, in the context of post-confirmation plan modification, that "no particularly burdensome proof is required . . . to show 'changed circumstances.'" In re Witkowski, 16 F.3d 739, 743 (7th Cir. 1994) (quoting In re Moseley, 74 B.R. 791, 799 n.13 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1987)).

See Hibbs v. Winn, 542 U.S. 88, 101 (2004) (statutory words must be construed in context). The use of the term "projected" in the economic and financial context of this statute suggests a forecast or estimate of an expected future financial reality. See The Random House Dict. of the English Lang. 1546 (2d ed. 1987) (defining to "project" as, inter alia, "to set forth or calculate (some future thing); They projected the building costs for the next five years."); Webster's Third New Int'l Dict. 1813 (1993) (defining "projected" as, inter alia, "planned for future execution: contrived, proposed," as "[projected] outlays for new plant and equipment"). While the calculation of "projected" financial data may well begin with historical data, it does not necessarily (or even usually) end there, nor does it entail a rigid and inviolable assumption, made by the trustee, that "projected" income will be identical with past income even when the available facts demonstrate otherwise. The trustee's and the Ninth Circuit's test ignores this context of the statutory language.

Even more important, while both the trustee, Trustee Brief, at 7-14, and the Ninth Circuit, Kagenveama, 541 F.3d at 873, assert that they are merely applying the plain meaning of section 1325(b)(1)(B), their interpretation fails to take into account other language in the same statutory provision.

First, although section 1325(b)(1)(B) explicitly refers to the income "to be received by the debtor" (emphasis added), the Ninth Circuit's test fails to address cases in which the historical income required to be used may have no relationship to the actual income "to be received," something that has led to unjust results within the Ninth Circuit post-Kagenveama. For example, in Featherstone, the district court affirmed a bankruptcy court's order denying confirmation of the debtors' plan where the debtors sought to exclude income received from a one-time sale of livestock from their "projected disposable income" calculation. See In re Featherstone, No. 08-00016, 2008 WL 5217936 (D. Mont. Dec. 11, 2008). Similarly, in Stansell, the bankruptcy court required non-recurring income received from the debtor's deceased spouse to be included in the debtor's calculation of "current monthly income" notwithstanding that the deceased spouse's income would not be available during the term of the debtor's plan. See In re Stansell, 395 B.R. 457 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2008).

Under the Ninth Circuit's test, the projection (i.e., multiplication) of a debtor's artificially high pre-petition income over the plan period results in fictitious "deemed" income that will never be "received by the debtor" within the meaning of section 1325(b)(1)(B). Neither the trustee in this case, nor the Ninth Circuit in Kagenveama, make any effort to address this language in the same statutory provision despite their purported reliance on "plain meaning" and the fact that section 1325(a)(6) of the Bankruptcy Code requires that a court only confirm a repayment plan if "the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan. . . ." Cf. Kagenveama, 541 F.3d at 878 (Bea, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (because the statute speaks of income "to be received," "even if a debtor's projected disposable income is zero at the time he seeks plan confirmation, he must commit to pay such disposable income as he receives it – should he receive it – during the applicable commitment period").

Second, the Ninth Circuit's test fails to take into account another statutory phrase in section 1325(b)(1)(B) as well: "will be applied to make payments." For reasons similar to those we discussed in connection with the "to be received" requirement, fictitious income cannot "be applied to make payments." Both the trustee here and the Ninth Circuit base their understanding of "projected disposable income" strictly on the historical "current monthly income" figure, minus expenses. In cases like Stansell and Featherstone, projecting forward this deemed or hypothetical income does not permit it to be applied to make payments, for the simple reason that it does not exist. Under the Ninth Circuit's test, either the debtor is charged with income that does not exist and cannot be "applied to make payments" under the plan, or the plan must be rejected, in which case the debtor is denied recourse under chapter 13. Neither the trustee here nor the Ninth Circuit even attempts to explain the phrase "be applied to make payments" in the same statutory provision.[5] It is no answer to say that the chapter 13 plan may be amended under section 1329 to take into account changed financial circumstances. See Kagenveama, 541 F.3d at 875, 77. In cases like Stansell and Featherstone, the Ninth Circuit's test would likely preclude confirmation of any chapter 13 plan in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(a)(6) (court shall confirm a plan only if "the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan").

[5] The trustee fails to address this specific language at all. For its part, the Ninth Circuit mentions the phrase in passing when it holds that there is no applicable commitment period when there is no "projected disposable income" to pay out during it. See Kagenveama, 541 F.3d at 876 ("When read together, only 'projected disposable income' has to be paid out over the 'applicable commitment period.' When there is no 'projected disposable income,' there is no 'applicable commitment period.'").

Any interpretation of section 1325(b)(1)(B) must take into account all of the language in the provision. If the interpretation cannot account for two phrases in the statute, which create serious interpretive issues in specific fact situations, the interpretation must be incorrect. It is well established that courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect." Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (citing United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1992)). The trustee's and Ninth Circuit's interpretation would require the Court to ignore this statutory maxim.

C. To Give Content To All Parts Of The Statute, Section 1325 Must Be Read To Require That The Historical Figure Be Used As A Starting Point, Subject To Adjustment Based On Changes In The Debtor's Financial Condition.

The correct interpretation of section 1325 uses historical "disposable income" as the starting point for determining "projected disposable income," but also takes into account changes in a debtor's income or expenses that affect the debtor's ability to fund a plan.

1. In our view, the assessment of "projected disposable income" in the current version of the statute must, as a general matter, be based on the newly defined "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2), which in turn is based on an historical calculation of "current monthly income," computed as the average income received during the six month period before the bankruptcy petition is filed. But there are circumstances in which a debtor's financial condition is projected to change from that pre-petition period and, in such circumstances, it will not be appropriate to use the historical calculation. See, e.g., Lanning, 545 F.3d at 1269; Frederickson, 545 F.3d at 652.

Our interpretation not only is faithful to the new definition of "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2) as an historical number but also treats "projected disposable income" as a future-oriented concept, as required by the language of section 1325(b)(1). See Pak, 378 B.R. at 264-65; Kibbe, 361 B.R. at 307-08. This interpretation requires the use of the historical income figure called for in the definition of "disposable income" as a starting point, and it calls for a presumption that the historical figure should be carried forward throughout the term of the plan, absent evidence to the contrary. But in order to take into account the future-orientation of the remaining language of the statute, and to ensure that "projected disposable income" is, in fact, a projection, it allows that presumption to be rebutted whenever the debtor is likely to experience (or actually has experienced) either an increase or decrease in net income after the filing of the chapter 13 plan.[6]

The reason for having a starting presumption that the historical "disposable income" figure should be applied mathematically to derive the "projected disposable income" is that, while "projected disposable income" is certainly not the same as "disposable income," it is appropriate in construing the former phrase to give effect

[6] As previously noted, this presumptive affect conforms with the burden shifting standard of proof required under section 1325(b). See United States Brief supra at 9-10 (citing Zellner, 827 F.2d at 1226; Heath, 182 B.R. at 560-61; McNichols, 349 B.R. at 168; Barnes, 378 B.R. at 777; Ehret, 238 B.R. at 87; Fries, 68 B.R. at 685).

to the definition of the latter. Section 1325(b)(2) provides a definition "[f]or purposes of this subsection." 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2). The only time that "disposable income" is used in "this subsection," section 1325(b), other than in the definition itself, is in the term "projected disposable income." Thus, we accept that a court should begin by applying the historical "disposable income" figure as a starting point, and by presumptively carrying that figure forward over the plan period.[7]

At the same time, however, this initial presumption that the historical "disposable income" will be used must necessarily be rebuttable. "[P]arties contending that a debtor's Form B22C disposable income figure does not accurately project the debtor's future ability to fund a plan must present documentation similar to that required by section 707(b)(2)(B)(ii) in support of their claim." In re Lanning, 380 B.R. 17, 25 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. 2007). See Pak, 378 B.R. at 267 ("It makes no sense to interpret 'projected disposable income,' governing debtors' future payments under their chapter 13 plans, as cast in stone by their pre-bankruptcy history, without any opportunity for the trustee, creditors or the debtor to offer rebutting evidence as to changed income circumstances before the effective date of the plan.").

[7] Congress may well have expected that the historical figure, computed generally with standard rather than actual expenses, would result in a higher "disposable-income" total for "above-median" debtors and a greater amount designated for repayment to creditors under the debtor's chapter 13 plan. But the fact that this is often not the case does not authorize a court to ignore Form 22C altogether in determining "projected disposable income" and base it instead on Schedules I and J in the ordinary case. Such decisions cannot find support in the statutory language. See, e.g., In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Riggs, 359 B.R. 649, 652-53 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2007).

Thus, contrary to the trustee's argument here, Trustee Brief, at 7, application of the historical "disposable income" figure to the plan period is not the end of the matter in all cases. There are situations in which a debtor has had, or is likely to have, changes in income after the period in which the historical "disposable income" is computed, and in order to give full effect to the statutory text those changes must be taken into account in "project[ing]" the debtor's future "disposable income." See, e.g., Stansell, 395 B.R. at 457; Featherstone, 2008 WL 5217936 at *1.

There are two types of cases that section 1325 must be able to address. First, a debtor may have either an increase in income at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition or a predictable increase later. For example, a debtor may be unemployed during the six-month period in which "current monthly income" is calculated but may accept a high-paying job at about the time he files his petition. See Pak, 358 B.R. 257 (debtor was unemployed for three years but found a job paying over $100,000 two months before filing his petition). Such a debtor would have an artificially low historical "disposable income" but might well be able to fund a chapter 13 plan that would repay most or all of his unsecured debt.

Second, conversely, a debtor may suffer a loss of income – for example, by losing a job – at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition, as in Lanning. See Lanning, 545 F.3d at 1269. Such a debtor would have a relatively high "current monthly income," based on an average of the six months preceding the month in which the petition was filed. Yet if that historical income were simply extended forward for purposes of the chapter 13 plan, it would not reflect the actual income available to the debtor during that future period. See, e.g., Lanning, 380 B.R. at 25 ("Where it is shown that Form B22C disposable income fails accurately to predict a debtor's actual ability to fund a plan, that figure may be subject to modification."). To put it in statutory terms, the future "disposable income" thus computed would not be the debtor's "projected" disposable income (because it would demonstrably not be based on a reliable estimate of future income), nor would it be the "disposable income" actually "received" by the debtor during the applicable commitment period. See 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(1)(B). Moreover, because the income amount determined by the Ninth Circuit's test is merely deemed or hypothetical and not actually received, the income could not be "applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." Id. In such a case, therefore, the court must take into account the loss of income in order to apply section 1325(b) faithfully.

2. Our interpretation is also consistent with this Court's ruling in Ross-Tousey. See Ross-Tousey v. Neary, 549 F.3d 1148 (7th Cir. 2008). In Ross-Tousey, this Court interpreted the means test as it applies to chapter 7 debtors under the Bankruptcy Code.[8] Id. (interpreting means test in connection with motion to dismiss for abuse under section 707(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code). Ross-Tousey ruled that chapter 7 cases are initially evaluated for dismissal under section 707(b)(2), which only evaluates a debtor's historical income and statutorily prescribed expense amounts. Id. at 1157-61. However, Ross-Tousey went on to find that: (a) merely passing section 707(b)(2)'s means test does not guarantee chapter 7 relief; (b) section 707(b)(3)(B) requires the dismissal of cases that pass the means test when the totality of a debtor's financial situation establishes abuse; and (c) abuse is evaluated based on a debtor's "actual income and expenses." Id. at 1161-62.

[8] Just as the means test applies to chapter 13 debtors by utilizing the defined term "current monthly income" and incorporating section 707(b)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code, see 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2) and (3), the means test also applies to chapter 7 debtors. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2).

Ross-Tousey's construction of section 707(b)(3)(B) supports the United States' reading of section 1325(b)(1)(B) in this case. Just as section 707(b)(3)(B) mandates the dismissal of a chapter 7 debtor's case based upon an evaluation of a debtor's actual income and expenses, and regardless of a contrary result under section 707(b)(2)'s means test, see Ross-Tousey, 549 F.3d at 1161-62; so too does section 1325(b)(1)(B) require that a chapter 13 debtor make plan payments based upon their actual income and expenses (as projected over the life of their plan), and regardless of section 1325(b)(3)'s incorporation of section 707(b)(2)'s means test. Indeed, the trustee's contrary reading would transform section 707(b)(2)'s means test – which is merely a stage-one "screening mechanism" in chapter 7, H.R. Rep. 109-31 at 1 (I) (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89 – into the final arbiter of chapter 13 plan payments.

3. Admittedly, the language of section 1325 is not a model of clarity. However, our interpretation gives effect to all of the statutory language far more faithfully than the test advocated by the trustee and adopted by the Ninth Circuit in Kagenveama. Almost as important, it better furthers the overall goal of chapter

Chapter 13 focuses on having debtors devote future income to paying their creditors. Indeed, the 2005 Act placed additional emphasis on this goal of paying future income to creditors when it added language to section 707(b) permitting a court, with the debtor's consent, to convert an abusive chapter 7 case to chapter 13, as an alternative to dismissal. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1). While the Ninth Circuit's test does require future income to be used to pay creditors, that future income is measured exclusively by reference to historical income, and in some cases, like this one, it bears little relation to the actual income available to the debtor. In contrast, our interpretation permits a court to consider the actual income that can "be applied to make payments" under the plan in those cases in which a different amount of actual income is available to a debtor because of changed circumstances. The use of actual income in such cases is an important measure of fairness, both to creditors in cases where the debtor's actual future income is greater than his historical income, and to debtors in cases like this one, Stansell, Featherstone, and Lanning, where a temporary pre-petition payment to the debtor is not reflective of the debtor's continuing income or ability to fund a chapter 13 plan.

4. In short, the Court should consider all of the language of section 1325(b)(1)(B) – "to be received," and "will be applied to make payments," as well as the phrase "projected disposable income." For the reasons we have given, the language of that section, read as a whole, does not support the Ninth Circuit's test, a test that is never subject to adjustment in light of changes in income or expenses after the filing of the petition.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States respectfully asks the Court to affirm the lower court's order.

INTRODUCTION

Under 28 U.S.C. § 158, this Court has jurisdiction to consider an appeal from a bankruptcy court only if the appeal is taken "in the time provided by Rule 8002 of the Bankruptcy Rules." 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2). Under Rule 8002(a), a notice of appeal must be filed within 14 days of the date of entry of the order appealed. Under subsection (b) of Rule 8002, however, if a party makes a timely motion to alter or amend under Rule 9023, the time to appeal runs from the date of the order disposing of the tolling motion. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b). A "motion to reconsider" filed within 14 days of the judgment is commonly construed as a motion under Fed. Bankr. P. 9023, which applies Fed. R. Civ. P. 59 to bankruptcy cases. See In re Hogan, 03-5338, 79 Fed. Appx. 846, 848, 2003 WL 22474621, 2 (6th Cir. Oct. 29, 2003) (concluding that"the bankruptcy court properly viewed [appellant's] motion [for reconsideration] as a motion to alter or amend judgment pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 59" and Fed. R. Bankr. 9023).

In this case, the order dismissing Ms. Johnson's case was entered on January 5, 2010. See Bankr. Dkt. 23. Thus, under Bankruptcy Rule 8002(a) and (b), Ms. Johnson needed to file a notice of appeal or motion to alter or amend no later than January 19, 2010. She did so. On January 15, 2010, she filed a motion to reconsider, which the bankruptcy court appropriately construed as a motion to alter or amend under Bankruptcy Rule 9023. See Bankr. Dkt. 25; see also Bankr. Dkt. 32 (construing motion for reconsideration as a Rule 9023 motion). The bankruptcy court's order denying Ms. Johnson's motion for reconsideration was entered on January 26, 2010. See Bankr. Dkt. 32. Entry of the order denying the motion for reconsideration started the 14-day appeal clock running. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b). Thus, to perfect her appeal from the order dismissing her case, Ms. Johnson needed to file a notice of appeal no later than February 9, 2010. She did not. [1]

Instead, Ms. Johnson filed a "renewed motion for reconsideration" on February 5, 2010. Bankr. Dkt. 39. The "renewed" motion raised the same grounds of alleged racial and religious discrimination as Ms. Johnson's original motion for reconsideration. Compare Bankr. Dkt. 39 with Bankr. Dkt. 25. The bankruptcy court denied the renewed motion for reconsideration in an order entered February 8, 2010, on the grounds that the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure do not recognize such a motion and because it was meritless. See Bankr. Dkt. 40. Nine days later, on February 17, 2010, Ms. Johnson filed a notice of appeal "from the final judgment entered in this action on January 5, 2010." Bankr. Dkt. 43. For the reasons set forth below, Ms. Johnson's February 17 notice of appeal was untimely to perfect an appeal from the January 5 final order.

ANALYSIS

Because Bankruptcy Rule 8002 "was tailored carefully after a corresponding rule, Rule 4(a)(4) of the Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure," courts in the Sixth Circuit are guided by cases construing Rule 4(a)(4) when faced with issues under Rule 8002. In re Bell & Beckwith, No. 86-4015, 831 F.2d 293 (Table), 1987 WL 44937, *1 (6th Cir. Oct. 5, 1987). In this circuit, there is no question under Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(4) that a second or "renewed" motion for reconsideration does not toll the time to appeal. See, e.g., Costello v. Lungaro, Nos. 92-3757, 92-3939, 977 F.2d 580 (Table), 1992 WL 245929, 1 (6th Cir. Sept. 29, 1992) ("A second, or successive motion to reconsider a prior ruling . . . does not, however, toll the time for filing a notice of appeal."). Moreover, the Third Circuit has squarely held under Bankruptcy Rule 8002 that a second or successive motion for reconsideration does not toll the time to appeal when, as here, the second motion raises no new grounds. See In re Taylor, 343 Fed. Appx. 753, 756, 2009 WL 2768985, 2 (3d Cir. 2009) ("if a district court denies a motion for reconsideration, and if the party who lost that motion files and loses a second motion for reconsideration, the [appeal] clock does not re-start if 'the factual and legal issues surrounding the [first] motion and the [second] motion are roughly similar....' ") (citing Turner v. Evers, 726 F.2d 112, 114 (3d Cir. 1984)).

---

[1] Ms. Johnson also failed to file a statement of issues on appeal and designation of record in accordance with Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002. These documents were due within 14 days after Ms. Johnson filed her Notice of Appeal, which was March 5, 2010.

In this case, Ms. Johnson's notice of appeal was untimely to appeal the final judgment. Although she did file an initial, timely Rule 9023 motion on January 15 (Bankr. Dkt. 25), her 14-day appeal clock began to run on January 26, 2010, the date of entry of the order denying reconsideration, (Bankr. Dkt. 32). Under the law recited above, her "renewed" motion for reconsideration — which raised no new grounds — did not toll the time to appeal. See Bankr. Dkt. 39. Thus, the time period for appealing the final judgment (Bankr. Dkt. 23) expired on February 9, 2010. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(b). Ms. Johnson's February 17, 2010 notice of appeal (Bankr. Dkt. 43) was therefore untimely to perfect an appeal from the January 5, 2010 final order. The time to appeal as set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) requires adherence to the time periods in Bankruptcy Rule 8002. When a time period for perfecting a timely notice of appeal is set forth in a statute, it is jurisdictional. See Bowles v. Russell, 551 U.S. 205, 213 (2007). Accordingly, because Ms. Johnson's notice of appeal was untimely, this Court lacks jurisdiction over the appeal.

CONCLUSION

For all of the foregoing reasons, this Court should dismiss this case for lack of jurisdiction.

STATEMENT REGARDING ORAL ARGUMENT

Appellee believes that oral argument will not materially aid the Court in deciding this case.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b) to hear the underlying case, a voluntary petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 701, et seq. In a judgment entered on August 6, 2010, the Bankruptcy Court denied Mr. Johnson a discharge, which is a final order. 28 U.S.C. § 158(d)(1). On August 16, 2010, Mr. Johnson filed a timely appeal with this Court. This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(1).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

(1) Did the Bankruptcy Court abuse its discretion in denying Appellant a bankruptcy discharge because he without justification "failed to keep or preserve any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, from which [his] financial condition or business transactions might be ascertained?" 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(3).

(2) Did the Bankruptcy Court abuse its discretion in denying Appellant a bankruptcy discharge because he failed to explain satisfactorily any loss of assets or deficiency of assets to meet the debtor's liabilities? 11 U.S.C. §727(a)(5).

(3) Did the Bankruptcy Court abuse its discretion in denying Appellant a bankruptcy discharge because he knowingly and fraudulently made a false oath or account in the case? 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(A).

STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

On appeal from a bankruptcy court, this Court applies the clearly erroneous standard of review to findings of fact, and reviews questions of law de novo. Stamper v. United States (In re Gardner), 360 F.3d 551, 557 (6th Cir. 2004). Contrary to Appellant's assertion in his brief, Br. at vii, the issues raised in the appeal solely involve the Bankruptcy Court's findings of fact. A finding of fact is clearly erroneous only when "the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Riverview Trenton

Ry v. DSC, Ltd. (In re DSC, Ltd.), 486 F.3d 940, 944 (6th Cir. 2007) (citations omitted).

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

Mr. Johnson's Business Entities

The Debtor in this case, Herbert Johnson, began advising people on investment strategies after graduating high school. Tr.[1] at 78. He would review their portfolios and financial statements, do additional research, and then "give them an opinion based upon that third party information." Tr. at 79. To prepare himself for this work, Mr. Johnson took financial courses from the American College, an on-line university, although he did not receive a degree. Tr. at 71; 2004 Exam[2] at 34-35. In addition, he attended various seminars on weekends. Tr. at 72. Mr.

The reference to "Dkt." refers to the docket of Adversary Proceeding No. 10-2010, the matter below.

[2] The reference to "2004 Exam" refers to the transcript of Mr. Johnson's examination on January 27, 2010 directed by an order of the Bankruptcy Court pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2004, and designated part of the record on appeal in Appellee's Designation of Record, Dkt. 47.

Johnson admitted he is not a registered investment adviser. Tr. at 73. Nor is he licensed by the Securities and Exchange Commission or state regulators in Ohio or Kentucky. Tr. at 72.

Mr. Johnson first worked on his own and then went into business as Thompson, Spratley, and Johnson, Inc. in Cincinnati, Ohio. Tr. at 23. After the corporation disbanded, Mr. Johnson formed Jabez Advisory Group in 2000, also in Cincinnati, which grew to 140 clients. Tr. at 23-24. At Jabez he "made recommendations on the existing portfolios they [the clients] had." Tr. at 24.

Although Mr. Johnson was not a registered investment adviser, two different versions of the Thompson, Spratley, Inc. letterhead identified Mr. Johnson as "Herb Johnson, RIA." Tr. at 26-27; UST 10-13. Mr. Johnson stated at trial that he was "sure" that RIA "could" mean Registered Investment Advisor. Tr. at 25. He, however, did not know how the term RIA was placed after his name, testifying that it was a "misprint" or "typo." Tr. at 27. The Bankruptcy Court, however, did not find Mr. Johnson's testimony on the "typo" credible. Tr. at 227.

From 2005 to 2008, Mr. Johnson engaged in extensive stock trading on his own account. In the four calendar years preceding Mr. Johnson's 2009 bankruptcy filing, he sold $76,445,941 in stock. See UST 29-32.

Mr. Johnson's "Private Annuity" with Martha J. Martin

In the mid-1980s, Mr. Johnson met Martha J. Martin and they became friends. 2004 Exam at 42. At that time Ms. Martin was a widow in her mid-sixties. See Tr. at 179-80. Mr. Johnson described her as a "very generous and nice woman." Id. According to Mr. Johnson, Ms. Martin "offered to help him" by giving him "a lump sum of money." Id. Mr. Johnson described the arrangement as a "Private Annuity." Id. at 43. On or about November 21, 1994, Mr. Johnson and Ms. Martin executed this "Private Annuity," UST 8, in which Mr. Johnson promised to pay Ms. Martin, or her daughter Nancy Frakes upon Ms. Martin's death, the amount of $2,200 monthly for 20 years beginning December 1, 1994. JS 1.

In exchange, Mr. Johnson received a check for $280,000 from Ms. Martin, which was deposited in Mr. Johnson's personal investment account. Although the record is not entirely clear, it appears Mr.

Johnson used his money to invest in real estate. UST 35; 2004 Exam at 45-50.

Mr. Johnson paid Ms. Martin $2,200 per month until she passed away in 2003. At that point, he began paying her daughter – Nancy Frakes – approximately $1,500 per month, based on his calculation of what tax-exempt bonds would have paid for the nine years he paid Ms. Martin the $2,200. 2004 Exam at 52-53. Mr. Johnson admitted that his agreement with Ms. Martin did not provide for adjusting the pay-out after her death. Id. at 53. Eventually Mr. Johnson stopped paying Ms. Frakes entirely. Tr. at 113, 146. He testified to the United States Trustee that "It [the annuity] was [$]280,000; I paid back [$]415,[000]. That's why I don't see why I'm [sic] keep getting grilled. I don't see what Mrs. Frakes['s] complaint is. I don't see what Mr. Dickman's [attorney for Ms. Frakes] complaint is or yours." 2004 Exam at 55.

Mr. Johnson's Residence

Mr. Johnson purchased his current residence at 8166 North Dilcrest Circle, Florence, Kentucky in 2004. JS 2. He transferred this property to Mary L. Cahill by Deed dated October 20, 2006, UST 4; JS 3. Mr.

Johnson married Ms. Cahill on March 30, 2007, JS 5, and they continue to live there. JS 4. Mr. Johnson also purchased land in the Dilcrest subdivision; he sold Lots 136 and 136A on November 7, 2008. UST 5.

At the meeting of Creditors held on September 3, 2009, Mr. Johnson engaged in the following testimony with the examining trustee, Mr. Kendrick:

Q. All right, sir. Do you own just the one parcel of real estate?

A. My wife and I own it, yeah.

Q. And you have one mortgage on the property?

A. There's two.

Q. All right. The petition says no real estate.

A. Well, it's in my wife's name.

MR. MASSEY [Mr. Johnson's lawyer]: It's not in his name at all.

Q. Okay. When did you transfer it to her or has it always been in her name?

A. It's always – it's always been in her name.

UST 3 at 6 (emphasis added). Mr. Johnson repeated this testimony later in the examination. Id. at 28.

When called upon to give testimony about the ownership of his residence at the 2004 Exam, Mr. Johnson gave different testimony:

Q. The address you gave me earlier, the Dillcrest [sic], do you own that house?

A. My wife and I do, yes.

Q. You both own it?

A. Actually, it's in her name.

Q. Okay. When did she buy the house?

A. I want to say 2007.

Q. Who did she buy it from?

A. Me.

2004 Exam at 4 (emphasis added).

Activities of Park Holding Company

Mr. Johnson formed Park Holding Company, LLC ("Park Holding") in 2000. JS 6. Park Holding owned and leased out multi-family properties. JS 7. Mr. Johnson was the sole member from 2006 until January 1, 2008. JS 6. On or about January 1, 2008, Mr. Johnson transferred a 50% interest in Park Holding to Gerald Barron in exchange for $100,000. JS 8. Mr. Barron testified that the agreement he signed stated he was paying Mr. Johnson a $100,000 purchase price. Tr. at 9-10; UST 17. But the copy of the agreement that Mr. Johnson provided the United States Trustee showed a $10,000 purchase price. Tr. at 52, 56; UST 18.

Mr. Johnson testified that he sent the agreement to Mr. Barron with two separate front pages but did not explain the reason to Mr. Barron. Tr. at 54-55; UST 16. Mr. Barron testified that did not recall ever seeing a second front page with the $10,000 amount or discussing the two amounts with Mr. Johnson. Tr. at 9-10. Mr. Johnson also sent the agreement with the $10,000 purchase price to his accountant, and he did not inform her of the existence of the version of the agreement stating a $100,000 purchase price. Tr. 55-56.

On or about May 28, 2008, Mr. Johnson received a check in the amount of $70,000 from Christoforo Kimoto to invest as Mr. Johnson saw fit. UST 24; JS 9-10. The two did not have a written agreement. Tr. at 160. Mr. Johnson initially deposited this check into his personal checking account, then deposited $62,500 of these funds into an E*Trade account. Tr. at 60-61; UST 25-26; JS 11.

At some point after receiving the $70,000, Mr. Johnson suffered losses in his investments. In an email dated October 3, 2008, he offered Mr. Kimoto part ownership of Park Holding in lieu of returning the $70,000. UST 27. Mr. Kimoto accepted, and they executed an agreement dated January 1, 2008 [sic] transferring a 50% interest in Park Holding to Mr. Kimoto. UST 28.

As with Mr. Barron, Mr. Johnson ultimately admitted that two versions of the agreement existed, but Mr. Johnson only provided the United States Trustee with a version setting forth a purchase price of $10,000. Tr. at 65. Neither Mr. Barron nor Mr. Kimoto knew the other owned 50% of Park Holding. Tr. at 11-12 (Barron); UST 34 at 26 (Kimoto); UST 36 (Johnson). Mr. Johnson continued to collect the rents for Park Holding on behalf of the two owners. JS 12; Tr. at 12 (Barron), 68 (Johnson). They learned of each other's existence from the United States Trustee. Tr. at 11.

Mr. Johnson's Bankruptcy Petition

Mr. Johnson filed for relief under chapter 7 of the United States Bankruptcy Code on July 9, 2009 in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky. JS 14. On that same date, Mr. Johnson filed Schedules and Statement of Financial Affairs that he signed under penalty of perjury. JS 15. At the first meeting of creditors held on September 3, 2009, Mr. Johnson testified under oath that his Schedules and Statement of Financial Affairs were true and correct. UST 3 at 5-6.

In response to Question number 10(a) of the Statement of Financial Affairs, which asks Mr. Johnson to list all property transferred other than in the ordinary course of business within the two years prior to filing for bankruptcy relief, Mr. Johnson answered "None." UST 2. By answering "none" to question 10(a), Mr. Johnson did not disclose the sale of the Dilcrest lots or the transfer of his interest in Park Holdings to Mr. Barron and Mr. Kimoto. At trial, Mr. Johnson stated that he did not list the transfers because he believed they were in the ordinary course of business. Tr. at 121, 173-75. The Bankruptcy Court, however, concluded that "the debtor was not in business of transferring membership interests in LLC[s]." Tr. at 228.

Mr. Johnson's Representations and Disclosures to the United States Trustee After Filing His Bankruptcy Petition

On November 24, 2010, the United States Trustee obtained an Order directing Mr. Johnson to appear at a Rule 2004 Examination. UST 6. The Order directed Mr. Johnson to produce:

(a) All statements and canceled checks from all bank and investment accounts used by the Debtor and any entity controlled by the Debtors from January 1, 2004 to September 30, 2009;

(b) All books and records concerning real estate held by the Debtor or Park Holding Co., LLC from January 1, 2004 to September 30, 2009;

(c) All books and records concerning investments of the Debtor or Jabez Advisory Group, LLC from January 1, 2004 to September 30, 2009; and

(d) All HUD-1 or other real estate closing statements from the sale of any real estate held by the Debtor or Park Holding Co., LLC from January 1, 2004 to September 30, 2009.

Id.

In response to this court order, Mr. Johnson did not produce any books and records of Park Holding or Jabez Advisory Group. He only produced tax returns for 2005 through 2008 and personal bank statements for one account for April to November 2008 and for July 2009. UST 7. Other than monthly statements for August 2009 and December 2008, and year end summaries and tax statements for 2005 through 2008, Mr. Johnson produced no records of his investment accounts. UST 7; Tr. at 4-7.

Mr. Johnson testified that his accountant turned over her entire file, which had cost him $250 in copying fees, “which if you are bankrupt is – is a lot of money.” Tr. at 127. He testified that he could not provide any more documentation because the banks “were wanting more money than what I had.” Id.

Mr. Johnson was also asked to provide a complete accounting of all receipts, disbursements, and other dispositions for the Martin “Private Annuity.” In response, Mr. Johnson stated that “other than the letters sent to the annuitant [UST 10-14], there are no other documents, receipts, etc. regarding this transaction.” UST 33 at 8.

Bankruptcy Court Decision

On February 12, 2010, the United States Trustee filed a Complaint seeking to deny Mr. Johnson a discharge in bankruptcy. Dkt. 1. Trial was held on July 29, 2010. At the end of the proceedings, the Court ruled in favor of the United States Trustee on three Counts of his Complaint to deny Mr. Johnson a discharge. First, the Court found that Mr. Johnson had failed to keep or preserve records from which his financial condition or business transactions might be ascertained under section 727(a)(3). Second, the Court found that Mr. Johnson had failed to explain satisfactorily any loss or deficiency of assets to meet his liabilities under section 727(a)(5). Finally, the Court found that Mr. Johnson had made false oaths under section 727(a)(4)(A). Judgment, Dkt. 41.

In its ruling, the Court stated that it "didn't find the debtor's testimony to be particularly credible, and the evidence shows that his testimony is inconsistent, and even in some instances can be said to make it up as he goes along." Tr. at 226. The Bankruptcy Court concluded that there "are inconsistencies . . . each time the debtor is under oath." Id.

For example, the Court identified Mr. Johnson's statements about the "Private Annuity" that he had executed with Ms. Martin as an example of his inconsistent testimony. Tr. at 226. In March of 2009, after Ms. Martin had passed, Mr. Johnson informed counsel for her daughter, Ms. Frakes, that the survivorship clause in the "Private Annuity" was not enforceable and so he was not obligated to make payments until 2014, as stated in the agreement. Tr. at 114. At the Meeting of Creditors, Mr. Johnson referred to the "Private Annuity" as a loan. UST 3 at 12. Finally, in response to Interrogatories propounded by the United States Trustee, Mr. Johnson stated that he terminated the annuity payments to Ms. Frakes not because the agreement was unenforceable, but because the agreed payments "had been accelerated and paid in full." UST 33 at 5. He also appeared to take the same position at trial. Tr. at 145-47.

On August 6, 2010, the Bankruptcy Court entered judgment denying Mr. Johnson's discharge. Dkt. 41. Mr. Johnson then timely appealed to this Court.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The facts of this case are largely undisputed and the Code provision at issue – 11 U.S.C. § 727 – has been frequently interpreted by bankruptcy judges. Both the facts and well-established law indicate that the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in denying Mr. Johnson a discharge on three independent bases. It was not clear error to find that Mr. Johnson 1) failed to produce adequate documentation to support his assertions concerning his financial affairs; 2) failed to adequately explain his loss of assets; and 3) made false oaths on his schedules and at the meeting of creditors.

The bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that Mr. Johnson did not provide adequate documentation. Mr. Johnson produced only his personal tax returns, two monthly bank statements, and year-end summaries for 2005-2008. He produced no investment records. He produced no information about his real estate transactions. Mr.

Johnson responded to inquiries about his record-keeping by either stating that his tax accountant would produce the documents or that he could not afford the cost of obtaining the information. The Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err in finding that Mr. Johnson was a sophisticated investor who had not fulfilled his obligation to keep detailed records of his transactions.

Second, the bankruptcy court did not clearly err in finding that Mr. Johnson did not adequately account for the loss of his assets. Between 2004 and 2008, Mr. Johnson engaged in $76 million dollars worth of stock trades. He bought and sold real estate. Yet he could not testify consistently about where the money went. The Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err by denying Mr. Johnson a discharge because "in some instances" Mr. Johnson seemed to be "mak[ing] it up as he goes along." Tr. at 226.

Third, the Bankruptcy Code did not clearly err when it found that Mr. Johnson had made false oaths, providing a third, independent ground to deny him a discharge. Mr. Johnson testified at the meeting of creditors that his wife had always owned their marital residence, although he had in fact transferred the property into her name several months before they were married. Mr. Johnson also represented to the trustee that he had made $10,000 when he sold half of his interest in Park Holdings when in fact the buyer had paid $100,000. These misrepresentations were material because, if left uncorrected, they would have left the trustee with an inaccurate picture of Mr. Johnson's financial affairs.

Finally, Mr. Johnson's brief, which cites only one case, simply asserts that Mr. Johnson is honest or "splits hairs" to try to justify his financial transactions. Tr. at 226. Even if Mr. Johnson's arguments were to garner sympathy from this Court, he has provided no legal basis upon which this Court could hold that the Bankruptcy Court abused its discretion in denying his discharge. The decision below should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

The Bankruptcy Court ruled in favor of the United States Trustee on three Counts of his Complaint. Mr. Johnson could be denied a discharge on any one of the Counts; therefore, this Court must affirm the judgment if it affirms the Bankruptcy Court's ruling on any one Count. As set forth below, the Bankruptcy Court's decision is supported by the record, its findings of fact are not clearly erroneous, and it correctly applied the law.

I. Mr. Johnson failed to produce adequate documentation under section 727(a)(3).

A bankruptcy court shall not grant a discharge if > the debtor has concealed, destroyed, mutilated, falsified, or failed to keep or preserve any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, from which the debtor's financial condition or business transactions might be ascertained, unless such act or failure to act was justified under all of the circumstances of the case.

11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(3). Under this subsection, the debtor's records must provide "enough information to ascertain the debtor's financial condition and track his financial dealings with substantial completeness and accuracy for a reasonable period past to present." In re Juzwiak, 89 F.3d 424, 427 (7th Cir. 1996). Proof of an intent to defraud is not required. E.g., Peterson v. Scott (In re Scott), 172 F.3d 959, 969 (7th Cir. 1999); Bergeron v. Ross (In re Ross), 367 B.R. 577, 581 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 2007).

The adequacy of a debtor's records is determined on a case-by-case basis. Turoczy Bonding Co. v. Strbac (In re Strbac), 235 B.R. 880, 882 (6th Cir. BAP 1999). Considerations include a debtor's "occupation, financial structure, education, experience, sophistication and other circumstances that should be considered in the interest of justice." Id. The United States Trustee and the Bankruptcy Court "should not be required to speculate as to the financial history or condition of the debtor, nor should they be compelled to reconstruct the debtor's affairs." Juzwiak, 89 F.3d at 428 (citation omitted).

The Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err when it ruled that Mr. Johnson was engaged in activities that required substantial record-keeping. Mr. Johnson held himself out as an investment advisor, and obtained many clients while acting as if he were an investment advisor. Tr. at 23-24, 26-27. He engaged in significant stock trading on his own account, selling over $70 million in stock between 2005 and 2008. Tr. at 42-43; UST 29-31. Finally, he owned and managed a business (Park Holding) that owned multi-family housing. JS 6-7, 12; Tr. at 12 (Barron), 68 (Johnson).

A sophisticated debtor engaged in business is held to a higher level of accountability in record keeping, and the more complex the debtor's financial situation, the more numerous and detailed the debtor's financial records should be. Ross, 367 B.R. at 581 (quoting McCord v. Sethi (In re Sethi), 250 B.R. 831, 839 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2000)).

The record demonstrates Mr. Johnson's numerous failures to provide documentation to explain his financial affairs. To name four: first, he failed to provide documentation – other than year end statements of earnings and losses – of over $76 million in stock trading from 2005 to 2008. UST 7; Tr. at 4-7.

Second, Mr. Johnson testified at trial that he normally kept three years of records for his clients, Tr. at 128, but he failed to produce any such records for the three years immediately preceding the February 2010 Complaint filed by the United States Trustee. UST 7.

Third, Mr. Johnson failed to produce any accounting of his use of the $280,000 received from Ms. Martin for the "Private Annuity." He failed to keep any records of his pay-out of the annuity to her during her lifetime or to her daughter after her death. UST 32 at 8; Tr. at 32, 33-34, 40-41, 62-63.

Fourth, Mr. Johnson provided no records related to the Park Holding apartments. Tr. 44. He was unable to document the holding company's finances when he owned it, when he co-owned it with Mr. Barron, and when he managed it on behalf of Mr. Barron and Mr. Kimoto. JS 12.

The Bankruptcy Court did not commit clear error in finding that Mr. Johnson's justifications for failing to provide this documentation were not persuasive. This is so for at least three reasons.

First, Mr. Johnson testified that his accountant had provided his tax return files for which she possessed copies. Tr. 44-46. Copies of tax returns alone, even when prepared by an accountant, do not constitute adequate record keeping for the purposes of section 727(a)(3). PNC Bank v. Buzzelli (In re Buzzelli), 246 B.R. 75, 104 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 2000). This is true in this case. The records Mr. Johnson produced contained a few bank statements and no monthly account statements of Mr. Johnson's extensive stock trading. He did not produce any document that had been independently verified, the minimum necessary to satisfy the Code's requirements. See id.

Second, Mr. Johnson maintained at trial that his own testimony sufficiently explained his financial affairs. His testimony is not an adequate substitute for written records, especially in light of his inconsistent testimony under oath. Micro Connections v. Shah (In re Shah), 388 B.R. 23, 32 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y 2008). See Tr. at 226 (Court finding of inconsistent testimony); supra at 15 (inconsistent testimony regarding private annuity); infra at 28-34 (false oaths and inconsistent testimony concerning transfers).

Third, the Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err in rejecting Mr. Johnson's testimony that he could not produce his records because he could not afford to obtain bank records. Tr. at 227-28; Tr. at 127, 2004 Exam at 7. The copying fees pale in comparison to the $280,000 he obtained from Ms. Martin, the $100,000 he obtained from Mr. Barron in 2008, and the $70,000 he obtained from Mr. Kimoto. It also does not explain his failure to produce recent records and records other than bank statements, such as the records of Park Holding. Tr. at 227-228.

Mr. Johnson argues that he should not be faulted because the documentation he produced "simply did not meet the satisfaction of the Trustee and Judge Wise." Br. at 6. He claims that he produced the documents he could afford and thus was "compliant." Id. However, the court order that directed Mr. Johnson to produce a list of specific documents, UST 6, established the standard of compliance for Mr. Johnson to meet. It is undisputed that he did not comply with the Bankruptcy Court's order to provide documents for the 2004 exam. UST 7; Tr. 4-7. The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in denying Mr. Johnson a discharge under section 727(a)(3). Its decision should be affirmed.

II. Mr. Johnson failed to explain satisfactorily his deficiency of assets under section 727(a)(5).

A bankruptcy court also cannot grant a discharge if a debtor "has failed to explain satisfactorily, before determination of denial of discharge under this paragraph, any loss of assets or deficiency of assets to meet the debtor's liabilities." 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(5). This subsection is broad enough to include any unexplained disappearance or shortage of assets. Solomon v. Barman (In re Barman), 244 B.R. 896, 900 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2000) (citing Chalik v. Moorefield (In re Chalik), 748 F.2d 616 (11th Cir. 1984)).

Furthermore, fraudulent intent is not required; this section imposes "strict liability" if the debtor cannot provide a satisfactory accounting of funds. Baker v. Reed (In re Reed), 310 B.R. 363, 368 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2004). In that context, satisfactory "may mean reasonable, or it may mean that the court, after having heard the excuse, the explanation, has that mental attitude which finds contentment in saying that he believes the explanation . . . ." Slocum v. Wheeler (In re Wheeler), 38 B.R. 842, 846 (Bankr. E.D. Tenn. 1984) (citation omitted).

The Bankruptcy Court, after hearing Mr. Johnson's testimony and other evidence, found that his financial transactions "cannot be traced with any certainty," Tr. at 225, and that Mr. Johnson's own testimony was "not particularly credible," "inconsisten[t]," and "vague." Tr. at 226, 229. "Vague and indefinite explanations" are unacceptable without supporting documentation. Schilling v. O'Bryan (In re O'Bryan), 246 B.R. 271, 280 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 1999) (citation omitted).

The Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that Mr. Johnson failed to explain his extensive financial dealings, either through credible testimony or written documentation.

On the date Mr. Johnson filed for bankruptcy relief (July 9, 2009), his liabilities exceeded his assets by $466,212.21. JS 18. However, in the four years preceding his bankruptcy filing, Mr. Johnson sold $76,445,941 in stocks on his own account. UST 29-32. He also received $100,000 from Mr. Barron in January of 2008, and $70,000 from Mr. Kimoto in May of 2008. JS 8-9. He could not document the disposition of these funds, much less show how he ended up with a deficit of nearly half a million dollars. Tr. at 43-44; 62-63.

In his brief, Mr. Johnson explains that he sold his membership in Park Holdings because he needed cash. Br. at 9. But the issue under section 727(a)(5) is what happened to the money, not the reason why the debtor sold the asset in the first place. Mr. Johnson blames his reversal of fortune on the "faltering economy." Id. The Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err in finding Mr. Johnson's explanations, such as he "is not the only American who lost equity in stocks in the past few years," Id., to be unsatisfactory.

III. Mr. Johnson knowingly and fraudulently made false oaths under section 727(a)(4)(A).

Finally, a bankruptcy court shall not grant a debtor a discharge if a debtor "knowingly and fraudulently, in or in connection with the case made a false oath or account." 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(A). The Bankruptcy Code imposes a duty on the debtor to disclose all assets. 11 U.S.C. § 521(a); Browning v. Levy, 283 F.3d 761, 775 (6th Cir. 2002); Browning Manufacturing v. Coastal Plains, Inc. (In re Coastal Plains, Inc.), 179 F.3d 197, 208 (5th Cir. 1999) ("the importance of this disclosure duty cannot be overemphasized"); Lewis v. Summers (In re Summers), 320 B.R. 630, 642 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2005) (stating that debtors have a "'paramount duty' and 'strict obligation' to truthfully, accurately, and completely answer questions in their schedules and statement of financial affairs") (citations omitted).

Under Sixth Circuit law, the failure to meet this disclosure duty will result in denial of a discharge under section 727(a)(4)(A) if five conditions are met. Keeney v. Smith, (In re Keeney), 227 F.3d 679, 685 (6th Cir. 2000). First, the debtor made the statements under oath; second, the statements were false; third, the debtor knew the statements were false; fourth, the debtor made the statements with fraudulent intent; and fifth, the statements related materially to the bankruptcy case. Id. The purpose of this section is "to make certain that those who seek the shelter of the bankruptcy code do not play fast and loose with their assets or with the reality of their affairs." Hamo v. Wilson (In re Hamo), 233 B.R. 718, 725 (6th Cir. BAP 1999) (citation omitted).

Mr. Johnson made two sets of statements under oath that are at issue here: his Statement of Financial Affairs and his testimony at the Meeting of Creditors. JS 15 (Statement of Financial Affairs); UST 3 at 3 (Meeting of Creditors).

Question 10 of the Statement of Financial Affairs required Mr. Johnson to "[l]ist all other property, other than property transferred in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor, transferred . . . within two years immediately preceding the commencement of this case [July 9, 2007 to July 9, 2009]." UST 2 at 4. In response, Mr. Johnson filled in the "None" box. Id. At the meeting of creditors on September 3, 2009, Mr. Johnson testified under oath that his Schedules and Statement of Financial Affairs were true and correct. UST 3 at 5-6.

In contrast, however, the record shows, and Mr. Johnson does not dispute, that he made three significant transfers during this time period:

1. Mr. Johnson transferred of 50% of Park Holding to Mr. Barron in January 2008 for $100,000, UST 15;

2. Mr. Johnson transferred his remaining 50% share of Park Holding to Christoforo Kimoto, at an unknown date around October 2008.[3] UST 27, 28; and

3. Mr. Johnson sold a parcel of undeveloped real estate for $30,500 in November 2008. UST 5.

Nor did the Bankruptcy Court clearly err in concluding that Mr. Johnson "knowingly" made false oaths. The Bankruptcy Court found [3] The Sale Agreement with Mr. Kimoto is dated January 1, 2008 – the same date as the Sale Agreement with Mr. Barron. Although the record does not clarify this discrepancy, Mr. Kimoto did not invest money with Mr. Johnson until May 2008, UST 24, making it impossible for the two men to have contracted a sale of property to make up for investment losses that occurred at least five months in the future.

"taints of dishonesty" in the fact that Mr. Johnson signed the Agreements of Sale in which he sold 50% interests to Mr. Barron for $100,000 and to Mr. Kimoto for $70,000, without informing either man of the involvement of the other. Tr. at 230. Because Mr. Johnson admitted at trial that the two men "were secret from one another," as the Court described it, there was no clear error in finding that Mr. Johnson had the requisite knowledge to support a violation of section 727(a)(4)(A). Tr. at 229 (denying discharge for "false oaths, for the omissions in the debtor's schedules, for the omissions at the first meeting of creditors.").

Furthermore, Mr. Johnson's misrepresentations were material because they bore "a relationship to the bankrupt's business transactions or estate, or concerns the discovery of assets, business dealings, or the existence and disposition of his property." Keeney, 227 F.3d. at 686 (citation omitted).

Insofar as a debtor rarely admits to fraudulent intent, it is inferred from circumstantial evidence of from his course of conduct. Hamo, 233 B.R. at 724. Intent is also established when a debtor exhibits a "reckless disregard as to whether a representation is true." Keeney, 227 F.3d at 686.

The record in the underlying case is replete with "badges of . . . dishonesty and unfairness that taint this proceeding." Tr. at 227-228 (ruling of Bankruptcy Court). First, Mr. Johnson represented that he was a Registered Investment Agent in his letters to Ms. Martin. Tr. at 26-27; UST 10-13. Second, he prepared two different versions of the Agreements to sell interests in Park Holding to Mr. Barron and Mr. Kimoto and did not inform them of this fact. Tr. at 9-10, 52, 54-56; UST 17, 18, 28. Finally, he did not tell Mr. Barron that Mr. Kimoto owned the remaining 50% of Park Holding, and vice versa. Tr. at 11-12 (Barron); UST 34 at 26 (Kimoto); UST 36 (Johnson).

Fraudulent intent is also supported by the fact that Ms. Frakes was taking action to enforce her right under the "Private Annuity"at the time the false oaths were made. JS 13. The undisclosed transfers of Mr. Johnson's interest in Park Holding were potentially recoverable by the chapter 7 trustee as a preference[4] or as a fraudulent conveyance[5] in the case of the transfer of his residence, giving him further incentive to conceal them.

The Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err when it found unpersuasive Mr. Johnson's excuse that he did not list the transfers because he believed they were in the ordinary course of business. Tr. 121, 173-175; Br. at 6-7. Mr. Johnson has not explained how a transfer of personal business or real estate interests would be in the ordinary course of business for an investment adviser. Cf. Devers v. Bank of Sheridan (In re Devers), 759 F.2d 751, 754 (9th Cir. 1985) (finding fraudulent intent under 727(a)(2)(B) because the debtors claimed that selling off all their breeding stock was "culling" in the "ordinary course of business"). The Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err when it found that Mr. Johnson [4] Subject to numerous limitations and defenses, a trustee may recover payments to creditors on account of antecedent debts made within 90 days of filing (or one year if the creditor is an insider) while the debtor is insolvent. 11 U.S.C. § 547(b).

[5] While 11 U.S.C. § 548 only permits recovery of fraudulent conveyances within one year of filing, a Kentucky trustee may recover fraudulent conveyances made within five years pursuant to Ky. Rev. Stat. §§ 378.010, 413.120. See 11 U.S.C. § 544(b) (trustee has rights and powers of creditor under state law).

"was not in business of transferring membership interests in LLC[s]," and could not "fake" this fact. Tr. 228.

Mr. Johnson argues in his brief that he did not make a false statement when he said that his residence had always been in his wife's name because he had transferred it to her more than two years before filing for bankruptcy. Br. at 7. However, Mr. Johnson had a "paramount duty" to be completely honest. Summers, 320 B.R. at 642. Mr. Johnson stated under oath that his wife had always owned the house. UST 3 at 6. This was untrue.

Mr. Johnson's defense is that he did not have to reveal the transfer on his schedules because it had happened more than two years earlier. Br. at 8. But the Trustee had asked a factual question about whether his wife had always owned the house. Mr. Johnson was under oath and obligated to tell the truth that he had owned it and transferred it to her. He failed to do so. He cannot now plausibly attempt to explain away the misrepresentation because "in the context of what the debtor was asked, he was correct in his answer." Br. at 9.

The Bankruptcy Court did not clearly err in finding that Mr. Johnson's "no harm no foul" attitude towards his lack of transparency in his business dealings, and in his interactions with the trustee and with the Court, could not be reconciled with the rules of the bankruptcy system. Tr. at 228.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the judgment of the Bankruptcy Court be affirmed.

PROOF BRIEF FOR APPELLEES

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a) & (b) to hear the underlying Jordan case, a voluntary petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 701, et seq. See also 28 U.S.C. §§ 151 & 1334(a). On August 5, 2004, the bankruptcy judge entered an order denying the United States

Trustee’s motion to transfer or dismiss for lack of venue. (R. 16 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___). The United States trustee filed a timely notice of appeal to the district court on August 16, 2004. (R. 24-26 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___).[2] Subsequently, on August 24, 2004, the United States Trustee filed an objection to the Chapter 7 Trustee’s Report of No Assets. (R. 49 in No. 04-28437). That objection was overruled by order dated September 23, 2004, (R. 62 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___), and the United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal to the district court from that order on October 1, 2004. (R. 69 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___).

Similarly, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 157(a) & (b) to hear the underlying Thompson case, a voluntary petition under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 1301, et seq. See also 28 U.S.C. §§ 151 & 1334(a). On August 25, 2004, the bankruptcy judge granted the United States Trustee’s motion to dismiss or transfer by ordering the case transferred to the Northern District of Mississippi. (R. 29 in No. 04-29553, JA ___-___). The debtors filed a timely notice of appeal to the district court on August 26, 2004. (R. 30 in No. 04-29553, JA ___-___). The bankruptcy court denied a subsequent motion to stay pending appeal, (R. 57 in No. 04-29553), but the district court granted a stay, (R. 5 in No. 04-2765).

[2] An appeal may be taken from a bankruptcy judge’s decision to the district court. See 28 U.S.C. § 158.

The district court consolidated the three appeals noted above as well as a fourth appeal in a different case, which is no longer relevant. (See R. 7 in No. 04-2979; R.8 in No. 04-2765; R. 4 in No. 04-2766). On October 31, 2006, the district court issued a single opinion deciding the shared question of law common to both the Thompson and Jordan cases. This decision affirmed the transfer in Thompson and reversed and remanded the order retaining the case in Jordan. (R. 12 in No. 04-2979, R. 17 in No. 04-2765, and R. 16 in No. 04-2766, JA ___-___). Jordan filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court on November 29, 2006. (R. 17 in No. 04-2766, JA ___-___). The Thompson debtors filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court on November 7, 2006. (R. 19 in No. 04-2765, JA ___-___). This Court has consolidated these two appeals, which it has jurisdiction to hear under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

When a bankruptcy case is filed in a court lacking venue, may that court deny a timely motion to dismiss or transfer and, instead, retain the case?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Statement of the Facts and Proceedings Below

1. Bankruptcy Court Proceedings in Jordan. Debtor Leonard Jordan, who lives and works in Southaven, Mississippi, initiated his bankruptcy case by filing a voluntary petition under Chapter 7 on June 2, 2004 in the United States District Court for the Western District of Tennessee. (R. 1 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___). On June 15, 2004, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss or transfer on the basis that venue was lacking because the debtor did not reside in the district (R. 9 in NO. 04-28437), which the bankruptcy judge denied by order dated August 5, 2004, (R. 16 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___). The bankruptcy judge acknowledged that "retention by the court of a bankruptcy case, after it has been determined that case venue is improper, is not specifically authorized by statute." Id. at 2, JA ___. However, he concluded that "there is no express statutory provision under title 28 for the court to dismiss or retain an improperly venued case upon a timely motion being filed to contest venue," id. at 26, JA ___, and therefore the sole question was whether it was "logical to allow an interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties standard" to retain the case. Id. at 27, JA ___.

Five days later, the bankruptcy judge substituted a "supplemental memorandum" explaining the basis for the denial of the motion to transfer or dismiss, (R. 18 in No. 04-28437, JA ___- ___), which is published as In re Jordan, 313 B.R. 242 (Bankr. W.D. Tenn. 2004). In that opinion, the bankruptcy court made clear that the basis for its decision was its "inherent or implicit authority," rather than any statutory authority. Id. at 18, JA ___. The Court also explained that it would not apply 28 U.S.C. § 1406 – the general statute regarding proceedings when a case is filed in a court lacking venue – because venue considerations in bankruptcy cases differ from those in other cases. Id. at 2, 11-12, JA ___, ___-___.

The United States trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from the denial of its motion on August 16, 2004. (R. 24-26 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___). Subsequently, on August 24, 2004, the United States Trustee filed an objection to the Chapter 7 Trustee's Report of no Assets. (R. 49 in No. 04-28437). That objection was overruled by order dated September 23, 2004, (R. 62 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___), and the United States Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal from that order on October 1, 2004, (R. 69 in No. 04-28437, JA ___-___).

2. Bankruptcy Court Proceedings in Thompson. The Thompson debtors – a husband and wife who reside in Olive Branch, Mississippi – filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 13 on June 21, 2004 in the United States District Court for the Western District of Tennessee. (R. 1 in No. 04-29553, JA ___-___). On July 20, 2004, the United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss or transfer based on lack of venue because of the debtors' residence. (R. 11 in No. 04-29553). Relying on a previous opinion holding that bankruptcy courts lack discretion to retain cases filed in the wrong venue, the bankruptcy judge granted that motion on August 25, 2004, ordering the case transferred to the Northern District of Mississippi. (R. 29 in No. 04-29553, JA ___-___). The debtors filed a timely notice of appeal on August 26, 2004. (R. 30 in No. 04-29553, JA ___-___). The bankruptcy court denied a subsequent motion to stay pending appeal, (R. 57 in No. 04-29553), but the district court granted a stay, (R. 5 in No. 04-2765).

3. District Court Proceedings. The cases were consolidated before the district court. See District Court Opinion, R. 17 in No. 04-2765, R. 16 in No. 04-2766, at 3 ("Dist. Ct. Op."), JA ___. The district court held that when a court lacks venue over a bankruptcy case, it must grant a timely motion to dismiss or transfer and has no discretion to retain the case. It therefore reversed the bankruptcy court in Jordan and affirmed in Thompson. Id. at 21, JA ___.

The district court began its analysis by noting that 28 U.S.C. § 1408 establishes venue for bankruptcy cases and that its provisions necessarily "provide[] legal constraints on bankruptcy filing, not mere suggestions." Id. at 12, JA ___. Thus the debtors here correctly "concede[d] that the venue in which they filed was improper, or at least 'technically improper.'" Id. at 13, JA ___. The district court then noted that in 1984, Congress had repealed a statutory provision, 28 U.S.C. § 1477, that expressly allowed bankruptcy courts to retain cases even when they lacked venue. Such a repeal must be viewed as purposeful, and the fact that Congress reenacted (with minor changes) other bankruptcy venue provisions, but not § 1477 must be given meaning. Id. at 13-16, JA ___-___. Moreover, there is an applicable statute that requires dismissal or transfer of cases filed in a court lacking venue. That statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1406(a), applies "on its face" to bankruptcy cases because it, like the bankruptcy-specific statutory provisions, applies to a "case" filed in a "district court." Id. at 17, JA ___. Accordingly, the district court held that § 1406 controlled the question before it and that the cases could not be maintained before the courts in Tennessee. Id. at 21, JA ___.

These consolidated appeals followed.

B. Relevant Statutory Provisions

Venue in bankruptcy cases is governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1408, which primarily provides for venue in the judicial district where an individual debtor lives:

> Except as provided in section 1410 of this title, a case under title 11 may be commenced in the district court for the district–
> (1) in which the domicile, residence, principal place of business in the United States, or principal assets in the United States, of the person or entity that is the subject of such case have been located for the one hundred and eighty days immediately preceding such commencement, or for a longer > portion of such one-hundred-and-eighty-day period that the domicile, residence, or principal place of business, in the United States, or principal assets in the United States, of such person were located in any other district; or

> (2) in which there is pending a case under title 11 concerning such person's affiliate, general partner, or partnership.

A case filed in the wrong venue is governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1406, the relevant portion of which here is subsection (a):

> The district court of a district in which is filed a case laying venue in the wrong division or district shall dismiss, or if it be in the interest of justice, transfer such case to any district or division in which it could have been brought.

While this provision refers specifically to a "district court" (and not a bankruptcy court), a separate statutory provision explains that a "bankruptcy court" is "a unit of the district court." 28 U.S.C. § 151. Finally, appellants contend that a provision addressing the transfer of bankruptcy cases is relevant here. That provision states that:

> A district court may transfer a case or proceeding under title 11 to a district court for another district, in the interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties.

28 U.S.C. § 1412.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Congress expressly forbade a court from retaining a case over which it lacks venue. In 28 U.S.C. § 1406(a), it clearly provided that such a court "shall dismiss, or if it be in the interest of justice, transfer such case . . . ." (Emphasis added). Congress also enacted certain venue rules that are specific to bankruptcy cases, but none of those rules addresses a court's ability to retain a case over which it lacks venue. Because general statutes apply to bankruptcy cases unless there is a direct and irreconcilable conflict with a bankruptcy-specific statute, § 1406(a) applies to bankruptcy cases and precludes a court from retaining a case over which it lacks jurisdiction, at least when, as here, a timely motion to dismiss or transfer is filed.

Appellants' arguments to the contrary are not supported. The statutory provision establishing venue in bankruptcy cases, 28 U.S.C. § 1408 (which appellants here ignored by filing in a court that they concede lacks venue), would be rendered meaningless under their proposed scheme. And they concede that the statutory provision on which they most rely, 28 U.S.C. § 1412, is "silent" with respect to whether a court lacking venue can retain the case.

Their primary appeal is to the bankruptcy court's alleged equitable power and the supposed inconvenience to the parties of requiring residents of Memphis suburbs that are located within the State of Mississippi to litigate their bankruptcy claims in a court located in Mississippi that is further from their homes than Memphis. But appellants grossly exaggerate the degree of inconvenience involved in litigating in their state of residence, and, at any rate, no court's equitable authority allows it to act contrary to the requirements of statutes enacted by Congress.

For these reasons, all three Article III courts to have ruled on this question have concluded that a court without venue over a bankruptcy case lacks authority to retain it when a proper motion to dismiss or transfer is filed. In addition to the decision below, these rulings are Swinney v. Turner, 309 B.R. 638 (M.D. Ga. 2004), and In re Peachtree Lane, 188 B.R. 815 (N.D. Ill. 1995). The only Bankruptcy Appellate Panel to rule on this question reached the same result, In re Sorrells, 218 B.R. 580 (10th Cir. BAP 1998), as have the majority of bankruptcy courts to address the question, see id. at 586 (collecting cases).

ARGUMENT

I. REVIEW IS DE NOVO.

The district court's decision was solely on questions of statutory interpretation and is therefore subject to de novo review. See First of Mich. Corp. v. Bramlet, 141 F.3d 260, 262 (6th Cir. 1998). Appellants agree. See Aplt. Br. 14 ("This appeal involves only a question of law so the standard of review is de novo.").

II. TITLE 28 SECTION 1406(a) REQUIRES DISMISSAL OR TRANSFER OF A CASE FILED IN A COURT LACKING VENUE.

A. Appellants' brief opens with the assertion that the law governing the question presented in this case is "murky." Aplt. Br. 15. To the contrary, it is quite clear and rather simple.

This case is squarely governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1406(a), which leaves no possibility that the bankruptcy courts could retain the petitions at issue here:

> The district court of a district in which is filed a case laying venue in the wrong division or district shall dismiss, or if it be in the interest of justice, transfer such case to any district or division in which it could have been brought.

This statute applies to the bankruptcy petitions at issue here because the bankruptcy judges in each judicial district constitute a "unit of the district court," 28 U.S.C. § 151, to whom bankruptcy cases may be referred, id. § 157. See Dist. Ct. Op. 4, JA ___. (noting that Congress "granted original and exclusive jurisdiction of all bankruptcy cases to the federal district courts, and then authorized the delegation of such authority to the bankruptcy courts as adjuncts to the district courts"); id. at 5 n.4, JA ___. Appellants agree. See Aplt. Br. 16, 18.

The petitions at issue here also meet the second criterion in § 1406(a) because, as even appellants themselves concede, the petitions lay venue in the wrong division or district. See, e.g., Aplt. Br. 9 ("In each case, the debtors conceded that venue in the Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Tennessee was not technically proper"); accord id. at 2, 9, 12-13, 15, 38. Accordingly, under 28 U.S.C. § 1406(a), the courts' only options were to "dismiss, or if it be in the interest of justice, transfer" these cases. Indeed, appellants agree that where § 1406(a) applies, it "requires" dismissal or transfer. Aplt. Br. 40. On this basis alone, the district court's decision should be affirmed.

> The applicable statutes simply do not authorize a bankruptcy court to retain a case when venue is improper, even if retaining the case may be more convenient for the parties or in the interest of justice. Since the plain language of the applicable statutory authority makes this clear, it is unnecessary and inappropriate to look beyond the plain language of those provisions in an attempt to speculate at some contrary intent of Congress.

Swinney, 309 B.R. at 641.

B. Where statutory meaning is clear, a court need not "resort to the canons of construction that we use to resolve doubtful cases. Beach v. Ocwen Fed. Bank, 523 U.S. 410, 417 (1998). Here, the meaning of § 1406(a) is clear and its applicability plain. No further analysis is necessary. Nonetheless, the clear language is fully supported by the usual tools of statutory construction as well.

1. "[T]he meaning of statutory language, plain or not, depends on context." Holloway v. United States, 526 U.S. 1, 7 (1999) (internal quotation marks omitted). The context here demonstrates that § 1406(a) applies. The context includes, most importantly, 28 U.S.C. § 1408 – the statutory provision that appellants concede establishes venue in bankruptcy cases, including the cases at issue here. Section 1408 divides all bankruptcy cases into two categories: (1) cases filed in a court with venue and (2) cases filed in a court without venue. This distinction matters precisely because a case filed in a court with venue can be retained, dismissed, or transferred, see 28 U.S.C. § 1404, while a case filed in a court lacking venue can only be dismissed or transferred (if an appropriate motion is filed), id. §§ 1406(a) & 1412. That makes sense.

Appellants' interpretation of the statute does not make sense because they assert that there is no difference between a case filed in a court with venue and a case filed in a court without venue: under either circumstance, the court can retain, dismiss, or transfer the case. Appellants' interpretation would thus render § 1408, and, indeed, the entire concept of venue in bankruptcy cases, irrelevant. See In re Sorrells, 218 B.R. at 588 (A court lacking venue must not be allowed to retain a bankruptcy case, "otherwise, there would be no reason to define proper venue" and "sections 1408 through 1410, which define venue [would] be totally circumvented."); Dist. Ct. Op. 12, JA ___ ("If venue is to have any meaning at all in a bankruptcy context, the Court must consider the terms of § 1408 as providing legal constraints on bankruptcy filing, not mere suggestions."). Because appellants' reading of the statute renders § 1408 irrelevant, it violates well-settled principles of statutory construction. See, e.g., Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pueblo of Santa Ana, 472 U.S. 237, 249 (1985) ("'[A] statute should be interpreted so as not to render one part inoperative.'") (quoting Colauitti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379, 392 (1979)); TRW Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19, 31 (2001) (statute ought to be construed so that no clause, sentence, or word is superfluous, void, or insignificant) (quoting Duncan v. Walker, 533 U.S. 167, 174 (2001)). The district court properly rejected such an approach. See Dist. Ct. Op. 16, JA ___ (noting that the purpose of § 1408 is "to distinguish properly venued cases from those improperly venued" and that it therefore does not make sense "to treat these two categories of cases as if they were one").

2. If the statute were ambiguous, courts would look to the relevant legislative history for guidance. Here too, that history indicates that Congress did not intend to allow courts to retain bankruptcy cases where venue was lacking. As appellants agree, the relevant legislative history involves former 28 U.S.C. § 1477, which was repealed in 1984. That provision had done what appellants seek here; it stated that:

> The bankruptcy court of a district in which is filed a case or proceeding laying venue in the wrong division or district may, in the interest of justice and for the convenience of the parties, retain such case or proceedings, or may transfer . . . such case or proceeding to any other district or division.

Appellants concede that this provision was "repealed" in 1984 and "not replace[d]," Aplt. Br. 19, but nonetheless suggest that "Congress did not intend" by this repeal "a departure from prior law," Aplt. Br. 30. Of course, following the general rule that Congress means what it says and says what it means, when Congress repeals and does not replace a provision, the logical inference to be drawn is that it no longer wants the repealed provision to operate. See, e.g., Lamie v. United States Trustee, 540 U.S. 526 (2004) (giving effect to Congressional decision to delete a phrase from a statute, even where the deletion left a grammatically incorrect phrase that was not parallel to other statutory provisions); Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255, 270-71 & n.9 (2000) (rejecting contention, based on legislative history, that deletion of the word "feloniously" from statute was a mere "stylistic change" not intended to alter the meaning of the statute). The fact that Congress repealed the provision expressly allowing courts without venue to retain bankruptcy cases thus indicates that Congress no longer wanted them to be able to do so. This logical interpretation reinforces the plain meaning of § 1406(a).

Appellants would draw the opposite conclusion, "[d]espite this repeal." Aplt. Br. 20. They suggest that legislative history indicates that "Congress intended no major change in the law," Aplt. Br. 20, and repealed § 1477 only because it was repetitive. Aplt. Br. 37. There are three serious flaws with this reasoning. First, even when the legislative history indicates that Congress did not intend to make significant changes when it repeals statutory language, the touchstone of legislative interpretation is the statutory language that remains, not the legislative history.

See Carter, 530 U.S. at 270-71 & n.9 (giving effect to the deletion of a word from the statute despite legislative history "that Congress intended only to make 'changes in phraseology.'") (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 80-304, at A135 (1947)). Second, appellants misstate the legislative history, which indicates that Congress did intend some changes. See S. Rep. No. 98-55, at 19-20 (1983) (saying that the statute repealing § 1477 "makes very few changes in current venue provisions"). This history is entirely consistent with giving substantive meaning to Congress's decision to delete § 1477, since that deletion was simply one of the "very few" changes that Congress intended. Third, appellants themselves admit that § 1477 was not redundant of other federal law because in 1984 (as now) there was no other federal law authorizing the retention of improperly venued bankruptcy cases. See Aplt. Br. 37-38 ("Section 1477 was the only statutory provision that specifically provided for retention of improperly venued cases. In this sense, section 1477 was not duplicative of other statutory venue provisions at all."). Appellants suggest that this creates "confusion," Aplt. Br. 38, but the confusion is of appellants' own making. Applying § 1406(a) on its own terms dispels all supposed "confusion," and results in a coherent and reasonable statutory scheme that complies with the statutory language.

3. Interpretation of ambiguous statutes can also be aided by looking to appropriate regulations. Congress has provided that

“[t]he Supreme Court shall have the power to prescribe by general rules, the forms of process, writs, pleadings, and motions, and the practice and procedure in cases under title 11.” 28 U.S.C. § 2075. Pursuant to this statutory provision, the Supreme Court has prescribed bankruptcy rules, and if there were any statutory ambiguity, it could be resolved by reference to the applicable rule of bankruptcy procedure. Rule 1014(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure states:

> Cases filed in improper district
> If a petition is filed in an improper district, on timely motion of a party in interest and after hearing on notice to the petitioners, the United States trustee, and other entities as directed by the court, the case may be dismissed or transferred to any other district if the court determines that transfer is in the interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties.

This rule tracks 28 U.S.C. § 1406(a) in providing two alternatives when a bankruptcy case is filed in an improper district: dismissal and transfer. Neither this rule nor any other rule provides for the court to retain a case filed in an improper district.

If there were any ambiguity in the rule, it is dispelled by the Advisory Committee Note to the rule, which explains that the rule implements congressional repeal of § 1477, and reflects the fact that § 1406(a) applies to bankruptcy cases:

> Formerly, 28 U.S.C. § 1477 authorized a court either to transfer or retain a case which had been commenced in a district where venue was improper. However, 28 U.S.C. § 1412, which supersedes 28 U.S.C. § 1477, authorizes only > the transfer of a case. The rule is amended to delete the reference to retention of a case commenced in the improper district. Dismissal of a case commenced in the improper district as authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1406 has been added to the rule.

This discussion is important in two respects. First, it recognizes the legislative history point above. The rule treats the repeal of § 1477 as having meaning, namely, removing the authority to retain an improperly venued case. Second, the advisory committee explicitly states that with respect to dismissal of a case where venue is lacking – a subject not addressed by § 1412 – § 1406(a) applies. See Dist. Ct. Op. 18, JA ___ ("Clearly the Committee viewed § 1406 as governing wrongly venued bankruptcy cases."). It naturally follows that, with respect to retaining a case where venue is lacking – also a subject not addressed by § 1412 – § 1406(a) similarly applies.

Appellants' discussion of Rule 1014 is unconvincing. First, without any analysis or explanation whatsoever, appellants assert that Rule 1014(a)(2) "provides the court with the authority to retain the case despite improper venue, if retention were in the interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties in furtherance of the judicial goal of the bankruptcy court." Aplt. Br. 25 (emphasis added). Saying that does not make it so. And certainly there is no actual language in Rule 1014 that could be interpreted in this way. Indeed, the rule, on its face, does not mention the concept of a court retaining a case under any circumstances; it refers only to transfer and dismissal. Moreover, the concepts of "interest of justice" and "convenience of the parties" in Rule 1014 relate solely to a possible transfer and have no relation whatsoever to the concept of retaining a case. In short, Rule 1014 does not by any conceivable stretch of its actual language stand for the proposition attributed to it by appellants.

Second, appellants assert that because the rule provides that a court "may" dismiss or transfer a case, it necessarily follows that it may, also, retain the case. Aplt. Br. 25. There is no warrant for such an inference. The word "may" is not always permissive. Indeed, in a very similar context – a specific venue statute – the Supreme Court reached just the opposite conclusion. In Radzanower v. Touche Ross & Co., 426 U.S. 148, 152 (1976), the Supreme Court addressed a statute providing "that suits against a national banking association 'may be had' in the federal district court for the district where such association is established." Although this statute, like Rule 1014, uses the permissive word "may," to establish venue, the Supreme Court concluded "that this grant of venue is mandatory and exclusive." Id.; Mercantile Nat'l Bank at Dallas v. Langdeau, 371 U.S. 555, 560 (1963). Accordingly, the use of the word "may," by itself, obviously does not mean that additional alternatives are available.[3] [3] Further examples of the use of "may" in a non-permissive sense abound. For example, Fed. R. App. P. 25(d)(3) says that "[p]roof of service may appear on or be affixed to the papers

Third, appellants suggest that the Advisory Committee Notes should be disregarded because they do not measure up to appellants' views regarding the goal of "equitable, just, and speedy" resolution of bankruptcy cases. Aplt. Br. 33. But vague principles do not trump regulations or negate the usefulness of the Advisory Committee Notes. Indeed, both the Supreme Court and this Court have relied on those notes in interpreting the rules. See In re Bli Farms, 465 F.3d 654, 657 (6th Cir. 2006) (relying on Advisory Committee Note to narrow scope of facially broad Bankruptcy Rule); see also Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 456 n.10 (2004); Pioneer Inv. Servs. Co. V. Brunswick Assocs. Ltd., 507 U.S. 380, 389 n.4 (1993).

III. APPELLANTS PROVIDE NO BASIS TO REFUSE TO APPLY § 1406(a).

Appellants offer a host of reasons to ignore 28 U.S.C. § 1406(a) here, none of which has merit.

A. The bulk of appellants' brief suggests that this Court should look to policy or equitable concerns, instead of the filed." The alternatives presented in this rule are exclusive, i.e. the rule requires that the proof of service either appear on or be affixed to the papers filed. Rule 27(d)(1)(A) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure states that "[a] motion, response, or reply may be reproduced by any process that yields a clear black image on light paper." Although the language is permissive, the import of the rule is that no other mode of reproduction is allowed. Rule 35(a) of this Court states that "[a] suggestion for a hearing or rehearing en banc may be made as provided in FRAP 35 or by any member of the en banc Court." No additional alternatives exist; this list is exclusive, despite the fact that it follows the word "may."

statutes enacted by Congress, in ruling on the venue question here. This Court should not follow such suggestions. For example, appellants argue that:

> In order to effectively construe and apply the Bankruptcy Code in achieving the judicial goals enumerated, the totality of the particular facts and circumstances of each individual case must be factored in to determine the venue or forum that best accommodates the parties in interest, while keeping the interests of justice in mind.

Aplt. Br. 28-29. But, of course, appellants do not get to make up their own rules regarding what factors should be relevant to determining venue; Congress does. Here, Congress has explained in 28 U.S.C. § 1408 what factors are relevant to venue in bankruptcy cases, namely the "domicile, residence, principal place of business in the United States, or principal assets in the United States" of the debtor. And, in § 1406(a), Congress explained the consequences of the absence of venue as defined by Congress. Congress did not vest courts with discretion to consider factors not listed in § 1408 in determining venue (including the factors suggested by appellants here), nor did it vest courts with discretion to respond to the absence of venue in ways not described in § 1406(a).[4]

[4] To be sure, Congress also stated that the "interests of justice" and "the convenience of the parties" could justify the transfer of a bankruptcy case, 28 U.S.C. § 1412, but appellants are not suggesting that a transfer was appropriate here. Quite the contrary, they are suggesting that the courts below should have retained – and not transferred – the cases. Thus, § 1412 is inapplicable here. Indeed, appellants themselves agree that "[s]ection 1412 . . . is silent as to whether an improperly venued

Similarly, appellants boldly assert (without citation) that "the Bankruptcy Court, a court of equity, has the inherent and implicit authority to retain, dismiss or transfer the case, in the interest of justice or for the convenience of the parties." Aplt. Br. 12. Similarly without citation, they assert that "bankruptcy courts are courts of equity where the interest of justice or the convenience of the parties may dictate that cases be administered in a court of improper venue." The Supreme Court disagrees, noting that "it is well established that [c]ourts of equity can no more disregard statutory and constitutional requirements and provisions than can courts of law." Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 485 (1997) (internal quotation marks omitted); INS v. Pangilinan, 486 U.S. 875, 883 (1988); Regional Airport Auth. of Louisville v. LFG, LLC, 460 F.3d 697, 711 (6th Cir. 2006).

More specifically, there is no basis for distinguishing district courts and bankruptcy courts in this regard. Both are created by statute. 28 U.S.C. §§ 132 & 151. Both can act as "courts of equity." See United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers case may be retained." Aplt. Br. 41; accord Swinney v. Turner, 309 B.R. 638, 640-41 (M.D. Ga. 2004) (Section 1412 "provided for the transfer of a case to another district for the convenience of the parties or in the interest of justice. However, no current statutory provision authorizes a court to retain a case in an improper venue for the convenience of the parties or in the interest of justice.") (citation omitted); In re Sorrells, 218 B.R. 580, 586 (10th Cir. BAP 1998) ("Section 1412 states that a court 'may' transfer a case, but it does not say anything about retaining a case of improper venue.").

Co-op., 532 U.S. 483, 496 (2001) (district court can act as court of equity). And, indeed, bankruptcy courts are merely "unit[s]" of the district courts. 28 U.S.C. § 151; accord Aplt Br. 18 (describing "bankruptcy courts as adjuncts of the United States district courts"). No one – not even appellants – would suggest that district courts are free to disregard the requirements of § 1406(a). See Aplt. Br. 40 (noting that § 1406 "requires" that an improperly venued case be dismissed or transferred). It necessarily follows that the fact that bankruptcy courts (just like the district courts of which they are units) can be described as courts of equity does not allow them to disregard the requirements of § 1406 (or any other statute).[5]

B. Given that this case must be governed by statute rather than general policy concepts, the only remaining question is whether appellants have provided any statutory reason for this Court to decline to apply § 1406(a). They have not.

1. Appellants appear to suggest that § 1406(a) should not apply because the word "case" has a different meaning with respect to civil cases than with respect to bankruptcy cases. Aplt. Br.

[5] Ancillary to their argument that bankruptcy courts have equitable power to ignore the venue statutes, appellants repeat the mantra that "bankruptcy is different" when it comes to venue. See, e.g., Aplt. Br. 21, 25-26. But bankruptcy is only different because (and to the extent that) Congress has deemed it so. Appellants concede that no bankruptcy-specific statute addresses the retention of improperly venued cases, and therefore, with respect to the retention of such cases, bankruptcy is not different.

15-17. This argument is puzzling, at best. Appellants concede that venue with respect to the cases at issue here is governed by 28 U.S.C. § 1408, see e.g., Aplt. Br. 12, 24, which refers to commencing "a case . . . in the district court." It necessarily follows that each of the petitions at issue here was "a case . . . in the district court." This exact same concept – indeed, the exact same words, "a case" filed in the "district court" – is used just two sections earlier in § 1406(a). Appellants provide no coherent explanation for why each of the proceedings at issue in this case constituted "a case" filed in a "district court" under § 1408 but not under § 1406(a), and there is none. See Dist. Ct. Op. 17, JA ___ (noting that § 1406 uses the same language as the bankruptcy-specific provisions in §§ 1408 and 1412).

2. Appellants suggest that § 1406(a) should not be applied because §§ 1408 & 1412, which specifically relate to bankruptcy cases, should apply instead. See Aplt. Br. 18-20. But the existence of a bankruptcy-specific statute on a topic does not negate the application of all non-bankruptcy-specific statutes on that same or similar topics. To the contrary, as the Supreme Court recognized in Connecticut Nat'l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253 (1992), two overlapping statutes must both be given effect "so long as there is no 'positive repugnancy'" between them (quoting Wood v. United States, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 342, 363 (1842)). There, a statute addressed review by the Court of Appeals of interlocutory district court decisions generally, and a separate provision addressed review by the Court of Appeals of district court decisions in bankruptcy cases. The Supreme Court rejected the argument that the statute governing appeals in bankruptcy cases, which was "silent" with respect to interlocutory decisions, limited by implication the statute regarding interlocutory appeals from district courts, whether or not in bankruptcy cases. 503 U.S. at 254. Accord Things Remembered, Inc. v. Petrarca, 516 U.S. 124, 129 (1995) (where general statute regarding removal and bankruptcy-specific statute regarding removal can "comfortably coexist," effect must be given to both). Germain is directly applicable here. Section 1406(a) is a general venue statute that addresses whether a court without venue can retain a case, and § 1412 is a bankruptcy-specific venue statute that appellants concede is "silent" on that question. Germain mandates that § 1406(a) applies in this situation.

In other words, because § 1406(a) applies on its face, and clearly prohibits a court from refusing to transfer or dismiss a bankruptcy case where venue is lacking and a timely objection to venue is made, appellants could only prevail by finding a bankruptcy-specific statute that also applies and that has precisely the opposite effect, i.e, that gives the court authority to retain an improperly venued case. But the only statute they cite is silent on this question.[6]

Appellants place much emphasis on 28 U.S.C. §§ 1408 and 1412 as statutes supposedly in tension with § 1406(a). See Aplt. Br. 24 ("The consideration of 28 U.S.C. §§ 1408 and 1412 in the instant case should be sufficient to determine the final result for the venue in these cases."). But, in fact, both of these statutes are completely consistent with § 1406(a).

Section 1408 is particularly unhelpful to appellants. That provision defines where venue lies in bankruptcy cases. It does not directly state whether a case can be maintained in a court lacking venue. For that reason alone, it is consistent with § 1406(a), which states that a case cannot be maintained in a court lacking venue. But beyond that, the entire tenor of § 1408 is consistent with § 1406(a) and not with appellants' view of venue. Section 1408 says that a case may not be "commenced" in a court lacking venue. The cases at issue here were "commenced" in a court lacking venue – a point that appellants do not contest. See, e.g. Aplt. Br. 15. Appellants suggest that, although they violated the requirements of § 1408, no corrective action should be taken. As noted above, this would render § 1408 a nullity, which this Court should not do. Instead, it is far more logical to conclude that Congress intended § 1408 to have real meaning, and that meaning is provided by § 1406(a), which spells out the consequences that follow from a violation of § 1408 (and other venue provisions).

[6] Appellants cite to various forms of legislative history surrounding the repeal of 28 U.S.C. § 1477 in 1984, and suggest that this history indicates that, in general, a permissive view of bankruptcy venue ought to prevail. See Aplt. Br. 19-20. But this puts the cart before the horse. Legislative history is only resorted to when the governing statutes are unclear. See, e.g., United States v. Gonzales, 520 U.S. 1, 6 (1997) ("Given the straightforward statutory command, there is no reason to resort to legislative history."). As noted above, § 1406(a) is clear, and requires dismissal or transfer of an improperly venued case. For reasons discussed above, the legislative history actually supports the district court's ruling, but even if it supported appellants, that fact alone would not be sufficient to overcome the clear statutory language that was actually enacted by Congress and thus constitutes the applicable law. See, e.g., Lexecon Inc. v. Milberg Weis Bershad Hynes & Lerach, 523 U.S. 26, 37 (1998) ("The language is straightforward, and with a straightforward application ready to hand, statutory interpretation has no business getting metaphysical.").

Similarly, with respect to retaining a case where venue is lacking, there is no "positive repugnancy" between § 1412 and § 1406(a). Section 1412 is aptly entitled "change of venue," and addresses the situations in which "[a] district court may transfer a case or proceeding under title 11 to a district court for another district." 28 U.S.C. § 1412. This provision is obviously silent as to the question at issue here (and directly addressed in § 1406(a)): whether a court may retain a case where venue is lacking and a timely objection is made. Indeed, appellants admit that it is "silent" on this question. Aplt. Br. 41; accord Swinney v. Turner, 309 B.R. 638, 640-41 (M.D. Ga. 2004) (Section 1412 "provided for the transfer of a case to another district for the convenience of the parties or in the interest of justice. However, no current statutory provision authorizes a court to retain a case in an improper venue for the convenience of the parties or in the interest of justice.") (citation omitted); In re Sorrells, 218 B.R. 580, 586 (10th Cir. BAP 1998) (noting that § 1412 "does not say anything about retaining a case of improper venue," which "alone leads us to believe that section 1412 does not authorize a court of improper venue to retain a bankruptcy case"). In other words § 1412 says that a court may transfer a case (under certain circumstances) and is silent as to what other options are available. Section 1406(a) also notes that a court may transfer a case, but, unlike § 1412, does speak to the remaining options available. It says that there is only one such option, when venue is lacking, and that is dismissal. Accordingly, nothing in § 1412 calls into question the requirement of § 1406(a) that a district court lacking venue must either transfer or dismiss.[7]

[7] Appellants suggest that there may be a conflict between § 1406(a) and § 1412 with respect to the courts' power to transfer cases in certain circumstances. If, as appellants suggest on pages 31-33 of their brief, § 1412 allows a court lacking venue to transfer a case to another court lacking venue, then there could be a conflict. Accord Aplt. Br. 19-20. As a matter of statutory construction, appellants' contention is highly questionable. See Dist. Ct. Op. 20, JA ___ (holding that "28 U.S.C. § 1412 governs the transfer of bankruptcy cases filed in the proper venue"). But there is no need to debate this point because it is not necessary to resolve it in order to decide the case at hand. The asserted conflict between §§ 1406(a) and 1412 involves whether a case may be transferred from one court lacking venue to another. That is not the question before this Court. Instead, this Court must determine whether a court lacking venue can retain a case. On that question, appellants concede that there is no conflict because they admit that § 1412 is "silent." Aplt. Br. 41 ("Section 1412 . . . is

C. Finally, appellants suggest that the requirements of § 1406(a) can be disregarded here because its application "creates absurd results." Aplt. Br. 13. The apparent absurdity is that they are not allowed to proceed "in a convenient, albeit technically improper venue." Aplt. Br. 29. While appellants do not specify why mere inconvenience is absurd, they focus on the distance between their homes and Aberdeen, Mississippi, home of the bankruptcy court for the Northern District of Mississippi (where all the parties agree that venue is proper). See Aplt. Br. 26-27 (noting that appellants "live and work in closer proximity to the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Western District of Tennessee, Western Division [based in Memphis], than to the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Mississippi [based in Aberdeen]"). More specifically, they complain that Memphis is about 15-25 miles from their homes wile Aberdeen is about 120-135 miles away, up to two hours further. Id. at 10-11, 22-24, 27.

Although it is correct that statutes must be interpreted to avoid absurd results, the standard of absurdity is a high one. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 202-03 (1819) (absurdity must be "so monstrous, that all mankind would, without hesitation, unite in rejecting" it); Robbins v. Chronister, 435 silent as to whether an improperly venued case may be retained . . . .").

F.3d 1238, 1241 (10th Cir. 2006) (requiring an absurdity "so gross as to shock the general moral or common sense") (internal quotations and citation omitted); Sigmon Coal Co. v. Apfel, 226 F.3d 291, 308 (4th Cir. 2000) (same), aff'd 534 U.S. 438 (2002). An extra two hours of driving time does not qualify. Indeed, appellants do not allege that it is absurd that their appeal be heard in this Court, which is located over 500 miles from their residences.

More importantly, appellants omit a number of key facts that demonstrate little or no inconvenience to them from being required to file in their state of residence. For example, although Aberdeen is indeed the seat of the bankruptcy court in the Northern District of Mississippi, that fact has almost no relevance to appellants. If appellants had properly filed their bankruptcy cases in the Northern District of Mississippi (and if this court upholds the district court's decision), bankruptcy court proceedings would not be held in Aberdeen, but rather in Oxford, Mississippi, which is only about 60 miles from appellants' residences.[8] [8] This practice is reflected in the February 1986 Standing Order of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Mississippi, which is attached as Addendum 1 to this Brief and notes that bankruptcy cases originating from DeSoto County (where debtors reside) are scheduled and conducted at Oxford.

Accordingly, the relevant courthouse is only about 60 miles away, half as far as appellants suggest. But even more importantly, appellants need never travel even those 60 miles. Instead, they can prosecute their cases through their counsel, without ever traveling to the court itself (much as they presumably intend to litigate before this much more distant Court). Indeed, many Chapter 7 and 13 debtors do just that. The only proceeding that debtors are required to attend in person is the meeting of creditors. See 11 U.S.C. § 341(d). But that meeting cannot be attended by the bankruptcy judge, see id. § 341(c), and need not occur in court or even near the courthouse. To the contrary, the United States Trustee has designated a number of different locations for such meetings, one of which is the DeSoto Civic Center in Southaven, Mississippi. See http://149.101.1.32/ust/r05/jackson/meetroom.htm. The Jordan Debtor actually resides in the very same town, Supplemental Opinion, R. 18 in No. 04-28437, JA ___ , and the Thompson Debtors live in Olive Branch, Mississippi, Aplt. Br. 10, which is just twelve miles away. In other words, with respect to the only bankruptcy event at which their personal attendance is necessary, the location of the meeting will actually be more convenient for appellants if their cases are handled in the Northern District of Mississippi than if they were to remain in a Tennessee-based court. In sum, there is no inconvenience to appellants, much less sufficient inconvenience to render Congress's decision in this regard "absurd."

At any rate, Congress was fully justified in enacting a statute that establishes bankruptcy venue based on the debtor's residence rather than his or her convenience. Despite appellants' assertion that "state lines are not necessarily drawn in the best interest of the citizens," Aplt. Br. 28, state lines do have important legal significance. They are the basis for the boundaries of the judicial districts, see 28 U.S.C. §§ 81-131, and those districts, in turn, are the boundaries that Congress deemed relevant to venue in bankruptcy cases, see id. § 1408. More importantly, the law governing bankruptcy "requires bankruptcy courts to consult state law in determining the validity of most claims." Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Pacific Gas & Elec., 127 S. Ct. 1199 (March 20, 2007); accord Vanston Bondholders Protective Comm. v. Green, 329 U.S. 156, 161 (1946) ("What claims of creditors are valid and subsisting obligations against the bankrupt at the time a petition in bankruptcy is filed is a question which, in the absence of overruling federal law, is to be determined by reference to state law."). Important issues, such as the exemptions available to a debtor, can turn on the law of the state in which the debtor resides. See 11 U.S.C. § 522(b)(3)(A) (exemptions based on "State or local law . . . at the place in which the debtor's domicile has been located."); In re Spears, 744 F.2d 1225 (6th Cir.

1984) (applying § 522(b)). Because the law of the debtor’s state of residence must frequently be applied in bankruptcy proceedings, it was entirely reasonable for Congress to require that bankruptcy cases be brought within that state, before judges more likely to be familiar with that law, even if (unlike in this particular instance) it meant that the debtors would have to drive a few extra miles to the meeting of creditors. See Rudd Constr. Equip. Co. v. Clark Equip. Co., 735 F.2d 974, 978 (6th Cir. 1984) (“The district judge will normally have a knowledge of that state’s law and will have the resources for ascertaining it.”); Selko v. Home Ins. Co., 139 F.3d 146, 151 (3d Cir. 1998) (noting that federal judges sitting in a state are “familiar with that state’s law”). There is nothing remotely “absurd” about Congress’s judgment in this regard.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the district court should be affirmed.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 157. On December 22, 2003, the bankruptcy court entered a final order limiting the attorney's fees payable to Appellant Marc L. Jordan ("Jordan"). Jordan timely filed a notice of appeal on December 24, 2003, over which the district court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a). The district court entered a final order affirming the bankruptcy court on September 30, 2004. On October 15, 2004, Jordan timely filed a notice of appeal to this Court, which has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion under 11 U.S.C. § 330 by limiting the compensation awarded to Jordan for services performed during the chapter 13 phase of the case.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error, and its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. In re Merry-Go-Round Enter., Inc., --- F.3d ----, 2005 WL 418692 (4th Cir. 2005). An award of attorneys fees is reviewed only for abuse of discretion. In re Wingert, 89 F.2d 305 (4th Cir. 1937).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Nature of the Case and Procedural Background.

This appeal concerns the bankruptcy court's discretion to allow compensation for a chapter 13 debtor's counsel under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4)(A). Jordan filed an application for attorney's fees ("Fee Application"), wherein he sought a total of $6,142.50 for services provided to Daniel Richard Doyon ("Debtor") during the chapter 13 case phase of his case. (A. at 100-126). Both the Debtor's ex-wife, Heidi A. Richardson ("Richardson"), who is the primary creditor in the case, and the United States Trustee[1/] filed objections to the Fee Application. (A. 100 - 125). Following a hearing, the bankruptcy court issued an order limiting Jordan's compensation to $1,000, which amount the Debtor had already paid. (Appendix ("A.") at 35-38). On appeal, the district court affirmed, (A. at 25-33), and this appeal ensued. (A. at 23, Pleading (Pl.) 185).

B. Statement of the Facts

Debtor and Richardson obtained a divorce decree in New York on October 11, 2000. (Supplemental Appendix ("S.A.") at 465 - 462). That decree incorporated a separation agreement that required that the Debtor pay her certain sums. (S.A. at 443 - 457). Debtor failed to those payments and Richardson filed a complaint in Circuit Court for Howard County, Maryland seeking to enforce the terms of the agreement. (S.A. at 460 - 465). Jordan represented the Debtor in the Maryland divorce proceeding, which was resolved by the entry on July 24, 2002, of a Settlement Decree and Consent Judgment (S.A. at 463 - 474), under which the Debtor was required to pay Richardson approximately $120,000. (S.A. at 441).

Following unsuccessful efforts by Richardson to collect any of the amounts owed her under the Settlement Decree and Consent Judgment, and shortly after Richardson garnished several of the Debtor's bank accounts (S.A. at 463), Jordan filed a voluntary petition for relief on behalf of the Debtor under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy on October 16, 2002. (A., Pl. 1). Jordan also filed a Disclosure of Compensation of Attorney for Debtor, as required by 11 U.S.C. § 329(a) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016(b). The disclosure stated that the agreed fee in the chapter 7 case was $1,500, which had been paid pre-petition. (S.A. at 22). George W. Liebmann was appointed as the chapter 7 trustee ("trustee").

On February 11, 2003, Jordan filed a one-page motion to convert the debtor's chapter 7 case to one under chapter 13. (A. at 84). Along with that motion, Jordan filed a new Rule 2016(b) statement, which disclosed that Jordan had agreed to accept $1,950 as a flat fee to represent the Debtor in his chapter 13 case and that he had already been paid $1,000 in advance. (A. 83). The bankruptcy court granted the Debtor's motion and entered an order converting the case to chapter 13 on February 21, 2004. The bankruptcy court entered an order converting the case to chapter 13 on February 21, 2004. (A. 35 - 38). Thereafter, the appointment of George Liebmann as chapter 7 trustee was terminated and Joel Goldberger was appointed to serve as chapter 13 trustee. (A. at 1).

On April 30, 2003, less than three months after disclosing his agreement to handle the Debtor's case for $1,950, Jordan filed an Application of Debtor's Attorney for Allowance of Compensation ("Fee Application") seeking a total of $6,142.50 for the work he provided the Debtor in the Debtor's chapter 13 case. Both Richardson and the United States Trustee objected to the Fee Application. (A. 100 - 125). On June 25, 2003, Jordan filed a supplemental Rule 2016(b) statement, disclosing a fee agreement with the Debtor for the chapter 13 case for $6,142.50. (A. at 14). On June 27, 2003, Jordan filed a motion to withdraw his appearance. (S.A. at 248). As of July 2, 2003, when the bankruptcy court granted the motion to withdraw, no plan had been confirmed and the Debtor had not made any plan payments as required under 11 U.S.C. § 1326. See generally, (A. 5 - 24). The case was reconverted to chapter 7 on Richardson's motion on September 29, 2003, and George W. Liebmann was reappointed to serve as the chapter 7 trustee. (A. at 20, Pl. 152).

Jordan's tenure as counsel to the Debtor was marked by repeated conflict with Richardson (his ex-wife), the chapter 7 trustee and the United States Trustee. See generally, (A. at 5 - 24) (reflecting 178 docket entries from the time the case was filed until the hearing on Jordan's Fee Application). These actions included objecting to the trustee's proposed sale of estate property (A. at 8, Pl. 33); filing a motion to remove the trustee (S.A. at 28 - 35); moving to quash a subpoena issued by the trustee for the Debtor's deposition (S.A. at 66), and; opposing the trustee's motion to extend the deadline for filing objections to discharge and to determine the dischargeability of certain debts (S.A. at 7, Pl. 18). The bankruptcy court ruled against the Debtor on all of those issues.

On February 11, 2003, the same date on which he filed a one-page motion to convert, Jordan also filed motions requesting leave to pursue an interlocutory appeal and for a stay of the bankruptcy court's decision allowing the sale of the personal property. (A. at 19, Pl. 185; S.A. at 91). The Debtor contended that this property included certain books and records that he needed to pursue his chapter 13 case. Following a telephonic hearing on February 25, 2003, the district court denied these motions. (S.A. at 106). The district court held that both motions were moot because, as a result the sale of the estate property, the buyer, Jennifer Thomas (a friend of Richardson), was a good faith purchaser as of January 3, 2003. Id. As a consequence of this sale, the district court held that the chapter 7 estate no longer owned the disputed property when Jordan filed.

Subsequent to conversion, Jordan filed two motions concerning the estate property previously sold by the chapter 7 trustee. The first was a March 5, 2003, motion that requested that the chapter 7 trustee show cause why he should not be held in contempt for failing to turn over that property to the chapter 13 trustee, Joel Goldberger. (S.A. at 108). On April 30, 2003, Jordan filed a motion seeking to compel the chapter 7 trustee, Richardson, and Thomas (buyer of the estate property) to turn over the books and records. (S.A. at 203). Both of these motions were denied, as the court had previously found, the property had been prior to conversion and was no longer in the possession of the chapter 7 trustee. (S.A. at 235 and 245).

In addition to being involved with substantial litigation, Jordan also failed to comply with repeated requests from the United States Trustee's Office and from counsel for Richardson for the Debtor's updated address, information the Debtor was required to provide under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4002(5). (S.A. at 180 - 197). Jordan also failed to file corrected bankruptcy schedules I and E. Id. Despite Jordan's repeated assurances, he did not correct these deficiencies during his tenure as Debtor's counsel.

On December 4, 2003, a hearing was held on the Fee Application. At that hearing, although argument was presented, the Debtor presented no evidence in support of his application, either testimonial or documentary. (A. 63 - 99). By order entered December 19, 2003, the bankruptcy court held that Jordan's compensation should be limited to the $1,000 he had already been paid. (A. at 35 - 39). The bankruptcy court observed that in the Bankruptcy Court for the District of Maryland, chapter 13 attorneys customarily received between $1,000 and $1,500. Id. at 2 - 3. It further reasoned that Jordan was bound by his fee agreement with the Debtor to no more than $1,950. The bankruptcy court concluded, however, that because Jordan withdrew prior to the confirmation hearing on the Debtor's plan, the fee claimed in his Rule 2016(b) disclosure should be reduced to $1,000. (A. at 37). On appeal, the district court affirmed, generally following the reasoning of the bankruptcy court. (A. at 25 - 33).

ARGUMENT

THE RECORD BELOW SUPPORTS THE LIMITATION OF JORDAN'S FEES, NOTWITHSTANDING ERROR BY THE LOWER COURTS

A. The Lower Courts Erred By Applying Incorrect Criteria In Reviewing Jordan's Fees

Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Code governs compensation to attorneys in bankruptcy cases. 11 U.S.C. § 330. It allows bankruptcy courts to award reasonable compensation in such cases only for "actual, necessary services rendered" and "actual, necessary expenses." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1). Section 330(a)(3) sets forth a non-exhaustive list of criteria that a court must consider in determining whether to award such fees.[2/]

[2/] The criteria set forth in section 330(a)(3) include the following:

> (A) the time spent of such services;
>
> (B) the rates charged for such services;
>
> (C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the services were rendered toward completion of, a case under this title;
>
> (D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the problem, issue or task addressed; and
> (E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title.

Under section 330(a)(4)(A),[3/] the compensation of a debtor's attorney in chapter 7 or 11 requires a showing of a benefit to the estate. See In re Reed, 890 F.2d 104, 106 (8th Cir.1989) (this rule is based in part upon the unfairness of allowing a debtor to deplete estate assets by pursuing the interests of the debtor to the detriment of creditors.). Section 330(a)(4)(B)[4/], however, provides a different set of criteria for determining whether fees may be awarded to debtors' counsel in chapter 13 cases. This section allows a bankruptcy court to award compensation to a chapter 13 debtor's counsel "for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case" based on considerations of benefit and

[3/] Section 330(a)(4)(A) provides as follows:

> (A) Except a provided in subparagraph (B), the Court shall not allow compensation for–
>
> (i) unnecessary duplication of services; or
>
> (ii) services that were not–
>
> > (I) reasonable likely to benefit the estate;
> >
> > (II) necessary to the administration of the case.

[4/] Section 330(a)(4)(B) of the Bankruptcy Code provides as follows:

> In a chapter 12 or chapter 13 case in which the debtor is an individual, the court may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorneys, for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section.

necessity of such services to the debtor, and other factors set forth in that section. See Lamie v. United States Trustee, 124 S.Ct. 1023, 1031 (2004) (noting in dicta that debtor's counsel may be paid by the estate under § 330(a)(4)(B)).

The bankruptcy court reviewed the criteria set forth in both sections 330(a)(4)(A) and 330(a)(4)(B). In performing that analysis, however, it focused only on the criteria contained in 330(a)(4)(A), which required consideration of the benefit to the debtor's estate and the necessity of those services for the administration of the case. The bankruptcy court reduced Jordan's fees, in part, because it determined that generally his services did not benefit and were not necessary to the administration of the debtor's estate. (A. 36 - 38). The district court did not identify which statutory criteria it applied, but affirmed the bankruptcy court's holding concerning the benefit of Jordan's services to the estate. (A. at 32).

To the extent that the lower courts' rulings considered the benefit to the estate of Jordan's services, their decisions were in error. Section 330(a)(4)(A) provides that the courts should consider whether the services benefitted the debtor's estate or were necessary to the administration of the estate. However, the first clause of that section contains a proviso that prohibits courts from denying fees to chapter 13 attorneys on those grounds. 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4)(A) ("Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the court shall not allow compensation for -- "

Thus, it was error for the lower courts to reduce fees based upon the fact that Jordan's services did not benefit the debtor's estate.

B. The Bankruptcy Court's Conclusion That Jordan Was Bound To The Maximum Amount Of Fees Agreed To Under The Fee Agreement Was Error

The bankruptcy court also reduced Jordan's chapter 13 fee request because it determined that he had made no showing that he was entitled to the $6,142.50 in fees sought. In performing its analysis, the bankruptcy court also relied, in-part, on the fact that Jordan had agreed to a maximum fee of $1,950 for the chapter 13 case. The bankruptcy court held that Jordan was bound by the agreement and that he had made no showing justifying a departure from the agreement. (A. 37 - 38).

Before the lower courts, in its objection to the fee application and in the joint Appellee's Brief in the District Court (A. 56), the United States Trustee and Co-Appellees argued that Jordan's fee should be limited to that provided by the fee agreement. Upon further reflection, the United States Trustee believes that the propriety of fees must be determined by applying the criteria Congress specified in section 330(a)(4)(B). Even when a debtor agrees to pay an attorney a specific fee, that agreement is not binding on the court, which instead must determine fees by applying criteria set forth in section 330(a)(4)(B). Certainly, the amount counsel anticipated his services might be worth may have evidentiary weight in determining what fee is appropriate. But, as here, a simple agreement, without supporting testimony why that fee is appropriate, would seem to have little evidentiary weight in determining what fee is appropriate under section 330(a)(4)(B).

The Bankruptcy Code does not allow parties, merely by contracting for professional services, to override bankruptcy courts' federal statutory responsibility for determining the "value" of professional services and the amount of compensation that would be "reasonable" pursuant to section 330. Because bankruptcy professionals under section 330 are paid from assets of the estate, 11 U.S.C. § 503(b)(3), bankruptcy courts have a critical "independent duty" to ensure that such fees are reasonable based on a totality of circumstances. In re Busy Beaver Building Centers, 19 F.3d 833, 840 (3d. Cir. 1994) (Bankruptcy court has power and duty to review fee applications, notwithstanding absence of objection by United States Trustee, creditors, or other interested party). Consequently, to the extent that the private parties' pre-petition fee agreements may have been deemed controlling, a defense of this appeal on that ground would be inconsistent with section 330(a)(4)(B).[5/]

Although the bankruptcy court incorrectly considered the benefit of Jordan's services to the estate and $1,950 fee agreement with the Debtor, those errors were harmless. As discussed below, the other factors the courts identified, and the record before the court support the bankruptcy court's exercise of its discretion in awarding $1,000 in fees in this case.

C. The Record Below Justifies Affirming the Decision of the District Court

The limitation by the lower courts of the compensation sought by Jordan to $1,000 should be affirmed as a reasonable exercise of the bankruptcy court's discretion. In this regard, two factors are critical. The first is that under the Bankruptcy Code, applicants for professional fees have long borne the evidentiary burden of proving that their requested fees are reasonable. See, e.g., Zolfo, Cooper & Co. v. Sunbeam-Oster Co., 50 F.3d 253, 261 (3d Cir. 1995); In re Kenneth Leventhal & Co., 19 F.3d 1174, 1177 (7th Cir. 1994). The second is the broad discretion afforded bankruptcy courts in determining fees. In scrutinizing the factual and discretionary determinations "involved in calculating . . . fee awards," appellate courts give "considerable deference to the bankruptcy court. Historically, bankruptcy courts have been accorded wide discretion . . . in regard to the terms and conditions of the engagement of professionals." In re Miniscribe Corp., 309 F.3d 1234, 1244 (10th Cir. 2002). "The bankruptcy judge is on the front line, in the best position to gauge the ongoing interplay of factors and to make the delicate judgment calls which such a decision entails." Id.

With respect to Jordan's burden of proof, it is significant that at the hearing on his fee application he presented no testimony, nor any documentary evidence whatsoever. (A. at 63 - 99). Consequently, Jordan's Fee Application constitutes his entire proffer on his entitlement to fees and that proffer is woefully insufficient. Throughout the Fee Application, Jordan offers no concrete details supporting his claim for compensation. (A. at 142 -152). Instead, he only avers that his application satisfies various statutory and case law criteria. For example, he stated that he "believes" that his services were necessary and beneficial. (A. at 145 (Fee Application at 4, ¶ 10(iii)). He did not, however, present any evidence or refer to any information in the record to support this claim. Similarly, in Jordan's discussion of the degree of skill required to provide legal services, he states only that this case required "services of capable counsel." (A. 147 (Fee Application at 6, ¶ 12(iii)). Again, however, Jordan did not offer any evidence concerning how capable his services were. A review of his discussion of other criteria in his application and his failure to present any evidence either in his Fee Application or at the hearing confirms that Jordan failed to carry his evidentiary burden of establishing that a reasonable fee under section 330(a)(4)(B) was $6,142.50.[6/]

[6/] Concerning the inadequacies of Jordan's Fee Application, the United States Trustee agrees with that portion of co-appellee's brief (at 20 - 25) that addresses the relevant enumerated factors that this Court set forth in Barber v. Kimbrell's, Inc. 577 F.2d 216 (4th Cir. 1978), relating to the reasonableness of attorneys' fees.

Given Jordan's failure to meet his burden of proof, the bankruptcy court could have denied the fee request as not adequately proven. Instead, the court exercised its power under section 330(a)(4)(B) to determine what an appropriate fee might be. See 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B) (with respect to debtor's counsel in a chapter 13 case "the court may allow reasonable compensation . . . "). Based on its review, the bankruptcy court awarded Jordan $1,000. Under the facts of this case, that award was adequate and was not an abuse of discretion.

In determining what compensation would be appropriate, the bankruptcy court held that counsel in chapter 13 cases, in the District of Maryland, typically receive $1,000 to $1,500 in fees for representing chapter 13 debtors. (A. at 36 - 37). The bankruptcy court further noted that Jordan had resigned as counsel before a plan confirmation hearing was held. Id. Given that Jordan performed fewer services than counsel typically do, it was an appropriate exercise of discretion for the bankruptcy court to reduce Jordan's fees in this case to something less than that typically awarded to chapter 13 counsel who represent their clients through the entire chapter 13 process. Cf. In re Kindhart, 167 F.3d 1158, 1160 (7th Cir. 1999) ($1,000 chapter 13 attorney's fee that obviates the need for individualized fee review in chapter 13, where district-wide fee level is fair and reasonable).

Although the bankruptcy court and the district court incorrectly focused on the benefit to the estate of Jordan's services, the district court did consider the benefit to the Debtor of Jordan's services. (A. at 32). A review of the record supports the district court's conclusion that generally the services provided by Jordan to the Debtor did not satisfy the criteria of "representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case." 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(4)(B). Although the Bankruptcy Code does not define the term "in connection with the bankruptcy case," the United States Trustee contends it is best understood as allowing services that moves the debtor's case forward. Debtors file chapter 13 cases so they can liquidate their debts through a chapter 13 repayment plan. 11 U.S.C. §§ 1301, et. seq. As a leading legal treatise on bankruptcy has observed, actions that are not necessary for completion of the plan should be seen as falling outside the ambit of compensable services under section 330(a)(4)(B). Collier on Bankruptcy, (15th Ed.) ¶ 330.04[1][b] ("services that benefit the debtor in connection with the case are services that facilitate the successful completion of the plan.").

Such non-compensable services include time for preparing his Fee Application (1.2 hours). (A. at 151). In re Copeland, 154 B.R. 693 (Bankr. W.D. Mich. 1993) (chapter 13 debtor's counsel not entitled to compensation for preparing attorneys fees, because work benefits counsel, not debtor). Jordan also requests compensation for time (7.8 hours) which, based on the facts set forth in Co-Appellees' Brief (at 28 - 30), did not benefit the Debtor in confirming or performing his plan. Further, Jordan sought compensation for time (at least 7.9 hours)[7] related to preparing and filing a one-page motion to convert the Debtor's case from chapter 7 to chapter 13, and related form documents. (A. at 151). By any standard, this amount of time is excessive.

Jordan also seeks compensation for time (5.2 hours) preparing for and attending a first meeting of creditors pursuant to section 341 of the Bankruptcy Code. Although the parties dispute why that meeting required four hours to complete, Jordan did not satisfy his burden of proving that his conduct and that of the Debtor in any way promoted the confirmation or completion of the Debtor's plan.

In sum, for the reasons set forth above and for the additional reasons set forth in the Argument portion of the Co-Appellees' Brief, section B.2, (at 31 - 34) B.3 (at 32 - 36) and B.5 (at 36 - 37), the lower courts did not abuse their discretion in limiting Jordan's fees.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that this Court affirm the decision of the district court limiting Jordan's fees to $1,000.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED ON APPEAL

> 1. Whether the bankruptcy court erred in concluding that Perkins Coie LLP failed to comply with the disclosure requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 327 and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014, where Perkins disclosed that it represented Wells Fargo Bank, the debtor's primary pre-petition secured creditor and post-petition lender, in unrelated matters, and that it received oral conflicts waivers from Wells Fargo and the debtor and was in the process of obtaining written waivers, but Perkins did not disclose the limited nature of the waivers, under which it agreed not to represent the debtor in litigation directly adverse to Wells Fargo.
>
> 2. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in disqualifying Perkins as counsel for the debtor, vacating the court's order of employment, and requiring disgorgement of Perkins' fees and costs, where Perkins had failed to disclose an unwaived, actual, and material conflict with the debtor's largest creditor, while repeatedly representing that it had disclosed all issues and potential conflicts of interest.

STATEMENT OF APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

The bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error and its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo. The court's decision about the proper amount of legal fees to be awarded is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. In re Lewis, 113 F.3d 1040, 1043 (9th Cir. 1997); *Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. STATEMENT OF THE CASE[1]

This is an appeal from an order entered by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Montana ("Bankruptcy Court") on July 28, 2003, disqualifying Perkins Coie LLP ("Perkins") as counsel for the Debtor, Jore Corporation ("Debtor"), vacating the Bankruptcy Court's order approving Perkins' employment, and requiring disgorgement of Perkins' fees and costs.

On May 22, 2001, the Debtor filed a voluntary bankruptcy petition under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code (Title 11 U.S.C.). The chapter 11 case was filed as a result of the Debtor's inability to restructure its financing with its primary secured lender, Wells Fargo Bank ("Wells Fargo"). After the filing of the petition, Wells Fargo agreed to provide critical postpetition debtor-in-possession ("DIP") financing to the Debtor to fund its reorganization efforts.

Both before and after the filing of the bankruptcy case, Perkins represented Wells Fargo in a number of unrelated legal matters. In connection with its application for employment, Perkins disclosed to the Bankruptcy Court that it currently represented Wells Fargo in unrelated matters, that it had received oral conflicts waivers from both Wells Fargo and the Debtor, and that it was in the process of obtaining written waivers from both parties. However, Perkins failed to disclose to the Bankruptcy Court, the United States Trustee ("UST"),[2] and other parties in interest the limited nature of the written conflict waivers, under which Perkins had agreed not to represent the Debtor "in litigation directly adverse to Wells Fargo," as well as "in any matter involving the assertion against Wells [Fargo] of a claim of fraud, misrepresentation, or dishonest conduct." ER, Ex. 1. Perkins also failed to disclose the existence of a limited conflicts waiver from another secured creditor and current Perkins client, General Electric Capital Corporation ("GECC"), which contained similar language precluding Perkins from asserting fraud claims against GECC on behalf of the Debtor. ER, Ex. 9.

Approximately a year after the bankruptcy case was filed, a dispute between Wells Fargo and the Debtor resulted in the Debtor's decision to bring litigation to assert claims against Wells Fargo arising from its alleged failure to comply with the "carve-out" provisions of the DIP financing order and for surcharge of Wells Fargo's collateral under 11 U.S.C. § 506(c). After Perkins advised Wells Fargo of its intent to assert such claims against Wells Fargo on behalf of the Debtor, counsel for Wells Fargo objected because Perkins had agreed not to represent the Debtor in litigation directly adverse to Wells Fargo pursuant to the terms of the written conflicts waiver between Wells Fargo and Perkins. ER, Ex. A, at 19-22, Ex. 2-7. Ultimately, Perkins was compelled to bring the limited conflicts waiver to the Bankruptcy Court's attention, and the Debtor retained other counsel to represent it in such litigation against Wells Fargo. ER, Ex. A, at 22-23; SER 6-7.

On September 5, 2002, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order converting the chapter 11 case to chapter 7, and a chapter 7 trustee was appointed. ER, Ex. A, at 24.

On March 5, 2003, the UST filed a motion to disqualify Perkins as counsel for the debtor, vacate the Bankruptcy Court's order employing Perkins, and require disgorgement of Perkins' fees and costs ("Motion"), as a result of Perkins' failure to disclose the terms of the limited conflicts waiver from Wells Fargo, as well as Perkins' failure to disclose the existence of the limited conflicts waiver requested from GECC. ER, Ex. A, at 25.

On May 8 and 9, 2003, the Bankruptcy Court conducted a two-day bench trial on the UST's Motion. On July 28, 2003, the Court entered an order and judgment granting the Motion. The court concluded, inter alia, that the terms of the limited conflicts waiver from Wells Fargo and the unwaived, actual conflict between Perkins and Wells Fargo were material and that Perkins' failure to disclose these matters was sanctionable, even if such failure were only negligent or inadvertent, as Perkins contended. As a sanction for Perkins' failure to disclose, the Bankruptcy Court disqualified Perkins as counsel for the debtor, vacated its order of employment, and ordered the disgorgement of all fees and all but $59,234 of the costs received by Perkins. ER, Ex. A.

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

I. Perkins' Employment and Related Disclosures

After it became apparent that the Debtor would not be able to restructure its financing with Wells Fargo outside of bankruptcy, at Wells Fargo's urging, the Debtor hired a turnaround professional, Clyde Hamstreet, to oversee the bankruptcy and restructuring and to find a buyer for the Debtor's assets. In turn, Mr. Hamstreet recommended that Perkins be retained as bankruptcy counsel for the Debtor. ER, Ex. A, at 3-4. Both before and after the filing of the bankruptcy case, Perkins had represented Wells Fargo in a number of unrelated matters, amounting to gross revenues to Perkins of $640,000 in 2000, $656,000 in 2001, and $278,000 in the first six months of 2002. The attorney-client relationship between Wells Fargo and Perkins dated back at least 20 years prior to the filing of the bankruptcy case. ER, Ex. 8, at 2-3.

On May 22, 2001, the date of filing of the bankruptcy case, the Debtor filed an ex parte application to employ Perkins as attorneys for the debtor, together with an Affidavit of Bruce G. MacIntyre, dated May 20, 2001. ER, Ex. 18. Exhibit 18 stated that Perkins had "undertaken an investigation of any connections that may exist between Perkins Coie and the Debtor, the creditors of the Debtor or any other party in interest ..." and that "to the best of [Mr. MacIntyre's] knowledge, [Mr. MacIntyre] and Perkins Coie have no such connections and are 'disinterested persons' as defined in 11 U.S.C. § 101(14), except as stated in this Affidavit."[3] ER, Ex. 18, at 2. Exhibit 18 disclosed that Perkins currently represented Wells Fargo in matters unrelated to the Debtor, and it also included a list of the Debtor's creditors who were current or former clients of Perkins, including Wells Fargo and GECC. ER, Ex. 18, at 3. Exhibit 18 indicated that "Perkins Coie continues to review its connections with shareholders, creditors, potential creditors, and parties in interest in this Chapter 11 case" and that Perkins "will notify the Court if any actual conflicts of interest or other significant connections are discovered in this process." It further provided as follows:

> I know of no reason that would impair Perkins Coie's ability to represent the Debtor zealously and effectively in this case. The Debtor has agreed that in the event Perkins Coie has an actual unwaived conflict of interest with any party adverse to the Debtor herein, Perkins Coie will not represent either the Debtor or the adverse party for such matters. If an actual conflict of interest arises herein, Debtor will (i) request Perkins to obtain the necessary and appropriate waivers; (ii) apply to employ special counsel to the Debtor if required by the nature of such matters; or (iii) use Jore's local counsel, Harold V. Dye or Jore's in-house counsel, David Bjornson, to represent Debtor in those matters.

ER, Ex. 18, at 4.

[3] Exhibit 18 and subsequent disclosures were filed pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a), which requires applications for employment of professional persons under 11 U.S.C. § 327 to be accompanied by a verified statement setting forth all of the professional person's connections with the debtor, creditors, or other parties in interest.

On May 23, 2001, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order approving Perkins' employment on an interim basis and setting a final hearing on Perkins' employment application for June 7, 2001. On June 6, 2001, Perkins filed a Supplemental Declaration of Bruce G. MacIntyre, dated June 4, 2001. ER, Ex. 19. Exhibit 19 disclosed that due to the role of Wells Fargo as primary prepetition and postpetition DIP lender, Perkins "has received oral waivers from both Wells Fargo and Jore and is in the process of obtaining written waivers from both parties." ER, Ex. 19, at 2. Exhibit 19 also included a list of additional creditors and parties in interest who were current or former clients of Perkins. Exhibit 19 provided that "[t]his Declaration discloses all issues and potential conflicts of interest that have been identified at the present time ... Perkins Coie will notify the Court if any actual conflicts of interest or other significant connections are discovered ..." ER, Ex. 19, at 5. Exhibit 19 further provided as follows:

> I do not believe that anything in the matters disclosed above, or in the May 20 MacIntyre Affidavit should disqualify Perkins Coie from vigorous and unfettered representation of the interests of Jore in connection with this case. The Debtor has agreed that in the event Perkins Coie has an actual unwaived direct conflict of interest with any party adverse to the Debtor herein or if an actual direct conflict of interest arises herein, Perkins Coie will obtain waivers as may be required by the applicable rules of professional conduct or that the matter will be handled by either Jore's in-house counsel or its local counsel, Harold V. Dye.

ER, Ex. 19, at 5.

On June 28, 2001, the Bankruptcy Court entered a final order approving the employment of Perkins as attorneys for the debtor. ER, Ex. A, at 11. On August 15, 2001, Perkins filed a second Supplemental Declaration of Bruce G. MacIntyre, dated August 14, 2001, disclosing a connection with Northwest Capital Appreciation, Inc. ("NCA"), a potential purchaser of the debtor's business assets, whose affiliates were current clients of Perkins in unrelated matters. ER, Ex. 20. Exhibit 20 provided that "Perkins Coie has verbally received the informed consent of both the Debtor and NCA to continue the simultaneous representation of both entities, and is in the process of securing written confirmation of this informed consent." ER, Ex. 20, at 2. Exhibit 20 also indicated that "[t]his Declaration discloses all additional issues and potential conflicts of interest that have been identified at the present time ... Perkins Coie will notify the Court if any actual conflicts of interest or other significant connections are discovered ..." ER, Ex. 20, at 2-3.

II. Conflicts Waivers

On June 4, 2001, Perkins partner, Alan D. Smith, sent a letter to Scott L. Manookin, vice president of Wells Fargo, regarding "Simultaneous Representation of Wells Fargo Bank and Jore Corporation," which set forth the terms of the conflicts waiver between Perkins and Wells Fargo. ER, Ex. 1. In Exhibit 1, Mr. Smith stated that Perkins "has received the informed consent of Wells Fargo ... to undertake the representation of Jore Corporation ... on a matter in which the interests of Jore and Wells [Fargo] are adverse, while continuing our representation of Wells [Fargo] on unrelated matters." Mr. Smith further admitted that "[c]ertain aspects of the Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings are adverse to Wells [Fargo], including without limitation the fact that Wells [Fargo] is Jore's principal lender." As set forth in Exhibit 1, Mr. Smith affirmatively agreed that Perkins "will not represent Jore in litigation directly adverse to Wells [Fargo], or in any matter involving the assertion against Wells [Fargo] of a claim of fraud, misrepresentation, or dishonest conduct ..." [Emphasis added.] Mr. Smith further acknowledged that "the Firm's representation of Jore on a matter adverse to Wells [Fargo], and simultaneous representation of Wells [Fargo] on unrelated matters creates a conflict of interest." [Emphasis added.] Mr. Manookin signed Exhibit 1 on behalf of Wells Fargo, consenting to Perkins' simultaneous representation of the Debtor and Wells Fargo. ER, Ex. 1.

On June 4, 2001, Mr. Smith sent to GECC a similar conflicts waiver letter, which contained a limitation precluding Perkins from asserting fraud claims against GECC on behalf of the Debtor, but unlike the Wells Fargo conflicts waiver, did not contain a "no litigation" exception. ER, Ex. 9. On that same date, Mr. Smith also sent to the Debtor a letter requesting the Debtor to waive any conflicts between Perkins and both Wells Fargo and GECC. ER, Ex. 10. Exhibit 10 pointed out the differences in the limitations contained in the conflicts waivers from Wells Fargo and GECC. The Debtor's president and CEO, Gerald McConnell, signed Exhibit 10, consenting to the conflicts on behalf of the Debtor. ER, Ex. 10.

Although Perkins disclosed that it had received oral waivers from both Wells Fargo and the Debtor and was in the process of obtaining written waivers from both parties, Perkins failed to disclose the limitations contained in the written conflicts waiver, including the "no litigation" clause, for more than one year after it became aware of such limitations. ER, Ex. A, at 10, 20, 22. Perkins also failed to disclose the existence of the GECC conflicts waiver. ER, Ex. A, at 20. Although Perkins currently or formerly represented a substantial number of the Debtor's secured and unsecured creditors, Perkins did not obtain a conflicts waiver from any other creditor or party in interest in this case, except for a conflicts waiver letter dated August 7, 2001, regarding NCA. ER, Ex. 12.

III. DIP Financing and the Actual Conflict Between Perkins and Wells Fargo

At the outset of the chapter 11 case, the Debtor and Wells Fargo entered into a stipulation providing for interim postpetition DIP financing pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 364, as well as for interim use of Wells Fargo's cash collateral pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(c). In addition, the stipulation provided for senior liens and "super-priority" administrative expense claims in favor of Wells Fargo with an exception for a "professional fee carve-out" ("carve-out") for professionals of the Debtor, any trustee, or official creditors' committee not to exceed a total of $585,000. The stipulation also provided for the Debtor's waiver of any surcharge claims against Wells Fargo under 11 U.S.C. § 506(c), and for the Debtor's waiver of any defenses, claims, or counterclaims against Wells Fargo with respect to the validity of Wells Fargo's prepetition secured claim against the Debtor. ER, Ex. A, at 13. The Court entered an interim DIP financing order approving this stipulation on May 23, 2001, and a final DIP financing order on June 29, 2001. In addition to the terms contained in the interim DIP financing order, the final DIP financing order also provided that the unsecured creditors' committee would have the right to examine any claims the estate may have against Wells Fargo, notwithstanding the Debtor's waiver of such claims, and required the Debtor to propose a plan to which Wells Fargo would not object. ER, Ex. A, at 14.

Throughout the Debtor's chapter 11 proceedings, the availability of DIP financing from Wells Fargo was critical to the Debtor's survival and ability to reorganize, and it was a central issue in the case. ER, Ex. A, at 12. In December 2001, after purchase offers from NCA and another potential buyer, Pentair, had fallen through, an actual conflict arose when Wells Fargo strongly opposed the Debtor's motion to extend the DIP financing order and alternative emergency motion for use of Wells Fargo's cash collateral. Despite Perkins' agreement in Exhibit 1 that it would not represent the Debtor in litigation directly adverse to Wells Fargo, Mr. MacIntyre appeared at the contested hearing on December 19, 2001, on behalf of the Debtor. Wells Fargo did not raise the issue of the "no litigation" exception at the time. The Bankruptcy Court granted the Debtor's emergency motion to use cash collateral, overruling Wells Fargo's objection. Wells Fargo appealed and filed a motion to modify the automatic stay pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 362(d) to foreclose on its secured claims, but the motion was settled. ER, Ex. A, at 15-16.

In April 2002, the Bankruptcy Court approved a sale of the Debtor's assets for approximately $32.9 million, which was insufficient to pay secured claims in full or to pay any administrative claims for professional fees. ER, Ex. A, at 18. At that time, a further actual conflict arose between Perkins and Wells Fargo regarding whether the $585,000 carve-out under the DIP financing order for professional fees (including those of Perkins and Mr. Hamstreet) applied to fees previously paid (but not approved by the Bankruptcy Court), and whether the Debtor's waiver of § 506(c) surcharge claims remained binding. ER, Ex. A, at 19-22, Ex. 2-7. On May 2, 2002, Mr. Smith sent to counsel for Wells Fargo a letter advising that Perkins intended to bring litigation asserting these claims against Wells Fargo. Mr. Smith requested that Wells Fargo either confirm that this litigation was covered under the June 4, 2001 conflicts waiver or consent to a further waiver. ER, Ex. 2. By letter dated May 9, 2001, and subsequent letters, counsel for Wells Fargo objected, responding that Perkins had agreed not to sue Wells Fargo on behalf of the Debtor pursuant to the June 4, 2001 conflicts waiver, and indicating Wells Fargo's refusal to consent to a further waiver. ER, Ex. 3, 5, 7.

On June 14, 2002, Perkins filed with the Bankruptcy Court a status report disclosing for the first time that Perkins had a dispute with Wells Fargo regarding the meaning of the "no litigation" exception. ER, Ex. A, at 22; SER 6-7. As a result of Wells Fargo's refusal to consent to a further conflicts waiver, the Debtor filed an application to authorize the Debtor's local counsel, Harold V. Dye, to represent the Debtor in the proposed litigation against Wells Fargo on the condition that Perkins and Mr. Hamstreet's firm be authorized to indemnify Mr. Dye's firm for fees and costs up to $50,000. SER 11-14. The UST objected. ER, Ex. A, at 22-23; SER 15-20.

IV. Perkins' Trial Testimony Regarding Conflicts Waivers and Disclosures

Alan D. Smith, when asked why Perkins did not disclose the "no litigation exception" in the Wells Fargo conflicts waiver letter, testified that he did not remember thinking about whether it should be disclosed and that it did not appear to him to be an important issue at the time. He further stated that he thought the "no litigation" exception was not significant because the debtor had waived any claims against Wells Fargo as part of the DIP financing order. ER, Ex. D, at 21-22, 27-28.

Mr. Smith testified that such waivers of claims in DIP financing order are "universal," despite the fact that they were generally prohibited in the Western District of Washington, where Mr. Smith's primary law practice is located, at the time of the filing of this case, and were still prohibited at the time of his testimony. ER, Ex. D, at 13-14, Ex. 15, ¶ A.7. In any event, Mr. Smith conceded that the waiver of claims applied only to prepetition claims and not to postpetition claims, including any litigation arising in connection with the DIP financing order and § 506(c) claims. ER, Ex. D, at 102-103.

Mr. Smith acknowledged that Perkins decided it was appropriate to disclose the existence (but not the limitations) of the Wells Fargo waiver. ER, Ex. D, at 103-105. Mr. Smith stated that he was not positive it was necessary to disclose the existence of a waiver with a particular client because of Perkins' "fall-back position" of seeking a further waiver or utilizing back-up counsel in the event of an unwaived conflict. ER, Ex. D, at 104-105. However, confirming his earlier deposition testimony, Mr. Smith conceded that the Court or any other person reading Perkins' disclosures would have no way of knowing that the Wells Fargo conflicts waiver was anything less than a full and total waiver without asking Perkins. ER, Ex. D, at 80-83.

Mr. Smith admitted that he did not negotiate the language of the conflicts waiver with Wells Fargo and had no knowledge of such negotiations. ER, Ex. D, at 78-79. Mr. Smith testified that a dispute arose between Perkins and Wells Fargo in April 2002 regarding the scope or meaning of the litigation exclusion in the June 4, 2001 conflicts waiver letter. Despite the unequivocal language in the waiver letter, he asserted that there is a "gray area" with respect to the meaning of "litigation" that was to be excluded from the waiver, in the context of a bankruptcy case. ER, Ex. D, at 31-32. However, on cross-examination, Mr. Smith himself conceded that the cash collateral motion contested by Wells Fargo was "litigation directly adverse to Wells Fargo." ER, Ex. D. at 93. Mr. Smith also admitted that although Wells Fargo did not raise the issue of the limited waiver at the time, it had no obligation or duty, ethical or otherwise, to challenge whether or not Perkins could bring an action under the waiver. ER, Ex. D, at 93-94, 95-96, 98-99.

Bruce G. MacIntyre, the Perkins partner who prepared and filed the three disclosures in connection with Perkins' employment application, admitted that he did not disclose the terms of the limited conflicts waiver from Wells Fargo (prior to the June 14, 2002 status report), even though he had previously disclosed that Perkins had received an oral waiver from Wells Fargo and was in the process of obtaining a written waiver. ER, Ex. E, at 54-55, 59. He testified that he believed that the limitations contained in the Wells Fargo conflicts waiver letter were not significant and did not need to be disclosed because it was just "standard" language, the Debtor had already waived any claims against Wells Fargo in connection with the interim DIP financing order, and Perkins had already reviewed Wells Fargo's security interest and concluded that it was perfected. ER, Ex. E, at 28-29.

Mr. MacIntyre testified that he did not disclose the existence of the GECC waiver because he did not believe GECC was any longer a significant player after it became apparent by June 2001 that GECC was not going to be a DIP lender or take-out lender. ER, Ex. E, at 29-31. Mr. MacIntyre later stated that he had no recollection as to why Perkins did not disclose the GECC waiver. ER, Ex. E, at 42.

V. Expert Testimony at Trial

Peter R. Jarvis testified as an expert witness on behalf of the UST in the area of attorney professional responsibility in general. The parties stipulated on the record to Mr. Jarvis' expertise.[4] ER, Ex. F, at 7. Mr. Jarvis testified that although written conflicts waivers are not required under Montana RPC 1.7,[5] conflicts waiver letters such as those used in this case are a regular part of the practice in large law firms such as Perkins. ER, Ex. F, at 20, 25-26. Mr. Jarvis explained that a conflicts waiver letter is a stipulated exception to the duty of undivided loyalty that lawyers have toward their clients, and it is important that the letter clearly define the scope of the lawyer's representation of the client with respect to a specific matter or matters and delineate what is or is not included within that exception. ER, Ex. F, at 28. Mr. Jarvis opined that the limitations contained in the Wells Fargo and GECC conflicts waiver letters were material terms of those conflicts waivers, [4] Mr. Jarvis is the President-Elect of the Association of Professional Responsibility Lawyers, and he has devoted a significant portion of his law practice for the past 20 years to legal ethics issues, primarily in the Pacific Northwest. Mr. Jarvis has lectured extensively on professional responsibility issues and has published numerous law review articles and other writings on conflicts of interest, conflicts waivers, honesty and candor issues, and other ethics issues. ER, Ex. F, at 5-7; SER 25-27, 31-49.

[5] Montana RPC 1.7 provides in pertinent part as follows:

> (a) A lawyer shall not represent a client if the representation of that client will be directly adverse to another client, unless:
>
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes the representation will not adversely affect the relationship with the other client; and
>
> (2) each client consents after consultation.
>
> (b) A lawyer shall not represent a client if the representation of that client may be materially limited by the lawyer's responsibility to another client or to a third person, or by the lawyer's own interests, unless:
>
> (1) the lawyer reasonably believes the representation will not be adversely affected; and

and that Perkins' statements made in Exhibits 18, 19, and 20 fell short of Perkins' professional responsibilities of honesty and candor under the applicable rules of professional conduct, including Montana RPC 4.1 and 8.4(c). ER, Ex. F, at 18-27, 36-42, 53-54.

In response to Mr. Smith's opinion that the meaning of the "no litigation" exception in the Wells Fargo waiver letter was unclear, Mr. Jarvis testified that conflicts waiver letters are generally construed against the lawyer, and not against the client to whom the lawyer owes a fiduciary duty. Mr. Jarvis further stated that the extent to which the language of the exception was unclear made it more important for Perkins to disclose the exception at the outset so that the Bankruptcy Court could timely address and resolve these issues. ER, Ex. F, at 43-45. Mr. Jarvis further indicated that the client is not required to act in a reasonable or rational manner in consenting or withholding consent to a conflicts waiver, and that the client is free to withhold consent to a waiver and still enjoy the attorney's duty of absolute loyalty. ER, Ex. F, at 43.

Perkins' professional responsibility expert, David Boerner, admitted that he had no expertise in bankruptcy. ER, Ex. J, at 45-46. Mr. Boerner opined that the "no litigation" exception in the Wells Fargo waiver was not material, that Perkins had no ethical obligation to disclose that limitation to the Bankruptcy Court or other interested parties, and that Perkins' disclosures to the Court were adequate. ER, Ex. J, at 36-38. Mr. Boerner based his opinion on the opinions of Perkins' bankruptcy experts, Jerome Shulkin and Harold V. Dye, but he did not examine any of the bankruptcy case law cited by the UST or Perkins. ER, Ex. J, at 32, 34-35, 56-57. Mr. Boerner agreed with Mr. Jarvis' opinion that Wells Fargo had the right to decide whether or not to invoke the "no litigation" exception to the conflicts waiver, and that Wells Fargo did not have to be reasonable or have reasons whether to waive or not. ER, Ex. J, at 65. On cross-examination, Mr.

Boerner agreed that vague or unambiguous terms in conflicts waivers are construed against the lawyer. ER, Ex. J, at 62.

Joel E. Guthals, an experienced Montana bankruptcy attorney employed by the Chapter 7 trustee, testified on behalf of the UST as an expert regarding the standards for employment of professional persons in Montana bankruptcy cases. Mr. Guthals testified that if he were requesting court approval to be employed as counsel for a debtor in possession in a case in which he had received a conditional or limited conflicts waiver from another client, he would be obligated to disclose to the court the terms of the conditional waiver in detail. ER, Ex. G, at 16. Mr. Guthals further testified that if the other client were the DIP lender in the case and that client had agreed to a limited waiver with a litigation exclusion, he would have a difficult time determining that he was disinterested, even if he had an agreement that another attorney would represent the debtor with respect to any matter in which an unwaived conflict may arise. Mr. Guthals testified that if he were in that situation, he would fully disclose the conflicts waiver so that the Court could determine his eligibility for employment, knowing that his employment may not be approved under such circumstances, and he acknowledged his continuing duty to disclose any subsequent developments concerning the conflicts waiver. ER, Ex. G, at 18-21.

Jerome Shulkin, counsel for the unsecured creditors' committee, and Harold V. Dye, local counsel for the Debtor, testified on behalf of Perkins as experts on the standard of disclosure required under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014 in Montana bankruptcy cases.[6] Mr. Shulkin testified that the Wells Fargo limited conflicts waiver was not a significant deterrent to Perkins' ability to act as counsel for the debtor. ER, Ex. I, at 8. Mr. Shulkin also testified that Perkins' disclosures relative to Wells Fargo and other creditors were consistent with bankruptcy practice in Montana. ER, Ex. I, at 20-21. Mr. Dye stated his opinion that Perkins' disclosures satisfied the applicable standard and that the UST was advocating a more stringent standard. ER, Ex. H, at 10-11, 17.

The Bankruptcy Court ruled that the issue before the Court was whether Perkins failed to comply with its duty of disclosure under Rule 2014(a), and not whether Perkins' disclosures complied with its obligations under the rules of professional responsibility, which was primarily a matter between Perkins and Wells Fargo. Thus, it was not necessary for the Bankruptcy Court to decide between the opinions of Mr. Jarvis and Mr. Boerner regarding whether Perkins violated its duty under those rules. ER, Ex. A, at 32.

In addition, the Bankruptcy Court properly ruled that the Court decides the legal requirements for disclosure under Rule 2014, not the parties' expert witnesses. Accordingly, the Bankruptcy Court acted fully within its discretion as the trier of fact to give little probative weight to the expert testimony of Messrs. Shulkin and Dye regarding the Court's requirements for disclosure under Rule 2014 because that was a matter for the Court to decide. Because Mr. Boerner relied on Messrs. Shulkin's and Dye's opinions in forming his own opinion, the Bankruptcy Court similarly ruled that his opinion carried the same lack of probative weight. ER, Ex. A, at 44. The Court also appropriately found that Mr. Guthals' expert testimony came much closer to describing the applicable legal standard requiring continuing, complete disclosure of a professional person's connections with creditors and parties in interest under Rule 2014(a). ER, Ex. A, at 44 n.29.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Err in Concluding that Perkins Failed to Comply with the Disclosure Requirements of 11 U.S.C. § 327 and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014.

The Bankruptcy Court correctly recognized that the Bankruptcy Code imposes a high standard of disclosure on attorneys who seek to be employed in bankruptcy cases and that those disclosure requirements are strictly construed by the courts in the Ninth Circuit and the District of Montana. Title 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) governs the procedure for obtaining court approval of the employment of attorneys and other professionals by trustees and debtors in possession in bankruptcy cases, limiting such employment to persons "that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons."[7] A professional person's failure to comply with these requirements at any time during such professional person's employment under § 327 may result in a denial of compensation. See 11 U.S.C. § 328(c). Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a) requires that an application for employment under § 327 shall include a statement, to the best of the applicant's knowledge, of "all of the person's connections with the debtor, creditors, any other party in interest, their respective attorneys and accountants, the United States trustee, or any person employed in the office of the United States trustee." [Emphasis added.] Rule 2014(a) further provides that "[t]he application shall be accompanied by a verified statement of the person to be employed setting forth the person's connections" with any such other persons. Although Rule 2014(a) does not expressly require supplemental or continuing disclosure, § 327(a) implies a continuing duty of disclosure and requires professionals to reveal connections that arise after their retention. See In re Bennett Funding

[7] A "disinterested person" is defined in the Bankruptcy Code, inter alia, as a "person that ... does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors or equity holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor or any investment banker specified in subparagraph (B) or (C) of this paragraph, or for any other reason." 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(E).

The Ninth Circuit has closely examined the obligation of attorneys to disclose all of their connections with the debtor, creditors, and parties in interest. See Neben & Starrett, Inc. v. Chartwell Financial Corp. (In re Park-Helena Corp.), 63 F.3d 877, 881-882 (9th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 1049 (1996). In Park-Helena, where the debtor's attorney failed to disclose the source of a prepetition retainer, the Ninth Circuit explained that Rule 2014(a) assists the court in ensuring that the attorney has no conflicts of interest and is disinterested, as required by 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). Id. at 881. The disclosure requirements of Rule 2014 are applied "strictly."[8] Id. "All facts that may be pertinent to a court's determination of whether an attorney is disinterested or holds an adverse interest to the estate must be disclosed." Id. at 882, quoting In re Hathaway Ranch Partnership, 116 B.R. 208, 219 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1990). "The duty of professionals is to disclose all connections with the debtor, debtor-in-possession, insiders, creditors, and parties in interest ... They cannot pick and choose which connections are irrelevant or trivial ... No matter how old the connection, no matter how trivial it appears, the professional seeking employment must disclose it." 63 F.3d at 882, quoting In re EWC, Inc., 138 B.R. 276, 280-281 (Bankr. [8] Perkins erroneously asserts that the Ninth Circuit's decision in Park-Helena addresses only financial disclosures under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016, not conflict disclosures under Rule 2014. Appellant's Brief, at 20. Title 11 U.S.C. § 329(a) and Rule 2016(b) require debtors' attorneys to file with the court a statement of compensation paid or agreed to be paid within one year prior to the date of filing of the bankruptcy petition and the source of such compensation. A supplemental statement is required to be filed within 15 days after any payment or agreement not previously disclosed. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2016(b). The Park-Helena court concluded that the undisclosed payment of the debtor's attorney's retainer by the debtor's president who was also a creditor was a connection within the meaning of Rule 2014(a) and that the attorney's failure to disclose that payment constituted a violation of both Rule 2014(a) and Rule 2016(b). 63 F.3d at 880-882. In so holding, the Court noted that the fiduciary duties of disclosure under Rule 2014(a) and Rule 2016(b) are similar and overlapping ("The disclosure requirements of Rule 2014 are applied as strictly as the requirements of Rule 2016 and section 329 ..."). Id. at 881. Perkins' contention that Rule 2016 imposes a higher standard on attorneys than Rule 2014 is incorrect and contrary to Ninth Circuit precedent. Appellant's Brief, at 20 n.5.

Ninth Circuit further stated that "[t]he disclosure rules are applied literally, even if the results are sometimes harsh." 63 F.3d at 881. Negligent or inadvertent omissions "do not vitiate the failure to disclose." Id., quoting In re Maui 14K, Ltd., 133 B.R. 657, 660 (Bankr. D. Haw. 1991). The failure to comply with the disclosure rules is a sanctionable violation, even if proper disclosure would have shown that the attorney had not actually violated any Bankruptcy Code provision or Bankruptcy Rule. 63 F.3d at 880. Applying these strict standards, the Park-Helena court held that the debtor's attorney's failure to describe the circumstances of the payment of the retainer violated the disclosure requirements of Rule 2014.[9] Id. at 882.

As evidenced by the Bankruptcy Court's ruling below and prior decisions, that court has consistently followed the Ninth Circuit in strictly interpreting the disclosure requirements of Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a). See In re Love, 163 B.R. 164, 168 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1993); In re Fjeldheim, 1993 WL 590145, 12 Mont. B.R. 267, 274-275 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1993). In Love, the court denied the debtor's counsel's second fee application in its entirety based upon the counsel's failure to comply with Rule 2014(a) to timely disclose her law firm's prior representation of the debtor's partner in a partnership to which estate funds were transferred. In Love, like the instant case, this connection was not disclosed to the court until over one year after the debtor's counsel filed her application for employment. Quoting from its earlier decision in Fjeldheim, the court in Love reiterated that "Rule 2014 requires the professional to disclose all facts that may be pertinent ... Further, a negligent failure to disclose all facts required by [Rule] 2014(a) does not relieve the professional of the consequences of failing to make a complete disclosure." Love, 163 B.R. at 168-169, quoting Fjeldheim, 12 Mont. B.R. at 276 [emphasis in original]. The court in Love further recognized that the burden of disclosure is on the applicant, and not on the court or other parties in interest: "the Court has no duty to rummage through files or conduct independent fact-finding investigations in order to determine whether prospective attorneys are involved in actual or potential conflicts of interest. It is the duty of the attorney to so inform the Court." Love, 163 B.R. at 170, quoting Fjeldheim, 12 Mont. B.R. at 278. Similarly, in Fjeldheim, where the court disqualified the debtor's attorney for failing to fully disclose a $45,000 retainer and the source of the retainer, it held that:

[9] Prior to the enactment of Bankruptcy Code, the requirement that attorneys disclose all of their connections in bankruptcy cases was recognized by the Ninth Circuit under the Bankruptcy Act. See In re Haldeman Pipe & Supply Co., 417 F.2d 1302, 1304 (9th Cir. 1969) ("General Order 44 [the precursor to Rule 2014] does not give the attorney the right to withhold information because it is not apparent to him that there is a conflict."). In Haldeman, however, the court reversed and remanded the case because the bankruptcy referee had failed to appraise the facts in the case and determine, as a discretionary matter, what if any fees should be allowed. Id. at 1305. Unlike that case, in the instant case, the Bankruptcy Court carefully considered the evidence and properly exercised his discretion to require disgorgement of all of the fees incurred by Perkins, based upon Perkins' failure to timely disclose material facts to the Court.

> It was not this Court's nor anyone else's duty other than [the debtor's attorney] to make full disclosure. Nor was it full disclosure for [the debtor's attorney] to disclose what it thought sufficient and then to correct any deficiencies to which the U.S. Trustee objected.

Id. at 277. The court further noted that the attorney's duty of full disclosure was a "continuing duty" to disclose connections when they arose, even if they arose after the court approved the attorney's employment.[10] Id.

Thus, applicable case law from both the Ninth Circuit and the District of Montana confirms that 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2014(a) impose a fiduciary duty on attorneys to disclose all facts that may be pertinent to the court's determination of whether an attorney is disinterested or represents an interest adverse to the estate.[11] This fiduciary duty is important to the bankruptcy system and is intended to facilitate the court's policing responsibilities. The disclosure rules impose upon attorneys as officers of the court an independent responsibility to disclose all pertinent facts so that the court may properly decide whether the attorney is entitled to be employed or compensated. Thus, an attorney's failure to comply with his or her fiduciary duty is sanctionable. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 880, 882. Ultimately, the court must decide which facts are relevant or important, not the attorney.

[10] Other courts within the Ninth Circuit have also strictly enforced attorneys' fiduciary duty of disclosure in bankruptcy cases. See, e.g., In re Maui 14K, Ltd., 133 B.R. 657, 660 (Bankr. D. Haw. 1991); In re Hathaway Ranch Partnership, 116 B.R. 208, 219-220 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1990); In re B.E.S. Concrete Products, Inc., 93 B.R. 228, 236-237 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1988); In re Coastal Equities, Inc., 39 B.R. 304, 308 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1984).

In the instant case, the record reflects that the material terms of the limited conflicts waiver from Wells Fargo were not timely disclosed to the Bankruptcy Court and only came to the surface over a year later after an actual conflict of interest had arisen between Perkins and Wells Fargo. Messrs. Smith and MacIntyre both testified that they did not disclose the terms of the waiver because they did not think it was important. Although Perkins argues that its failure to disclose these facts was not willful, Perkins violated its fiduciary duty to disclose all pertinent facts, as strictly construed

[11] Although not cited by the Bankruptcy Court below, other bankruptcy courts have held that agreements similar to the "no litigation" exception contained in the June 4, 2001 Wells Fargo conflicts waiver letter have a direct impact upon whether an attorney is disinterested or represents an interest adverse to the estate. For example, in In re American Printers & Lithographers, Inc., 148 B.R. 862, 864 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1992), the court denied approval of the chapter 11 debtor's application to employ counsel, finding that an actual conflict of interest was created by the counsel's continuing representation of the debtor's major secured lender in unrelated matters, where counsel conceded in open court that it would not represent the debtor in a lawsuit against the creditor, notwithstanding the fact that both the debtor and the creditor consented to the law firm's representation of the debtor. In In re Amdura Corp., 121 B.R. 862, 867, 869 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1990), the court similarly held that the two co-counsel for related Chapter 11 debtors, who represented the debtors' major secured lender in unrelated matters, were not disinterested, represented interests adverse to the debtors, and could not be employed by any of the debtors, where both co-counsel advised the court that they could not investigate or prosecute any claims against the creditor. In American Printers and Amdura, the courts disapproved counsel's employment, even after full disclosure of such agreements. See also In re Granite Partners, L.P., 219 B.R. 22, 40 (Bankr. S.D. N.Y. 1998) (counsel for the chapter 11 trustee represented adverse interests resulting in denial of compensation, where counsel failed to disclose that it had agreed at the outset of the case to investigate but not sue the debtor's audit firm because that firm was also the law firm's auditor); In re Envirodyne Industries, Inc., 150 B.R. 1008, 1014 n.7 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1993) (counsel for related Chapter 11 debtors, which represented a substantial creditor of one debtor, was not disinterested and represented an adverse interest, and order employing counsel was vacated, where counsel had stated in a memorandum that it would not investigate or sue such creditor).

by the Ninth Circuit. Perkins did not have the right to pick and choose which connections were worthy of disclosure. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. Having affirmatively and unequivocally disclosed to the Bankruptcy Court in three different declarations that it had disclosed all issues and potential conflicts and would notify the Court if any actual conflicts of interest or other significant connections are discovered, and having disclosed that a conflicts waiver had been received from Wells Fargo, Perkins was obligated to disclose the "no litigation" exception to the waiver. By the time that Mr. MacIntyre filed Exhibit 20 in August 2001, Perkins had known of the terms of the limited Wells Fargo waiver for almost two months. Wells Fargo was the Debtor's largest creditor and primary source of DIP financing, without which the Debtor could not stay in business. By failing to timely disclose the limitations of the waiver, Perkins deprived the Bankruptcy Court, the UST, and other parties in interest of the ability to fully and timely determine whether Perkins had a conflict of interest in connection with its simultaneous representation of Wells Fargo in unrelated matters. Even if the Bankruptcy Court were to determine that Perkins did not have a conflict of interest, Perkins' failure to disclose material facts is a sanctionable violation, as of the time that the failure occurred, and not when the true facts were ultimately revealed. Id. at 880.

Perkins argues that its failure to disclose the "no litigation" exception in the Wells Fargo waiver should be excused because (1) the "no litigation" exception did not apply to matters in the bankruptcy case and thus was not important or material, (2) the Debtor had waived all claims against Wells Fargo under the terms of the DIP Financing Order, and (3) the "fall-back" position included in Perkins' disclosures eliminated the need to disclose the terms of the conflicts waiver. The Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that none of these arguments excuses or mitigates Perkins' failure to disclose. ER, Ex. A, at 35, 37.

The record reflects that Perkins and Wells Fargo did not agree on what constituted "litigation" within the meaning of the limited conflicts waiver, which made it all the more important for Perkins to disclose the exception to the waiver. ER, Ex. A, at 35 n.25. Had Perkins disclosed the terms of the waiver at the outset of the case, the Bankruptcy Court could then have timely settled any ambiguity and determined whether Perkins had an unwaived conflict of interest with Wells Fargo. Thus, contrary to Perkins' inaccurate characterization of the "no litigation" exception as "de minimis" or an "undisclosed nuance," that limitation in the Wells Fargo conflicts waiver was a material term which Perkins was obligated to disclose.

The Debtor's waiver of claims against Wells Fargo did not excuse Perkins' failure to disclose because a disclosure violation may result in sanctions regardless of any actual harm to the estate. See Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. In any event, that waiver of claims against Wells Fargo did not cover postpetition claims, including any litigation that may arise from disputes relating to the DIP financing order itself or § 506(c) claims, all of which were foreseeable and did in fact occur.

Finally, Perkins' "fall-back position" to request further waivers or retain Mr. Dye or other counsel in the event of an unwaived conflict did not obviate the need to disclose the Wells Fargo waiver.[12] Mr. Smith conceded that in the absence of any disclosure of the "no litigation" exception, [12] In In re Amdura Corp., 121 B.R. 862, 867 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1990), the court rejected the debtors' counsel's argument that a conflict with the debtors' major secured creditor could be avoided by utilizing separate counsel or by turning the matter over to the creditors' committee or an examiner. While a "carve-out" of certain issues from a retained law firm's responsibilities may be appropriate in some cases to avoid a conflict of interest, the Amdura court stated that this is not appropriate where the resolution of the other client's claims will be the "lynch-pin" of the case, as was true of Wells Fargo's claims in the instant case.

Further, Perkins implies that the "special counsel" provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 327(e) were intended as a means to circumvent the disinterestedness requirement of § 327(a) when a conflict arises during the course of a bankruptcy case. Appellant's Brief, at 14. On the contrary, Congress enacted § 327(e) primarily as a means to permit the bankruptcy estate to retain for a specified special purpose an attorney who represented the debtor prior to bankruptcy, so that such attorney may continue his or her representation after the bankruptcy case has commenced, notwithstanding the attorney's lack of disinterestedness on account of a debt for prepetition legal fees or other reason. See H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 328 (1977); S. Rep. No. 989, 95th Cong., 2nd Sess. 38-39 (1978).

the Bankruptcy Court and parties in interest would have no way of knowing whether there were any unwaived conflicts with respect to Wells Fargo. Without full disclosure of all of the facts, including the "no litigation" exception, the Court, the UST, and other parties in interest could not adequately and timely determine the appropriateness of the proposed "fall-back" procedure to address any unwaived conflict of interest.

II. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised its Discretion in Disqualifying Perkins as Counsel for the Debtor, Vacating the Court's Order of Employment, and Requiring Disgorgement of Perkins' Fees and Costs.

The bankruptcy court is vested with the discretion to disqualify professional persons employed by the court, deny all fees, and order disgorgement of fees, where a debtor's attorney has failed to disclose material facts. In re Love, 163 B.R. 164, 170 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1993). In Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881, where the bankruptcy court denied all of the debtor's attorney's fees based upon his failure to disclose the source of a retainer as required under Rule 2014(a) and Rule 2016(b), the Ninth Circuit held that the court's denial of all fees was within its discretion. Although the bankruptcy court in Park-Helena found the disclosure violation to be willful, the Ninth Circuit held that "[e]ven a negligent or inadvertent failure to disclose fully relevant information may result in a denial of all requested fees." Id. at 882.

The Ninth Circuit further delineated the bankruptcy court's power to sanction attorneys for violations of the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure requirements in In re Lewis, 113 F.3d 1040, 1045-1046 (9th Cir. 1997). In Lewis, the Ninth Circuit affirmed an order requiring the attorney for a chapter 11 debtor to disgorge all retainers received, where the debtor's counsel had misrepresented the timing of retainers received and failed to properly supplement his initial disclosure of compensation. In so ruling, the Ninth Circuit held that the bankruptcy court has broad and inherent authority to deny any and all compensation when an attorney fails to meet the requirements of 11 U.S.C. §§ 327, 329, 330, and 331, regardless of the excessiveness or reasonableness of such compensation. Under the circumstances, the court held that an inquiry into the appropriate amount of the fee was not required. Id. at 1046.

Similarly, in Fjeldheim, where the chapter 11 debtor's attorney failed to fully disclose a $45,000 retainer and the source of the retainer, the Montana bankruptcy court disqualified counsel, vacated his employment ab initio, ordered the disgorgement of all retainers, and denied all compensation. See In re Fjeldheim, 1993 WL 590145, 12 Mont. B.R. 267, 279 (Bankr. D. Mont. 1993). In Love, where the debtor's attorney failed to disclose her representation of the debtor's partner when she filed her application for employment, the same court acknowledged that it has the discretion to disqualify the applicant, deny all fees, and order disgorgement.[13] See Love, 163 B.R. at 170.

In this case, the Bankruptcy Court found that Mr. MacIntyre made a false statement in Exhibit 20, filed over two months after the June 4, 2001 conflicts waiver from Wells Fargo, that he had disclosed "all additional issues and potential conflicts of interest that have been identified at the present time," when in fact he had failed to disclose the terms of the limited conflicts waivers from Wells Fargo and GECC. ER, Ex. A, at 40. Although Perkins argued at trial that its failure to disclose was not willful, the Bankruptcy Court properly exercised its discretion in sanctioning Perkins for such failure, relying on Ninth Circuit precedent recognizing that a negligent or [13] However, in Love, the court in its discretion considered the fact that counsel voluntarily amended her Rule 2014(a) statement more than one year later to fully disclose her connection with the debtor's partner and performed extensive services in the case that resulted in a confirmed plan and substantial benefit to the estate. Accordingly, the court declined to order disgorgement of interim compensation previously awarded to counsel in the amount of $25,226, but denied all fees and costs requested by counsel pursuant to her second fee application in the amount of $91,211 (78% of the total). 163 B.R. at 171.

inadvertent as well as a willful failure to disclose fully relevant information may result in a denial of all fees. Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 882. In this case, as distinguished from Love, at no time did Perkins voluntarily amend its Rule 2014(a) statements to disclose the terms of the Wells Fargo and GECC limited conflicts waivers. The Bankruptcy Court correctly noted that Perkins' belated disclosure of the "no litigation" exception to the Wells Fargo conflicts waiver in the June 14, 2002 status report did not excuse Perkins' failure to timely disclose. ER, Ex. A, at 41.

Perkins cites a number of decisions from other jurisdictions in which the courts exercised their discretion to impose lesser sanctions for various disclosure violations. However, the Bankruptcy Court below correctly observed that such decisions "are not binding on this Court like Park-Helena." ER, Ex. A, at 34. In fact, the Ninth Circuit's holdings in Park-Helena and Lewis are fully consistent with courts of appeals decisions from the First, Fifth, and Sixth Circuits upholding the complete denial of fees for violations of the Bankruptcy Code's disclosure requirements. See In re Independent Engineering Co., 197 F.3d 13, 17 (1st Cir. 1999) (court affirmed disgorgement of all fees for attorney's failure to disclose postpetition draws and payments from debtor); In re Downs, 103 F.3d 472, 479-480 (6th Cir. 1996) (bankruptcy court abused its discretion in not requiring full disgorgement of all fees as result of attorney's willful failure to disclose retainer); In re Prudhomme, 43 F.3d 1000, 1003-1004 (5th Cir. 1995) (court affirmed disgorgement of all fees due to attorney's failure to disclose retainer); see also In re Kisseberth, 273 F.3d 714, 721 (6th Cir. 2001) (court affirmed disgorgement and denial of fees for attorney's failure to disclose all payments received from debtors). In Kisseberth, like this case, the debtor's attorney was an experienced bankruptcy practitioner who claimed that his failure to disclose resulted from negligence or inadvertence. Nonetheless, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the bankruptcy court's disgorgement of all but $2,288 in fees received and denied all other compensation requested by the attorney. In so ruling, the Sixth Circuit, like the Bankruptcy Court below, held that disgorgement may be proper even if the failure to disclose resulted from negligence or inadvertence. The court further recognized that "bankruptcy courts have broad and inherent authority to deny any and all compensation where an attorney fails to satisfy the requirements of the Code and Rules." 273 F.3d at 721.

Contrary to Perkins' contention, the risk of an actual conflict arising between Perkins and Wells Fargo was substantial and likely and in fact did occur. As the Bankruptcy Court noted, Wells Fargo was the Debtor's largest creditor and primary source of DIP financing. At the same time, Perkins' attorney-client relationship with Wells Fargo was long-standing and not insubstantial. Mr. Smith conceded in Exhibit 1 that a conflict of interest existed between Perkins and Wells Fargo. In December 2001, Perkins represented the Debtor on a contested cash collateral motion against Wells Fargo, and Wells Fargo subsequently appealed the ruling on that motion. Months later, Perkins threatened to bring litigation against Wells Fargo. However, unbeknownst to the Bankruptcy Court, Perkins had a limited conflicts waiver agreement with Wells Fargo, which on its face excepted these conflicts from the waiver. Perkins and Wells Fargo subsequently disputed the meaning of the "no litigation" exception.[14] For these reasons, the terms of the conflicts waiver were fully and absolutely [14] Perkins mistakenly contends that the Bankruptcy Court clearly erred in admitting into evidence correspondence between Perkins and counsel for Wells Fargo because such documents were inadmissible hearsay. Appellant's Brief, at 12, 18. At the outset of the trial, on the stipulation of the parties, the Court admitted these and other documents into evidence. ER, Ex. P, at 24; Ex. 3, 5, 7. At no time during the trial did Perkins affirmatively object to the admission of any of these documents as required under Fed. R. Evid. 103. In any event, the letters do not constitute hearsay as they were not offered in evidence to prove the truth of the contents of the letters, but rather as evidence of an actual conflict between Perkins and Wells Fargo and the existence of a dispute between Perkins and Wells Fargo regarding the meaning of the "no litigation" exception to the conflicts waiver. Fed. R. Evid. 801(c); see Orsini v. O/S Seabrooke O.N., 247 F.3d 953, 960 n.4 (9th Cir. 2001); In re Papp International, Inc., 189 B.R. 939, 947 (Bankr. D. Neb. 1995). Scott Clark, the author of the letters in question, represented Wells Fargo at the time of Wells Fargo's consent to the June 4, 2001 conflicts waiver letter, and in fact he was copied on that letter by Mr. Smith. ER, Ex. 1.

relevant to the issue whether Perkins had a conflict with Wells Fargo from the outset of the case, and were by no means "de minimis."

As further grounds for disqualification, the Bankruptcy Court noted that 11 U.S.C. § 327(c) imposes a per se disqualification of any attorney or other professional person who has an actual conflict of interest because of such person's employment by or representation of a creditor. ER, Ex. A, at 43; see In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246, 251 (3rd Cir. 2002); In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 476 (3rd Cir. 1998) (court may also within its discretion disqualify an attorney who has a potential conflict of interest). The Bankruptcy Court correctly concluded that Perkins had an unwaived actual conflict of interest with Wells Fargo based on Mr. Smith's own statement in Exhibit 1 and his admission at trial that the contested cash collateral motion constituted "litigation directly adverse to Wells Fargo."[15] ER, Ex. D, at 93.

Finally, Perkins' attorneys and other witnesses appearing on Perkins' behalf testified that Perkins' "zealous" representation of the debtor was not affected by its relationship with Wells Fargo. Even if this were true, disclosure violations are sanctionable "without regard to any actual harm to the estate." Park-Helena, 63 F.3d at 881. Perkins also presented testimony regarding the "success" of its efforts in the case, primarily in permitting the debtor to continue as a going concern and preserving some employees' jobs. While the court has the discretion to determine what fees, if any, should be allowed, the Ninth Circuit held in Lewis that the court had the discretion to deny all fees for a disclosure violation without inquiring as to the appropriate amount of the fee. Lewis, 113 F.3d at 1046. In this case, Mr. MacIntyre testified that there was little likelihood from the outset of the case that the unsecured creditors would receive anything. ER, Ex. E, at 64-65, 74. Only the Debtor, Wells Fargo, and other secured creditors stood to benefit from the Chapter 11 case. After the sale of the Debtor's assets was concluded, there were no unencumbered funds in the estate available to pay Perkins' fees. Thus, in this case, as distinguished from Love, Perkins' services did not result in a substantial benefit to the estate--a plan was not and could not be confirmed, secured creditors sustained substantial losses, unsecured creditors have received nothing, and the estate is administratively insolvent.[16] Under the circumstances of this case, the Bankruptcy Court did not abuse its discretion in entering its July 28, 2003 order and judgment disqualifying Perkins as counsel for the debtor, vacating the Bankruptcy Court's order approving Perkins' employment, and requiring disgorgement of Perkins' fees and costs.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Bankruptcy Court's July 28, 2003 order and judgment should be affirmed.

DATED this _____ day of November, 2003.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE’S MEMORANDUM OF LAW

The United States Trustee submits this Memorandum of Law, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§105, 307, 28 U.S.C. §1930(a)(6), F.R.B.P. 9013 and Local Rule 26, in support of his Response To Debtors’ Motion For Final Decree. The Court has jurisdiction over this case under 28 U.S.C. §157(b).

STATEMENT OF ISSUE

Does 28 U.S.C. §1930(a)(6), as amended in 1996, require all chapter 11 post-confirmation debtors to pay quarterly fees based upon all disbursements made by those debtors until the Chapter 11 case is dismissed or converted.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

In May, 1993, P.J. Keating Company (“Keating Co.” or ”Debtor”), Keating Sports Group, Inc. (“Sports”), Roofblok Limited (“Roofblok”) and Keating Materials Corporation (“Materials”) filed voluntary petitions for relief under Chapter

11. On June 17, 1994, the bankruptcy court (the “Court”) confirmed the Keating Co. Third Party Plan of Reorganization(“the Plan”). Pursuant to the Plan, Materials merged into Keating Co., Roofblok continued to operate as a distinct legal entity and Sports is apparently a defunct, but not dissolved, corporate shell. In addition, a consummation agent (“Agent”) was appointed to distribute certain assets of the debtors. Keating Co. also has or will pay over $101,000.in pre-confirmation claims. Agent’s Final Accounting, Exhibit 5. Various other assets were vested into the so-called reorganized Debtor and Roofblok.

On October 30, 1996, the Debtor filed a Motion For Final Decree (the “Motion”), pursuant 11 U.S.C. §350, seeking an Order waiving Keating Co.’s, requirement to pay any quarterly disbursement fees to the United States Trustee Program (“the “Program”). Keating Motion at, p.5, para. 7. The Motion did not address the liability of Sports, Materials or Roofblok cases for quarterly fees owed to the Program.

On November 7, 1996, the United States Trustee filed his Response To Debtor’s Motion(the “Response”). The Response sought an Order from the Court requiring the payment of approximately $24,000. in unpaid quarterly disbursement fees by all four debtors, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §1930(a)(6). The Debtor later filed a “Statement Of P.J. Keating Company Concerning Payment Of Quarterly Fees To United States Trustee”(the “Statement”). In the Statement, Keating now concedes that subsection (a)(6), requires the payment of post-confirmation quarterly fees. It also acknowledges that if the United States Trustee’s position is sustained, Keating Co. is liable for $25,000. in quarterly fees to the Program. The Statement fails to address whether any additional quarterly fees are due from Roofblock, Sports or Materials. As the cases have been jointly administered (but not substantively consolidated), any order regarding Keating should also extend to the other three chapter 11 cases.

A hearing was held on November 27, 1996 addressing the Motion, Response and Statement, at which time the Court granted the United States Trustee’s request for an opportunity to submit a memorandum of law addressing the quarterly fee issue. On December 11, 1996, the Court extended the deadline for filing the memorandum to December 20, 1996.

ARGUMENT

PURSUANT TO 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6), QUARTERLY FEES ARE CALCULATED BASED ON ALL DISBURSEMENTS MADE DURING THE PENDENCY OF THE CASE

A. As Originally Enacted, The Plain Language Of 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) Required Quarterly Fees To Paid During the Pre-Confirmation Period Based On All Disbursements Made During The Pendency Of The Bankruptcy Case

On October 27, 1996, the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-554, 100 Stat. 3088 (1986)("1986 Act"). The 1986 Act expanded the pilot United States Trustee Program from 18 judicial district to a permanent nationwide program. Section 117 of the 1986 Act amended 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a) by, among other things, creating a new quarterly fee for chapter 11 cases. Pursuant to the 1986 Act, a new subsection (6) was added to section 1930(a) following subsections (a)(1) - (5). As originally enacted, section 1930(a)(6) provided as follows:

> (6) In addition to the filing fee paid to the clerk, a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee, for deposit in the Treasury, in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first. The fee shall be $150 for each quarter in which disbursements total less than $15,000; $300 for each quarter in which disbursements total $15,000 or more but less than $150,000; $750 for each quarter in which disbursements total $150,000 or more but less than $300,000; $2,250 for each quarter in which disbursements total $300,000 or more but less that $3,000,000; $3,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $3,000,000 or more. The fee shall be payable on the last day of the calendar month following the calendar quarter for which the fee is owed.

(emphasis added).

Section 1930(a)(6) ("the quarterly fee statute") is straight forward. It requires payment of a statutory fee quarterly based on a sliding scale, which is tied to the amount of disbursements made in a case. As originally enacted, the quarterly fee applied in all pending cases until a plan of reorganization was confirmed, or the case was converted or dismissed.

As the Supreme Court has noted, the best evidence of Congressional intent is the plain language of the statute. CSX Transportation v. Easterwood, Inc., 507 U.S. 658, 633 (1993). Section 1930(a)(6) uses only two words to describe on what basis the quarterly fee is calculated: a "case" pending in chapter 11, and "disbursements." The parameters of a pending chapter 11 case is defined in the Bankruptcy Code as commencing with the filing of a petition, 11 U.S.C. §§ 301 - 303. If the case remains under chapter 11 and obtains confirmation of a plan, it proceeds until the estate has fully administered and the bankruptcy court enters a final decree. 11 U.S.C. § 350; F.R.B.P. 3022. Unlike the word "case," the word "disbursement" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code, nor under any provisions of title 28.

Where a statute's language is not conclusive, the courts next look to its legislative history to determine congressional intent. Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 432 n.12 (1987). The United States Trustee, however, is aware of no applicable legislative history concerning the 1986 Act that addresses the definition of the word disbursement.[1] The legislative history of the 1986 Act does disclose that the enactment of the Quarterly Fee Statute was an effort by a Congress, confronted with budget deficits and the need to maintain tax revenues, to apportion fairly the cost of the United States Trustee Program on users. See H.R. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. 22 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S. Code and Admin. News 5227 (1986). "The United States Trustee Program should not have to be self-funding. It provides a great service to our country's bankruptcy system. However, in this time of budget deficit concerns, self-funding becomes a necessity." Id. at 26. Thus, Congress expressly intended that the beneficiaries of the bankruptcy system, i.e., the debtors, pay the incumbent costs associated with its benefits.

[1] The United States Trustee is aware of no Legislative History expressly addressing the meaning of the term disbursement. In response to this Court's request for legislative history concerning quarterly fees and the activities of the United States Trustee Program in connection with the passage of section 1930(a)(6), attached hereto as Exhibit A is a Statement made by Thomas J. Stanton, former Director, Executive Office for United States Trustees, to the House Committee on the Judiciary prior to the passage of the 1986 Act.

Because neither the statute, nor its legislative history defines the word disbursement, its meaning must be derived from the plain language of the statute and accepted cannons of statutory construction. The most applicable cannon of statutory construction in this circumstance is the axiom that where a word is not otherwise defined in the relevant statute, the courts should construe it in accord with its ordinary and natural meaning. Smith v. United States, 507 U.S. 223, 228 (1993); Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42 (1979). Applying this cannon of statutory construction, those courts which have addressed the issue of what constitutes a disbursement under section 1930(a)(6) have construed that term very broadly to mean any payment, whether made directly or by a third party.

In St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, 38 F.3d 1525, 1534 (9th Cir. 1994), for example, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's holding that a payment to a secured creditor from the proceeds of the sale of the secured property did not constitute a disbursement. The Court of Appeals noted that the definition of "disburse" in Webster's Third New International Dictionary, was "to expend . . . pay out." Id. It further observed that the statute drew no distinction between payments to secured and unsecured creditors and that the sparse legislative history on the issue suggested Congress intended an expansive definition. Id. at n. 10 and accompanying text. From this, the Court of Appeals concluded the the term disbursements included all payments made by the debtor's estate.

A number of courts have followed the Victoria Farms reasoning in according an expansive definition to the term "disbursements." See, e.g., In re Flatbush Associates, 198 B.R. 75 (Bankr.S.D.N.Y. 1996)(payment of rent to cooperative apartment is a disbursement); In re Meyer, 187 B.R. 650 (Bankr.W.D.Mo. 1995)(that distribution made to secured creditor by an escrow agent does not allow debtor to avoid payment of quarterly fees); In re Hays Builders, Inc., 144 B.R. 778, 780 (Bankr.W.D.Tenn. 1992)("All disbursements, whether direct or through a third party, [are] included in the calculation of fees due the trustee under 1930(a)(6)."); In re Wernerstruck, Inc., 130 B.R. 86, 89 (Bankr. D.S.D. 1991)(holding any payments by the debtor are disbursements under section 1930(a)(6); In re Ozark Beverage, Inc., 105 B.R. 510, 511-12 (Bankr.E.D. Mo 1989) (rejecting debtor's argument that "disbursements" mean only payments made to pre-petition creditors and holding that disbursements means all expenses in a given quarter).

In the pre-confirmation period, some courts have analyzed disbursements in the context of payments made by or in connection with the bankruptcy estate, while others have not. Compare St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, In re Flatbush Associates, supra, (referencing the bankruptcy estate) with In re Ozark Beverage, Inc. and In re Wernerstruck, Inc., supra, (making no mention of the bankruptcy estate). To the extent that courts have referenced the bankruptcy estate, this reference is understandable since upon filing of a bankruptcy case, an estate is created which consists of all the debtor's legal and equitable interests in property. 11 U.S.C. § 541(a). None of these cases, can fairly be read as restricting the ordinary meaning of the term disbursements, which includes all payments. Indeed, each of the above-cited cases have held that the term disbursements is to be construed broadly in accordance with the ordinary meaning of the word.

As discussed above, however, the legislative history of the 1986 Act does indicate that Congress intended the users of the bankruptcy system to pay its incumbent costs. H.R. No. 764, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. at 26. The bankruptcy estate is not a user of a chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization, it is merely the repository of the debtor's property between the filing of the case and confirmation of the plan. It is the debtor that seeks reorganization that is the user of the system and the entity that Congress intended would pay quarterly fees on all disbursements made during the case.

B. Nothing In The Recent Legislation Extending Quarterly Fee Obligations Into The Post-Confirmation Period Limits The Term "Disbursements" Or Otherwise Supports the Debtor's Attempt To Minimize Its Quarterly Fee Obligations

(1) The January 27, 1996 Amendment To Section 1930(a)(6) Imposed On the Post-Confirmation Debtor The Same Quarterly Fee Requirements As Congress Imposed On The Pre-Confirmation Debtor In The 1986 Act

On January 27, 1996, section 1930(a)(6) was amended pursuant to section 211 of the Balanced Budget Downpayment Act, I, Pub. L. No. 104-99, 110 Stat. 26, 37-38 (1996) ("Public Law 104-99"), by striking out the words "a plan is confirmed".[2] The portion of section 1930(a)(6) which was amended (hereinafter "January 1996

[2] Section 211 provides that "Public Law 104-91 is amended by inserting after the words 'the protection of the Federal judiciary' in section 101(a), the following: 'to the extent and in the manner and', and by inserting at the end of the paragraph containing those words, but before the semicolon, the following: ": Provided That, with the exception of section 114, the General Provisions for the Department of Justice included in [House Conference Report 104-378] are hereby enacted into law." See Attachment B (Public Law 104-99, section 211) and Attachment C (Public Law 104-91). Section 111 of the General Provisions in House Report 104-378 states as follows: "Section 1930(a)(6) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the words 'a plan is confirmed or'."

Amendment" or "amended section 1930(a)(6)") provides as follows, with the language stricken by Public Law 104-99 redlined in the text:

> In addition to the filing fees paid to the clerk, a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States trustee in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until [~~a plan is confirmed or~~] the case is converted or dismissed, whichever occurs first . . ..

As is evident from the above quoted text, the only change in the statute was the deletion of the words "a plan is confirmed or" from the text of section 1930(a)(6). The intended effect of this amendment was to extend a debtor's obligation to pay quarterly fees into the post-confirmation period. McLean Square Associates, C.P., 201 B.R. 436, 439 (Bankr.E.D.Va. 1996).

As with the 1986 Act, the United States Trustee is not aware of any legislative history the addresses the meaning of the word "disbursement."[3] The legislative history of the 1996 amendment does, however, clearly articulate the reason for this amendment. As explained in the initial House Report from the Committee on Appropriations, which was reported from the House of Representatives on July 19, 1996, Congress expressly considered

[3] Although the United States Trustee requested an extension of the quarterly fee into the post-confirmation period, it submitted nothing to Congress addressing the meaning of the term disbursement. Attached hereto as Exhibit D is the relevant portion of the United States Trustee's budget request for fiscal year 1997, which contains its request for an extension of the quarterly fee into the post-confirmation period.

the need to increase quarterly fee revenues by extending the fee into the post-confirmation period:

> Decline in Bankruptcy filings.--The recommendation [to increase the U.S. Trustee's fees] assumes an overall decline in bankruptcy filings in 1996, as assumed in the budget, but reduces the amount of funding to correspond to this decline, which was not reflected in the budget request. The Committee understands that due to this decline, Chapter 11 filing fees which partially finance this program are anticipated to drop significantly. However, because cases with assets to administer often take two to three years, the pending caseload still in progress will require ongoing attention. The Committee recommendation includes an extension of the quarterly fee payments under Chapter 11 to include the period after a reorganization plan has been confirmed by the Bankruptcy Court until the case has been dismissed (i.e., the post-confirmation period). Presently, quarterly fees are collected only until the plan of reorganization in the case is confirmed by the court.

H.R. Rep. No. 104-196, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. at 16-17 (1995)(emphasis added).[4]

Although the legislative history of amended section 1930(a)(6) does not address the meaning of the word disbursement, it does very clearly reflect that Congress intended to extend post-confirmation the same quarterly fee payment made pre-confirmation under the 1986 Act. Both House Report 104-196, quoted above, and the Joint Explanatory Statement of House Conference Report 104-378 provide that the quarterly fee

---

[4] A copy of the relevant portions of 104-196 are attached hereto as Exhibit E for the court's convenience. For a concise synopsis of the Legislative History of Public Law 104-99, see generally 142 Cong. Rec. H3842-02, H3943-44 (April 25, 1996), a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit F.

assessment will simply continue post-confirmation, without discussing any change in the calculation of the fee:

> In addition, under section 111, the conferees agree to include an extension of post-confirmation quarterly fee payments made under Chapter 11 as proposed in both the House and Senate bills and expect that these fees will apply to all pending Chapter 11 cases with confirmed reorganization plans.

H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-378, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (December 4, 1995); 141 Cong. Rec. H13894 (December 4, 1995) (emphasis added). The only logical inference to be drawn from Congress' failure to discuss a different basis for calculating the quarterly fee post-confirmation is that Congress intended the that the fee be calculated on all disbursements post-confirmation, just as it is calculated on all disbursements pre-confirmation. A copy of the relevant portions of H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-378 is attached hereto as Exhibit G.

The legislative history further identifies the debtor as the party that Congress intended would pay the fees connected with those disbursements. Conference Report 104-378 provides as follows:

> The conference agreement includes section 111 as proposed in the House and Senate bills, which extends the quarterly fee payments for debtors under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code to include the period from when a reorganization plan is confirmed by the Bankruptcy Court until the case is converted or dismissed. The conferees intend that this fee will apply to both pending and new cases.

H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-378, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (December 4, 1995); 141 Cong. Rec. H13899 (December 4, 1995) (emphasis added). Thus, although there is no available legislative history discussing the meaning of the term disbursement, the amended statute, together with its legislative history unequivocally demonstrate that Congress intended the debtor would pay precisely the same quarterly fee post-confirmation as it did pre-confirmation in order to ensure adequate funding of the bankruptcy system.

(2) Quarterly Fee Legislation Enacted On September 30, 1996 Demonstrates Congress' Intent To Increase Revenues And To Have Amended Section 1930(a)(6) Construed Broadly

On September 30, 1996, additional legislation was enacted to augment quarterly fee revenues. That legislation was contained in Section 109 ("Section 109") of the General Provisions for the Department of Justice contained in Title I of the Omnibus Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 1997, Public Law 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009, and affected quarterly fees in two ways.[5]
First, Section 109(a) amended the schedule of quarterly fee payments set forth in section 1930(a)(6).[6] The schedule was amended by increasing the number of levels of fees from five to ten and by increasing significantly the maximum amount of fees applicable to large cases. For, example, in a case with quarterly disbursements of $3,000,000, the corresponding fee was increased from $5,000 to $8,000.[7]

The second provision related to quarterly fees was set forth in Section 109(d), and provided as follows:

> "Section 101(a) of Public Law 104-91, as amended by section 211 of Public Law 104-99 is further amended by inserting ": Provided further, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the fees under 28 U.S.C. 1930(a)(6) shall accrue and be payable from and after January 27, 1996, in all cases (including without limitation, any cases pending as of that date), regardless of

[7] The text of Section 109(a) provided as follows:

> SEC. 109. (a) Section 1930(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended in paragraph (3), by inserting "$" before "800", and in paragraph (6), by striking everything after "total less than $15,000;" and inserting in lieu thereof: "$500 for each quarter in which disbursements total $15,000 or more but less that $75,000; $750 for each quarter in which disbursements total $75,000 or more but less than $150,000; $1,250 for each quarter in which disbursements total $150,000 or more but less than $225,000; $1,500 for each quarter in which disbursements total $225,000 or more but less that $300,000; $3,750 for each quarter in which disbursements total $300,000 or more but less than $1,000,000; $5,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $1,000,000 or more but less than $2,000,000; $7,500 for each quarter in which disbursements total $2,000,000 or more but less than $3,000,000; $8,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $3,000,000 or more but less than $5,000,000; $10,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total $5,000,000 or more. The fee shall be payable on the last day of the calendar month following the calendar quarter for which the fee is owed.

> confirmation status of their plans" after "enacted into law".,

This amendment to Public Law 104-91 was enacted in response to a number of bankruptcy court cases which held that post-confirmation quarterly fees could not be collected from debtors with plans confirmed prior to the effective date of the January 27, 1996 amendment to section 1930(a)(6). See, e.g., In re Precision Autocraft, Inc., 197 B.R. 901 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1996). By enacting this clarifying legislation, Congress expressly stated its intent that amended section 1930(a)(6) be applied all pending chapter 11 cases, including those with plans confirmed prior to the effective date of the January 27, 1996 amendment.[8]

Once again, nothing in this legislation, nor in its legislative history addresses the meaning of the word disbursement or in any way evidences any intent by Congress that post-confirmation debtors should pay quarterly fees on anything but the same basis as pre-confirmation debtors.

(3) Keating Co.'s Construction Of The Term Disbursement Would Require Two Separate Definitions Of That Term And Is Contrary To The Plain Language Of The Statute

There is no dispute that Keating Co.'s chapter 11 case was

[8] The applicable conference report for this legislation expressly provides that the Amendment serves to "clarify that fees collected under post-confirmation status are to be assessed in all pending chapter 11 cases." H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 3620, 104th Cong. Sess., 142 Cong. Rec. H11644, H11850 (daily ed. September 28, 1996). A copy of the relevant portions of this conference report is attached hereto as Exhibit J.

pending in the relevant time period and that disbursements have occurred. Indeed, Keating Co. concedes that it has disbursed in excess of $5 million and that if the United States Trustee's construction of the term "disbursements" is correct, it owes quarterly fees of $25,000. Keating Statement at 5, ¶ 8. Keating Co. argues, however, that its post-confirmation disbursements must be calculated in a manner different from its pre-confirmation disbursements: "quarterly fees payable after confirmation of a plan of reorganization are based on disbursements made by the bankruptcy estate pursuant to the confirmed plan, and not on all disbursements made by the reorganized debtor in the operation of its business postconfirmation." Keating Statement at 3, ¶ 5. Keating Co.'s argument is without merit for several reasons.

First, nothing in either the plain language or legislative history of the 1986 Act suggests that Congress intended to limit the term disbursements to payments by the "bankruptcy estate." Instead, Congress was concerned only in establishing a viable, self-funded United States Trustee Program paid for by the entities which sought protection of and were benefitted by the bankruptcy system, i.e., debtors. See United States Trustee v. Prines, 867 F.2d 478, 484-85 (8th Cir. 1989)(quarterly fee established to impose costs of system on the users); H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-378, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (December 4, 1995); 141 Cong. Rec. H13899 (December 4, 1995) (amendment to section 1930(a)(6) extends the quarterly fee payments "for debtors under Chapter 11" into post-confirmation period).

Keating Co. cites St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, Inc. for the proposition that disbursements must be limited to payments made by the bankruptcy estate. As discussed above, that case and the others that have addressed the issue have not referenced the legal concepts of the bankruptcy estate or debtor-in-possession in order to limit the meaning of the term disbursement. To the contrary, those courts have used them as part of an analytical framework to apply the term "disbursements" broadly and to reject technical arguments raised by debtors to avoid paying all fees owed. See, e.g., St. Angelo v. Victoria Farms, Inc., 38 F.3d at 1534.

Indeed, Keating Co.'s contention is reminiscent of another technical argument that was rejected in In re Ozark Beverage Co., 105 B.R. 510 (Bankr. E.D. Mo. 1989). There, the debtor asserted that the word "disbursements" meant only payments made to pre-petition creditors. The bankruptcy court rejected the debtor's argument, stating as follows:

> neither the statute nor its legislative history gives even a hint that this was Congress' intended definition. Further, the Debtor has given the Court no indication as to the source of this new interpretation. In essence, the Debtor has simply proposed a novel definition of the term which would engender a less harsh result in this case. If Congress had intended such a meaning, surely it would have stated so more clearly.

Id. at 512 (emphasis added). Like the debtor in Ozark Beverage, Inc., Keating Co. has simply proposed a novel construction of the term disbursement in order to limit the amount it owes in quarterly fees. This argument is unsupported by the either the plain language of the statute or its legislative history, however, and should be rejected.

A second error in Keating Co.'s argument is that it relies on the flawed analysis in SeaEscape Cruises for the proposition that postconfirmation disbursements are necessarily limited to are payments made by under the plan of reorganization. In SeaEscape Cruises, the bankruptcy court first noted that "[u]pon a plan's confirmation and/or pursuant to the plans terms, the bankruptcy estate's assets revest in the name of the reorganized debtor and are no longer part of the bankruptcy estate." 20 B.R. at 323 (citing 11 U.S.C. § 1141(b)). Notwithstanding this conclusion, the SeaEscape court summarily concluded that payments under the plan were payments from the estate without citation to any authority.

The SeaEscape analysis is logically and legally inconsistent. If confirmation of a plan revests the assets of the estate in the debtor, 11 U.S.C. § 1141(b), payments by a reorganized debtor under a plan, as a matter of law, cannot constitute payments from the bankruptcy estate.[9] Moreover, if

[9] See McKinney v. Waterman Steamship Corporation, 925 F.2d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 1991)(confirmation revests estate property in the debtor and discharges its debts); see also In re Robbins, 167 B.R. 724 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1994) (the bankruptcy estate revests in post-confirmation disbursements are limited to payments by a bankruptcy estate that no longer exists, then no quarterly fees beyond a minimum amount would ever be owed pursuant to amended section 1930(a)(6). Congress' intent to increase funding for the United States Trustee Program would then be a nullity. Such a construction would achieve an absurd result and, therefore, must be rejected. Griffin v. Oceanic Contractor, Inc., 458 U.S. 564, 575 (1982)(statutory constructions leading to absurd result are to be avoided); Pritzker v. Yari, 42 F.3d 53, 67 (1st Cir. 1994)(same).

Further, the SeaEscape decision, in effect, holds that post-confirmation disbursement are limited to payments under the plan of reorganization. If Congress had wanted to limit post-confirmation "disbursements" in this manner, however, it could have done so. See 28 U.S.C. § 586(e)(1)(B)(ii)(I) (limiting standing trustee compensation to "ten percent of the payments made under the plan"). The SeaEscape decision improperly fails to recognize these differences in statutory language. Russello v. United States, 464 U.S. 16, 23 (1983); 2A N. Singer, Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 46.07 (5th ed. 1992 and Supp. 1996). At best, the SeaEscape Cruises decision should be viewed as a result-oriented decision, rather than one based on the law. It provides little guidance for this court to follow.

the debtor at confirmation and no longer exists).

The third flaw in Keating Co.'s argument is that it necessarily requires differing definitions of the term disbursements for the pre-confirmation and post-confirmation periods. As set forth above, the courts that have addressed the issue of what constitutes a disbursement in the pre-confirmation period have consistently applied a broad construction of that term to the effect that quarterly fees are calculated based on all payments made. Indeed, as the First Circuit has recognized, a presumption exists in the law that Congress was aware of prior judicial and administrative interpretations of statutory terms. United States v. Ramirez, et al., 82 F.3d 1131 (1st Cir. 1996)(citing Lorillard v. Pons, 434 U.S. 575, 580 (1978); Sierra Club v. Secretary of the Army, 820 F.2d 513, 522 (1st. Cir. 1987)). Consequently, Congress must be presumed to be aware of the broad construction afforded the term "disbursements" under section 1930(a)(6).

As discussed above, there is no evidence that Congress considered adopting a narrower definition of the term "disbursement" in the post-confirmation period. Indeed, as discussed above the history of the January 27, 1996 amendment to section 1930(a)(6) indicates that Congress intended simply to extend post-confirmation the same quarterly fee paid pre-confirmation. Consequently, Keating Co.'s arguments to the contrary should be rejected.

(4) Keating Co.'s Policy Arguments Should Be

Rejected

Keating Co. states that its interpretation of the statute "comports with the purpose underlying Section 1930(a)(6) -- that debtors availing themselves of Chapter 11 fund the services necessitated by their Chapter 11 cases." Keating Statement at 5, ¶ 9. This approach is unavailing for several reasons.

First, contrary to Keating Co.'s contention, nothing in either the statute or its legislative history suggests that Congress intended to link the amount of effort expended by the United States Trustee in a given case with the amount of quarterly fees it pays. To the contrary, the relative ease of basing the quarterly fee on all disbursements indicates that Congress intended an straight forward system that designed to avoid dragging the courts through a laborious process of deciding how much the United States Trustee should receive in each case.[10] Had Congress wished to created such a linkage, presumably it could have structured post confirmation fees along the lines of professional fees, which are limited according to various criteria. 11 U.S.C. § 328 (Limitations on compensation of professional persons). Instead, Congress established the amount of the quarterly fee obligation relative only to the debtor's

[10] Cf. In re Savage, 67 B.R. 700, 705-08 (D.R.I. 1986) (Congress established a percentage fee structure for compensating standing trustees that avoids the vicissitudes of individual cases to ensure that adequate funding exists to administer all cases).

Second, Keating Co.'s argument disregards the fact that Congress has structured the fee in an equitable fashion and with full knowledge of the impact that it would have on chapter 11 debtors. Modest fees are assessed on a graduated scale according to the amount of disbursements made by a debtor. Congress has also imposed a ceiling so that no debtor would pay more than a fixed maximum in any quarter. Moreover, the overriding premise for the quarterly fee inextricably ties the benefits of chapter 11 protection the debtor receives from the law and its concurrent responsibilities. Consequently, Keating Co.'s attempt to limit quarterly fees on this basis is unjustified.

Third, contrary to Keating Co.'s contention, the United States Trustee did undertake post-confirmation activities in the above-captioned case. The Office of the United States Trustee reviewed various fee applications, participated in a number of discussions regarding post-confirmation disbursements, responded to inquiries by various creditors of the debtors, and sought closure of the cases.

Fourth, to the extent that Keating Co. may argue that post-confirmation disbursements should not be considered disbursements on fairness grounds, this contention is plainly without merit. It was the protections of chapter 11 that enabled Keating Co. to remain a viable ongoing entity. That Congress has determined to assess a fee during the post-confirmation period, during which a debtor still enjoys the benefits of chapter 11 protection can hardly be considered unfair. For example, during the post-confirmation period, a debtor might seek modification of its plan pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1127, or seek resolution of any number of disputes arising under the plan in the bankruptcy court rather than in an alternate forum. If a debtor wishes to minimize its post confirmation quarterly fees, it should move expeditiously to substantially consumate its plan and seek a final decree, which would close the case and prevent the assessment of additional fees.

Finally, under the approach urged by Keating Co., the fairness and uniformity of the quarterly fee system would be jeopardized. Calculating quarterly fees according to all disbursements by the debtor during the pendancy of the case results in one uniform standard being applied to all. If Keating Co.’s approach were adopted and quarterly fees were determined based on disbursements by the estate, those debtors whose plans do not revest property of the estate in the debtor may be forced to pay larger quarterly fees that debtors whose plans do permit or require bankruptcy estate property to revest.[11] Such a result

[11] To the extent that Keating Co. may rely on equitable considerations, such considerations do not allow a court to set aside the applicable bankruptcy law. Prisbrey v. Noble, 505 F.2d 170 (10th Cir. 1974). While bankruptcy courts are courts of equity, a fundamental principle of equity is that "equity follows the law." Wedges v. Dixon County, 150 U.S. 182, 192 (1893). As noted above, Congress has struck what it considers to be an equitable balance. Barring a constitutional infirmity, Congress' would undermine the uniform, straightforward nature of the quarterly fee system, has no basis in the law and should be rejected.

CONCLUSION

The U.S. Trustee submits that subsection 1930(a)(6) requires all four above-captioned debtors to pay quarterly disbursement fees based upon all post-confirmation disbursements made by each debtor or so-called reorganized debtor. This conclusion is supported by the plain meaning of the statutory language of 28 U.S.C. §1930(a)(6), when read in conjunction with the legislative history of the subsection evidencing Congress’s intent. The U.S. Trustee therefore respectfully urges the Court to deny the debtors’ request for the entry of final decrees until all quarterly disbursement fees owed by these debtors are paid.

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING REVERSAL

Pursuant to Rule 29 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, the United States submits this brief as amicus curiae supporting reversal of the bankruptcy court's order.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of the federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977). The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. 307. See In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000).

This case involves a dispute over confirmation of a plan under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. The United States Trustee is authorized, among other things, to "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in chapter 13 cases, monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such chapter 13 plans in connection with a plan confirmation hearing under section of the Code. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

In 2006, more than a quarter million persons filed bankruptcy petitions under chapter 13. In chapter 13 cases, with so-called above-median debtors,[1] the question of statutory interpretation presented in this case has occurred frequently and is continuing to occur. In fact, there are already approximately 50 bankruptcy court decisions that have faced this statutory issue.

In this brief, the United States respectfully offers this Court its views on the correct interpretation of section 1325(b). See 28 U.S.C. 517 (authorizing Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States").

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court erred in holding that the debtor's projected disposable income under section 1325(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code is computed by simply multiplying the debtor's disposable income, as defined in section 1325(b)(2), by the number of months in the chapter 13 plan, with no other adjustments.

STATEMENT

A. Statutory Background.

In 2005, Congress passed and the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005) (BAPCPA).

One of the innovations of the BAPCPA was means-testing. In section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code, which addresses dismissal of abusive chapter 7 petitions, Congress established special rules for debtors whose current monthly income, reduced by certain permitted expenses, exceeded a threshold for abuse under a specified formula.

11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2). This amendment changed the way these expenses were computed; some were no longer the debtor's actual and reasonable expenses but instead were standard expenses under the National Standards and Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the debtor's area of residence. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii).

Congress also applied means-testing to chapter 13 cases, like this one, in which the debtor seeks not to liquidate his debts, as in chapter 7, but rather to establish a plan for repaying all or part of those debts. Before the BAPCPA amendments were enacted, section 1325, governing confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, required such a plan to provide that all of the debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period would be used to repay debts. Disposable income was calculated from the debtor's actual income and expenses set forth on Schedules I and J, which the debtor was required to file. But the BAPCPA amended section 1325 to change the definition of "disposable income." The new section 1325(b)(2) defines "disposable income" to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2).[2] This definition incorporates two changes: first, it defines "disposable income" based on an average of past monthly income and expense figures; and second, for debtors with higher income levels, it requires the use of the same standard expenses mandated for certain debtors under section 707(b)(2). Specifically, section 1325(b)(3) now directs that reasonable expenses be determined "in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2)" for those chapter 13 debtors whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is greater than the median family income for a family of the corresponding size. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Chapter 13 debtors in this class are typically referred to as "above-median" debtors. An above-median debtor is not one whose income places him in the top half of all debtors; it is one whose income places him in the top half of families of his size in his area.

Under current bankruptcy rules, such a debtor must file a Form 22C,[3] which sets forth the debtor's income and expenses in accordance with standard numbers issued by the IRS. Because a debtor must also file the traditional Schedules I and J setting forth actual income and expenses, it often becomes apparent that there is a significant difference between the above-median debtor's disposable income under Schedules I and J and his disposable income under Form 22C. In some cases, the use of standard expenses for above-median debtors under Form 22C actually results in a lower amount of disposable income, and in a few cases, like the present case, the use of Form 22C actually converts an otherwise positive disposable income into a negative

[3] The form was known as "B22C" at the time the debtor filed in this case. We will use the current form name "22C" throughout.

one. Likewise, in some cases, it is clear that the historical circumstances that produced a particular income figure will change prospectively.

For the convenience of the Court, we have attached in an addendum to this brief the pre-BAPCPA text of section 1325, the current text of section 1325, and a redlined version showing the changes to section 1325 made by the BAPCPA.

B. Facts.

The debtor, Laura Kagenveama, filed a chapter 13 petition on November 28, 2005. Accompanying her petition were two different sets of forms disclosing her income and expenses and computing those figures in different ways. The first set of forms, the traditional Schedules I and J,[4] showed a total combined monthly income of $4,096.26 and total monthly expenses of $2,572.37, for a monthly net income of $1,523.89. ER 1-2. The second form, Form 22C,[5] as amended, which is a new Form

[4] A chapter 13 petition must be accompanied by a variety of schedules to illustrate the debtor's financial situation. Schedule I (Current Income of Individual Debtor(s)) requires the debtor to compute net monthly take home pay, along with additional sources of income. Schedule J (Current Expenditures of Individual Debtor(s)) requires the debtor to set forth estimates of the average monthly expenses of the debtor and his family. At the bottom of Schedule J, the total monthly expenses are deducted from the total income figure from Schedule I.

[5] Form 22C is a new form developed after the enactment of BAPCPA. Titled "Statement of Current Monthly Income and Calculation of Commitment Period and Disposable Income," this form provides for the computation of the debtor's income and expenses pursuant to the definitions and rules found in BAPCPA. As we will explain, those definitions and rules are different from those that are found in Schedules I and J. developed for use after the enactment of the BAPCPA, showed the debtor's statutorily defined "current monthly income" to be $6,168.21 ($74,018.52 annually), which after computing deductions allowable under BAPCPA, showed monthly disposable income of negative $4.04. ER 19.

In light of this negative disposable income, the debtor filed a chapter 13 plan that called for her to make no payments to unsecured creditors. The chapter 13 trustee objected, arguing that the debtor's Schedules I and J indicated actual disposable income that could be used to pay unsecured creditors. The debtor countered that her disposable income was negative, and that if that negative income was projected through the plan period, she would satisfy the requirement of section 1325(b)(1)(B) that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan." That is, "all" of her projected disposable income was less than nothing, so by paying nothing, she was complying with the Code, and her plan should be confirmed.

2. The bankruptcy court agreed with the debtor. Citing "the plain words of the statute," the bankruptcy court noted that Congress, in BAPCPA, had focused the definition of "disposable income" on "current monthly income." ER 23. The bankruptcy court pointed out that the definition, in section 1325(b)(2), applies in "this subsection," and that the term appears nowhere else but in section 1325(b)(1)(B), which refers to "projected disposable income." Id. Thus, "[u]nless the definition applies to 'projected disposable income,' it has no meaning." Id.

The bankruptcy court rejected the chapter 13 trustee's argument that a simple historical number could not be "projected," observing that one would just "apply the current monthly income amount over the applicable commitment period." ER 23. It is true, the bankruptcy court admitted, that this computation might bear little relation to actual income available to the debtor during the plan period, and that Schedules I and J might provide a better measure. Nevertheless, that is what Congress called for, as "ironic and unfortunate" as that may be. ER 24.

3. The chapter 13 trustee asked the bankruptcy court to certify its order for direct interlocutory appeal to the court of appeals under 28 U.S.C. 158(d)(2). The debtor did not object, and the bankruptcy court ordered that the matter be certified. ER 36-37. The Ninth Circuit granted permission to appeal on October 30, 2006.

The BAPCPA amendments to section 1325 have created important interpretive questions about the proper way to understand "projected disposable income." As the case law reflects, there are three different ways to interpret and apply that statutory language in light of the amendments. The interpretation adopted by the bankruptcy court (and supported by the debtor) should be rejected, because it fails to take into account all the language in the statute.

The bankruptcy court interpreted the term "projected disposable income" to require use of the historical "disposable income" figure throughout the chapter 13 plan period, regardless of the debtor's actual income and expenses during that period. In this case, the debtor's historical "disposable income" was negative, and under the bankruptcy court's interpretation, the debtor's negative disposable income was "projected" over the entire plan period, with the result that her chapter 13 plan called for repayment of no debt whatsoever. If this were what the statute actually required, that would be one thing. But the bankruptcy court's interpretation does not account for the usual meaning of "projected" income or for the statutory phrases "to be received" and "will be applied to make payments" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Blindly extending into the future an historical monthly income calculation, which the court itself admitted may bear no relationship to actual income that the debtor will receive in the future, makes it impossible for the plan to apply available future income to make payments to unsecured creditors in accordance with the statute. That approach relies exclusively on a definition of current monthly income that is inherently retrospective. Blindly using the inherently retrospective number to make the inherently prospective projection required by the statute makes no sense and fails to give meaning to every word in the statute.

Albeit in a less problematic way, the chapter 13 trustee's interpretation also fails to give weight to all the language of the statute. The chapter 13 trustee correctly explains that the bankruptcy court's interpretation of "projected disposable income" does not take into account important statutory language. However, the chapter 13 trustee's own interpretation – which asks courts to focus on income and expenses in Schedules I and J, as they used to do before the language was amended – fails to give adequate meaning to the new definition of "disposable income," the one term in section 1325(b) that now is actually defined.

In contrast with both of these interpretations, the best interpretation of section 1325(b) is one that gives meaning to "disposable income" by requiring its use in determining the "disposable income" that is to be projected as an initial matter, subject to adjustment to account for any significant increases or decreases in the debtor's income that are likely in particular cases. Such adjustments may be necessary in individual cases to ensure that the income attributed to a debtor in his chapter 13 plan is actually income that is "projected" and "to be received" and that "will be applied to make payments" to unsecured creditors. While a simple multiplication of the initial disposable income number by the relevant number of months is a presumptive starting point, this approach allows adjustments to be made.

Though our interpretation is not wholly free of minor textual difficulties, those difficulties are considerably less problematic than those raised by the bankruptcy court's interpretation. Our interpretation is also consistent with the overall goals of chapter 13.

ARGUMENT

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED IN HOLDING THAT AN ABOVE-MEDIAN DEBTOR'S "PROJECTED DISPOSABLE INCOME" UNDER SECTION 1325(b) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE MUST BE DETERMINED EXCLUSIVELY BY APPLYING HISTORICAL "DISPOSABLE INCOME" OVER THE PLAN PERIOD.

A. The Bankruptcy Court's Interpretation Fails To Give Content To Three Statutory Phrases.

In this case, the debtor, Laura Kagenveama, is an above-median debtor, whose income and expenses, under 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3), are computed in accordance with national and local standards. Although her Schedules I and J produced a disposable income of $1,523.89 a month, her Form 22C showed disposable income of -$4.04. ER 24. In holding that this negative disposable income had to be "projected" over the entire chapter 13 plan period, with no other adjustments, the bankruptcy court applied a mechanical interpretation of "projected disposable income" that fails to give meaning to all parts of the statutory language.

1. The BAPCPA amendments in 2005 to section 1325 created a significant change in the law. Before these amendments were enacted, section 1325(b)(1) provided that if the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objected to the confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, the court was not permitted to approve the plan unless it provided that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the three-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1) (2000 ed.). The term "disposable income" was defined as income received by the debtor that was "not reasonably necessary to be expended" for "maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent" or for necessary business expenses if the debtor was engaged in a business. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2) (2000 ed.). As the bankruptcy court in this case recognized, a debtor's projected disposable income under that former law was calculated simply by "subtracting the debtor's expenses set out on Schedule J from the debtor's income set out on Schedule I," two forms that a chapter 13 debtor was required to file. ER 21.

In contrast, under the BAPCPA amendments, section 1325(b)(1) now provides that:

> (b)(1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan – * * * (B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). And now, "disposable income" is defined expressly to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). "Current monthly income" is defined as the "average monthly income from all sources" that the debtor received during the six-month period ending the last calendar month before the debtor filed the chapter 13 petition. 11 U.S.C. 101(10A). An above-median debtor calculates these figures on Form 22C.

The bankruptcy court held that "projected disposable income" in the current version of the statute must refer to the newly defined term "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2), which in turn is based on a retrospective calculation of current monthly income based on the average of recent months. Although it realized that "historical current monthly income may or may not have any relationship to the actual income to be received by the debtors during the course of their Chapter 13 plan," ER 24, the court held that the statutory language required it to "project" this historical income by applying it across the term of the chapter 13 plan. Because, in the present case, the debtor's historical monthly income was less than zero, the projected disposable income would be negative, no matter how long the term of the chapter 13 plan.[6]

2. The bankruptcy court's interpretation of "projected disposable income" is not correct. Most significantly, it adopts a contextually invalid interpretation of the term "projected" and wholly fails to account for two other important phrases in section 1325(b)(1)(B).

[6] The United States takes no position on the parties' dispute over the "applicable commitment period."

First, the bankruptcy court erred in concluding that to "project[]" disposable income means to "apply the current monthly income amount over the applicable commitment period." ER 23. Statutory words must be construed in context. Hibbs v. Winn, 542 U.S. 88, 101 (2004). In the economic and financial context – which is plainly the relevant context for purposes of this statute – the calculation of "projected" financial data may well begin with historical data, but it does not necessarily (or even usually) end there, and it certainly does not entail a rigid and inviolable assumption that projected income will necessarily be identical to past income even when the available facts demonstrate otherwise. To the contrary, in context the term "projected" must be understood to refer to a forecast or estimate of an expected future financial reality. See The Random House Dict. of the English Lang. 1546 (2d ed. 1987) (defining to "project" as, inter alia, "to set forth or calculate (some future thing); They projected the building costs for the next five years."); Webster's Third New Int'l Dict. 1813 (1993) (defining "projected" as, inter alia, "planned for future execution: contrived, proposed," as "[projected] outlays for new plant and equipment"). The bankruptcy court erred in failing to adopt a contextually accurate interpretation of the term "projected."

Second, as the court itself conceded, the historical income required to be used may have no relationship to the actual income "to be received" by the debtor. ER 24. This concession is highly significant. Section 1325(b)(1)(B) states that the court may not approve a plan unless it provides that all the debtor's projected disposable income "to be received" during the plan period is applied to make payments to unsecured creditors. To the extent historical income bears no relationship with actual income "to be received" by the debtor, the court's interpretation is inconsistent with the statutory language.

Third, the bankruptcy court's interpretation also ignores the statutory phrase "will be applied to make payments." If projected disposable income is based on an historical figure, minus expenses, there will be some cases in which income in the plan is only deemed, or hypothetical, and not actually received. A fairly typical case would be one in which a debtor lost a job at about the time he filed a chapter 13 petition. In such a case, the debtor's current monthly income, an average of the past six months' income, would reflect the income from that job, and the debtor's disposable income (the current monthly income less expenses) would not reflect the loss of that job. Projecting that figure forward would require the debtor to apply deemed or hypothetical income that was not actually "received" in the future "to make payments" under the plan.

These are more than mere policy objections to the bankruptcy court's interpretation; they are critical textual flaws. It is well established that courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect." Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (citing United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1992)). The bankruptcy court's interpretation fails to heed this statutory maxim.

B. The Chapter 13 Trustee's Interpretation Is Problematic, Because It Requires The Court In Every Case To Consider Income On Schedules I And J.

While the chapter 13 trustee correctly points out some of the flaws in the bankruptcy court's reading of the statute, his own interpretation fails to give sufficient meaning to the statute's new definition of "disposable income."

The chapter 13 trustee correctly argues that the word "projected" in "projected disposable income" confers a future orientation to the analysis. Trustee Br. 31 ("The plain meaning of 'projected' is 'to calculate, estimate, or predict (something in the future), based on present data or trends.'); see id. at 39-42. The fact that Congress used the phrase "projected disposable income" suggests that the meaning is different in some way from the defined phrase "disposable income." Trustee Br. 32. In addition, the chapter 13 trustee accurately points out that the bankruptcy court's interpretation fails to give meaning to "to be received," a phrase that indicates future receipt of actual income. Trustee Br. 33-34. Finally, the chapter 13 trustee offers that the phrase "as of the effective date of the plan" in section 1325(b)(1) speaks of the forthcoming plan confirmation date, another future event. Trustee Br. 34-35.

We are in general agreement with the chapter 13 trustee that the words he cites are indicia of future orientation. But the chapter 13 trustee goes on to make a broader interpretive point that is in some tension with the statutory language.

Summarizing his interpretation, the chapter 13 trustee argues that, in ruling on whether to confirm a plan to which a chapter 13 trustee has objected, the court "may look not only to the static number calculated using Form B22C, but must also 'take into account the debtor's actual current income as reported on Schedule I, projected to include the actual income the debtor expects to receive over the life of the plan.'" Trustee Br. 35-36 (emphasis added) (quoting In re Edmondson, ___ B.R. ___, 2007 WL 656457 at *5 (Bankr. D.N.M. Mar. 5, 2007)). Schedule I (income) and Schedule J (expenses) are the forms that were used in determining projected disposable income under section 1325 before the BAPCPA amendments. (They are still required of chapter 13 debtors and are used in formulating plans for debtors who are not above-median.)

In our view, there is no statutory basis for requiring the court to take into account the debtor's Schedules I and J in every case. That was the practice before Congress passed the BAPCPA amendments, but the chapter 13 trustee overstates matters in claiming that "[t]he BAPCPA amendments have not changed this practice." Trustee Br. 44. In fact, those amendments appear to have significantly modified the relevant statutory approach.

In particular, section 1325(b)(2) now defines "disposable income" as an historical figure based on an average of income over the six months preceding the filing of the petition. The financial data necessary to determine "disposable income" for above-median debtors are disclosed on Form 22C, not on Schedules I and J, as under pre-BAPCPA practice. Under the statutory definition, then, one cannot compute "projected disposable income" by ignoring Form 22C altogether and relying solely on Schedules I and J, as if Congress's rewriting of section 1325 were meant to accomplish nothing.

We explained in Part A. why the bankruptcy court erred in relying exclusively upon the historical income provided in Form 22C. But the chapter 13 trustee arguably errs in the other direction by giving too little effect to Congress's definition of "disposable income." As we will now explain, the new statutory language is best read as adopting a different approach, which starts but does not finish with Form 22C and the statutory definition of "disposable income."

C. Section 1325 Should Be Interpreted To Require That The Historical Disposable Income Figure Be Presumptively Applied Over The Plan Period, But Adjusted For Significant Changes In Income.

This Court should adopt an interpretation of section 1325(b) that not only gives meaning to the new definition of "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2) as an historical number but also treats "projected" disposable income as a future-oriented concept, as required by the language of section 1325(b)(1). More specifically, the Court should interpret section 1325(b) to require the use of the historical income figure called for in the definition of "disposable income" as a starting point, and a presumption that the historical figure should be carried forward throughout the term of the plan, absent evidence to the contrary. But in order to take into account the future-orientation of the remaining language of the statute, and ensure that projected disposable income is, in fact, a projection, the Court should allow that presumption to be rebutted whenever the debtor is likely to experience (or actually has experienced) either a significant increase or a significant decrease in income after the filing of the chapter 13 plan.

1. A starting presumption that the historical figure should be used is appropriate in light of the BAPCPA amendments. While we agree that "projected disposable income" is not the same as "disposable income," Trustee Br. 16, 29, 30, it is appropriate in construing the former phrase to give some effect to the definition of the latter. Section 1325(b)(2) provides a definition "[f]or purposes of this subsection." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). The only time that "disposable income" is used in "this subsection," section 1325(b), other than in the definition itself, is in the term "projected disposable income." As the bankruptcy court observed, "Unless the definition applies to 'projected disposal [sic] income,' it has no meaning." ER 23. To give it meaning, a court should begin by applying the historical "disposable income" figure as a starting point. Moreover, the court can likewise presumptively carry that figure forward over the plan period.

It may seem odd to apply an historical "current monthly income" figure over a future plan period, but Congress may well have expected that the historical figure, computed generally with standard rather than actual expenses, would result in a higher disposable-income total for "above-median" debtors and a greater amount designated for repayment to creditors under the debtor's chapter 13 plan. The fact that this is often not the case does not authorize a court to ignore the statutory definition altogether.

2. This initial presumption that the historical current monthly income will be used is necessarily rebuttable. Thus, contrary to the bankruptcy court's conclusion here, application of the historical income figure to the plan period is not the end of the matter in all cases. There are situations in which a debtor has or is likely to have significant changes in income after the period in which the historical "current monthly income" is computed, and in order to give full effect to the statutory text those changes must be taken into account in "project[ing]" the debtor's future disposable income.

A good illustration of this point is the debtor who suffers a significant loss of income at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition. Such a debtor may have a relatively high "current monthly income," based on an average of the six months preceding the month in which he filed his petition. Yet if that historical income were simply extended forward for purposes of the chapter 13 plan, it would not reflect the actual income available to the debtor during that future period. To put this in statutory terms, the future disposable income thus computed would not be the debtor's "projected" disposable income (because it would demonstrably not be based on a reliable estimate of future income) nor would it be the disposable income "received" by the debtor during the applicable commitment period. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). Moreover, because the income amount determined by the bankruptcy court's approach is merely deemed or hypothetical and not actually received, the income could not be "applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." Id. In such a case, therefore, the court would have to take into account this significant loss of income in order to apply section 1325(b) faithfully.[7]

3. Although our interpretation may not fit the statutory language perfectly in every respect, it gives effect to the statutory language more fully and faithfully than does the bankruptcy court's interpretation. Almost as important, it best furthers the overall goal of chapter 13.

[7] We recognize that some of these concerns with the statutory text do not arise in the same manner when the debtor finds himself with a significant increase in income at about the time he files his petition. See, e.g., In re Pak, 357 B.R. 549 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2006) (debtor was unemployed during most of six-month period before month in which he filed petition, but at time he filed he was earning over $100,000). With an increase in income, the lower historical figure would actually be received by the debtor and could be applied to pay unsecured creditors. But it would still not be an accurate "project[ion]" of the debtor's disposable income to be "received" during the plan period, and thus the bankruptcy court's interpretation is irreconcilable with the statutory text in these circumstances also. And in any event, section 1325(b) should be interpreted in one uniform way for all above-median debtors, so the rebuttable presumption approach should be applied across the board.

Unlike chapter 7, which allows a debtor to discharge his obligations, chapter 13 focuses on having debtors devote future income to paying their creditors. Indeed, BAPCPA placed additional emphasis on this goal when it added language to section 707(b) permitting a court, with the debtor's consent, to convert an abusive chapter 7 case to chapter 13, as an alternative to dismissal. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). While the bankruptcy court's interpretation does require a deemed amount of purported future income to be used to pay creditors, that deemed amount is measured exclusively by reference to historical income, which in some cases bears no relation to actual income available to the debtor. In contrast, our interpretation permits a court to consider the actual income that can "be applied to make payments" under the plan in cases in which a different amount of actual income is available to a debtor because of changed circumstances. This is an important measure of fairness, both to the debtor in cases in which the debtor's prospective income is below his historical income, and to creditors in cases in which the debtor will earn significant additional income that is not reflected in the historical calculation. Moreover, it avoids the absurd results entailed in requiring debtors to make payments to creditors on the basis of deemed "future" income assumptions that are known to be grossly inaccurate. See Rowland v. California Men's Colony, 506 U.S. 194, 200 (1993) (referring to "the common mandate of statutory construction to avoid absurd results").

4. For the reasons outlined above, this Court should reverse the bankruptcy court's order and remand the case for further proceedings. It would be inadvisable for this Court itself to attempt to apply the rule we propose to the facts of this case. Even if applying the rule we articulate here might not bring about a different result, the bankruptcy court has the greatest familiarity with the facts, and there may well be a need for the parties to develop the facts further in light of this Court's decision.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the bankruptcy court should be reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction over this proceeding under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334(a) and 157(b). The order below concerning quarterly fees was entered on the docket on June 30, 2009, and the United States Trustee timely filed his appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) on July 9, 2009. The bankruptcy court's order is final and appealable. See In re Dannys' Markets, Inc., 266 F.3d 523 (6th Cir. 1998) (treating quarterly fee order as a final order); Vergos v. Greggs' Enters., Inc., 159 F.3d 989 (6th Cir. 1998) (same). This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal of a final order of the bankruptcy court under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334(a) and 158(a).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the bankruptcy court erred in holding that Kentucky Processing Company did not owe quarterly fees assessed under 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) for quarters in which there were no disbursements, notwithstanding that the applicable language of the statute states that a fee shall be paid for each quarter "in which disbursements total less than $15,000"?

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The issue in this appeal is one of statutory interpretation, which this Court reviews de novo as a question of law. Vergos v. Greggs' Enters., Inc., 159 F.3d at 990.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Statutory Background

This appeal concerns statutory fees that are paid to the Department of Justice in chapter 11 cases on a quarterly basis ("quarterly fees"). Under federal law, the Department of Justice, acting through its United States Trustees, supervises cases filed under chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. See generally 28 U.S.C. § 586(a) (describing the various duties of the United States Trustee). The United States Code includes a quarterly fee statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6), that raises revenue to support the United States Trustees' chapter 11 supervisory activities. The quarterly fee statute was first enacted in 1986 as part of the Bankruptcy Judges, United States Trustees, and Family Farmer Bankruptcy Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-554, 100 Stat. 3088 (1986) (the "1986 Act").[1]

Quarterly fee payments to the United States Trustees are deposited in the United States Trustee System Fund, an account managed by the United States Department of the Treasury. The Fund is the source of monies then appropriated by Congress to fund the United States Trustee's operations. See 28 U.S.C. § 589a (establishing the United States Trustee System Fund). Quarterly fees are thus part of the United States Trustees' self-funding mechanism and constitute a significant portion of the monies deposited into the Fund. See In re Prines, 867 F.2d 478, 480 (8th Cir. 1989).

Section 1930(a)(6) contains three sentences, the first two of which are relevant to this appeal.[2] The first sentence requires the payment of a quarterly fee in each case for each quarter or fraction thereof until it is converted, dismissed or closed. Vergos v. Greggs' Enters., Inc., 159 F.3d at 993. The second sentence sets forth a sliding scale to be used in determining the fee to be paid each quarter and is comprised of twelve clauses. The first clause sets the lowest level of the fee as follows: "The fee shall be $325 for each quarter in which disbursements total less than $15,000." 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The next ten clauses establish progressively higher levels of fees based on increasing amounts of disbursements, with each level bounded by both an upper and lower dollar amount. The twelfth and final clause provides that the quarterly fee shall be "$30,000 for each quarter in which disbursements total more than $30,000,000." Id.[3]

Statement of Facts

On September 25, 1998, Kentucky Processing Company, the debtor and appellee ("Kentucky Processing"), filed a voluntary petition for relief under the provisions of chapter 11 of the United States Bankruptcy Code. Bankruptcy Docket ("Bankr. Dkt.") # 1. On May 31, 2001, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky entered an order confirming Kentucky Processing's chapter 11 plan. Bankr. Dkt. # 249. Kentucky Processing made no disbursements after December 31, 2001. Memorandum Opinion at 5 (hereinafter "Memorandum Opinion"). Bankr. Dkt. # 337.

The bankruptcy case remained open pending the resolution of an adversary proceeding concerning whether DLX, Inc. and a Kentucky Processing affiliate, Fox Trot Properties, Inc. ("Fox Trot"), owned a parcel of real estate referred to in the opinion below as the "Refuse Pile Tract." Memorandum Opinion at 3, Bankr. Dkt. # 337. Counsel for the parties to that adversary proceeding, DLX, Inc. and Fox Trot, expressed concern that the bankruptcy court would not have jurisdiction over the adversary proceeding if the bankruptcy case were closed. Id.

[3] The full text of section 1930(a)(6) is included in the Addendum at Exhibit A.

DLX, Inc. prevailed in the adversary proceeding. Memorandum Opinion at 4, Bankr. Dkt. # 337. After that litigation was over, Kentucky Processing filed a motion to close its bankruptcy case on September 23, 2008. Bankr. Dkt. # 301. In that motion, Kentucky Processing acknowledged that it owed the United States Trustee outstanding quarterly fees in the amount claimed by the United States Trustee, $4,550. Memorandum Opinion at 5, Bankr. Dkt. # 337. Kentucky Processing also requested that the bankruptcy court close the case prior to December 31, 2008, to avoid the further accrual of quarterly fees. Id. at 2-3. Additionally, Kentucky Processing requested that the bankruptcy court enforce a purported oral agreement between it and the parties to the Refuse Pile Tract adversary proceeding, that the unsuccessful party in that litigation would pay all accrued quarterly fees. Id. at 1-2. The United States Trustee did not oppose that motion.

On November 17, 2008, the bankruptcy court, acting sua sponte, entered an order setting a hearing on the motion to close case that directed the parties "to advise the court, within ten (10) days from the date of this order, whether in their view quarterly fees are actually owed for the several quarters this chapter 11 case was kept open to accommodate the litigation in Adv. No. 01-5199 between two non-debtor parties." Bankr. Dkt. # 305. No party disputed the United States' right to collect quarterly fees in the amount acknowledged by Kentucky Processing to be owing, $4,550. Indeed, on November 20, 2008, Kentucky Processing simply filed a Report attaching the last bill received for $4,500 in quarterly fees. Bankr. Dkt. # 306.

When no party objected to the fees that Kentucky Processing acknowledged as owed, the bankruptcy court on November 21, 2008, took the unusual step of filing a pleading it entitled "Comment." In its Comment, the bankruptcy court posited that there had been no disbursements made since October 2001 and that "[t]he real issue in this case is whether U.S. Trustee fees are owed for quarters in which no distributions are made." Id. The bankruptcy court concluded its Comment by stating that "[a] holistic reading of the provisions of 1930(a) appears to require that disbursements be made in a quarter before quarterly fees are due." Id. (emphasis added). The United States Trustee, with the leave of the bankruptcy court, filed a memorandum on December 11, 2008, sharing the United States' position that the text of section 1930(a)(6) requires that the minimum $325 quarterly fee is due when quarterly disbursements equal zero, until a chapter 11 case is converted, dismissed, or closed by order of the bankruptcy court.[4] Bankr. Dkt. # 313.

On June 30, 2009, the court below rejected Kentucky Processing's acknowledgment that it owed $4,500 in fees in a memorandum opinion and an order. The bankruptcy court ruled Kentucky Processing did not owe quarterly fees to the United States Trustee because there were no disbursements made by Kentucky Processing in the months for which it sought either to pay the quarterly fees or to have them paid by its affiliate Fox Trot.[5] Bankr. Dkt. ## 337, 338. The United States Trustee timely filed this appeal to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky. Bankr. Dkt. ## 340, 341.

[4] Although $325 is a modest number, the aggregate amount is significant because it applies in a large number of chapter 11 cases.

[5] Although not mentioned by name in its motion to close the case, under the alleged agreement it would appear that Kentucky Processing's affiliate Fox Trot would be responsible, as the non-prevailing party, for payment of the fees.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The issue in this appeal is whether quarterly fees accrue for those quarters in which a chapter 11 debtor does not make disbursements. Section 1930(a)(6) provides: "The fee shall be $325 for each quarter in which disbursements total less than $15,000." 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The bankruptcy court erred in failing to properly construe this statutory language, concluding that a disbursement of zero cannot be totaled and therefore is not less than $15,000. Memorandum Opinion at 7, Bankr. Dkt. # 337. The bankruptcy court failed to enforce the plain language of section 1930(a)(6), which requires a minimum fee for all quarters in which disbursements are less than $15,000, including those in which there are no disbursements. The bankruptcy court's analysis was predicated on the incorrect belief that zero is not a number. Although any resort to legislative history is precluded by the plain language of the statute, the legislative history concerning the quarterly fee statute does not support the bankruptcy court's ruling

ARGUMENT

The Bankruptcy Court Erred in Refusing to Allow Fees for Those Quarters in Which Disbursements Were Zero

In construing a statute, courts first look to the plain statutory language as the best evidence of congressional intent. CSX Transp. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658, 663 (1993). The language in section 1930(a)(6) establishing the lowest level of the quarterly fee is contained in the first clause of the second sentence and provides as follows: "The fee shall be $325 for each quarter in which disbursements total less than $15,000." 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). Had Congress wished to limit the payment of the fee to only those quarters in which there were disbursements, it could have included a lower boundary for the minimum fee, as it did for each of the next ten levels of fees. 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6). The absence of a lower boundary for the lowest level of the fee demonstrates Congress imposed the minimum fee for all quarters in which a debtor's disbursements are less than $15,000, including quarters in which total disbursements are zero.

This reading is supported by a ruling of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which recently construed the phrase "less than" just this way. Gorman v. National Transp. Safety Bd., 558 F.3d 580 (D.C. Cir. 2009). In that case, the court considered an appeal concerning whether a particular federal aviation regulation applied to aircraft with a passenger seating capacity of "less than 20 seats." Id. at 588 (quoting 14 C.F.R. § 119.23(a)). The pilot in that case argued the regulations did not apply, because the plane in question had no passenger seats. In rejecting this argument, the court of appeals held that "'[z]ero is, in fact, a number' and '[i]f you have zero seats, you do have less than 20 seats.'" Id. at 585 (quoting the administrative law judge). The court also held that this reading was reinforced by the caption of the regulation, which made it applicable to cargo airplanes. Id. The regulation was captioned as follows: "Operators engaged in passenger-carrying operations, cargo operations, or both with airplanes when common carriage is not involved." Id. (citing 14 C.F.R. § 119.23).

Similar to the circumstances in Gorman, reading the quarterly fee statute as requiring payment of the minimum fee for quarters in which the debtor makes zero disbursements is supported by additional language in the statute. See FTC v. Mandel Brothers, Inc., 359 U.S. 385, 389 (1959) (holding that statutes should be interpreted so as to "fit, if possible, all parts into an harmonious whole"). The first sentence of section 1930(a)(6) is written in mandatory language that provides, in relevant part: "a quarterly fee shall be paid to the United States' trustee . . . in each case under chapter 11 of title 11 for each quarter (including any fraction thereof) until the case is converted or dismissed [or closed], whichever occurs first." 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) (emphasis added).

As this case demonstrates, there are cases in which debtors make no quarterly disbursements. Only a construction of section 1930(a)(6) requiring payment of the minimum fee for quarters in which there are no disbursement gives effect to the mandate in this first sentence of section 1930(a)(6) that a fee will be paid in each case and for every quarter, including partial quarters, for as long as the case remains open. See Bowsher v. Merck & Co., Inc., 460 U.S. 824, 833 (1983) (restating and reaffirming "the settled principle of statutory construction that we must give effect, if possible, to every word of the statute").

The bankruptcy court's misreading of section 1930(a)(6) appears to relate to its misunderstanding of the concept of zero. The bankruptcy court asserted that "[o]ne cannot prove zero is less than $15,000" by subtraction, addition or division. Memorandum Opinion at 7, Bankr. Dkt. # 337. The bankruptcy also court stated that zero is a "nothing, nil." Id. The bankruptcy court further observed that Congress could not have intended zero disbursements to be totaled, as such would be an exercise in futility, and concluded that zero disbursements cannot total less than $15,000. Id. Although its analysis is somewhat unclear, it appears that the bankruptcy court did not believe zero to be a number. This conclusion is, however, incorrect. Gorman v. National Transp. Safety Bd., 558 F.3d at 585 (rejecting this conclusion); Memorial Hosp. of Laramie County v. Healthcare Realty Trust Inc., 509 F.3d 1225, 1231 (10th Cir. 2007) (zero is a number) (citing Robert Kaplan, The Nothing That Is: A Natural History of Zero at 90-115 (1999); Morris Kline, Mathematics for the Nonmathematician at 60 (1985) (explaining that zero is a member of our number system and is different from nil).[6] Because zero is a number, it can be used mathematically and one can add daily or monthly disbursements to reach a quarterly total, even if that total is zero. Therefore, the bankruptcy court's analysis was incorrect and the plain meaning of the statute compels the conclusion that Kentucky Processing does owe the minimum fee for those quarters in which no disbursements were made.

Because the quarterly fee statute is so plain in its wording, it is perhaps unsurprising that in the twenty-three years that have elapsed since the statute was first enacted, the issue of whether fees must be paid for quarters in which no disbursements are made has been infrequently litigated. Other than the court below, the United States Trustee is aware of only three bankruptcy courts that have expressly ruled on the issue.

In one case, the bankruptcy court agreed with the United States Trustee's reading that quarterly fees were payable for quarters in which no disbursements were made. In re Boulders on the River, Inc., 205 B.R. 948, 951 (Bankr. D. Or.), rev'd on other grounds, 218 B.R. 528 (D. Or. 1997). This result is supported by a number of other courts that, although not expressly confronted with the issue, have also expressed the view that the statute requires payment of a minimum quarterly fee even when there are no disbursements. See, e.g., In re Aquatic [6] Morris Kline was the author or editor of more than a dozen books, including Mathematics in Western Culture (1953), Mathematics: The Loss of Certainty (Oxford University Press, 1980), and Mathematics and the Search for Knowledge (Oxford University Press, 1985). Two analogies used by the late Professor Kline (formerly Professor Emeritus of Mathematics at New York University) help clarify the distinction between the concepts of zero and nil (nothing) as follows: "A student's grade in a course he never took is no grade or nothing. He may, however, have the grade of zero in a course he has taken." A second example used by Professor Kline is closer to the current issue raised by the court below: "If a person has no account in a bank, his balance is nothing. If he has a bank account, he may very well have a balance of zero." Mathematics for the Nonmathematician at 60. Zero is, therefore, a real number that can be used in addition and can describe the quarterly total of disbursements made by a debtor.

Development Group, Inc., 352 F.3d 671, 674 n.2 (2d Cir. 2003) (observing that minimum fee is payable in quarters in which there were no disbursements); In re Celebrity Home Entm't, 210 F.3d 995, 998 (9th Cir. 2000) (observing that a narrow definition of "disbursements" as limited to payments by a bankruptcy estate would mean that "most reorganized debtors would have to pay only the minimum quarterly fee which is due when there are zero disbursements"); In re Adams, 299 B.R. 540, 546 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2003) (section 1930(a)(6) "requires a debtor in possession to pay a quarterly fee . . . based on disbursements during the quarter, but with [the statutory minimum payment] per quarter"); In re Maruko Inc., 206 B.R. 225, 230 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. 1997) ("The court finds that there are no disbursements . . . . Accordingly, [the debtor] owes the minimum amount"), rev'd on other grounds, 219 B.R. 567 (S.D. Cal. 1998); In re Sedro-Woolley Lumber Co., 209 B.R. 987, 989 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1997) ("In those cases where there have been no disbursements, the fee would be the minimum due under the schedule.").

In the other two decisions directly addressing this issue, the bankruptcy courts' initial conclusion that no fees were payable for quarters in which the debtor made zero disbursements were questioned on appeal, remanded and were effectively reversed. United States Trustee v. Torres-Ruiz, 123 B.R. 696 (D.P.R. 1990), remanded, No. 86-01799 (Bankr. D.P.R., February 3, 1993) (dismissed on order to show cause for failure to pay quarterly fees);[7] In re Smith & Son, 88 B.R. 375 (Bankr. D. Utah 1988), decision on appeal, No. 88C-0651G (D. Utah, March 24, [7] Although the bankruptcy court's dismissal order is unavailable, the docket, which is included in the Addendum at Exhibit B, reflects that after remand the bankruptcy court dismissed the case on its order to show cause why the case should not be dismissed for failure to pay quarterly fees.

1989), remanded, 1990 LEXIS 2777, *8, No. 86B-05435 (Bankr. D. Utah, October 5, 1990) (decision on remand holding quarterly fees owed).

To the extent that the bankruptcy court relied on legislative history, the United States Trustee notes that the document cited by the bankruptcy court, a report prepared by an outside contractor for the Department of Justice (Abt Associates), is not legislative history. Moreover, when interpreting a statute, a court may "resort to a review of congressional intent or legislative history only when the language of the statute is not clear." In re Comshare Inc. Sec. Litig., 183 F.3d 542, 549 (6th Cir. 1999) (emphasis added). See also Lockhart v. Napolitano, 573 F.3d 251, 262 (6th Cir. 2009) (court may examine legislative history if statute is not clear). As set forth above, the United States Trustee has demonstrated that the statute is not ambiguous and a resort to its legislative history is not appropriate.

Finally, even if an examination of legislative history were appropriate, it would not support the bankruptcy court's conclusion. The preliminary House Report concerning the House's version of the bill that preceded the 1986 Act, H.R. Rep. No. 99-764 (1986), reprinted in U.S.C.C.A.N. 5227 (1986), contains the isolated statement that only debtors who have made disbursements would pay the quarterly fee. However, after both the House and Senate bills passed their respective chambers, Congress deleted this statement from the final Conference Committee Report, H.R. Rep. No. 99-958 (1986), that reconciled both bills into the 1986 Act. United States Trustee v. Torres-Ruiz, 123 B.R. at 697 (citing Smith & Son, No. 88C-0651G (D. Utah, March 24, 1989)). Consequently, the stronger evidence of Congressional intent does not support the bankruptcy court's decision. Moore v. District of Columbia, 907 F.2d 165, 175 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (the disposition of the respective House and Senate bills in conference furnishes the strongest evidence of what both chambers intended). See also United States Trustee v. Torres-Ruiz, 123 B.R. at 697 (remanding for consideration of Conference Committee Report).

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order entered below.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

1. The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b) and 1334. After that court entered a final order, appellant filed a timely notice of appeal to the district court. The district court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

2. The order in this case grants a final application for attorney's fees. See Excerpts of Record ("E.R.") 1-2. Unlike an order authorizing retention of counsel, which a bankruptcy court might later modify or revoke and which therefore is not final, see In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp.,

162 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 1998) ("S.S. Retail I"), this order is appealable because it conclusively resolves the issue of counsel's right to payment, and it represents the bankruptcy court's final determination of the propriety of counsel's appointment. This Court therefore has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(d) and 1291.

Although this Court held in In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp., 216 F.3d 882, 884 (9th Cir. 2000) ("S.S. Retail II"),[1] that it sometimes has the discretion to dismiss an appeal of a fee award when it would be "inequitable" to require the law firm "to disgorge the fees and expenses it ha[s] been paid," this is not such a case. Here, the contested fee has been placed in an interest-bearing account segregated from the law firm's operating account, and the Court therefore could reverse the bankruptcy court's order without requiring it to impose a remedy of disgorgement.

In any event, S.S. Retail II at most establishes a discretionary doctrine that permits, but does not compel, the dismissal of an appeal in the interests of equity. There is no basis in law or equity for dismissal of this appeal. Under S.S. Retail I, the United States Trustee could not have taken an earlier appeal. Thus, if review were unavailable now, it would mean that a bankruptcy court's appointment of a professional, which the United States Trustee contends was in violation of a federal statute, is entirely immune from appellate review. Such a result is not contemplated by the Bankruptcy Code, nor is it supported by equitable concerns here.

3. The district court's judgment was entered on April 7, 2003, see E.R. 3, and the notice of appeal was filed on June 3, 2003, see E.R. 4, 8. This appeal is therefore timely. See Fed. R.

App. P. 4(a)(1)(B).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Section 327(a) of the Bankruptcy Code permits the bankruptcy court to appoint a "disinterested" attorney to assist a debtor-in-possession. The question presented is whether a law firm may be appointed under section 327(a) when one of the firm's partners is not "disinterested" because he served as the debtor's corporate secretary prior to the bankruptcy filing.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Appellee Keravision, Inc., petitioned for relief under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Acting as a debtor-in-possession, Keravision asked the bankruptcy court to appoint Latham & Watkins LLP as counsel for the estate under 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). The United States Trustee objected, noting that section 327(a) requires attorneys to be "disinterested," and arguing that the firm was not disinterested because one of its partners had served as Keravision's corporate secretary until three weeks before the bankruptcy filing. The bankruptcy court nevertheless appointed the firm, and the district court affirmed. Subsequently, the bankruptcy court granted Latham's final application for approximately $178,000 in fees. The district court again affirmed, and the United States Trustee now appeals to this Court.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory and Regulatory Background

1. The Bankruptcy Code permits the debtor in Chapter 11 cases to act as a "debtor-in-possession" -- that is, instead of appointing a trustee, the bankruptcy court may allow the debtor to retain control of its business and property. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a) (A debtor-in-possession

"shall have all the rights . . . and powers, and shall perform all the functions and duties . . . of a trustee"). Like a trustee, a debtor-in-possession is a fiduciary "owing a duty of care and loyalty to the estate's creditors." In re McConville, 110 F.3d 47, 49 (9th Cir. 1997).

With the bankruptcy court's approval, a debtor-in-possession may employ the services of "professional persons," provided that those persons are "disinterested":

> Except as otherwise provided in this section, the trustee, with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys, accountants, appraisers, auctioneers, or other professional persons, that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title.

Id. § 327(a). The Code defines a "disinterested" person as one who

> (A) is not a creditor, an equity security holder, or an insider;
> . . . .
> (D) is not and was not, within two years before the date of the filing of the petition, a director, officer, or employee of the debtor . . .; and
> (E) does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of creditors or equity security holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor.

Id. § 101(14).

2. The United States Trustee is an official of the Executive Branch of the federal government and is responsible for "protecting the public interest and ensuring that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to the law." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 109 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6070. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." Id. at 88, 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 6049. Congress therefore provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on nay issue in any case or proceeding" under the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. § 307. Congress also directed United States Trustees to "revie[w] . . .

applications filed for compensation under section 330 of title 11," and to file with the court any "objections to such application." 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3)(A)(i)-(ii); see also In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000).

B. Facts and Prior Proceedings

In March 2001, Keravision, Inc., petitioned for relief under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. See In re Keravision, Inc., 273 B.R. 614, 615 (N.D. Cal. 2002) (reprinted in addendum). The bankruptcy court permitted Keravision to act as a debtor-in-possession, and soon thereafter, the company applied to the bankruptcy court for an order appointing Latham & Watkins LLP to act as counsel for the estate under section 327(a). See ibid. In connection with the application, Latham disclosed (1) that two of its partners owned stock in the debtor; (2) that one of those partners, Michael Hall, had served as the debtor's corporate secretary until about three weeks before the bankruptcy filing; and (3) that the firm had served as the debtor's outside counsel for several years. See ibid. Against this backdrop, the United States Trustee objected to Latham's appointment, arguing that the firm was not "disinterested." See ibid.

The bankruptcy court nevertheless approved the application. See ibid. As a condition of its approval, it required the two partners to sell their stock in the debtor, and it directed that Hall not be involved in the representation. See ibid. The court stayed its order to permit the United States Trustee to pursue an interlocutory appeal to the district court. See ibid.

The district court affirmed the order appointing Latham & Watkins. See id. at 619-20. The court agreed that under the statutory definition, Hall was not a "disinterested" person. See id. at 616. But the court rejected the argument that Hall's disqualification could be imputed to Latham. It explained that "[t]he statute provides that a person who is an officer is disqualified; it does not provide further that the law firm in which the officer is a partner is also not disinterested." Ibid.

The district court then considered "whether Latham is disqualified because of its own involvement with the debtor." Id. at 619. The court stated that it was "inclined to remand this matter to the bankruptcy court for further proceedings" to determine whether Latham was disqualified because it, and not just Hall, had served as Keravision's corporate secretary. Id. at 620. Because the United States Trustee had not pressed that argument, however, the court simply affirmed the order appointing the firm. See ibid.

The case was eventually converted from Chapter 11 to Chapter 7 under 11 U.S.C. § 1112(b), and Latham filed a final fee application, seeking fees and expenses of approximately $178,000. See E.R. 1-2. The United States Trustee again objected. The bankruptcy court overruled the objection and approved Latham's compensation. See ibid. In response to the United States Trustee's motion for a stay, the court allowed Latham to remove its retainer from Keravision's trust account, but it ordered that the funds be kept in a separate, interest-bearing account segregated from Latham's operating account.[2]

The United States Trustee again appealed to the district court. That court affirmed, relying on the reasons stated in its prior opinion. See E.R. 3.

[2] The bankruptcy court's order was entered on March 6, 2003, after the case was appealed to the district court. Although it is not part of the record as defined by Fed. R. App. P. 6(b)(2)(B)(iii), this Court may take judicial notice of it. See Fed. R. Evid. 201; Papai v. Harbor Tug & Barge Co., 67 F.3d 203, 207 n.5 (9th Cir. 1995) ("Judicial notice is properly taken of orders and decisions made by other courts or administrative agencies"), rev'd on other grounds, 520 U.S. 548 (1997). The order is reprinted in an addendum to this brief.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Bankruptcy Code provides that "professional persons" such as attorneys may be retained by a debtor-in-possession only if they are "disinterested." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). Under the Code, a person is not disinterested if he or she served as "a director, officer, or employee of the debtor" within two years prior to the filing of the petition. Id. § 101(14)(D). A law firm is a "person" under the Code and is subject to the disinterestedness requirement. See id. § 101(41). But a firm, which is simply an association of individuals, cannot be disinterested unless the individuals it comprises are themselves disinterested. The bankruptcy court therefore erred when it appointed Latham & Watkins in this case even though one of its partners was not "disinterested" because he had previously served as the debtor's corporate secretary.

The bankruptcy court's appointment of Latham is fundamentally inconsistent with the purposes underlying the disinterested-person requirement. When attorneys are appointed to assist the debtor-in-possession, their true client is the bankruptcy estate, not the debtor. The requirement of disinterestedness is important because it ensures that if the attorneys discover that the estate has a claim against a former officer of the debtor, they will not hesitate to pursue it. But if the officer in question is one of their law partners, they will face a conflict of interest, and they may be reluctant to act. For this reason, principles of professional responsibility generally provide that when an attorney is disqualified from a representation because of a personal interest, the disqualification is imputed to his or her firm. Section 327(a) should be interpreted consistently with these principles.

The bankruptcy court apparently believed that its appointment of Latham was permissible because the firm did not have an actual conflict of interest in this case. In so holding, it failed to appreciate that sections 327(a) and 101(14)(D) establish a prophylactic rule of disqualification intended to prevent even the potential for conflict. The court erred in substituting its own assessment of conflict for Congress's categorical judgment.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Because this Court "is in as good a position as the district court to review the findings of the bankruptcy court, [it] independently review[s] the bankruptcy court's decision." In re Emery, 317 F.3d 1064, 1069 (9th Cir. 2003). The only issues in this appeal are questions of law, and the bankruptcy court's legal conclusions are reviewed de novo. See ibid.

ARGUMENT

THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S APPOINTMENT OF LATHAM & WATKINS AS COUNSEL TO KERAVISION WAS INCONSISTENT WITH THE DISINTERESTEDNESS REQUIREMENT OF 11 U.S.C. § 327(a).

Under the Bankruptcy Code, "professional persons" such as attorneys may be appointed to assist a debtor-in-possession only if they are "disinterested." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). The Code's definition of "person" extends to law firms, see id. § 101(41), and the Code draws no distinction between the disinterestedness requirement that it imposes on a law-firm "person" and that which it imposes upon natural persons, see id. § 327(a). As a logical matter, an association of individuals, such as a law firm, cannot be disinterested when the individuals it comprises are not themselves "disinterested." Because one of Latham's partners was not "disinterested," the firm should not have been appointed in this case. The bankruptcy court's award of fees was therefore unauthorized by 11 U.S.C. § 330(a).

The bankruptcy court's contrary holding is not only inconsistent with the plain language of the statute, it also undermines the statutory purpose and contravenes established principles of professional responsibility. The court erred because it failed to appreciate that Congress rejected a regime in which courts evaluate interest on a case-by-case basis, instead creating a bright-line prophylactic rule aimed at eliminating even the potential for a conflict of interest.

A. The Purpose of the Disinterestedness Requirement in Section 327(a) is to Avoid Even a Potential Conflict of Interest That Might Prejudice the Bankruptcy Estate.

1. The history of section 327(a) demonstrates that the purpose of the disinterestedness requirement is to ensure that counsel hired by the debtor-in-possession protects the interests of the estate. The requirement of a "disinterested" participant in corporate bankruptcy proceedings has its origins in the Chandler Act of 1938. See Chandler Act, ch. 575, §§ 156-58, 52 Stat. 840, 888 (1938). In enacting that statute, Congress explained that reforms to the bankruptcy law were necessary because the prior rules governing corporate reorganizations had been manipulated by insiders of debtor corporations. A House Report quoted at length from the testimony of William O. Douglas, then Commissioner of the Securities and Exchange Commission, who outlined the abuses that unchecked insider control had permitted under the prior system:

> The record [shows] that plans of reorganization were frequently dictated by a single interest -- by a closely-knit inside group . . . . These conclusions indicate that something must be done to provide impartial, capable control over reorganizations.

H.R. Rep. No. 75-1409, at 37 (1937). Commissioner Douglas explained that insider manipulation had been made possible by the fact that "[a] debtor [corporation] may remain in possession of the property; or one of its officials may be appointed trustee for the debtor," which he thought permitted insiders to evade any meaningful scrutiny from, or responsibility to, interests other than their own. Ibid.

To solve the problem of unchecked insider control over the reorganization process, the Chandler Act required judges to appoint "one or more trustees" in any reorganization involving a corporate debtor owing $250,000 or more. Chandler Act § 156. These trustees, as well as any attorneys appointed to represent them, were required to be "disinterested." Id. §§ 156, 157. No person could be considered "disinterested" if he had been, within two years prior to the date on which the bankruptcy petition was filed, a "director, officer, or employee of the debtor." Id. § 158. The House Report noted that the importance of these "disinterested" trustees was "difficult to overemphasize," H.R. Rep. No. 75-1409, at 43, observing that "[t]he central problem in reorganization is to see to it that . . . power is not exploited by reorganizers but appropriated for the benefit of investors," and that the "shift in power, inherent in the device of an independent trustee, is basic and fundamental if the reorganization system is to be reconstituted in the interest of investors," id. at 44.

2. The bankruptcy law has been amended several times since the Chandler Act. Under the new system, the appointment of a trustee is not mandatory in corporate reorganizations -- that is, a debtor corporation may be permitted to serve as "debtor-in-possession."

In cases where there is not an independent trustee, it is all the more important that the "professional persons" through whom the debtor participates in the bankruptcy proceeding be "disinterested." That is why section 327(a) requires the debtor-in-possession to obtain the court's approval before retaining any attorney or other "professional perso[n]" to represent or assist it in carrying out its duties, and prohibits the court from approving the employment of any professional person who is not "disinterested." Only with such a safeguard in place can a debtor corporation be trusted to retain possession of its assets during a reorganization -- to be, in effect, both debtor and trustee. See 11 U.S.C. § 1107(a) (with specified exceptions, "a debtor in possession shall have all the rights . . . and powers, and shall perform all the functions and duties . . . of a trustee").

The debtor-in-possession bears a fiduciary duty to the debtor's creditors. See Wolf v. Weinstein, 372 U.S. 633, 649 (1963) ("[S]o long as the Debtor remains in possession, it is clear that the corporation bears essentially the same fiduciary obligation to the creditors as does the trustee for the Debtor out of possession"); In re McConville, 110 F.3d 47, 49 (9th Cir. 1997). The appointed attorney has a similar duty. See In re Park-Helena Corp., 63 F.3d 877, 880 (9th Cir. 1995) ("[A]ttorneys who represent the debtor [must] do so in the best interests of the bankruptcy estate"); In re Interwest Bus. Equip., Inc., 23 F.3d 311, 317 (10th Cir. 1994) (describing the professional's duty "to independently serve the trustee"). After all, the true client of counsel to the debtor-in-possession is not the debtor itself, but the bankruptcy estate. See In re Perez, 30 F.3d 1209, 1219 (9th Cir. 1994). Congress has determined that only counsel completely free of "interest" can be relied upon to fulfill these fiduciary obligations. See Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 58 (1st Cir. 1994) (explaining that the disinterestedness requirements "serve the important policy of ensuring that all professionals . . . tender undivided loyalty and provide untainted advice and assistance in furtherance of their fiduciary responsibilities").

Experience has borne out Congress' concern that if attorneys for a debtor-in-possession are insufficiently detached from the corporation's insiders, insiders will often seize the opportunity to abuse the bankruptcy process for their own ends. Attorneys for debtors-in-possession fail to satisfy their obligation to check the self-serving actions of insiders when, for example, they acquiesce in reorganization plans that improperly benefit the corporation's insiders to the detriment of the corporation's creditors, see, e.g., In re Kendavis Indus. Int'l, Inc., 91 B.R. 742 (Bankr. N.D. Tex. 1988); or assist insiders in sabotaging the creditors' efforts to get a true picture of the corporation's financial condition, see, e.g., In re Bonneville Pac. Corp., 147 B.R. 803 (Bankr. D. Utah 1992), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, Hansen, Jones & Leta, P.C. v. Segal, 220 B.R. 434 (D. Utah 1998); or decline to investigate the insiders' decision to sell off the corporation's assets, see, e.g., In re Wilde Horse Enterps., 136 B.R. 830 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1991).

3. In section 327(a), Congress sought to prevent not just actual conflicts of interest but also situations that posed potential conflicts. The statute separately provides that appointed professionals may not "represent an interest adverse to the estate." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). The "disinterestedness" requirement is a distinct and independent statutory criterion that must be satisfied whether or not the professional actually has an adverse interest. It sets up a bright-line prophylactic rule to eliminate the need for case-by-case inquiry into the existence of a conflict. See Interwest Bus. Equip., 23 F.3d at 316 n.9 ("§ 327(a) is prophylactic 'to insure that the undivided loyalty and exclusive allegiance required of a fiduciary to an estate in bankruptcy is not compromised'") (quoting In re Prudent Holding Corp., 153 B.R. 629, 631 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1993)); In re Federated Dep't Stores, Inc., 44 F.3d 1310, 1319 (6th Cir. 1995) ("Congress sought to disqualify professionals with the appearance of a conflict of interest as well as those who have an actual conflict of interest"). Under section 327(a), even if the professional would not have an actual conflict of interest -- indeed, even if the appointment might provide "practical benefits" -- a bankruptcy court is barred from appointing a professional who is not "disinterested." United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 142 (3d Cir. 1994).

B. Permitting A Law Firm That Is Not Composed Of "Disinterested Persons" To Qualify As A "Disinterested Person" Would Undermine The Purpose Of The "Disinterested Person" Requirement.

1. The bankruptcy court's holding -- that a firm may be appointed to represent the estate even when one of its partners is not "disinterested" -- is contrary to the purposes for which the "disinterested person" requirement was created. The Supreme Court has stressed "[o]ver and over" that "[i]n expounding a statute, [courts] must not be guided by a single sentence or member of a sentence, but look to the provisions of the whole law, and to its object and policy." Regions Hosp. v. Shalala, 522 U.S. 448, 460 n.5 (1998); see also Davis v. Michigan Dep't of Treasury, 489 U.S. 803, 809 (1989) ("It is a fundamental canon of statutory construction that the words of a statute must be read in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme"). The bankruptcy court's conclusion that a law firm may be considered disinterested despite the interest of its former-officer partner seriously undermines the "object and policy" underlying the disinterested-person requirement.

As a practical matter, a firm that is partly composed of "interested persons" cannot be relied upon to act in the thoroughly detached fashion in which a truly "disinterested" person would act. For example, if a disinterested individual serving as counsel to the debtor-in-possession were to uncover evidence indicating that the officers of the debtor corporation were liable for wrongdoing committed before the bankruptcy filing, he or she would not hesitate to initiate a lawsuit against the officers to recover money and property which rightfully belongs to the bankruptcy estate. See, e.g., Trone v. Smith, 621 F.2d 994, 996 (9th Cir. 1980) (trustee initiated legal action against officers of the debtor corporation); In re Sally Shops, Inc., 50 B.R. 264, 265 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1985) (same). As the Tenth Circuit has put it, "[t]he jaundiced eye and scowling mien of counsel for the debtor should fall upon all who have done business with the debtor recently enough to be potential targets for the recovery of assets of the estate." Interwest Bus. Equip., 23 F.3d at 316, quoting In re McKinney Ranch Assoc., 62 B.R. 249, 255 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. 1986).

But if counsel for the debtor-in-possession is a law firm with a partner or partners who are, or recently were, officers of the debtor, the firm's loyalty to the bankruptcy estate could be impaired. The detachment and vigilance of the "interested" attorney's partners would be undermined by a natural reluctance to initiate a legal action that might subject their own former-officer partner to liability. As one court has explained, "[i]t defies reason and belief to suggest that [a] firm can exercise the independence of judgment necessary to the performance of its duties" when those duties "may well include taking a position adverse to the interests" of one of its partners. In re Michigan Interstate Ry. Co., Inc., 32 B.R. 327, 330 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 1983); see also In re Essential Therapeutics, Inc., ___ B.R. ___, 2003 WL 21398001, *6 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003) ("[I]t is entirely possible that officers of the Debtor may be subject to suit or, at a minimum, to questions regarding their role in the Debtors' demise. It would be impossible for [a firm with a former-officer partner] to adequately represent the Debtors' interests in that event") (footnote omitted).

Specifically, the "interested" attorney's partners would be less motivated to seek out evidence of wrongdoing by the debtor corporation's officers than "disinterested" counsel would be. They also would be inclined to exercise less vigilant scrutiny over the debtor corporation's business plans than would "disinterested" counsel, because they would think it possible that their former-officer partner had a hand in creating the plans, or could in any case be held legally responsible for them by virtue of his former position. And this sort of lax oversight might be exactly what the debtor's insiders intended -- a financially ailing debtor might appoint as one of its officers a partner of a large law firm for the express purpose of having a friendly firm representing the estate in a Chapter 11 proceeding.

2. We do not suggest that Latham & Watkins or its attorneys have been involved in such manipulation, or that they have in any way behaved unethically in this case. But as we have explained, Congress expressly declined to leave determinations as to whether recent service as an officer of the debtor corporation gives rise to disqualifying "interest" to case-by-case inquiry. Instead, it created a per se rule of disqualification. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 101(14)(D), 327(a). Because Congress has clearly expressed its preference for a categorical rule, courts are bound to respect its judgment.

In departing from the bright-line rule of section 327(a), the bankruptcy court produced an internally inconsistent holding. The court believed that a firm may be disinterested even when some of its partners are not disinterested. But at the same time, it ordered two Latham partners, including Michael Hall, to sell stock that they held in the debtor. See 273 B.R. at 615. The Code provides that a person is not disinterested if he owns stock in the debtor. See 11 U.S.C. § 101(14)(A). But under the bankruptcy court's approach, it should have been permissible for some of Latham's partners to own stock, because their lack of disinterestedness would not be imputed to the firm as long as they did not participate in the representation.

Perhaps the bankruptcy court could conclude that stock ownership created an actual conflict, giving the firm an "interest adverse to the estate." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). The district court made this idea explicit, suggesting that "depending on the circumstances," a court might decline to appoint a firm if it concluded that the firm was an insider, or that it had an interest adverse to the estate. 273 B.R. at 618. But this approach even more obviously eliminates the per se rule of the statute and replaces it with case-specific investigation of actual conflicts. But cf. In re Essential Therapeutics, 2003 WL 21398001, *6 (observing that a case-by-case inquiry would entail the "herculean task" of "interrogat[ing] all the members (and even associates) of the firm . . . to ascertain whether the actions of the attorney who served as an officer of the debtor would impair their ability to act on behalf of the debtor and the estate in an impartial manner"). As we have shown, that interpretation improperly undermines Congress's decision to adopt a prophylactic rule.

C. The Bankruptcy Court's Interpretation of Section 327(a) Is Contrary to Basic Principles of Professional Responsibility.

1. General principles of professional responsibility also show that the disqualifying interest of an attorney should be imputed to his or her firm. The bankruptcy court therefore erred when it appointed Latham & Watkins, because it failed to construe section 327(a) so as to make it consistent, rather than inconsistent, with well-settled background legal principles. See Astoria Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Solimino, 501 U.S. 104, 108 (1991) ("[W]here a common-law principle is well established . . . the courts may take it as given that Congress has legislated with an expectation that the principle will apply except 'when a statutory purpose to the contrary is evident'") (quoting Isbrandtsen Co. v. Johnson, 343 U.S. 779, 783 (1952)).

Under the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, a lawyer may not represent a client when "there is a significant risk that the representation . . . will be materially limited by . . . a personal interest of the lawyer." Model Rule 1.7(a)(2). The California rule is similar.

California Rule of Professional Conduct 3-310(B)(2) restricts the representation of a client when the attorney "previously had a legal, business, financial, professional, or personal relationship with a party or witness in the same matter [and] the previous relationship would substantially affect" the representation. See also Rule 3-310(B)(4) (restricting representation when the attorney "has or had a legal, business, financial, or professional interest in the subject matter of the representation").

Congress's judgment, expressed in 11 U.S.C. § 327(a), is that prior service as an officer of the debtor automatically disqualifies an attorney from appointment as counsel to the estate. In other words, Congress has made a categorical determination that such service creates a "significant risk" that the representation "will be materially limited," and that the service may "substantially affect" the representation.

To be sure, the rules of professional responsibility sometimes permit conflicts to be waived by the client. See Model Rule 1.7(b)(4) (permitting representation if "each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing"); Cal. Rule Prof. Conduct 3-310(B) (permitting representation if the attorney "provid[es] written disclosure to the client"). But in the bankruptcy context, the client is the entire estate, rather than an individual or identified group of individuals, so it is not possible to provide disclosure or to obtain the client's consent.

And crucially, when an attorney is disqualified by reason of a conflict of interest, the disqualification is imputed to all of the attorneys at the same firm. See Model Rule 1.10(a) ("While lawyers are associated in a firm, none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so by Rules 1.7 or 1.9"); Henriksen v. Great American Sav. & Loan, 14 Cal. Rptr. 2d 184, 187 (Cal. Ct. App. 1992) ("As a general rule in California, where an attorney is disqualified from representation, the entire law firm is vicariously disqualified as well"). This rule is based on "the premise that a firm of lawyers is essentially one lawyer for purposes of the rules governing loyalty to the client." Model Rule 1.10, cmt. 2. Section 327(a) should be interpreted consistently with this background principle of professional ethics.

2. The bankruptcy court held that Latham & Watkins did not need to be disqualified as long as Michael Hall, the interested partner, did not participate in the representation. See 273 B.R. at 615. The court apparently believed that screening Hall from the representation would eliminate any conflict of interest. But as we have explained, section 327(a) is concerned with more than simply actual conflicts of interest. The bankruptcy court does not have discretion to disregard the statute's per se rule of disqualification, even if it believes that no actual conflict is present. See Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d at 142.

In any event, under general principles of professional responsibility, "screening" is not an appropriate response to a potential conflict of interest. Screening primarily serves the function of ensuring that confidential information held by the screened-off attorney is not shared with other attorneys in the firm representing clients with adverse interests. In the bankruptcy context, screening may block the flow of confidential information and may prevent "interested" attorneys from directly taking part in the representation, but it cannot remove the hesitation that the interested attorney's partners will feel when they discover that cause exists for recommending lawsuits against the debtor's insiders -- including against their own law partner, in his capacity as a former officer of the debtor corporation. Nor can it erase the other partners' natural tendency to take a favorable view of business plans which they know or suspect that their law partner was involved in developing.

For these reasons, screening generally is not considered an adequate solution to conflicts arising from an interested attorney's membership in a law firm, and the ABA Model Rules limit screening to conflicts caused by successive government and private employment, where a more lenient rule is "necessary to prevent the disqualification rule from imposing too severe a deterrent against entering public service." Model Rule 1.11, cmt. 4; accord Henriksen, 14 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 187-88 (applying California Rules of Professional Conduct). In all other situations, an attorney's disqualifying interest disqualifies the entire firm, whether or not the attorney is screened. See Model Rule 1.10. Even if Hall took no part in the representation, Latham still should have been disqualified in this case.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the district court should be reversed, and the case should be remanded with instructions to reverse the order granting the final application for attorney's fees.

REPLY BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

INTRODUCTION

The Bankruptcy Code provides that a debtor-in-possession may retain "professional persons" such as attorneys only if the professionals are "disinterested." 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). Under the Code, a person is not disinterested if he or she served as "a director, officer, or employee of the debtor" within two years prior to the filing of the petition. Id. § 101(14)(D). In our opening brief, we showed that the bankruptcy court erred in appointing Latham & Watkins as counsel to the estate because one of the firm's partners had previously served as the debtor's corporate secretary.

Keravision does not dispute that one of the Latham & Watkins partners was an "officer" of the debtor and hence was not "disinterested." But it argues that his disqualification should not disqualify the firm. Under Keravision's theory, the disinterestedness of a law firm with "interested" partners should be evaluated by an ad hoc, standardless inquiry into whether the firm has an interest that would prejudice the representation. This theory is at odds with the statutory text, which sets out a specific definition of "disinterested." It also undermines the statutory purpose, which is to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy system by establishing a broad prophylactic rule that eliminates even the possibility of a conflict of interest. And it makes the statute inconsistent with background principles of professional responsibility, under which the disqualification of an attorney normally is imputed to his or her firm. It therefore should be rejected.

Keravision urges that Latham & Watkins be paid a fee even if its representation in this case was unlawful. This argument overlooks that a firm that is not "disinterested" has no statutory entitlement to payment. Permitting firms to be paid for work performed in violation of the statute would encourage firms to evade the safeguards established by Congress.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S APPOINTMENT OF LATHAM & WATKINS AS COUNSEL TO KERAVISION WAS INCONSISTENT WITH THE DISINTERESTEDNESS REQUIREMENT OF 11 U.S.C. § 327(a).

Title 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) provides that "professional persons" providing services to a bankruptcy trustee -- or to the debtor-in-possession, acting as trustee -- must be "disinterested." Under § 101(41), law firms are considered "persons" and therefore are subject to the disinterestedness requirement. In our opening brief, we explained that the disinterestedness of a firm depends on whether the individuals who make up the firm satisfy the definition of "disinterested" set out in § 101(14). Keravision, in response, advocates an ad hoc inquiry into whether the firm's representation of the estate would be prejudiced. See Appellee's Brief ("Br.") at 41. Keravision's argument should be rejected. Examining whether a firm's members are "disinterested" is supported by the statutory structure, better serves the statutory purpose, makes the statute conform to basic background principles of professional responsibility, and is the approach taken by most courts.

A. The Structure of the "Disinterested Person" Definition in 11 U.S.C. § 101(14) Suggests that the Disinterestedness of a Law Firm Should Be Evaluated by Examining the Individual Attorneys in the Firm.

The structure of the "disinterested person" definition in § 101(14) suggests that a law firm is disinterested if and only if the individuals it comprises are themselves disinterested. Law firms are subject to the disinterestedness requirement because § 327(a) requires professional "persons" to be disinterested, while § 101(41) defines "person" to include a law firm. But several of the components of the "disinterested person" definition can only apply to natural persons. In law, as in ordinary usage, the terms "director, officer, or employee," § 101(14)(D), refer to natural persons, not to corporations or partnerships. Likewise, only an individual can be an "insider," at least insofar as that term is defined to include a "relative of a general partner, director, officer, or person in control of the debtor." §§ 101(14)(A), 101(31)(B)(vi). That provision is further evidence that "director" and "officer" refer to natural persons, for a partnership or corporation surely could not have a "relative." If these components of the "disinterested person" definition are to have any effect when the "person" in question is a law firm, it can only be by looking at the attorneys who make up the firm.

Keravision argues that a law firm can sometimes be an "officer." Br. at 16. Its only authority for this proposition is In re Capitol Metals Co., 228 B.R. 724 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1998). In that case, Peterson, the debtor's CFO, was one of two principals of ABC Capital Markets Group; the other was Peterson's wife. See id. at 725. After filing a Chapter 11 petition, the debtor sought to employ ABC as a financial advisor and investment banker. See ibid. Such an appointment would be clearly prohibited if Peterson's disqualifying interest were imputed to his firm. But the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel was constrained to reject a rule of imputed disqualification by In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp., 211 B.R. 699 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1997), the same case relied on by the bankruptcy court here. Accordingly, the Capitol Metals court held that ABC was disqualified because the company had also served as the debtor's CFO. See 228 B.R. at 727. In other words, the court was compelled -- by the very rule advocated by Keravision in this case -- to adopt a strained construction of the term "officer" in order to disqualify an obviously interested firm. The court did not discuss the definition of the term "officer" at any length, and so far as we are aware, Capitol Metals is the only case to suggest that a corporation can be an "officer."

Even Keravision does not argue that a corporation or partnership can be an "employee" or a "director" for purposes of § 101(14). So if those components of the statute are to have any effect when the professional person is a law firm, it can only be by looking at the individual professionals within the firm.

Keravision emphasizes the contrast between Rule 5002(a) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, which expressly provides that another type of disqualification must be imputed to a disqualified individual's law firm, and § 327(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, which does not explicitly mention imputation.

See Br. at 15-16. From this it infers that § 327(a) must not require a firm's disqualification based on its partner's "interest." This reasoning is flawed. To be sure, "[w]here Congress includes particular language in one section of a statute but omits it in another section of the same Act, it is generally presumed that Congress acts intentionally and purposely in the disparate inclusion or exclusion." Bates v. United States, 522 U.S. 23, 29-30 (1997). But Rule 5002 does not appear in the "same Act" or even in any other Act. It was not enacted by Congress, but rather was drafted by the advisory committee and adopted by the Supreme Court. Sound inferences as to Congress's intent may not be drawn by comparing the language that Congress placed in a statute with the language that an advisory committee placed in a rule. Indeed, such an inference is precluded by the Rules Enabling Act, which bars any use of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure to "abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right." 28 U.S.C. § 2075.

B. Imputed Disqualification Best Promotes the Prophylactic Purposes of Section 327(a).

In addition to being the most natural interpretation of the statutory text, disqualifying a firm when its members are not "disinterested" promotes the purpose of 11 U.S.C. § 327(a). As we explained in our opening brief (pp. 15-16), that purpose is to avoid even the appearance of a conflict of interest that would prejudice the estate. A truly disinterested professional might determine that it is in the best interest of the estate to pursue legal action against the debtor's former directors. See In re Interwest Bus. Equip., Inc., 23 F.3d 311, 316 (10th Cir. 1994); In re Essential Therapeutics, Inc., 295 B.R. 203, 211 (Bankr. D. Del. 2003). If a law firm representing the estate includes some of those former directors, it cannot realistically be expected to act in a disinterested fashion.

At a minimum, a firm with "interested" members would give the appearance of not being disinterested -- an appearance Congress sought to avoid by adopting a very broad conflict rule in § 327(a). See In re Federated Dep't Stores, Inc., 44 F.3d 1310, 1319 (6th Cir. 1995) ("Congress sought to disqualify professionals with the appearance of a conflict of interest as well as those who have an actual conflict of interest"). If Congress's concern had been simply actual conflicts of interest, then most of the specific prohibitions in § 101(14) would be superfluous; the statute would only need to include § 101(14)(E), which requires that professionals "not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate." Congress enacted the categorical prohibitions in § 101(14) in order to make absolutely certain that counsel would "tender undivided loyalty and provide untainted advice and assistance" to the trustee. Rome v. Braunstein, 19 F.3d 54, 58 (1st Cir. 1994). As a fiduciary, counsel owes the estate "[n]ot honesty alone, but the punctilio of an honor the most sensitive.” Meinhard v. Salmon, 164 N.E. 545, 546 (N.Y. 1928).

Keravision argues that a rule of imputed disqualification will “penaliz[e] a party,” Br. at 26, or “den[y] debtors their preferred choice of counsel,” Br. at 50. This reflects a fundamental confusion about whom counsel for the estate represents. As this Court has explained, counsel in Chapter 11 cases “must keep firmly in mind that [their] client is the estate and not the debtor individually.” In re Perez, 30 F.3d 1209, 1219 (9th Cir. 1994). Section 327(a) permits the retention of professional persons not to represent the debtor’s interests, but to “assist the trustee,” or the debtor-in-possession acting as a trustee, “in carrying out the trustee’s duties” to the estate. After all, the debtor-in-possession has a “fiduciary obligation to creditors and shareholders.” CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355. The “willingness of courts to leave debtors in possession is premised upon an assurance” that debtors “can be depended upon to carry out the fiduciary responsibilities of a trustee” rather than to promote their own interests. Ibid (quotation marks omitted). To provide such assurance, Congress has directed that the professionals who assist debtors must be approved by the court and must meet statutory standards of disinterestedness. See 11 U.S.C. § 327. The debtor’s own interests or preferences about its counsel should not override the safeguards that Congress established in order to protect the estate.

Nor does it matter that a law firm may have a "long-term relationshi[p]" with the debtor. Br. at 49. Congress has unequivocally specified that professionals may not represent the estate unless they are "disinterested" -- a requirement that often disqualifies professionals who have long-term relationships with debtors. Any "practical benefits" that might be provided by employing a non-"disinterested" professional are simply not relevant, given the mandatory language of § 327(a). United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 142 (3d Cir. 1994). In any event, Keravision acknowledges that many large firms have bankruptcy practices, and the estate in this case could have received competent representation from one of them. See Br. at 50 n.14, 51.

Keravision argues that the bankruptcy court should perform an ad hoc assessment in each case of whether a law firm with an "interested" member is likely to lack "the requisite independent judgment and impartial attitude." Br. at 41, quoting In re O'Connor, 52 B.R. 892, 899 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. 1985). Keravision does not explain what standard a bankruptcy court would apply in conducting such an evaluation. To the extent that Keravision would have the bankruptcy court look for actual conflicts of interest, its approach is inconsistent with the statute. As we have shown, § 327(a) is intended to prevent not just actual conflicts, but also the appearance of conflict. Cf. 11 U.S.C. § 327(a) (court may appoint professionals "that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons") (emphasis added).

In any case, whatever the precise standard envisioned by Keravision, its approach would entail serious practical problems. First, the bankruptcy court often will be unable to determine whether the presence in a law firm of an "interested" attorney will affect the firm's handling of the representation. For example, Keravision proposes a regime in which the bankruptcy court must monitor the firm to ensure that it is "engag[ing] in adequate investigation." Br. at 35. But the bankruptcy court is unlikely to have enough information to monitor the firm's investigation in a meaningful fashion. If the firm discovers, but then suppresses, evidence suggesting that the interested partner might be liable to the estate, the bankruptcy court will never learn of it.

Second, the ongoing monitoring envisioned by Keravision would create the possibility that a firm might have to be disqualified in the middle of a case once a conflict of interest becomes apparent. See Br. at 35 n.12. Requiring the substitution of counsel in the middle of a case would impose additional costs on the estate, prejudicing the interests of creditors. That is why appointment decisions under § 327(a) are to be made at the beginning of the case. See In re Martin, 817 F.2d 175, 183 (1st Cir. 1987) (disqualification "must be judged prospectively"); In re RKC Dev. Corp., 205 B.R. 869, 872 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1997) (It is "the responsibility of the Court to determine qualification at the commencement of the case and not . . . address the issues after the fact"). The scheme contemplated by Keravision would contravene this sound practice. It therefore should be rejected.

C. Basic Principles of Professional Responsibility Suggest that Section 327(a) Should Be Interpreted to Establish a Rule of Imputed Disqualification.

In our opening brief, we showed that under general rules of professional responsibility, a conflict of interest that disqualifies one attorney will be imputed to other attorneys in the same firm. Keravision apparently misunderstands the significance of this fact, because it devotes a section of its brief to demonstrating that its representation in this case did not violate the California Rules of Professional Conduct. See Br. at 51-55. That may well be true; as we have explained, the "disinterest" standard that § 327(a) imposes in bankruptcy cases is much stricter than the conflict-of-interest rules governing lawyers generally. Principles of professional responsibility are relevant in this case not because they prohibit the representation of their own force, but because they offer a guide to the interpretation of § 327(a). In accordance with those principles, the statutory disqualification of attorneys who are not "disinterested" should be imputed to their law firms.

The Supreme Court has held that statutes should be "read with a presumption favoring the retention of long-established and familiar principles." Isbrandtsen Co. v. Johnson, 343 U.S. 779, 783 (1952). Courts "may fairly presume that Congress is aware of the common-law background against which it legislates," Chappell v. Robbins, 73 F.3d 918, 924 (9th Cir. 1996), and that "where a common-law principle is well established," Congress "has legislated with an expectation that the principle will apply," Astoria Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Solimino, 501 U.S. 104, 108 (1991). For this reason, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code governing disqualification of counsel should be read so that they are consistent, rather than inconsistent, with general principles of professional responsibility.

The "traditional presumption" of the law governing professional responsibility is that an interest that disqualifies one attorney also disqualifies any affiliated attorneys. Developments in the Law -- Conflicts of Interest in the Legal Profession, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 1244, 1361 (1981). The ABA's Model Code of Professional Responsibility stated unequivocally: "If a lawyer is required to decline employment or to withdraw from employment under a Disciplinary Rule, no partner or associate, or any other lawyer affiliated with him or his firm may accept or continue such employment." ABA Model Code of Professional Responsibility, Disciplinary Rule 5-105(D) (1974). And the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which have been adopted by a substantial majority of the States, are similar. See Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr. & W. William Hodes, The Law of Lawyering § 1.15 (3d ed. 2001 & 2003 Supp.). Under Model Rule 1.10(a), when lawyers are affiliated in a firm, "none of them shall knowingly represent a client when any one of them practicing alone would be prohibited from doing so" by the rules governing conflicts. ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.10(a) (2003); accord Henriksen v. Great American Sav. & Loan, 14 Cal. Rptr. 2d 184, 187 (Cal. Ct. App. 1992) (reaching same result under California Rules of Professional Responsibility); see also Restatement (Third) of the Law Governing Lawyers § 123 (2000) ("[T]he restrictions upon a lawyer imposed by [the provisions governing conflicts] also restrict other affiliated lawyers who . . . are associated with that lawyer in rendering legal services to others through a law partnership"). As the Restatement explains, this rule reflects the reality that "lawyers in a law firm . . . ordinarily share each other's interests," which means that if one lawyer has an interest that gives him or her "an incentive to violate an obligation" to a client, "an affiliated lawyer will often have similar incentive." Id., comment b.

Keravision cites three cases that, it says, reject a per se rule of imputed disqualification. See Br. at 39. Its reading of the cases is incorrect. The California decision, Adams v. Aerojet-General Corp., 104 Cal. Rptr. 2d 116, 122 (Cal. Ct. App. 2001), stated flatly: "It is now firmly established that where the attorney is disqualified from representation due to an ethical conflict, the disqualification extends to his entire firm." The court merely declined to apply this rule in reverse by disqualifying an attorney in a case where his former firm would have been conflicted. See ibid. Of the two bankruptcy court decisions that Keravision cites, one actually applied the principle of imputed disqualification and disqualified a law firm because one of its associates had an interest adverse to the estate. See In re Cropper Co., 35 B.R. 625, 632 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 1983) ("Even though Mr. Griffin is an associate of Sell & Melton rather than a partner, his disqualification results in the disqualification of all members of that law firm"). In the other case, the court did not disqualify the firm, but it reached this decision after finding that the individual attorney had done nothing disqualifying. See In re Lawrence, 217 B.R. 658, 664-665 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1998). Although the court directed that the attorney in question be screened from the representation, it did so only "out of an abundance of caution." Id. at 662.

Thus, the established rule is that the disqualification of an attorney is imputed to his or her law firm. Section 327(a) should be interpreted in accordance with this principle.

D. A Rule of Imputed Disqualification Is Consistent with the Approach Taken by Most Courts.

Keravision errs in suggesting that most courts have rejected a rule of imputed disqualification. Br. at 21-32. No court of appeals has addressed the question, and although some bankruptcy courts and district courts have adopted the view urged by Keravision, most courts have held that the "interest" of an attorney is imputed to his or her law firm. See Essential Therapeutics, 295 B.R. at 208-09 (citing cases); see also In re Vebeliunas, 231 B.R. 181, 196 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1999) ("The general rule is that when one member of a firm is disqualified, all members of that firm must be similarly disqualified"); In re Tinley Plaza Assocs., L.P., 142 B.R. 272, 277 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1992) ("If an attorney who is a member of a law firm is disqualified . . . then all the members of the attorney's law firm are also disqualified"); In re Wells Benrus Corp., 48 B.R. 196, 199 (Bankr. D. Conn. 1985) ("The disqualification of any attorney pursuant to Code § 327(a) causes every attorney in that attorney's firm to be disqualified as well").

II. "EQUITABLE CONSIDERATIONS" DO NOT PERMIT LATHAM & WATKINS TO RECEIVE PAYMENT FOR SERVICES THAT IT PROVIDED IN VIOLATION OF SECTION 327(a).

Keravision argues that "equitable considerations" permit Latham & Watkins to be paid fees as counsel to the bankruptcy estate even if its service was contrary to law. Br. at 55. That is incorrect. Because the firm was not "disinterested," its appointment violated the explicit requirements of § 327(a). The firm therefore has no statutory right to payment, and this Court should reverse the order awarding fees.

A. At the outset, we note that Keravision is incorrect when it suggests that this case involves "disgorgement" of Latham's fee. Br. at 55, 57. To be sure, if Latham had already been paid, disgorgement would be appropriate here. Disgorgement is a standard remedy when an attorney has collected fees in a Chapter 11 case despite being ineligible under § 327(a) to provide professional services. See, e.g., In re Occidental Fin. Group, Inc., 40 F.3d 1059, 1062-63 (9th Cir. 1994); cf. In re First Jersey Sec., Inc., 180 F.3d 504, 514 n.9 (3d Cir. 1999). More generally, this Court has explained that disgorgement of unlawfully collected funds in a bankruptcy case is appropriate whenever a party had timely notice that its ability to collect those funds was under challenge. See In re Cascade Roads, Inc., 34 F.3d 756, 761 (9th Cir. 1994) (because "[t]he trustee is a party to this appeal and has been aware at all times that the United States would seek appellate review," it would not be "inequitable" to order disgorgement of a judgment against which the United States claimed an offset); In re International Envtl. Dynamics, Inc., 718 F.2d 322, 326 (9th Cir. 1983) (since counsel for creditors "has known since [the fees were disbursed] that [the trustee] contests the bankruptcy court's order that he be paid," it would not be "inequitable" to order disgorgement of the fees). Here, of course, Latham & Watkins has known since the beginning of the case that the United States Trustee challenged the propriety of its appointment. Equity therefore would not bar disgorgement.

This case, however, does not involve disgorgement. The contested fees have not yet been paid to Latham & Watkins. Instead, the bankruptcy court ordered that they be placed in an interest-bearing account segregated from the firm's operating account. See Stipulation and Order Granting in Part and Denying in Part U.S. Trustee's Mot. to Continue Stay, No. 01-41564 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. March 6, 2003), reprinted in Appellant's Brief, Addendum at 7. As we explained in the jurisdictional statement of our opening brief, that fact makes this case significantly different from In re S.S. Retail Stores Corp., 216 F.3d 882, 884 (9th Cir. 2000), in which this Court dismissed an appeal of a fee award because it would have been "inequitable" to order disgorgement. Keravision has conceded this point by endorsing our jurisdictional statement. See Br. at 3.

B. Because the appointment of Latham & Watkins was unlawful, the firm has no statutory entitlement to a fee award. Under the Code, a bankruptcy court may award fees to "a professional person employed under section 327." 11 U.S.C. §

330(a)(1). Latham is not such a “person,” because it failed to satisfy the standards of § 327(a). As the Sixth Circuit has held, “a valid appointment under § 327(a) is a condition precedent to the decision to grant or deny compensation under § 330(a)” so that a bankruptcy court may not authorize the payment of fees to a professional who is not disinterested. In re Federated Dep’t Stores, Inc., 44 F.3d 1310, 1320 (6th Cir. 1995). Although other courts have held that a bankruptcy court has some discretion to decide whether to award fees, they have stressed that fees generally should not be permitted if a professional does not satisfy the requirements of § 327(a). See Gray v. English, 30 F.3d 1319, 1324 (10th Cir. 1994) (“In exercising the discretion granted by the statute we think the court should lean strongly toward denial of fees”); accord In re Prince, 40 F.3d 356, 360 (11th Cir. 1994); see also In re Wiredyne, Inc., 3 F.3d 1125, 1127 (7th Cir. 1993) (noting that “courts have generally denied fees as a matter of course under sections 327 and 328 in the event of a conflict”).

Whatever the precise scope of discretion permitted to bankruptcy courts, it would be an abuse of discretion to award fees in this case, because the appointment of Latham & Watkins plainly violated the disinterested-person requirement of § 327(a). As the Supreme Court has explained, “a court sitting in equity cannot ‘ignore the judgment of Congress, deliberately expressed in legislation.'" United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Coop., 532 U.S. 483, 497 (2001), quoting Virginian R. Co. v. Railway Employees, 300 U.S. 515, 551 (1937); see also In re Futoran, 76 F.3d 265, 267 (9th Cir. 1996) ("The bankruptcy court's equitable powers may only be exercised 'in furtherance of the goals of the Bankruptcy Code'") (quoting In re Bownic Insulation Contractors, Inc., 134 B.R. 261, 267 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1991)). Allowing a law firm to escape a strict disqualification provision set forth in the Code can hardly be thought to be "in furtherance of" the Bankruptcy Code's goals.

Permitting law firms to earn fees regardless of the unlawfulness of their representations would undermine the efficiency and fairness of the bankruptcy system. Confident that they would be able to accrue all of their fees before a court of appeals could rule on a challenge to their eligibility, attorneys would feel free to engage in representations that appellate courts would, given the opportunity, declare unlawful. Cf. In re BBQ Resources, Inc., 237 B.R. 639, 642 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 1999) (denial of fees "is meant to dissuade counsel from becoming involved in the representation of debtors where there are substantial questions apparent at the outset concerning conflicts of interest"). Professionals who anticipated challenges to their eligibility would have an incentive to proceed with undue haste -- by winning the race against the challenger's appeals, they could be rewarded with an entitlement to their fees notwithstanding the unlawfulness of their employment. The United States Trustee could seek to stay bankruptcy cases pending review of its challenges to appointments, but that approach would burden the other parties by impeding the speedy resolution of cases.

Contrary to Keravision's suggestion, there is nothing "fundamentally unjust," Br. at 57, about denying fees for an appointment that violated § 327. To be sure, the bankruptcy court and the district court approved Latham's representation. But the firm was aware that the United States Trustee objected to its appointment, and it knew that the appointment order might be challenged at the conclusion of the case in an appeal to this Court. The firm nonetheless chose to take the risk of proceeding with the representation, just as a firm that takes a case on a contingent-fee basis accepts the risk that it might not be able to collect a fee. If reliance on a bankruptcy court order does not preclude disgorgement of funds erroneously collected, then a fortiori it should not preclude a decision not to award money. Cf. Cascade Roads, 34 F.3d at 761; International Envtl. Dynamics, 718 F.2d at 326; In re Spirtos, 992 F.2d 1004, 1007 (9th Cir. 1993).

Moreover, Latham & Watkins is not the only party with an interest in being paid by the estate. This is a Chapter 7 case, which means that liquidation of Keravision's assets will not produce sufficient funds to satisfy all creditor claims. The creditors' already-diminished recoveries will be further reduced if Latham & Watkins is paid a fee. That result would not prevent an injustice; it would create one.

Finally, it is not relevant that in this particular case the unlawfulness of Latham's appointment may not have resulted in any "harm or prejudice to the estate." Br. at 57. The Supreme Court has held that when a fiduciary's ability to provide "loyal and disinterested service" is impaired by that professional's interests, "[i]t is no answer to say that fraud or unfairness were not shown to have resulted." Woods v. City Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 312 U.S. 262, 268 (1941). The remedy of denying compensation is designed to eradicate "not only actual evil results" but also the "tendency to evil in other cases." Ibid, quoting Weil v. Neary, 278 U.S. 160, 173 (1929).

C. Even if the bankruptcy court was not compelled to deny compensation, it at least had discretion to do so. A court abuses its discretion when it makes an error of law, see Southwest Voter Registration Educ. Project v. Shelley, 344 F.3d 914, 918 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc), and here, the bankruptcy court's fee award rested on the erroneous conclusion that Latham's appointment was permissible under § 327(a). Therefore, if this court concludes that Latham's appointment was improper because the firm was not "disinterested," it should at least reverse the district court with instructions to remand the case to the bankruptcy court to permit that court to reconsider whether to award fees, and if so, in what amount.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the district court should be reversed, and the case should be remanded with instructions to reverse the order granting the final application for attorney’s fees.

The United States submits this brief under Fed. R. App. P. 29 as amicus curiae supporting reversal.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

This appeal calls upon this Court to interpret a statutory provision affecting chapter 13 bankruptcy cases, 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Section 1325(b)(3) makes two chapter 7 provisions – 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B) – applicable to chapter 13 cases.

The United States has a direct interest in the proper construction of these provisions because United States Trustees, who are Justice Department officials appointed by the Attorney General, supervise the administration of chapter 7 and chapter 13 bankruptcy cases in all federal judicial districts within this circuit. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. See also H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 88 (1977) (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena."); In re Revco D.S., Inc., 898 F.2d 498, 500 (6th Cir. 1990) (citing legislative history).

This appeal affects the United States' interests for two distinct reasons:

First, by applying section 1325(b)(3), this Court will determine how much above-median-income chapter 13 debtors must repay their creditors in their chapter 13 repayment plans. The United States has an interest in that question because United States Trustees “supervise the administration of [chapter 13] cases and trustees,” monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such chapter 13 plans in connection with plan confirmation hearings under section 1324 of the Code. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

Second, because section 1325(b)(3) incorporates two parts of the chapter 7 means test, sections 707(b)(2)(A) and (B), this appeal will also determine what expenses above-median-income chapter 7 debtors can claim on the means test. The means test determines whether an above-median-income debtor’s chapter 7 case should be dismissed as abusive. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1) and (2).

United States Trustees play a unique role in chapter 7 means test cases because section 704(b) requires them to review all such cases and, whenever a case is deemed presumptively abusive under the statute, either (a) seek its dismissal, or (b) file a statement declining to seek dismissal. See 11 U.S.C. 704(b). See also Schultz v. United States, 529 F.3d 343, 348 (6th Cir. 2008) (describing the United States Trustee’s duties to enforce the chapter 7 means test under the 2005 Act).

In fiscal year 2007, United States Trustees filed 3,370 motions to dismiss under section 707(b)(2) and 1,441 statements declining to seek dismissal when a presumption of abuse existed in a case.

Given these interests, the United States submits this brief to share its views on the application of sections 1325(b)(3) and 707(b)(2)(A). See 28 U.S.C. 517. See also 11 U.S.C. 307.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

The Bankruptcy Code allows debtors to claim a vehicle ownership expense, in a set amount, when it is "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The expense amount is a standardized dollar value debtors may claim to account for vehicle loan or lease payments. The debtors in this case claimed such a set amount for two vehicles, even though they have no loan or lease payments for one of the vehicles.

The question presented is: Did the bankruptcy appellate panel err in ruling the Kimbros could claim that expense amount on the vehicle for which they had no vehicle ownership expenses?

STATUTORY BACKGROUND

This appeal involves the interpretation of provisions added to the Bankruptcy Code by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.[1] The 2005 Act significantly altered how debtors obtain chapter 13 bankruptcy relief.

[1] Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005). The 2005 Act applies to the Kimbros' case, because the act's general effective date is for cases filed on or after October 17, 2005.

In a chapter 13 case, a debtor's unsecured creditors or trustee may insist the debtor devote all of his "projected disposable income" to repay unsecured creditors over a period of up to five years. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). Disposable income is a net number: income less allowed expenses.

Under the 2005 Act, above-median-income debtors, like the Kimbros, determine disposable income by first calculating their gross income.[2] Next, the debtors deduct permitted expenses. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)

Above-median-income chapter 13 debtors determine their permitted expenses by employing the formula found in 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A) and (B). 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3) (incorporating those provisions). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) permits debtors to deduct (a) certain prescribed "actual" expenses, and (b) other "applicable" expense amounts. Applicable expense amounts are not the debtor's actual expenses. Instead, they are the static amounts listed in the Internal Revenue Service's Local and National Standards.[3] Id. Last, a debtor may deduct additional expenses identified in other subsections of section 707(b)(2)(A). That yields a net number – disposable income, which establishes the minimum an above-median-income debtor must pay to unsecured creditors under a chapter 13 plan. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B).

This appeal poses a question about one part of this expense-side calculation of disposable income related to vehicle ownership expenses under the IRS Local Standards. Transportation expenses incorporate two components: (1) monthly expenses for costs associated with operating vehicles and (2) monthly expenses for costs associated with purchasing or leasing vehicles. All debtors receive monthly transportation expenses based on either public transportation costs or the costs associated with operating one or two cars. Operating expenses include amounts for vehicle maintenance, fuel, state and local registration, required inspection, parking fees, tolls, and driver's license fees.

The ownership expense allowance under the IRS Standards is one amount for each vehicle that is based on the average cost of financing a vehicle as determined annually by the Federal Reserve Board. Id. Independent of operating expenses, when applicable, debtors can claim a standardized amount to reflect a loan or lease payment. Id. Like the operating expense, the ownership expense, which covers vehicle lease or purchase payments, is limited to no more than two vehicles. Id.

Specifically at issue in this appeal is whether a standardized vehicle ownership amount deduction is "applicable" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) when the debtor has no associated vehicle ownership expense. The Kimbros have no loan or lease payments on their second vehicle, so this appeal requires this Court to determine whether they may nonetheless claim the standardized IRS Local Standard expense amount for that vehicle and thereby subtract $332 from their plan payment for each month of their 60-month repayment plan.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On June 7, 2007, Mr. and Mrs. Kimbro filed a voluntary petition under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 1301, et seq. (R. 1, Voluntary Petition). Their means test form calculated monthly disposable income of $183.60.[4] [4] The chapter 13 means test form, Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22C, facilitates the computation of a chapter 13 debtor's income and expenses under the 2005 Act.

---

(R. 3, Ch. 13 Statement of Current Monthly & Disposable Income, p. 5).

In making this calculation, the Kimbros claimed $343 under the Local Standards for monthly vehicle operating expenses for two vehicles. (Id., p. 3). In addition, the Kimbros also claimed monthly vehicle ownership expenses for two vehicles. (Id.). The Kimbros deducted an ownership expense of $358.82 for their first vehicle, calculated by subtracting their average monthly car payment of $112.18 from the IRS Local Standard of $471. (Id.). The Kimbros also claimed on their means test form a standardized $332 monthly vehicle ownership expense amount for a second vehicle under the IRS Local Standard, although they own this vehicle free and clear of any loan or lease payments. (Id.).

The Kimbros' chapter 13 repayment plan proposed to pay $183.60 monthly to unsecured creditors over 60 months, which represented approximately 39% of their $27,009.46 in scheduled debts to unsecured creditors. (R. 2, Ch. 13 Plan, p. 3).

The chapter 13 trustee objected to confirmation of the Kimbros' plan. (R. 19, Motion for Hearing On Confirmation and Request for Dismissal, p. 1). He argued that the Kimbros could not reduce creditor payments by claiming a standardized vehicle ownership expense amount for one of their two vehicles because they had no associated ownership expenses for that vehicle. (R. 25, Brief in Support of Trustee's Objection to Confirmation, p. 3).

The trustee alleged that striking that inapplicable expense amount yielded monthly disposable income sufficient to repay their unsecured creditors in full. (Id.). The Kimbros countered that they were entitled to claim the expense amount regardless of whether their second car was paid in full.

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the Middle District of Tennessee overruled the trustee's objection and confirmed the Kimbros' plan. (R. 29, Order Confirming Ch. 13 Plan, p.1; R. 34, Order Denying Trustee's Objection, p. 1). The trustee timely filed a notice of appeal to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Sixth Circuit. (R. 32, Notice of Appeal).

On June 12, 2008, a divided panel of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Sixth Circuit issued an order and opinion affirming the bankruptcy court's decision. In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. 518 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2008). In so doing, the majority of the appellate panel held that debtors may deduct the standardized vehicle ownership expense amount even when they have no associated vehicle ownership expenses. Id. at 524. On July 7, 2008, the trustee filed a notice of appeal to this Court.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Mr. and Mrs. Kimbro, who are chapter 13 debtors, seek to shield almost $16,000 from their creditors by claiming a standardized vehicle ownership expense amount under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) when they have no corresponding vehicle ownership expenses.[5] The appellate panel allowed the Kimbros to claim this expense amount. See In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 532 (Fulton, J., dissenting) (calling the majority ruling "a superb effort to weave a seemingly robust cloth from somewhat thin threads.".

That ruling conflicts with the weight of bankruptcy appellate panel and district court rulings, and it is wrong for five reasons.

1. First, the Kimbros cannot claim a standardized vehicle ownership expense amount on their second vehicle because section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows a debtor to claim it only when it is "applicable" to the debtor's case. The standardized vehicle ownership amount deduction is not applicable to the Kimbros' second vehicle because they have no associated vehicle ownership expense.

Reading the word "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) as limiting expense amounts to debtors who have associated expenses is the best construction of this section because it (1) uses the ordinary dictionary meaning of "applicable," and does so in a way that gives meaning to each word in the section; (2) fulfills Congress' stated reasons for enacting the section; and (3) most equitably implements bankruptcy policy - both for debtors and for creditors.

[5] Section 1325(b)(3) incorporates section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) into the Kimbros' chapter 13 bankruptcy case.

2. Giving "applicable" its ordinary definition in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) yields a statute that allows debtors who have monthly expenses to claim the expense amount set out in the IRS Standards. At the same time, it prevents debtors who lack monthly expenses from claiming phantom expense amounts. This construction also gives meaning to every word in the section, something the appellate panel's construction does not.

3. The 2005 Act's legislative history supports this interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The Act's House Report reveals Congress enacted the new law to ensure debtors would repay their debts when they were able, and to eliminate loopholes and incentives for debtor abuse in discharging debts when a portion could be repaid. Allowing the Kimbros to claim a fictional expense amount diverges from the purpose of the 2005 Act.

4. Reading "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to require a loan or lease payment also fosters sound public policy. Barring above-median-income debtors like the Kimbros from claiming inapplicable ownership expense amounts is fair because it simply prevents them from claiming a monthly expense for an expense they do not have. This interpretation does not hurt lower-income debtors, because they are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). It is also fair to creditors because they will receive payments on their debts when debtors have the financial ability to repay.

5. Finally, the bankruptcy system has two safety valves to ensure that higher-income debtors without loan or lease payments will not suffer by being denied phantom vehicle expenses. First, when they have older vehicles, they receive an additional $200 monthly expense allowance for up to two vehicles to fund the operation of these older vehicles. Second, these chapter 13 debtors can modify their court confirmed repayment plan under section 1329(a) if they require a new car during the course of repaying their creditors.

ARGUMENT

THE APPELLATE PANEL ERRED IN RULING DEBTORS MAY CLAIM A VEHICLE OWNERSHIP DEDUCTION UNDER SECTION 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE WHEN THEY HAVE NO ASSOCIATED VEHICLE OWNERSHIP EXPENSES.

The United States asks this Court to reverse the appellate panel's ruling that section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) allows the Kimbros to reduce their disposable income available to repay creditors by claiming an inapplicable standardized vehicle ownership expense amount. This case presents an issue of statutory construction that this Court reviews de novo. Rembert v. AT&T Universal Card Servs., 141 F.3d 277, 280 (6th Cir. 1998).

I. A vehicle ownership expense amount is "applicable" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) only when a debtor is making a corresponding loan or lease payments on the vehicle.

A. Vehicle ownership expense amounts are not "applicable" to a debtor who makes no loan or lease payment on a vehicle.

The Bankruptcy Code permits above-median-income individuals to claim a vehicle ownership expense amount when that expense is "applicable." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). Section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) provides that a "debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's applicable monthly expense amounts specified under the . . . Local Standards . . . issued by the Internal Revenue Service. . . ." 11 U.S.C.

707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added).

"Applicable" is not defined in the Bankruptcy Code, so the word should be given its ordinary meaning. Smith v. United States, 508 U.S. 223, 228 (1993) ("When a word is not defined by statute, we normally construe it in accord with its ordinary and natural meaning."); Limited, Inc. v. Comm'r, 286 F.3d 324, 333 (6th Cir. 2002) (same). Courts frequently turn to dictionaries to ascertain a word's ordinary meaning. See e.g., Clark Equip. Co. v. United States, 912 F.2d 113, 117 (6th Cir. 1990) (applying a dictionary definition to determine the common meaning of a statutory term).

The dictionary defines "applicable" to mean "capable of being applied: having relevance . . . fit, suitable, or right to be applied: APPROPRIATE" Webster's Third New International Dictionary at 105 (1981) (emphasis in original).

The appellate panel's ruling is inconsistent with the ordinary, common sense definition of "applicable" because it allows debtors like the Kimbros to deduct a monthly vehicle loan/lease expense amount when they have no associated monthly loan or lease expenses on their vehicles. See In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762, 767 (E.D. Wis. 2007) (section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) does not make such "fixed allowances guaranteed to every car owner").

The point here is simple – a debtor has no section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) vehicle ownership expense amounts that are "capable of being applied" to him if he does not make any loan or lease payments. Ransom v. MBNA America Bank, N.A. (In re Ransom), 380 B.R. 799, 807-08 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007). Like the dissent below, the weight of district courts and bankruptcy appellate panels rejected the appellate panel's contrary interpretation. In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. 532-33 (Fulton, J., dissenting); Babin v. Powell (In re Powell), 392 B.R. 407 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008); Babin v. Wilson (In re Wilson), 383 B.R. 729 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008); Grossman v. Sawdy (In re Sawdy), 384 B.R. 199 (E.D. Wis. 2008); Wieland v. Thomas (In re Thomas), 382 B.R. 793 (D. Kan. 2008); Meade v. McVay (In re Meade), 384 B.R. 132 (W.D. Tex. 2008); United States Trustee v. Deadmond (In re Deadmond), 2008 WL 191165 (D. Mont. Jan. 22, 2008); Fokkena v. Hartwick (In re Hartwick), 373 B.R. 645 (D. Minn. 2007); In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. 762 (E.D. Wis. 2007); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807-08. But see In re Armstrong, 2008 WL 4426144 (E.D. Wash. Sep. 24, 2008) (permitting debtor to deduct the vehicle ownership expense even in the absence of loan or lease payments); In re Pearson, 390 B.R. 706 (B.A.P. 10th Cir. July 28, 2008) (same).

B. The appellate panel's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) suffers from four flaws the dissent's interpretation avoids: (a) conflating "applicable" with "actual," (b) rendering "applicable" superfluous, (c) misinterpreting the significance of the term "payments for debts" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), and (d) defining "applicable" inconsistently with its intended use in the immediately following subsection, 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II).

The divided court below concluded section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) entitles debtors to claim vehicle ownership expenses even when they have no associated loan or lease payment. It did not read "applicable" as an eligibility requirement. Instead, it concluded that "applicable" simply directs debtors to pick out and use the dollar amounts set forth in tables published by the IRS, so all debtors can claim the expense amount for every vehicle they own. In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 524.

This interpretation suffers from at least four flaws:

First, it confuses the distinction between the words "actual" and "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). The panel ruled that conditioning an expense amount deduction upon the existence of an expense would require "applicable" to mean "actual" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 523-24. The panel also noted that the term "applicable" is an adjective that modifies the "amounts specified" in the IRS Local Standards, and does not modify the "debtor's monthly expenses" which appears at the beginning of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

Id. at 524 quoting In re Chamberlain, 369 B.R. 519, 524 (Bankr. D. Ariz. 2007). This lead the panel majority to rule "applicable" cannot mean debtors must have an associated expense because that would give identical meaning to two different words Congress used in the same statute.

This conclusion fails to recognize the words "applicable" and "actual" have different meanings in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) because "expense amounts" – the words following "applicable" in the statute – do not refer to "actual" costs. In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 650 (recognizing that a debtor's "actual" expense does not control the amount of the vehicle ownership deduction" under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I)).

To the contrary, vehicle expense amounts are static numbers drawn from the IRS Local and National Standards; they are not the debtor's actual vehicle ownership expenses. These fixed amounts are used regardless of the debtor's "actual" expenses. Id. They are the opposite of "actual" expenses.

Because "applicable" and "actual" have different meanings, the panel's concern about overlapping definitions was simply incorrect, and led to an incorrect reading of the statute. See In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (the United States' reading "gives meaning to the distinction between 'applicable' and 'actual' without taking a further step to conclude that 'applicable' means 'nonexistent' or 'fictional.'"); In re Thomas, 2008 WL 597586 at *4 (same); In re Meade, 382 B.R. at 798 (same).

The dissent understood this, as it explained that "Congress intended and used the phrases 'applicable monthly expense amounts' . . . and 'actual expenses' . . . simply in recognition of the differing ways in which the IRS uses the National Standards and Local Standards versus the Other Necessary Expense categories." In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 533 (Fulton, J., dissenting).

The panel's reading would be wrong, however, even if "applicable" and "actual" meant the same thing in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I). As the Supreme Court has recognized, there is nothing wrong with two different words within a single section being synonyms. Wachovia Bank v. Schmidt, 546 U.S. 303, 314 (2006) ("Congress may well have comprehended the words 'located' and 'established,' as used in [28 U.S.C.] § 1348, not as contrasting, but as synonymous or alternative terms"). Therefore, even should this Court conclude that "applicable" is synonymous with "actual" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), the Kimbros would remain ineligible for a vehicle ownership expense amount for their second vehicle because they have no "actual" ownership expenses associated with that vehicle.

Second, as the dissent below recognized, the panel's reading of "applicable" renders it superfluous. See In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 532-33 (Fulton, J., dissenting). Under the majority's reading, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would have the same meaning without the word "applicable" in it. Id. at 533.

The majority suggests the word instructs debtors to perform the "very simple task" of going to the IRS Standards referenced in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) and "looking up" the standard dollar figure it establishes for a debtor's locality and for the number of vehicles the debtor has. Id. at 523.

But debtors would do the same thing if the word were not in the statute because the statute would then read "[t]he debtor's monthly expenses shall be the debtor's ~~applicable~~ monthly expense amounts" under the IRS standards. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) (emphasis added). Striking out the word "applicable" would still lead the debtor to the same line under the Local Standards that the majority below suggests the word "applicable" exists to accomplish. In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 765 (E.D. Wis. 2007) ("Had Congress intended to indiscriminately allow all expense amounts specified in the National and Local Standards, it would have written 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) [without using the word 'applicable.']"); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (concluding that the Debtors' construction would "read[]

'applicable' right out of the Bankruptcy Code"); In re Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4 ("The word ['applicable] must mean something, and if some monthly expenses are applicable, then other monthly expenses are not applicable.").

Because the panel's reading renders "applicable" superfluous, the word must have a different meaning than the one the court ascribed. See generally Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004)(courts "must, if possible, construe a statue to give every word some operative effect"); United States v. Page, 131 F.3d 1173, 1180 (6th Cir. 1997) ("It is well settled law that statutory constructions that render portions of a statute superfluous are to be avoided."), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 828 (1998). As we explain above, the word "applicable" does have a different meaning. Under its dictionary meaning, the word exists to allow debtors to claim a standard vehicle expense amount that is inapplicable because they have a loan or lease expense.

Third, the panel's interpretation of "applicable" was premised, in part, on the proviso within section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) providing that "the monthly expenses of the debtor shall not include payments for debts." The majority below concluded that "[t]his provision alone establishes beyond doubt that Congress intended to allow an ownership expense even when a debtor has no debt payment on a vehicle" because otherwise, "there would be no reason for this limitation." In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 523.

This reading misinterprets the term "payments for debts." Debtors for whom the ownership expense is applicable receive a fixed standard allowance that is the dollar amount under the applicable standard. This is not a "payment for a debt." Cf. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) (which allows an expense deduction for a debtor's actual average monthly secured debt payments to creditors).

The "payment for debts" language exists instead to ensure debtors do not double-deduct their actual payments for debts under section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) and then claim overlapping expenses for certain categories in the IRS's Other Necessary Expenses, such as secured debt payments and repayment of delinquent tax debts, as those are already allowed elsewhere under the means test. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Financial Analysis Handbook, Pt. 5, ch. 15, § 5.15.1.10, available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch15s01.html#d0e195695 (listing categories of Other Necessary Expenses). See also 707(b)(2)(A)(iii) (permitting deduction for secured debts under the means test) and 707(b)(2)(A)(iv) (permitting deduction for tax debts under the means test). And it also ensures debtors do not deduct their student loan payments under the means test, even though the IRS categorizes them as an “Other Necessary Expense.” See In re Knight, 370 B.R. 429, 436-37 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2007) (concluding that the plain language of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii) “precludes deduction” of student loan payments as an expense under the means test.

Fourth, and significantly, the United States’ reading permits an interpretation of “applicable” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) that is consistent with the meaning of the same word in the immediately following subsection. This is consistent with “the ‘normal rule of statutory construction’ that ‘identical words used in different parts of the same act are intended to have the same meaning.” Gustafson v. Alloyd Co., Inc., 513 U.S. 561, 570 (1995) (quoting Dep’t of Revenue v. ACF Indus., Inc., 510 U.S. 332, 342 (1994).

Specifically, we interpret “applicable” in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to mean capable of being applied or appropriate. Webster’s Third New International Dictionary at 105 (1981).

The immediately following subsection, 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II), uses the word “applicable” in precisely the same way - i.e., debtors get expenses when they actually incur them. It provides, in relevant part, that “the debtor’s monthly expenses may include, if applicable, the continuation of actual expenses paid by the debtor . . . for care and support of an elderly, chronically ill, or disable household member or member of the debtor's immediately family. . . ." 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II) (emphasis added).

Subsections (I) and (II) use "applicable" for different purposes, i.e., subsection (I) allows expense amounts under the IRS Standards and (II) allows actual expenses. But clearly in the latter, Congress intended to allow debtors expenses only if they apply to that particular debtor. Under accepted rules of statutory construction, the same meaning of "applicable" in 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(II) should be given to the word in 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

II. Reading section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to limit vehicle ownership expense amounts to debtors with loan or lease payments fulfills two goals Congress expressed in enacting the 2005 Act: ensuring that above-median-income debtors repay their debts when they can, and eliminating abuse.

A. Congress passed the 2005 Act to maximize debtor repayment to creditors and to eliminate opportunities for bankruptcy abuse.

1. In interpreting "applicable" in section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), this Court may look to its legislative history to determine the statute's objectives and illuminate its text. United States v. Markwood, 48 F.3d 969, 975 n. 7 (6th Cir. 1995) (finding that "when a term is undefined or its meaning unclear from the context of the statute, it is our duty to examine the legislative history in order to render an interpretation that gives effect to Congress's intent.").

2. The "heart" of the 2005 Act is the means test, which seeks to "ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89.[6] See also Schultz v. United States 529 F.3d 343, 347 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The centerpiece of the [2005 Act] is the imposition of a 'means test' for chapter 7 filers."). Cf. In re Thomas, 382 B.R. at 798 ("If a debtor were permitted a car ownership allowance when he actually incurs no such expense, application of the means test would not accurately reflect the debtor's ability to repay creditors, and the purpose of the statue would be frustrated.").

Congress felt this aspect of bankruptcy reform legislation was so important that it included this language in the very first paragraph of the legislative history. H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89. Congress saw fit to reiterate this point when it addressed this specific provision in the legislative history. Id. at 97 - 100. Given how important this was to Congress, the statute should be interpreted in accordance the overarching goal that underpins the 2005 Act.

And this underscores another flaw in the panel's reasoning – that the purpose of the statute was to adopt a mechanical test. See In re Kimbro 389 B.R. at 527 (noting that "the purpose of the means test" was "to adopt a uniform, bright-line test that eliminates judicial discretion").

[6] There is no Senate Report or Conference Report to the 2005 Act.

That is not what the legislative history indicates Congress was doing. To the contrary, Congress enacted the statute to require debtors to make repayments when they were able. H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 1 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 89.

The panel thus confused the purpose of the statute - to increase creditor recoveries - with the fact that Congress employed a number of methods, including non-mechanical methods, to achieve that goal.[7]

And, significantly, Congress also used non-mechanical methods in section 707 to determine other aspects of a debtor's expenses. For example, in calculating disposable income under section 707(b)(2), multiple provisions permit debtors to claim non-standard "reasonable and necessary" expenses for a host of categories, including health insurance, disability insurance, health savings accounts, amounts to care for elderly, chronically ill or disabled household and family members, home energy costs in excess of amounts allowed under the IRS Local Housing Standards, expenses to maintain the family's safety from domestic violence, and amounts for children under 18 to attend a private or public elementary or secondary school. See 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) - (IV). In addition, debtors who, prior to filing for bankruptcy, fall behind on their mortgage or car payments and intend to keep the property, may claim expenses necessary to retain the property under a chapter 13 repayment plan. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(iii)(II). None of these are mechanical.

[7] Many Reform Act provisions are non-mechanical. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 1112(b) (authorizing conversion or dismissal of a chapter 11 case).

3. In any event, the United States' interpretation is no more or less mechanical than the panel's. Both employ the same arithmetical calculation. The United States simply would allow debtors without a loan or lease payment $0 for vehicle ownership expenses under the Local Standards, while the panel would allow the full amount. Neither approach is more mechanical than the other.

4. Finally, the 2005 Act also seeks to eliminate "loopholes and incentives" in the system "that allow and – sometimes – even encourage opportunistic personal filings and abuse." H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5, 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 92.

Thus, ensuring that above-median-income debtors claim vehicle ownership expense amounts only when they have associated ownership expenses fulfills

Congress' intent that such debtors repay their debts when they are able. See In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 ("The statute is only concerned about protecting the debtor's ability to continue owning a car, and if the debtor already owns the car, the debtor is adequately protected."); In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same); In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 807 ("[W]hat is important is the payments that debtors actually make, not how many cars they own, because the payments that debtors make are what actually affect their ability to make payments to their creditors."); Babin v. Wilson, 383 B.R. at 733 (for above-median-income chapter 13 debtors, the "purpose" of the 2005 Act was to "require" such debtors "to make more funds available to their unsecured creditors").

B. The Appellate Panel's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) would yield inequitable results not contemplated by Congress.

The panel's interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) yields unfair results not contemplated by Congress.[8] Under the appellate panel's reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), a higher-income debtor with an inoperable car "rusting away in his backyard" could claim the ownership expense amount simply because the car is an "automobile" and he "owns" it. In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 768. This statutory reading has been rejected by lower appellate courts because it "defies common sense." In re Deadmond, 2008 WL 191165 at *4. See also In re Ross-Tousey, 368 B.R. at 766 (when a debtor "has no monthly ownership expenses, it makes no sense to deduct an ownership expense to shield it from creditors.").

III. Barring above-median-income debtors from claiming phantom vehicle ownership expenses implements sound bankruptcy policy.

A. Reading section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to limit vehicle ownership expenses to debtors with a loan or lease payment is fair to debtors and creditors.

Reading section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) to limit vehicle ownership expense amounts to debtors with a loan or lease payment is fair. This is so because it establishes a threshold – the existence of vehicle loan or lease payments – for claiming a standardized ownership expense amount, one that is consistent for all chapter 13 debtors.

Significantly, section 1325(b)(2) independently requires below-median-income debtors to incur an expense to claim a deduction. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2) (allowing such debtors only "reasonably necessary" expenses).

Reading "applicable" as requiring above-median-income debtors to have an associated expenses means the above-median-income debtors will not be able to claim phantom expenses that less wealthy debtors cannot.

Nor does our interpretation otherwise adversely affect below-median income debtors – those most likely to file bankruptcy petitions – because such debtors are not subject to section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) in the first place. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). These below-median-income debtors represent approximately 73% of the men and women who seek chapter 13 protection.[9]

Similarly, in chapter 7 bankruptcies, section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) only applies to the 10% of debtors with above-median incomes.[10] See Schultz v. United States,

[9] There were 307,521 non-business chapter 13 cases filed in fiscal year 2007. See U.S. Courts, Bankruptcy Statistics, 2007 Fiscal Year by Chapter, available at http://www.uscourts.gov/bnkrpctystats/sept2007/f2table.xls. Of these cases, the United States estimates that 83,030 cases may have been filed by above-median-income debtors. The United States' estimate is based on a 2006 survey conducted by RAND across a sample of nine judicial districts that estimated that 27% of chapter 13 cases were filed by above-median-income debtors. See The Bankruptcy Abuse and Consumer Protection Act of 2005: Evaluation of the Effects of Using IRS Expense Standards to Calculate a Debtor's Monthly Disposable Income, RAND Institute for Civil Justice at x, 23, available at www.usdoj.gov/ust/eo/public_affairs/reports_studies/index.htm.

[10] During fiscal year 2007, according to data collected by the U.S. Trustee Program, 451,012 non-business chapter 7 cases were filed nationwide, excluding the judicial districts in Alabama and North Carolina, whose data were not collected. Of these cases, only 10% had above-median incomes and were thereby subject to the means test and the requirements of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I).

529 F.3d 343, 347 (6th Cir. 2008) (noting that under 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(7), the presumption of abuse cannot arise with respect to below-median-income debtors).

Our interpretation is also fair to creditors. Congress enacted the 2005 Act because under prior law "some bankruptcy debtors are able to repay a significant portion of their debts" but were not required to do so. H.R. Rep. No. 109-31 (I), at 5 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92. Our interpretation of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I) ensures that above-median-income debtors will not avoid repaying their debts by claiming expense amounts when those debtors have no associated expense.

B. Other Bankruptcy Code provisions adequately protect above-median-income debtors who own vehicles, but lack vehicle ownership expenses.

Under our reading of section 707(b)(2)(A)(ii)(I), at least two safety valves are available to prevent hardships against above-median-income debtors who own vehicles but have no vehicle ownership expenses.

First, every debtor who owns a vehicle, whether or not it is subject to a loan or lease payment, receives an unrelated vehicle operating expense under the IRS Local Standards. Operating expenses include vehicle insurance, maintenance, fuel, state and local registration, required inspection, parking fees, tolls, and driver's license fees. The majority opinion below incorrectly characterized many of these "operating expenses" as "ownership expenses" and failed to acknowledge that all debtors who incur operating expenses receive the operating expense allowance under the IRS Local Standards. In re Kimbro, 389 B.R. at 531. Indeed, the Kimbros claimed $332 in monthly vehicle operating expenses for their two vehicles, in addition to claiming ownership expenses for their vehicles.

And, debtors who own unencumbered vehicles that are six or more years old or have 75,000 or more miles, also receive an additional $200 in monthly vehicle expense deduction per vehicle under the IRS framework. See IRS Internal Revenue Manual, Pt. 5, ch. 8, § 5.8.5.5.2 ("Treatment of Non-Business Transportation Expenses"), available at http://www.irs.gov/irm/part5/ch08s05.htm. See also In re Ransom, 380 B.R. at 808 (recognizing $200 additional allowance); In re Hartwick, 373 B.R. at 652 (same); Babin v. Wilson, 383 B.R. at 734 (same).

Second, if any debtor needs a new vehicle during the course of his chapter 13 plan, the debtor can move to modify his plan to reduce payments to creditors to account for the new expense. See 11 U.S.C. 1329(a); Babin v. Wilson, 383 B.R. 729, 734 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2008) ("[I]n the event a debtor needs a new car during the course of a case, the debtor can move to modify the plan based on changed circumstances."). For debtors who require a new vehicle, plan modification is appropriate because financing the vehicle usually indicates a substantial change in a debtor's ability to pay that was not already taken into account at the time of plan confirmation. Cf. In re Storrey, 392 B.R. 266, 272 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2008) (plan modification possible if a debtor's circumstances change following plan confirmation).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States respectfully asks this Court to reverse the order of the United States Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Sixth Circuit and remand with instructions that the panel remand this case to the bankruptcy court with instructions that it deny confirmation of the Kimbros' plan.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT CONCERNING ORAL ARGUMENT

The United States Trustee does not seek oral argument. However, should the Debtor request it, and should the Court determine that oral argument is necessary, the United States Trustee requests equal time to that provided to the Debtor.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

The United States Trustee invoked the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction in this proceeding under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157 and 1334, and 11 U.S.C. § 727(d). (R. 4) On August 2, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered a final order revoking the Debtor's discharge. (R. 2; R. 3) On August 10, 2007, the Debtor timely filed a notice of appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(c)(2) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). (R. 1) This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(a) and 158(b).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES

The issue before this Court is whether the bankruptcy court committed clear error in revoking the Debtor's discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(d)(2).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On October 10, 2005, the Debtor, through counsel, filed a voluntary petition for relief under the liquidation provisions of chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 6) Shortly thereafter, Mr. Thomas L. Flynn ("Trustee") was appointed as the Debtor's chapter 7 trustee. (R. 6) On November 15, 2005, the Trustee conducted the Debtor's meeting of creditors under Section 341 of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 6; R. 13) The Debtor was orally admonished at that meeting not to spend any tax refunds he might receive. (R. 5, at 9:19-10:9, 10:19-10:22, 28:1-28:10.) Further, the Debtor was provided with a written warning instructing him not to spend any tax refunds absent Trustee approval, and requesting that he provide the Trustee with copies of his 2005 Federal and State tax returns (the "2005 Tax Returns"). (R. 5, at 9:9-10:17; R. 14) On January 18, 2006, the bankruptcy court entered an order discharging the Debtor of all of his dischargeable debts. (R. 6) On February 6, 2006, the Debtor filed his 2005 Tax Returns. (R. 8)

The 2005 Tax Returns requested a refund, which the Debtor promptly received and spent. (R. 5, at 30:13-30:17; R. 8) On June 21, 2006, following the Debtor's failure to appear at an examination pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2004, and the Trustee's receipt of copies of the 2005 Tax Returns, the Trustee made demand upon the Debtor for the estate's portion of his 2005 tax refunds. (R. 5, at 12:4-15:16) When the refunds were not forthcoming, and the Debtor failed to appear at a second examination, the United States Trustee filed a complaint (the "Complaint") seeking the revocation of the Debtor's discharge under Sections 727(d)(2) and (3) of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 4; R. 5, at 15:19-17:1; R. 6) On July 26, 2007, the bankruptcy court conducted a trial on the Complaint and took the matter under advisement. (R. 3, at 1) Shortly thereafter, on August 2, 2007, the bankruptcy court entered an order and written opinion revoking the Debtor's discharge under Section 727(d)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code.[1] (R. 2; R. 3) It is from that order that the Debtor now appeals.[2] (R. 1)

STATEMENT OF THE FACTS

A. Statutory Background

Under chapter 7, "an individual debtor receives an immediate unconditional discharge of personal liability for certain debts in exchange for relinquishing his or her nonexempt assets to a bankruptcy trustee for liquidation and distribution to creditors." H.R. Rep. 109-31(I), at 10; see 11 U.S.C. §§ 701–727. A debtor's bankruptcy estate generally includes all legal or equitable

---

[1] The bankruptcy court also denied the United States Trustee's request for relief with respect to the Section 727(d)(3) portion of the Complaint. (R. 3) interests of a debtor in non-exempt property as of the commencement of a case, and a debtor has a duty to surrender such property to his bankruptcy trustee.[3] See 11 U.S.C. §§ 521, 541 and 542. To the extent a debtor acquires property of the estate after the entry of his discharge, but knowingly and fraudulently fails to surrender such property to his bankruptcy trustee, his discharge must be revoked. See 11 U.S.C. § 727(d)(2).

B. The Proceedings Below

On October 10, 2005, the Debtor, through counsel, filed a voluntary petition for relief under the liquidation provisions of chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 6) The Debtor filed his petition together with his bankruptcy Schedules A-J and Statement of Financial Affairs. (R. 6) The Debtor listed no real property on his Schedule A. (R. 12) He valued his cash, household goods, and apparel at $3,100.00 on his Schedule B. (R. 12) He fully exempted each of these items on his Schedule C. (R. 12) The Debtor listed no secured or priority creditors on his Schedules D and E. (R. 12) On his Schedule F, the Debtor listed $8,308.12 in general unsecured creditors. (R. 12) Finally, the Debtor's Statement of Financial Affairs listed no payments to creditors within the 90 days prior to the filing of his petition, and no payments to insiders, executions, garnishments, attachments, or transfers within the 1 year period prior to the filing of his petition. (R. 12)

On November 15, 2005, the Debtor's Trustee conducted the Debtor's meeting of creditors under Section 341 of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 6; R. 13) At that meeting, the Debtor was examined under oath. (R. 13) Among other things, the Trustee inquired regarding the Debtor's receipt of tax refunds. (R. 13, at 5:10-5:17) The Debtor was orally admonished not to spend any tax refunds he might receive. (R. 5, at 9:19-10:9, 10:19-10:22, 28:1-28:10) Moreover, the Debtor was provided with a one-page handout (the "Handout") warning him not to spend any tax refunds absent Trustee approval, and requesting that he provide the Trustee with copies of his Tax Returns once filed. (R. 5, at 9:9-10:17; R. 14) The Handout set out the following language in bold typeface: "Warning: Do not spend any of your tax refunds until you have received approval from my office, even if you have received notice from the Bankruptcy Court that a bankruptcy discharge has been entered. The bankruptcy discharge does not close your bankruptcy case or eliminate your need to turn over non-exempt assets." (R. 14) (bold and underlining in original) The Debtor took the Handout home with him. (R. 5, at 53:2-53:14) He claims he did not read it. (R. 5, at 53:2-53:14)

On January 18, 2006, the bankruptcy court entered an order (the "Discharge Order") discharging the Debtor of all of his dischargeable debts.[4] (R. 6) The Discharge Order was silent with respect to the subject of turnover and advised the Debtor that "[b]ecause the law is complicated, you may want to consult an attorney to determine the exact effect of the discharge in this case." See Official Bankruptcy Form B-18. However, rather than contacting his attorney regarding this subject, as the Discharge Order advised, the Debtor testified he assumed his bankruptcy case was a "done deal" and that he had no further obligations in this case. (R. 5, at 28:1-29:16)

[4] The Discharge Order was served on the Debtor, at his address of record, on January 21, 2006. (R. 6)

On February 6, 2006, the Debtor filed his 2005 Tax returns. (R. 8) The 2005 Tax Returns requested refunds in the aggregate amount of $3,510.00. (R. 8) Shortly thereafter, the Debtor received his refunds and, unbeknownst to the Trustee, used the money to pay off debts and bills. (R. 5, at 30:13-30:17)

On June 5, 2006, having failed to receive copies of the 2005 Tax Returns as requested in the Handout, the Trustee filed a motion for examination of the Debtor pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2004. (R. 6; R. 7) On June 6, 2006, the bankruptcy court entered an order granting the Trustee's 2004 examination request. (R. 6) Although the Debtor failed to appear at the scheduled 2004 examination, the Debtor did, shortly thereafter, tender copies of the 2005 Tax Returns to the Trustee. (R. 5, at 12:4-12:24) Based on those returns, the Trustee was able to calculate that $1,556.11 of the $3,510.00 in taxes previously refunded to the Debtor (the "Tax Refunds") constituted property of the Debtor's bankruptcy estate. (R. 5, at 15:3-15:9, 16:23-17:1)

On June 21, 2006, the Trustee made demand upon the Debtor for the Tax Refunds. (R. 5, at 12:4-15:16) When the money was not forthcoming, the Trustee sought to examine the Debtor once again. (R. 6; R. 10) That same day, the bankruptcy court entered an order granting the Trustee's second examination request. (R. 6) However, when the Debtor failed to appear at his second scheduled examination, and failed to tender the Tax Refunds to the Trustee, the United States Trustee, on September 26, 2006, initiated the instant proceeding seeking to revoke the Debtor's discharge under Sections 727(d)(2) and (3) of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 4; R. 5, at 15:19-17:1; R. 6) On July 26, 2007, the bankruptcy court conducted a trial on the matter, at which the Debtor was represented by counsel, and at which both the Debtor and the Trustee testified. (R. 5) The bankruptcy court took the matter under advisement, and on August 2, 2007, entered an order and written opinion revoking the Debtor's discharge under Section 727(d)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code. (R. 2; R. 3)

In its written opinion, the bankruptcy court expressly found that "[the] Trustee . . . orally cautioned [the Debtor] not to spend any 2005 tax refunds without talking to his office, even if the discharge were granted." (R. 3, at 7) Further, the bankruptcy court found that "[the Trustee] gave [the Debtor] a written warning, which provided in bold type the warning that he should not spend any of his tax refunds 'even if you have received notice from the Bankruptcy Court that a bankruptcy discharge has been entered.'" (R. 3, at 7) Finally, the bankruptcy court found that "in light of the warnings, [the Debtor's] testimony that he believed he could spend the refunds [was] not credible." (R. 3, at 7)

STANDARD OF REVIEW

A bankruptcy court's findings of fact are reviewed for clear error and its legal conclusions are reviewed de novo. See Four B. Corp. v. Food Barn Stores, Inc. (In re Food Barn Stores, Inc.), 107 F.3d 558, 561 (8th Cir. 1997). Findings of fact shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the bankruptcy court to judge the credibility of witnesses. See Richardson v. Sugg, 448 F.3d 1046, 1052 (8th Cir. 2006); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013.

ARGUMENT

Section 727(d)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code provides for the revocation of a debtor's discharge if the debtor acquires property of the estate and knowingly and fraudulently fails to deliver such property to his trustee. See 11 U.S.C. § 727(d)(2). Here, the bankruptcy court, after a full evidentiary hearing on the matter, determined that the Debtor acquired property of the estate in the form of the Tax Refunds, and knowingly and fraudulently failed to surrender them to his Trustee. The bankruptcy court made such a determination after considering all of the facts and circumstances in this case, including: (a) repeated warnings provided to the Debtor not to spend his tax refunds, and (b) the Debtor's argument that once his discharge was entered he assumed his bankruptcy case was a "done deal" and had no further obligations in this case. Ultimately, the bankruptcy court found that "in light of the warnings, [the Debtor's] testimony that he believed he could spend the refunds [was] not credible." (R. 3, at 7) Such a determination should be given great weight by this Court, and should only be set aside if clearly erroneous. See Richardson v. Sugg, 448 F.3d at 1052; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013.

As demonstrated below, nothing in the record before this Court indicates that the bankruptcy court committed clear error in concluding that the Debtor's discharge should be revoked. Accordingly, this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court's order revoking the Debtor's discharge.

First, the bankruptcy court properly concluded that the Tax Refunds constituted property of the Debtor's bankruptcy estate. Under Section 541(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, the commencement of a voluntary case under Section 301 of the Bankruptcy Code creates an estate. See 11 U.S.C. § 541(a). A bankruptcy estate is generally comprised of all of a debtor's legal and equitable interests in property as of the commencement of a case. Id. This includes contingent interests in future payments such as a debtor's anticipated tax refund. See In re Benn, 491 F.3d 811, 813 (8th Cir. 2007); Barowsky v. Serelson (In re Barowsky), 946 F.2d 1516, 1517-18 (10th Cir. 1991); Turshen v. Chapman, 823 F.2d 836, 838 (4th Cir. 1987); Doan v. Hudgins (In re Doan), 672 F.2d 831 (11th Cir. 1982); see also Kokoszka v. Belford, 417 U.S. 642, 645-48 (1974)(Bankruptcy Act case). Here, the Debtor commenced this case on October 10, 2005. Accordingly, any tax refunds associated with the period January 1, 2005 through October 10, 2005 constituted property of the Debtor's bankruptcy estate.

Second, the bankruptcy court properly concluded that the Debtor had a duty to report and surrender the Tax Refunds to his Trustee. See In re Kasden, 209 B.R. 239, 243-44 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 1997); Turshen v. Chapman, 823 F.2d at 838-39*; In re Markey*, – B.R. – , 2007 WL 3170187, at *6 (Bankr. D. Minn. October 29, 2007); 11 U.S.C. §§ 521(a)(4) and 542(a).

Lastly, the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error in determining that the Debtor knowingly and fraudulently failed to surrender the Tax Refunds to his Trustee. While there is no question that the Debtor spent the Tax Refunds for his own personal use (R. 5, at 30:13-30:17), and therefore failed to surrender them to his Trustee (R. 5, at 16:23-17:1), the Debtor professes to have done so under the alleged belief that once his discharge was entered he had no further obligations in this case. (R. 5, at 28:1-29:3) The bankruptcy court considered this explanation and rejected it.

Specifically, the bankruptcy court found that in light of the repeated oral and written warnings provided to the Debtor not to spend such refunds, the Debtor's statement indicating an entitlement to them based on the entry of his discharge was not credible. (R. 3, at 7) In doing so, the bankruptcy court noted that "[the] Trustee . . . orally cautioned [the Debtor] not to spend any 2005 tax refunds without talking to his office, even if discharge were granted." (R. 3, at 7) Further, the bankruptcy court noted that "[the Trustee] gave [the Debtor] a written warning, which provided in bold type the warning that he should not spend any of his tax refunds ‘even if you have received notice from the Bankruptcy Court that a bankruptcy discharge has been entered.’” (R. 3, at 7) Moreover, the Discharge Order upon which the Debtor professes to have relied is silent with respect to the subject of turnover – a matter of no small import when one considers that the Discharge Order advised the Debtor to consult with counsel to determine the effects of his discharge and the Debtor ignored that advice.[5] See Official Bankruptcy Form B-18; (R. 5, at 28:1-29:16) Accordingly, since the bankruptcy court's account of the evidence in this case is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, it’s ruling must be upheld on appeal. See Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573-4 (1985); Rogers v. Kelly, 866 F.2d 997, 1000 (8th Cir. 1989); Forbes v. Forbes (In re Forbes), 215 B.R. 183, 187 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 1997); see also HSBC Bank USA v. F & M Bank Northern Va., 246 F.3d 335, 338 (4th Cir. 2001); *W.H. Scott Const. Co., Inc. v. SUMMARY AND REQUEST FOR ORAL ARGUMENT

This appeal arose from a decision of the bankruptcy court in the District of South Dakota denying the United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss for Substantial Abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). The bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion, holding that certain disability payments received by debtor Eugene Wayne Koch could not be considered in applying the "ability to pay" test set forth in In re Fonder, 974 F.2d 981 (8th Cir. 1989).

Oral argument is requested because the issue of law raised in this appeal appears far more technical than it really is and the resolution of this issue would be facilitated by oral argument.

STATEMENT OF SUBJECT MATTER AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This appeal arose from a decision of the bankruptcy court in the District of South Dakota denying the United States Trustee's Motion to Dismiss for Substantial Abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). The bankruptcy court issued a final order on October 25, 1994, denying the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss and holding that certain disability payments received by debtor Eugene Wayne Koch could not be considered in applying the "ability to pay" test set forth in In re Fonder, 974 F.2d 981 (8th Cir. 1989). Joint Appendix ("JA"), Tab 6; JA, Tab 7 at 29-30. A notice of appeal was timely filed on November 4, 1994. JA, Tab 8. The district court therefore properly had jurisdiction over this matter pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a).

The district court, per Judge Lawrence L. Piersol, issued a memorandum opinion and order on September 28, 199, In re Koch, 187 B.R. 664 (D.S.D. 1995), affirming the decision of the bankruptcy court. JA, Tab 2. The United States Trustee timely filed a motion for Rehearing on October 10, 1995. JA, Tab 1, at 3, Docket # 13. The district court entered its Order Denying Motion for Rehearing on December 15, 1995. JA, Tab 1, at 3, Docket # 17. The United States Trustee timely filed a notice of appeal on February 12, 1996. JA, Tab 4. This Court, therefore, properly has jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(d) and 1291.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED

Whether the bankruptcy court and the district court erred in holding that disability payments to one of the debtors in the amount of $1,343.33 per month could not be considered in determining whether to dismiss a case for substantial abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b).

The most apposite cases in this matter are as follows:

In re Fonder, 974 F.2d 996 (8th Cir. 1992);
In re Harris, 960 F.2d 74 (8th Cir. 1992);
In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981 (8th Cir. 1989);
In re Jackson, 173 B.R. 168 (Bankr.E.D.Mo. 1994) . .

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The relevant facts in this case are not in dispute. Eugene Koch and Debra Nelson-Koch (hereinafter the "debtors") filed a petition for relief under chapter 7 of title 11 of the United States Code on May 13, 1994. JA, Tab 9. At the time they filed their petition, the debtors listed in their schedules unsecured debt totaling $29,885.15. JA, Tab 9 (Schedule F - Creditors Holding Unsecured Nonpriority Claims). The debtors subsequently amended their schedules to add two unsecured creditors with claims totalling $290.40, for a total unsecured debt of $30,175.55. JA, Tab 11 (Amendment to Amended Schedule F). The debtors reported monthly take-home pay of $1,940.81 and monthly expenses of $1,841.00. JA, Tab 9 (Schedule I - Current Income of Individual Debtors; Schedule J - Current Expenditures of Individual Debtors). The debtors did not include in their monthly take-home pay calculation certain workers' compensation payments totalling $1,343.33 per month received by Mr. Koch and claimed exempt by the debtors. JA, Tab 9 (Schedule C - Property Claimed as Exempt).

The United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss for substantial abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) on August 8, 1994. JA Tab 5, at 2, Docket # 19. In that motion the United States Trustee asserted that the debtors' bankruptcy should be dismissed pursuant to section 707(b) because, when Mr. Koch's workers' compensation benefits were considered along with other available income, the debtors had the ability to pay all of their creditors. The debtors, relying on S.D.C.L. § 62-4-42, claimed those workers' compensation payments were exempt.[1]

At the October 18, 1994 hearing on that motion, the parties stipulated as to the admissibility of exhibits that set forth the debtors' monthly take-home pay, including Mr. Koch's workers' compensation benefits, and their monthly expenses. Although the debtors did not amend their schedules, Mr. Koch also testified that he had incurred an additional $40,000 to $50,000 in medical expenses that were not covered by workers' compensation. The debtors did not offer any evidence to corroborate Mr. Koch's testimony in this regard. JA, Tab 7, Transcript of 10/18/94 Hearing ("Tr.") at 7-13.

[1] S.D.C.L. § 62-4-42 provides as follows:

> No claim for compensation under this title is assignable, and all compensation and claims therefor are exempt from all claims of creditors except for those for child support and spousal support.

The exhibits admitted at the hearing demonstrated that the debtors had the ability to pay their creditors $50,693.04 over a three-year period. JA, Tab 7, Tr. Ex. 1. This amount represents 167.99% of the unsecured debt reflected on their bankruptcy schedules, or between 63.23% and 72.24% of the unsecured debt reflected on their bankruptcy schedules and the additional "$40,000 to $50,000" about which Mr. Koch testified. Id. Alternatively, the debtors could pay $84,448 over a five-year period, JA, Tab 7, at 13, which would be the equivalent of $279.98% of the unsecured debt listed on their schedules, or between 105.38% and 120.39% of the unsecured debt reflected on their schedules and the additional "40,000 to "$50,000" of unsecured debt about which Mr. Koch testified. At the October 18, 1994 hearing, their counsel conceded unequivocally that the debtors had the ability to pay their debts: "we admit [the debtors] could pay creditors if they chose to do so . . . .." JA, Tab 7, TR. at 27.

The bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, holding that the workers' compensation payments were exempt and could not be considered part of debtor's disposable income in a chapter 13 case. On appeal, the district court affirmed. The district court acknowledged the existence of substantial case law recognizing that a bankruptcy court may consider property which is exempt under chapter 7 in assessing whether a case should be dismissed for substantial abuse pursuant to section 707(b). JA, Tab 2 (187 B.R. 664, 667-68). Notwithstanding that case law and the express statement by the Eighth Circuit in In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981, 982, 984, fn.7. (8th Cir. 1989) that exempt income should be considered in assessing a debtor's "ability to pay", the district court held that workers' compensation payments could not be considered in a section 707(b) analysis. JA, Tab 2 (187 B.R. at 668). In affirming the bankruptcy court, the district court relied on In re Berger, 61 F.3d 624 (8th Cir. 1995).

APPLICABLE STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

The applicable standard of review on appeal is de novo with respect this issue, which is a question of law. Miller v. Farmers Home Administration, 16 F.3d 240 (8th Cir. 1994).

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The Eighth Circuit has recognized that the debtors no longer have unfettered access to chapter 7 bankruptcy relief. With the enactment of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), Congress has authorized courts to dismiss cases which the bankruptcy courts determine would constitute a substantial abuse of the bankruptcy system. In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981, 982 (8th Cir. 1989). The Eighth Circuit, has determined that where debtors have the ability to pay their creditors, which is assessed by reference to their ability to fund a hypothetical plan of reorganization under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, dismissal of their chapter 7 case under section 707(b) is appropriate.

In this case, it is uncontested that debtors can pay their creditors if they so choose. They prefer instead to pay nothing, arguing they cannot be compelled to commit certain workers compensation funds, which they claim are exempt, to fund a chapter 13 plan. In affirming the bankruptcy court in its refusal to dismiss the debtors' bankruptcy case under section 707(b), the district court relied on In re Berger, 61 F.3d 624 (8th Cir. 1995) for the proposition that exempt money is not includable in the disposable income which a chapter 13 debtor must commit to his or her chapter 13 plan. Because the debtors cannot be compelled to commit these workers compensation benefits to a chapter 13 plan, the district court reasoned that those funds could not be considered in any assessment under section 707(b) of the debtor's ability to pay their creditors. The district court's decision is flawed, however, because the central inquiry in a substantial abuse analysis in the Eighth Circuit is not whether a debtor can be compelled to pay their creditors, but rather whether they have the ability to pay them. Because the debtors in this case have the uncontested ability to pay their creditors, the bankruptcy court erred in refusing to consider the workers' compensation benefits as in assessing whether the debtors' case should be dismissed for substantial abuse under section 707(b).

ARGUMENT

THE DISTRICT COURT ERRED BY REFUSING TO CONSIDER MR. KOCH'S WORKERS' COMPENSATION BENEFITS AS PART OF ITS SUBSTANTIAL ABUSE ANALYSIS

The Eighth Circuit has recognized that "[w]ith the enactment of the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984[, Pub. L. 98-353, 98 Stat. 353] ("1984 Act"), debtors no longer have unfettered access to voluntary Chapter 7 relief." In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981, 982 (8th Cir. 1989). Pursuant to the 1984 Act, Congress substantially amended section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code by adding section 707(b), which provides as follows:

> (b) After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee, but not at the request or suggestion of any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts if it finds that the granting of relief would be a substantial abuse of the provisions of this chapter. There shall be a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor.

11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (emphasis added).

The Eighth Circuit has determined, in light of its legislative history, that section 707(b) was "aimed primarily at stemming the use of Chapter 7 relief by unneedy debtors." Walton, 866 F.2d at 983 (citing S. Rep No. 65, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1983)). (emphasis added). Consequently, the Eighth Circuit has expressed the belief that section 707(b) "upholds creditors' interests in obtaining repayment where such repayment would not be a burden on the debtors." Id. at 983 (quoting S. Rep. No. 65 at 53). Although the term "substantial abuse" is not defined in section 707(b) or elsewhere in the Bankruptcy Code, the Eighth Circuit has determined that Congress expressly declined to adopt a rigid, mechanical approach, but opted rather for an undefined, flexible "substantial abuse" standard. Walton, 866 F.2d at 983.

Although recognizing that section 707(b) had no defined standard, the Eighth Circuit noted that "almost all the courts that have interpreted the 'substantial abuse' language of section 707(b) have concluded that this language encompasses consideration of the debtor's ability to pay his debts out of future income." Id. at 984. The Eighth Circuit therefore adopted the reasoning of the Ninth Circuit in In re Kelly, 841 F.2d 908 (9th Cir. 1988), which held that:

> [T]he debtor's ability to pay his debts when due as determined by his ability to fund a chapter 13 plan is the primary factor to be considered in determining whether granting relief would be substantial abuse. . . That is not to say that inability to pay will shield a debtor from section 707(b) dismissal where bad faith is otherwise shown. But "a finding that a debtor is able to pay his debts, standing alone, supports a conclusion of substantial abuse.

Walton, 866 F.2d at 984-85 (emphasis added). The Walton decision was subsequently reaffirmed in both Fonder v. United States, 974 F.2d 996, 999 (8th Cir. 1992) and United States v. Harris, 960 F.2d 74, 76 (8th Cir. 1992). Although the Eighth Circuit has concluded that a debtor's ability to fund a chapter 13 plan is a "primary factor", it has expressly declined to hold that to be dismissed under section 707(b), a debtor must be eligible for chapter 13 relief. Fonder v. U.S., 974 F.2d 996, 999 (8th Cir. 1992).

In this case, the debtors openly admit that they have the ability to pay their creditors. Their counsel stated unequivocally at the hearing on the United States Trustee's motion that "we admit [the debtors] could pay their creditors if they chose to do so . . ." Tr. at 27. (emphasis added). This admission is not surprising in light of the substantial funds available to the debtors. As set forth above, the uncontroverted evidence establishes that they have the ability to pay their creditors $50,693 over three years. This amount is equivalent to $167.99% of the unsecured debt reflected on their bankruptcy schedules or between 63.23% and 72.24% of their scheduled debt and the "$40,000 to $50,000 of additional debt claimed by Mr. Koch at the hearing. Alternatively, they could pay $84,448 over a five-year period, which sum is equivalent to 279.39% of their scheduled debt, or between 105.38% and 120.39% of the scheduled unsecured debt and the "$40,000 to $50,000 of additional debt about which Mr. Koch testified.

Under any of these scenarios, the debtors have the uncontested ability to repay either a substantial portion or all of their debt. See Walton, 866 F.2d at 985 (debtor's ability to pay two-thirds of debt in three years or 100% of debt in five years is sufficient to rebut the statutory presumption in section 707(b) in favor of granting the relief requested by debtor and justifies dismissal for substantial abuse).

Rather than taking advantage of the statutory protections available under chapter 13 that would enable them to pay their debts, debtors prefer to pay their creditors nothing, arguing that they cannot be forced to use an asset which is exempt from liquidation in a chapter 7 proceeding to fund a chapter 13 plan. In upholding the debtors' decision to ignore their creditors' interests -- and rights -- the district court disregarded both the letter and the spirit of controlling Eighth Circuit case law, which clearly provides that cases filed by "unneedy debtors" for whom repayment "would not be a burden" should be dismissed. Walton, 866 F.2d at 983.

The district court's decision acknowledged the existence of the substantial case law, including the Walton decision, expressly recognizing that a bankruptcy court may consider property which is exempt under chapter 7 in assessing whether a case should be dismissed for substantial abuse pursuant to section 707(b). 187 B.R. at 667-68 (citing, In re Minor, 177 B.R. 576, 579 (Bankr. E.D.Tenn. 1995); In re Jackson, 173 B.R. 168, 171 (Bankr.E.D.Mo. 1994); In re Morse, 164 B.R. 651 (Bankr. E.D. Wash. 1994); In re Schnabel, 153 B.R. 809 (Bankr. N.D.Ill. 1993). See also, In re Rogers, 168 B.R. 806 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 1993)).

In assessing a debtor's ability to fund a hypothetical chapter 13 plan, these courts have examined the ability of the debtor to repay debts out of future disposable income. Rogers, 168 B.R. at 809. The analysis of this issue has generally focused on the definition in 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b)(2) of "disposable income" as "income which is received by the debtor and which is not reasonably necessary to be expended -- (A) for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependant of the debtor . . ." See Rogers, 168

B.R. at 809. Because the plain language of section 1325(b)(2) does not exclude exempt income from disposable income, the majority of courts that have addressed this issue have declined to read such a limitation into that section. See, e.g., Rogers, 168 B.R. at 809 (citing Schnabel, 155 B.R. at 815).

The district court relied on Berger, which it incorrectly believed had held that exempt proceeds of a life insurance policy "may not be included in calculating the amount of income available to pay the claims of unsecured creditors under 11 U.S.C. § 1225(b)." 187 B.R. at 667.[2] Because it determined that section 1225(b) is so closely analogous to section 1325(b), the district court held that Berger controlled in the debtors' hypothetical chapter 13 case as well. Id. Specifically, the district court held that, notwithstanding the substantial case law to the contrary, exempt income may not be considered part of disposable income under section 1325(b). From this, the district court reasoned that Mr. Koch's workers' compensation benefits, which are exempt from liquidation in a chapter 7 proceeding, are excluded from disposable income under section 1325(b) and may not be considered in a section 707(b) analysis. 187 B.R. at 667-68. The district court's reasoning in this regard is flawed for several reasons.

[2] As discussed in the text, the issue of whether exempt income may be considered part of disposable income under 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b) is irrelevant in an ability to pay analysis. The true issue is whether the debtors have the ability to pay their creditors such that dismissal for substantial abuse is appropriate. Nonetheless, contrary to the district court's statement, the Eighth Circuit in Berger did not hold exempt property or income was not part of a chapter 12 debtor's disposable income under 11 U.S.C. § 1225(b). That issue was decided by the bankruptcy court, was not challenged on appeal and was therefore not a holding of the Court of Appeals. See In re Berger, 61 F.3d 624, 626 (8th Cir. 1995)("The bankruptcy court determined that the proceeds were exempt . . .and that ruling is not challenged on appeal.").

First, the Eighth Circuit in Berger did not confront or consider an application of the substantial abuse standard. Indeed, as the district court noted, the Berger decision did not cite any of the considerable case authority discussing exempt income in the context of a substantial abuse analysis. 187 B.R. at 668. Consequently, that case offers no guidance concerning the implementation of § 707(b) and should not be read as contrary authority to the express statement in Walton that exempt income may be considered in assessing a debtor's ability to pay his creditors.[3]

Second, the district court's reliance on Berger in holding that a debtor cannot be compelled to fund a chapter 13 plan with exempt income ignores the central question concerning substantial abuse under Walton. That question is not whether the debtors can be compelled to pay their debt -- no chapter 7 debtor can be compelled to do so. See Walton, 866 F.2d at 984, fn.6 (citing In re Edwards, 50 B.R. 933, 939 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1985)) ("Although Code § 707(b) may have the effect of relegating a debtor to a Chapter 13 if he wants any bankruptcy relief, any decision to utilize Chapter 13 remains that of the debtor." (emphasis added)). The question is instead whether the debtors have the ability to do so. Indeed, as this Court stated in In re Fonder,

[3] In In re Walton, the Eighth Circuit expressly addressed the holding in In re Brady, 86 B.R. 616 (W.D.Mo. 1987). In Brady, the district court overruled the dismissal of the debtor's bankruptcy for substantial abuse, holding that exempt income may not be considered in a substantial abuse analysis. This is the only case of which appellant is aware to so hold and the only case relied upon by the debtors for this proposition. In Walton, however, the Eighth Circuit expressly stated that the bankruptcy court's decision in Brady, 95 B.R. 1004 (Bankr. W.D.Mo. 1987), which included exempt social security benefits in its substantial abuse analysis, represented "the correct view of the law".

> While the Walton\Harris test for substantial abuse focuses on whether the debtor can fund a Chapter 13 plan, the essential inquiry remains whether the debtor's ability to repay creditors with future income is sufficient to make the Chapter 7 liquidating bankruptcy a substantial abuse of the [Bankruptcy] Code.

974 F.2d 996, 999 (8th Cir. 1992). (emphasis added). See also In re Morse, 164 B.R. 651, 656 (Bankr. E.D. Wash. 1994) ("While the court does not dispute that debtors are entitled to any exemption which they may validly claim, the ability to claim an exemption is an independent issue from whether debtors have the ability to repay their debts." (emphasis added)); In re Anatal, 85 B.R. 838 (Bankr. W.D. Mo. 1988) (injecting considerations of exempt property or money into the section 707(b) analysis is inappropriate, where central inquiry is simply whether debtor has the ability to pay creditors).

The district court erred by focusing on whether the debtors might claim an exemption in a chapter 13 case, as opposed to addressing the central question under the substantial abuse standard set forth in Walton of the debtors' ability to pay their creditors. The district court decision that Mr. Koch's $1,343.33 per month in workers' compensation benefits may not be considered in assessing whether the debtor had ability to pay creditors is contrary to the Eighth Circuit's broad interpretation of section 707(b) and its determination that "unneedy debtors" should not be permitted chapter 7 relief. The district court's analysis is therefore contrary to the law of the Eighth Circuit and should be rejected.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth, the United States Trustee respectfully urges this Court to reverse the decision of the district court.

FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING RESPONDENT

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

Pursuant to Section 727 of the Bankruptcy Code, the trustee of the debtor's estate, the United States trustee, or any creditor may object to the granting of a discharge of a debtor. 11 U.S.C. 727(c)(1). Rule 4004(a) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure specifies that "a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge under § 727(a) of the Code shall be filed no later than 60 days after the first date set for the meeting of creditors * * * ." This case presents the question whether the requirement that the objection to discharge be filed within the 60-day period specified in Rule 4004(a) may be forfeited by the debtor. Because the United States is a creditor in many bankruptcies and, through the United States Trustee Program, supervises the administration of bankruptcy cases, the United States has a strong interest in the proper interpretation and application of this Rule.[1]

BANKRUPTCY RULES INVOLVED

1. Rules 4004(a) and (b) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure provide:

> (a) Time for Filing Complaint Objecting to Discharge; Notice of Time Fixed. In a chapter 7 liquidation case a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge under § 727(a) of the Code shall be filed no later than 60 days after the first date set for the meeting of creditors under § 341(a). In a chapter 11 reorganization case, the complaint shall be filed no later than the first date set for the hearing on confirmation. At least 25 days' notice of the time so fixed shall be given to the United States trustee and all creditors as provided in Rule 2002(f) and (k) and to the trustee and the trustee's attorney.
>
> (b) Extension of Time. On motion of any party in interest, after hearing on notice, the court may for cause extend the time to file a complaint objecting to discharge. The motion shall be filed before the time has expired.

2. Rule 9006(b)(1) and (3) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure provide:

(b) Enlargement.

[1] See also 11 U.S.C. 307 (the United States Trustee may appear and be heard on any issue in any bankruptcy case). The United States Trustee Program is created by 28 U.S.C. 581-589. In the administration of that program, the United States Trustee files hundreds of complaints each year that object to the entry of a discharge or seek revocation of a discharge.

> (1) In General. Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subdivision, when an act is required or allowed to be done at or within a specified period by these rules * * * , the court for cause shown may at any time in its discretion (1) with or without motion or notice order the period enlarged if the request therefor is made before the expiration of the period originally prescribed or as extended by a previous order or (2) on motion made after the expiration of the specified period permit the act to be done where the failure to act was the result of excusable neglect.
> (3) Enlargement limited. The court may enlarge the time for taking action under Rules 1006(b)(2), 1017(e), 3002(c), 4003(b), 4004(a), 4007(c), 8002, and 9033, only to the extent and under the conditions stated in those rules.

STATEMENT

1. In a Chapter 7 liquidation case, a debtor who satisfies the several conditions set forth in Section 727(a) of the Bankruptcy Code is to receive an order discharging his debts. 11 U.S.C. 727(a).[2] A discharge

---

[2] Under Section 727(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, a court may not grant a discharge if the debtor (i) is not an individual, (ii) has concealed, transferred or destroyed property of the estate in the year preceding bankruptcy or during the bankruptcy case, (iii) has destroyed books and records, (iv) has knowingly given a false oath or account, (v) has presented or used a false claim, (vi) has attempted to obtain money by acting or forbearing to act, (vii) has withheld documents relating to the debtor's property or financial affairs, (viii) has failed to explain a loss or deficiency of assets, (ix) has refused to obey court orders, (x) has refused to testify in the granted under this Section frees the debtor from all debts that arose before the bankruptcy case commenced other than those excepted from discharge under Section 523 of the Code. 11 U.S.C. 727(b).[3]

The trustee, the United States trustee, or any creditor may object to the granting of a discharge under Section 727. 11 U.S.C. 727(c)(1). Such an "objection[] to discharge" is a "core proceeding" within the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court. 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(J). Nothing in the Bankruptcy Code, however, specifies a time or deadline for filing such an objection. Instead, the time frame for filing a complaint objecting to a discharge is set forth in Rule 4004(a) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure. That Rule states in relevant part that "a complaint objecting to the debtor's discharge under § 727(a) of the Code shall be filed no later than 60 days after the first date set for the meeting of creditors * * * ." Rule 4004(b) then goes on to provide that "[t]he court may for cause extend the time to file a complaint objecting to discharge" if the motion is "filed before the time has expired." And, Rule 9006(b)(3), which addresses motions for enlargement of case, (xi) has received a chapter 11 discharge within six years of the filing of the current bankruptcy case, (xii) has received a chapter 12 or 13 discharge within six years in a case in which the debtor did not pay at least 70 percent of the allowed unsecured claims or, in certain circumstances, all of those claims, unless the court approves a written waiver of discharge after the order for relief in the case has been entered. 11 U.S.C. 727(a)(1)-(10).

[3] Many specific types of debts are excepted from discharge by Section 523. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(1) (certain debts "for a tax or a customs duty"); 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(2)(A)) (certain debts for money obtained by "false pretenses * * * or actual fraud"); 11 U.S.C. 523(a)(6) (debts for "willful and malicious injury by the debtor").

time generally, further provides that "the court may enlarge the time for taking action under Rule[ ] 4004(a) * * * only to the extent and under the conditions stated in [that] rule." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9006(b)(3).[4]

2. On April 4, 1997, petitioner filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 7. Pet. App. 1. Respondent, who is one of petitioner's creditors, sought and obtained three separate extensions of the 60-day deadline for filing an objection to discharge under Rule 4004(a). The final extension was until January 13, 1998. Pet. App. 3-4, 26.

On January 13, 1998, respondent filed an adversary complaint that objected to petitioner's discharge. In that complaint, respondent alleged that petitioner had transferred property within one year of filing bankruptcy with intent to defraud and should therefore be denied a discharge under 11 U.S.C. 727(a)(2)-(5) of the Bankruptcy Code. See Pet. App. 4, 26; note 2, supra. On May 6, 1998, without an additional court-approved extension, respondent filed an amended complaint that asserted an additional objection to discharge. The new objection was based on respondent's allegation that petitioner had fraudulently transferred money to his wife by removing his name from a family checking account and then continuing to deposit his salary into the account. According to the amended complaint, such transfers were fraudulent and therefore provided an additional basis for denying the discharge under Section 727(a)(2)(A). See Pet. App. 4, 27.

[4] An analogous provision provides for objections to the discharge of a particular debt pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 523(c). See note 3, supra. Rule 4007(c) specifies that "[a] complaint to determine the dischargeability of a debt under § 523(c) shall be filed no later than 60 days after the first date set for the meeting of creditors under § 341(a) * * * . On motion of a party in interest, after hearing on notice, the court may for cause extend the time fixed under this subdivision. The motion shall be filed before the time has expired." Because the language in Rules 4007(c) and 4004(a) and (b) are virtually identical, courts have found it appropriate to consider decisions construing Rule 4007(c) in determining whether the time limit set forth in Rule 4004(a) may be forfeited. See Pet. App. 8 n.3.

Petitioner filed an answer in which he denied liability on the asserted fraudulent transfers. He did not, however, object to the amended complaint on the ground that it was filed beyond the time permitted by Rule 4004. Pet. App. 4.

3. The bankruptcy court granted respondent's motion for summary judgment. The court concluded that the fraudulent transfers described in the amended complaint were appropriate grounds for denying petitioner a discharge under Section 727(a)(2). Pet. App. 4-5.

Petitioner then moved for reconsideration. In that motion, he argued for the first time that the allegations of the amended objection to discharge were untimely and that the court was therefore deprived of "jurisdiction" to deny his discharge on those grounds. The bankruptcy court held that the time limit set forth in Rule 4004(a) is not "jurisdictional" and that, by not raising a timely objection to the grounds stated in the amended complaint, petitioner had forfeited his objection under that Rule. Pet. App. 5, 29.

4. The district court upheld the bankruptcy court ruling. Pet. App. 25-38. The court agreed with the holding of In re Santos, 112 B.R. 1001, 1008 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1990), that "the timeliness of a dischargeability complaint presents an affirmative defense that must be raised in an answer or responsive pleading [and that] [i]f the defense is not raised in the answer or responsive pleading, it is generally waived." Pet. App. 31-32.[5] Adopting the reasoning of the Second Circuit in In re Benedict, 90 F.3d 50, 54 (1996), and of the Fourth Circuit in Farouki v. Emirates Bank International, Ltd., 14 F.3d 244, 248 (1994), the court noted that the filing requirement set forth in Rule 4004(a) is not different from "a statutory provision that imposes a filing deadline" and that "statutory filing deadlines are generally subject to the defenses of waiver, estoppel, and equitable tolling." Pet. App. 31. The court therefore concluded that, "[b]y not raising the timeliness of the family account claim in his responsive pleading, [petitioner] waived the objection." Id. at 33.

5. The court of appeals affirmed. Pet. App. 1-23. The court emphasized that the statutes that grant jurisdiction to the bankruptcy courts "over bankruptcy matters do not indicate that timeliness of objections to discharge is a jurisdictional predicate." Id. at 12 (citing 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(J)). The court agreed with the holding of the Second and Fourth Circuits that the timely filing requirement of Rule 4004(a) is not "jurisdictional" and, like other limitations provisions, may therefore be waived. Pet. App. 14 (citing In re Benedict, 90 F.3d at 53-54; Farouki v. Emirates Bank International, Ltd., 14 F.3d at 248).

[5] The issue in this case is more accurately described as one of forfeiture rather than waiver. "Waiver is different from forfeiture. Whereas forfeiture is the failure to make the timely assertion of a right, waiver is the 'intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right.'" United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725, 733 (1993) (quoting Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938)). Although in other contexts that distinction has material consequences, that is not the case for Rule 4004. And, since the lower court opinions use these terms interchangeably, this brief will not retain the distinction. See Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 895 n.2 (1991) (Scalia, J., concurring) ("I shall not try to retain the distinction between waiver and forfeiture throughout this opinion, since many of the sources I shall be using disregard it.").

The court of appeals noted that petitioner did not challenge the timeliness of respondent's objection to discharge under Rule 4004(a) prior to his motion for rehearing in the bankruptcy court. Pet. App. 18. The court of appeals concluded that petitioner waived the affirmative defense that the objection to discharge was untimely by not raising that defense until after the court ruled on the merits of the objection. Ibid.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. The court of appeals correctly determined that the time limit set forth in Rule 4004(a) is subject to forfeiture. The core jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts expressly encompasses all "objections to discharge." 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(J). In that statute, Congress did not impose, as a jurisdictional predicate, a requirement that objections to discharge be filed in a timely manner under the bankruptcy rules. To the contrary, while this statute requires that some matters be timely asserted as a prerequisite of core jurisdiction, the statute contains no such requirement for objections to discharge. Nothing in this jurisdictional statute thus indicates that bankruptcy courts have jurisdiction only over objections to discharge that are timely filed under the bankruptcy rules or that a debtor otherwise cannot forfeit an argument about the timeliness of an objection to discharge by failing to raise the argument.

Moreover, the bankruptcy rules themselves specify that they are not to be construed either to extend or limit the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts. Fed. Bank. R. Proc. 9030. The filing deadline for objections to discharge in Rule 4004(a) is thus expressly not "jurisdictional." Instead, like other filing deadlines, it operates "like a statute of limitations" and is therefore "subject to [the defenses of] waiver, estoppel and equitable tolling." Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. 385, 393 (1982).

2. That does not, of course, mean that the doctrine of forfeiture—or equitable defenses such as tolling or estoppel—would always be applicable under Rule 4004(a) and that a failure to raise an argument about the timeliness of an objection to discharge would always result in forfeiture of that argument. In this case, however, petitioner no longer argues that a factual basis for a finding of forfeiture does not exist. Instead, petitioner incorrectly urges only that the timely filing requirement of Rule 4004(a) is "jurisdictional" and therefore may never be forfeited.

3. Petitioner errs in claiming that the decision of the court of appeals conflicts with this Court's decision in Taylor v. Freeland & Kronz, 503 U.S. 638 (1992). In Taylor, the Court held that the time limits for filing objections to a debtor's list of exempt property in Rule 4003 apply even for exemptions that are not claimed in "good faith." Id. at 644-645. That decision does not suggest that the deadline in Rule 4003 is jurisdictional and does not support a contention that a debtor cannot forfeit the defense that an objection to discharge is untimely under Rule 4004(a).

ARGUMENT

THE TIME LIMITS IMPOSED IN RULE 4004(a) FOR FILING AN OBJECTION TO DISCHARGE MAY BE FORFEITED BY THE DEBTOR

This Court has made clear that, unless strict compliance with a filing deadline is a prerequisite to the jurisdiction of the court, "[s]tatutory filing deadlines are generally subject to the defenses of waiver, estoppel, and equitable tolling." United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84, 94 n.10 (1985). See Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. 385, 393 (1982). In this case, the court of appeals correctly held that the time limits imposed by Rule 4004(a) of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure are not "a jurisdictional prerequisite to suit in federal court, but [are instead] a requirement that, like a statute of limitations, is subject to waiver, estoppel and equitable tolling" (Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. at 393).

A. The Federal Rules Of Bankruptcy Procedure Do Not Have Jurisdictional Effect

1. The jurisdiction of the lower federal courts is created by statute, not by rules of practice. As this Court has emphasized, "[i]t is axiomatic" that the rules of practice and procedure established by this Court for the lower federal courts can neither create nor destroy the jurisdiction that Congress has created. Owen Equipment & Erection Co. v. Kroger, 437 U.S. 365, 370 (1978); see Snyder v. Harris, 394 U.S. 332, 337 (1969); Sibbach v. Wilson & Co., 312 U.S. 1, 9-10 (1941). Instead, the procedural rules adopted by this Court "merely prescribe the method by which the jurisdiction granted the courts by Congress is to be exercised."

Wright, Miller & Marcus, Federal Practice & Procedure § 3141, at 485 (1997).

As pertinent to this case, Congress has specified that an "objection[] to discharge" is a "core proceeding" within the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court. 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(J). Moreover, Rule 9030 specifies that the bankruptcy rules of practice "shall not be construed to extend or limit the jurisdiction of the courts or the venue of any matters therein." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9030.[6] Accordingly, nothing in Rule 4004—including the time limit for the filing of objections to discharge set forth in that rule–-"limit[s] the jurisdiction of the courts" over such objections. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9030.

In order for a time limit for filing a claim to constitute a true "jurisdictional prerequisite to suit in federal court" (Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. at 393), it would need to be established by Congress, not in a rule of practice or procedure adopted by this Court.[7] In this case, however, the statute that creates

[6] Rule 82 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure similarly states that the rules of civil procedure "shall not be construed to extend or limit the jurisdiction of the United States district courts or the venue of actions therein." Fed. R. Civ. P. 82.

[7] In rejecting the assertion that a time requirement in a rule of practice is "jurisdictional and cannot be waived," the Court stated in Schact v. United States, 398 U.S. 58, 64 (1970), that "it must be remembered that this rule was not enacted by Congress but was promulgated by this Court under authority of Congress to prescribe rules * * * . The procedural rules adopted by the Court for the orderly transaction of its business are not jurisdictional and can be relaxed by the Court in the exercise of its discretion when the ends of justice so require." Justice Harlan similarly emphasized in his concurring opinion in Schact that "this Court on occasion waives the time limitations imposed by its own jurisdiction over "objection[s] to discharge" in bankruptcy cases contains no time limit for filing such claims. 28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(J). While this jurisdictional statute requires that some motions or proceedings in bankruptcy cases must be brought in a "timely" manner, the statute contains no such requirement for objections to discharge.[8] Because, as it applies to

Rules and yet treats time requirements imposed by statute as jurisdictional." Id. at 68.

To be sure, a rule may, by its express terms or structure, require absolute compliance with a time limit and thus preclude reliance on equitable doctrines or waiver. For example, the time period for filing a notice of appeal may be strictly enforced even when it is fixed by rule, rather than statute. See, e.g., Fed. R. App. P. 4(b)(1)(A) (10-day limit for appeal by a criminal defendant). While courts sometimes refer to such provisions as "jurisdictional" in an effort to describe the strict nature of the timeliness requirements, they are not true limits on jurisdiction. See Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 90 (1998) ("Jurisdiction, it has been observed, 'is a word of many, too many, meanings.' "); Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. at 395 (the deadline for filing EEOC complaints is subject to equitable estoppel even though "our cases contain scattered references to the timely-filing requirement as jurisdictional").

[8] As the court of appeals emphasized (Pet. App. 12):

> Matters of timeliness are, notably, present in other provisions. For instance, section 157(b)(3) states that "[t]he bankruptcy judge shall determine, on the judge's own motion or on timely motion of a party, whether a proceedings is a core proceeding." 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(3). Further, for a party to obtain de novo review in the district court of a bankruptcy court's findings of fact and conclusions of law in a non-core proceeding, that party must "timely and specifically object[]." 28 U.S.C. § 157(c)(1). These references to timeliness in sections other than the grants of jurisdiction support the view that timeliness is not a prerequisite to the bankruptcy court's exercise of jurisdiction in a core proceeding such as [petitioner's] objection to discharge.

objections to discharge, this statute "does not limit jurisdiction to those cases in which there has been a timely filing," compliance with the time limitations of Rule 4004 is not a "jurisdictional prerequisite." Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. at 393.

The time limit for filing objections to discharge is set forth in a procedural rule adopted by this Court that has no jurisdictional effect and does not preclude application of principles of waiver or forfeiture. The bankruptcy rules, including Rule 4004(a), are designed to assist the bankruptcy courts in the management of cases and to promote the "'expeditious and economical administration' of cases under the Code." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1001 advisory committee's note. These rules are to "be construed to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every case and proceeding;" they are not to be construed to extend or limit the court's jurisdiction. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1001, 9030.

The relevant jurisdictional provision in this case has no time limit for objections to discharge. It thus stands in stark contrast to jurisdictional provisions, such as the Federal Tort Claims Act, which commands that failure to comply with a filing requirement means that "an action shall not be instituted" and that "a tort claim against the United States shall be forever barred * * *." 28 U.S.C. 2675(a), 2401(b). Similarly, 28 U.S.C. 2107 specifies that, "[e]xcept as otherwise provided in this section, no appeal shall bring any judgment, order or decree in an action, suit or proceeding of a civil nature before a court of appeals for review unless notice of appeal is filed, within thirty days after the entry of such judgment, order or decree." The Court has therefore noted that "the filing of a notice of appeal is an event of jurisdictional significance—it confers jurisdiction on the court of appeals and divests the district court of its control over those aspects of the case involved in the appeal." Griggs v. Provident Consumer Discount Co., 459 U.S. 56, 58 (1982).

Unlike a timely notice of appeal, which is a prerequisite for the jurisdiction of the court of appeals, the filing of a timely objection to discharge neither confers nor deprives the bankruptcy courts of jurisdiction over a creditor's discharge. That jurisdiction is established by statute (28 U.S.C. 157(b)(2)(J)), and the bankruptcy rules merely "govern procedure in [such] cases." Fed. R. Bank. P. 1001.

2. This Court's recent decision in Young v. United States, 535 U.S. 43 (2002), supports the conclusion that the time deadline in Rule 4004(a) is not jurisdictional. In Young, the Court addressed the three-year lookback period in Section 507(a)(8)(A)(i) of the Bankruptcy Code, which allows the government to collect taxes "for which a return was due within three years before the filing of an individual debtor's petition." Id. at 44. The Court held in Young that the period established in this limitations provision is subject to equitable tolling. Id. at 47. The Court stated that this statute "prescribes a period within which certain rights (namely, priority and nondischargeability in bankruptcy) may be enforced" and rejected the argument that the statutory lookback period was a "substantive component" of the Code. Id. at 47, 48. Instead, the Court found it to be a limitation provision that "serves the 'same basic policies [furthered by] all limitations provisions: repose, elimination of stale claims, and certainty about a plaintiff's opportunity for recovery and a defendant's potential liabilities." Id. at 47. The Court emphasized that, while the purpose of the period is to "encourage[ ] the IRS to protect its rights" before the three-year period has elapsed (id. at 47-48), "nothing in the Bankruptcy Code precludes equitable tolling of the lookback period." Id. at 47. Instead, the Court concluded that such limitations periods in bankruptcy cases are presumptively subject to equitable tolling because bankruptcy courts "are courts of equity and apply the principles and rules of equity jurisprudence." Id. at 50 (citations and internal quotation omitted).

Those same principles apply here. See In re Phillips, 288 B.R. 585, 592-593 (Bankr. M.D. Ga. 2002) (applying Young to Rule 4007). The deadline in Rule 4004(a) serves the same purposes furthered by all limitations periods—finality, repose, and certainty about liability. As Young makes clear, these basic purposes are not jeopardized by recognizing the applicability of equitable defenses in particular cases.

B. The Time Limit For Filing Objections to Discharge In Rule 4004(a) Of The Bankruptcy Rules Of Practice And Procedure May Be Forfeited By The Debtor

1. Because the timely filing requirements of the bankruptcy rules do not constitute "a jurisdictional prerequisite to suit in federal court," they are to be treated "like a statute of limitations" and are therefore presumptively "subject to waiver, estoppel and equitable tolling." Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. at 393. The fact that the time limit in Rule 4004(a) is presumptively "subject to" the doctrine of waiver—and to defenses such as equitable tolling or estoppel—does not, of course, mean that these defenses would always be available under Rule 4004(a) or that a failure to point out that an objection to discharge is untimely will always prove fatal. In the present case, however, petitioner does not claim that appropriate factual grounds for a finding of waiver are not present. See Pet. App. 18, 31, 33. Instead, petitioner incorrectly urges only that the timely filing requirement of Rule 4004(a) is "jurisdictional" and therefore may never be waived. That contention is incorrect for the reasons already described.

Moreover, much of petitioner's argument is actually directed to an issue that is not presented in this case. Petitioner insistently maintains that, taken together, the structure of Rule 4004(a) (which establishes the time for objecting to discharge) and of Rule 9006(b)(3) (which provides that the time for such objections may be enlarged only when timely application for an extension is made pursuant to Rule 4004(a)) require the conclusion that "a court has no authority to extend the deadlines based on equitable exceptions imported from outside the rules." Pet. Br. 13 (emphasis added); see also id. at 28 (arguing courts have no equitable authority "to extend the time for objecting to discharge"). This case, however, does not involve the issue of equitable tolling, for it does not involve a timely objection to an untimely application to "extend the deadlines" for filing an objection to discharge under Rule 4004(a). Instead, it involves the distinct issue of whether petitioner waived his right to object to an objection to discharge that was admittedly untimely. The question whether, under these Rules, equitable tolling doctrines would permit a court to "extend" the deadline is thus not presented here. And, because that question is not presented here, the Court need not address whether the time restrictions in these Rules are in such "emphatic form" that they negate the "presumption" that equitable tolling is available to remedy "unfairness in individual cases" by extending the filing deadline. United States v. Brockamp, 519 U.S. 347, 350, 353 (1997).

2. The filing deadline in Rule 4004(a) is designed to further the prompt administration of bankruptcy estates and to allow the debtor to enjoy finality and certainty in relief from financial distress. Those purposes do not preclude application of the doctrine of waiver in this case. As petitioner acknowledges, the doctrine of waiver is designed to "promote finality" and efficiency in the adjudicative process (Pet. Br. 21). "[T]he debtor, if he or she asserts his or her rights in a timely manner, will not suffer any impairment of his or her interest in certainty, finality and prompt administration." In re Santos, 112 B.R. 1001, 1008 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 1990).

Indeed, this case presents a core example of a waiver of rights in litigation, for petitioner failed to challenge the timeliness of respondent's objection to discharge until after the court had ruled on the merits of that objection. See page 6, supra. Recognizing that the bankruptcy rules are to be interpreted and applied to achieve "the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every case and proceeding" (Fed. R. Bank. P. 1001), the court of appeals properly concluded that the doctrine of waiver applies in this case.

C. The Decision Below Is Not Inconsistent With Taylor v. Freeland & Kronz

Petitioner mistakenly argues (Pet. Br. 19-21) that the decision in this case is inconsistent with the decision of this Court in Taylor v. Freeland & Kronz, 503 U.S. 638 (1992).[9] In Taylor, the Court held that the time limits

---

[9] Petitioner also erroneously relies (Pet. Br. 21) on Carlisle v. United States, 517 U.S. 416 (1996), which concerned the proper application of Rule 29(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The Court held in Carlisle that Rule 29(c) is "plain and unambiguous" and does not permit untimely motions for acquittal, in Rule 4003 for filing objections to a debtor's list of exempt property apply even for exemptions that are not claimed in "good faith." Id. at 644-645. Under the Bankruptcy Code, a debtor may claim certain property as exempt from his bankruptcy estate. 11 U.S.C. 522(b). To do so, "[t]he debtor shall file a list of property the debtor claims as exempt. * * * Unless a party in interest objects, the property claimed as exempt on such list is exempt." 11 U.S.C. 522(l). Bankruptcy Rule 4003(b) specifies that the trustee or any "creditor may file an objection to the list of property claimed as exempt within 30 days after the meeting of creditors." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4003(b).

The debtor in Taylor had listed as exempt property the proceeds from her pending employment discrimination suit. Even though only a portion of these proceeds would have been allowable as an exemption, the trustee decided not to object to the claimed exemption because he thought the debtor's claim "might be a 'nullity.'" 503 U.S. at 641. In a settlement of the discrimination suit that followed a verdict in favor of the debtor, the debtor received $110,000. The trustee thereafter filed a complaint to obtain a turnover of the funds to the estate. Ibid.

even when the failure to make a timely filing is assertedly the result of "excusable neglect." 517 U.S. at 421. Indeed, the Rules involved in that case specified that "excusable neglect" is not a valid basis for a failure to comply with the time limits in Rule 29(c). Id. at 421. Moreover, in Carlisle, the government timely argued that the defendant's motion for acquittal "should be denied as untimely" (id. at 418), and the Court therefore had no occasion to address or consider whether the government could waive its right to challenge an untimely filing under Rule 29(c). The decision in Carlisle thus has no application to the present case.

The Court framed the issue in Taylor as "whether the trustee may contest the validity of an exemption after the 30-day period if the debtor had no colorable basis for claiming the exemption." 503 U.S. at 639. The Court held that the trustee "could have made a valid objection under § 522(l) and Rule 4003 if he had acted promptly * * * [but] that his failure to do so prevents him from challenging the validity of the exemption now." 503 U.S. at 642. The Court noted that Rule 4003(b) expressly gives the trustee and creditors 30 days from the initial creditors' meeting to object and that, "[b]y negative implication, the Rule indicates that creditors may not object after 30 days 'unless, within such period, further time is granted by the court.' " 503 U.S. at 643. The Court concluded that there was no statutory basis for limiting this 30-day requirement to exemptions that the debtor claimed in good faith under Section 522(l). 503 U.S. at 644-645.

The decision in Taylor does not describe the filing deadline contained in Rule 4003(b) as jurisdictional. Nor, as the court of appeals noted in this case, did the Court hold that the debtor had an unlimited time in which to object to an untimely objection by the trustee. Pet. App. 15 n.4. Indeed, the question whether the 30-day limitation period in Rule 4003(b) was subject to waiver or equitable tolling was simply not raised or presented in the petition in that case.[10] The Court in

[10] As Justice Stevens noted in his dissenting opinion in Taylor, the Court did not address in that case whether "the doctrine of equitable tolling applies to the 30-day limitations period in Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 4003(b)." 503 U.S. at 646. Justice Stevens suggested that, if the Court had reached that question, it would have found "ample authority" for such a holding. Ibid. The Court, however, expressly declined to consider arguments in Taylor that were not raised below and that were not contained in

Taylor thus neither addressed nor unsettled the established rule that filing deadlines in procedural rules—like statutes of limitation generally—are presumptively "subject to waiver, estoppel and equitable tolling." Zipes v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 455 U.S. at 393.

The judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

BRIEF FOR APPELLEE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Did the bankruptcy court err in dismissing the Kornfields' bankruptcy petition pursuant to section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Nature of the Case.

The Kornfields challenge the dismissal of their chapter 7 bankruptcy case. The bankruptcy court dismissed their case pursuant to section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code after concluding it would be a substantial abuse of chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code to erase the Kornfields' debts given their unwillingness to alter their lavish lifestyle and their ability to make substantial payments to their creditors.[1] On appeal, the district court affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision in all respects. This appeal followed.

B. Factual Background and Proceedings Below.

Robert N. Kornfield is a gastroenterologist who now works for a professional corporation in which he is President, sole shareholder and the sole physician-employee. A120-21, 198, 283, 300, 302.[2] Dr. Kornfield lives with his wife, Karen E. Kornfield, in Pittsford, New York (A276), a town of 27,500 persons located within the Rochester, New York, Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area ("SMSA"). Rochester has a low cost of living. The area's median home cost is $88,100. Of the 135 SMSAs in the United States, only 33 have a lower median home price. See Median Home Prices Across the USA, Money, Nov. 14, 1997, available in Allnewsplus file (1997 WL 7019974) (Rochester SMSA's $88,100 median home price is 70% of the $126,500 national aver-

In 1996, Dr. Kornfield earned $318,127 from his medical practice. A206. In 1995, he earned $404,050.[3] A206, 295. He earned $472,445 in 1994. A295. Mrs. Kornfield lists her occupation as housewife. A293, 307.

The Kornfields' financial difficulties began when they built a $2.1 million dollar home in Pittsford in 1991. A142. Their problems increased in 1995 when Dr. Kornfield (who was then self-employed) did not timely pay his federal income taxes; as a result of his failure to pay taxes, the Kornfields had to refinance their property in the amount of $225,000 to pay their tax obligations.[4] A142-43. The loan to repay the taxes was made in February 1995; in October 1995 the Kornfields defaulted on this mortgage. A142-43, 170. Litigation that followed the foreclosure on their house precipitated the Kornfields' filing for bankruptcy relief. A143-44, 219-20, 228.

On July 30, 1996, the Kornfields filed a petition seeking protection under the debt liquidation provisions of chapter 7 of [3] Dr. Kornfield did not set up his professional corporation until 1995. A206. His earnings in 1995 represented $92,396 in wages from his corporation and $311,654 in profit from his previously unincorporated business. Id.

[4] In the application that they submitted to obtain the February 1995 loan, the Kornfields described the "upgraded improv." to their house as "Custom Brick[,] Gold Faucets[,] Marble Foyers[,] Solid Cherry Library[,] 6 fireplaces[,] Copper roof & gutters[,] Pella Windows[,] Hand painted tiles." A190.

the Bankruptcy Code. A276-305. In a chapter 7 case, a debtor’s non-exempt assets can be used to pay existing creditors but the debtor’s future income is shielded from the repayment of those debts. 11 U.S.C. § 541(defining property of the estate). The Kornfields’ schedules listed assets of $433,666 and liabilities of $646,673. A282-284, 305. A debtor’s schedules are intended to provide the court and all parties to the case with an accurate snapshot of the debtor’s finances. Because of their critical importance to the effective administration of the bankruptcy system, these documents are signed under penalty of perjury. 11 U.S.C. § 521(1); see also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1008. The Kornfields amended certain of their schedules on September 5, 1996 and February 19, 1997; these amendments did not significantly change their initial petition. A220 n.1, 306-07; Bankruptcy Court Docket (“B. Dkt.”) 50.

The Kornfields’ general unsecured debt arose from consumer loans, including credit card purchases. A220 n.1, 289-90. They owed money on a First Fidelity Bank VISA card, a First Union Bank VISA card, a First USA credit card, a USAA credit card, and a Citibank credit card. Id. Their schedule of unsecured claims lists additional debts arising from consumer purchases of goods or services. Id. Their largest unsecured debts were the unsecured portions of the loans owed to the creditors who had held first and second mortgages on their $2 million home, First Federal Savings & Loan ("First Federal") and First Union Home Equity Bank ("First Union"). Id. See 11 U.S.C. § 506(governing treatment of undersecured creditors). In their schedules, the Kornfields did not list the debts owed to First Federal and First Union as disputed, although in later papers they challenged the First Federal debt. A220, 289.

The Kornfields' bankruptcy schedules evidenced an intent to live lavishly post-petition. A294. In them, the Kornfields claimed they needed $13,115 monthly for living expenses, including $3,000 each month to rent a house, $400 for clothing, $4,470 for private school tuition, and $1,200 a month for food and entertaining. Id. Their schedules reveal they owned or leased three vehicles, a 1996 Range Rover, a 1994 Plymouth Grand Voyager, and a 1989 Voyager. A283-84. The Kornfields stated in their petition that they intended to keep and maintain all three.[5] A285-86, 304. The Kornfields' petition revealed their intention to reaffirm the indebtedness securing their cars, and their list of expenditures included debt service for them, including monthly gasoline and oil costs of $175 and an additional $200 budgeted each month for automobile repairs. A294.

Of the $433,666 in assets that the Kornfields identified on their schedules (A281-85), $398,216 of those assets were claimed as exempt from liquidation to repay their debts (A285). The largest exempt asset was $390,216, which represented a profit-sharing plan that Dr. Kornfield's professional corporation established for his benefit. A285. See also A85 (general description of plan).[6]

The remaining assets the Kornfields listed on their schedules had minimal value. Despite the fact that their previous home cost $2.1 million, the Kornfields represented in their schedules that all their household goods and furnishings were worth only $4,000. A282. They then exempted the value of these furnishings pursuant to New York law. A285. Although at the time they filed their bankruptcy petition they rented a house for $3,000 a month (A294), they stated in their petition that there were no existing security deposits that had been given to their landlord (A282).

Because the Kornfields had minimal assets other than Dr. Kornfield's pension, which was protected from his creditors, the Kornfields' general unsecured creditors, who are owed $584,694 (A289-90), would have received nothing in a chapter 7 liquidation because the Kornfields' secured and priority unsecured debts of $61,979 (A286-87) exceed their scheduled estimates of $35,450 in nonexempt assets[7] (A281-85). A chapter 7 discharge would, however, free the Kornfields from all these debts. 11 U.S.C. §§541, 726, 727(b).

After the Kornfields filed their chapter 7 petition, Peter Scribner was appointed as chapter 7 trustee for their case. A64. See 11 U.S.C. § 704 (describing duties of case trustee). The first meeting of creditors was scheduled for and held on September 5, 1996. Id. Before and after the meeting of creditors, Mr. Scribner asked the Kornfields' attorney for additional information about various matters raised in their schedules, including information about Dr. Kornfield's pension plan. A67-68, 71. In a September 19 letter, Mr. Scribner told debtor's counsel that he had "grave problems with [the pension plan's] exemptability" and also advised that the United States Trustee was considering a motion to dismiss their case because of substantial abuse. A71. Mr. Scribner also stated that the decision to move to dismiss the case depended on whether the pension funds were exempt because, if they were not exempt assets, liquidation of those funds in chapter 7 obviously would result in a large distribution to creditors. Id. Thus, Mr. Scribner advised, if the exemption issue could not be resolved by the deadline for filing a substantial abuse motion, an extension of that deadline would be requested.[8] Id.

Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(e) requires the United States Trustee to file a motion to dismiss a case for substantial abuse no later than sixty days after the first date set for the meeting of creditors.[9] However, before those 60 days elapse, the bankruptcy court can extend the time for filing a section 707(b) motion if cause is shown. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(e)(1). In this case, the United States Trustee had to file her motion under 707(b) on or before November 4, 1996. A71.

On October 23, 1996, the United States Trustee moved ex parte to extend the time for filing any motion to dismiss for substantial abuse. A64-72. The United States Trustee requested

[8] On September 5, 1996, Mr. Scribner filed an objection to the Kornfields' claimed exemption of the pension funds. A84. Mr. Scribner filed this pleading to preserve any objection and candidly admitted that "[t]he trustee must review this exemption much more closely before consenting to the validity of such a large pension by a self employed person." Id. In order to pursue and obtain a ruling on the objection, Mr. Scribner would have needed to schedule a hearing on this matter. No hearing was ever scheduled.

[9] United States Trustees are officials of the Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-589 (establishing the United States Trustee Program and the powers of United States Trustees); United States Trustee v. Columbia Gas Systems, Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Systems, Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994)(United States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law)(citing H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 109 (1977); United States Trustee v. Revco D.S., Inc. additional time so that Mr. Scribner could complete his research and determine whether the $400,000 in pension funds were in fact exempted from distribution to creditors in this case. A64-66. The United States Trustee attached to her motion correspondence from Mr. Scribner to her office and to the Kornfields' counsel. A67-72.

On October 28, 1996, before the 60-day deadline expired, the court granted the United States Trustee an extension of time to file a motion to dismiss for substantial abuse. A63. Two months later, on December 27, the Kornfields moved for reconsideration of the order extending time.[10/] A73-85.

After the United States Trustee filed her opposition (A86-87), a hearing was held on January 8, 1997, on the motion to reconsider (resettle) the order extending time (A88-108). The Kornfields argued that extending the deadline for the substantial abuse motion ex parte denied them their rights to be heard on the issue. They also contended that cause did not exist to extend the deadline. The court concluded that because additional time was needed to investigate the validity of the Kornfields' exemption, cause existed to extend the deadline for the substantial [10/] The Kornfields filed this motion through the law firm of Lacy, Katzen, Ryen & Mittleman, LLP. A73. They previously had been represented in this case by Albert H. Pinsky, Esq. A276-78. abuse motion.[11] A106-07. The motion to resettle was denied.[12] A109-110.

So that the case would not be delayed further, on the same day that she filed her opposition to the Kornfields' motion to reconsider, the United States Trustee moved to dismiss the Kornfields' bankruptcy case pursuant to section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code. A111-114, 276-307. The debtors opposed the motion. A198-226. Mr. Scribner and creditor First Union filed papers supporting the motion to dismiss (A163-197); and a hearing was held February 12, 1997 (A115-162). At the end of the hearing, the bankruptcy court gave all parties time to submit any additional evidence or analysis they wanted considered. A161. The court specifically directed the Kornfields' counsel to submit evidence concerning the debtors' monthly income.[13] Id. Mr.

[11] The court did note that it had interpreted the United States Trustee's papers as saying that the debtors were not cooperating with the case trustee and that the debtors agreed that a deadline was necessary to reach the merits of a 707(b) motion. A99-100. Upon receipt of the Kornfields' December 27 motion, the court regretted that it had not contacted the debtors' counsel prior to extending the deadline and concluded that future extension motions could not be filed ex parte. A100, 102, 107. Nevertheless, the court concluded that cause existed to extend the filing deadline. A106-07.

[12] The Kornfields appealed from this interlocutory order. A308. Their appeal was denied. A309-10.

[13] At the hearing, one of Dr. Kornfield's three attorneys asserted that the debtors' net income in 1996 was only $120,000. A157. The court specifically instructed Dr. Kornfield's lead counsel to submit evidence on this point. A161.

Scribner filed a supplemental pleading (A227-28) and the United States Trustee filed a letter-memorandum (A229-74); however, the Kornfields submitted nothing, choosing instead “to rely upon the papers, pleadings, and arguments heretofore made and submitted. . . [Counsel has] sent this letter only to let the court know that the Debtors have not overlooked the matter.” A275.

In a lengthy opinion entered on June 23, 1997, the court found that to grant the Kornfields a discharge would constitute substantial abuse under section 707(b). A28-62; In re Carlton, 211 B.R. 468 (Bankr. W.D.N.Y. 1997).[14] Accordingly, the court dismissed the Kornfields’ case. The Kornfields filed a notice of appeal to the district court on July 1, 1997. A311-12.

On November 10, 1997, the United States District Court for the Western District of New York, issued an order and memorandum decision affirming the bankruptcy court’s dismissal of the Kornfields’ case. A10-27; Kornfield v. Schwartz, 214 B.R. 705 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). On December 5, 1997, the Kornfields filed a notice of appeal to this Court. A8-9.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes dismissal of a chapter 7 case if it would constitute substantial abuse to give the debtor chapter 7 relief. Although the Kornfields allege the bankruptcy court erred in dismissing their case, their case is a textbook example of substantial abuse. The Kornfields sought to discharge their lawful debts even though they have the ability to repay them; their financial difficulties were caused by their own pecuniary improvidence; they filed schedules that evidenced their intent to continue living lavishly rather than pay their creditors; and they lived extravagantly while in bankruptcy.

The Kornfields also categorically refused to consider seeking bankruptcy relief under other chapters of the Bankruptcy Code, which could have given them the opportunity to resolve their debts in an orderly fashion while assuring that their creditors would receive a fair return on their debts. Instead, the Kornfields insist to this day that they have the right to subsidize their personal lifestyle at their creditors' expense by liquidating their debts in a chapter 7 proceeding in which — unlike a chapter 11 or chapter 13 case — their substantial future income is ignored. This is an unfair result that the law does not mandate. As the district court noted, "[a] fresh start is not the same thing as a 'free ride,' which is what [the bankruptcy court] was concerned with preventing here, to the detriment of appellants' creditors." A26-27; 214 B.R. at 713.

ARGUMENT

1. The Bankruptcy Court Acted Appropriately in Dismissing the Kornfields' Petition for Substantial Abuse.

Section 707(b) of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 707(b), authorizes a bankruptcy court, upon its own motion or upon that of the United States Trustee, to dismiss a debtor's chapter 7 petition if two conditions are met. First, the debtor must be an individual with primarily consumer debts. This prong is not at issue in this case. The Kornfields do not contest that they have primarily consumer debts. A277 (Kornfields executed certification in schedules "BY INDIVIDUAL CHAPTER 7 DEBTOR WITH PRIMARILY CONSUMER DEBTS"). See also A198-205, 219-26 (no assertion in pleadings that Kornfields' debts are not consumer debts).

Second, the court must find that the "granting of relief would be a substantial abuse of the provisions of this chapter." Section 707(b) establishes a presumption in favor of granting the relief sought by the debtor.

The Bankruptcy Code does not define "substantial abuse" and the apposite legislative history is unhelpful. See generally In re Ontiveros, 198 B.R. 284, 288 (C.D. Ill. 1996) (describing the absence of meaningful legislative history). It is clear, however, that section 707(b) was enacted to stem bankruptcy filings by non-needy debtors. Green v. Staples (In re Green), 934 F.2d 568, 570 (4th Cir. 1991); In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123, 126 (6th Cir. 1989).

This Court has not had occasion to interpret this term.[15] Other circuits have created three overlapping tests to help determine whether a case constitutes substantial abuse. The Eighth and Ninth Circuits hold that the "primary factor" evidencing substantial abuse is a debtor who has an "ability to pay his debts out of his income." United States Trustee v. Harris, 960 F.2d 74, 76 (8th Cir. 1992); Zolg v. Kelly (In re Kelly), 841 F.2d 908, 914-15 (9th Cir. 1988). These courts will dismiss a case based solely upon a debtor's ability to use future income to repay a substantial portion of its debt. Id. They espouse this test because it preserves "'the bankruptcy courts' ability to dismiss cases filed by debtors who are not dishonest, but who also are not needy.'" Harris, 960 F.2d at 76 (quoting In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981, 983 (8th Cir. 1989)).

[15] Below, the bankruptcy court reviewed extant case law and decided it would apply a "blended approach," enumerating 15 non-exclusive factors culled from reported decisions to be considered when deciding substantial abuse motions. A49-52; 211 B.R. at 477-78. The court ultimately concluded that "to allow the Kornfields a Chapter 7 discharge would be a substantial abuse of Chapter 7, no matter what legal standard the Court utilizes." A61; 211 B.R. at 483.

The Fourth Circuit prefers a test that it characterizes as a "totality of the circumstances" analysis. Green, 934 F.2d at 572. This court places greater emphasis on determining whether a debtor has acted appropriately in seeking bankruptcy protection. The Fourth Circuit will consider, among other things, (1) whether the bankruptcy is a product of sudden illness, calamity, disability, or unemployment; (2) whether the debtor has made consumer purchases far in excess of its ability to repay; (3) whether the debtor's proposed family budget is excessive or unreasonable; (4) whether the debtor's schedules and statement of current income and expenses are reasonable and accurate; and (5) whether the petition has been filed in good faith.[16/] Id.

[16/] The Fourth Circuit does not require that all five criteria be analyzed or satisfied in every case. Instead, courts must reach decisions on a "case-by-case basis." Green, 934 F.2d at 572. Accord Kestell v. Kestell (In re Kestell), 99 F.3d 146, 149-50 (4th Cir. 1996) (dismissing pursuant to section 707(b) for

In addition, the Fourth Circuit agrees with the Eighth and Ninth Circuits that a court may consider a debtor’s ability to repay. Id. (court may consider “the relation of the debtor’s future income to his future necessary expenses”). See In re Smurthwaite, 149 B.R. 409, 410 (Bankr. N.D.W. Va. 1992) (Green “gave considerable weight to the debtor’s ability to repay as a factor which it should consider”).

The Sixth Circuit allows courts to consider a debtor’s conduct and its ability to repay. In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123, 126-27 (6th Cir. 1989) (court may consider a number of factors, including: the ability to repay; whether unforeseen or catastrophic events caused the bankruptcy; whether the debtor has a “stable source of future income”; whether the debtor’s schedules evidence good faith; and whether expenses can be reduced significantly).[17]

It not necessary for this Court to adopt one of these tests to determine this appeal because the bankruptcy court correctly held that the Kornfields’ case constitutes substantial abuse “no matter what legal standard the Court utilizes.” A61; 211 B.R. at lack of good faith because the debtor “sought to avoid paying what he owe[d] to [one specific creditor,] his former wife[,]” without analyzing the other four Green factors).

[17] The Eighth and Ninth Circuits do not prohibit courts from considering Green and Krohn-type factors. Instead, they hold the absence of such factors cannot save the chapter 7 petition of a debtor who can repay a substantial portion of his or her debts. Walton, 866 F.2d at 982,983; Kelly, 841 F.2d at 914-15.

483. Collectively, the Kornfields' unwillingness to adjust their conduct (including their extravagant lifestyle) and their ability to repay a substantial part of their debts justified dismissal. A57-60; 211 B.R. at 479-80.

The bankruptcy court properly dismissed the Kornfields' petition based upon the evidence before it. "Dr. Kornfield has and will continue to enjoy stable employment." A59. The Kornfields suffered no sudden illness, calamity, disability, or unemployment which forced them into bankruptcy. A59; 211 B.R. at 482. See Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (citing this as a factor justifying dismissal); Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (same).

The court found that the Kornfields' proposed budget, which was "excessive and possibly even extravagant", buttressed the dismissal of their case. A57, 211 B.R. at 481. See Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (citing this as a factor justifying dismissal). Rather than demonstrating an intent to rectify their financial problems, the court found that the evidence established that the Kornfields > appear unwilling to make any effort to reduce their possibly actual, but in large part voluntary and excessive, living expenses to enable them to repay something to their creditors. In fact, the Kornfields, . . . , have in essence argued to the court that no one should involuntarily be required to live below their current means to repay creditors, notwithstanding prior financial mistakes, and the Bankruptcy System is there to ensure that that cannot happen, because it allows a debtor to simply file a Chapter 7 case, obtain a discharge from all of his debts, even though he has an Ability to Pay, continue to live an extravagant life> style, and retain substantial exempt funds.

A60; 211 B.R. at 482-83.

The Kornfields' budget also evidenced an intent to live lavishly post-petition. A294. Their fashionable lifestyle included a monthly rental payment of $3,000, $120 a month for telephone bills (which included four telephone lines), $1,200 a month for food and entertaining,[18] $400 a month for clothing,[19] recreation of $100 a month, life insurance payments of $250, monthly automobile expenses of $1,455, and monthly tuition payments of $4,470. A294. These extravagant expenditures while in bankruptcy called their good faith into question. See Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (citing bad faith as a basis for dismissal).

The bankruptcy court also dismissed the Kornfields' case because they have the ability to repay substantial sums to their creditors if they reduce their expenses to reasonable levels. A57-58. The court found the Kornfields have gross monthly take-home pay of $25,939.16. A58. After withholding income tax at a rate of 50.8%, the Kornfields have net monthly income of

See also Kelly, 841 F.2d 908, 915 n.9 ("going out to dinner, entertaining people" are not "items [that] qualify as reasonably necessary . . . for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent of the debtor" (citations omitted)).

$12,762.[20] A58.

The court then concluded the Kornfields could reasonably reduce their monthly expenses in at least five ways. A57-58. The court found that monthly food costs could be reduced by at least $350, the telephone expenses could be reduced by $50, clothing costs could be reduced by $200, charitable donations of $200 could be reduced, and the private school tuition costs of $4,470 per month (or $53,640 per year) could be eliminated.[21] Id. The court thus concluded that the Kornfields could easily reduce their monthly expenses by $5,270 by making only the five reductions listed.[22] A58. The court then used the figure of $4,117 in reduced expenses per month to conclude that these five reductions alone would make available to creditors $148,212 over [20] The court applied a withholding percentage of 50.8% because that was the rate used by the Kornfields in their schedules. A307. However, this tax rate was contradicted by the debtors' records, which evidenced a withholding rate of 29 to 31%. A164, 167. The Kornfields' tax records for 1994 and 1995 evidenced a tax rate of 40% of gross income. A164.

---

The 50.8 percentage results in $13,177 in withholding. The court mistakenly states in its opinion that the Kornfields have $13,177 in monthly income, but later uses the correct monthly income number of $12,762 in its calculations ($25,939.16 - $13,177 = $12,762). A58.

[21] The court noted that the Kornfields' public school district was "nationally acclaimed." A57; 211 B.R. at 481.

[22] In reaching the calculation of $5,270, the court included in its calculations but did not itemize the $200 in extra clothing expenses. A58.

a 36-month term and $247,020 over a 60-month term.[23] A58.

In addition, the record plainly shows that there are other “extras” in the Kornfields’ budget.[24] For instance, $3,000 a month for rent is “at the extreme high end of rents in this area” and could have easily been reduced to $1,000 to $1,500. A165. Second, the court used the 50.8% tax withholding rate that the Kornfields employed in their schedules to calculate net monthly income. A307. However, their own payroll and tax documents demonstrate that withholding of 40% is more accurate. A163-64, 167-68. Using a 40% withholding rate would result in net monthly income of $15,906.35, which represents an increase in the income figure that the court used of $3,144.35.[25] A58. Analysis of only these two items yields an additional $4,144.35 ($1,000 plus $3,144.35) in net monthly income. Other “extras” that are susceptible to question are the $1,100 monthly repayments that Dr. Kornfield made to himself for a loan from his pension funds (A148-49) and a $250 payment that the Kornfields make each month on life insurance that they did not claim as an asset on their

[23] If the total amount of hypothetical reductions had been used ($5,270), that would have resulted in $189,270 available to creditors in a 36-month term and $316,200 in a 60-month term.

[24] Harris, 960 F.2d at 77 (affirming district court’s consideration of additional income evidenced by the record).

[25] Net monthly income of $15,906 is calculated as follows: 1996 net income of $318,127 (A206) divided by 12 = $26,510.58. 40% (A164,167-68) of $26,510.58 = $10,604.23. $26,510.58 minus $10,604.23 = $15,906.35.

schedules (A282, 294).[26]

Thus, the record plainly shows that the “Kornfields clearly have an Ability to Repay” substantial sums to their creditors. A60. By making reasonable cutbacks in their lifestyle, the Kornfields would be able to pay their creditors either $247,020 over five years (according to the court’s calculations (A58)) or $316,200 over five years (using a monthly calculation of $5,270 additional income per month) without “depriving any of them of adequate food, clothing, shelter or other necessities; . . .” A58. Adding the $4,144 gained from the reductions in mortgage expense and tax withholding brings the total available for repayment over five years from $316,200 to $564,840.

The Kornfields are the masters of their financial future. They can repay a substantial portion of their debts. A57-58. They can seek relief under the debt reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Code if they need breathing room to reorganize their debts; they may also be eligible for chapter 13 relief.[27] A59. Indeed, in her motion, the United States Trustee stated that, as an alternative to dismissal, "the Debtors should be permitted to convert to a Chapter 11 or Chapter 13 [case] if they so desire." A114. The Kornfields rejected this proposal out-of-hand, contending instead that they were entitled to a chapter 7 discharge that would leave their creditors with nothing while allowing them to keep all of their future income to fund their lavish lifestyle. A220. Finally, the bankruptcy court did not bar them from filing another chapter 7 petition (A60-61), and they could do so if their financial circumstances worsen. The Kornfields should not be denied all relief in bankruptcy, but the bankruptcy court properly found that it would be inappropriate to allow them relief under the liquidation provisions of chapter 7.

[26] These calculations also assume the Kornfields neither extend the life of their debt service nor negotiate any forgiveness of debt. A58.

[27] The case trustee noted that, because the Kornfields dispute the amounts owed to at least one bank, the Kornfields may qualify for relief under chapter 13. A228. Moreover, as the court correctly observed, the Kornfields in a chapter 11 case could voluntarily reserve some of their income to fund a repayment plan. A56-57; 211 B.R. at 480-81.

The bankruptcy court also noted that their "unwillingness to consider a Chapter 11 case where they might negotiate a consensual plan with their creditors, . . . raises concerns as to their honesty and good faith in their approach to the Bankruptcy System and their creditors; . . ." A59. Other evidence in the record buttresses this conclusion. The debtors were less than candid about their monthly income. In their schedules, the debtors state that their monthly gross income is $23,000. A293, 307. However, the very evidence that they submitted in opposition to the United States Trustee's motion shows that Dr. Kornfield's 1996 income was $318,127, which comes to $26,510 per month. A206 (Kornfields' accountant's letter).

Their own evidence notwithstanding, Dr. Kornfield’s General Counsel (one of three attorneys who represented the Kornfields at the February 12 hearing) insisted at that hearing that the debtors’ net income in 1996 after tax withholdings was $120,000. A157. The court explicitly asked the Kornfields’ lead counsel to submit evidence to support the $120,000 figure. A161. Despite the court’s request, the debtors did not submit this evidence, choosing instead to “rely upon the papers, pleadings, and arguments heretofore made and submitted.”[28] A275. Finally, the debtors never amended their schedules to reflect the numbers submitted by their accountant. The debtors plainly were less than forthright with the court and their creditors about their true income.[29]

[28] See Industrial Ins. Servs., Inc. v. Zick (In re Zick), 931 F.2d 1124, 1128-29 (6th Cir. 1991) (finding dismissal under 707(a) appropriate where debtor failed to respond to court’s request for additional information).

[29] In their opening brief, the Kornfields contend that the court erred in failing to harmonize national policies governing “pensions, education, and mortgage lending.” Appellants’ Br. at 13-30. These arguments are without merit. The Kornfields’ argument concerning pensions misstates the record — the Kornfields contend that the bankruptcy court’s decision forces them to invade their $400,000 in exempt pension funds. App. Br. at 15-19. The bankruptcy court did not order them to distribute these funds; it simply noted the existence of these monies as one of the totality of the circumstances of the case. A59. This approach comports with applicable case law. See, e.g., Stuart v. Koch (In re Koch), 109 F.3d 1285, 1288-89 (8th Cir. 1997) (in deciding 707(b) motion, bankruptcy court should consider exempt income in calculations of hypothetical chapter 13 plan). So does the bankruptcy court’s approach to the extravagant $53,640 annual tuition expenses for private schools. In re Gyurci, 95 B.R. 639,

This case should have been, and properly was, dismissed. "At no point in the [Kornfields'] history, either before or after filing for chapter 7 relief, ha[ve] the debtor[s] shown a sincere resolve to repay [their] obligations and/or to reduce [their] monthly expenses." Krohn, 886 F.2d at 127. The Kornfields will profit as much as their creditors from some "good, old-fashioned belt tightening." Id. at 128.

2. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Commit Any Procedural Errors in Dismissing the Kornfields' Case.

In their opening brief, the Kornfields "raise a gaggle of 643 (Bankr. D. Minn. 1989).

In addition, the Kornfields, who cursorily mentioned this argument in a five-sentence footnote below (A220 n.2), now contend the bankruptcy court applied 707(b) in a manner that conflicts with Congressional intent as evidenced by the Financial Institution Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act ("FIRREA"). Appellants' Br. at 12, 23-30. FIRREA principally involves the power of the FDIC to liquidate banks. See, e.g., 12 U.S.C. §§ 1811-1825. Whatever limitations FIRREA might impose on the FDIC's powers, no provision of the Bankruptcy Code permits, much less requires, a court to consider vague national policies — regarding pensions, mortgages or anything else — in deciding a substantial abuse motion under section 707(b). Cf. Patterson v. Shumate, 504 U.S. 753, 112 S. Ct. 2242, 2246-48 (1992) (holding that when Bankruptcy Code provision explicitly referenced "applicable nonbankruptcy law", courts had to consider federal ERISA law). As the district court observed, the Kornfields' argument alleging improper "protection" of mortgage lenders "is in effect an argument that those who deliberately live beyond their means should be relieved of their obligation to repay lenders because it was foolhardy to lend them money in the first place." A24; 214 B.R. at 712. In any event, there is no implied right of action under FIRREA even as to the FDIC for debt relief for individuals such as the Kornfields. See generally Hindes v. Federal Deposit Ins. Corp., — F.3d —, 1998 WL 65978 *21 (3d Cir. 1998).

procedural matters that they claim require reversal. Appellants' claims are without merit." A15; 214 B.R. at 708. The bankruptcy court did not commit any procedural errors in finding that the Kornfields' case constituted substantial abuse of the bankruptcy system.

First, the Kornfields argue that the bankruptcy court committed reversible error in granting the United States Trustee's motion to extend time for filing her substantial abuse motion ex parte. Appellants' Br. at 37-41. Fed. Rule Bankr. P. 1017, which governs motions to dismiss for substantial abuse, requires that the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss shall be filed no later than 60 days following the first meeting of creditors, unless "before [the deadline for such motions] has expired, the court for cause extends the time for filing the motion." Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1017(e)(1).

The plain language of Rule 1017(e)(1) does not require notice and a hearing before the court extends the time to file a substantial abuse motion. See also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9006(b) (contemplating ex parte motions to enlarge time); 9013 (contemplating certain motions can be filed ex parte). In contrast, Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004, upon which the Kornfields rely in their brief (Appellants' Br. at 38-40), does require a "hearing on notice" before a court can extend the time for filing complaints objecting to discharge. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 4004(b). The language of Rule 4004(b) is not pertinent here. The requirements of the pertinent rule — Rule 1017(e)(1) — were met when the court found that cause existed to extend the filing deadline and reached this decision before the 60-day deadline had expired.

Finally, as the district court cogently noted, “the single biggest flaw” in this argument is the fact that the Kornfields did “have an opportunity to raise all these matters” concerning the impropriety of the ex parte motion when the court heard the debtors’ motion to resettle on January 8. A16; 214 B.R. at 708. At that hearing, the bankruptcy court found that the interests of judicial economy constituted sufficient cause to support the extension of time. A106-07. That decision should be affirmed.

The Kornfields also contend that the bankruptcy court’s decision should be reversed because the court improperly permitted the case trustee, Mr. Scribner, and a creditor to submit papers and participate at the hearing on the substantial abuse motion. Appellants’ Br. at 44-50. The Kornfields’ argument does not comport with the applicable bankruptcy rules.

Rule 1017(e) explicitly states that an individual debtor’s bankruptcy case can be dismissed “only . . . after a hearing on notice to the debtor, the trustee, the United States trustee, and such other parties in interest as the court directs.” All parties in interest received notice of the United States Trustee’s motion to dismiss the Kornfield case. A111 (“CREDITORS ARE INVITED, BUT NOT REQUIRED, TO APPEAR AND BE HEARD”). As the district court observed, “there is nothing in the Code that proscribes a creditor’s participation in proceedings relating to a substantial abuse motion brought by the U.S. Trustee. Bankruptcy Rule 1017(e) . . . suggests precisely the opposite.” A26; 214 B.R. at 713. Accord Zolg v. Kelly (In re Kelly), 841 F.2d 908, 917 (9th Cir. 1988) (dictum) (after “the issue of section 707(b) dismissal is raised, the debtor and, if appropriate, other parties as well are free to present evidence on the relevant issues”). See also H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 99-958, 132 Cong. Rec. H8986, H8998 (daily ed. Oct. 2, 1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5246, 5248 (“The conferees anticipate that panel trustees will frequently appear in court regarding the motions filed by the U.S. Trustee under Section 707(b)”).

Finally, the Kornfields’ contention that they were denied a proper hearing is likewise meritless. A case may be dismissed under section 707(b) only “[a]fter notice and a hearing.” 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). Section 102(1) of the Code explains that “notice and a hearing” means whatever notice and hearing “as in appropriate in the particular circumstances.” Such circumstances do not require a full-blown evidentiary hearing. Zick, 931 F.2d at 1128-29. See also DiNova v. Harris (In re DiNova), 212 B.R. 437, 442 (Bankr. 2d Cir. 1997) (notice and hearing means notice and opportunity for hearing that is appropriate in the circumstances).[30]

In this case, as in Zick, the Kornfields were given a full and fair "opportunity to present pleadings or an affidavit in opposition and to respond to the court through his counsel." Id. at 1129. Indeed, the court adopted the legal analysis that the Kornfields advocated (A138 ("The basic element in a substantial abuse case is an ability to pay"); A221-22 (court must consider "all the surrounding circumstances")) and relied upon the debtors' sworn statements and other documents they had submitted in reaching its conclusion. The court accepted the Kornfields' budget, which they signed under penalty of perjury, and their calculations, including their tax withholding rate, despite the fact that the tax rate was contradicted by other evidence they submitted. A56-60, 163-64, 167-68, 198-218, 276-307.

Moreover, not once during the February 12 hearing did the Kornfields make a proffer as to any additional evidence that they wished to submit; nor did they request an evidentiary hearing. A115-162. They never filed a motion for reconsideration seeking an evidentiary hearing after the court issued its decision. Finally, although the court specifically requested that they adduce evidence in support of their assertions of reduced income at the February 12 hearing, they chose not to submit any further evidence on this issue. A157, 161, 275.

[30] The Kornfields mistakenly assert that DiNova mandates reversal here. Appellants' Br. at 37, 39. DiNova involved a situation in which the court dismissed the entire bankruptcy case pursuant to an ex parte motion and contrary to the requirement in 707(a) that a case can be dismissed only after notice and a hearing. 212 B.R. at 446. In this case, the court extended the United States Trustee's deadline for filing a substantial abuse motion based on the United States Trustee's ex parte motion to extend time. As previously discussed, Rule 1017(e)(1) does not require notice and a hearing before the court extends this deadline. DiNova is inapposite to the instant case.

Their complaints as to notice are also specious. The United States Trustee clearly referenced and appended the Kornfields' schedules to her motion to dismiss. A112-113, 276-307. After the case trustee and a creditor filed pleadings to support the United States Trustee's motion (A163-97), the Kornfields in responsive papers took pains to rebut carefully the expense issues detailed in those pleadings (A198-218). The Kornfields should not be heard now to say that the notice and hearing afforded them were inadequate.

CONCLUSION

The bankruptcy court properly refused to permit the Kornfields to obtain a chapter 7 discharge at the expense of their lawful creditors. For the foregoing reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks this Court to affirm the decisions of the bankruptcy and district courts dismissing the Kornfields' bankruptcy case.

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLEE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b) to hear the underlying case, a voluntary petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 701, et seq. See also 28 U.S.C. §§ 151, 1334(a). On November 21, 2005, the bankruptcy court granted the debtors' motion to reopen the bankruptcy case. Aplt. App. at 270-79; Addendum to Opening Brief ("Addendum"), Tab A, at 1-10.

On November 29, 2005, Dr. Jimmy Giddens ("Giddens") filed a timely notice of appeal from that order to the district court. See Aplt. App. at 280-81; Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). The district court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a). On June 12, 2006, the district court dismissed the appeal, holding that Giddens lacked standing to challenge the bankruptcy court's order. See Aplt. App. at 438-48; Addendum, Tab C, at 1-11. Giddens subsequently filed a timely notice of appeal to this Court on June 27, 2006. Aplt. App. at 450-52. This Court has jurisdiction to hear the appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

(1) Whether Giddens lacks standing to appeal, because the bankruptcy court's order did not cause him a direct pecuniary injury. See Aplt. App. at 342-45, 440-43.

(2) Whether, in the alternative, the bankruptcy court properly exercised its discretion in reopening this bankruptcy case to allow a newly-appointed Chapter 7 trustee to determine how to administer an asset of the estate. See Aplt. App. at 73-83, 443-48.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Bankruptcy Code requires debtors to disclose all assets, including any contingent or potential claims against third parties. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 521(a)(1), 541(a). In April 2003, debtors Michael and Rebecca Kreutzer ("debtors") jointly filed for bankruptcy protection under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. The debtors, however, failed to disclose a potential malpractice claim against Dr. Jimmy Giddens.

The debtors later moved to reopen their bankruptcy case to disclose the malpractice claim. The bankruptcy court, over Giddens' objection, granted the motion to reopen, and directed the United States Trustee to appoint a Chapter 7 trustee to complete the administration of the bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy court's order left the newly-appointed trustee with the discretion to decide whether to pursue the malpractice claim against Giddens.

Giddens sought to appeal, and the district court dismissed the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. Applying the strict test for appellate standing in bankruptcy, the court held that Giddens lacked standing to appeal this bankruptcy court order, because it did not cause him any direct pecuniary injury. The district court further stated that, even if Giddens had standing, it would affirm the bankruptcy court's decision on the merits. This appeal followed.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

I. Statutory and Regulatory Background

A. Bankruptcy Protection for Individual Debtors

An individual who seeks to discharge his past debts may file a petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 701, et seq. The debtor's assets are then transferred to a new legal entity: the "bankruptcy estate." See id. § 541(a). A trustee is appointed to help with the administration and liquidation of the estate. See id. §§ 701, 702, 704.

The Chapter 7 trustee liquidates the debtor's assets and distributes the proceeds to creditors who have filed claims against the estate. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 507, 704(a)(1), 726. At the end of this process, the bankruptcy court discharges most of the debtor's prior financial obligations, and closes the case. See id. §§ 350(a), 727.[2]

The Bankruptcy Code authorizes the bankruptcy court to reopen a case under certain circumstances. "A case may be reopened . . . to administer assets, to accord relief to the debtor, or for other cause." 11 U.S.C. § 350(b).

B. Contingent and Unliquidated Claims Against Third Parties

The Bankruptcy Code requires debtors to disclose all assets, including any potential claims against third parties. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 521(a)(1), 541(a); Official Bankruptcy Form 6, Schedule B (Personal Property) (the debtor must list "contingent and unliquidated claims of every nature"). The Chapter 7 trustee must then decide how to administer any such claim. The trustee may bring suit against the third party on behalf of the estate. See 11 U.S.C. §§ 541(a)(1), 704(a)(1); see also id. § 726(a) (proceeds must first be used to pay creditors). Alternatively, the trustee may abandon the claim if he concludes that it would be too costly to litigate or would provide little monetary value to the estate. See id. § 554(a) ("After notice and a hearing, the trustee may abandon any property of the estate that is burdensome to the estate or that is of inconsequential value and benefit to the estate."). If the trustee abandons the claim, the debtor may pursue it. See id. § 726(a)(6).

[2] The bankruptcy court may also, within one year after granting a discharge, revoke the discharge if it was "obtained through the fraud of the debtor[.]" See 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(d)(1),(e).

Significantly, if the debtor fails to disclose a pre-petition claim, the claim continues to be property of the estate, because it has neither been administered nor abandoned by the trustee. See 11 U.S.C. § 554(d) ("Unless the court orders otherwise, property of the estate that is not abandoned under this section and that is not administered in the case remains property of the estate.").

II. Factual Background and Proceedings Below

A. The Bankruptcy and State Court Proceedings

In April 2003, Michael and Rebecca Kreutzer jointly filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 7. See Aplt. App. at 9-31. The debtors indicated on their bankruptcy petition that they did not have any "contingent [or] unliquidated claims" against any third party. See Aplt. App. at 14. A few months later, the bankruptcy court issued a general order of discharge and closed the case. See Aplt. App. at 51 (order of discharge on 08/11/03); Aplt. App. at 54 (order closing case on 08/29/03).

In fact, the debtors had a pre-petition medical malpractice claim against Dr. Jimmy Giddens. The debtors believed that, in September 2001, Giddens negligently performed gall bladder surgery on Rebecca Kreutzer. See Aplt. App. at 150-53. The debtors, however, did not notify the creditors or the Chapter 7 trustee about this potential asset of the estate. See Aplt. App. at 14, 56.

In June 2003, during the pendency of the bankruptcy case, the debtors brought the malpractice action against Giddens in Oklahoma state court. See Aplt. App. at 150-53. The debtors later dismissed the suit without prejudice and refiled it in February 2004. See Aplt. App. at 56, 90-92. In September 2005, Giddens sought to dismiss the state court action, asserting that the debtors lacked standing to pursue the claim, because it was an asset of their bankruptcy estate. See Aplt. App. at 112-14. Giddens also argued that the debtors should be judicially estopped from prosecuting a claim that they had failed to disclose in bankruptcy. See Aplt. App. at 114-18.

The debtors moved to reopen their bankruptcy case in order to disclose the pre-petition malpractice claim. See Aplt. App. at 56-60. Giddens objected to the motion to reopen. See Aplt. App. at 63-85.

B. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision

The bankruptcy court granted the debtors' motion to reopen. See Aplt. App. at 270-79; Addendum, Tab A, at 1-10. The court observed that, under the law of this Circuit, a bankruptcy court has a "'duty . . . to reopen an estate whenever prima facie proof is made that [it] has not been fully administered.'" Aplt. App.

at 272 (quoting In re Mullendore, 741 F.2d 306, 308 (10th Cir. 1984)); Addendum, Tab A, at 3. And, here, "all parties agree[d]" that the malpractice claim was still an asset of the estate, "because it was not administered or abandoned by the Chapter 7 trustee." Ibid. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court found that it had a "duty to reopen the bankruptcy case in order to permit a trustee to determine whether the asset should be administered for the benefit of the creditors." Aplt. App. at 273; Addendum, Tab A, at 4.

The bankruptcy court rejected Giddens' claim that judicial estoppel should apply here. See Aplt. App. at 273-79; Addendum, Tab A, at 4-10. The court found that it would be inequitable to prevent "the trustee, who is blameless, from administering the Malpractice Claim for the benefit of the estate," simply because the debtors failed to disclose it. See Aplt. App. at 278-79; Addendum, Tab A, at 9-10; see also Aplt. App. at 277 (noting that the creditors' "only hope for any repayment derives from the potential proceeds of the Malpractice Claim"); Addendum, Tab A, at 8.

Accordingly, the bankruptcy court granted the debtors' motion to reopen and ordered them to "amend their schedules to disclose the Malpractice Claim[.]" Aplt. App. at 279; Addendum, Tab A, at 10. The court directed the United States Trustee "to appoint a Chapter 7 trustee to complete the administration of the estate." Ibid.[3]

Giddens sought to appeal to the district court. See Aplt. App. at 280-81. The United States Trustee participated as appellee in district court, urging that Giddens lacked standing to prosecute the appeal, see Aplt. App. at 342-45, and that, in any event, the bankruptcy court's decision was correct on the merits, see Aplt. App. at 346-59.

C. The District Court's Decision

The district court held that Giddens lacked standing to appeal the bankruptcy court's order.[4] See Aplt. App. at 440-43; Addendum, Tab C, at 3-6. The court recognized that the test for standing in bankruptcy cases is "more stringent" than the requirements for standing under Article III. See Aplt. App. at 441-42; Addendum, Tab C, at 4-5. "To have standing to appeal [in bankruptcy], the litigant must have a direct and adverse pecuniary interest in the particular order he is challenging." Aplt. App. at 441; Addendum, Tab C, at 4. The court found that Giddens failed to demonstrate any such direct pecuniary injury. See Aplt. App. at 441-43; Addendum, Tab C, at 4-6. Giddens claimed only that "he may be exposed to potential liability if the bankruptcy is reopened[.]" See Aplt. App. at 442-43;

3 appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 581-89; In re Columbia Gas Systems, Inc., 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994) (noting that United States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 99-764, at 24 (1986)).

[4] The district court reviewed the report and recommendation of a magistrate judge. See Aplt. App. at 373-82; Addendum, Tab B, at 1-10.

Addendum, Tab C, at 5-6. The court determined that Giddens' assertions of "potential" future harm did not satisfy the stringent requirements for standing in bankruptcy appeals. See ibid.

The district court further found that Giddens' objections to the bankruptcy court's decision were without merit. The court rejected Giddens' assertion that the debtors lacked standing to file the motion to reopen. See Aplt. App. at 443-44; Addendum, Tab C, at 6-7. The court likewise rejected Giddens' judicial estoppel claim. See Aplt. App. at 444-48; Addendum, Tab C, at 7-11. The district court agreed with the bankruptcy court that the trustee should not be estopped from pursuing the malpractice action on behalf of the creditors of the estate. See Aplt. App. at 445-48; Addendum, Tab C, at 8-11.

Giddens subsequently filed this appeal.[5]

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I. The district court properly held that Dr. Jimmy Giddens lacks standing to appeal this bankruptcy court order. To appeal a bankruptcy court's decision, a litigant must demonstrate that his "rights or interests are directly and adversely affected pecuniarily" by the challenged order. See In re American Ready Mix, Inc., 14 F.3d 1497, 1500 (10th Cir. 1994) (internal quotation marks omitted). Giddens cannot satisfy this stringent test for appellate standing.

[5] Following the bankruptcy court's decision, the United States Trustee appointed a Chapter 7 trustee. The trustee filed an appearance in the state court action, and asked the bankruptcy court to notify creditors that the debtors' estate has a potentially valuable asset. Counsel for the government understand that the state court action is largely on hold pending resolution of this appeal.

The bankruptcy court here granted the debtors' motion to reopen their bankruptcy case, so that they could disclose an asset of the estate: a potential malpractice claim against Giddens. The court also directed the United States Trustee to appoint a Chapter 7 trustee to determine how to administer this asset. Giddens' interest in this order was, at best, remote and speculative: If the Chapter 7 trustee chose to pursue the malpractice claim, and if he prevailed, Giddens might ultimately have to pay money damages. Such an indirect and conjectural claim of injury does not satisfy the stringent requirements for appellate standing in bankruptcy. Accordingly, the Court should dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

II. The Court should, in the alternative, uphold the bankruptcy court's decision on the merits. The bankruptcy court properly exercised its discretion in reopening this case and in authorizing a Chapter 7 trustee to administer an additional asset of the estate (the malpractice claim against Giddens). As this Court has emphasized, a bankruptcy court has a "duty . . . to reopen an estate whenever prima facie proof is made that it has not been fully administered." In re Mullendore, 741 F.2d 306, 308 (10th Cir. 1984).

Giddens fails to demonstrate that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in granting the debtors' motion to reopen. First, contrary to Giddens' assertion, the debtors clearly had standing to file the motion. The debtors had an obligation to disclose their pre-petition malpractice claim, and could face criminal prosecution if they deliberately concealed it.

Furthermore, the bankruptcy court properly rejected Giddens' judicial estoppel argument. Giddens repeatedly asserts that the debtors should be judicially estopped from pursuing the malpractice action, because they took inconsistent positions with respect to that claim in bankruptcy court and Oklahoma state court. But Giddens' argument is misplaced. The bankruptcy court did not permit the debtors to pursue that claim. Instead, it authorized a newly-appointed Chapter 7 trustee to administer the claim on behalf of the creditors of the estate. The trustee has never taken any inconsistent position with respect to the malpractice claim. Accordingly, judicial estoppel simply does not apply to the trustee.

THE STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court reviews the decision of the bankruptcy court according to the same standards as the district court. See In re Hodes, 402 F.3d 1005, 1008 (10th Cir. 2005). The Court reviews the bankruptcy court's factual findings for clear error and its legal determinations de novo. Ibid.; see also Rascon v. US West Communications, Inc., 143 F.3d 1324, 1329 (10th Cir. 1998) ("the application of judicial estoppel presents a legal question"). The Court reviews the bankruptcy court's decision to reopen the case for abuse of discretion. See In re Woods, 173 F.3d 770, 778 (10th Cir. 1999).

ARGUMENT

I. Giddens Lacks Standing To Appeal The Bankruptcy Court's Order.

It is axiomatic that, in order to appeal a case to federal court, a litigant must demonstrate standing. As the district court recognized, the test for standing in bankruptcy cases is even "more stringent" than that required by Article III. See Aplt. App. at 441-42; Addendum, Tab C, at 4-5; In re Alpex Computer Corp., 71 F.3d 353, 357 n.6 (10th Cir. 1995). Under Article III, a party may establish standing by demonstrating that he has suffered an injury-in-fact that is fairly traceable to the defendant's allegedly improper conduct. See Utah Association of Counties v. Bush, 455 F.3d 1094, 1099-1100 (10th Cir. 2006). By contrast, in bankruptcy, an appellant must show that he is a "person aggrieved." In re American Ready Mix, Inc., 14 F.3d 1497, 1500 (10th Cir. 1994). To qualify as a "person aggrieved," a litigant must demonstrate that his "rights or interests are directly and adversely affected pecuniarily" by the challenged order. Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added); see also Alpex, 71 F.3d at 357 n.6 ("[t]he standing requirement is more stringent in bankruptcy appeals than the case or controversy standing requirement of Article III, which need not be financial and need only be fairly traceable to the alleged illegal action") (internal quotation marks omitted).[6]

---

[6] Notably, this test for appellate standing applies only to private parties, and not to the United States Trustee. See 11 U.S.C. § 307 (authorizing the United States Trustee to "appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this title"); In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000) (recognizing that 11 U.S.C. § 307 confers broad standing on the

Giddens cannot satisfy this stringent test for appellate standing in bankruptcy. See also In re Thompson, 965 F.2d 1136, 1142 n.9 (1st Cir. 1992) ("[g]enerally speaking, a nonparty lacks appellate standing in bankruptcy proceedings"). The bankruptcy court order at issue here did not cause him any direct pecuniary injury.

The court here reopened the bankruptcy case, ordered the debtors to disclose an additional asset (their potential malpractice claim against Giddens), and authorized a newly-appointed Chapter 7 trustee to determine what to do with the asset. See Aplt. App. at 279; Addendum, Tab A, at 10. Giddens' interest in this bankruptcy court order was, at most, indirect and speculative. Giddens suggests that, if the Chapter 7 trustee chose to pursue the malpractice action against him, and if the trustee prevailed, Giddens might suffer a future financial injury. But any such future harm would not be the direct result of the order challenged here. Instead, any such harm would depend on the separate and independent judgments of the Chapter 7 trustee and the Oklahoma state courts. See Travelers Insurance Co. v. H.K. Porter Co., Inc., 45 F.3d 737, 741 (3d Cir. 1995) (the appellant lacked standing because its interest was "too remote and contingent to satisfy the standing requirement[s] of bankruptcy appeals").

For these reasons, courts of appeals have repeatedly denied standing to litigants like Giddens, who seek to challenge a bankruptcy court order simply because it may expose them to future litigation. Such "potential defendants" do not have a sufficiently direct stake in the bankruptcy case to qualify as "persons aggrieved." See Travelers, 45 F.3d at 743 ("a potential defendant in [a separate] adversary proceeding" lacks standing in bankruptcy); In re El San Juan Hotel, 809 F.2d 151, 155-56 (1st Cir. 1987) (same); In re Fondiller, 707 F.2d 441, 443 (9th Cir. 1983) (same); see also Alpex, 71 F.3d at 354, 358 (the appellant's "status as a defendant in a [separate] civil suit" did not render it a "party in interest" with standing to move to reopen a Chapter 11 bankruptcy case).

The First Circuit's decision in In re El San Juan Hotel, 809 F.2d 151 (1st Cir. 1987), is particularly instructive. The bankruptcy court in San Juan Hotel issued an order, authorizing the United States to bring suit against a former bankruptcy trustee for breach of fiduciary duty. See id. at 153. The former trustee sought to appeal the order authorizing suit against him. See ibid. The First Circuit held that he lacked standing, because the bankruptcy court's order had "'no direct and immediate impact on [his] pecuniary interests,'" but only exposed him to future litigation. See id. at 155-56 (appellant's "'only demonstrable interest in the order [was] as a potential party defendant in an adversary proceeding'") (quoting Fondiller, 707 F.2d at 443). The court recognized that the "former trustee [did] have an interest in defending himself against liability, but the order in question [did] not prevent [him]" from doing that, because he could assert any claims or defenses in the separate suit. See id. at 155.

Likewise, the bankruptcy court's decision here does not prevent Giddens from defending against the malpractice claim. Contrary to Giddens' suggestion (see Open. Br. 18), he may assert any claim or defense, including judicial estoppel, in the state court suit. Indeed, Giddens previously recognized as much, for he first raised his judicial estoppel defense with the Oklahoma state court. See Aplt. App. at 114-18. For the reasons identified below, we believe that any such judicial estoppel claim lacks merit as applied to the Chapter 7 trustee,[7] but nothing in the bankruptcy court's decision precludes Giddens from asserting it against the debtor. See, e.g., Ryan Operations G.P. v. Santiam-Midwest Lumber Co., 81 F.3d 355, 361 (3d Cir. 1996) (the defendants "were not barred from seeking judicial estoppel" against the debtor in their separate civil suit "by the fact that they were not parties to [the debtor's] bankruptcy proceeding").[8]

Giddens fails to show that the bankruptcy court's decision directly injured him at all, much less that it caused him direct

[7] It is also not clear that a state court would have the authority to prohibit a bankruptcy trustee from pursuing an action that had been approved by the bankruptcy court.

[8] Giddens does not attempt to distinguish (see Open. Br. 14-20) the bulk of this appellate court precedent. Instead, Giddens seeks to rely (Open. Br. 15-16) on two bankruptcy court decisions, which allowed certain tort defendants to file objections in bankruptcy court. See In re Pryor, 341 B.R. 571 (Bkrtcy. N.D. Miss. 2006); In re Tarrer, 273 B.R. 724 (Bkrtcy. N.D. Ga. 2001). But neither court purported to apply the "person aggrieved" test. See Pryor, 341 B.R. at 576; Tarrer, 273 B.R. at 730-31. Accordingly, those decisions do not demonstrate that Giddens has standing here.

pecuniary harm. Accordingly, this Court should dismiss Giddens' appeal for lack of jurisdiction. Alternatively, for the reasons set forth below, this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court's decision on the merits.

II. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised Its Discretion In Reopening This Bankruptcy Case To Allow A Chapter 7 Trustee To Complete The Administration Of The Estate.

A. The bankruptcy court properly exercised its discretion in granting the debtors' motion to reopen and in directing the appointment of a Chapter 7 trustee. The Bankruptcy Code provides that "[a] case may be reopened . . . to administer assets, to accord relief to the debtor, or for other cause." 11 U.S.C. § 350(b). Here, the debtors notified the court about a previously undisclosed asset: the potential malpractice claim against Giddens. The bankruptcy court properly granted the motion to reopen, so that a newly-appointed Chapter 7 trustee could "administer [this] asset[]" of the estate. _See_ 11 U.S.C. § 350(b); _see also In re Woods_, 173 F.3d 770, 777 n.3 (10th Cir. 1999) (noting that a case may be reopened "when there [were] assets unknown to the trustee at the time the case was closed"). Indeed, any other decision would likely have been an _abuse_ of discretion. As this Court has stated, the bankruptcy court has a "duty . . . to reopen an estate whenever prima facie proof is made that it has not been fully administered." _In re Mullendore_, 741 F.2d 306, 308 (10th Cir. 1984).

B. Giddens fails to demonstrate that the bankruptcy court abused its discretion in reopening this bankruptcy case. First, contrary to Giddens' assertion (_see_ Open. Br. 20-23), the debtors clearly had standing to file the motion to reopen. Debtors have an ongoing duty to disclose pre-petition assets, see 11 U.S.C. §§ 521(a)(1), 541(a); Ajaka v. Brooksamerica Mortgage Corp., 453 F.3d 1339, 1344 (11th Cir. 2006) ("[t]he duty to disclose is a continuing one") (internal quotation marks omitted), and, indeed, may be criminally prosecuted if they conceal assets of the estate, see 18 U.S.C. § 152(1) ("[a] person who [] knowingly and fraudulently conceals . . . any property belonging to the estate of a debtor . . . shall be fined under this title, imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both").

Accordingly, the debtors here had not only the authority, but an obligation, to seek to reopen the bankruptcy proceeding to notify the court about a previously undisclosed asset. See also United States v. Messner, 107 F.3d 1448, 1452 (10th Cir. 1997) (the prosecutor explained that, to avoid criminal liability, a debtor may "petition[] the bankruptcy court to reopen the [bankruptcy] case to determine whether the assets should be administered for the benefit of creditors or abandoned").

Giddens is likewise incorrect in asserting that the doctrine of judicial estoppel applies here. "Judicial estoppel bars a party from adopting inconsistent positions in the same or related litigation." Rascon v. US West Communications, Inc., 143 F.3d 1324, 1330 (10th Cir. 1998) (internal quotation marks omitted); see Johnson v. Lindon City Corp., 405 F.3d 1065, 1068-69 (10th Cir. 2005).

Giddens' judicial estoppel claim rests on a fundamental misconception about the bankruptcy court's decision. Giddens insists (Open. Br. 23-41) that the debtors should be judicially estopped from pursuing the malpractice action against him, because they took "inconsistent positions" with respect to that claim in their bankruptcy case and in the separate state court suit. In the bankruptcy case, the debtors failed to acknowledge that the claim existed, while, in the state court action, they vigorously prosecuted the claim.

But the bankruptcy court's order does not permit the debtors to pursue the state court suit against Giddens. On the contrary, the bankruptcy court authorized a newly-appointed Chapter 7 trustee to administer the claim on behalf of the bankruptcy estate. Judicial estoppel plainly does not apply to the trustee. The trustee has never taken any position with respect to the malpractice claim, and thus plainly would not be taking an inconsistent position if he pursued the state court suit. See Parker v. Wendy's International, Inc., 365 F.3d 1268, 1272 (11th Cir. 2004) (the trustee "never took an inconsistent position under oath with regard to [the debtor's] claim" and thus "cannot [] be judicially estopped from pursuing it"); see also Kaiser v. Bowlen, 455 F.3d 1197, 1203 (10th Cir. 2006) (the defendant's judicial estoppel claim "fails for the simple reason that [the plaintiff] did not take a [contrary] position in a prior legal proceeding").

Nor is the trustee "tainted or burdened" by the debtors' failure to disclose their malpractice claim. See Parker, 365 F.3d at 1273 ("The trustee made no false or inconsistent statement under oath in a prior proceeding and is not tainted or burdened by the debtor’s misconduct.”). When a trustee brings suit on behalf of a bankruptcy estate, the trustee is subject only to defenses that could have been raised against the debtor prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition. See Bank of Marin v. England, 385 U.S. 99, 101 (1966) (“the trustee is subject to all claims and defenses which might have been asserted against the bankrupt but for the filing of the petition”); Integrated Solutions, Inc. v. Service Support Specialties, Inc., 124 F.3d 487, 495 (3d Cir. 1997) (“the trustee only succeeds to the same rights the debtor possessed in the property prepetition”) (emphasis added).[9] But “any post-petition conduct by [the debtor], including failure to disclose an asset,” may not be charged to the trustee. See Parker, 365 F.3d at 1272 n.3 (emphasis in original).

Moreover, applying judicial estoppel here would be at odds with the equitable considerations underlying that doctrine. As the bankruptcy court recognized, it would be inequitable to prevent “the trustee, who is blameless, from administering the Malpractice Claim for the benefit of the estate.” See Aplt. App. at 278-79; Addendum, Tab A, at 9-10. Such a ruling would harm a completely innocent group: the creditors, whose “only hope for any repayment derives from the potential proceeds of the Malpractice Claim.” See Aplt. App. at 277; Addendum, Tab A, at 8. As the Seventh Circuit has observed, “[j]udicial estoppel is an equitable doctrine, and it is not equitable to employ it to injure creditors who are themselves victims of the debtor's deceit." Cannon-Stokes v. Potter, 453 F.3d 446, 448 (7th Cir. 2006); see Biesek v. Soo Line Railroad Co., 440 F.3d 410, 413 (7th Cir. 2006) ("[The debtor's] nondisclosure in bankruptcy harmed his creditors by hiding assets from them. Using this same nondisclosure to wipe out his [potential] claim would complete the job by denying creditors even the right to seek some share of the recovery."). For these reasons, the Seventh and Eleventh Circuits have properly concluded that a debtor's prior nondisclosure does not preclude a trustee from pursuing a claim on behalf of a bankruptcy estate. See Cannon-Stokes, 453 F.3d at 448 (the debtor's misconduct "does not prevent the creditors themselves from realizing on the claim"); Parker, 365 F.3d at 1269 ("because the party pursuing this case . . . is not [the debtor], but is instead the bankruptcy trustee - who did not make any inconsistent statements to the courts - we hold that judicial estoppel does not apply").[10]

[9] That would encompass, for example, a statute of limitations defense. See, e.g., In re McGavin, 189 F.3d 1215, 1220-21 (10th Cir. 1999).

---

[10] Although the Fifth Circuit has reached a different conclusion, see In re Coastal Plains, Inc., 179 F.3d 197, 201-02, 209-13 (5th Cir. 1999) (applying judicial estoppel to both a debtor and a trustee), it has never explained how the trustee may be charged with the debtor's misconduct, see id. at 209-13 (explaining why the debtor should be judicially estopped from pursuing a previously undisclosed claim, but failing to explain why the same analysis applies to the trustee); see also In re Superior Crewboats, Inc., 374 F.3d 330, 334-36 (5th Cir. 2004) (holding that the debtor was judicially estopped from bringing a previously undisclosed tort claim, and stating, without further explanation, that this "judicial estoppel determination . . . . renders moot the trustee's claim to substitute as plaintiff"). Because the Fifth Circuit has not articulated any rationale for applying judicial estoppel against the trustee, its approach

The bankruptcy court here authorized the Chapter 7 trustee to pursue the malpractice action on behalf of the creditors of the estate. Accordingly, Giddens' argument that the debtors should be judicially estopped is simply misplaced. This Court need not at this point address whether, or to what extent, judicial estoppel should apply to the debtors. See Parker, 365 F.3d at 1273 n.4 (observing that, "in the unlikely scenario where the trustee would recover more than an amount that would satisfy all creditors and the costs and fees incurred, then, perhaps judicial estoppel could be invoked by the defendant [at that time] to limit any recovery to only that amount and prevent an undeserved windfall from devolving on the non-disclosing debtor").

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

The issues to be decided in this appeal are whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion or erred as a matter of law by denying the debtor's motion to overturn a final order entered more than three years ago where the debtor did not file an appeal of the original order.

STATEMENT OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Maine ("the bankruptcy court" or "court") had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(b) and 1334(a) over the bankruptcy case Frank J. Kristan ("Mr. Kristan") initiated on March 8, 2004, by filing a voluntary chapter 7 petition. This appeal is taken from a final order of that bankruptcy court entered on January 10, 2008, denying Mr. Kristan's Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge (the "Discharge Order"). Mr. Kristan filed a timely notice of appeal from that order on January 18, 2008.[1] This Panel has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. §158(a) and 158(b)(1).

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Reviewing courts apply a clearly erroneous standard to a bankruptcy court's findings of

[1] Mr. Kristan's notice of appeal states that he is appealing from "the final judgment order, entered in this case on January 9, 2008." Only the Minutes of a hearing held on January 9, 2008, were entered that day. The Discharge Order was entered on January 10, 2008. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a) provides that a notice of appeal filed after the announcement of an order but before entry of such order "shall be treated as filed after such entry and on the date thereof."

fact and a de novo standard to conclusions of law. See TI Fed. Credit Union v. DelBonis, 72 F.3d 921, 928 (1st Cir. 1995); Western Auto Supply Co. v. Savage Arms, Inc. (In re Savage Indus., Inc.), 43 F.3d 714, 719-20 n. 8 (1st Cir. 1994). Mixed questions of law and fact are reviewed "along a degree-of-deference continuum, ranging from plenary review for law-dominated questions to clear-error review for fact-dominated questions." Johnson v. Watts Regulator Co., 63 F.3d 1129, 1132 (1st Cir. 1995). The decision denying the Debtor's Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge should be reviewed for abuse of discretion. See Aguiar v. Interbay Funding, LLC (In re Aguiar), 311 B.R. 129, 131 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2004)

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Mr. Kristan is a pro se debtor who transferred virtually all of his assets into an Australian trust (the "Trust") before filing his bankruptcy petition. On March 8, 2004, Mr. Kristan filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. On February 9, 2005, in response to an adversary proceeding filed by Mr. Kristan's primary creditor, the bankruptcy court denied Mr. Kristan's discharge (the "Discharge Denial Order") under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2)(A), finding that his transfer to the Trust was made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors. Mr. Kristan did not appeal the Discharge Denial Order.

Almost three years later, Mr. Kristan filed a "Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge" (the "Discharge Motion"), asking the bankruptcy court to overturn the Discharge Denial Order. (Appellant's Appendix-Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge.) Both the United States Trustee and the Chapter 7 trustee opposed the Discharge Motion. (Appellant's Appendix-Trustee's Objection to Motion to Revoke; U.S. Trustee’s Objection to Motion to Revoke.) On January 10, 2008, the bankruptcy court denied the Discharge Motion (the “Discharge Order”). (Appellant’s Appendix-Order Denying Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge.) In this appeal, the sixth of eight appeals filed by Mr. Kristan in this case, Mr. Kristan asserts that the bankruptcy court erred in denying the Discharge Motion.[2]

STATEMENT OF FACTS

I. Statutory Framework - Overview of 11 U.S.C. §727(e)(2)

Absent unusual circumstances, individuals who file for protection under the Bankruptcy Code are entitled to a discharge of their debts. 11 U.S.C. § 727(a). If, however, a debtor misleads the court or his creditors, or engages in certain other acts, his discharge may be denied. 11 U.S.C. § 727(a) provides a list of factors constituting cause for denial of a debtor’s discharge. See e.g. 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(3) (concealing, destroying or falsifying records); 727(a)(5) (failing to satisfactorily explain the loss of assets to meet liabilities); 727(a)(6) (refusing to obey any lawful order of the court). Mr. Kristan's discharge was denied for transferring property with intent to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors. A.P. 04-2063, Docket No. 18; 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2).

If a debtor has already received a discharge but the discharge was obtained through fraud or like means, the United States Trustee, the case trustee or a creditor may petition the court to revoke such discharge. 11 U.S.C. § 727(d). Section 727(e) sets time limits for actions to revoke discharge. An action to revoke discharge must be filed within one year after the discharge was granted or, in certain enumerated circumstances, the action may be filed at any time before the case is closed. 11 U.S.C. § 727(e)(1), (e)(2). By their express terms, §§ 727(d)(2) and 727(e) apply only in cases where a discharge was previously granted to the debtor.

II. Factual and Procedural Background

Mr. Kristan filed a voluntary pro se chapter 7 petition on March 8, 2004. Prior to filing, Mr. Kristan transferred virtually all of his assets into an Australian trust (the "Trust"). (Appellant's Appendix-Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge.) On February 2, 2005, the bankruptcy court avoided Mr. Kristan's transfer to the Trust. Id. On February 9, 2005, the bankruptcy court entered an order denying Mr. Kristan a discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(2)(A) (the "Discharge Denial Order"). Id. Mr. Kristan did not appeal either order.

The automatic stay expired upon entry of the Discharge Denial Order. Kristan v. Nesbit, B.A.P. Case No. 07-032, unpublished opinion of September 6, 2007 at 6 (Appellee's Addendum at Exhibit 1). Nevertheless, Mr. Kristan continued to act as if the automatic stay was in effect. Id. Mr. Kristan also objected to all efforts by the Chapter 7 trustee to compromise claims and all requests for trustee compensation. See Docket Nos. 116, 128, 135, 168, 228; 114, 134, 140, 149, 174, 186, 206, 211, 366. It is Mr. Kristan's position that the automatic stay will remain in effect until his bankruptcy case is closed.

On November 30, 2007, nearly three years later after the entry of the Discharge Denial Order, Mr. Kristan filed a Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge (referred to herein as the "Discharge Motion"), requesting that the bankruptcy court revoke the 2005 Discharge Denial Order. Mr. Kristan cited 11 U.S.C. § 727(e)(2) as the basis on which the bankruptcy court could grant him relief. Id. Mr. Kristan also used the Discharge Motion to allege that the Chapter 7 trustee engaged in wrongdoing while administering the bankruptcy estate. Id. Both the United States Trustee and the Chapter 7 trustee opposed the Discharge Motion. (Appellant's Appendix-Trustee's Objection to Motion to Revoke; U.S. Trustee's Objection to Motion to Revoke.) On December 12, 2007, the Chapter 7 trustee filed a motion for sanctions, requesting an award of attorneys' fees and an order requiring Mr. Kristan to obtain the permission of the bankruptcy court before filing any further pleadings.

On January 9, 2008, the bankruptcy court held a hearing on the Discharge Motion. On January 10, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered its order denying the Discharge Motion (the "Discharge Order"). (Appellant's Appendix-Order Denying Motion to Revoke Denial of Discharge.) On the same day, the bankruptcy court entered a separate order granting the trustee's motion for sanctions.[3] On January 18, 2008, Mr. Kristan filed a timely appeal of the Discharge Order.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The 2005 Discharge Denial Order was a final order that Mr. Kristan did not appeal. If the Discharge Motion is a motion from relief from judgment under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b)(3) and Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9024, it must fail because it was filed more than one year after the Discharge Denial Order was entered. Moreover, as a substantive matter, 11 U.S.C. § 727(e) applies only to debtors who have received a discharge and is thus inapplicable to Mr. Kristan.

ARGUMENT

I. The 2005 Discharge Denial Order is a Final Order that Mr. Kristan Did Not Appeal

A decision is final if "it ends the litigation on the merits and leaves nothing for the court to do but execute the judgment." Fleet Data Processing Corp. v. Branch (In re Bank of New England Corp.), 218 B.R. 643, 646 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 1998). Although a flexible approach to the concept of finality should be applied in bankruptcy appeals, an order denying discharge is without question a final appealable order. In re Aoki, 323 B.R. 803, 811 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2005). Thus, the 2005 Discharge Denial Order was a final appealable order.[4]

[3] The bankruptcy court's order granting the trustee's motion for sanctions is the subject of three B.A.P. appeals, Case Nos. 08-002, 08-009 and 08-010.

[4] Within ten days of its entry, Mr. Kristan could have asked the bankruptcy court to modify the Discharge Denial Order by filing a motion to alter or amend the judgment under Fed. R. Civ. P. 59(e) (made applicable by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9023). He did not do so.

A notice of appeal in a bankruptcy case must be taken within ten days of the date of entry of judgment or order appealed from. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(a). A bankruptcy judge may extend the time for filing a notice of appeal. Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8002(c). However, any motion for extension of time to file an appeal must be filed within thirty days of the time for filing a notice of appeal as prescribed by Rule 8002(a). Id. Mr. Kristan did not file an appeal of the Discharge Denial Order within ten days of its entry, nor did he file a motion to extend time for filing a notice of appeal. The Discharge Motion is essentially a late attempt by Mr. Kristan to circumvent the time limits for appealing the Order Denying Discharge. Because the Discharge Denial Order was not appealed, the Discharge Denial Order cannot now be overturned.

II. If the Discharge Motion is a Motion From Relief From Judgment Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b)(3), It Must Fail Because It Was Filed More Than One Year After the Discharge Denial Order Was Entered

Because the Discharge Motion was filed almost three years after the Discharge Denial Order entered, the Discharge Motion is properly treated as a motion for relief from judgment pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 60, made applicable here by Fed. R. Bankr. P. 9024[5]. See In re Joseph S. Chicco, 23 B.R. 292, 293 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 1982) (construing a motion filed in a bankruptcy court to revoke a previous order entered by that bankruptcy court under Rule 60). Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) provides for relief from a final judgment or order for reasons of (1) mistake, inadvertence or excusable neglect, (2) newly discovered evidence, (3) fraud, (4) and (5) because the judgment is void or satisfied, or (6) "for any other reason that justifies relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b). The Discharge Motion does not allege mistake, newly discovered evidence, or that the Discharge Denial Order is void or otherwise satisfied.

Because the Panel construes pro se arguments liberally, it could view the Discharge Motion as a Rule 60(b)(3) motion seeking relief from judgment for fraud.[6] See Kasparian v. Conley (In re Conley), 369 B.R. 67 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007). If the Panel takes this view however, the Discharge Motion fails because Rule 60(b)(3) motions cannot be brought more than one year "after the judgment, order or proceeding was entered or taken" and the Discharge Denial Order was entered in February, 2005.[7] Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(c)(1). If the Panel interprets the Discharge Motion as a Rule 60(b)(6) motion "for any other reason that justifies relief," that view must also fail because motions brought under Rule 60(b)(6) must be brought within a "reasonable time." Id. Three years after the entry of an order is not a "reasonable time." See In re Martin, 287 B.R. 423, 431-32 (Bankr. E.D. Ark. 2003). Even if the Discharge Motion was timely filed, Rule 60(b)(6) is "intended to provide relief only where exceptional circumstances prevent the moving party from seeking redress through the usual channels" and no exceptional circumstances are [6] Mr. Kristan asserts that the trustee's actions constituted fraud and are therefore cause to revoke denial of the discharge. However, all of the trustee's actions in this case were approved by the court, and are now final orders. Mr. Kristan was denied a discharge not because of any action by the trustee, but as a result of Mr. Kristan's own wrongful actions in attempting to transfer property beyond the reach of his creditors, which actions had to be addressed by the trustee on behalf of the estate.

[7] The "fraud on the court" standard is "distinct from the more general fraud standard of Rule 60(b)(3), and may be brought at any time. However, while there is no strict time limitation for filing a motion alleging fraud on the court, such a motion must be brought within a reasonable time." See In re Martin, 268 B.R. 168, 171 (Bankr. E.D. Ark. 2001).

III. As a Substantive Matter, 11 U.S.C. § 727(e) Applies Only to Debtors Who Have Received a Discharge and is Thus Inapplicable to Mr. Kristan

Mr. Kristan uses 11 U.S.C. § 727(e) as both the jurisdictional and the substantive basis for the Discharge Motion. 11 U.S.C. § 727(e) does not apply to Mr. Kristan because § 727 (e) applies only the debtors who have previously obtained a discharge and Mr. Kristan did not obtain a discharge in the underlying bankruptcy case.

The import of § 727(e) is that if a debtor has already received a discharge, “the Trustee, a creditor, or the United States Trustee may request a revocation” of that discharge upon a showing that the discharge was obtained through fraud or like means.[8] 11 U.S.C. § 727(e). Mr. Kristan misinterprets § 727(e)(2)’s provision that a revocation of discharge may be sought by any date before “the date the case is closed” using it, without basis, to attack the Discharge Denial Order entered years earlier. The bankruptcy court committed no error of law in finding that Mr. Kristan is not entitled to relief under 11 U.S.C. § 727(e).

CONCLUSION

Mr. Kristan has failed to meet his burden on appeal. Accordingly, the Discharge Denial [8] Mr. Kristan ignores the clear language of § 727(e) that only the “trustee, a creditor, or the United States Trustee may request a revocation of discharge” by claiming that he purchased his creditors’ claims, and thus he now stands in the shoes of the creditors to revoke the Discharge Denial Order under section 727(e)(2).

---

Order should be affirmed.

In re KROY (EUROPE) LIMITED, a company chartered under the laws of the United Kingdom, Debtor.	)	Case No. 90-05034-PHX-RGM (Jointly Administered) (Chapter 11)
In re KROY, Inc., a Minnesota corporation, Debtor.	)

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE'S OPPOSITION TO DEBTORS' MOTION FOR AN ORDER COMPELLING THE UNITED STATES TRUSTEE TO ANSWER INTERROGATORIES, AND FOR SANCTIONS

The United States Trustee, through undersigned counsel, opposes the Motion Of Kroy, Inc. And Kroy (Europe) Ltd. ("Debtors") For An Order Compelling The United States Trustee To Answer Interrogatories, And For Sanctions ("Motion to Compel"). As set forth in their motion, Debtors sought discovery from the United States Trustee by propounding six interrogatories. The United States Trustee's objections to those interrogatories were, for the reasons set forth below, appropriate, and Debtors are not entitled to the discovery sought. Moreover, the United States Trustee has provided information to the Debtors on an informal basis that will enable them to obtain any additional information they seek, if they so choose. Consequently, Debtors' motion to compel and for sanctions should be denied.

I. The United States Trustee Has Attempted In Good Faith To Avoid An Unnecessary Discovery Dispute

In the course of attempting to resolve this discovery dispute, the United States Trustee, through undersigned counsel, Paul W. Bridenhagen, attempted in good faith to avoid a discovery dispute with counsel for Debtors (Richard A. Baumgart). Motion to Compel, Exhibit C; United States Trustee's Opposition Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, ¶¶ 5-9 . Debtors's Interrogatory #1 requested the "number of cases in the District of Arizona in which the Office of the United States Trustee has pursued post-confirmation fees pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 19309a)(6)." Debtors's Interrogatory #2 requested the name and case number of each case identified in response to Interrogatory #1. The United States Trustee objected to these requests, inter alia, on vagueness grounds, because she was unable to determine the precise meaning of the term "pursued." Specifically, the United States Trustee was unsure whether the term "pursued" included a written request for payment of a debtor's post-confirmation obligation, whether it was limited only to a filing of a motion or an objection in bankruptcy court seeking payment of fees, or whether it was limited only to the pursuit of an appeal of an adverse decision of a bankruptcy court in response to a motion or an objection filed by the United States Trustee. In response to that objection, Debtors refined the meaning of the term "pursued " to mean "taken any formal action to collect fees." Motion to Compel, at 6. (emphasis added).

Thus defined, counsel for the United States Trustee informed Debtors' counsel that, under the supervision of the Executive Office for United States Trustees ("EOUST"), written notices and requests for payment concerning post-confirmation quarterly fee obligations were sent to all debtors in cases in the District of Arizona listed in EOUST's database as having plans that were confirmed before January 17, 1996 pending from and after that date (hereinafter these cases will be referred to as the "relevant cases"). Counsel for the United States Trustee informed Debtors' counsel, therefore, that the United States Trustee had pursued quarterly fees in all of the relevant cases. See, Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, ¶ 6 .

Without waiving the United States Trustee's objections to the discovery sought, in an effort to avoid a formal discovery dispute, counsel for the United States Trustee offered to have electronic search commands formulated and run by the contractor retained by EOUST to service its electronic case database system concerning quarterly fees in order to generate lists of the relevant cases and a summary of all post-confirmation fees collected therein. See, Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, ¶ 7 & 8. Although undersigned counsel initially understood that the formulation and execution of the necessary search commands could be performed by about September 10, 1998, the reports were not able to be completed until the afternoon of September 18, 1998. See, Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, ¶ 8. Shortly thereafter, these reports were sent by overnight courier to counsel for Debtors, with a request that he contact counsel for the United States Trustee to discuss whether the information provided was sufficient for Debtors' needs in this litigation. Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, attached letter and reports. To date, counsel for the Debtors has not contacted counsel for the United States Trustee to discuss the adequacy of the information provided. See, Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, ¶ 9.

II. Debtors Have Failed To Demonstrate That They Are Entitled To Discovery, Which Is Sought Solely In Connection With Debtors' Facially Invalid "Selective Enforcement" Defense

Contrary to the representation by Debtors in their motion (Motion to Compel, at 5), the United States Trustee did not suggest that the issues on remand were in any way limited. The United States Trustee's relevancy objection was set forth as follows: "The information sought by this interrogatory is neither relevant nor reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of relevant evidence that relates to any of the six issues identified by the district court, or to any other valid defense, in this matter. See Motion to Compel, Exhibit B, at 2 (emphasis added). In their Motion, Debtors argue only that all of the interrogatories "directly relate to whether the United States Trustee has selectively enforced its interpretation of § 1930(a)(6), and bear upon the United States Trustee's belief as to what [she] can collect." Motion to Compel, at 5. In their brief on remand, Debtors' selective enforcement argument is articulated as follows: "The local United States Trustee's offices handles cases concerning this issue inconsistently . . . those entities who actively seek to close their cases, such as New Kroy, face the United States Trustee's demand for the payment of quarterly fees. Reorganized debtors whose cases are administratively closed by the Clerk's Office, however, do not face similar demands for payment." Brief Of Kroy, Inc., And Kroy (Europe) Ltd., On Remand Relating To Liability For Payment Of Quarterly Fees Allegedly owed To The United States Trustee ("Debtor's Brief On Remand"), at 13.

Debtors' selective enforcement argument appears to be based solely on a footnote in this Court's order granting its request for final decree. Motion to Compel, at 2 n.1, citing In re Kroy (Europe) Limited, In re Kroy, Inc., no. B-90-05034-PHX-RGM, B-90-05035-PHX-RGM, unreported, 1997 WL 178857, n.1 (Bankr. D. Ariz., March 5, 1997). As set forth in the United States Trustee's Brief on Remand, at 18, n.6, however, the United States Trustee sought reconsideration of that decision, in part, based on the content of that footnote. In denying the reconsideration sought, the Court noted that the footnote contained nothing more "than an observation regarding the apparent inconsistency" in the United States Trustee's policies, and that observation had no bearing on the facts and conclusions regarding the approval of the entry of the final decree in the case. 1997 WL 178857, *2 (emphasis added).

As the Supreme Court and the Ninth Circuit have both recognized, the government retains broad discretion in the enforcement of its laws. Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607

(1985) (government retains broad prosecutorial discretion); United States v. Bourgeois, 964 F.2d 935 , 937 (9th Cir. 1992) (same). Although broad, that discretion is not unfettered, and may not be "deliberately based upon an unjustifiable standard such as race, religion, or other arbitrary classification." Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. at 608, quoting Oyler v. Boles, 368 U.S. 448, 456 (1962). In United States v. Ness, 652 F.2d 890, 891 (9th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1126 (1981), the Ninth Circuit directly addressed a party's right to conduct discovery in the context of a claim of selective prosecution. In that case, the Ninth Circuit stated that a party seeking discovery in support of such a claim has the "burden of establishing that others similarly situated have not been prosecuted and that the allegedly discriminatory prosecution was based on an impermissible motive." Id..

In this matter, Debtors have failed to satisfy either prong of this test and are not entitled to the discovery sought. First, the Debtors cite only footnote No. 1 in this Court's final decree, which this Court has described as merely an observation of an apparent inconsistency. Furthermore, although under-staffing has forced the United States Trustee to prioritize her collection efforts, the evidence before the Court demonstrates that the United States Trustee has both on her own and through the EOUST pursued quarterly fees in all of the relevant cases by, inter alia, sending demands for payment. See, Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, ¶¶ ; See, Exhibit B, Declaration of Michele R. Hankins, at 1. Second, the Debtors have failed to articulate any impermissible motive (related to such considerations as race, religion, free speech, or retaliation) that would support a claim of selective enforcement. See also Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue Service, 822 F.2d 844, 85 3 (9th Cir. 1987) (taxpayer failed to demonstrate "type of hostility to a target of law enforcement that would support a claim of selective enforcement"), citing U.S. v. Ness, supra. Thus, under the law of this Circuit, Debtors are not entitled to the discovery sought. United States v. Ness, 652 F.2d at 891 (fact that discovery might be helpful does not relieve party of burden of making initial showing).

Finally, even if the United States Trustee did seek quarterly fees more actively from debtors who filed motions to close their cases, such a policy would have been a reasonable exercise of her discretion: debtors who actively litigate their cases demonstrate in an immediately verifiable way that they are still in existence and are more likely to have the funds necessary to pay the fees sought. See, Exhibit B, Declaration of Michele R. Hankins, at 1-3 (describing the United States Trustee's practices and policies concerning the collection of post-confirmation quarterly fees). See also United States v. Bourgeois, 964 F.2d 935, 938 (9th Cir. 1992) ("selective enforcement prosecution claims are evaluated 'according to ordinary due process standards'") quoting United States Wyate, 470 U.S. at 608-09.

III. The Discover Sought Is Burdensome, Particularly In Light Of The Current Understaffing Of The United States Trustee's Office And The Information Already Provided To Debtors

The United States Trustee has, by providing the lists attached to Exhibit A to this opposition, enabled Debtors to obtain any further information they may deem necessary to their defense in this matter. Because responses to Interrogatories ## 3-5 by the United States Trustee could only have be made after a manual search of all United States Trustee and court files of all the cases identified in response to interrogatories ## 1 and 2, such a search would be unduly burdensome in the context of this case. See, Exhibit A, Declaration of Paul W. Bridenhagen, attached letter and reports. See also, Exhibit B, Declaration of Michele R. Hankins, at 2-3. Therefore, the United States Trustee's objection in this regard was appropriate.

Conclusion

For the above-stated reasons, the United States Trustee requests that the Court deny Debtors' request for an order compelling discovery and for sanctions.

DECLARATION

I, Paul W. Bridenhagen, hereby declare as follows:

1. I have been employed with the Executive Office for United States Trustees ("EOUST") since April 1993 as an attorney in the Office of the General Counsel

2. I make this declaration based on my own knowledge and information made known to me in the course of my responsibilities as an attorney in the Office of the General Counsel.

3. I have been assigned to assist the Office of the United States Trustee in Arizona in the above-captioned case and was the primary attorney responsible for handling the United States Trustee’s response to the interrogatories propounded by the Debtors this matter.

4. In the course of my responsibilities in this matter, after consultation with the Office of the United States Trustee in Arizona and personnel at the Executive Office for United States Trustees, I prepared, signed and served the United States Trustee's objections to the interrogatories propounded by the Debtors.

5. In a good faith effort to avoid a discovery dispute, I discussed with counsel for Debtors, Stuart Baumgart, the Debtors' theory concerning selective enforcement and expressed the view that I believed it was without legal merit. On at least three separate occasions, August 28, 1998, September 4, 1998 and September 8, 1998, I had conversations Mr. Baumgart. During the course of those conversations I reiterated the objections of the United States Trustee to the Debtors' interrogatory requests, but sought to understand his discovery needs. During the September 4, 1998 conversation, I expressly stated to Mr. Baumgart that in responding to the Debtors' discovery requests, the United States Trustee had not taken the position that the parties were limited in the issues that could be raised on remand.

6. Following my initial discussions with Mr. Baumgart, I consulted with the personnel at the Database Management Systems, EOUST, and was informed that its contractors had sent written notices concerning quarterly fees in all cases listed in EOUST's database that had plans confirmed prior to January 27, 1996. Those notices informed the parties of the January 1996 amendment to 28 U.S.C. § 1930(a)(6) that extended the obligation of chapter 11 debtors to pay quarterly fees into the post-confirmation period and demanded payment of all fees due. During my September 4, 1998, conversation with Mr. Baumgart, I informed him that these written requests for payment were made in all the relevant cases and stated, therefore, that the United States Trustee had pursued quarterly fees in all cases with plans confirmed prior to January 27, 1996, including those pending in Arizona.

7. In early September, I inquired whether the contractor that manages the database used in the collection of quarterly fees was capable of generating a list of all cases in the District of Arizona with plans that were confirmed before January 17, 1996 that were pending from and after that date (hereinafter these cases will be referred to as the "relevant cases.") . I further inquired whether the contractor could generate a summary of all post-confirmation fees collected in the relevant cases. I was initially told that the database was not configured to generate such reports.

8. On, or shortly before, September 8, 1998, I was informed by that, although EOUST's database was not then capable of generating the lists discussed in ¶ 7, the contractor could formulate search commands that would generate such lists, but that the process would take approximately two days. On September 8, 1998, I spoke with Mr. Baumgart and offered to provide him with lists containing the case names and numbers of all the relevant cases and a list of all post-confirmation fees collected in those cases to date. I indicated that I was uncertain as to how long the contractor would take to generate the list, but had been told it would take about two days. He stated that he would proceed to prepare and file his motion to compel and that he would review whatever information I ultimately provided him and then discuss his discovery needs further.

9. Although I repeatedly attempted to expedite the processing of the lists that I had offered to provide to Mr. Baumgart, I did not receive them until the afternoon of September 18, 1998. I immediately called Mr. Baumgart to discuss the matter, but he was not in his office. I left a message for him to call me. I called again the following Monday and was informed he was out of the office. He called me the next day September 22, 1998, and we discussed the contents of the lists, which I sent to him by overnight mail that day. In a letter dated September 22, 1998, that accompanied the lists, I requested that he call me to discuss me whether the information provided would be sufficient for Debtors' needs in this matter. To date he has not contacted me in this regard.

10. True and accurate copies of the reports provided to Debtors' counsel, along with the transmittal letter, are attached hereto.

I hereby declare on penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This appeal arises from a final order entered by the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the First Circuit ("BAP") dated January 23, 1998, which affirmed the May 7, 1997 order ("Order") of the Rhode Island United States Bankruptcy Court dismissing the chapter 7 bankruptcy case of Richard Lamanna ("Debtor") for substantial abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b). In re Lamanna, 210 B.R. 17 (Bankr. D.R.I. 1997). This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 158(d).

STATEMENT OF ISSUE PRESENTED

Did the bankruptcy court, as affirmed by the BAP, commit clear error in dismissing Debtor's chapter 7 case for substantial abuse under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), where he demonstrated no meaningful economic or other hardships that prevented him from repaying all of his debts?

STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

In general, appellate courts "'... independently review the bankruptcy court's decision, applying the 'clearly erroneous' standard to findings of fact and de novo review to conclusions of law.' ... [Where the issue] poses a mixed question of law and fact, [the Court applies] the clearly erroneous standard, unless the bankruptcy court's analysis was 'infected by legal error ...'" In re Winthrop Old Farm Nurseries, Inc., 50 F.3d 72, 73 (1st Cir. 1995) (citations omitted). See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013.[1/]

[1/] A finding of fact is clearly erroneous "... when although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed ..." United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 395, 68 S.Ct. 525, 542, 92 L.Ed 756, 766 (1948). "... When the finding of fact is premised on an improper legal standard, or a proper one is improperly applied, that finding loses the insulation of the clearly erroneous rule ..." Wilson v. Huffman (In re Missionary Baptist Foundation of America, Inc., 712 F.2d 206, 209 (5th Cir. 1983).

The facts in this appeal, however, are not disputed. The Court reviews de novo both the meaning of the statutory terms used in section 707(b) and the lower courts' ultimate conclusion that granting the debtor a discharge would be a "substantial abuse" of chapter 7. Fonder v. United States, 974 F.2d 996, 999 (8th Cir. 1992); In re Green, 934 F.2d 568, 570 (4th Cir. 1991).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Nature of the Case.

This case arises out of a chapter 7 petition filed by Debtor on February 18, 1997. Appendix ("App.) at 1; 3. After reviewing the schedules accompanying Debtor's petition, the bankruptcy court, sua sponte, issued an order to show cause why it should not dismiss Debtor's case under 11 U.S.C. 707(b). Following the show cause hearing, the bankruptcy court found that Debtor could easily pay all of his debts, and it dismissed his case for substantial abuse. Debtor appealed, and the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the First Circuit affirmed the Order. Debtor subsequently appealed to this Court.

B. Course of Proceedings Below

1. Proceedings In Bankruptcy Court

Shortly after Debtor filed his chapter 7 petition, the bankruptcy court, in conducting its standard section 707(b) review of all Rhode Island chapter 7 consumer petitions, prepared a worksheet based on Debtor's schedules "I" and "J." App. at 30. In his schedule "I," Debtor stated that he was employed by the Town of Johnston, Rhode Island and that his monthly take home pay totaled $1,330.96, net of Federal, State and local taxes and "Retpup."[2] App. at 17. In his schedule

[2] On information and belief, "Retpup" represents monthly deductions for a defined benefit or a defined contribution retirement plan. The record does not indicate either that Debtor claimed an interest in any vested retirement benefits and/or that his interest would be exempt under applicable law.

"J," Debtor stated that his monthly expenses totaled $580, consisting of rent ($300), food ($100), transportation ($60), clothing ($100) and recreation ($20), leaving him disposable, monthly income of $770.96. App. at 17 - 18. In his statement of financial affairs, Debtor also stated that he earned gross income of $23,171 in 1995. App. at 20.

Based on the foregoing, sworn information filed by Debtor, the bankruptcy court concluded that Debtor could repay 100% of his pre-petition debts in equal monthly payments of $491.10 under a three year chapter 13 plan, or $294.66 under a five year plan. App. at 30. The court's worksheet indicated that Debtor could repay his pre-petition debts without difficulty, because, after making monthly chapter 13 plan payments, he would still have excess, disposable income of $279.86 per month under a three year plan and $476.30 per month under a five year plan. App. at 30.

The bankruptcy court issued an order dated February 24, 1997, requiring Debtor to show cause why his chapter 7 case should not be dismissed under section 707(b) for substantial abuse, stating that "... the majority of debts listed on Schedule F appear to be consumer debts ..." and attaching a copy of its worksheet showing that he could easily repay his debts. App. at 29 - 30. Debtor filed a one page "Responde [sic] of Debtor to Trustee's Motion to Dismiss" dated March 28, 1997, stating that his monthly expenses of $580, "... while accurately reflect[ing] Debtor's circumstances at the time of filing [were] artificially low because at the time of filing Debtor was living with his parents ..." App. at 31. Debtor further stated that "... [i]t is obviously preposterous to believe that a 28 year old man can pay for housing, food, transportation, health insurance, clothing and other normal expenses for less than $7,000.00 a year. To sustain the Trustee's objection in this case would be to determine that Debtor is required to live below the poverty level in order to avoid substantial abuse ..." App. at 31.

The bankruptcy court conducted the section 707(b) show cause hearing on April 10, 1997. App. at 2; 36. Debtor, through his counsel, affirmed that his scheduled income and expenses were "entirely accurate" and conceded that he currently had sufficient after tax income to repay his entire pre-petition indebtedness. App. at 38 - 39. The court inquired whether Debtor anticipated a present change in his circumstances that might diminish his ability to make payments under a chapter 13 plan, such as emancipating himself from his parents. App. at 39 - 40.[3] Debtor's counsel did not indicate that any such change was anticipated, arguing instead that "... [w]e're here because if the numbers are applied sort of by an adding machine it shows excess income, but we say -- when we say that it true, it simply is a matter of law. It does not show substantial abuse ..." (sic). App. at 39 - 40. He declined the court's invitation to adduce circumstances demonstrating that he could not repay all his debts from disposable income. Thus, the record below demonstrates that, other than his arguments concerning his income level and his "artificially low" expenses, Debtor offered no countervailing considerations (e.g., job loss or sudden illness) to demonstrate that, notwithstanding his admitted ability to repay all his debts, his case should not be dismissed for substantial abuse. App. At 31. Debtor did not dispute that he owed primarily consumer debts. App. at 31.

The bankruptcy court issued the Order on May 7, 1997, finding on the admitted facts that Debtor owed primarily consumer debts, which, given his admitted monthly income and expenses, he could entirely repay. App. at 44 - 47. Applying a "totality of the circumstances test," the court dismissed Debtor's chapter 7 case for substantial abuse under section 707(b), stating as follows:

> [Debtor] has sufficient disposable income to liquidate all of his debts with relative ease and, in fact, he would

[3] "... [I]f you're telling me that the debtor intends to move out and have expenses like everybody else does — and I don't want to hold him hostage in his parents' house ..." App. at 39 - 40.

> still have $279.86 left over after his monthly payment to the Chapter 13 trustee, even under a [three year] 100% plan. These cases are fact specific and in this instance the payment of these debts would not deprive the Debtor of adequate food, shelter, clothing, or other necessities. Because the numbers here are on a smaller scale than most does not alter or relieve the Debtor of his Section 707(b) responsibility, and having failed to show cause why the case should not be dismissed under Section 707(b), it is so ORDERED.

App. at 46; 210 B.R. at 218. The court stayed the implementation of its Order pending Debtor's appeal. App. at 47 - 48; 210 B.R. at 218.

2. Proceedings Before the BAP

Debtor filed a timely notice of appeal to the First Circuit BAP. On appeal, Debtor did not contest the bankruptcy court's findings of fact concerning his ability to repay all of his debts, instead arguing that only "real" substantial abuse, such as where a debtor had unreasonable expenses, merited dismissal of his case under section 707(b). Addendum ("Add.") at 3. He further argued that "...[t]o sustain the Decision below in this case, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel would need to determine that any level of income and expenses, which yield an excess, automatically require dismissal of the Chapter 7 case, even where the 'excess' is created by a highly artificial situation in which a very low income Debtor lives and is supported by his parents and accordingly, at the moment of filing, lacks normal expenses ..." Add. at 3. The BAP was unpersuaded:

> As to the last argument, the Appellant's expenses are what they are, and are not expected to change. That is not artificial; that is actual. To base a finding that there was substantial abuse on the Appellant's potential to increase his spending would be artificial. As to the remaining arguments, they substantially overstate the case.

App. at 57. Finding no error, the BAP affirmed the bankruptcy court's Order on January 23, 1998. App. at 57. Debtor timely perfected this appeal of the BAP's order on January 30, 1998.

C. Unexplained "Eve Of Bankruptcy Expenditures"

Although not expressly relied upon by either the bankruptcy court or the BAP, the record on appeal demonstrates that Debtor signed and dated his petition, along with his schedules and statement of financial affairs, under pains and penalties of perjury on November 22, 1996. App. at 1; 3; 4; 19; 26; 27. During the four week period immediately prior to signing the documents, Debtor charged $9,994.45, or 63%, of his total $15,911.72 in admittedly pre-petition, consumer debts on credit cards and personal credit lines.[4] App. at 13 - 14; 44; Appellant's Brief at 3. Other than a 1995 $1,900 college loan, the record below does not suggest what Debtor's eve of bankruptcy expenditures were. In his schedule "B," however, Debtor claimed that his only assets comprised personalty - cash and clothing - worth $2,006, all which he claimed as exempt in his schedule "C." App. at 7 - 8; 10.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS

The bankruptcy court found, based on Debtor's sworn schedules, that he could easily repay 100% of his debts. Debtor did not contest these findings. Moreover, although give ample notice and an opportunity to respond to the bankruptcy court's show cause order, Debtor presented no evidence of any countervailing considerations that militated against dismissal, such as the occurrence of a sudden illness or financial or other hardships. Considering the totality of the circumstances in the record before it, the bankruptcy court correctly found that granting relief to Debtor under chapter 7 would be a substantial abuse, and the BAP agreed. Accordingly, the Court should affirm the Order, as did the BAP.

---

[4] The $9,994.45 figure included the following debts incurred in October, 1996: a $7,729.88 "personal loan" from Household Finance; a $821.18 credit card debt payable to Norwest Financial; a $763.76 personal loan payable to Hospital Trust; and a $679.63 credit card debt payable to "HRS". Separately, Debtor had incurred a $4,017.27 credit card debt to First USA in October, 1995, within thirteen months of signing the petition. The remaining $1,900 debt represented a September, 1995 "college debt" payable to Mount Ida College. App. at 13 - 14.

The record below provides an additional ground for sustaining the dismissal of the Debtor's case. Although not focused on by the courts below, the record demonstrates that Debtor incurred 63% of his total indebtedness ($9,994.45) within the four weeks preceding the signing of his petition. Applying the totality of the circumstances test, the bankruptcy court could have found substantial abuse based on Debtor's unexplained, eve of bankruptcy spending spree.

I. THE BAP CORRECTLY AFFIRMED THE BANKRUPTCY COURT'S DISMISSAL OF DEBTOR'S CASE FOR SUBSTANTIAL ABUSE BASED ON HIS ADMITTED ABILITY TO REPAY ALL OF HIS DEBTS

With the enactment of Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, Pub. L. 98-353, 98 Stat. 353 ("1984 Act"), "... debtors no longer have unfettered access to voluntary Chapter 7 relief ..." In re Walton, 866 F.2d 981, 982 (8th Cir. 1989). Pursuant to the 1984 Act, Congress substantially amended section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code by adding section 707(b), which currently provides as follows:

> (b) After notice and a hearing, the court, on its own motion or on a motion by the United States trustee, but not at the request or suggestion of any party in interest, may dismiss a case filed by an individual debtor under this chapter whose debts are primarily consumer debts if it finds that the granting of relief would be a substantial abuse of the provisions of this chapter. There shall be a presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor.

11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (emphasis added). Section 707(b) therefore authorizes the bankruptcy court, sua sponte , or on the motion of the United States Trustee, to dismiss the chapter 7 case of an individual debtor who owes primarily consumer debts for substantial abuse.[5] Although the term “substantial abuse” is not defined in the 1984 Act, neither the courts nor the commentators dispute that the initiative for section 707(b)[6] arose from Congress’ concern that consumer borrowers had been filing chapter 7 liquidation cases in record numbers following the enactment of the Bankruptcy Code in 1978 and discharging progressively higher amounts of consumer debts, which, researchers claimed, a significant minority had the capacity to repay. In re Green, 934 F.2d at 570 (“...Section 707(b) introduced an additional restraint upon a debtor’s ability to gain Chapter 7 relief, by allowing a bankruptcy court to deal equitably with the situation in which an unscrupulous debtor seeks the courts assistance in a scheme to take unfair advantage of his creditors...”); In re Walton, 866 F.2d at 983 (section 707(b) was "... aimed primarily at stemming the use of Chapter 7 relief by unneedy

[5] Although Debtor has not contested that his are primarily consumer debts, by way of background, section 101(8) of the Bankruptcy Code defines consumer debt as “... debt incurred by an individual primarily for personal, family, or household purpose ...” In re Mastromarino, 197 B.R. 171, 174 (Bankr. D. Me. 1996). “... [P]rimarily suggests an overall ratio of consumer debts of over fifty percent. Furthermore, the consumer debts should be evaluated not only by amount, but by their relative number ...” Matter of Booth, 858 F.2d 1051, 1055 (5th Cir. 1988).

[6] Among the 1984 Act’s nineteen amendments to the Bankruptcy Code, the Consumer Credit Amendments added 11 U.S.C. § 109(g), authorizing the bankruptcy court to bar a debtor from filing successive petitions for 180 days - In re Tomlin, 105 F.3d 933, 938 (4th Cir. 1997) - and requiring all individual chapter 7 debtors to file schedules “I” and “J,” detailing their current, monthly income and expenses - Fonder v. U.S., 974 F.2d at 999 (“... [w]hen Congress enacted § 707(b) in 1984, it also added the requirement that debtors file an Income/Expense Schedule ‘to facilitate addressing the question of abuse in Chapter 7 cases ...”) (citations omitted). It also added 11 U.S.C. § 1325(b), which “... provides that if the trustee or the holder of an unsecured claim objects to confirmation of the plan, the plan may not be confirmed unless the debtor proposes to pay into the plan all of the debtor’s ‘disposable income’ for a period of three years or until all allowed unsecured claims are paid in full, whichever is earlier ... ‘Disposable income’ is defined as income not reasonably necessary for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependant of the debtor ...” 8 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 1325.08[1] (15th Ed. 1997) (Revised).

debtors ..."), citing S. Rep No. 65, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1983) (emphasis added). See also Wells, Kurtz and Calhoun The Implementation of Bankruptcy Code Section 707(b): The Law and the Reality, 39 Clev. St. L. Rev. 15 (1991) at 30.

Although the tests employed by the various Courts of Appeal differ slightly, they generally agree that dismissal under section 707(b) is warranted either if a debtor does not “need” a chapter 7 discharge, because he can repay his consumer debts with ease out of his future earnings, or if he has been“dishonest” with his creditors, for example, by making “eve of bankruptcy” purchases or misrepresenting facts in his schedules and statement of financial affairs. See In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123, 126 (6th Cir. 1989); see also In re Green, 934 F.2d at 572; accord In re Walton, 866 F.2d at 985 (8th Cir. 1989); In re Kelly, 841 F.2d 908, 914 - 915 (9th Cir. 1988).[7]

A. "Substantial Abuse" Is Determined On The Totality Of Circumstances, But Ability To Repay Debts May Be Enough To Support Dismissal, Unless There Are Sufficient Countervailing Considerations.

This Court has not yet decided a case involving "substantial abuse" under section 707(b). Most circuits that have addressed the issue have applied a totality of the circumstances type test. In our view, the proper approach is a "totality of the circumstances" analysis, a version of which the bankruptcy court adopted in dismissing Debtor’s petition. App. at 35. Under this approach, a debtor's ability to repay his debts may alone be a basis for dismissal, unless there are sufficient countervailing considerations.

---

[7] ... In determining whether to apply § 707(b) to an individual debtor, then, a court should ascertain from the totality of the circumstances whether he is merely seeking an advantage over his creditors, or is “honest,” in the sense that his relationship with his creditors has been marked by essentially honorable and undeceptive [sic] dealings, and whether he is “needy” in the sense that his financial predicament warrants the discharge of his debts in exchange for liquidation of his assets ... Substantial abuse can be predicated upon either lack of honesty or want of need ...

In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (citations omitted) (emphasis added).

Prior to enactment of section 707(b) in 1984, chapter 7 debtors were subject only to dismissal for cause under 11 U.S.C. § 707(a), to denial of discharge for various types of wrongdoing under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a) and to exceptions of specific debts from discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a). They otherwise "... enjoyed an unfettered right to a 'fresh start' under Chapter 7, in exchange for liquidating their nonexempt assets for the benefit of their creditors ..." In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126. In permitting dismissal of a chapter 7 case for “substantial abuse,” section 707(b) was intended to "... deny Chapter 7 relief to the dishonest or non-needy debtor ..." Id.,citing In re Walton, 866 F.2d at 983. The goal was to "... promote fairness to creditors, and thereby increase the flow of consumer credit ..." In re Koch, 109 F.3d 1285, 1288 (8th Cir. 1997).

Congress did not define "substantial abuse" in section 707(b), choosing instead to leave the standard "flexible" in order to enable courts to respond to a wide range of factual situations. In re Krohn, 866 F.2d at 983; see In re Kelly, 841 F.2d at 914. The Fourth Circuit has enumerated several factors to be considered in the "substantial abuse" inquiry. These include whether the debtor has the ability to repay, as well as (1) whether the petition was filed "... because of sudden illness, calamity, disability, or unemployment ...;" (2) whether the debtor "... incurred cash advances and made consumer purchases far in excess of his ability to pay ...;" (3) whether the debtor's "... proposed family budget is excessive or unreasonable ...;" (4) whether the debtor's schedules and statement of current income and expenses "... reasonably and accurately reflect [his] true financial condition ...;" and (5) whether the petition "... was filed in good faith ..." In re Green, 934 F.2d at 572.[8]

The Sixth Circuit has also offered a nonexclusive list of similar factors: "... the debtor's good faith and candor in filing schedules and other documents, whether he has engaged in 'eve of bankruptcy purchases,' and whether he was forced into Chapter 7 by unforeseen or catastrophic events ..." In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126. These factors are comparable to factors (1), (2), (4), and (5) under In re Green.

All four courts of appeals to address the "substantial abuse" standard agree that the "primary" or "principal" factor is the debtor's ability to repay his debts. In re Green, 934 F.2d at 572; In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126; In re Walton, 866 F.2d at 984; In re Kelly, 841 F.2d at 914. "... The primary factor that may indicate a substantial abuse is the ability of the debtor to repay the debts out of future disposable income ..." 6 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 707.04[4], at 707-20 (15th Ed.1997) (Revised).

The Fourth Circuit held in Green that an ability to repay debts was not alone sufficient in that case to support dismissal under section 707(b). It further noted that debtor's "... relative solvency may raise an inference ..." that he is trying to take unfair advantage of creditors, but that "... solvency alone is not a sufficient basis ..." for a finding of substantial abuse. In re Green, 934 F.2d at 572 . The remaining three circuits have concluded that an ability to repay debts, standing alone, may suffice, even though other factors may also be relevant. See United States Trustee v. Harris, 960 F.2d 74, 77 (8th Cir. 1992) (ability to fund chapter 13 plan sufficient, although court may "... 'take the petitioner's good faith and unique hardships into consideration ...'") (quoting In re Walton, 866 F.2d at 983); In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126 (ability to repay sufficient, at least when debtor has ability to repay "with relative ease"); In re Kelly, 841 F.2d at 915 (ability to repay sufficient for dismissal under section 707(b), but inability to repay will not preclude dismissal if bad faith is otherwise shown).

[8] A court need not analyze all these factors in every case, since substantial abuse is a case-specific and fact-based determination. See, e.g., In re Kestell, 99 F.3d 146, 150 (4th Cir. 1996) (focusing on lack of good faith of debtor who "... sought to avoid paying what he owes to his former wife while making good on his other financial obligations ...").

These differences are less significant than they may at first appear. The varying formulations of the circuits can be reconciled with what we consider to be the thrust of section 707(b): Under a "totality of the circumstances" approach, the debtor's ability to repay his debts may be enough, standing alone, to warrant dismissal for substantial abuse under section 707(b), unless there are countervailing considerations - such as sudden illness, calamity, disability, or unemployment - which might indicate that mandating repayment of debts would impose an unwarranted hardship on the debtor. This analysis is consistent with the language and purpose of section 707(b), as well as the holdings of other circuits.[9] [9] With one possible exception, First Circuit bankruptcy courts, including the courts below, have adopted the totality of the circumstances test, stressing that a debtor’s ability to repay debts is the primary factor. See In re Snow, 185 B.R. 397, 402 - 403 (Bankr. D.Mass. 1995) (“... [a]lthough there is predictability in a per se rule [such as that articulated in In re Kelly, 841 F.2d at 915], it is obtained at the expense of fairness and perhaps even of basic principles of due process ...” (citation omitted); In re Mastromarino, 197 B.R. at 176 - 177 [Maine]; In re Haffner, 198 B.R. 646, 648 (Bankr. D. R.I. 1996); In re Blair, 214 B.R. 257, 258 - 259 (Bankr. D.Me. 1997); In re Lapatin, 215 B.R. 643 (Bankr. D.R.I. 1997); In re Meleleu, 215 B.R. 645 (Bankr. D.R.I. 1997); c/f In re Keniston, 85 B.R. at 222 (Bankr. D.N.H. 1988) (obviating an analysis of the constitutionality of section 707(b) under the Equal Protection Clause by narrowly interpreting it to provide a redundant check on “bad faith” filings under 11 U.S.C. § 105(a)).

B. The Record Supports The Dismissal of Debtor's Case For Substantial Abuse, Because He Can Repay His Debts Under A Chapter 13 Plan With Ease, And He Has Demonstrated No Financial Or Other Hardships Entitling Him To Chapter 7 Relief.

As below, Debtor concedes here that his debts are primarily consumer debts and that he is eligible for chapter 13 relief. Appellant's Brief at 3. The sole issue before the Court, therefore, is whether the totality of the circumstances, established by the record below, supported the bankruptcy court's dismissal of Debtor's case as an abuse of chapter 7. In re Wilson, 125 B.R. 742, 745 (W.D.Mich. 1990).

In this case, the bankruptcy court properly weighed all of the evidence before it. Based on the admitted facts, the bankruptcy court found that Debtor's monthly take home pay totaled $1,330.96 and that his monthly expenses were $580, leaving him disposable, monthly income of $770.96. App. at 17 - 18. From this, the bankruptcy court concluded that Debtor could repay 100% of his pre-petition debts in equal monthly payments of $491.10 under a three year chapter 13 plan, or $294.66 under a five year plan. App. at 30. The court further determined this repayment would be relatively easy, because after making monthly chapter 13 plan payments, he would still have excess, disposable income of $279.86 under a three year plan and $476.30 under a five year plan. App. at 30.

Despite the bankruptcy court's granting him ample opportunities (App. at 39 - 40; 45), Debtor did not articulate any specific, countervailing circumstances demonstrating that his bankruptcy would not be a substantial abuse. For example, Debtor did not proffer any evidence - in either his written response to the show cause order or his April 10, 1997 oral argument - that any tragedy, illness and/or unemployment or other unanticipated circumstances had precipitated his bankruptcy filing.[10] Moreover, he did not argue that he presently intended to move out of his parents' home, which might have reduced his future net disposable income. App. at 37 - 42; cf. In re Andrus, 94 B.R. 76 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 1988); In re Matias, 203 B.R. 490 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1996) (finding that parents' subsidizing a debtor's living expenses did not require court to adjust its calculation of disposable income for purposes of determining whether the debtor could repay his debts with ease and, therefore, whether he was needy).

In sum, the record below shows that while living at his parents' home and making in excess of $23,000 per year, Debtor voluntarily incurred consumer debts that he apparently chose not to repay and, in exempting all of his assets, proposed to pay his creditors nothing. In re Peluso, 72 B.R. 732, 738 (Bankr. N.D.N.Y. 1987); In re Grant, 51 B.R. 385, 394 (Bankr. N.D.Ohio 1985). Debtor is, therefore, the precise type of "unneedy" debtor that section 707(b) was meant to screen out of the bankruptcy system. In re Green, 934 F.2d at 572 (noting that "... the real concern behind Section 707(b)[is the] abuse of the bankruptcy process by a debtor seeking to take unfair advantage of his creditors ..." See also, In re Mastromarino, 197 B.R. at 178 - 180. Under the totality of circumstances in the record, the bankruptcy court correctly dismissed Debtor's case pursuant to section 707(b).

Debtor argues that the bankruptcy court mechanically applied a rigid "ability to pay" or "future income" test that was expressly rejected by Congress in the 1984 Act. Appellant's Brief, at 7. He attempts to support his argument by citing various congressional statements offered incident

Moreover, insofar as "...[t]here were no committee reports on the 1984 Act ... the [1983 Senate report discussing the draft predecessor to section 707(b)] S. 445 is the best available evidence of Congress' intent in enacting section 707(b) ..." > This provision represents a balancing of two interests. It preserves that fundamental concept embodied in our bankruptcy laws that debtors who cannot meet debts as they come due should be able to relinquish non-exempt property in exchange for a fresh start. At the same time, however, it upholds creditors' interests in obtaining repayment where such repayment would not be a burden. Crushing debt burdens and severe financial problems place enormous strains on borrowers and their families. Family life, personal emotional health, or work productivity often suffers. By enabling individuals who cannot meet their debts to start a new life, unburdened with debts they cannot pay, the bankruptcy laws allow troubled borrowers to become productive members of their communities. Nothing in this bill denies such borrowers with unaffordable debt burdens bankruptcy relief under Chapter 7. However, if a debtor can meet his debts without difficulty as they come due, use of Chapter 7 would represent a substantial abuse.

"substantial abuse" from S 455 and incorporated it into section 707(b). In re Balaja, 190 B.R. 335, 340 - 341 (Bankr. N.D.Ill. 1996). Thus, to the extent that the Court considers the legislative history of section 707(b), it should reject Debtor's arguments that future, disposable income cannot be considered in determining substantial abuse.

Debtor next argues that the bankruptcy court erred in dismissing his case for substantial abuse insofar as it made no express finding of "bad faith." Such a finding is not a prerequisite to section 707(b) dismissal. In re Green, 934 F.2d at 568. Moreover, the Consumer Credit Amendments incorporated into the 1984 Act reflected congressional intention that bankruptcy courts, in a departure from prior law, regulate access to chapter 7 discharge by individuals who could easily pay their debts. New section 521, for example, required individual chapter 7 debtors to file schedules "I" and "J," delineating their monthly income and expenses. Pub.L. 98-353, §305(2). Prior to the 1984 Act, a bankruptcy court lacked a direct means to evaluate an individual debtor's income and expenses. 4 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 521.06[4] (15th Ed. 1997) (Revised); see In re Snow, 185 B.R. at 401 ("... No utility beyond assisting an income based determination under § 707(b) comes to mind ..."). See also Fonder v. U.S., 974 F.2d at 999 ("... [w]hen Congress enacted § 707(b) in 1984, it also added the requirement that debtors file Income/Expense Schedule 'to facilitate the question of abuse in chapter 7 cases ...'"), quoting 3 Norton Bankruptcy Law and Practice § 69.01, n. 12 (1991).

The 1984 Act also mandated that bankruptcy clerks inform debtors with primarily consumer debts that they could file a chapter 13 case in order to repay some or all of their debts (Pub.L. No. 98-353, § 302), that debtors sign statements acknowledging their option of filing for chapter 13

S.Rep. No. 65, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 43 (1983) (emphasis added).

(Pub.L. No. 98-353, § 322) and that debtors' attorneys affirm that they had advised their clients that they might file chapter 13 (Pub.L. No. 98-353, § 322(2)). In re Grant, 51 B.R. at 392 - 393.[13] Debtor and his attorney signed their respective statements, so they presumptively knew that Debtor could have chosen to repay his consumer debts in chapter 13. App. at 4. He elected not to do so.

Contrary to Debtor's argument, section 707(b) was not redundant of other provisions authorizing the bankruptcy court to dismiss his case for bad faith. In re Snow, 185 B.R. at 400. ("... While the intent of Congress is lost in the darkness of conference committee deliberations, it is fair to assume that Congress intended to accomplish something when it enacted the provision. The section is more than a needless duplication of other provisions of the Code that have always required petitioners to file in good faith ...").[14] The courts below applied section 707(b) to the facts here in a manner consistent with Congress's desire to screen out consumer debtors who did not need chapter 7 relief. Accordingly, the Court should affirm the Order, as affirmed by the BAP.

[13] This interpretation is also consistent with congressional intention to preserve the "fresh start" of a chapter 7 discharge for those who truly need it, while providing the incentive of a broader discharge available in chapter 13 to those who repay at least a portion of their debts. In enacting chapter 13 and broadening its eligibility requirements beyond the "wage earner" restriction of former Chapter XIII, as interpreted by Perry v. Commerce Loan Company, 383 U.S. 392, 15 L.Ed.2d 827, 86 S.Ct. 852 (1966), to include anyone who realized "regular income," Congress sought to encourage repayment of debts commensurate with the debtor's ability. "... The premises of the bill with respect to consumer bankruptcy are that use of the bankruptcy law should be a last resort; that if it is used, debtors's should attempt repayment under chapter 13 ..." 8 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 1300.02 (15th Ed. 1997) (Revised) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong. 1st Sess. 117 (1977); 11 U.S.C. §§ 109(e); 101(30). Congress gave debtors the incentive to complete performance under their chapter 13 plan by granting them a broader discharge than they would have received in chapter 7. In re Rimgale, 669 F.2d 426, 428 (7th Cir. 1982) (analyzing section 1328).

[14] Prior to the advent of section 707(b), the specific exceptions and objections listed in 11 U.S.C. §§ 523 and 727(c), (d) and (e) and 707(a) prescribed a bankruptcy court's ability to regulate a chapter 7 debtor's access to discharge. See In re Green, 934 F.2d at 570 - 571.

II. THE COURT SHOULD ALSO AFFIRM THE LOWER COURTS' ORDERS, BECAUSE DEBTOR EVIDENCED BAD FAITH IN MAKING SUBSTANTIAL CONSUMER CREDIT PURCHASES ON THE EVE OF BANKRUPTCY

A. The Record Indicates That Debtor Charged The Majority of His Consumer Debts Within Four Weeks Of Signing His Bankruptcy Petition.

Although not focused on below, the record indicates that Debtor incurred the vast bulk of his pre-petition debt within four weeks of signing his bankruptcy petition, charging $9,994.45, or 63%, of his total indebtedness. App. at 13 - 14; 44. Given the brief time between when he incurred the debts and signed the petition, the bankruptcy court could easily have inferred that Debtor went on a "eve of bankruptcy spending spree." Such a spending spree is another factor that, in the totality of the circumstances of this case, would allow this Court to affirm the lower courts' decisions. In re Parque Forestal, Inc., 949 F.2d 504, 510 (1st Cir. 1991) (a reviewing court may affirm a bankruptcy court order upon any grounds presented by the record, even if they were neither argued to nor relied upon by the bankruptcy court); Fish Market Nominee Corp. v. Pelofsky, et al., 72 F.3d 4 (1st Cir. 1995); Petit v. Fessenden, 80 F.3d 29, 32 (1st Cir. 1996).

As the Sixth Circuit in In re Krohn noted, section 707(b) "... serves notice upon those tempted by unprincipled accumulation of consumer debt that they will be held to at least a rudimentary standard of fair play and honorable dealing ..." In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126. Nothing in the record offered by Debtor suggests that he made his consumer purchases over a period of years and that the compounded effects of recent charges and old debt service overwhelmed his ability to pay his bills as they came due. See In re Balaja, 190 B.R. at 342 ("... There has been no showing that the debtors deliberately constructed this situation in order to obtain an unfair advantage over their creditors in bankruptcy. To the contrary, it appears that the debtors gradually, over a long period of time, found credit card interest increasing their debt to unmanageable levels ..."). Where, as here, a debtor makes substantial consumer charges within a brief period before filing, a bankruptcy court, drawing reasonable inferences from the facts, cannot find that his "... relationship with his creditors has been marked by essentially honorable and undeceptive dealings ..." (sic). In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 126; In re Webb, 75 B.R. 264, 265 (M.D.Tenn. 1986); see In re Braithwaite, 192 B.R. 882, 884 (Bankr. N.D.Ohio 1996).

Debtor asserts that the bankruptcy court unfairly infringed upon his right to a fresh start. However, insofar as a bankruptcy discharge is a creation of congressional policy, rather than a constitutional right, Congress may limit its availability under certain circumstances, where, as here, a debtor seeks to secure "... a 'headstart' on conspicuous consumption and its concomitant status at the expense of [his] deserving creditors ..." In re Grant, 51 B.R. at 397; In re Krohn, 886 F.2d at 127, citing United States v. Kras, 409 U.S. 434, 446 - 447, 93 S.Ct. 631, 638 - 639, 34 L.Ed.2d 626 (1973). Although not considered below, the record below fully supports the lower courts' dismissal of Debtor's case for substantial abuse on the additional circumstance that he incurred the vast bulk of his debt shortly before he signed his bankruptcy petition.

CONCLUSION

The Court should affirm the lower courts' decisions dismissing Debtor's chapter 7 case for substantial abuse under section 707(b), because, as the record demonstrates, he could have easily repaid all of his debts out of his future earnings and, although afforded the opportunity, he did not demonstrate any countervailing considerations militating against dismissal. Further, the record evidences that Debtor went on a spending spree on the eve of bankruptcy, a factor, when considered in the totality of the circumstances, suggesting that Debtor's bankruptcy is a substantial abuse.

The statutory context, history, and purposes are consistent with the view that Congress intentionally omitted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney'' from the statute. Finally, because the statute as written creates a sensible statutory scheme, there is no warrant for petitioner's claim that the Court should rewrite the Code.

No. 02-693

JOHN M. LAMIE, PETITIONER

v.

UNITED STATES TRUSTEE

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI
TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR THE RESPONDENT

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the court of appeals (Pet. App. 1a-14a) is reported at 290 F.3d 739. The opinion of the district court (Pet. App. 15a-27a) is reported at 260 B.R. 273. The opinion of the bankruptcy court (Pet. App. 28a-44a) is reported at 253 B.R. 724.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court of appeals was entered on May 31, 2002. A petition for rehearing was denied on August 5, 2002 (Pet. App. 45a). A petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on November 4, 2002, and was granted on March 10, 2003. The jurisdiction of this Court rests under 28 U.S.C. 1254(1).

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The relevant statutory provisions are reproduced in an Appendix to this brief. App., infra, 1a-5a.

STATEMENT

1. United States Trustees supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees within specified geographic regions. 28 U.S.C. 581-589. "The United States Trustee Program acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency and to protect and preserve the integrity of the bankruptcy system." http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/mission.htm. See H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 88 (1977) (United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena."). Congress provided in the Code that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding under this Title." 11 U.S.C. 307. Congress also has specifically directed United States Trustees to "review[] * * * applications filed for compensation and reimbursement under section 330 of title 11[] and * * * [to] fil[e] with the court" any "objections to such application." 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(A)(i) and (ii).

2. On December 24, 1998, Equipment Services, Inc., filed a voluntary petition for relief under the debt reorganization provisions of chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. 1101 et seq. At the time of the filing, the company had retained petitioner, an attorney, to represent it in the bankruptcy proceedings and had given petitioner a $6000 retainer, of which $1000 was used to pay the fees and costs of filing the petition. Petitioner deposited the remaining $5000 in an escrow account, to be drawn upon as petitioner earned fees. On January 26, 1999, the Bankruptcy Court approved petitioner's employment as the attorney for the debtor-in-possession in the chapter 11 proceeding. Pet. App. 2a, 28a; see 11 U.S.C. 327(a), 1107.

On March 17, 1999, on the motion of the United States Trustee, the proceeding was converted into a case under the liquidation provisions of chapter 7. 11 U.S.C. 1112(b). Petitioner filed an application with the Bankruptcy Court seeking $2325 in attorneys fees, $1325 of which was earned during the chapter 11 proceeding and $1000 of which was earned during the chapter 7 proceeding. The United States Trustee objected to the application to the extent that it requested $1000 in compensation for services rendered after the case was converted to a chapter 7 proceeding. Pet. App. 4a, 15a-17a, 29a.

The Bankruptcy Court held that the Code did not authorize a chapter 7 debtor's attorney to be paid funds from the bankruptcy estate. Pet. App. 30a-38a. The court explained that, before the Code was amended in 1994, 11 U.S.C. 330 (1988) had authorized an award to any debtor's attorney, but Congress in a 1994 amendment to Section 330 deleted the statutory language authorizing such an award. Pet. App. 34a. The court further observed that Congress in 1994 added a separate provision to Section 330 that "provide[s] express authority for payment of counsel to a Chapter 12 or 13 debtor from the estate." Pet. App. 33a (citing 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B)). The court accordingly concluded that there was no authority to award fees to a chapter 7 debtor's attorney. The Bankruptcy Court nonetheless awarded petitioner fees for services rendered while the case proceeded under chapter 7 because the court concluded that the pre-petition retainer was not, under state law, property of the bankruptcy estate. Id. at 38a-43a.[1]

The district court affirmed. Pet. App. 15a-26a. The court concluded that Section 330(a)(1) was "plain" in not authorizing fees to a chapter 7 debtor's attorney. Id. at 22a, 24a. The district court nonetheless agreed with the bankruptcy court's conclusion that, under state law, the retainer was not property of the estate and accordingly that petitioner was entitled to draw from the retainer fees earned during the chapter 7 proceeding. Id. at 25a-26a.

3. A divided panel of the court of appeals affirmed the district court's construction of Section 330, but the panel unanimously reversed the district court's conclusion that the retainer was not property of the bankruptcy estate. Pet. App. 1a-14a. The court of appeals held that Section 330(a) does not authorize a chapter 7 debtor's attorney to be compensated from the estate. Id. at 5a-9a. The court of appeals reasoned that "§ 330(a), as revised in 1994, omits the phrase 'or the debtor's attorney' from the list of persons to whom a court may award 'reasonable compensation' from the bankruptcy estate for services rendered in a Chapter 7 proceeding." Id. at 6a. The court concluded that it "should follow the plain language of the 1994 version of § 330(a), particularly because application of that plain language supports a reasonable interpretation of the Bankruptcy Code." Id. at 8a.

chapter 7 debtor's attorney. Pet. App. 13a-14a. In his view, the deletion of the phrase "or to the debtor's attorney" from the statute was a "drafting error" subject to correction by the court. Id. at 13a.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

A. The 1994 amendments to Section 330 removed "the debtor's attorney" from the list of eligible individuals entitled to receive compensation. The current version of Section 330 thus contains no statutory authority to use estate funds to compensate a chapter 7 debtor's attorney. The judgment of the court of appeals therefore must be affirmed unless petitioner meets the heavy burden of showing that the omission of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from the statute is unquestionably a scrivener's error that produces absurd results.

B. Petitioner fails to demonstrate beyond question that Congress's omission was an accident, much less one that, if not corrected, would produce results that Congress could not have rationally intended. The statutory context indicates that Congress purposefully omitted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from Section 330. The omission is the most direct and obvious means to eliminate the authority to pay debtors' attorneys out of estate funds held for the benefit of creditors. Moreover, while the 1994 amendments to 11 U.S.C. 330(a) (1988) omitted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney," the amendments enacted a new provision authorizing only attorneys for individual chapter 12 or 13 debtors to be paid fees from the estate. 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B). Congress's simultaneous denial of similar authorization for attorneys for chapter 7 debtors reflects deliberate action on the part of Congress.

C. The legislative history also is consistent with the conclusion that Congress intentionally omitted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from Section 330(a)(1). The phrase was deleted in the same amendment that added the authorization in Section 330(a)(4)(B) for estate fees to be paid solely to attorneys for chapter 12 or 13 debtors. Furthermore, the members of Congress had over five months before final enactment in which to read and consider the text of the Senate bill that had deleted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from Section 330(a). In that intervening period, the deletion of the phrase was brought to the attention of Congress by an organization of debtors' attorneys who expressed no objection to the deletion, and Congress thereafter left the provision unchanged.

D. Enforcing the statute as written serves legitimate and substantial policy objectives. Unlike proceedings under chapters 11, 12, and 13, in which the debtor is responsible for developing repayment plans for the benefit of creditors, a proceeding under chapter 7 involves liquidation of the estate by a trustee. 11 U.S.C. 704. Chapter 7 is a zero-sum game in which any funds diverted from the estate to pay attorneys reduce the amount of funds available to pay creditors. Congress therefore quite rationally could have determined to preserve chapter 7 estate funds for the benefit of creditors.

At the same time, denial of estate funds to pay a chapter 7 debtor's attorney is entirely consistent with the orderly administration and liquidation of chapter 7 estates. Such denial does not affect the 96% of all chapter 7 cases in which there are no funds available in the estate to pay counsel (or creditors, for that matter). Moreover, where funds are available, the Code gives the trustee the power to seek court approval to hire counsel, including the debtor's counsel, where appropriate and in the best interest of the estate. 11 U.S.C. 327(a) and (e). Chapter 7 debtors play very little role in the administration of the estate and are therefore given no similar statutory authority to retain counsel to assist the administration of the estate. Finally, regardless of the size of the estate, a chapter 7 debtor who retains counsel for the debtor's personal benefit may compensate counsel by giving counsel a pre-petition flat fee, by using his post-petition income, or both. For those reasons, the United States Trustees, who are charged with supervising the administration of bankruptcy cases, 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3), view enforcing Section 330(a)(1) as written as furthering the proper administration of chapter 7 estates.

ARGUMENT

SECTION 330 DOES NOT AUTHORIZE THE USE OF ESTATE FUNDS TO COMPENSATE A CHAPTER 7 DEBTOR'S ATTORNEY

The court of appeals correctly concluded that Section 330(a)(1) is plain on its face in not authorizing compensation to the debtor's attorney in a chapter 7 case. The statutory context, history, and purposes are consistent with the view that Congress intentionally omitted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from the statute. Finally, because the statute as written creates a sensible statutory scheme, there is no warrant for petitioner's claim that the Court should rewrite the Code.

A. The Plain Text Of Section 330(a)(1) Does Not Authorize Estate Funds To Be Paid To A Chapter 7 Debtor's Attorney

1. The assets of a chapter 7 estate must be distributed pursuant to the priority provisions of the Code. 11 U.S.C. 503, 507, 726. The Code gives priority to administrative expenses, 11 U.S.C. 507(a)(1), and permits "compensation and reimbursement awarded under section 330(a)" to be treated as an administrative expense, 11 U.S.C. 503(b)(2). In re Milwaukee Engraving Co., 219 F.3d 635, 636-637 (7th Cir. 2000); F/S Airlease II, Inc. v. Simon, 844 F.2d 99, 108-109 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 852 (1988). Petitioner in this case sought such priority treatment in applying for compensation out of the funds of the chapter 7 estate under Section 330(a) for services performed during the chapter 7 proceeding. Pet. App. 2a.

The 1994 amendments to Section 330(a), however, compel the conclusion that the Code does not authorize estate funds to be awarded to a chapter 7 debtor's attorney. As originally enacted in the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, Section 330(a), entitled "Compensation of officers," provided that:

> After notice to any parties in interest and to the United States trustee and a hearing, and subject to sections 326, 328, and 329 of this title, the court may award to a trustee, to an examiner, to a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103 of this title, or to the debtor's attorney—
> (1) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by such trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney, as the case may be, and by any paraprofessional persons > employed by such trustee, professional person, or attorney, as the case may be, based on the time, the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, and the cost of comparable services, other than in a case under this title; and

> (2) reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses.

Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-598, § 330, 92 Stat. 2564 (11 U.S.C. 330(a) (1988)) (emphasis added). In the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, Congress substantially revised Section 330(a) to provide in relevant part:

> (a)(1) After notice to the parties in interest and the United States Trustee and a hearing, and subject to sections 326, 328, and 329, the court may award to a trustee, an examiner, a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103—
>
> (A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney and by any paraprofessional person employed by any such person; and
>
> (B) reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses.
>
> * * * * *
> (4) * * * (B) In a chapter 12 or chapter 13 case in which the debtor is an individual, the court may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case > based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section.

Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-394, § 224, 108 Stat. 4130 (11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1) and (4)(B)).

Thus, the prior version of Section 330(a) authorized compensation to "a trustee, to an examiner, to a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103 of this title, or to the debtor's attorney." By contrast, the statute as revised permits an award of compensation to only "a trustee," "an examiner," and "a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1). Section 330(a)(1) thus unambiguously "excludes attorneys from its catalog of professional officers of a bankruptcy estate who may be compensated for their work." In re Pro-Snax Distribs., Inc., 157 F.3d 414, 425 (5th Cir. 1998). Section 330(a)(1) is accordingly "clear textually on its face" in not providing statutory authority to compensate any debtor's attorney from funds of the estate. In re Am. Steel Prod., Inc., 197 F.3d 1354, 1356 (11th Cir. 1999); In re Century Cleaning Servs., Inc., 195 F.3d 1053, 1061 (9th Cir. 1999) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("The plain language of § 330(a) is not ambiguous: it precludes an award of attorney's fees to Chapter 7 debtors' attorneys from the bankruptcy estate.").

2. Given the complete absence of any statutory authority to compensate a chapter 7 debtor's attorney, petitioner argues that Section 330(a)(1) should be judicially revised to include the phrase "or the debtor's attorney." In petitioner's view (Pet. Br. 16, 28), the absence of that phrase reflects a "scrivener's error" caused by a "slip of the pen" of a drafter who deleted the phrase during the 1994 amendments to Section

330(a). See In re Century Cleaning Servs., Inc., 195 F.3d at 1060 (Reinhardt, J.). What petitioner requests, however, "is not a construction of a statute, but, in effect, an enlargement of it by the court, so that what was omitted, presumably by inadvertence, may be included within its scope." Iselin v. United States, 270 U.S. 245, 251 (1926). This Court, however, does not have "carte blanche to redraft statutes in an effort to achieve that which Congress is perceived to have failed to do." United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84, 95 (1985). "There is a basic difference between filling a gap left by Congress' silence and rewriting rules that Congress has affirmatively and specifically enacted." Ibid. (quoting Mobil Oil Corp. v. Higginbotham, 436 U.S. 618, 625 (1978)). That conclusion is compelled out of "deference to the supremacy of the Legislature, as well as recognition that Congressman typically vote on the language of a bill." Ibid.

Accordingly, when "the statute's language is plain, 'the sole function of the courts—at least where the disposition required by the text is not absurd—'is to enforce it according to its terms.'" Hartford Underwriters Ins. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1, 6 (2000) (quoting United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 241 (1989)). In other words, when the "result the text produces is not necessarily absurd, [it] cannot be dismissed as an obvious drafting error." Chan v. Korean Air Lines, Ltd., 490 U.S. 122, 134 (1989); see Union Bank v. Wolas, 502 U.S. 151, 163 (1991) (Scalia, J., concurring) (A scrivener's error is one that "produc[es] an absurd result.").

This Court found a scrivener's error subject to judicial correction in United States National Bank v. Independent Insurance Agents of America, Inc., 508 U.S. 439 (1993). In that decision, the Court disregarded quotation marks appearing in the Act of Sept. 7, 1916, ch. 461, 39 Stat. 753, and held that "the placement of the quotation marks in the 1916 Act was a simple scrivener's error, a mistake made by someone unfamiliar with the law's object and design." 508 U.S. at 462. The Court invoked the settled rule permitting courts to "disregard the punctuation, or repunctuate, if need be, to render the true meaning of the statute." Ibid. (quoting Hammock v. Loan & Trust Co., 105 U.S. 77, 84-85 (1881)). The Court also found that, based on "overwhelming evidence from the structure, language, and subject matter of the 1916 Act," "[t]he true meaning of the 1916 Act is clear beyond question." Ibid. (emphasis added).

Petitioner here requests a significant extension of that decision. Petitioner seeks not to repunctuate the statute, or, indeed, to interpret any particular statutory text. Rather, he seeks to insert an entire phrase that is conspicuously missing from the Code in order to create a substantive authorization for chapter 7 debtors' attorneys to be given priority over creditors in the distribution of estate assets. Accordingly, even if there were some basis for petitioner's claim of a drafting error in removing the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" —which there is not—the relief petitioner seeks would be impermissible. As this Court stated in Iselin, 270 U.S. at 251, "[t]o supply omissions transcends the judicial function." See also United States v. Granderson, 511 U.S. 39, 68 (1994) (Kennedy, J., concurring) ("It is beyond our province to rescue Congress from its drafting errors, and to provide for what we might think * * * is the preferred result."). In her concurring opinion in Director, Office of Workers' Compensation Programs v. Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., 514 U.S. 122, 142 (1995), Justice Ginsburg similarly observed that "[c]orrecting a scrivener's error is within this Court's competence, see, e.g., [United States Nat'l Bank, supra], but only Congress can correct larger oversights of the kind presented by the OWCP Director's petition," i.e., Congress's failure to confer standing on the Director when it amended the statute at issue.

There is particular reason for the Court to hesitate here before embarking on the judicial creation of a substantive right for all debtors' attorneys to seek compensation from the bankruptcy estate. Congress has shown considerable willingness to amend the Bankruptcy Code in order to correct perceived flaws or achieve policy goals, and in fact has done so many times since 1994 without choosing to insert language authorizing the use of chapter 7 estates to pay debtors' lawyers.[2]

Indeed, far from acting to authorize such payments, Congress has specifically declined to pass three bills that would have added the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" to Section 330(a)(1). H.R. 120, 105th Cong., 1st Sess. § 7 (Jan. 7, 1997); H.R. 764, 105th Cong., 1st Sess. § 7 (Nov. 13, 1997); S. 1559, 104th Cong., 2d Sess. § 4 (Aug. 2, 1996). Similarly, the current bankruptcy reform bill passed by the House would amend Section 330(a)(1) without reinserting the phrase "or the debtor's attorney." H.R. 975, 108th Cong., 1st Sess.

§§ 332(b), 333 (Mar. 19, 2003); 149 Cong. Rec. D258, D262 (daily ed. Mar. 19, 2003). In short, "[t]he current version of § 330(a) has been in force now for eight years and Congress has not elected to recognize that it made a scrivener's error when it amended the statute in 1994." Pet. App. 9a. While such subsequent legislative history may be a suspect interpretive tool in other contexts, it is a significant obstacle to petitioner's ability to carry the burden of showing that the text of Section 330(a) can only be explained as a scrivener's error. Accordingly, at least in the absence of "overwhelming evidence" demonstrating "beyond question" (United States Nat'l Bank, 508 U.S. at 462) that Congress could not have intended to remove the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from Section 330(a), the statutory text must be enforced as written.

B. The Statutory Context Is Consistent With Congress's Intentional Deletion Of The Phrase "Or The Debtor's Attorney"

1. The starting point in discerning congressional intent is, of course, the text of the statute. Hughes Aircraft Co. v. Jacobson, 525 U.S. 432, 438 (1999); Schreiber v. Burlington N., Inc., 472 U.S. 1, 5 (1985). "[I]n interpreting a statute a court should always turn first to one, cardinal canon before all others. * * * [C]ourts must presume that a legislature says in a statute what it means and means in a statute what it says there." Connecticut Nat'l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253-254 (1992). That presumption should apply in this case. The most efficient and direct way to eliminate compensation for debtors' attorneys was the precise course that Congress chose here, i.e., the deletion of "the debtor's attorney" from the list of eligible officers entitled to receive compensation under Section

330(a)(1). "[B]y deleting 'to the debtor's attorney' from the statute, Congress has clearly indicated that the debtor's attorney may not be compensated from the estate." In re Pro-Snax Distribs., Inc., 157 F.3d at 425.

Petitioner contends (Pet. Br. 4, 17, 20, 25) that the omission of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" reflects a scrivener's error because, while Section 330(a)(1) excludes the debtor's attorney from the list of eligible officers entitled to receive compensation, Section 330(a)(1)(A) permits an award of "reasonable compensation for * * * services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney." The most logical explanation for the "attorney" reference, however, is that Congress failed to make corresponding changes to the parts of Section 330(a)(1)(A) that were affected by Congress's deliberate removal of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from Section 330(a)(1). Cf. Chickasaw Nation v. United States, 534 U.S. 84, 94 (2001) ("The canon requiring a court to give effect to each word 'if possible' is sometimes offset by the canon that permits a court to reject words 'as surplusage' if 'inadvertently inserted or if repugnant to the rest of the statute.'") (quoting Karl Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition 525 (1960)). Making that corresponding change might have resulted in a cleaner text, but the fact remains that omitting the critical, operative reference to "the debtor's attorney" was the most direct and efficient way to implement the change.

More importantly, the reference to "attorney" in Section 330(a)(1)(A) does not render the statute unenforceable as written. As discussed, Section 330(a)(1) permits the court to award fees to "a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1). The Code expressly contemplates that the phrase "a professional person" encompasses an attorney employed by the trustee under Section 327 or by chapter 11 creditor committees under Section 1103. 11 U.S.C. 327, 328(c), 1103. Accordingly, as the court of appeals explained, the phrase "a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103 could be the antecedent to 'attorney' as used in § 330(a)(1)(A), because the Trustee is authorized to hire an attorney as a professional person." Pet. App. 8a (citation omitted). Although "the reference in § 330(a)(1)(A) to 'attorney' may be superfluous," id. at 9a, it is not "necessarily absurd," Chan v. Korean Air Lines, Ltd., 490 U.S. at 134, and therefore does not justify judicial reinsertion of language that Congress unambiguously omitted.[3]

For similar reasons, petitioner errs in relying (Pet. Br. 4, 14, 20) on the fact that Section 330(a)(1) contains a grammatical error: there is a missing "or" between the phrases "an examiner" and "a professional person." The omission of a conjunction, however, "is an oversight that is as consistent with the deliberate deletion of the words 'debtor's attorney' as it is with the inadvertent deletion of those words from that section." Pet. App. 9a. The absence of a conjunction also does not affect the substance or application of the text because "[the] omission does not change the meaning of the words around it." In re Pro-Snax Distribs., Inc., 157 F.3d at [3] Petitioner mistakenly suggests (Pet. Br. 18-19) that the reference to "attorney" in Section 330(a)(1)(A) "literal[ly]" authorizes an award of fees to a chapter 7 debtor's attorney. As petitioner elsewhere concedes (Pet. Br. 4), Section 330(a)(1)(A) merely lists "parties that provide compensable services" (including paraprofessional persons), while Section 330(a)(1) "identifies persons who may be paid compensation." Thus, only persons who are included in the latter provision may be awarded compensation from the estate; chapter 7 debtors' attorneys are notably absent from that provision.

425 n.14. "Indeed, all that the omission would signify to a reader unfamiliar with the pre-1994 statute is the typographical deletion of 'or' before the phrase 'a professional person.'" Ibid. Such a missing conjunction is not uncommon. The United States Code is replete with such instances.[4]

2. The structure of Section 330(a) is also consistent with Congress's intentional exclusion of the previously existing authority to compensate a chapter 7 debtor's attorney. At the same time that Congress enacted Section 330(a)(1) to limit fee awards to trustees, examiners, and professional persons employed under Sections 327 and 1103, Congress added Section 330(a)(4)(B) to authorize compensation to a limited class of debtor's attorneys. Section 330(a)(4)(B) provides that "[i]n a chapter 12 or 13 case in which the debtor is an individual, the court may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in [Section 330(a)]." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B) (emphasis added).[5]

If Congress had intended to permit compensation for chapter 7 debtors' attorneys, it naturally would have included them in Section 330(a)(4)(B), which "allow[s]" a court to award fees to a debtor's attorney, but only in cases under chapters 12 and 13. "Thus, although Chapter 12 and Chapter 13 debtors' attorneys were also affected by the amendment to § 330(a), Congress specifically added a mechanism providing for their compensation." In re Century Cleaning Servs., Inc., 195 F.3d at 1062 (Thomas, J., dissenting). "The inclusion of Chapter 12 and Chapter 13 debtors' attorneys in a new section of the statute, coupled with the omission of 'debtor's attorney' from the general section, lends support to the conclusion that the choice was deliberate under the statutory construction principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius." Ibid.

Petitioner is also wrong in arguing (Pet. Br. 23) that Section 330(a) necessarily contemplates compensation to all debtors' attorneys because Section 330(a)(4)(B) permits the compensation of attorneys for chapter 12 and 13 debtors under a standard that is an "exception" to the general standards set forth in Section 330(a)(4)(A). The authority to compensate those attorneys does not depend on an interpretation of the statute that would authorize compensation of all debtors' attorneys. Section 330(a)(4)(B) itself authorizes estate funds to be awarded to attorneys for chapter 12 and 13 debtors by providing that the court "may allow" reasonable compensation to those attorneys based on a consideration of the benefit to the chapter 12 or 13 debtor and "the other factors set forth in this section." Section 330(a)(4)(B) also by its own terms makes applicable to requests for compensation by chapter 12 and 13 debtors' attorneys the factors that the court considers in awarding fees to those seeking compensation under 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1), i.e., trustees, examiners, and professional persons employed under Sections 327 and 1103.

[5] Chapter 13 allows individuals with regular income to satisfy their debts through a repayment plan. 11 U.S.C. 1301 et seq. Chapter 12 similarly allows family farmers with regular annual income to satisfy their debts through a repayment plan. 11 U.S.C. 1201 et seq.

Among those factors is the prohibition in Section 330(a)(4)(A) that bars compensation if the services were not "reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate" or "necessary to the administration of the case." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(A)(ii). Thus, the "[e]xcept as provided in subparagraph (B)" clause at the beginning of Section 330(a)(4)(A) authorizes the court to award fees to a chapter 12 or 13 debtor's attorney under "subparagraph (B)," even where the services do not benefit the estate, as long as the services benefit the debtor. That reading is consistent with the provision's history, which shows that Section 330(a)(4) was derived from a previous version of S. 540, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993), which, before it was limited to chapter 12 and 13 debtors, would have provided that, "[i]n a case in which the debtor is an individual, the court shall allow reasonable compensation for services by the debtor's attorney representing the interests of the debtor without regard to the benefit of such services to the estate." 140 Cong. Rec. S4416 (daily ed. Apr. 19, 1994); see p. 24, infra. Accordingly, construing Section 330(a) in accordance with its text yields no interpretive difficulties and is consistent with the legislative evolution of the 1994 amendments.

Petitioner similarly errs in arguing (Pet. Br. 24) that, because Section 330(a)(4)(B) applies when the attorney represents the chapter 12 or 13 debtor, there must be some other authorization in Section 330(a)(1) to compensate such an attorney when he "represent[s] the interests of the debtor's estate." Trustees, not chapter 7 debtors or debtors' attorneys, represent the estate. 11 U.S.C. 323(a). Section 330(a)(4)(B) moreover permits a chapter 12 or 13 debtor's attorney to be compensated for representing the debtor when his services benefit the debtor as well as the estate. 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B). Such a benefit typically occurs in chapter 12 and 13 under which the debtor proposes a repayment plan and remains in possession of all property of the estate. 11 U.S.C. 1203, 1207(b), 1221, 1303, 1304, 1306(b), 1321. No similar circumstances are present under chapter 7. See pp. 35-36, infra.

3. Petitioner's reading of Section 330(a)(1) should also be rejected because it would circumvent a specific provision in the Code that addresses the circumstances under which the debtor's attorney may be compensated for services that benefit the estate. As discussed, Section 330(a)(1) permits a court to award compensation to individuals, including attorneys, retained by the trustee as professional persons under Section 327. 11 U.S.C. 327, 328(c), 330(a)(1). In particular, Section 327(e) permits "[t]he trustee, with the court's approval, [to] employ, for a specified special purpose, other than to represent the trustee in conducting the case, an attorney that has represented the debtor, if in the best interest of the estate, and if such an attorney does not represent or hold any interest adverse to the debtor or to the estate with respect to the matter on which such attorney is to be employed." 11 U.S.C. 327(e). Section 327(e) thus explicitly entrusts the trustee, a fiduciary who represents the estate on behalf of creditors (11 U.S.C. 323(a); Mosser v. Darrow, 341 U.S. 267, 271 (1951)), with the responsibility of determining when to hire a former debtor's counsel, and the Code permits such retention only if a court concludes that counsel does not have a conflict of interest and his services serve a special purpose and further the best interests of the estate.[6]

Under petitioner's reading of the statute, however, a chapter 7 debtor's counsel would be able to bypass altogether the provisions of Section 327(e) while still obtaining compensation from the estate. Petitioner freely admits (Pet. Br. 32) that Section 327 is unsatisfactory from his perspective, because retention under Section 327 is "sufficiently uncertain—including because the choice would be left to the trustee and because the debtor's counsel may be deemed to have a preclusive conflict of interest." This Court should reject an interpretation that would usurp the trustee's authority under Section 327(e) to determine whether counsel's services are necessary, and that would permit counsel with a conflict to seek compensation under Section 330(a).[7]

[6] In the United States Trustees' experience, trustees usually retain special counsel to litigate claims made against and on behalf of the estate. See also David Tatge et al., Chapter 7 Bankruptcy Trustee's Manual § 4.28 (1993).

[7] As discussed, the Code expressly permits chapter 12 and 13 debtors' counsel to seek fees from the estate. Moreover, because chapter 12 and 13 debtors remain in possession of the estate, see p. 20, supra, and chapter 12 and 13 trustees do not collect and reduce to money the property of the estate, 11 U.S.C. 1202(b)(1) and 1302(b)(1), counsel's services for the chapter 12 and 13 debtor with respect to claims made against and on behalf of the estate would not usurp the trustee's role under Section 327(e).

4. Petitioner also relies (Pet. Br. 24-25) on Section 330(a)(5)'s direction to courts to reduce a final award of professional fees by any interim compensation awarded under 11 U.S.C. 331, which provides for interim compensation to, inter alia, "a debtor's attorney." Petitioner's argument lacks merit. Section 331 provides that various persons, including "a debtor's attorney," "may apply to the court * * * for such compensation for services * * * or reimbursement for expenses * * * as is provided under section 330 of this title." 11 U.S.C. 331 (emphasis added). The authority to award interim compensation under Section 331 is thus expressly tied to the authority of the court to award final compensation under Section 330. Read together, Sections 330(a)(5) and 331 provide that debtors' attorneys who are authorized under Section 330 to seek compensation, i.e., attorneys for debtors in chapter 12 and 13, may seek an interim award of fees to be credited in the final award of compensation. That straightforward result provides no support for petitioner's counter-textual interpretation of the statute.

C. The Legislative History Is Consistent With An Intentional Deletion Of The Phrase "Or The Debtor's Attorney"

Petitioner places heavy reliance (Pet. Br. 18, 25-30) on the legislative history of the 1994 amendments to Section 330 in attempting to show that Congress inadvertently deleted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from the statute. The history, however, is consistent with an intentional deletion of the phrase, and thus does not demonstrate "beyond question" (United States Nat'l Bank, 508 U.S. at 462) that the deletion was inadvertent.

1. The revised version of Section 330 originated as Section 309 of a Senate bill, S. 540, 103d Cong., 1st Sess., which was introduced in the Senate on March 10, 1993, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. 139 Cong. Rec. S2610, S2621-2622 (daily ed. Mar. 10, 1993). Section 309 originally did not diminish the existing right of any debtor's attorney to seek fees but, inter alia, deleted the phrase "of this title" from the original 1978 Act and added new language requiring consideration of the views of the United States Trustees:

> Section 309. Professional Fees.
>
> Section 330(a) of title 11, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:
>
> "(a)(1) After notice to the parties in interest and the United States trustee and a hearing, and subject to sections 326, 328, and 329, the court may award to a trustee, an examiner, a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103, or the debtor's attorney, after considering comments and objections submitted by the United States Trustee in conformance with guidelines adopted by the Executive Office for United States Trustees pursuant to section 586(a)(3)(A) of title 28—
>
> (A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney and by any paraprofessional person employed by any such person; and
> (B) reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses.

139 Cong. Rec. at S2621-S2622. That version of the bill also set forth new criteria for awarding compensation in a new provision, Section 330(a)(2), and added another provision, Section 330(a)(3), which provided that "[t]he court shall not allow compensation for duplication of services or for services that are not either reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate or necessary in the administration of the case." Id. at S2622.

On October 28, 1993, the Judiciary Committee reported S. 540 to the Senate with a new provision, Section 330(a)(3)(B), which would have provided that, "[i]n a case in which the debtor is an individual, the court shall allow reasonable compensation for services by the debtor's attorney representing the interests of the debtor without regard to the benefit of such services to the estate." S. 540, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) (emphasis added); 139 Cong. Rec. S14,625 (daily ed. Oct. 28, 1993).

On April 19, 1994, S. 540 was brought before the Senate for debate. 140 Cong. Rec. at S4405, S4415-4416. On April 20, 1994, the day before the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" was deleted from the bill, Senator Heflin explained that Section 309 of S. 540 was being revised in order to encourage debtors to file for bankruptcy protection under chapter 13:

> During the course of our hearings, it became very apparent that chapter 13 is often the best overall process for debtors, creditors, and the national economy. Numerous bankruptcy judges have indicated that most individuals want to pay their debts in a manner similar to the program offered under chapter 13 of this code. Unfortunately, the use of this chapter is not widespread throughout the country, and many people are simply not informed that this > option is available when they seek the Bankruptcy Code's protection. This title contains many provisions that take into account these concerns.

140 Cong. Rec. S4507 (daily ed. Apr. 20, 1994); accord id. at S4505, S4506.

The following day, Senator Heflin, on behalf of Senator Metzenbaum, introduced Amendment No. 1645, which revised Section 330 with language identical to that ultimately adopted by Congress later that year. 140 Cong. Rec. S4741-S4742 (daily ed. Apr. 21, 1994); id. at S4646. The Senate unanimously passed the bill the same day. Id. at S4666, D418.

Amendment No. 1645 is consistent with deliberate action by Congress in important respects. The amendment both deleted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from the committee's version of Section 330(a)(1) and simultaneously authorized in Section 330(a)(4)(B) compensation solely to attorneys for chapter 12 and 13 debtors. 140 Cong. Rec. at S4741-S4742. Not only is petitioner factually wrong in asserting (Pet. Br. 25) that the 1994 amendments to Section 330 contained no "substantive" change, but rather, "the fact that Congress carefully reexamined and entirely rewrote the * * * provision * * * supports the conclusion that the text * * * as enacted reflects the deliberate choice of Congress." Union Bank v. Wolas, 502 U.S. at 160.

Other features of the amendment also signal a deliberate intent to preclude chapter 7 debtors' attorneys from seeking compensation out of estate funds. In addition to deleting the authority to compensate all debtors' attorneys from Section 330(a)(1), the amendment accomplished a similar result by deleting the language in the committee's version of the bill that would have authorized compensation for any individual debtor's attorney, including an individual chapter 7 debtor's attorney, when the services were necessary and beneficial to the debtor. In light of the concerns expressed by Senator Heflin, Amendment No. 1645 replaced the committee's language with a new provision, Section 330(a)(4)(B), which authorized compensation solely to attorneys for individual debtors in chapters 12 and 13. That elimination of authority to compensate attorneys for individual chapter 7 debtors was undoubtedly intentional, and it supports the conclusion that Congress acted with similar intent in deleting the authority to compensate such debtors' attorneys in Section 330(a)(1).

Likewise, the deletion of the phrase "or the debtors' attorney" from Section 330(a) comports with the view of the amendment's sponsor, Senator Metzenbaum, that "chapter 13 is often the best overall process for debtors, creditors, and the national economy," 140 Cong. Rec. at S4507, presumably because chapter 13 enlarges the sources of repayment to creditors by drawing upon post-petition income to fund a repayment plan, 11 U.S.C. 1321-1328. By making available estate funds to compensate only chapter 12 and 13 debtors' attorneys, the 1994 amendments provided an incentive for debtors' attorneys to educate their clients about the potential advantages to the debtor of a chapter 13 bankruptcy petition, rather than a chapter 7 liquidation. Given the concern that "[u]nfortunately, the use of this chapter [13] is not widespread throughout the country, and many people are simply not informed that this option is available when they seek the Bankruptcy Code's protection," 140 Cong. Rec. at S4507, Congress rationally could have sought to remedy this perceived problem and to encourage the use of chapter 13 by precluding debtors' attorneys from seeking compensation from chapter 7 estates.

2. The events following the Senate's passage of Amendment No. 1645 further suggest that the members of Congress were aware of the text of the legislation that they enacted. As an initial matter, the members of Congress had over five additional months to read and consider Amendment No. 1645 before final passage of the legislation as H.R. 5116 by the House on October 5, 1994 (140 Cong. Rec. at H10,917), and by the Senate on October 6, 1994 (id. at S14,461).[8] During that intervening period, moreover, the deletion of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" was specifically brought to Congress's attention.

On August 17, 1994, three months after the Senate passed Amendment No. 1645, the House Subcommittee on Economic and Commercial Law held hearings on bankruptcy reform. Among the written materials submitted to the committee for the hearing was a statement by National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys (NACBA). The NACBA is "the only national association of attorneys organized for the specific purpose of protecting the rights of consumer bankruptcy debtors," NACBA Pet. Am. Br. 2, a class that comprises approximately 98% of all chapter 7 debtors <http://www.uscourts.gov/Press_Releases/cy02. pdf (table F-2)>. In analyzing S. 540, the NACBA informed the members of the Committee that the provision regarding professional fees > appears to have some minor drafting errors, including the apparently inadvertent removal of debtors' attorneys from the list of professionals whose compensation awards are covered by section 330(a).

[8] Although the House held hearings on bankruptcy reform in August 1994, no bankruptcy reform bill was apparently formally introduced in the House until September 28, 1994, when H.R. 5116 was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without any amendment to Section 330. 140 Cong. Rec. D1153, D1155 (daily ed. Sept. 28, 1994); id. at H10,006. The House Committee on the Judiciary reported H.R. 5116 to the House on October 4, also without amendment to Section 330. 140 Cong. Rec. at H10,726. The same day H.R. 5116 was amended to include, among other things, a revised Section 330 with language conforming to S. 540 as passed by the Senate. Id. at H10,752, H10,758-10,759.

> NACBA does not oppose this provision, since it contains language ensuring that chapter 12 and 13 individual debtors' attorneys may be awarded compensation for their work in protecting the debtor's interests in a bankruptcy case.

Bankruptcy Reform: Hearing on H.R. 5116 Before the Subcomm. on the Economy and Commercial Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 551 (1994) (emphasis added). "Despite having the specific impact of the Senate bill on Chapter 7 debtors' attorneys called to its attention, the House of Representatives passed House Bill 5116, which included the text of § 330 as passed by the Senate." In re Century Cleaning Servs., Inc., 195 F.3d at 1063 (Thomas, J., dissenting).

The NACBA's testimony is the only direct evidence relating to petitioner's assertion of a scrivener's error, and it is in clear tension with petitioner's theory. It shows that Congress was affirmatively notified of both the deletion of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" and the lack of any objection to the deletion, and Congress passed the statute as written. That sequence of events makes it highly unlikely that the deletion was a mere accident, and the NACBA's outright acquiescence in the provision certainly renders it difficult to conclude that a rational Congress could not have deleted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from the statute. Petitioner's retort is that, even were members of Congress "aware of this snippet, they likely agreed with its conclusion that the omission was inadvertent." Pet. Br. 29. Acceptance of that contention, however, would turn the doctrine of scrivener's error on its head, since it would permit statutory amendment by judicial fiat even where Congress consciously enacts the words of a statute.

3. Petitioner argues (Pet. Br. 14, 18, 25-28) that Congress deleted the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" only as a "last minute" addition to the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, and did so inadvertently when the statute's drafter removed the phrases appearing immediately before and after the phrase "or the debtor's attorney." As demonstrated above, the Senate had engaged in over a year of deliberations leading up to its passage of S. 540 as revised by Amendment No. 1645, i.e. from March 10, 1993 until April 21, 1994. Congress also had an additional five months to review the text of the Senate bill before passage of the final legislation in October 1994 and, in the intervening period, the House was explicitly notified of the omission of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney." See pp. 27-28, supra. Thus, the deletion of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" was the product of a lengthy deliberative process. And in any event, there is no principle of law that deprives a "last minute" statutory change to a bill of its statutory force and effect, or that makes such a change less likely to reflect a deliberate choice by the members of Congress.

Contrary to petitioner's theory, moreover, Amendment No. 1645 made no change to the words that appeared immediately before the phrase "or the debtor's attorney." Rather, the phrase "of this title," which had appeared immediately before the phrase "or to the debtor's attorney" in Section 330 of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, was deleted by the original version of S. 540 that was introduced in the Senate on March 10, 1993, a full year before Amendment No. 1645 removed the phrase "or the debtor's attorney." See p. 23, supra. Nor is it significant that Amendment No. 1645 did delete the phrase that immediately followed the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from the committee version of the bill. That phrase related to an entirely different subject matter—comments, objections, and guidelines by the United States Trustees regarding fee applications—and that phrase was separated from the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" by a comma. It is exceedingly unlikely that the statute's drafters, whose specific intent was to make "improvements and modifications from the initial sections adopted by the committee" (140 Cong. Rec. at S4507), failed to notice that they were deleting the phrase "or the debtor's attorney" from the statute, either at the time of the deletion or during the five months leading up to the final passage of the legislation.

4. Petitioner also relies (Pet. Br. 28-29) on the House Report to H.R. 5116 and post-enactment statements by Senator Metzenbaum remarking that the United States Trustees would develop guidelines for "fee applications" under the 1994 amendments to 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(A). H.R. Rep. No. 835, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 51 (1994); 140 Cong. Rec. S14,597 (daily ed. Oct. 7, 1994) (Sen. Metzenbaum). As an initial matter, the cited House Report related to a bill that contained no changes to Section 330 of the Code, see note 8, supra, and therefore has little bearing on Congress's intent in passing Section 330 as amended. Moreover, nothing in Senator Metzenbaum's statement suggests that chapter 7 debtors' attorneys may receive compensation from the estate. As discussed, Section 330 permits the award of fees to examiners, trustees, and professional persons, as well as chapter 12 and 13 debtors' attorneys, all of whom must submit "fee applications" subject to the United States Trustees' Guidelines. See 28 C.F.R. Pt. 58, App. A.

Senator Metzenbaum's statements also refute the notion that Congress intended the 1994 amendments to "increase the compensation paid to counsel," as suggested by petitioner (Pet. Br. 3). In fact, Senator Metzenbaum commented that, "throughout the process of crafting a viable bankruptcy reform proposal, I have reiterated that there is one problem in particular that we must fix—professional fees in bankruptcy." 140 Cong. Rec. at S14,597. The Senator explained that earlier hearings had "revealed a number of examples of how lawyers suck the financial life out of companies by charging exorbitant and often unnecessary fees." Ibid. "In light of these abuses," Senator Metzenbaum stated that he was "particularly pleased that [his] proposal relating to professional fees is included in the act." Ibid. In short, neither those statements, nor any other piece of legislative history, shows that Congress unquestionably intended to authorize a chapter 7 debtor's attorney to be awarded fees from the bankruptcy estate.

5. Petitioner also argues (Pet. Br. 14-16, 36-42) that Congress would not have eliminated the rights of any debtor's attorney to seek fees without an affirmative statement by members of Congress in the legislative history. The 1994 amendments to Section 330, however, did not make the seismic shift asserted by petitioner, see pp. 33-35, infra, and the NACBA, the group who presumably would have been affected by the omission of the phrase "or the debtor's attorney," did not oppose the amendments because of the specific grant of authority to chapter 12 and 13 debtors' attorneys to seek fees. In those circumstances, Congress's silence is hardly surprising. Harrison v. PPG Indus., Inc., 446 U.S. 578, 592 (1980) ("[A]lthough the number of actions comprehended by a literal interpretation of [the statute] is no doubt substantial, the number would not appear so large as ineluctably to have provoked comment in Congress.").

Moreover, "it would be a strange canon of statutory construction that would require Congress to state in committee reports or elsewhere in its deliberations that which is obvious on the face of a statute. In ascertaining the meaning of a statute, a court cannot, in the manner of Sherlock Holmes, pursue the theory of the dog that did not bark." Harrison, 446 U.S. at 592; accord Morales v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 504 U.S. 374, 385, n.2 (1992) ("Suffice it to say that legislative history need not confirm the details of changes in the law effected by statutory language before we will interpret that language according to its natural meaning.").

Petitioner similarly argues that the Court should "not read the Bankruptcy Code to erode past bankruptcy practice absent a clear indication that Congress intended such a departure." Pet. Br. 36 (citing Cohen v. de la Cruz, 523 U.S. 213, 221 (1998) (quoting Pennsylvania Dep't of Pub. Welfare v. Davenport, 495 U.S. 552, 563 (1990)). That canon is inapposite here. The Court has invoked that principle to interpret terms in the Bankruptcy Code of 1978 that were unclear on their face or to resolve issues not explicitly addressed by the text. Cohen, 523 U.S. at 221; Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410, 419-420 (1992); Pennsylvania Dep't of Pub. Welfare, 495 U.S. at 563; United States v. Ron Pair Enters., 489 U.S. 235, 245-246 (1989). That principle has never been invoked to reinsert a phrase that Congress specifically struck in an amendment to the Code. Because the omission of "the debtor's attorney" in Section 330(a)(1) is plain on its face in removing the statutory basis for awarding counsel fees to chapter 7 debtors' attorneys, the revised statute is controlling. See Raleigh v. Illinois Dep't of Revenue, 530 U.S. 15, 22 (2000) ("[T]he Code generally incorporates pre-Code practice in the absence of explicit revision.") (emphasis added); Hartford Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1, 10 (2000) ("[P]re-Code practice informs our understanding of the language of the Code, [but] cannot overcome that language. It is a tool of construction, not an extratextual supplement.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted); BFP v. Resolution Trust Corp., 511 U.S. 531, 546 (1994) ("[W]here the meaning of the Bankruptcy Code's text is itself clear, its operation is unimpeded by contrary * * * prior practice.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

D. Enforcing Section 330(a)(1) As Written Furthers Reasonable Policy Objectives

1. Congress's preclusion of fee awards to chapter 7 debtors' attorneys advances legitimate policy goals without adversely affecting the administration of bankruptcy cases, and petitioner's apocryphal allegations to the contrary are without merit. The amendment did not, as petitioner repeatedly suggests (Pet. Br. 5, 14, 15, 19, 30, 36) result in a "profound" or "radical" "sea change" in bankruptcy practice by preventing an award of fees to all debtor's counsel. Such a change presumably would have garnered an objection by the NACBA during the consideration of the 1994 amendments, but no such objection was forthcoming. As discussed, Section 330(a)(4)(B) expressly authorizes a court to award fees to attorneys for chapter 12 and 13 debtors. 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B) (see pp. 17-18, supra). The Code also permits a former debtor's attorney to be awarded fees when he is employed by the trustee, including in a chapter 7 case. 11 U.S.C. 327(e), 330(a)(1) (see p. 20, supra).

In addition, Section 330(a)(1) authorizes compensation to attorneys employed by debtors-in-possession under the reorganization provisions of chapter 11. The Code gives chapter 11 debtors-in-possession "all" statutory powers, rights, and duties of a trustee, except the right to be paid as a trustee. 11 U.S.C. 1107(a); see also 11 U.S.C. 1106. The chapter 11 debtor-in-possession's rights thus include the trustee's right to retain counsel under Section 327 "to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties." 11 U.S.C. 327(a). Indeed, the Code is explicit in providing that an attorney who was retained by a chapter 11 debtor-in-possession before the filing of a petition "is not disqualified from employment under section 327." 11 U.S.C. 1107(b). Counsel who are retained by chapter 11 debtors-in-possession thus have express statutory authority to seek fees from the estate as "a professional person employed under section 327." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1).[9]

[9] Petitioner argues (Pet. Br. 21-22) that an award of fees to counsel for a chapter 11 debtor-in-possession conflicts with an interpretation of the statute that gives "full effect" to the deletion

2. Substantial policy reasons support Congress's choice to exclude attorneys fees in chapter 7 cases, and chapter 11 cases where a trustee has been appointed, while permitting estate funds to be used to pay attorneys for debtors-in-possession under chapter 11 and individual debtors in chapters 12 and 13. Debtors-in-possession in chapter 11, like debtors in chapters 12 and 13, pursue along with creditors the common goal of crafting and adopting a repayment plan to pay creditors from an estate that includes post-petition assets and income. Because only the chapter 11 debtor-in-possession is authorized to propose a plan initially, 11 U.S.C. 1121(a), (b) and (c), its counsel's assistance in developing a plan benefits the creditors who are paid from post-petition income and assets. 11 U.S.C. 1122-1129. The same is true for chapters 12 and 13, under which debtors remain in possession of all property of the estate and have the responsibility to propose post-petition repayment plans. 11 U.S.C. 1203, 1207(b), 1221, 1303, 1304, 1306(b), 1321. Because those chapters include post-petition assets in the pool of potential recovery, Congress rationally could have determined to authorize estate funds to be paid to attorneys for debtors in proceedings under those chapters as compensation for their services in assisting the debtor to develop a repayment plan for the benefit of creditors.

A case under the liquidation provisions of chapter 7 is fundamentally different from cases under chapters 11, of the phrase "the debtor's attorney." Petitioner is mistaken. The Code unambiguously includes attorneys within the category of "professional persons" who may be retained by the trustee, 11 U.S.C. 327(a), or the chapter 11 debtor-in-possession with the same rights and powers of the trustee, 11 U.S.C. 1107, and the Code unambiguously authorizes compensation to such "professional person[s]" in Section 330(a)(1).

12, and 13. A chapter 7 debtor does not administer or control the estate on behalf of creditors. That function is instead performed by the trustee, who is appointed in all chapter 7 cases, 11 U.S.C. 701, and who represents the estate on behalf of creditors, pp. 20-21, supra. Moreover, the chapter 7 debtor does not propose a repayment plan. Rather, he "surrender[s] * * * all property of the estate" to the trustee, 11 U.S.C. 521(4), who liquidates the debtor's nonexempt assets for the benefit of the estate's creditors, 11 U.S.C. 704(1), 726.

Significantly, as discussed, the Code gives a trustee who needs legal assistance in administering or liquidating a chapter 7 estate authority to seek court approval to retain counsel. Section 327(a) thus permits "the trustee, with the court's approval, [to] employ one or more attorneys * * * that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title." 11 U.S.C. 327(a). And Section 327(e) permits the trustee to retain the former debtor's counsel for a special purpose when in the best interest of the estate.

Additionally, every dollar taken from the chapter 7 estate reduces the amount of funds available for creditors. Because the size of a chapter 7 estate is cast in stone as of the date of the filing of the petition, 11 U.S.C. 727(b), chapter 7 is a zero-sum game. Any diversion of funds from a chapter 7 estate to pay for a debtor's personal attorney reduces the amount of estate funds available to pay creditors. In those circumstances, it was reasonable for Congress to prohibit the siphoning of finite assets in chapter 7 cases by preventing chapter 7 debtors from using estate funds to pay the bills of their personal attorneys.

At the same time, the lack of authorization to use estate funds to pay counsel for a chapter 7 debtor does not prevent the debtor from hiring an attorney, as suggested by petitioner (Pet. Br. 2). Quite to the contrary, subject to certain limited exceptions, all assets and income acquired by a chapter 7 individual debtor after the petition is filed belong to the debtor. 11 U.S.C. 541(a)(5) and (6), 726, 727(b). An individual debtor typically will have post-petition funds, particularly his or her salary, that the debtor may use to pay counsel for any post-petition legal services. Similarly, when a corporate chapter 7 debtor is being liquidated, the Code does not restrict the corporation's former shareholders or officers from using their personal funds to pay for legal services in order to further their personal interests.[10]

3. Petitioner argues (Pet. Br. 30-36) that, without access to estate funds, bankruptcy lawyers will be discouraged from representing debtors in performing

[10] Similar policy reasons support the absence of authority to use estate funds to compensate the debtor's counsel in the unusual case where a chapter 11 trustee is appointed "for cause, including fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, or gross mismanagement of the affairs of the debtor by current management" or because the appointment is in "the interest of creditors." 11 U.S.C. 1104(a)(1) and (2). In those circumstances, the debtor loses its powers over the estate, including the sole right under Section 1121(b) to propose an initial reorganization plan and the rights and powers of a trustee under Sections 327(a), 1106, and 1107 to retain professional persons. It is thus entirely appropriate that the debtor should not be in a position to siphon funds from the estate to pay the debtor's attorney—yet that is the result that would be permissible under petitioner's interpretation. As discussed in the text, moreover, the Code does not restrict the use of post-petition earnings by individual debtors, 11 U.S.C. 541(a)(6), and the Code permits the trustee to retain the debtor's counsel under Section 327(e).

their statutorily imposed duties in the over one million chapter 7 cases filed each year. For several reasons, however, it is the experience and considered view of the United States Trustees, whom Congress has charged with supervising the administration of bankruptcy cases (28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)), that enforcing Section 330(a)(1) as written has no appreciable detrimental impact upon the administration of chapter 7 bankruptcy cases.[11]

First, the right to seek chapter 7 debtors' counsel fees from the bankruptcy estate has no practical effect in the overwhelming majority of chapter 7 cases. The data that the United States Trustees maintain on chapter 7 cases in the regions they supervise reveal that 96% of chapter 7 cases closed during 2002, i.e., 1,001,697 of the 1,041,065 chapter 7 cases, had no assets in the estate to pay anything to counsel (or creditors for that matter). Thus, it is only in the remaining 4% of chapter 7 cases—less than 40,000 cases annually—that the amendment limits the ability of the chapter 7 debtor's counsel to seek fees from the estate. In those instances, however, Congress has made the rational choice of preserving those funds for creditors and of requiring the chapter 7 debtor to use non-estate, post-petition funds to pay for counsel if needed, or to comply with the provisions of Section 327(e) that permit retention of the debtor's counsel by the trustee. See pp. 20, 36-37, supra.

---

[11] Chapter 7 filing data maintained by the United States Trustees support the conclusion that enforcing Section 330(a)(1) as written does not unduly discourage chapter 7 filings. In the years 1999 and 2000, chapter 7 filings declined nationally. Those filings declined at a lower rate, however, in the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits, which have enforced the statute as written. In re Pro-Snax Distribs., Inc., 157 F.3d 414 (5th Cir. 1998); In re Am. Steel Prods., Inc., 197 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 1999). Similarly, in 2001, while chapter 7 filings increased nationally, such filings in the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits increased at a higher rate than the national average.

Second, the vast majority of chapter 7 debtors who have retained counsel, both before and after Congress amended Section 330, have paid their attorney a flat fee prior to filing bankruptcy to compensate the attorney for the typical services provided by counsel. Teresa A. Sullivan et al., As We Forgive Our Debtors 23 (1999) ("Because most attorneys insist on being paid in advance, the debtor must find some money for fees and filing before bankruptcy is possible. Some people are literally saving up for their bankruptcies."); Amy L. Good & Dean P. Wyman, Representing Consumer Debtors: Fiduciary Duties of Counsel, Prac. Law., Mar. 1999, at 33 ("Chapter 7 attorneys are generally paid a one-time fee immediately before the filing of the bankruptcy petition."); Stanley B. Bernstein et al. Collier Compensation, Employment and Appointment of Trustees and Professionals in Bankruptcy ¶ 3.02[1], at 3-2 (2001) ("In the majority of [chapter 7] cases, the debtor's counsel will accept an individual or a joint consumer chapter 7 case only after being paid a retainer that covers the 'standard fee' [which Bernstein estimates as between $750 and $850 in 2001] and the cost of filing the petition.").

Those fees routinely compensate counsel for his work in a chapter 7 case, most of which is completed before the petition is filed and the debtor's non-exempt assets become part of the estate under 11 U.S.C. 541. "Proceedings under Chapter 7 differ from cases under other Chapters of the Code in that the bulk of the legal and fact-finding work is done before the petition is filed." Rosemary E. Williams, Bankruptcy Practice

Handbook § 5:1, at 5-4 (2d ed. 2002); accord In re Century Cleaning Servs., Inc., 195 F.3d at 1064 (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("In many Chapter 7 cases, there is little for the debtor's attorney to do after the petition is filed.").

The Code imposes very limited duties on a chapter 7 debtor. The debtor must complete a bankruptcy petition, a schedule of assets and liabilities, a statement of Financial Affairs, and a disclosure of debts secured by real property. 11 U.S.C. 521(1) and (2); Bankr. R. 4002; 11 U.S.C. App. Official Forms 1, 6, 7. Those duties generally may be performed before the debtor files for bankruptcy. The debtor also must cooperate with the trustee, surrender all property of the estate to the trustee, and appear at any discharge hearing. 11 U.S.C. 521(3)-(5); Bankr. R. 4002(2) and (3). Additionally, the debtor must attend an initial meeting of creditors where he may be asked questions to make sure that he accurately reported assets and liabilities on the bankruptcy filings. 11 U.S.C. 341. Thus, where counsel is retained in chapter 7, the attorney typically analyzes the debtor's financial condition, advises the debtor whether to file bankruptcy, prepares schedules for filing, and appears at the initial meeting of creditors. Representing Consumer Debtors, supra, at 40.

Petitioner asserts (Pet. Br. 1) that "[t]he debtor" has a duty to "maximize the value of the estate." The decision cited by petitioner, Louisiana World Exposition v. Federal Insurance Co., 858 F.2d 233, 246 (5th Cir. 1988)), however, involves a chapter 11 debtor-in-possession, which has the duty of a trustee to manage the estate on behalf of creditors, 11 U.S.C. 1106, 1107(a), 1108. That duty has no application to debtors in chapter 7, who have neither the right nor obligation to control or manage the estate. 11 U.S.C. 323(a), 521(4).

For similar reasons, petitioner errs in attempting to show (Pet. Br. 6-7, 30-31) that the services he performed—such as his work in reviewing proofs of claims, in connection with the adversary complaint, and in investigating flood damage to the estate property—are illustrative of essential services by chapter 7 debtors' attorneys. The chapter 7 trustee, not the debtor, reviews proofs of claims, 11 U.S.C. 704(5), reduces to money the property of the estate, 11 U.S.C. 704(1), and acts to preserve the estate's assets, 11 U.S.C. 704(1) and (2). There was thus no need for petitioner to perform those services, which should have been performed by the trustee or counsel retained by the trustee (and subject to the trustee's direction, not the debtor's) under the specific provisions of Section 327.[12]

Based on the limited and generally pre-petition nature of the duties of a chapter 7 debtor, it is the United States Trustees' experience that chapter 7 debtors' counsel routinely receive flat fees before the bankruptcy petition is filed, even in those circuits that allow chapter 7 debtors' counsel to seek fees in "asset" cases (i.e., those relatively few cases in which the chapter 7 estate actually contains some assets for distribution). Indeed, only the most imprudent attorney would fail to secure payment before commencing work for a client who is entering chapter 7. Regardless of the [12] Some of petitioner's services were potentially adverse to the estate's interests. Petitioner observes (Pet. Br. 6), for example, that post-conversion he explained to the debtor, a defunct corporation, how it could attempt to reconvert the case to chapter 11. Petitioner's time records also suggest that he drafted a notice of appeal from the order converting the case to chapter 7. Pet. Br. App. 13a. Petitioner was therefore performing services that apparently were designed to benefit the debtor's equity holders, not the estate that petitioner no longer represented.

outcome of this case, the United States Trustees fully expect debtors' counsel in chapter 7 cases to continue to charge a flat fee in advance for their services, rather than work for free and then face the uncertain prospect of seeking judicial approval for an award of fees from the assets (if any) of the liquidating estate.

Because chapter 7 counsel are already routinely fully paid for their services up front, petitioner also errs (Pet. Br. 35) in predicting that enforcement of the statute as written will encourage enhanced flat fees that would unduly reduce the size of the estate. In any event, the Code already ensures that any pre-petition fee arrangement must be reasonable. Section 329 requires any attorney representing a debtor, whether or not the attorney "applies for compensation," to disclose all fee arrangements made within one year of the petition and to return any payment that "exceeds the reasonable value" of counsel services. 11 U.S.C. 329(a) and (b). The Code similarly prohibits preferential payments to counsel. 11 U.S.C. 547(b); In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246, 250 (3d Cir. 2002); In re First Jersey Secs., Inc., 180 F.3d 504, 508-514 (3d Cir. 1999).[13]

[13] Petitioner notes (Pet. Br. 36 n.7) that some States consider funds that are paid to an attorney for services that have not yet been performed to be potentially refundable to the client. In that instance, such funds may be part of the estate when the petition is filed. 11 U.S.C. 541. Any chapter 7 debtor's attorney who practices in those jurisdictions may nonetheless be compensated out of the debtor's post-petition salary or other income for any post-petition services. As discussed, moreover, most services of the chapter 7 debtor's attorney are typically performed pre-petition, i.e., before the creation of the estate, and an attorney can accordingly be paid reasonable compensation for his pre-petition services.

4. Petitioner also speculates (Pet. Br. 33) that an attorney who represents a chapter 11 debtor-in-possession may find himself ethically compelled to "work[] for free" if the case converts to chapter 7. Conversions, however, form only a very small fraction of chapter 7 cases. Records maintained by the United States Trustees indicate that conversions reflect less than 0.26% of chapter 7 cases. Furthermore, counsel may seek in advance to limit the scope of the representation to his services for the chapter 11 debtor-in-possession as approved by the court under Section 327(a). Cf. Model Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 1.2(c) (2002) ("A lawyer may limit the scope of the representation if the limitation is reasonable under the circumstances and the client gives informed consent."). In any event, there is no reason to think that the chapter 7 debtor's attorney will be saddled with post-petition work in the typical case, see pp. 39-40, supra, and Section 327(e) permits retention of the debtor's counsel as needed.

* * * * *

In sum, the statute as enacted by Congress produces reasonable results that are fully consistent with the proper administration of bankruptcy proceedings. Indeed, the United States Trustees have observed no detrimental effects from the 1994 amendments to Section 330(a) on the administration of bankruptcy cases throughout the country, including in the circuits that have enforced the statute as passed by Congress. In light of the United States Trustees' experience and Congress's refusal over the last eight years to amend Section 330 as urged by petitioner, there is no justification for accepting petitioner's extraordinary request to rewrite the Bankruptcy Code.

APPENDIX

1. Section 327 of Title 11, U.S. Code, provides:

§ 327. Employment of professional persons

(a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, the trustee, with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys, accountants, appraisers, auctioneers, or other professional persons, that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons, to represent or assist the trustee in carrying out the trustee's duties under this title.

(b) If the trustee is authorized to operate the business of the debtor under section 721, 1202, or 1108 of this title, and if the debtor has regularly employed attorneys, accountants, or other professional persons on salary, the trustee may retain or replace such professional persons if necessary in the operation of such business.

(c) In a case under chapter 7, 12, or 11 of this title, a person is not disqualified for employment under this section solely because of such person's employment by or representation of a creditor, unless there is objection by another creditor or the United States trustee, in which case the court shall disapprove such employment if there is an actual conflict of interest.

(d) The court may authorize the trustee to act as attorney or accountant for the estate if such authorization is in the best interest of the estate.

(e) The trustee, with the court's approval, may employ, for a specified special purpose, other than to represent the trustee in conducting the case, an attorney that has represented the debtor, if in the best interest of the estate, and if such attorney does not represent or hold any interest adverse to the debtor or to the estate with respect to the matter on which such attorney is to be employed.

(f) The trustee may not employ a person that has served as an examiner in the case.

2. Section 330 of Title 11, U.S. Code, provides:

§ 330. Compensation of officers

(a)(1) After notice to the parties in interest and the United States Trustee and a hearing, and subject to sections 326, 328, and 329, the court may award to a trustee, an examiner, a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103—

(A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney and by any paraprofessional person employed by any such person; and

(B) reimbursement for actual, necessary expenses.

(2) The court may, on its own motion or on the motion of the United States Trustee, the United States Trustee for the District or Region, the trustee for the estate, or any other party in interest, award compensation that is less than the amount of compensation that is requested.

(3)(A)[1] In determining the amount of reasonable compensation to be awarded, the court shall consider the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors, including—

---

[1] So in original.

(A) the time spent on such services;

(B) the rates charged for such services;

(C) whether the services were necessary to the administration of, or beneficial at the time at which the service was rendered toward the completion of, a case under this title;

(D) whether the services were performed within a reasonable amount of time commensurate with the complexity, importance, and nature of the problem, issue, or task addressed; and

(E) whether the compensation is reasonable based on the customary compensation charged by comparably skilled practitioners in cases other than cases under this title.

(4)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the court shall not allow compensation for—

(i) unnecessary duplication of services; or

(ii) services that were not—

(I) reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate; or

(II) necessary to the administration of the case.

(B) In a chapter 12 or chapter 13 case in which the debtor is an individual, the court may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section.

(5) The court shall reduce the amount of compensation awarded under this section by the amount of any interim compensation awarded under section 331, and, if the amount of such interim compensation exceeds the amount of compensation awarded under this section, may order the return of the excess to the estate.

(6) Any compensation awarded for the preparation of a fee application shall be based on the level and skill reasonably required to prepare the application.

(b)(1) There shall be paid from the filing fee in a case under chapter 7 of this title $45 to the trustee serving in such case, after such trustee's services are rendered.

(2) The Judicial Conference of the United States—

(A) shall prescribe additional fees of the same kind as prescribed under section 1914(b) of title 28; and

(B) may prescribe notice of appearance fees and fees charged against distributions in cases under this title; to pay $15 to trustees serving in cases after such trustees' services are rendered. Beginning 1 year after the date of the enactment of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, such $15 shall be paid in addition to the amount paid under paragraph (1).

(c) Unless the court orders otherwise, in a case under chapter 12 or 13 of this title the compensation paid to the trustee serving in the case shall not be less than $5 per month from any distribution under the plan during the administration of the plan.

(d) In a case in which the United States trustee serves as trustee, the compensation of the trustee under this section shall be paid to the clerk of the bankruptcy court and deposited by the clerk into the United States Trustee System Fund established by section 589a of title 28.

3. Section 331 of Title 11, U.S. Code provides:

§ 331. Interim compensation

A trustee, an examiner, a debtor's attorney, or any professional person employed under section 327 or 1103 of this title may apply to the court not more than once every 120 days after an order for relief in a case under this title, or more often if the court permits, for such compensation for services rendered before the date of such an application or reimbursement for expenses incurred before such date as is provided under section 330 of this title. After notice and a hearing, the court may allow and disburse to such applicant such compensation or reimbursement.

QUESTION PRESENTED

Does 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1) authorize a court to award fees to a debtor’s attorney?

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDINGS BELOW

In the court of appeals, this matter was captioned United States Trustee v. Equipment Services (In re Equipment Services). Equipment Services is a debtor represented by John M. Lamie. Because the issue in this Court is Lamie's right to attorney's fees, and because the United States Trustee objected to the fee award in the proceedings below, they are respectively denominated the petitioner and the respondent in this Court. Equipment Services was identified as a nominal party by the Petition for Certiorari.

OPINIONS BELOW AND JURISDICTION

The opinion of the Fourth Circuit (Pet. App. 1a-14a) is published at 290 F.3d 739. The opinions of the district court (Pet. App. 15a-27a) and bankruptcy court (id. 28a-44a) are unpublished. The court of appeals issued its opinion on May 31, 2002, and denied rehearing en banc on August 5, 2002. This Court granted certiorari on March 10, 2003. RELEVANT STATUTORY PROVISIONS

The relevant statutory provisions are reproduced infra at 1a-5a.

STATEMENT

For more than a century, Congress has authorized bankruptcy courts to use funds of the bankruptcy estate to pay the fees of a debtor's attorney for services that benefit the estate. A divided panel of the Fourth Circuit in this case nonetheless inferred that Congress implicitly reversed course entirely, forbidding such compensation, when it revised and recodified Section 330(a) of the Bankruptcy Code in 1994. The court of appeals rejected the contrary rule endorsed by the leading treatise and adopted by "the majority of courts" (In re Hasset, Ltd., 283 B.R. 376, 381 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2002)), acknowledging that three circuits had reached the opposite conclusion.

1. The Bankruptcy Code imposes an array of duties on a debtor in bankruptcy. For example, the debtor must "file a list of creditors," together with "a schedule of assets and liabilities." 11 U.S.C. 521(1); Bankr. R. 1007(a)(1), (b)(1). The debtor must also take steps to "maximize the value of the estate." La. World Exposition v. Federal Ins. Co., 858 F.2d 233, 246 (CA5 1988) (citing CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 352 (1985)). "In addition," whether the debtor is "in possession" of the estate or instead a trustee has been appointed to represent the estate, the debtor "shall"

> (1) attend and submit to an examination at the times ordered by the court; (2) attend the hearing on a complaint objecting to discharge and testify, if called as a witness; (3) inform the trustee immediately in writing as to the location of real property in which the debtor has an interest and the name and address of every person holding money or property subject to the debtor's withdrawal or order * * *; (4) cooperate with the trustee in the preparation of an inventory, the examination of proofs of claim, and the administration of the estate, and (5) file a statement of any change of the debtor's address.

Bankr. R. 4002 ("Duties of Debtor"). See also 11 U.S.C. 521(3), (4) (providing that debtor must "cooperate with the trustee as necessary to enable the trustee to perform the trustee's duties," including by "surrender[ing] to the trustee all property of the estate and any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, relating to property of the estate"). The debtor must also appear at the meeting of creditors to be examined by the trustee and to be advised of the consequences of the proceedings. Id. § 341; Bankr. R. 2004. These duties remain ongoing during the course of the proceedings.

Although the debtor thus bears substantial responsibilities, a number of which can generally be competently fulfilled only with legal advice, the debtor lacks funds to pay counsel. The debtor's assets are deemed to be the property of the estate (11 U.S.C. 541), which must be "surrender[ed] for distribution * * * at the time of bankruptcy" (Local Loan Co. v. Hunt, 292 U.S. 234, 244 (1934) (emphasis omitted)). Any expenditure by the debtor of those funds without permission of the bankruptcy court is forbidden. 11 U.S.C. 549.

To solve this dilemma, Congress has long permitted the debtor's legal fees to be paid from the debtor's estate to the extent that they benefit the estate or are necessary to the administration of the case. The Code authorizes the debtor to retain counsel. 11 U.S.C. 329(a). The Code addresses the payment of fees to attorneys and other professionals in the provision at issue in this case, Section 330(a). 11 U.S.C. 330(a). Congress enacted this provision to increase the compensation paid to counsel under predecessor provisions of the bankruptcy laws. See 3 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 330.LH, at 330-72 (15th ed. 2002).

Subsection 330(a)(1) authorizes the court to award compensation. Subsection (a)(2) gives the Office of the United States Trustee, a division of the Department of Justice, the right to comment on and object to any fee application. Subsection (a)(3) sets forth extensive criteria for the bankruptcy court to evaluate such an objection, including "the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, taking into account all relevant factors." Subsection (a)(4) affirmatively forbids compensation for "unnecessary duplication of services," as well as for "services that were not (I) reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate; or (II) necessary to the administration of the case." Fees approved under Section 330 are deemed an "administrative expense" payable from the estate on a priority basis. Id. §§ 503(b)(2), 507(a)(1).

Section 503 of the Code contains a separate, more general provision authorizing the use of estate funds to pay for services that benefit the estate. A party such as an attorney may submit "a request for payment of an administrative expense." 11 U.S.C. 503(a). The bankruptcy court, in turn, is directed to allow as legitimate administrative expenses "the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate." Id. § 503(b)(1)(A).

Sections 330 and 503 are relevant only if the attorney is to be compensated from the property of the estate. They are inapposite to the extent the debtor seeks to pay counsel from non-estate funds, as when, prior to the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, the debtor secures counsel and pays the attorney a particular form of retainer. 11 U.S.C. 329(a). If properly framed, and if permitted under the legal ethics rules of the state in question, the retainer is the property of the attorney rather than the property of the estate. The bankruptcy court has substantially less control over such a retainer, which is reviewed not under the searching standards of Section 330(a)(3) and (4), supra, but instead simply for whether it "exceeds the reasonable value of [the attorney's] services" (id. § 329(b)).

2. Congress substantially revised and recodified the fee provisions of Section 330(a) in 1994. The question presented by this case is whether Congress in the 1994 Act implicitly intended to prohibit bankruptcy courts from compensating attorneys even for services beneficial to the estate. The question arises because the statute, as revised, contains an obvious scrivener's error. Section 330(a) contains two conjoined lists that contain irreconcilable references to the debtor's attorney:

> [T]he court may award to a trustee, an examiner, [sic] a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103--(A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney.

11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1)(A) (emphasis added). For ease of reference, we will call the former list (which does not refer to the debtor's attorney and contains a grammatical error by omitting the conjunction "or") the "payees list," because it identifies persons who may be paid compensation. We will call the latter list (which does refer to the attorney) the "providers list," because it identifies the parties that provide compensable services.

Prior to the adoption of the current version of Section 330(a) in 1994, both lists referred to the debtor's attorney. The question presented by this case is whether the omission of the phrase "debtor's attorney" from the payees list in 1994 overcomes the other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code that authorize compensating the debtor's attorney and thus prohibits the payment of fees to the debtor's counsel from the estate, thereby effecting a sea change in bankruptcy law. A divided panel of the Fourth Circuit answered that question in the affirmative. The majority denied that Section 330(a) was at all ambiguous and therefore refused to consider whether the court's holding could be rationalized with other statutory provisions, the purpose of the Code, the legislative history, or past Code practice. The court of appeals thereby parted ways with a majority of courts, which hold that Congress in 1994 did not intend to abrogate the longstanding authority to compensate counsel for services that benefit the bankruptcy estate.

3. Equipment Services, Inc., a mine services company, hired petitioner John M. Lamie, an attorney, to represent the company in its bankruptcy proceedings. Prior to the commencement of the proceedings, the company paid Lamie a $6,000 retainer. Petitioner spent an initial $1,000 to cover the cost of preparing a petition for Chapter 11 reorganization and to pay the $830 filing fee. Petitioner held the remaining $5,000 of the retainer in a client escrow account.

Petitioner filed the petition for relief in December 1998. The bankruptcy court then appointed him counsel for the debtor. Petitioner represented Equipment Services in its Chapter 11 proceeding, earning $1,325 in fees for 10.5 hours of work and incurring $3.85 in expenses. Among other things, petitioner filed an adversary complaint against a creditor relating to equipment held by the debtor in a mine.

When the debtor was unable to secure insurance on the equipment in its custody, the U.S. Trustee successfully moved to have the case converted from a Chapter 11 reorganization to a Chapter 7 liquidation. As in all Chapter 7 cases, the bankruptcy court named a trustee to oversee the liquidation. See 11 U.S.C. 701(a). Over the course of the next several months, petitioner worked a further 8.1 hours on the case (totaling $1,000 in fees), often under order of the court or at the request of the trustee. The U.S. Trustee does not dispute in this Court that petitioner's services were non-duplicative, necessary to the administration of the case, and beneficial to the bankruptcy estate.[1]

For example, on the date the bankruptcy court converted the case to a Chapter 7 proceeding, March 17, 1999, petitioner wrote to the debtor to explain that the conversion had occurred and to discuss steps the debtor potentially could take to reconvert the case to Chapter 11. The bankruptcy court's conversion order also required "the debtor(s) (or Trustee)" to file a report detailing any debts incurred, or property acquired, by the debtor since the bankruptcy filing. App. 15a; 11 U.S.C. 521(1). In this case like many others, the debtor's counsel (here, petitioner) took responsibility for filing the report (App. 17a-18a) because the newly appointed trustee was not familiar with the debtor's assets and liabilities.

Next, in April 1999, petitioner prepared and filed an amendment to the bankruptcy schedules to reflect a claim filed by an additional creditor. App. 19a-21a. He also distributed a required notice of the "Section 341" creditors meeting. App. 22a; see 11 U.S.C. 341. Petitioner appeared with the debtor at the creditors' meeting. See 11 U.S.C. 341(d) (providing that debtor must be available for examination). Soon thereafter, at the request of the trustee, petitioner held a telephone call regarding the status of the equipment held in the mine. See id. § 521(3) (debtor is required to cooperate with trustee).

In December 1999, petitioner appeared at a hearing on the adversary complaint that he had previously filed on behalf of the debtor. Petitioner then wrote to advise the debtor that it was essential to coordinate with the trustee regarding proceedings on the complaint. Petitioner also advised the debtor regarding issues relating to a lien that had the potential to reduce the equipment's value to the estate.

[1] Any properly preserved argument by the U.S. Trustee that petitioner's services were not sufficiently beneficial to qualify for payment under the Code would be left for remand.

In January 2000, petitioner provided the trustee with the adversary complaint, together with an order substituting the trustee as the plaintiff. App. 25a; see 11 U.S.C. 521(4) (duty to provide materials to trustee). At the trustee's request, petitioner coordinated with the creditor's counsel the exchange of witnesses and exhibits regarding a hearing on the complaint. App. 26a.

In March 2000, once again at the trustee's request, petitioner investigated allegations that the equipment in the mine had been damaged by flooding. App. 27a-28a. Based on that investigation, the trustee requested that petitioner attend a meeting between the trustee, the debtor, and an asset-recovery firm regarding the equipment.

4. Since at least the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, Congress has authorized bankruptcy courts to compensate debtors' attorneys from the assets of the estate in both reorganizations and liquidations. In June 2000, petitioner submitted to the bankruptcy court a request to approve the modest $2,325 in fees he had earned, and $3.85 in expenses he had incurred, throughout the case. Respondent U.S. Trustee, however, opposed that portion of the fee request ($1,000) relating to petitioner's work during the Chapter 7 stage. The U.S. Trustee contended that Section 330(a), as revised and recodified in 1994, forbids the bankruptcy court from awarding such fees because, although the providers list refers to the debtor's attorney, the payees list omits the reference to the debtor's attorney that was included in the pre-1994 version of the statute. See supra at 4 (quoting the statute).

The U.S. Trustee did not, however, oppose petitioner's application for the $1,325 in fees for services he provided before the case was converted to Chapter 7. Section 330(a) applies generally to fee requests, including in both Chapter 7 and Chapter 11 cases. Nonetheless, the U.S. Trustee took the view, favorable to petitioner, that several Code provisions in combination authorized petitioner to receive fees during the Chapter 11 proceedings not as a debtor's attorney but instead as a trustee's attorney. A Chapter 11 debtor in possession has the rights of a trustee (id. § 1107(a)), including the right under Section 327 of the Code to hire an attorney (id. § 327(a)). Section 330(a)'s payees list, in turn, authorizes the bankruptcy court to award fees to "a professional person employed under section 327."

The U.S. Trustee also disputed petitioner's alternative argument that, without regard to Section 330(a), he was entitled to be paid all his fees, including the $1,000 for work during the Chapter 7 proceedings, from the $6,000 pre-petition retainer. The U.S. Trustee acknowledged below that certain types of retainers – so-called "general" or "classic" retainers – become the property of the attorney upon payment and thus are not part of the bankruptcy estate. The attorney's receipt of such a retainer is accordingly subject to review by the bankruptcy court under Section 329(b) only to determine if it "exceeds the reasonable value of [the attorney's] services" rather than under the more searching standards of Section 330(a)(3) and (4). But the U.S. Trustee argued that the particular retainer paid by Equipment Services to petitioner in this case did not so qualify, but rather remained the property of the estate because it authorized petitioner to draw upon it only as he performed legal services and furthermore obligated petitioner to return to the debtor any balance remaining at the conclusion of the proceedings.

5. The bankruptcy court agreed with the U.S. Trustee's contention that Section 330(a)(1) does not authorize petitioner to receive payment for the fees he earned during the Chapter 7 proceedings. See Pet. App. 32a-38a. The court acknowledged that its interpretation renders Section 330(a)(1) "arguably internally inconsistent with" the statute's providers list, which authorizes payment for services rendered by "the * * * attorney." Id. 35a. Further, the court acknowledged that "the absence of legislative history and a brief review of the syntax of the statute might indicate that" the absence of "attorneys" from the payees list "was inadvertent." Id. 36a. But the court found it dispositive that "the current version of 330(a)(1) is the result of a deletion by Congress [of the phrase 'or a debtor's attorney' from the payees list] that resulted in a statute which is clearly at odds with its pre-amendment version." Id. 35a.

The bankruptcy court agreed with petitioner, however, that Section 330(a) simply did not govern his fee application because the retainer he had been paid by Equipment Services was his property, not "property of the estate." The court rejected the U.S. Trustee's proposed distinction among types of retainers (Pet. App. 42a), reasoning that "the client cannot retain the benefit of the services being rendered and yet to be rendered by the attorney and at the same time demand a refund of the current unearned balance of the retainer" (id. 38a). On the bankruptcy court's view, "[o]nly to the extent that a balance remains in the retainer after all services have been rendered and fees have been allowed under § 329 does the reversionary interest of the debtor in that balance become property of the bankruptcy estate." Id.

The bankruptcy court recognized "the unsatisfactory potential consequences of a decision which places a premium upon a debtor's attorney obtaining a retainer large enough to cover in advance any and all legal services which might reasonably be contemplated during the entire case." Pet. App. 43a. The refusal to award fees altogether, however, would create > a very powerful disincentive * * * to attorneys to accept Chapter 7 cases in the first place, or to provide anything beyond the most perfunctory required post-petition services to the client in those Chapter 7 cases that were accepted. Particularly in the context of a Chapter 7 corporate debtor without interested, willing, and financially able owners or > affiliates, the likelihood of payment for post-petition services by the debtor's attorney precluded from relying on his retainer for payment would appear to be doubtful at best.

Id. 42a. The bankruptcy court concluded that the retainer Equipment Services had paid to petitioner was reasonable in light of the services he provided (see 11 U.S.C. 329(b)) and accordingly approved the award of all of petitioner's requested fees from it. Pet. App. 43a-44a.

6. The district court affirmed in all respects. Pet. App. 15a-27a. The district court agreed with the bankruptcy court that Section 330(a) does not authorize the award of attorney's fees to a debtor's attorney in light of "the mysterious disappearance from the Bankruptcy Code" of the reference to the debtor's counsel in the payees list. Id. 19a. The court acknowledged that "[n]o principled reason appears in any legislative history for the removal of the crucial words, nor is there a record of any debate of the deletion." Id. 22a. Further, "[t]here are doubtless strong policy reasons for not omitting a chapter 7 debtor's attorney from eligibility for fees paid from the debtor's estate, particularly since § 330 limits compensation to those services 'reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate.'" Id. 24a (quoting 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(A)(ii)(I)). But the court did not deem it "nonsensical" for Congress to have withdrawn the bankruptcy courts' authority to award fees to debtors' attorneys from the property of the estate. Id.

The district court nonetheless agreed with the bankruptcy court that Section 330(a) was irrelevant to this case, and that petitioner was entitled to be paid from the pre-petition retainer he received from Equipment Services, because the retainer was petitioner's property, not property of the estate. The district court reasoned that, although "a chapter 7 debtor's attorney may not be entitled under the Bankruptcy Code to compensation from the estate, the debtor is not prohibited from being represented and until such representation is ended, the debtor–and hence, the debtor's bankruptcy estate–is not entitled to a refund." Pet. App. 26a.

7. On the U.S. Trustee's appeal, a divided panel of the Fourth Circuit affirmed the district court's holding that Section 330(a)(1) forbids compensating debtors' attorneys from estate property, but it reversed the holding that the particular retainer paid by Equipment Services in this case was petitioner's property and thus immune from review under Section 330(a). The court of appeals therefore disallowed payment of the $1,000 petitioner earned during the Chapter 7 proceedings. The court acknowledged that its decision conflicted with rulings of the Second, Third, and Ninth Circuits. Pet. App. 2a, 6a-7a.

a. The Fourth Circuit majority held that "the plain language of the 1994 version of § 330(a)" is "unambiguous and is reasonable in application." Pet. App. 8a-9a. The court did not rest its decision on any literal prohibition against paying the debtor's attorney. Rather, it inferred that Congress so intended in recodifying the statute: "The 1994 version clearly omits the prior authorization to compensate the debtor's attorney from a Chapter 7 estate." Id. Deeming the deletion "plain," the court refused to consider contrary indications of congressional intent: "When a statute is unambiguous, canons of construction prevent us from considering outside sources, such as legislative history, to attempt to discern what Congress may or may not have intended to do." Id. 9a.

The Fourth Circuit separately reversed the lower courts' determination that the retainer received by petitioner was not part of the bankruptcy estate. The court of appeals agreed with petitioner and the U.S. Trustee that retainer agreements can be shaped to become property of the attorney, rather than property of the estate, and thus to avoid the provisions of Section 330(a):

> Retainer agreements can take various forms. For example, a retainer can be paid simply to ensure an > attorney's availability to represent the client, whether or not services are ever performed. Or a retainer can be a prepayment for all future services to be performed, amounting to a flat fee. Under either one of these arrangements, the attorney acquires title to the retainer fee at the time he receives it, regardless of whether he thereafter performs legal services for the client. On the other hand, if the relationship is a trust arrangement in which the attorney holds the retainer for the client as security for the payment of future fees, then the retainer so held, less any fees charged against it, constitutes the property of the client.

Pet. App. 11a (citing Indian Motorcycle Assocs. v. Mass. Housing Finance, 66 F.3d 1246, 1254 (CA1 1995)). But under the particular retainer agreement in this case, the Fourth Circuit concluded that, as a matter of Virginia law, "until [petitioner] earned fees, the account remained the property of Equipment Services so that in the end, if any of the $6,000 remained, [petitioner] would be required to return the balance to Equipment Services." Id. The retainer was accordingly "property of the estate" and could only be used to pay fees consistent with Section 330(a). Id.

b. In dissent, Judge Michael agreed with the panel majority that the retainer was part of the bankruptcy estate but disagreed with its interpretation of Section 330(a)(1). See Pet. App. 13a-14a. He would have adopted the conclusion of the Second, Third, and Ninth Circuits that when Congress revised and recodified "§ 330(a) in 1994, it inadvertently deleted debtors' attorneys from the existing statutory list of those who could be paid from the bankruptcy estate for services rendered in bankruptcy proceedings." Id. 13a. Because the bankruptcy court had only considered the reasonableness of the retainer under Section 329(b), and thus had not applied the more stringent guidelines for awarding fees set out in Section 330(a)(3) and (4), Judge Michael would have "vacate[d] the award of attorney's fees to [petitioner] for his post-Chapter 7 services and * * * remand[ed] for the bankruptcy court to evaluate [petitioner's] fee application under the proper standard." Id. 14a.

8. This Court subsequently granted certiorari to decide the following question: "Does 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)(1) authorize a court to award fees to a debtor's attorney?" Pet. i. Petitioner did not challenge the court of appeals' state-law determination that the particular retainer in this case was property of the estate, rather than of petitioner. Id. 8 n.2. The U.S. Trustee did not cross-petition (see S. Ct. R. 12.5) from so much of the judgment below as authorized petitioner to be paid for his services at the Chapter 11 stage of the proceedings.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The Fourth Circuit reasoned that the "plain language" of the Bankruptcy Code prohibits compensating debtors' attorneys from the funds of the bankruptcy estate because Section 330(a), as revised and recodified in 1994, omits the reference to the debtor's attorney that previously appeared in the statute's payees list. The negative inference drawn by the court of appeals exclusively from that one omission is unsound. It fails to account for the fact that Section 330(a) contains an obvious scrivener's error that renders the statute ambiguous: the payees and providers lists are inextricably intertwined, yet one refers to the debtor's attorney while the other does not. Both cannot be enforced as written. Nor is the failure of the payees list to mention the debtor's attorney dispositive of the power to compensate counsel, for that power can be located in other provisions of the Code as well. For those reasons and others, this Court can properly construe Section 330(a) only by looking beyond the isolated text of the payees list to factors such as the text of the statute as a whole, the animating purposes of federal bankruptcy law, and past practice under the Code.

The text and structure of Section 330(a), as well as other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, demonstrate that the court of appeals erred. Each party named in the providers list refers back to a parallel reference in the payees list. For example, "a trustee" may receive compensation for services by "the trustee." The better view is accordingly that, in retaining the authority in the providers list to pay compensation for the services of "the * * * attorney," Congress in 1994 necessarily assumed that an attorney would receive that compensation. Equally important, the court of appeals' decision cannot be reconciled with two other provisions that Congress added to Section 330(a) in the 1994 Act: subsection (a)(4) sets forth standards for paying the debtor's counsel; and subsection (a)(5) incorporates the power to pay the debtor's counsel interim compensation.

The legislative record furthermore demonstrates that the omission upon which the court of appeals seized was inadvertent, not a purposeful deletion from Section 330(a). The statute was the result of a last-minute amendment to the 1994 Act that, among other things, removed the phrases that appeared both immediately before and immediately after "or the debtor's attorney" in the payees list. Every indication – including from the Act's legislative history and the statement of the amendment's sponsor – is that the drafter made the mistake of striking all the text from the beginning of the first phrase to the end of the second. The inadvertent nature of the omission is confirmed by the fact that the amendment deleted even the conjunction "or," leaving the payees list grammatically incorrect.

The absence of any indication in the legislative record that Congress intended to eliminate the power to compensate debtors' counsel takes on still greater significance in light of the profound conflict that result would have with fundamental policies embodied by the Bankruptcy Code. Congress recognized in enacting Section 330(a) that counsel will not serve if they cannot be paid, a result that the bankruptcy system cannot countenance. Debtors have numerous important responsibilities that often can be fulfilled only with the assistance of an attorney. Even if the power to pay counsel were eliminated only in the more than one million cases a year in which a trustee has been appointed to administer the assets of the estate – a result the text cannot sustain – the negative consequences for bankruptcy administration would be so profound that it is almost inconceivable that Congress could have intended to incur them.

Finally, this case is controlled by the canon of construction that legislation will not be construed to depart dramatically from longstanding bankruptcy practice absent some affirmative indication of congressional intent. The history of the payment of the fees of debtor's counsel in bankruptcy is one written in three parts: practice under the Bankruptcy Act of 1867; procedures under the Act of 1898; and procedures under the current Bankruptcy Code. The history is also one of three relevant themes: the gradual expansion of the role of debtor's counsel in bankruptcy proceedings; the recognition of the fairness and need for counsel to be paid from the estate in order to ensure the orderly administration of the estate and that essential services are performed; and the eventual abandonment of the concept that services performed in a bankruptcy case are less deserving of payment than other legal services offered in the marketplace generally. In reviewing this history, one observation is particularly striking. In exercising its rulemaking authority under the Act of 1867, this Court adopted a "General Order" abrogating the prior practice of allowing the fees of debtor's counsel to be paid out of the debtor's estate. Subsequently, in enacting the Act of 1898 (and, later, the provisions of the current Bankruptcy Code), Congress explicitly, consistently, and repeatedly repudiated the Court's prohibition. Given this express and sustained determination by Congress, the conclusion that it in 1994 implicitly removed authorization for the payment of the fees of debtor's counsel from Section 330 is tantamount to ascribing to Congress a view that it had never previously embraced and, indeed, purposefully rejected at the close of the nineteenth century.

The judgment should accordingly be reversed.

ARGUMENT

I. Section 330(a) Contains a Scrivener's Error that Requires the Court To Consider the Text, Purpose, and History of the Statute and the Code as a Whole To Determine Its Meaning.

The Fourth Circuit held that the Bankruptcy Code does not permit the bankruptcy court to compensate petitioner for the services he provided in the Chapter 7 proceedings in this case, notwithstanding that those services benefited the bankruptcy estate. The panel majority refused to consider anything beyond the isolated text of Section 330(a)'s payees list – such as the text of the Code as a whole, the legislative history, the policies embodied by federal bankruptcy law, and prior practice. It maintained that the "plain language" of Section 330(a) compelled its construction. Pet. App. 8a. But that characterization by the majority of the statute considerably overstates the ruling's textual support. No provision of the Bankruptcy Code provides, as the court of appeals held, that the bankruptcy court is prohibited from compensating a debtor's attorney from the debtor's estate. The court of appeals instead rested its decision on the fact that "[t]he 1994 version clearly omits the prior authorization to compensate the debtor's attorney." Id. The decision below thus relies not on a statutory proscription against compensating counsel but on a negative inference that the absence of the phrase "a debtor's attorney" from the payees list of the 1994 Act is purposeful and controlling over other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.

This Court should conclude that, for at least four reasons, the inference drawn by the court of appeals cannot alone bear the weight of its dramatic holding that Congress in 1994 eliminated the bankruptcy court's power to award fees to the debtor's attorney from the property of the estate. Instead, the proper construction of Section 330(a) requires the Court to consider other sources that inform the statute's meaning.

First, the Fourth Circuit's contention that the text of Section 330(a) is "plain" is wrong. The statute is facially ambiguous, not clear, and contains an obvious scrivener's error. It sets forth two lists that are ineluctably tied together:

> The court may award to a trustee, an examiner, [sic] a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103--(A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney * * *.

11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1) (emphases added). The two lists are facially irreconcilable. Either Congress inadvertently omitted the "debtor's attorney" from the "payees" list, on which the court of appeals relied, or it inadvertently retained the reference to the attorney in the latter, "payees" list.[2] The 1994 Act also omitted the necessary conjunction "or" from the payees list, further evidencing the carelessness of the scrivener. There is no apparent reason, other than a drafting error, that Congress would have rewritten the statute to produce a grammatically incorrect provision.

Although petitioner believes that the drafting error was the omission of "or the debtor's attorney" from the payees list rather than the retention of the reference to the attorney in the providers list (see Part II-A, infra), the inescapable point for present purposes is that the statute contains a mistake of some kind. The court of appeals thus erred in drawing an inference exclusively from the text of the payees list in disregard of the

[2] The lower courts themselves essentially acknowledged that the two lists are inconsistent. See Pet. App. 9a (court of appeals' recognition that, on its reading, "the reference in [the providers list] to 'attorney' may be superfluous"); id. 35a (bankruptcy court's acknowledgment that payees list is "arguably internally inconsistent with" providers list).

"cardinal rule that a statute is to be read as a whole" (Wash. State Dep't of Soc. & Health Servs. v. Guardianship Estate of Keffeler, 123 S. Ct. 1017, 1025 (2003)) and without regard to other indicia of congressional intent. Construction of the Bankruptcy Code, in particular, is a uniquely "holistic endeavor." United Sav. Ass'n v. Timbers of Inwood Forest Assocs., Ltd., 484 U.S. 365, 371 (1988).

Second, the Fourth Circuit reasoned from the false premise that Congress in 1994 amended Section 330(a) by specifically deleting the reference to the debtor's counsel from the payees list. See Pet. App. 8a-9a. In reality, Congress substituted a new, and substantially different, version of Section 330(a). See Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-394, § 224(b), 108 Stat. 4106, 4130 (substituting new provision in place of former Section 330(a) that substantially revised subsection (a)(1) and added entirely new subsections (a)(2)-(6)). And as more fully described in Part III, infra, the phrase "debtor's attorney" was itself omitted from the substitute bill only in a last-minute overhaul of the whole provision. The change was thus in no sense the targeted and purposeful deletion from the predecessor Bankruptcy Code imagined by the court of appeals.

Third, the Bankruptcy Code contains authority to compensate counsel other than in the payees list of Section 330(a). The providers list on its face authorizes the fee award in this case, directing the bankruptcy court to award "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the * * * attorney." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1)(A) (emphasis added). Section 330(a) must be read to "give meaning to each element" of the statute (Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525, 542 (2001)), and thus to each element of the providers list. Section 503 similarly provides for the payment of administrative expenses to the extent they represent "the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate." Our point is not that Section 503 permits compensation in circumstances clearly precluded by Section 330; it logically does not. Rather, because the literal terms of the Code authorize the bankruptcy court to award fees in these circumstances, the negative inference drawn from the single statutory omission cited by the Fourth Circuit is not strong enough to justify its sweeping holding.

Fourth, it is simply implausible to believe that, if Congress actually did intend to make the radical departure from past practice of eliminating the power to compensate debtors' counsel, it would have done so in the oblique and ham-fisted manner of the 1994 revision to the statute. As just described, the 1994 Act eliminated only one of the two references to the attorney in Section 330(a). In addition, as we show in the next section, every other relevant source of statutory construction contradicts, and ultimately defeats, the inference drawn by the Fourth Circuit. Petitioner's position is thus supported by the text of the Code, the history of the 1994 Act, past practice, and the purposes of federal bankruptcy law. The leading treatise on bankruptcy law thus urges courts to recognize that the omission from the payees list is simply a drafting error:

> [S]ection 330(a)(1) of the Code deletes the reference to "the debtor's attorney" as a party who may be allowed compensation. Clearly this result was unintended * * *. [It] would represent a fundamental change in the law. * * * Because the change is inconsistent with current case law and the legislative history of section 330 does not support such a drastic change, courts should construe the deletion as unintended.

3 Collier ¶ 330.LH[5].

This Court has not hesitated to reject an inference, like that drawn by the court of appeals in this case, which is supported by an omission from a statute but is contradicted by other evidence in the text as well as the history of the provision's enactment and common sense. "An inference drawn from congressional silence certainly cannot be credited when it is contrary to all other textual and contextual evidence of congressional intent." Burns v. United States, 501 U.S. 129, 136 (1991). Such a negative inference is "a valuable servant, but a dangerous master" and has no place where, as in this case, it "leads to inconsistency or injustice." Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593, 612 (1927) (citation omitted); see also Chevron U.S.A. v. Echazabal, 536 U.S. 73, 84 (2002) ("Expressio unius just fails to work" in such situations.).

II. The Decision Below Conflicts with the Text and Structure of Section 330(a) and Other Provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.

A. The better reading of the text of Section 330(a) is that Congress did not intend to eliminate the authority to compensate debtors' attorneys.

1. Interpreting Section 330(a) involves a forced choice between giving full effect to the payees list (which does not refer to the debtor's attorney) or instead to the providers list (which does). The text does not conclusively resolve the inconsistency, but what guidance it does provide undermines the Fourth Circuit's decision. The payees and providers lists function in parallel: "a trustee" may receive compensation for services by "the trustee"; "an examiner" for services by "the * * * examiner"; and "a professional person employed under section 327" for services by "the * * * professional person." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1). Read consistently, by retaining the reference in the providers list to "the * * * attorney," Congress assumed that an "attorney" would receive payment for the attorney's services. Cf. United States v. Morton, 467 U.S. 822, 828 (1984) (a statutory term "must be read in light of the immediately following phrase").

In addition, the providers list is grammatically correct; the payees list, which omits not just "a debtor's attorney" but also the introductory conjunction "or," is not. We are not suggesting that statutes deserve respect only in proportion to how well they are written. Rather, as between two closely related but flatly irreconcilable provisions contained in direct succession, Congress more likely made an inadvertent mistake in the provision that contains the grammatical error.

2. The alternative reading of Section 330(a) pressed by the U.S. Trustee faces the equally substantial obstacle that it is logically inconsistent. The decision below reasons that Congress purposefully omitted the phrase "debtor's attorney" from Section 330(a), retaining only the authority to compensate distinct actors in the bankruptcy process: "a trustee, an examiner, [sic] a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103." The Fourth Circuit's premise was thus that Congress drafted the 1994 Act intending to distinguish the "debtor's attorney" from, inter alios, "a professional person employed under section 327."

But the U.S. Trustee elsewhere rejects that very premise, arguing that the debtor's attorney in some instances should be deemed "a professional person employed under section 327." In an effort to minimize the negative consequences of its construction of Section 330(a), respondent maintains that bankruptcy courts retain the authority to compensate debtors' counsel in Chapter 11 cases in which no trustee has been appointed.[3] Section 330(a) by its terms applies to attorney's fees in all forms of bankruptcy, including in cases under both Chapter 7 and Chapter 11, and furthermore without regard to whether a trustee has been appointed to administer the assets of the estate. The U.S. Trustee nonetheless asserts – without any support in the legislative record – that Congress in 1994 intended to eliminate the authority to pay the debtor's attorney only in Chapter 7 proceedings and those Chapter 11 proceedings in which no trustee has been appointed. It reasons that, in Chapter 11 cases in which there is no trustee,

[3] As noted supra at 13, the U.S. Trustee has not challenged in this Court that portion of the judgment in this case that authorizes petitioner to be paid from the bankruptcy estate for the services he provided during the Chapter 11 proceedings. Our point is that the U.S. Trustee's concession that petitioner is entitled to those fees rests on an internally contradictory reading of Section 330(a).

the debtor in possession has a trustee's power to retain an attorney (11 U.S.C. 327(a), 1107(a)), who may in turn be compensated under Section 330(a) not as an "attorney" but as a "professional person employed under section 327."

The U.S. Trustee cannot have it both ways. If Congress in 1994 intentionally eliminated the authority to compensate "a debtor's attorney" but not "a professional person employed under section 327" from Section 330(a), without making any special provision for certain Chapter 11 proceedings, then that deletion must be given full effect. Yet neither any court nor the U.S. Trustee endorses the view that Congress intended to eliminate entirely the power to compensate counsel in all cases. But that is the inevitable consequence of the Fourth Circuit's reading of the statute.

The "debtor's attorney" furthermore cannot be equated with a "professional person employed under section 327" because the Code consistently distinguishes those two terms. See 11 U.S.C. 330(a) (providers list), 331 (interim compensation authority). Statutes will not be read so as to render their terms "altogether redundant." Gustafson v. Alloyd Co., 513 U.S. 561, 574 (1995).

B. The Fourth Circuit's holding that Congress intended in the 1994 Act to prohibit bankruptcy courts from compensating counsel with funds of the debtor's estate cannot be reconciled with two provisions that Congress added to Section 330(a) at that time.

The most significant change made by Congress in revising and recodifying Section 330(a) in 1994 was its addition of detailed criteria under which the bankruptcy court is to determine whether, and to what extent, fees should be paid. The 1994 Act specifically added two new subsections relating to attorney compensation. The fact that the enactment on which the Fourth Circuit rested its decision expressly contemplates paying debtors' attorneys refutes its conclusion that Congress simultaneously intended to eliminate that very authority.

1. Section 330(a)(4), added in 1994, contains a categorical prohibition on awarding fees in certain circumstances, but provides an exception for attorneys in a subset of bankruptcies:

> (A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the court shall not allow compensation for--
>
> (i) unnecessary duplication of services; or
>
> (ii) services that were not--
>
> (I) reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate; or
>
> (II) necessary to the administration of the case.
>
> (B) In a chapter 12 or chapter 13 case in which the debtor is an individual, the court may allow reasonable compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor in connection with the bankruptcy case based on a consideration of the benefit and necessity of such services to the debtor and the other factors set forth in this section.

11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4) (emphases added).

The 1994 Act, in Section 330(a)(4), thus explicitly contemplates that bankruptcy courts will award compensation to a "debtor's attorney" under subsection (a)(1). Congress adopted general standards governing the award of compensation (subsection (a)(4)(A)) that incorporate a specific exception that more permissively allows the award of fees to the debtor's attorney in a subset of cases otherwise subject to the general rule (subsection (a)(4)(B)). Neither the general rule nor the exception makes sense if, as the Fourth Circuit held, Congress intended in 1994 to render debtors' attorneys ineligible to receive compensation in the first instance. Put another way, the U.S. Trustee cannot offer a reading of the statute under which the special standards for compensating counsel in Chapter 12 and Chapter 13 cases actually operate, as the text requires, as an exception to the general standards of subsection (a)(4)(A).

The status of subsection (a)(4)(B) as an exception – as opposed to an affirmative grant of authority to compensate counsel only under Chapters 12 and 13 – is confirmed by the fact that it refers only to compensating the debtor's counsel for "representing the interests of the debtor" (emphasis added) but directs the bankruptcy court in awarding compensation to consider "the other factors set forth in this section," which include the "benefit [to] the debtor's estate" (emphasis added). The authority to pay compensation to the debtor's attorney for representing the interests of the debtor's estate must therefore arise from some other Code provision. Indeed, in virtually every context – including all instances under Chapter 7 and Chapter 11, and with respect to the payment of parties other than the debtor's counsel (such as the trustee) even under Chapters 12 and 13 – the sine qua non of compensation is benefit to the estate. See 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(3). It is difficult to imagine that Congress intended to compensate counsel in Chapter 12 and Chapter 13 cases for services that benefit the debtor but to forbid their compensation for the services they provide that benefit the estate.

2. Subsection 330(a)(5), also added by the 1994 Act, furthermore incorporates the authority to compensate debtors' counsel on an interim basis that is set forth in Section 331. It directs bankruptcy courts to "reduce the amount of compensation awarded under [Section 330(a)(1)] by the amount of any interim compensation awarded under section 331." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(5). Section 331, in turn, employs the traditional list and provides that compensation may be paid to "[a] trustee, an examiner, a debtor's attorney, or any professional person employed under section 327." 11 U.S.C. 331 (emphasis added). Subsection (a)(5) thus contemplates the availability of interim compensation for all the parties named in Section 331; no exception was made for that paid to debtors' attorneys. Congress in 1994 could not have intended, as the Fourth Circuit concluded, to forbid that very compensation.

Relatedly, the Fourth Circuit's decision impermissibly reads out of the Code the explicit authority conferred by Section 331 to award debtors' attorneys interim compensation. "Obviously, if a debtor's attorney is eligible to apply for interim payments, she must be eligible for payments in the first place." In re Taylor, 250 B.R. 869, 871 (E.D. Va. 2000).

III. The Circumstances Surrounding the 1994 Recodification of Section 330(a) Refute the Claim that Congress Intended To Eliminate the Authority To Compensate Counsel.

The preceding analysis doubtless raises the question of the source of the scrivener's error that omitted the debtor's attorney from the payees list but retained it in all related sections. "No principled reason appears in any legislative history for the removal of the crucial words, nor is there a record of any debate of the deletion." Pet. App. 22a. The answer lies in examining what actually changed in the 1994 amendments and how specific sentences were moved at the last minute. Both the providers and payees lists of Section 330(a)(1) as currently enacted are derived from similar provisions of the prior Code. Although the 1994 Act included a variety of wording differences beyond the omission of "a debtor's attorney," none was substantive.[4] Nothing suggests

[4] The differences between the provisions, with deletions struck out and additions italicized, are as follows:

> (a)(1) After notice to ~~any~~ the parties in interest and ~~to~~ the United States Trustee and a hearing, and subject to sections 326, 328, and 329~~ of this title~~, the court may award to a trustee, ~~to~~ an examiner, [sic] ~~to~~ a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103~~ of this title, or to the debtor's attorney--~~
>> ~~(1)~~(A) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by ~~such~~ the trustee, examiner, professional person, or attorney~~, as the case may be,~~

that Congress in 1994 intended to do anything other than carry forward with minor wording changes the predecessor provisions governing the persons to whom compensation may be paid. To the contrary, as noted, the redrafted version of Section 330(a)(1) retains the debtor's attorney in the providers list.

The reference in the payees list to the debtor's attorney appears simply to have been inadvertently omitted when Section 330(a) was overhauled through a "last minute addition * * * to the 1994 Act." 3 Collier ¶ 330.LH[5], at 330-75. As originally introduced, the bill that became the 1994 Act would have revised Section 330(a), by making each of the non-substantive wording changes to subsection (a)(1) just noted, one of which is relevant here: the bill would have deleted the phrase "of this title" that appeared immediately before "or to the debtor's attorney" in the payees list. The bill also would have inserted, immediately after the reference to the debtor's attorney, an additional provision directing the U.S. Trustee to review fee applications. It provided:

> (a)(1) After notice to the parties in interest and the United States trustee and a hearing, * * * the court may award to a trustee, an examiner, a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103, or the debtor['']s attorney, after considering comments and objections submitted by the United States Trustee in conformance with guidelines adopted by the Executive Office for United States Trustees pursuant to section 586(a)(3)(A) of title 28 and by any paraprofessional person~~s~~ employed by ~~such trustee, professional person, or attorney, as the case may be~~ any such person * * *.

S. 540, 103d Cong. (1993), reprinted in S. Rep. No. 168, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) (emphasis added).

On April 21, 1994, the day the Senate passed the Act, it considered fifteen separate amendments prior to final passage. "The Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994 comprehensively covers a wide range of bankruptcy provisions. Due to the breadth of the amendments, technical errors are to be expected." 3 Collier ¶ 330.LH[5], at 330-76.[5] The amendment at issue here, No. 1645, substantially reorganized the provisions of the proposed replacement version of Section 330(a). With respect to subsection (a)(1), it carried forward the proposed deletion of the phrase "of this title" that appeared before "or the debtor's attorney." The amendment also deleted and moved to a new subsection (a)(2), the newly proposed provision relating to the U.S. Trustee's authority to review fee applications that had appeared immediately after the reference to the debtor's attorney. 140 Cong. Rec. S4741-01 (daily ed. Apr. 21, 1994). But the amendment also omitted the phrase "or the debtor[']s attorney" that appeared between [5] Indeed, the 1994 amendments introduced an array of errors into the Code: Sections 330(a)(3)(A) and 546(g) appear twice; the Code skips from Section 101(2) to Section 101(4), with the former Section 101(3) moved to Section 101(21B); Section 101(56A) was inserted between Sections 101(53C) and 101(53D); Sections 365(c)(4) and (d)(5) through (d)(9) were not deleted as expired, yet subsection (p) was; Section 522(f)(2) was redesignated as Section 522(f)(1)(B), but the cross-reference in Section 522(g)(2) was left unchanged; new Section 523(a)(15) was placed at the end of Section 523 rather than at the end of Section 523(a); Section 362(b)(14) was renumbered as 362(b)(17), but the cross-reference in Section 553(b)(1) was not corrected; Section 553(b)(1) refers to Section 546(h), which does not exist because there are two Section 546(g)'s; and Section 726(b) refers to a nonexistent Section 1009.

---

the two purposeful deletions; the drafter struck from the beginning of one to the end of the other, apparently without recognizing the phrase in between. In other words, the omission seems to have been, quite literally, a "slip of the pen."

The legislative history furthermore contradicts the suggestion that Amendment No. 1645 purposefully deleted the authority to pay fees to debtors' counsel. The 1994 version of Section 330(a) sought "to codify many of the factors previously considered by courts in awarding compensation and reimbursing expenses." 3 Collier ¶ 330.LH[5], at 330-73. "The purpose of these amendments was to foster greater uniformity in the application, processing and approval of fees. To accomplish this goal, the amendments expand[ed] the factors that courts should consider in approving fee applications, recognize[d] a bankruptcy court's authority to review fee applications sua sponte and require[d] the executive office of the United States trustee to establish national guidelines for the allowance of fees and expenses." Norton Bankruptcy Law and Practice § 26:5, at 206 (2d ed. 1997 Supp.). "Coincidentally, the language providing for objections, which [the] amendment removed from § 330(a)(1) in the reorganization, was contained in a clause that happened to fall immediately after the term 'debtor's attorney,' although the two subject matters were entirely unrelated." In re Century Cleaning Servs., 195 F.3d 1053, 1059 (CA9 1999) (emphasis added).

Indeed, directly contrary to the Fourth Circuit's decision, the legislative history contemplates that fees will be paid to debtors' attorneys. The definitive report on the 1994 Act states that Section 330(a), as revised, > requires the United States Trustee to invoke procedural guidelines regarding fees in bankruptcy cases and file comments with fee applications. These changes should help foster greater uniformity > in the application for and processing and approval of fee applications.

H.R. Rep. No. 835, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 51 (1994); 140 Cong. Rec. H10,769 (daily ed. Oct. 4, 1994). The sponsor of the amendment in question, Senator Metzenbaum, similarly explained that it > sets forth in clear and concise terms those factors that must be considered when deciding the appropriateness of a fee request. * * * In addition, the U.S. trustees will be required to adopt uniform procedural guidelines for the review of fee applications and where appropriate, object to a fee request.

140 Cong. Rec. S14,597-02 (daily ed. Oct. 7, 1994).

There is no substantial support in the legislative record for the contrary holding of the court of appeals. As noted, nothing in the legislative history suggests the deletion of the phrase "a debtor's attorney" was purposeful. One piece of written testimony provided to a Subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee during consideration of the 1994 Act noted, in passing, "the apparently inadvertent removal of debtors' attorneys from the list of professionals whose compensation awards are covered by section 330(a)." Bankruptcy Reform: Hearing on H.R. 5116 Before the Subcomm. on Econ. & Commercial Law of the Comm. on the Judiciary, 103d Cong. 551 (1994). In the unlikely event members of Congress were aware of this snippet, they likely agreed with its conclusion that the omission was inadvertent and would not alter the statute's meaning.

Subsequent to the Act's adoption, two "technical corrections" bills were introduced in the House that included, among their provisions, an amendment reinserting the debtor's attorney to the payees list. H.R. 120, 105th Cong. § 7 (1997); H.R. 764, 105th Cong. § 4 (1997). "Failed legislative proposals are a particularly dangerous ground on which to rest an interpretation of a prior statute." Solid Waste Agency v. United States Army Corps of Engineers, 531 U.S. 159, 169-70 (2001). That rule is particularly apt here. Given the circuit conflict, the failure to pass corrective legislation does not indicate support for one reading of Section 330(a) over the other. The technical corrections bills may not have passed for a host of reasons, including objections to any of the several other amendments to the Bankruptcy Code they proposed.

The circumstances surrounding the omission of the phrase "a debtor's attorney," as confirmed by the legislative history, thus support the conclusion that Congress did not intend the radical change of prohibiting bankruptcy courts from compensating debtors' counsel but rather made an inadvertent error in the course of a last-minute statutory reorganization.

IV. The Fourth Circuit's Decision Conflicts with Basic Bankruptcy Policies and Produces an Absurd Result.

The inference drawn by the Fourth Circuit that Congress intended to eliminate the power to compensate counsel out of the assets of the bankruptcy estate is implausible for the further reason that it would entail an inexplicable, wholesale departure from not only the purpose of Section 330(a) as revised in 1994 but also the guiding principle of the "prompt and effectual administration" of federal bankruptcy law as a whole (Katchen v. Landy, 382 U.S. 323, 328 (1966)). The Code embodies Congress's recognition that the sound administration of the bankruptcy process requires imposing on debtors a variety of requirements, many of which can be fulfilled only by counsel. The 1994 Act does not eliminate any of these obligations of debtors. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 341, 343, 521; Bankr. R. 1007(a), 2004, 4002.

This case is a perfect illustration. The owners of Equipment Services, a small mine services company, had no capacity to prepare either the Chapter 11 filing or the adversary complaint that petitioner filed on behalf of the debtor. Nor would the debtor have been aware of either the significance of the conversion of the case to a Chapter 7 proceeding or its obligation to cooperate with the appointed trustee. Upon conversion, only counsel would have had the knowledge and experience either to arrange the "Section 341" creditors meeting or to coordinate the proceedings on the adversary complaint.

Commentators agree that the policies embodied by the Code require compensating debtors' attorneys in order to ensure the operation of the bankruptcy process:

> There are several postpetition services commonly performed by the debtor's attorney in chapter 7 proceedings that are necessary to the administration of the estate. If debtors' attorneys' compensation is not permitted, this may have the effect of denial of counsel, or at the very least, lead to debtors representing themselves. This possibility may lead to increased errors and time spent to correct those errors, thereby further extending the time necessary to adjudicate all parts of the case.

Joseph G. Minias, Text and Context: Discerning the Basis for Debtor's Attorneys' Fees Under Chapter 7 and 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, 18 Bankr. Dev. J. 201, 219-20 (2001). We have collected other representative cases illustrating the valuable services provided by debtors' counsel, including in Chapter 7 proceedings and Chapter 11 proceedings in which a trustee has been appointed, in the Appendix, infra, at 29a-32a.

Counsel generally will not, of course, agree to serve a client in bankruptcy without compensation. Congress's point in enacting and subsequently revising Section 330(a) – a purpose which the Fourth Circuit's decision serves to defeat – was to ensure that attorneys are willing and able to represent parties to the bankruptcy process. "[I]t has become clear over the years that it is most difficult to attract competent attorneys to perform the often complex legal services required in bankruptcy if they must constantly be preoccupied with the manner in which they are to be paid * * *." W. Homer Drake, Jr., Bankruptcy Practice for the General Practitioner § 10.14 (3d ed. 2002). The decision below thus runs contrary to the "principal goal" of ensuring "open access" to bankruptcy relief. Report of the Commission on the Bankruptcy Laws of the United States, H.R. Doc. No. 137, Part II, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973); H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 220 (1977); see also, e.g., In re UNR Indus., Inc., 986 F.2d 207, 210 (CA7 1993) (Section 330 is designed to ensure "that attorneys [would] be reasonably compensated and that future attorneys [would] not be deterred from taking bankruptcy cases due to a failure to pay adequate compensation. * * * [T]he important thing is to provide compensation in bankruptcy equivalent to that outside it."); In re Pontiac Hotel Assocs., 92 B.R. 715, 716 (E.D. Mich. 1988) ("Bankruptcy judges may award compensation to a debtor's attorney pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330. This statute was designed to ensure that bankruptcy counsel would command fees comparable to non-bankruptcy counsel, and thus that competent professionals would be attracted to the bankruptcy field." (citing H.R. Rep. No. 595, supra, at 329-30)).

It is no answer that, as respondent suggests, the trustee can secure the assistance of counsel, including the counsel who previously represented the debtor (see 11 U.S.C. 327, 328(b)), who can be compensated as the trustee's lawyer under Section 330(a). That prospect is sufficiently uncertain – including because the choice would be left to the trustee and because the debtor's counsel may be deemed to have a preclusive conflict of interest (see 11 U.S.C. 327(a)) – that counsel will refuse to come into the case in the first instance. The Code also imposes distinct duties on the debtor, which needs its own counsel throughout the proceedings. But even if that were not so, respondent's proposal would be self-defeating at best, as it would provide no substantive benefit to the bankruptcy process but instead would give rise to an inefficient and ultimately purposeless process in which the parties regularly file form motions to name the debtor's lawyer as the counsel to the trustee.

The Fourth Circuit's view of Congress's intent is furthermore implausible even if, as the U.S. Trustee proposes, Section 330(a) is read to eliminate the power to compensate counsel not in every bankruptcy proceeding but instead in Chapter 7 cases and Chapter 11 cases in which a trustee has been appointed. If attorneys know that they cannot be compensated for work done under Chapter 7, then they will be loath to take on a Chapter 11 case for fear that a trustee will be appointed or (as in this case) the proceeding will be converted to Chapter 7. The construction of Section 330(a)(1) adopted below creates in the attorney's mind the fear that he or she will be left "working for free," in part because "state law ethical obligations may require an attorney to continue to perform as counsel, regardless of the potential prohibition of payment." Bruce H. White & William L. Medford, Compensation for Debtor's Counsel After a Chapter 11 Trustee Is Appointed: When Should Debtor's Counsel Stop Working, 1999 ABI J. LEXIS 79, at *7-*8 (June 1999). Fearing that the canons of ethics would prevent them from abandoning their client once a trustee entered the case, attorneys will stay away from the outset. Cf. Model Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 1.16(b) (permitting attorneys to withdraw from representing a client only "if withdrawal can be accomplished without material adverse effect on the interests of the client" or if other unusual circumstances exist).

But in any event, there are more than one million Chapter 7 filings every year, more than twice the number for all other forms of bankruptcy combined. 2001 Year-End Totals for Filings Reach New High, The Bankruptcy Strategist, Apr. 2002, at 1. Even those judges who read the text of the payees list to eliminate only the right to compensation in that subset of cases recognize the grave consequences of the rule they grudgingly apply. The bankruptcy judge in this case thus wrote that, in his experience, the failure to pay counsel will give rise to "a very powerful disincentive * * * to attorneys to accept Chapter 7 cases in the first place, or to provide anything beyond the most perfunctory required post-petition services." Pet. App. 42a (emphasis added). Judge Thomas of the Ninth Circuit similarly recognized that the policies underlying Section 330 point in "favor of allowing attorneys to receive reimbursement under § 330. There are several post-petition services commonly performed by the debtor's attorney in Chapter 7 proceedings that are necessary to the administration of the estate." Century Cleaning Servs., 195 F.3d at 1060 (dissenting opinion). "Categorical exclusion of fees can only result in denial of access to justice, with debtors unrepresented or under-represented. The increase in pro se cases, and in cases which become pro se after the petition is filed, does not aid the administration of our bankruptcy system." Id. at 1064.[6]

There also is no reason to believe that Congress decided to forbid compensating counsel under Section 330(a) in order to preserve the assets of the estate. Congress addressed the question of asset preservation in subsections (a)(3) and (a)(4), which set forth detailed criteria for awarding fees, and which forbid compensation (except in cases under Chapters 12 and 13) for "unnecessary duplication of services" and services that are not "(I) reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate; or (II) necessary to the administration of the case." "There are doubtless strong policy reasons for not omitting a chapter 7 debtor's attorney from eligibility for fees paid from the debtor's estate, particularly since § 330 limits compensation to those services 'reasonably likely to benefit the debtor's estate.'" Pet. App. 24a (quoting 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(A)(ii)(I)) (emphasis added). "The bankruptcy court may reduce or even disallow the requested amount of compensation when no real benefit is conferred upon the debtor's estate by the services for which the applicant seeks compensation." 3 Collier ¶ 330.03[3], at 330-25 (collecting cases). We have collected representative cases illustrating the scrutiny that bankruptcy courts apply to fee applications submitted by debtors' counsel, including in Chapter 7 proceedings and Chapter 11 proceedings in which a trustee has been appointed, in the Appendix, infra, at 33a-35a. The Fourth Circuit nonetheless attributed to Congress an illogical, penny-wise and pound-foolish determination to eliminate entirely – as a purportedly asset-preserving measure – compensation that is essential to debtors' receipt of legal services that are "necessary" and "benefi[cial]" to the value of the estate.

[6] There is also no reason Congress in 1994 would have chosen to eliminate the right to compensation from the assets of the estate in Chapter 7 cases and Chapter 11 "debtor out of possession" cases as the Fourth Circuit supposed, but simultaneously preserved (and even enhanced) the right to compensation in all other forms of bankruptcy. The distinction cannot be that the assets are being liquidated, for there is no liquidation under Chapter 11. Nor can the distinction be the presence of a trustee, for a trustee is appointed in Chapter 12 and 13 cases as well. See 11 U.S.C. 1202, 1302.

Indeed, the Fourth Circuit's decision is likely to have the absurd consequence in many cases of reducing the assets of the estate, as well as the bankruptcy court's control over fee awards. Congress could not have intended either result, given that the principal innovation of the 1994 Act was the adoption of more stringent standards for the court to apply in reviewing fee applications. The court of appeals held, and the U.S. Trustee agreed, that debtors and their counsel may enter into pre-petition "general" retainer agreements that, because they are the debtor's property rather than property of the estate, will be reviewed only for their "reasonableness" under Section 329(b) rather than under the more stringent standards of Section 330(a). See Pet. App. 11a. There can be no dispute regarding "the unsatisfactory potential consequences of a decision which places a premium upon a debtor's attorney obtaining a retainer large enough to cover in advance any and all legal services which might reasonably be contemplated during the entire case." Id. 43a. Indeed, the attorney will logically insist that the retainer be enhanced to account for the risk that services required in the proceeding will be more extensive than anticipated, thereby reducing the funds that are ultimately available to creditors as a part of the estate.[7]

V. Congress Would Not Have So Profoundly Changed Prior Bankruptcy Practice Without Any Acknowledgement in the Statutory History.

The Fourth Circuit's decision implausibly attributes to Congress the intent to abandon silently over a century of established bankruptcy law authorizing the payment of the fees of debtor's counsel from the assets of the bankruptcy estate. "When Congress amends the bankruptcy laws, it does not write on 'on a clean slate.'" Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410, 419 (1992). As this Court has repeatedly made plain, "[w]e * * * 'will not read the Bankruptcy Code to erode past bankruptcy practice absent a clear indication that Congress intended such a departure.'" Cohen v. de la Cruz, 523 U.S. 213, 221 (1998) (quoting Pennsylvania Dep't of Pub. Welfare v. Davenport, 495 U.S. 552, 563 (1990)); see also Davenport, 495 U.S. at 565 (Blackmun, J., joined by O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("This Court carefully has set forth a method for statutory analysis of the Bankruptcy Code. * * * * To determine the drafters' intent, the Court presumes that Congress intended to keep continuity between pre-Code judicial practice and the enactment of the Bankruptcy Code in 1978." (citations omitted)). Applying this approach in a series of cases, the Court has indicated time and again that, in construing the provisions of the Code, it will not presume that Congress intended to overturn an established bankruptcy rule

---

[7] Although some jurisdictions prohibit such retainers (see, e.g., In re Craig, 265 B.R. 624, 629 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2001) (discussing Florida law)), others do not, and it is unlikely that Congress intended to make the availability of compensation in federal bankruptcy proceedings turn on the nuances of individual states' attorney ethics rules.

sub silentio, but will instead require any intent to change the law to be "unmistakably clear." Cohen, 523 U.S. at 222.

Since the adoption of the Constitution, Congress has enacted five distinct bankruptcy acts. The first, the Act of 1800, and the second, the Act of 1841, contained no express provision for the compensation of debtor's counsel out of the property of the debtor's bankruptcy estate. See Bankruptcy Act of 1800, ch. 19, 2 Stat. 19 (repealed 1803); Bankruptcy Act of 1841, ch. 9, 5 Stat. 440 (repealed 1843); 3A Collier ¶ 64.01, at 2046-47 (14th ed. 1988).[8]

Enacted in the wake of the Civil War, the Nation's third bankruptcy statute – the Act of 1867 – was distinctly different. See Bankruptcy Act of 1867, ch. 176, 14 Stat. 517

[8] This is not surprising. Both statutes were enacted during a period in which imprisonment for debt was common and insolvent debtors were viewed, more often than not, as criminal offenders. See Charles Warren, Bankruptcy in United States History 52 (1935) (discussing the gradual abolishment of the practice of imprisonment for debt in the United States during the first half of the nineteenth century); James Kent et al., Bankrupt and Insolvent Laws, Report of the Incalculable Chancellor and Judges of the Supreme Court of the State of New York (Jan. 22, 1819), reprinted in 16 Niles' Wkly. Reg. 85 (1819) (extolling the virtues of the common practice of imprisonment for debt). Moreover, both bankruptcy acts were principally debt collection devices concerned with the seizure and liquidation of the debtor's property, and each contemplated little role for the debtor (or, by extension, his counsel) beyond the debtor's surrendering of his property and submission to interrogation. See Act of 1800, § 18, 2 Stat. at 26 (providing that imprisoned debtor would be subject to examination); id. § 20, 2 Stat. at 27 (authorizing officials administering the Act to "break open" the debtor's houses and chests and take possession of all of the debtor's property); Act of 1841, § 3, 5 Stat. at 442 (transferring the debtor's property to the bankruptcy assignee); id. § 4, 5 Stat. at 443-44 (providing that the debtor would be subject to examination "at all times," and would be guilty of perjury for any false statement).

(repealed 1878). First, it was crafted after the general demise of the practice of imprisonment for debt and likewise reflected emerging popular perceptions of insolvent debtors as typically "honest but unfortunate" rather than criminal. See Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U.S. 595, 602 (1877) (remarking that "[i]mprisonment for debt is a relic of ancient barbarism" and that "[e]very right-minded man must rejoice when such a blot is removed from the statute-book"). Second, the Act expanded both the debtor's benefits in bankruptcy (primarily by providing an enhanced right of discharge) and likewise the debtor's role in the administration of the case. See Louisville Joint Stock Land Bank v. Radford, 295 U.S. 555, 588 (1935) ("[t]he discharge of the debtor has come to be an object of no less concern than the distribution of his property"); Stellwagen v. Clum, 245 U.S. 605, 617 (1918) (observing the importance of granting the "unfortunate" debtor a discharge); Charles Jordan Tabb, The Historical Evolution of the Bankruptcy Discharge, 65 Am. Bankr. L.J. 325, 353-62 (1991) (discussing innovations under the Act of 1867, including expanded right of discharge).

Because the Act contemplated that the debtor would surrender all of his property at the commencement of the case to an "assignee" (essentially, a trustee), the Act logically and expressly contemplated that the debtor's expenses incurred in complying with the Act would likewise be borne by the estate, although it did not expressly address the compensation of the debtor's counsel. See Act of 1867, §§ 26, 28, 14 Stat. at 529-31. Exercising its rulemaking authority under the Act (see Act of 1867, § 10; see also J.B. Orcutt Co. v. Green, 204 U.S. 96, 103 (1907)), and reacting to amendments by Congress restricting the payment of most administrative expenses (Act of June 22, 1874, ch. 390, § 18, 18 Stat. 178, 184), this Court weighed in on the practice of paying the fees of debtor's counsel by abrogating it. The Court's General Order 30 provided that "no allowance shall be made against the estate of the bankrupt for fees of attorneys, solicitors, or counsel, except when necessarily employed by the assignee, when the same may be allowed as disbursements." See In re Gies, 10 F. Cas. 339, 339 (E.D. Mich. 1875) (emphasis added). Because the debtor's counsel was employed by the debtor rather than the assignee, General Order 30 was thought to prevent the payment of the fees of debtor's counsel. See id.; In re Handell, 11 F. Cas. 420 (W.D. Tex. 1876) (same).

Against this backdrop, Congress revisited the issue of the payment of the fees of debtor's counsel, and rejected the approach of General Order 30, when it enacted the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, ch. 541, 30 Stat. 544. In no fewer than three separate provisions of the 1898 Act, Congress expressly authorized the payment of the fees of the debtor's attorney.[9] [9] Congress so provided in Section 64(b)(3). After further amendment (including one that transferred the provisions of Section 64(b)(3) to Section 64(a)(1)), the section, as it existed immediately prior to the enactment of the Bankruptcy Code in 1978, expressly authorized the payment of "one reasonable attorney's fee, for the professional services actually rendered, irrespective of the number of attorneys employed, to the bankrupt in voluntary and involuntary cases * * * in such amount as the court may allow." Bankruptcy Act of 1926, Pub. L. No. 69-301, § 15, 44 Stat. 662, 667.

In addition, in 1934 Congress enacted Section 77B dealing specially with corporate reorganizations. Act of June 7, 1934, ch. 424, 48 Stat. 911, codified at 11 U.S.C. 207. In creating this special procedure, Congress also specifically authorized the court in reorganization proceedings to "allow a reasonable compensation for the services rendered * * * in connection with this proceeding * * * by * * * parties in interests * * * and the attorneys * * * of any of the foregoing and of the debtor." Bankruptcy Act of 1898, ch. 54, § 77B(c)(9), 30 Stat. 544, codified at 11 U.S.C. 207(c)(9) (emphasis added). In 1938, Congress replaced Section 77B with the corporate reorganization provisions of Chapter X, and specifically replaced Section 77B(c)(9) with Section 241 of Chapter X. In relevant part, Section 241(4) provided that "[t]he judge may allow * * * reasonable compensation for services rendered * * * in

As this Court subsequently explained, the touchstone for the allowance of compensation of the fees of debtor's counsel under the 1898 Act was whether those fees were "rendered in aid of the administration of the estate and the carrying out of the provisions of the act." Conrad, Rubin & Lesser v. Pender, 289 U.S. 472, 476 (1933); see also Randolph & Randolph v. Scruggs, 190 U.S. 533, 539 (1903); 3A Collier ¶ 62.31, at 1596-1600 (14th ed. 1988) (collecting cases). To the extent that they were rendered in aid of administration, fees were properly compensable and the reported decisions clearly establish the link between the payment of these fees and the useful and necessary functions of counsel for the debtor in the administration of the debtor's bankruptcy case. See In re Kross, 96 F. 816, 819 (S.D.N.Y. 1899); 3A Collier ¶ 62.31[3], at 1604-10 (14th ed. 1988); id. ¶ 62.31[4], at 1610-12 (analyzing fees compensable under Section 64); 6A Collier ¶ 13.04, at 571-76 (14th ed. 1988) (analyzing fees compensable under Section 241).

As summarized by one court, although the 1898 Act authorized compensating the debtor's counsel, it required strict frugality:

> The amount of compensation should be based, in ordinary cases, upon the nature of the case, the extent and character of the work actually performed, and the amount involved in the controversy. In bankruptcy cases, while these elements should properly be considered in fixing the compensation of the attorney, the policy of the act should be steadily a proceeding under this chapter * * * (4) by the attorney for the debtor." See also former Chapter X Rule 10-215(c)(1) (providing a similar authorization).

Finally, in addition to Sections 64 and 241, Congress also added the provisions of Chapter XII governing real property arrangements and, in doing so, added Section 491. Act of 1898, § 491, 11 U.S.C. 891. Section 491(4) is identical in all material respects to Section 241.

> kept in view, that is, that it should be administered with severe economy * * * so as to reduce to the lowest minimum the costs of administration.

In re Lang, 127 F. 755, 757 (W.D. Tex. 1904) (emphasis added); see also 3A Collier ¶ 62.05[1], at 1427 (14th ed. 1988).

When Congress enacted the 1978 Bankruptcy Code after ten years of study, it continued in Section 330(a) the practice of providing for the payment of the fees of debtor's counsel out of the assets of the estate. Significantly, in enacting Section 330, the debate in Congress focused not on the practice of compensating the debtors' counsel vel non, but rather on the standard by which professional fees would be allowed. That debate was resolved in favor of enhancing compensation. As described in the definitive joint statement of the floor managers of the 1978 Act:

> Section 330(a) contains the standard of compensation adopted in H.R. 8200 as passed by the House rather than the contrary standard contained in the Senate amendment. Attorneys' fees in bankruptcy cases can be quite large and should be closely examined by the court. However, bankruptcy legal services are entitled to command the same competency of counsel as other cases. In that light, the policy of this section is to compensate attorneys and other professionals serving in a case under title 11 at the same rate as the attorney or other professional would be compensated for performing comparable services other than in a case under title 11 * * *. Notions of economy of the estate in fixing fees are outdated and have no place in [the] bankruptcy code.

124 Cong. Rec. H11,089 (daily ed. Sept. 28, 1978) (statement of Rep. Edwards), reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6436, 6442; 124 Cong. Rec. S17,406 (daily ed. Oct. 6, 1978) (statement of Sen. DeConcini), reprinted in 1978

U.S.C.C.A.N. 6505, 6511. Section 330 thus reflected an intentional liberalization of the award of attorney's fees in bankruptcy cases in favor of attracting skilled representation. See 3 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 330.LH[4] (15th ed. rev. 2001).

In sum, other than a brief deviation by this Court under its rulemaking authority that was corrected by Congress in a subsequent legislative revision, there has never been a question for over a century that compensation for debtors' counsel comes from the estate. Legislative revision has focused on ways to watch-dog that compensation and perceived problems of quality of representation, but never on the long-established question of compensation simpliciter. In the 1994 Act, either Congress swept aside this century of long-settled practice without a hint of deliberation, or the scrivener erred in a statutory amendment that contains both a grammatical error and an internal inconsistency on its face. This Court's precedents holding that Congress will not be held to have dramatically departed from prior bankruptcy practice without discussion compel the latter conclusion.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit should be reversed.

RE: Equipment Services, Inc.
Chapter 7 Case No. 98-04851-WSA-7

Dear Bob:

I have talked with Dennis Dowdy concerning the allegation that the mine is flooded with the equipment in it. Mr. Dowdy has heard several “rumors” concerning this. One story is that the mine is flooded but that the equipment had been moved to higher ground in the mine and is safe; second, the mine and equipment are flooded; and third, the equipment was removed from the mine by a back entrance and sold.

I would suggest that Larry Akers be contacted and asked to investigate this situation.

Please let me know how you wish to proceed.

Sincerely yours,

John M. Lamie

PS- Dennis did confirm that men moved the equipment to a higher part of the mine before he shut down.

Examples Of Valuable Services Provided By Debtors' Counsel

United States Trustee v. Garvey, 195 F.3d 1053, 1060 (CA9 1999): Court remands for determination of appropriate compensation for post-petition services rendered by attorney in Chapter 7 cases. Court explains that "[t]here are several post-petition services commonly performed by the debtor's attorney in Chapter 7 proceedings that are necessary to the administration of the estate. * * * In this case, for example, [the debtor's attorney] filed the conversion petition, prepared schedules, amended reports, a statement of affairs, and a Rule 2015 report, communicated with creditors, and participated in 2004 examinations. Interpreting the ambiguous provision in § 330(a)(1) so as to eliminate the possibility of post-petition compensation for Chapter 7 debtor's attorneys would significantly alter the ability of Chapter 7 debtors to secure counsel in order to perform these services - a fundamental change in bankruptcy law."

In re Tundra Corp., 243 B.R. 575, 581 (Bankr. D. Mass. 2000): In Chapter 11 non-DIP case converted to Chapter 7, court approves fees for debtor's counsel for work on business operations; case administration; fee/employment applications; financing; meeting of creditors; seeking relief from stay proceedings.

In re Crown Oil, Inc., 257 B.R. 531, 543-44 (Bankr. D. Mo. 2000): Court allows fees "for the purpose of alleviating hardship and for allowing reasonable fees likely to benefit the estate at the time the services and expenses were provided." Court notes that attorneys "negotiated a recovery for the estate shortly after the beginning of the case consisting of a ten percent interest in the oil wells from ResourceFund, which Watts described as the single largest asset in the estate. Both Watts and Deschenes provided services in compiling and assembling the Debtor's Schedules and Statements. Deschenes represented the Debtor in the § 341 meetings of creditors in the Chapter 11 case, and after conversion in the Chapter 7 case. Watts provided the Chapter 7 Trustee with services, records, and information regarding possible preference actions against shareholders."

In re Office Prods. of Am., 136 B.R. 964, 974 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 1992): Attorney's fees for debtor's counsel in Chapter 7 case upheld for services related to assisting trustee with operation of unusually complex business: "The trustee knew from the beginning that he needed to operate the debtor's stores at least for a short period of time to realize the value of the assets. These operations demanded the assistance of the debtor, including working with the debtor's pre-petition lender, because only the debtor was sufficiently familiar with both legal and operational problems associated with running office products warehouse-style retail outlets located in eastern states over 1500 miles from the situs of the trustee. With inventory to account for, sales tax to take care of, and employee benefits to attend to (including making arrangements for withholding not only for federal income taxes but also state income taxes), there were many special duties imposed on this debtor not normally required of the usual debtor in chapter 7. Any actual, necessary legal services rendered to the debtor relative to its performing these important duties are compensable." Ordinarily, however, chapter 7 debtor's attorney may be compensated only for "assisting the debtor in performing his legal duties" under Bankruptcy Code Section 521 and Bankruptcy Rule 4002.

In re Wash. Mfg. Co., 21 Bankr. Ct. Dec. 1345 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1991): Court concludes that Chapter 11 debtor's counsel is entitled to reasonable compensation for time and expenses in preparing, presenting and defending fee application. See also Smith v. Edwards & Hale, Ltd., 305 F.3d 1078, 1088 (CA9 2002), cert. denied, 71 U.S.L.W. 3721 (2003) ("The preparation of fee applications was necessary for the administration of the case and provided a direct benefit to the estate because those services aided the trustee in determining the allocation of administrative fees.").

In re TS Indus., Inc., 125 B.R. 638 (Bankr. D. Utah 1991): Chapter 11 debtor’s counsel fee application. Court upholds fee requests for general estate administration, work on specific claims against the estate, and services rendered in preparing various business agreements.

In re Colorado-Ute Elec. Ass’n, 132 B.R. 174, 180 (Bankr. D. Colo. 1991): Chapter 11 debtor’s counsel entitled to fees for work in rate cases before the public utilities commission, for representation in a jurisdictional dispute regarding the commission, as well as for representation relating to “general case administration, cash collateral, employee benefits, utilities deposits, the employment of professionals, Craig 3 lease issues, other lease issues, motions for relief from stay, Public Utilities Commission intervention, and the Office of Consumer Counsel intervention.” Court also allows fees for time spent preparing fee application.

In re Stoecker, 114 B.R. 965, 971 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1990): Court awards compensation to Chapter 11 debtor’s counsel “for services provided in connection with making court appearances and reviewing, drafting, editing and revising pleadings,” for “time expended reviewing and assembling voluminous documents,” and for time spent resolving discovery issues with trustee’s counsel and creditors’ counsel, since the debtor was “the sole equity holder in the corporate cases and was asserting his Fifth Amendment privilege.”

In re Holden, 101 B.R. 573 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 1989): “An attorney for the debtor is entitled to compensation for analyzing the debtor's financial condition; rendering advice and assistance to the debtor in determining whether to file a petition in bankruptcy; the actual preparation and filing of the petition, schedules of assets and liabilities, and the statement of affairs; and representing the debtor at the Section 341 meeting of creditors.’” (citations omitted).

In re Wash. Mfg. Co., 101 B.R. 944, 954 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1989): Court upholds fee award to Chapter 11 debtor’s counsel based on time spent “on research, pleadings and memoranda concerning the appointment of a trustee,” as well as for time spent on efforts “to protect the estate's assets in their communications with creditors, both secured and unsecured; in their representation of the debtors in labor negotiations and in a temporary restraining order action filed by the U.S. Department of Labor; and in their representation of the debtors in defense of a manager trainee who was criminally charged and arrested in Kentucky for the debtors' failure to pay pre-petition wages.”

In re Brady, 20 B.R. 936, 955-56 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1982): Attorney for debtor in Chapter 7 proceeding entitled to recover legal fees for filing of initial bankruptcy petition. The Court concludes that “the attorney for the debtor is entitled to be paid a legal fee for the initial filing of the petition in bankruptcy out of the assets in this estate.”

Examples Of Judges Scrutinizing Fee Applications

In re Top Grade Sausage, Inc., 227 F.3d 123, 132 (3d Cir. 2000): Chapter 11 debtor's counsel fee application denied. Court finds that "[a]fter a search of the record, we are unable to ascertain any particular action by the debtor's attorney that could not have been done by the Trustee and his staff."

In re Rheam of Indiana, 133 B.R. 325, 334-35 (E.D. Pa. 1991): Fee award to debtor's attorney in Chapter 7 proceeding reduced upon bankruptcy court's determination that legal questions in the case were "extremely simple," and therefore the hourly rate should be reduced to hourly rate for junior associate from hourly rate for senior partner. Fees also denied for appeals that bankruptcy court determined were not "necessary" to represent debtor's estate.

In re Hasset, 283 B.R. 376, 381 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 2003): Court denies in part fee application in Chapter 11 case converted to Chapter 7 case when compensation sought for "services that went beyond the typical statutory duties required of a debtor post-conversion."

In re Berg, 268 B.R. 250, 262 (Bankr. D. Mo. 2002): Court disallows fees when counsel should have realized that reorganization was infeasible and thus services did not benefit the estate, but awards some fees when attorneys' "services in compiling and assembling the Debtor's Schedules and Statements may have ultimately aided the Chapter 7 Trustee."

In re Crown Oil, Inc., 257 B.R. 531 (Bankr. D. Mo. 2000): Court disallows fees when counsel should have realized that reorganization was infeasible and had filed false certificate of service with the court.

In re Poseidon Pools of Am., 180 B.R. 718, 732, 736, 739-40 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1995): Court lowers fee amount for Chapter 7 debtor's counsel, concluding that attorney's accounting of time was "woefully deficient in providing that level of information necessary for a meaningful evaluation."

Court also disallows fee award for unnecessary document retrieval. Finally, some services rejected as duplicative.

In re Waxman, 148 B.R. 178 (Bankr. E.D.N.Y. 1992): Chapter 7 proceeding. Court concludes that attorney for Chapter 7 debtor is not entitled to compensation out of bankruptcy estate for services rendered to defend debtor against creditor's objections to discharge and dischargeability of debt.

In re Ginji Corp., 117 B.R. 983, 992 (Bankr. D. Nev. 1990): Using very careful review of application for compensation by Chapter 11 debtor's counsel (debtor out of possession case), court reduces award for "general" and "tangential" research, explaining that in case in which trustee has been appointed, "the correct approach is not to disallow fees but to scrupulously inquire into such services so as to ascertain whether or not they were for the benefit of the estate or for some other interest." Court denies fees for services duplicative of trustee's or other attorneys' efforts.

In re Grabill, 110 B.R. 356 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1990): Chapter 7 proceeding converted to Chapter 11 (trustee appointed). Court concludes that debtor's counsel is not entitled to compensation from estate for time spent contesting expansion of trustee's power, to extent that such services were for benefit of prepetition management rather than estate. Court carefully reviews fee application and reduces two categories, while fees are awarded in full in three categories.

In re Holden, 101 B.R. 573, 576 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 1989): Chapter 7 debtor's counsel fees denied for defending an objection to exemptions or discharge. Court notes that "courts have been fairly restrictive in their interpretation of what benefits the estate."

In re Moss, 90 B.R. 189 (Bankr. D.S.C. 1988): Chapter 7 debtor's counsel fees for time spent contesting Chapter 7 trustee's liquidation of one of debtor's assets benefited debtor, not estate, and thus, are not compensable from estate.

In re Rhoten, 44 B.R. 741 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1984): Chapter 7 debtor’s counsel fees compensation from debtors' estate not allowed for work of protecting debtors' discharge or exemptions.

REPLY BRIEF FOR THE PETITIONER

Petitioner's opening brief demonstrated that 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1) contains an obvious drafting error with respect to the power of courts to compensate debtors' attorneys. Section 330(a)(1) functions as a series of inextricably intertwined parallel references: "the court may award to a trustee * * * reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the trustee"; it may award compensation to "an examiner" for services of the "examiner"; and it may award compensation to "a professional person employed under section 327 or 1103" for services of the "professional person." Section 330(a)(1) also expressly empowers the court to pay reasonable compensation for the services of the debtor's "attorney," but it does not specifically name the attorney as an authorized recipient of the compensation. Congress thus either inadvertently included the attorney in the "providers list" or it inadvertently omitted the attorney from the statute's "payees list."

This case calls on this Court to resolve the ambiguity in Section 330(a)(1) with its standard tools of statutory construction, augmented by the special canons applicable in bankruptcy. This manifestly is not, as respondent urges, a case in which one construction or the other can be sustained only on a heightened showing that the statute's literal terms should be ignored as a "scrivener's error." Neither the construction pressed by respondent, nor the contrary view of most courts, permits "[e]nforcing the statute as written." Contra Resp. Br. 6. This Court could adopt respondent's construction only by reading out of Section 330(a)(1) the authority expressly conferred by Congress for bankruptcy courts to pay compensation for the services of the "attorney." Indeed, respondent and the majority below admit that their interpretation renders that central provision "superfluous." Id. 16 (quoting Pet. App. 9a). Both parties thus agree that the statute contains a drafting error; the disagreement is what that error is. So neither petitioner nor respondent bears a burden of showing that "Congress unquestionably intended to" adopt its view or "could not have rationally intended" the contrary, for neither position calls for an interpretation that conflicts with the result genuinely compelled by the literal language. Contra Resp. Br. 5, 31.

Respondent's litany of decisions reiterating the uncontroversial proposition that this Court "does not have 'carte blanche' to redraft statutes" (Resp. Br. 11 (quoting United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. 84, 95 (1985))) thus does not advance its position. These cases each involve clear, grammatically correct, and internally consistent statutory language. See, e.g., Iselin v. United States, 270 U.S. 245, 250 (1926) (noting statute was "evidently drawn with care"); United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 240-41 (1989) (citing "coherent and consistent" statutory scheme and "precision" of language and grammar). In contrast, where coherence and consistency are lacking, and where the text of one provision in isolation is ambiguous, this Court looks to the structure of the statute as a whole as well as to other evidence of legislative intent. See, e.g., Chickasaw Nation v. United States, 534 U.S. 84, 90 (2001) (concluding, in light of an internal inconsistency in a statute, that Congress must have made a drafting mistake, and resolving that mistake); Hartford Underwriters Ins. v. Union Planters Bank, N.A., 530 U.S. 1, 6-8 (2000) (looking to "contextual features" of the Bankruptcy Code as well as "pre-Code practice and policy considerations"); United States v. Granderson, 511 U.S. 39, 44-53 (1994) (considering internal consistency within statute, stated legislative purpose, legislative history, and policy concerns).[1] [1] Even in a traditional "scrivener's error" case – i.e., a case in which the Court must choose between a literal reading of the text and a departure from it, rather than (as in this case) between two alternate means of resolving an inconsistency in the text – this Court will not impose a special, dramatically heightened standard to justify the departure, but rather will "look to the provisions of the whole law, and to its object and policy," to determine Congress's intent. United States Nat'l Bank v. Independent Insurance Agents of America, Inc., 508 U.S. 439, 545-55 (1993) (citation omitted). Although in National Bank the Court noted that "overwhelming evidence" supported its view, it did not suggest that such evidence was required. Id. at 462. Contra. Resp. Br. 12.

As petitioner now shows, his reading is supported by each relevant tool of statutory construction. Further, there is no merit to respondent's contention that the omission of the word "attorney" from the payees list in the 1994 amendment to Section 330(a) was purposeful because it furthers supposed policy goals.

I. The Inherent Ambiguity In Section 330(a), As Amended In 1994, Is Properly Resolved By Concluding That Congress Did Not Intend To Revoke The Century-Old Authority Of Courts To Compensate Counsel For Services Necessary And Beneficial To The Estate.

The interpretative question before the Court is straightforward: who has the better reading of Section 330(a)(1)? The answer is plain; indeed, it is not seriously disputed. Stripped of its contention that petitioner must show that the Fourth Circuit's reading is "absurd," respondent does not genuinely contend that its is the superior interpretation.

1. As petitioner's opening brief detailed, Congress carefully considered and expressly addressed the authority of bankruptcy courts to compensate counsel in the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 and the Bankruptcy Code of 1978. Acting specifically to overturn cases reading this Court's General Order 30 to forbid compensation (see Pet. Br. 39 & n.9), Congress in the 1898 Act authorized compensation from estate funds in all forms of bankruptcy for services "rendered in aid of the administration of the estate and the carrying out of the provisions of the Act" (Conrad, Rubin & Lesser v. Pender, 289 U.S. 472, 476 (1933)). When federal bankruptcy law was thoroughly revised in 1978, there was no serious suggestion in Congress that this power should be repealed; to the contrary, Section 330(a) was adopted to authorize compensation more broadly. Pet. Br. 41-42.

Under the 1898 Act, courts awarded limited fees based on a principle of "severe economy * * * so as to reduce to the lowest minimum the costs of administration." In re Lang, 127 F. 755, 757 (W.D. Tex. 1904) (internal citation omitted). In enacting Section 330 in 1978, by contrast, Congress determined that, although fees "should be closely examined by the court," "[n]otions of economy of the estate in fixing fees are outdated and have no place in [the] bankruptcy code." 124 Cong. Rec. H11,089 (daily ed. Sept. 28, 1978) (definitive joint statement of floor managers, per Rep. Edwards), reprinted in 1978 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 6436, 6442.

Respondent does not contest this history. See Br. 32-33. And although respondent contends that petitioner cannot show a pellucid intention by Congress to retain the right to compensate counsel (see infra at 5-10), respondent does not argue that there is a clear statement in the text or legislative record of an intent to deviate from past practice. Those concessions are essentially dispositive of the question presented, for respondent's position would clearly work "a fundamental change in the law" that would be "inconsistent with current case law." 3 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 330.LH[5] (15th ed. 2002). Indeed, the essence of respondent's textual argument is that the 1994 Act represented a substantial change from prior practice that Congress could not have overlooked. However, this Court "will not read the Bankruptcy Code to erode past bankruptcy practice absent a clear indication that Congress intended such a departure." Pa. Dep't of Pub. Welfare v. Davenport, 495 U.S. 552, 563 (1990). If not in text, there must be "at least some discussion in the legislative history." Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410, 419 (1992). Congress adopted the 1994 Act against the backdrop of that settled canon.

Respondent only reinforces the point. It contends that the plain statement canon would apply only if the terms of Section 330(a)(1) "were unclear on their face or to resolve issues not explicitly addressed by the text." Br. 32-33. Respondent reiterates that its sole contention is that "Section 330(a)(1) is plain on its face in removing the statutory basis for awarding counsel fees to chapter 7 debtors' attorneys." Id. 33. But as petitioner has shown – and respondent concedes in admitting that its reading renders "superfluous" the courts' statutory authority to pay compensation for the services of the "attorney" (id. 16) – the text is ambiguous, not plain. Because there is no clear statement by Congress in the text or the legislative history of an intent to depart from nearly a century of settled bankruptcy practice in the 1994 amendment (see infra at 5-10), Section 330(a)(1) is properly understood to maintain the authority to compensate the debtor's counsel from the assets of the estate.

2. Respondent fails to undermine petitioner's showing that his construction is more faithful to the statutory text. Respondent, like the majority below, principally reasons not from the text of Section 330(a)(1) as currently enacted, but from the contrast between that text and the 1978 version's explicit reference to the debtor's counsel in the payees list. Respondent contends that "[t]he omission is the most direct and obvious means" of limiting the compensation paid for the services provided by debtors' counsel. Resp. Br. 5.

That simply is not so. The "direct" and "obvious" approach would have been to amend not just one isolated reference to the attorney's right to compensation, but all of the provisions relating to that authority (including Section 330(a)'s providers list, 11 U.S.C. 331, and 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(A)), without simultaneously enacting other provisions that necessarily presume the availability of fees for attorneys (11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B)) and that govern the award of those fees (id. § 330(a)(4)(A)). Further, as between the payees list and the providers list, if Congress actually intended to eliminate or limit the availability of compensation, it would have amended the latter. But it did not, instead leaving unaltered the court's explicit authority in the providers list to pay "reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by the * * * attorney." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1) (emphasis added). Congress in 1994 merely omitted a provision that addresses the ministerial act of turning the compensation over to the attorney.

Although Section 330(a) is inartfully phrased on any reading, at least petitioner's interpretation gives meaning to each of its terms. Respondent's contention that petitioner would read additional terms into the statute is incorrect. As just noted, Congress retained in the providers list the power to award compensation for the attorney's services. The 1994 omission of the attorney in the provision addressing the act of transmitting otherwise-authorized compensation is a relatively minor error that would ordinarily be overlooked as unremarkable. In any event, as petitioner's opening brief explained, compensation is separately authorized by Section 503 of the Bankruptcy Code, which broadly authorizes "payment of administrative expenses to the extent they represent 'the actual, necessary costs and expenses of preserving the estate.'" Pet. Br. 18 (quoting 11 U.S.C. 503). Respondent's brief ignores this font of authority.

3. Petitioner's reading similarly best makes sense of both the statutory structure and its object. Respondent's position is supported, at best, by the omission from the payees list "in isolation," whereas petitioner's reading prevails because it is most consistent with the "statute[] as a whole" (United States v. Morton, 467 U.S. 822, 828 (1984)), particularly given that construction of the Bankruptcy Code is a uniquely "holistic endeavor" (United Sav. Ass'n v. Timbers of Inwood Forest Assocs., 484 U.S. 365, 371 (1988)). The 1994 amendment to Section 330(a) added provisions that contemplate the continued availability of attorney's fees under Section 330(a)(1). Congress enacted procedures for the court to reduce fee awards on the basis of objections by third parties (Section 330(a)(2)), specific standards for evaluating fee applications (330(a)(3)), threshold requirements for receiving fees (330(a)(4)), and offsetting rules to account for "interim compensation" already awarded (330(a)(5)).[2] Petitioner reads these provisions, as Congress intended them, to govern fee awards to the debtor's attorney under Section 330(a)(1). Congress sought to ensure judicial scrutiny of fee awards (see, e.g., 140 Cong. Rec. S14,597 (daily ed. Oct. 7, 1994) (Sen. Metzenbaum)) – scrutiny that would be impossible if those fees were eliminated.

[2] Respondent correctly notes that, on its reading, a "debtor's attorney" in Chapters 12 and 13 is literally eligible for interim compensation as required by Sections 330(a)(5) and 331. Br. 22. But because Chapter 12 and 13 reorganizations generally involve "relatively standardized services" (In re Kimber, No. 00-14333, 2001 Bankr. LEXIS 1506, at *7 (Bankr. D. Colo. Sept. 7, 2001)) paid for with "flat fees" (In re Pineloch Enters., 192 B.R. 675, 678 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 1996)), there is no practical reason Congress would have enacted a provision that contemplates the use of interim compensation for just those cases. See, e.g., In re Campbell, 259 B.R. 615, 620 n.3 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2001) ("the flat fee of $750 is an amount that many Chapter 13 counsel charge a debtor for handling a routine Chapter 13 case").

Petitioner's position is specifically supported by Congress's 1994 enactment of Sections 330(a)(4)(A) and (B). The former permits the award of fees only for services "necessary to the administration of the case" or "likely to benefit the estate" (emphasis added). The latter provides that fees may be awarded to an individual debtor's counsel in cases under Chapters 12 or 13 for "representing the interests of the debtor" (emphasis added). Petitioner contends that subsection (a)(4)(A) announces a general rule limiting the availability of fees for, inter alios, debtors' attorneys, and that subsection (a)(4)(B) creates a special exception to that general rule which expands the availability of fees under Chapters 12 and 13. By contrast, respondent contends that subsection (a)(4)(A) does not apply to fee awards to the "debtor's attorney" for services benefiting the estate (which it says are not permitted), and that subsection (a)(4)(B) permits limited fees in Chapter 12 and 13 cases. The disagreement matters because if petitioner is correct that the 1994 Act codifies a general rule providing for the availability of attorney's fees in subsection (a)(4)(A), Congress could not have intended to eliminate those very fees in the same statute. Petitioner's reading is superior for several reasons.

First, the text plainly states that subsection (a)(4)(B) is an exception that expands the availability of fees that could otherwise be awarded in Chapter 12 and 13 cases. The limitations on fees in Section 330(a)(4)(A) constitute a general rule applicable to all fees "[e]xcept as provided in subparagraph (B)" (emphasis added). Only petitioner's reading treats the provisions of subsection (a)(4)(B) as such an "exception" to the general rule of subsection (a)(4)(A).

Second, Congress could not logically have intended, as respondent supposes, that counsel for Chapter 12 and 13 debtors would be eligible for compensation for services that benefit the "debtor" but not for services that benefit only the debtor's "estate." Respondent does not dispute that the sine qua non of the availability of fees in bankruptcy has always been benefit to the estate. See Pet. Br. 24. But under respondent's novel reading, a Chapter 12 or 13 debtor's counsel is inexplicably ineligible for attorney's fees for services that benefit only the estate – for example, those that provide creditors with information regarding the availability of assets to satisfy their claims.

Third, on respondent's view, attorney's fees in Chapter 12 and 13 cases would implausibly not be subject to Section 330(a)(1). Section 330(a)(1) incorporates Section 329, which permits the court to terminate or modify fee agreements. Section 330(a)(1) grants the U.S. Trustee and other parties the right to object to fee applications. And Section 330(a)(1), unlike Section 330(a)(4)(B), confers the right to reimbursement for expenses. Congress could not have intended that each of these provisions would apply to every type of fee application in bankruptcy except attorney's fee applications filed by individual Chapter 12 and 13 debtors.

Finally, there is no merit to respondent's expressio unius argument (Br. 18) that Congress's failure to list Chapter 7 debtors' counsel in subsection (a)(4)(B) implies an intent to eliminate the availability of attorney's fees in such cases. That Congress authorized additional compensation in some Chapter 12 and 13 cases for services that benefit the "debtor" does not suggest a corresponding intention to abandon – and is in fact logically unrelated to – the general authority to pay compensation for services benefiting the "estate."

4. Respondent could, at least conceivably, rescue its reading of the 1994 amendment if it could establish that Congress gave genuine consideration to deleting the courts' longstanding authority to pay counsel. By showing that the omission of the attorney from the payees list was purposeful, respondent arguably could explain Congress's failure to delete the parallel reference in the providers list as an inadvertent oversight in pursuit of this deliberate goal. (Yet it would remain doubtful that Congress would have intended to eliminate the availability of attorney's fees when the 1994 amendment's obvious overriding object was enhancing judicial scrutiny of fees rather than forbidding those fees outright.) The legislative record, however, makes clear that Congress omitted the "attorney" from the payees list accidentally.

As discussed in the leading bankruptcy treatise, the omission occurred as a result of a final change to a "last minute addition * * * to the 1994 Act." 3 Collier ¶ 330.LH[5], at 330-75. The revision to Section 330(a) occurred on the final day the 1994 Act was considered, along with numerous amendments, by the Senate (April 21, 1994). Five months later, the bill was introduced in the House and passed the next day (October 5, 1994). In only one day (October 6, 1994), it was returned to, and passed by, the Senate. Respondent's emphatic claims that Section 330(a) was pending for "over five additional months" before enactment (Br. 27 (emphasis in original)) and was the subject of "over a year of deliberations" (id. 29) are thus misleading. The "five months" was a period in which the bill was not pending in either chamber. The "year" refers to the seven-month stretch before the relevant amendment was made to Section 330(a) and the five-month period in which neither the House nor the Senate had the bill before it.

It is also obvious how the inadvertent omission occurred. The reference to the debtor's attorney in the payees list was dropped when the succeeding clause was deleted and then reinserted in another place. The drafter simply struck out too much text, a conclusion reinforced by the fact that the deletion extended to the necessary conjunction "or." See Pet. Br. 25-30. As respondent itself points out, that subsequent clause and the amendment as a whole involved the review of fee applications by the U.S. Trustee, which is "an entirely different subject matter" from the courts' authority to award fees. Br. 30; see also 3 Collier ¶ 330.LH[5], at 330-73; Norton Bankruptcy Law and Practice § 26:5, at 206 (2d ed. 1997 Supp.). Although respondent asserts that "[i]t is exceedingly unlikely that the statute's drafters * * * failed to notice" the omission (Br. 30), the last-minute nature of the change makes it not unlikely at all, as even respondent implicitly acknowledges in arguing that Congress inadvertently overlooked its "fail[ure] to make corresponding changes" in the providers list (id. 15). Indeed, petitioner's opening brief demonstrated, and respondent does not contest, that the 1994 amendments introduced numerous other obviously inadvertent errors into the Code. Pet. Br. 27 n.5.

The sequence of the amendment's transformation from a last-minute cut-and-paste job to federal law indicates that this is no more than an instance in which a reorganization caused a statutory reference to be "lost in the shuffle" (United States v. Wilson, 503 U.S. 329, 336 (1992)), a fact that this Court can and will recognize without some specially persuasive showing that Congress made a scrivener's error (id.). Here, as in Wilson, "Congress entirely rewrote [the statute] when it changed it to its present form": "It rearranged its clauses, rephrased its central idea * * *, and more than doubled its length." Id. Indeed, there is even more reason to recognize that the omission was inadvertent here than there was in Wilson, because here the Court can determine "what happened to the [missing] reference" (id.): the drafter inadvertently omitted the "attorney" in an entirely unrelated, "last-minute change" (3 Collier ¶ 330.LH[5], at 330-75) to the adjoining clause in the statute. Cf. Fulman v. United States, 434 U.S. 528, 539 (1978) ("we will not read legislation to abandon previously prevailing law when, as here, a recodification of law is incomplete or departs substantially and without explanation from prior law").[3]

[3] Respondent's repeated emphasis that the omission was noted without objection in the House does not support its view that Congress acted purposefully. The cited reference is buried in a single sentence of written testimony for a House hearing that appears in a 718-page hearing record. Bankruptcy Reform: Hrg. on H.R. 5116 Before the Subcomm. On the Economy and Comm. Law of the House Comm. On the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 551 (1994). Respondent's contention that the point was made by the National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys (NACBA), which respondent contends is the nation's most expert organization on these questions (Br. 27-28, 32), is genuinely strange. Respondent has either forgotten or decided to ignore that NACBA filed a brief in this very case explaining that the Fourth Circuit's refusal to recognize that the omission of "the debtor's attorney" was an inadvertent error that if not recognized as such would have a "pernicious real world effect" on the orderly

II. Respondent's Contradictory Policy Arguments Do Not Call For A Different Result.

Although respondent advances policy arguments that it contends support its position, the fact that those arguments are mutually inconsistent and unsupported by the legislative record demonstrates that respondent's position is at best a post hoc rationalization and not an accurate reflection of Congress's intent. That conclusion is reinforced by the undisputed fact that Congress expressly considered and rejected these very policy arguments in enacting Section 330(a) in 1978. On the one hand, respondent hypothesizes that Congress "rationally could have determined" (Br. 6) to eliminate the availability of fees for debtors' attorneys under Section 330(a)(1) in order to prevent attorneys from "siphoning off" estate assets in Chapter 7 cases or as leverage to discourage debtors from pursuing relief under Chapter 7 rather than Chapters 12 and 13. On the other hand, respondent takes the opposite position that such a policy choice would be essentially meaningless because attorneys will still be paid under the Code from the assets of the estate, including in Chapter 7, because (inter alia) they may be hired by the trustee.

administration of bankruptcy proceedings. See NACBA Cert. Amicus Br. 6. (NACBA's position was stated sufficiently clearly at the cert. stage that it was unnecessary to file a duplicative merits amicus brief.) Although respondent contends that NACBA did not oppose the 1994 amendments because it believed the change was not problematic, NACBA's statement makes clear (as does its brief in this case) that the organization believed Congress or the courts would ignore the omission as "inadvertent." Hrg. on H.R. 5116, supra, at 551.

Respondent's invocation of "subsequent" legislative history is flawed for the reasons set out in petitioner's opening brief, which respondent ignores. The bills that would have corrected the omission of "attorney" contained numerous other provisions that could have caused them not to pass. And given that most courts have deemed the omission unintentional, it is not surprising that Congress found it unnecessary to intervene. See Pet. Br. 30.

If Congress had concluded that any of these were genuinely "[s]ubstantial policy reasons" for the 1994 amendment (Resp. Br. 35), it would have pursued them coherently, and those reasons would have been acknowledged somewhere in the legislative history, whether by a legislator, by respondent in its own comments on the Act, or by at least a witness. But the entire history of the Act contains not a single instance in which anyone made those arguments, or even expressed more general concern regarding the longstanding availability of Chapter 7 attorney's fees. That silence is deafening here, for respondent is asking this Court to read the last-minute omission of one reference to the "attorney" in Section 330(a)(1) as embodying a significant change in bankruptcy policy that Congress consistently rejected for nearly a century. See supra at 3-4.

Further, respondent's claim that it is presenting an "experience[d] and considered view" on these policy matters (Br. 38) – like its quotation of its own public relations materials stating that it "acts in the public interest" (Br. 1 (quoting http://www.usdoj.gov/ust/mission.htm)) – rings hollow. Neither prior to nor in the course of the 1994 revision to Section 330(a)(1) did respondent suggest the change in the availability of fees that it now reads into the statute.

Rather, respondent's position is openly directed at arrogating to itself authority that trustees were not granted by Congress. The 1994 amendments to Section 330(a) conferred on the U.S. Trustee the right to review and comment on fee applications, including those submitted by debtors' attorneys. See 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(1), (2). But respondent would convert the amendment into the much broader authority – which the U.S. Trustee has never possessed – to control which attorneys are retained in the first instance. It thus contends that attorneys in Chapter 7 cases may be paid from estate funds only if hired by the trustee. See Resp. Br. 6-7. All the available evidence refutes the suggestion that Congress intended such a sweeping expansion of trustees' powers.[4] [4] Respondent's assertion that it is not the courts but "the United States Trustees[] who are charged with supervising the

---

As petitioner now shows, in the 1994 amendments, Congress was not pursuing the policies suggested by respondent.

1. Respondent opines that the 1994 omission of "debtor's attorney" may have been intended to preserve the assets of the estate because "under petitioner's interpretation" debtors supposedly would "siphon funds from the estate to pay the debtor's attorney" (Br. 37 n.10) and "divert[]" those funds from creditors (id. 6). The legislative history on which respondent relies, however, undermines its claim. Although the sponsor of the 1994 amendment (Senator Metzenbaum) expressed concern over excessive attorney's fees being awarded in large corporate reorganizations (140 Cong. Rec. at S14,597), those cases are overwhelmingly Chapter 11 "debtor in possession" proceedings, which is the lone category of cases that respondent contends was unaffected by the 1994 amendment. Indeed, the prototypical example cited by Senator Metzenbaum was the Chapter 11 reorganization of Colt Manufacturing. See id. (citing Laurence Zuckerman, Judgment Day for a Legal Powerhouse, N.Y. Times, Sept. 25, 1994, at C2). Further, respondent quotes Senator Metzenbaum's statement that he was "particularly pleased that [his] proposal relating to professional fees [was] included in the act" (Br. 31), but omits that the proposal was (as the next sentence of the Senator's statement explains) not the elimination of fees in any cases but the enactment "in clear and concise terms [of] those factors that must be considered when administration of bankruptcy cases" (Resp. Br. 7) is contradicted by the very statute respondent cites. The "supervis[ory]" authority of the U.S. Trustees that respondent invokes with respect to attorney's fees does not include acting on fee requests (that is the court's responsibility (see 11 U.S.C. 330(a)) but instead is limited to "reviewing * * * applications filed for compensation and reimbursement under section 330" and "filing with the court" any "comments [or] objections to such application[s]" (28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(A)). This responsibility applies "in cases under chapter 7, 11, 12 or 13." Id. (emphasis added). But respondent reads Section 330(a) to forbid Chapter 7 debtors from submitting attorney's fee applications.

deciding the appropriateness of the fee request" (140 Cong. Rec. at S14,597).

As an entirely separate matter, respondent's argument rests on an important misstatement of basic bankruptcy law. The 1978 Act specifically rejected the view that attorney's fees waste estate assets. See supra at 3-4. Congress in the 1994 Act then adopted Senator Metzenbaum's proposal to codify the rule that courts may approve fees for services "likely to benefit the debtor's estate" or "necessary to the administration of the case." 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(A). See generally 3 Collier ¶ 330.03[3], at 330-25. Respondent inexplicably ignores not only this central provision but also the many cases demonstrating that courts rigorously scrutinize fee applications. See Pet. Br. App. 33a-35a. If a fee application involves an actual "diver[sion]" of funds that should be paid to creditors, it will be denied.

Further, on respondent's reading, Chapter 7 attorney's fees will still be paid from the assets of the estate, albeit in a way Congress could not have intended. Respondent contends that attorneys will be retained by the trustee and/or will receive a pre-petition retainer from the debtor. Br. 36-37. The funds to pay an attorney hired by the trustee are paid from the estate under Section 330(a)(1). Similarly, the funds for a pre-petition retainer would otherwise form part of the estate. 11 U.S.C. 541(a)(1). By encouraging the use of such retainers, respondent's position perversely reduces the court's authority to scrutinize payments to attorneys. See Pet. Br. 35-36 (explaining that pre-petition retainers are subject to less rigorous review under Section 329(b) than are fees under Section 330(a)). This case – in which the bankruptcy and district courts agreed that the retainer petitioner was paid by his client was "reasonable" without scrutinizing the services petitioner provided – is a perfect example.

In any event, respondent's reading of the 1994 amendment to Section 330(a) would not reduce the availability of fees only under Chapter 7. It would more broadly eliminate the authority to pay debtors' counsel for services necessary and beneficial to the estate in most bankruptcies: those under Chapters 7, 12, and 13, as well as under Chapter 11 if the debtor is "out of possession." Respondent repeatedly mischaracterizes the issue as implicating Chapter 7 alone, acknowledging only at the end of its brief that it reads the 1994 amendment as eliminating the power to pay such fees not merely "in chapter 7 cases" but also in "chapter 11 cases where a trustee has been appointed." Br. 35. Even this statement omits that courts would have no authority to pay fees either (i) to counsel for individual Chapter 12 and 13 debtors for services that benefit the estate but not the debtor or (ii) in any cases involving Chapter 12 business debtors. See 11 U.S.C. 330(a)(4)(B).

2. Nor does respondent have a persuasive explanation for why Congress in 1994 would have intended to eliminate the availability of attorney's fees in many Chapter 7 cases while simultaneously expanding the availability of fees under Chapters 12 and 13. Throughout the history of federal bankruptcy law, the authority to award fees has applied uniformly to all forms of bankruptcy, and there is no substantial reason Congress would have intended for the first time to, sub silentio, draw the distinction hypothesized by respondent.

Respondent contends that in cases under Chapters 12 and 13, as well as when a Chapter 11 debtor is "in possession," the debtors "pursue along with creditors the common goal of crafting a repayment plan to pay creditors from an estate that includes post-petition assets and income." Br. 35. By contrast, under Chapter 7, the estate is administered by a trustee and involves liquidation rather than repayment. Id. 36. But respondent has done no more than identify commonalities and distinctions among some kinds of bankruptcy. Innumerable other lines could be drawn. For example, Chapter 7 and 11 cases involve larger estates while Chapters 12 and 13 are subject to defined income limits. Chapters 7, 11, and 12 involve businesses and therefore more complex reorganizations, while cases under Chapter 13 only involve individuals. But none of these comparisons, including those made by respondent, relates to whether Congress intended fees to be paid from the estate.

Respondent's argument that "Chapter 7 is a zero-sum game in which any funds diverted from the estate to pay attorneys reduce the amount of funds available to pay creditors" (Br. 6) misapprehends how Chapter 7 operates. Neither the claims against the estate nor the assets of the estate are finally established at the point a bankruptcy petition is filed. Rather, the debtor and the trustee often work to reduce the claims against the estate and maximize the value of the assets. Debtor's counsel assists the trustee in pursuing adversary proceedings that will generate funds for the estate, including avoiding "preferences" to increase the size of the estate for creditors (see, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 547-550), cooperates with the trustee examining proofs of claim filed against the estate (see Bankr. R. 4002(4)), and takes steps to ensure that the bankruptcy process operates smoothly (such as providing information to the affected parties) to ensure that the estate's funds are properly distributed to creditors (see 11 U.S.C. 521).

3. Respondent alternatively emphasizes that one goal of the 1994 amendments to Section 330(a) was to encourage individual debtors eligible for treatment under Chapters 12 and 13 to reorganize under those provisions. Br. 26-27. That fact is no help to respondent because that objective was pursued through the enactment of Section 330(a)(4)(B), not any change to Section 330(a)(1). See supra at 6-9. Respondent imagines that Congress might have omitted the prior authorization to pay debtors' counsel from subsection (a)(1) as the "stick" to accompany the "carrot" of newly enacted subsection (a)(4)(B), hypothesizing that "Congress rationally could have sought to * * * encourage the use of chapter 13 by precluding debtors' attorneys from seeking compensation from chapter 7 estates." Br. 26-27. Respondent offers only one piece of support for this unusual theory, in which Congress begrudges compensation for services that are "necessary" or "beneficial" to the estate. It is Senator Heflin's statement that his amendment to Section 330(a) would encourage Chapter 13 filings. Br. 24-25 (quoting 140 Cong. Rec. S4507 (daily ed. Apr. 20, 1994)). But respondent concedes that this statement was made "before the phrase 'or the debtor's attorney' was deleted from the bill" (id. 24), as it refers instead to the provision that became subsection (a)(4)(B).

Further, only petitioner's construction is consistent with Congress's goal of encouraging resort to Chapters 12 and 13.

Under any reading, Section 330(a)(4)(B) provides that individual Chapter 12 and 13 debtors may compensate their counsel for services that benefit the debtor. But respondent's reading prohibits attorney's fees in Chapters 12 and 13 in important circumstances, and it is therefore less likely to encourage use of Chapters 12 and 13. Only petitioner's reading permits business Chapter 12 filers to pay fees and furthermore permits debtors to compensate their counsel for services that benefit only the debtor's estate.

Respondent would also read the statute as a blunderbuss that is inconsistent with the statute's supposed purpose of encouraging individual debtors to pursue relief under Chapters 12 and 13. Chapters 12 and 13 are limited to, respectively, "family farmers with regular annual income" (11 U.S.C. 109(f)) and "individuals with regular income" but certain maximum debts (id. § 109(e)). Of particular importance, the great majority of the approximately 40,000 Chapter 7 filings that respondent contends involve ongoing attorney's fees under Section 330(a)(1) are likely to be more complicated business liquidations ineligible for treatment under Chapters 12 and 13. It is no coincidence that the 40,000 figure is roughly comparable to the annual average of approximately 34,500 Chapter 7 bankruptcy filings by businesses. See http://www.uscourts.gov/judicialfactsfigures/table5.2.htm. This case perfectly illustrates the misfit between the elimination of the availability of fees under Section 330(a)(1) and the goal of encouraging resort to Chapters 12 or 13. Because petitioner's client is a company, neither Chapter 12 nor Chapter 13 was ever an option.

At bottom, respondent ignores the many respects in which its interpretation does not fit with the statutory goals it imagines Congress might have been pursuing. Just a few examples demonstrate the point. If Congress had actually concluded that fees are merited in Chapter 12 and 13 cases (Br. 35), why would it have eliminated them for services that benefit the estate (as opposed to the debtor) in such cases or for all services in Chapter 12 business cases? If Congress had actually intended to draw a distinction based on whether creditors would be paid from post-petition assets (id. 35), why would it have eliminated fees in Chapter 11 cases in which the debtor is out of possession? And if Congress had actually concluded that it was sufficient that individual debtors under Chapter 7 and debtors generally under Chapter 11 could pay their attorneys from pre- or post-petition assets (id. 37 & n.10), why would it have not applied the same approach in all forms of bankruptcy?

4. Petitioner's opening brief collected not "apocryphal allegations" (contra Resp. Br. 33) but an array of authorities – including the leading bankruptcy treatise and the judges in this very case – recognizing that respondent's construction will have genuine adverse consequences for bankruptcy administration. See Pet. Br. 31-34. Respondent's reading produces a "very powerful disincentive * * * to attorneys to accept Chapter 7 cases in the first place, or to provide anything beyond the most perfunctory required post-petition services." Pet. App. 42a.

The limited data collected by respondent does not undermine that showing. Respondent acknowledges that its position would prohibit the payment of fees from the estate in the approximately 40,000 Chapter 7 cases each year in which the estate has assets (Br. 38), which is a significant number. Moreover, these are precisely the cases – those in which the bankruptcy will actually be litigated rather than a simple liquidation – in which the presence of counsel is most important to bankruptcy administration.

Although respondent characterizes the duties of a debtor as "very limited" (Br. 40), it cites an array of responsibilities, many of which can be performed only with the assistance of counsel. Respondent acknowledges the obligations to attend a creditors meeting and to be prepared to answer questions regarding the assets and liabilities of the estate (11 U.S.C. 341); file a list of creditors and schedule of assets and liabilities (id. § 521(1)); file a statement regarding secured assets (id. § 521(2)); cooperate in the execution of the trustee's duties (id. § 521(3)); surrender relevant books and records (id. § 521(4)); appear at any discharge hearings (id. § 521(5)); cooperate in examining proofs of claim and identify real property (Bankr. R. 4002); and identify exempt property (id. R. 4003). Petitioner's opening brief also collected an array of case law, which respondent ignores, demonstrating the many services performed by debtor's counsel, including in Chapter 7 cases, as in United States Trustee v. Garvey, 195 F.3d 1053, 1060 (CA9 1999), in which the debtor's attorney "filed the conversion petition, prepared schedules, amended reports, a statement of affairs, and a Rule 2015 report, communicated with creditors, and participated in 2004 examinations." The court accordingly recognized that "[i]nterpreting the ambiguous provision in § 330(a)(1) so as to eliminate the possibility of post-petition compensation for Chapter 7 debtor's attorneys would significantly alter the ability of Chapter 7 debtors to secure counsel in order to perform these services – a fundamental change in bankruptcy law." See generally Pet. Br. App. 29a-32a. The notion that an individual could undertake these tasks without a lawyer, much less that an officer of a corporation could do so in a complex bankruptcy proceeding, is not even a serious argument. Importantly, these are duties of the debtor that cannot be performed by an attorney retained by the trustee to represent the estate.

This very case is a perfect illustration. Respondent cannot, and does not, contest that the debtor in this case – a small mine-services company – would have been completely incapable of undertaking the responsibilities performed by petitioner, as required by the Code. See Pet. Br. 5-7, 30. Respondent does argue that some of these tasks "should have been performed by the trustee or counsel retained by the trustee." Br. 41. Many others, however, indisputably were the responsibility of the debtor's counsel. Further, respondent's view would produce a substantially less efficient bankruptcy system. Petitioner, as the attorney with the relationship with the debtor and the knowledge of the case, was best positioned to promptly resolve issues relating to the status of the estate. That is no doubt why both the judge and the trustee turned to him. Nor does anything in the Code preclude the debtor's counsel from undertaking such tasks, as even respondent implicitly acknowledges in arguing (Br. 37) that debtor's counsel can be paid for post-petition services through a pre-petition retainer or post-bankruptcy assets. And requiring the trustee regularly to secure judicial approval to hire the debtor's counsel would be a profound waste of resources.

Thus, although respondent quotes Judge Thomas's statement that "[i]n many Chapter 7 cases, there is little for the debtor's attorney to do after the petition is filed" (Br. 40 (quoting In re Century Cleaning Servs., 195 F.3d 1053, 1064 (CA9 1999) (dissenting opinion))), it omits his conclusion that the distinction between classes of debtors drawn by respondent "makes no sense" (id. (quoting In re Ames Dep't Stores, 76 F.3d 66, 782 (CA2 1996))) and that, while "in the typical 'no asset' Chapter 7 case, there is little activity after the filing of the petition other than attendance at the section 341 hearing," > in many cases, the debtor's attorney is called upon to represent the debtor in post-petition adversary proceedings, Rule 2004 examinations, and in reaffirmation hearings. In more complex Chapter 7 bankruptcies, post-petition demands on the debtor's counsel increase dramatically. Categorical exclusion of fees can only result in denial of access to justice, with debtors unrepresented or under-represented. The increase in pro se cases, and in cases which become pro se after the petition is filed, does not aid the administration of our bankruptcy system.

Id. (emphases added).

* * * *

This case calls on the Court to interpret an inherently ambiguous statute. Of the two possible readings, petitioner's best comports with the text of the specific provision and the statute as a whole. It also best makes sense of the course of last-minute events that led to the introduction of the ambiguity. And, particularly important in the context of bankruptcy law, it comports with longstanding bankruptcy practice, from which Congress gave no indication of an intent to depart. The judgment of the court of appeals should accordingly be reversed.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, as well as those set forth in petitioner's opening brief, the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit should be reversed.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction over this Chapter 7 proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(a). The District Court had appellate jurisdiction over the Bankruptcy Court's final order pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). This appeal was timely filed on September 4, 1998. This Court has jurisdiction over the District Court's final order dated August 7, 1998, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 158(d) and 1291.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Whether the District Court erred as a matter of law in strictly interpreting 11 U.S.C. § 326(a)[1/] to exclude the credit bid portion of a 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) sale from the calculation of maximum trustee compensation.

2. Whether the District Court erred as a matter of law in holding that the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum is not a factor in determining reasonable trustee compensation under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a).

3. Whether the District Court erred in holding that the Bankruptcy Court's reasonableness determination cannot be influenced by the timing of the U.S.

[1/] As the underlying bankruptcy case was filed in 1992, unless otherwise noted all citations to title 11, United States Code, refer to that statute as it existed prior to the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994.

Trustee's objection nor the hardship disgorgement would cause the Trustee.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This appeal is from an order of the Honorable Joseph E. Irenas, U.S. District Judge for the District of New Jersey ("District Court") reversing an order of the Honorable Judith H. Wizmur, U.S. Bankruptcy Judge ("Bankruptcy Court") that had awarded final compensation to James J. Cain ("Trustee"). The United States Trustee ("U.S. Trustee") had objected to Trustee's Final Report on the grounds that the Trustee had received interim compensation in excess of the maximum established by 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). That provision limits trustee compensation to a percentage of "moneys disbursed or turned over by the trustee to parties in interest," which the U.S. Trustee interprets as requiring the actual disbursement of cash.

In this case, however, the Trustee based his compensation on cash disbursements plus the value of a $7.78 million credit bid made pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) by the secured creditor in purchasing the estate's main asset. Rather than selling the asset, disbursing any cash received to unsecured creditors, and then basing his compensation on a percentage of cash disbursements, the Trustee first calculated the compensation he would request, then carved out a small portion to set aside for unsecured creditors. Thus, the sale benefitted the Trustee in an amount almost four times the benefit received by unsecured creditors. By basing his compensation on noncash disbursements, the Trustee has violated his fiduciary duty and administered the estate so as to primarily benefit himself, with only a residual benefit to unsecured creditors.

The principal issue in this case is whether the Trustee properly included the credit bid in calculating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum. The Bankruptcy Court loosely interpreted the statute and allowed the credit bid to be included; the District Court literally interpreted it and allowed only cash disbursements to be included.

Other issues raised by this case include: (i) whether the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum is a factor in the 11 U.S.C. § 330 determination of reasonable trustee compensation; (ii) whether the fact that the U.S. Trustee objected to neither the asset sale nor the interim compensation request may influence the reasonableness determination; (iii) whether the hardship caused by the Trustee's possible disgorgement of excess interim compensation may be included in the reasonableness determination; and (iv) whether the Trustee's interim compensation was, in fact, reasonable. The Bankruptcy Court's answer to each of these issues was "Yes." The District Court's answer to the first three was "No," so it remanded the case for a reasonableness determination devoid of extraneous factors.

Although the District Court did not address the reasonableness of the Trustee's compensation, if its decision is affirmed the Bankruptcy Court on remand will only be able to base maximum compensation on cash disbursements. Thus, regardless of what amount is deemed reasonable compensation in light of the benefit the Trustee's services conferred to the estate, the Trustee will have to disgorge over $142,000.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On July 6, 1992, LAN Associates XI, L.P. ("Debtor") filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of title 11, United States Code ("Bankruptcy Code" or "Code"). JA3. On August 24, 1992, the Bankruptcy Court, entered an order directing the U.S. Trustee to appoint a trustee pursuant to Code Section 1104(a), and the Trustee was subsequently appointed. JA9. On May 21, 1993, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order converting this case to one under Chapter 7 of the Code and allowing the Debtor to be operated pursuant to Code Section 721. JA17. The U.S. Trustee subsequently appointed the Trustee to serve as Chapter 7 trustee. Id.

This estate's principal asset was a parcel of real property ("Property") originally valued at $9,000,000 by the Debtor. JA76, JA176. The Property was encumbered by the mortgage of First Fidelity Bank, N.A. ("Bank"), which filed a proof of claim for $12,865,434.55. JA204. The Property was later appraised at a fair market value of $9,727,000 and a liquidation value of $7,781,200. JA77.

By interlocutory order dated April 8, 1993, the Trustee was awarded interim compensation of $28,665.51 based upon disbursements of $949,183.54, all made as Chapter 11 trustee. JA73, JA46. As he rendered 163.5 hours of services, the Trustee received compensation at the rate of $175.26 per hour. JA43.

In January 1994, the Trustee filed a motion to approve the Property's sale. JA76-81. In support the he certified that the Bank proposed a transaction in which no cash would change hands, but the Bank would bid a portion of its claim pursuant to Code Section 363(k) in an amount equal to the liquidation value ("Credit Bid"), waive its deficiency claim of approximately $5 million, and allow the Trustee to retain $372,387 in cash collateral already in the Trustee's account. JA77-79. The Trustee also stated that notice of the sale would allow other bidders to submit higher and better offers. JA77. The sale price as noticed comprised a $7,781,200 credit bid. JA88.

The Trustee further certified that he "ha[d] an ability" to pursue the Debtor's general partner, Antonio Reale, "for any deficiency of property of the estate to pay all claims of the estate." JA77. The Trustee asserted that if the Property were abandoned "waiting for a foreclosure to be completed in order for the deficiency to be determined would significantly delay the commencement of" any action against Mr. Reale. JA78.

The Trustee anticipated a $70,000 "commission" on cash disbursed while operating the Property and a $233,616 "commission" on the sale. Id. The Trustee further certified that to pay administrative claims and a "meaningful distribution" estimated at 25% to unsecured creditors he "agreed to contribute $83,346.00 of the commission that [he] would have been authorized to receive if the property sold for at least $7,781,200.00." JA80. Finally, he asserted that, although he believed the distribution to unsecured creditors would be meaningful, even without such distribution the sale should be approved to facilitate any action against Mr. Reale. Id.

The Bankruptcy Court authorized the sale by a February 14, 1994 order that made no mention of the amount of compensation to be awarded based on the sale. JA92-94. The Trustee thereafter "sold" the Property to a subsidiary of the Bank. JA96. The Trustee's Deed dated March 30, 1994, indicated that the consideration paid for the Property was not the $7,781,200 credit bid certified to the Bankruptcy Court and noticed to creditors, but a $7,408,813 credit bid plus $372,387 in cash. JA98-101.[2]

[2] The discrepancy does not affect this appeal. If the Credit Bid (whatever the amount) cannot be included in the Section 326(a) calculation, the $372,387 in cash disbursed may still be included. Similarly, if this Court concludes that the Bankruptcy Court's reasonableness analysis was satisfactory, the issue will be moot.

In October 1994, the Trustee submitted an application for interim compensation of $204,522.76 and reimbursement of $999.40 in expenses. JA106. The requested compensation amounted to an hourly rate of $403.09 based on 578.50 hours of services, some as Chapter 11 trustee and some as Chapter 7 trustee. JA129.

In calculating the disbursements upon which he based his compensation request, the Trustee added the Credit Bid to "operating revenues" of $2,763,942.42, making total disbursements of $10,545,142.42. JA109. From this amount he calculated an "allowable commission" of $316,534.27, or $547.16 per hour. JA110, 129. The Trustee then subtracted the $28,665.51 interim compensation previously received plus a "voluntary reduction" of $83,346 from which a "meaningful distribution" of $62,500 to unsecured creditors was anticipated. JA110-11.

On December 2, 1994, the Bankruptcy Court entered an interlocutory order authorizing the interim compensation as requested. JA159. Although estate

If, however, this Court holds that the Credit Bid may be included but still remands for a further reasonableness determination, the Bankruptcy Court must determine whether the Trustee based his compensation calculation solely on "sale proceeds" of $7,781,200 (which includes the $372,387 cash), or whether he based it on the constructive disbursement of $7,781,200 plus the actual disbursement of $372,387. If the Bankruptcy Court finds that the Trustee counted the $372,387 twice, the Trustee could have to disgorge over $11,000 on this basis alone.

administration was not complete, on December 6, 1994, the Trustee paid himself the entire award of $204,522.76. JA196.

In March 1995 the Trustee filed a motion to permit him to disburse $62,500 to unsecured creditors. JA160-64. The Bankruptcy Court subsequently entered an order authorizing the distribution, and the Trustee disbursed the funds. JA169, JA195. The U.S. Trustee calculated the disbursement as only 19% of the $328,538.03 total allowed unsecured claims, not 25% as previously represented by the Trustee. JA229.

On October 6, 1995, the Trustee's proposed abandonment of his cause of action against Mr. Reale was noticed to all creditors. JA32. Despite the Trustee's use of his potential action against Mr. Reale as a reason to approve the sale of the Property, the Trustee did not reference it as an asset in his Final Report. JA176.

On November 13, 1995, the Trustee forwarded his Final Report to the U.S. Trustee pursuant to Code Section 704(9). JA171. As of that date the Trustee held $19,086.88, from which he proposed a 73% pro rata disbursement to the remaining administrative claimants. JA224. The Trustee requested no additional compensation and certified that the interim compensation previously approved and paid did not exceed the Code Section 326(a) maximum. JA207.

The U.S. Trustee determined that as Chapter 11 trustee the Trustee disbursed cash totaling $1,333,503.14. JA235. Thus, the U.S. Trustee calculated the Trustee's Section 326(a) maximum compensation as Chapter 11 trustee to be $40,185.94. Id. The U.S. Trustee further calculated gross estate proceeds of $1,679,097.80 as Chapter 7 trustee. JA235. The Section 326(a) maximum compensation on the disbursement of this amount is $50,552.93. Id. As a result, the U.S. Trustee calculated that the Trustee's maximum allowable compensation is only $90,738.87. JA235-36.

The U.S. Trustee objected to the Final Report on the grounds that the plain meaning of Code Section 326(a) requires maximum trustee compensation to be based only on cash disbursements. JA226-40. As the Credit Bid was not "moneys" for purposes of Section 326(a), the U.S. Trustee argued that the Trustee must disgorge the $142,449.40 excess interim compensation based on the Credit Bid, plus interest, and distribute these funds to unsecured creditors. Id.

The Trustee responded that the U.S. Trustee received notice of both the sale of the Property and the subsequent interim compensation application and should be precluded from objecting to the Trustee's compensation at the final hearing. See Bankruptcy Court Decision, in Addendum A to this Brief, at 10. The Trustee also asserted that the Credit Bid was a "constructive disbursement" of moneys for purposes of Section 326(a). Id. at 11.

On March 16, 1998, the Bankruptcy Court rendered a written decision in which it agreed with the U.S. Trustee that, as the interim compensation orders were not final orders, the objection was not precluded by the doctrines of res judicata, collateral estoppel, law of the case, laches, equitable estoppel, or trustee immunity. Bankruptcy Court Decision at 22-28. The Court disagreed with the U.S. Trustee, however, regarding whether the Credit Bid could be included in the Section 326(a) calculation. Id. at 17-21. Noting that cases decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 ("Bankruptcy Act" or "Act") had acknowledged the possibility of including "constructive disbursements" as "moneys disbursed or turned over," the Bankruptcy Court determined that Section 326(a) was ambiguous, and could not be strictly applied as written. Id. at 12-17. As a result, the Court held that the Trustee had properly included the Credit Bid in calculating his compensation request. Id. at 17.

The Bankruptcy Court then addressed whether the Trustee's compensation was reasonable. Bankruptcy Court Decision at 28. The Court rejected the U.S. Trustee's assertion that trustee compensation is subject to a Code Section 330(a) reasonableness determination to which the Section 326(a) cap must be strictly imposed. Id. at 31. Instead, the Court held that Congress intended trustee compensation to be different from compensation payable to other professionals. Id.

The Court found that Section 326(a) serves as an incentive compensation system that allows trustees to receive a percentage of assets brought into the estate. Id. Noting that in its experience trustees generally receive the maximum, and further stating that the Trustee had received less than the maximum by virtue of his "voluntary reduction," the Court held that the Trustee's compensation was reasonable. Id. at 32-34.

The Bankruptcy Court directed some funds disgorged, however. Id. at 35. As the Trustee had always asserted enough of a carve out from his "commission" to fund a 25% distribution to unsecured creditors, the Court directed him to disgorge $19,634.51. Id. at 37. This amount, when added to the distribution already made, would bring to 25% the total distribution to unsecured creditors. Id.

The U.S. Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal, and the Trustee did not cross-appeal either the preclusion issue or the disgorgement issue. JA35. The District Court did not entertain oral argument and, after reviewing the briefs of the parties and the National Association of Bankruptcy Trustees ("NABT") as amicus curiae, entered an order dated August 7, 1998 reversing the Bankruptcy Court's decision and remanding this case for a new determination of the Trustee's compensation award. See District Court Decision, in Addendum A to this Brief, at 2. The District Court's decision was based on the plain meaning of Section 326(a), which allows compensation only on moneys actually disbursed. Id. at 12-15. The District Court "predict[ed] that the Third Circuit would not endorse the constructive disbursement theory, at least not in the context of a credit bid sale." Id. at 17. Citing the support for the U.S. Trustee's position in case law and in the legislative history, the District Court concluded that it was legal error for the Bankruptcy Court to allow the Trustee to include the Credit Bid in calculating his maximum compensation. Id. at 23.

The District Court also held that "it is legal error to import § 326(a)'s maximum compensation levels into the reasonableness analysis," and that to the extent the Bankruptcy Court did so it must limit its decision on remand to the Section 330(a) criteria. Id. at 25. The District Court further held that to the extent the Bankruptcy Court considered factors such as the timing of the U.S. Trustee's objection and the hardship caused by disgorgement it abused its discretion and on remand would be required to limit its analysis to the Section 330(a) criteria. Id. at 26.

The Trustee filed a timely notice of appeal of the District Court's order. JA1.

STATEMENT OF STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

In reviewing the District Court's decision for error this Court reviews the Bankruptcy Court's findings using the standards applicable to the District Court. See Universal Minerals, Inc. v. C.A. Hughes & Co., 669 F.2d 98, 102 (3d Cir. 1981). Questions of law are reviewed de novo. First Jersey Nat'l Bank v. Brown (In re Brown), 951 F.2d 564, 567 (3d Cir. 1991). Findings of fact are set aside only if clearly erroneous. Stendardo v. Federal Nat'l Mortgage Ass'n (In re Stendardo), 991 F.2d 1089, 1094 (3d Cir. 1993). In addition, "[f]ee awards are reviewed for an abuse of discretion, which can occur 'if the judge fails to apply the proper legal standard or to follow proper procedures in making the determination, or bases an award upon findings of fact that are clearly erroneous.'" Zolfo, Cooper & Co. v. Sunbeam-Oster Co., 50 F.3d 253, 257 (3d Cir. 1995) (quoting Electro-Wire Prods., Inc. v. Sirote & Permutt, P.C. (In re Prince), 40 F.3d 356, 359 (11th Cir. 1994)).

The standard of review regarding Issues Nos. 1 and 2 is plenary, as these are purely questions of law. As Issue No. 3 is a question of both law and fact, the standard of review is plenary as to whether the Bankruptcy Court properly considered the timing of the U.S. Trustee's objection and the potential hardship of disgorgement on the Trustee, and abuse of discretion as to the Bankruptcy Court's determination of the reasonableness of the Trustee's compensation.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Congress based maximum trustee compensation on cash disbursements. See 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). Nonetheless, the Trustee received $142,449.40 in excess interim compensation calculated upon a "sale" of this estate's principal asset in which the secured creditor merely bid $7.78 million of its claim while allowing the Trustee to retain funds already in his account. Indeed, the Trustee reversed the usual process, basing the sale's terms on the amount of compensation he expected rather than simply selling the asset first and applying for compensation later. Despite the Trustee's fiduciary duty to administer estate assets for the benefit of creditors, he was the intended primary beneficiary of the sale from its inception.

Rather than basing his compensation on the tangible benefit his services obtained for the estate, the Trustee based the creditors's return on the $316,534.27 "allowable commission" to which he believes he is "entitled" as a result of the "sale." Although the Trustee "carved out" a return of $62,500 to unsecured creditors, constituting 19% of their allowed claims, this return pales in comparison to the Trustee's receipt of 85% of the $372,387 cash proceeds of the "sale." Once recovered into the estate pursuant to Section 506(c) these funds should have been paid mostly to unsecured creditors with a small percentage to the Trustee – not the other way around.

The District Court properly applied Code Section 326(a) literally, and its decision should be affirmed. The District Court's decision is consistent with the vast majority of cases interpreting Section 326(a) (including the only circuit court to do so), basic tenets of statutory construction applied by this Circuit, the legislative history, and Third Circuit cases decided under the Bankruptcy Act. The contrary position espoused by the Trustee and the NABT would require a sea change in the way this Circuit interprets statutes, and would open the door to erratic, case-by-case determinations of the meaning of "moneys disbursed or turned over." Indeed, it is not even clear that the Trustee's position was uniformly applied under the Act – and Congress did not include in Section 326(a) the Act-era language that might have supported compensation on constructive disbursements. If the Third Circuit adopts a loose interpretation of Section 326(a), the provision would be rendered meaningless and Congress' expressed intent to limit trustee compensation would be lost.

In addition, to the extent the Bankruptcy Court considered the Section 326(a) maximum as a factor in the 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) determination of reasonable trustee compensation, it was clearly in error. Section 330 establishes the basis for determining compensation to all estate professionals, including trustees. Section 326(a) merely sets an outside limit, and does not make trustee compensation an incentive-based "commission" as asserted by the Bankruptcy Court and the NABT. Therefore, the District Court's decision on this issue should be affirmed.

Also, as the interim compensation awards were subject to change at any time during the case and the U.S. Trustee's objection was not subject to any form of preclusion, the Bankruptcy Court was in error to the extent it based its decision on the fact that the U.S. Trustee did not object before the final hearing stage. Similarly, the fact that disgorgement of the excess compensation would cause a hardship to the Trustee is not a factor to be considered in the Section 330 reasonableness determination. To the extent the Bankruptcy Court was influenced by such equitable considerations to circumvent clear statutory language, it was in error. Thus, the District Court decision on this issue must be affirmed, and the matter must be remanded for a reasonableness determination in which Section 330(a) is properly applied.

In addition, the Trustee's interim compensation was unreasonable in light of the services rendered. The Trustee is attempting to use the $62,500 "bone" thrown to unsecured creditors to justify his receipt of over $230,000. If the excess interim compensation is disgorged and paid to unsecured creditors, however, these creditors will see their return grow from 19% of their claim (and only 25% of the Trustee's "cut") to over 60% of their claim. If the District Court's decision is affirmed the Trustee will still have received over $90,000, not an insubstantial sum for serving as the Property's landlord for little more than eighteen months and then "selling" it to the Bank. The Trustee will have been amply, but not excessively, rewarded for recovering funds for the benefit of creditors – which is what Congress intended.

ARGUMENT

I. THE DISTRICT COURT PROPERLY EXCLUDED CREDIT BIDS FROM THE MAXIMUM TRUSTEE COMPENSATION CALCULATION

The maximum compensation allowable to a Chapter 7 trustee is governed by Code Section 326(a), entitled "Limitation on compensation of trustee," which provides that "the court may allow reasonable compensation under [Code Section 330] . . . for the trustee's services . . . not to exceed [a percentage based] upon all moneys disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee to parties in interest, excluding the debtor, but including holders of secured claims" (emphasis added). The U.S. Trustee submits that the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over" refers solely to "cash disbursed or turned over," not the value of a credit bid.

The Trustee, however, argues that the Credit Bid should be treated as if it were the receipt and disbursement of $7.78 million in cash. Thus, the Trustee seeks to retain the entire $233,188.27 interim compensation received, including $142,449.40 attributable to the Credit Bid, even though the unsecured creditors to whom he owes his primary fiduciary duty received only $62,500 from his services. Cf. In re Pearson Indus., Inc., 178 B.R. 753, 761 (Bankr. C.D. Ill. 1995) ("A Chapter 7 trustee in bankruptcy represents the interest of the unsecured creditors and not the secured creditors."); Fox v. Anderson (In re Thu Viet Dinh), 80 B.R. 819, 822 (Bankr. S.D. Miss. 1987) ("it is a fundamental concept in bankruptcy that a trustee's primary duty is to the unsecured creditors rather than to the secured creditors").

The Trustee's position directly contradicts Section 326(a) and the vast majority of relevant Code cases, the legislative history, Third Circuit Act cases, and basic tenets of statutory interpretation applied by the Supreme Court and the Third Circuit. As a result, the District Court's holding that the Credit Bid cannot be included in the Trustee's maximum compensation calculation must be affirmed.

A. The District Court's Strict Interpretation of Section 326(a) is Consistent With the Majority of Cases Decided Under the Code

The majority of reported Code decisions have applied Section 326(a) literally. The Fifth Circuit recently became the first circuit to address the meaning of "moneys disbursed or turned over" under the Code in a reported decision. In Pritchard v. U.S. Trustee (In re England), 153 F.3d 232 (5th Cir. 1998), the trustee transferred property to creditors in satisfaction of their claims. Id. at 234. The trustee requested compensation on cash disbursements plus the value of property transferred to creditors, arguing that a strict interpretation of Section 326(a) contradicts Congressional intent. Id. at 234-36. The Fifth Circuit rejected the trustee's policy arguments and the handful of Code cases that have allowed trustee compensation on something other than actual cash disbursed. Id. at 237. As "[t]he plain language of § 326(a) indicates that the statute caps a trustee's compensation based upon only the moneys disbursed," and as the statutory language is consistent with the Code Section 704(1) duty to reduce estate property to "money," the Fifth Circuit reversed a district court decision that had allowed compensation on the value of property transferred. Id. at 235-37 (citing, inter alia, In re Brigantine Beach Hotel Corp., 197 F.2d 296, 299 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 344 U.S. 832 (1952)).

Although Pritchard was not a credit bid case, the U.S. Trustee respectfully submits that the Third Circuit should adopt the Fifth Circuit's sound reasoning rather than blaze the trail urged by the Trustee. Congress has decreed that cash disbursements alone form the basis for calculating maximum trustee compensation.

The plain meaning of Section 326(a) must prevail – trustee compensation cannot be based on the value of property transferred in satisfaction of creditor claims.

Many courts have interpreted “moneys disbursed or turned over” as meaning cash disbursed by the trustee. See, e.g., Havis v. Rhea (In re Rhea), 143 B.R. 690, 691 (S.D. Tex. 1992) (no “authority for departing from the unambiguous language of the statute”); Kandel v. Alexander Leasing Corp., 107 B.R. 548, 551 (N.D. Ohio 1988) (compensation based only on "monies [that] actually passed through [the trustee's] hands"); In re Landing, Inc., 142 B.R. 169, 172 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1992) (noting “the general trend towards strict construction of statutory language,” trustee compensation allowed only on cash disbursed, not value of liens assumed); In re Music Merchandisers, Inc., 131 B.R. 377, 380 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1991) ("That the trustee did not disburse or turn over cash money has compelled courts on various facts to resist inclusion of 'constructive disbursements' in the compensation base for purposes of § 326."); In re Palm Beach Resort Properties, Inc., 73 B.R. 323, 324 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1987) (where $2.4 million “did not pass through the trustee’s account . . . . [t]here was no actual or constructive disbursement”); In re New England Fish Co., 34 B.R. 899, 901-02 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1983) ("the trustee's compensation must be based on actual monies disbursed . . . and not on assets or settlements which can be construed as a constructive disbursement").

More recently, two courts in the District of New York applied Section 326(a) literally to credit bid situations. In United States Trustee v. Messer (In re Pink Cadillac Assocs.), 1997 WL 164282 (S.D.N.Y. April 7, 1997), the trustee sold an asset encumbered by a lien of over $2.7 million to the mortgagee for a $1.5 million credit bid. Id. at *1. While no cash was disbursed, the trustee requested $20,000, which he argued was a 71% “voluntary reduction” from the maximum “commission” to which he was “entitled” — if the $1.5 million credit bid was included in the calculation. Id. at *2. Although the bankruptcy court agreed with the trustee, the district court reversed on the grounds that the U.S. Trustee’s emphasis on "moneys" was consistent with Congress' position regarding the trustee's principal duty to "reduce to money" property of the estate. Id. at *3. The district court noted that many Code cases have interpreted "moneys" literally. Id. The district court rejected the trustee's argument that a strict application raises form over function, since the trustee never actually handled cash, and it was not "clear how he would have done so." Id. at *4. As the credit bid covered the entire purchase price, the transaction did not generate "moneys.” Id.

In In re Colonial Southbury L.P., Case No. 94-22057 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. June 3, 1997), the court in an unpublished decision followed Pink Cadillac, adding that even if compensation could be based on the credit bid the compensation requested was unreasonable in light of the services rendered. JA244-55. In Colonial Southbury, a secured creditor with a $16.5 million lien purchased estate assets using a $3 million credit bid. JA246-48. The secured creditor agreed to contribute 3% of the sale price for distribution to creditors, and the trustee sought a “commission” on all disbursements made while operating the debtor, including the value of the credit bid. Id. The Colonial Southbury court agreed that the line of cases supporting the U.S. Trustee's position was "compelling, particularly in light of the legislative history of Section 326(a)," and that allowing the requested compensation "would equate to judicial legislation." JA251. The court also rejected the Act cases cited by the trustee as the legislative history evinces Congress’ determination that "moneys" is not the equivalent of "property." JA252. As the U.S. Trustee noted, the secured creditor could have bid its entire claim instead of only $3 million – in which case the trustee would have sought compensation on $16.5 million, which could not be what Congress intended. Id. Thus, the court only allowed compensation on cash disbursements. JA255.

The Pink Cadillac and Colonial Southbury cases, in addition to Pritchard, indicate that the District Court’s decision was consistent with the most recent determinations regarding non-cash disbursements under Section 326(a). The Trustee "sold" property with a $7.78 million liquidation value for a $7.78 million credit bid plus $372,387 in cash. As in Pink Cadillac and Colonial Southbury, the mortgage far exceeded the Property's value. It was highly unlikely that the Trustee could have structured a pure cash transaction, since the Bank could win any "bidding war" without paying a cent merely by bidding its entire claim. In addition, the Pink Cadillac trustee argued that he had taken a "voluntary" reduction of 71%, but the district court was not taken in by this ruse as the trustee was actually entitled to 0% of the amount requested. Similarly, in the instant case the District Court rejected the Trustee's argument that to carve out a distribution to administrative claimants and unsecured creditors he had taken a "voluntary reduction" of 26% of his "commission." Although no cash changed hands in Pink Cadillac, it is obvious from that court's analysis that if cash had changed hands the trustee would only have been allowed to include the cash, and not the credit bid, in his Section 326(a) calculation.

The few Code cases that have loosely applied Section 326(a) are easily distinguishable. For example, in In re Greenley Energy Holdings of Pa., Inc., 102 B.R. 400 (E.D. Pa. 1989), a Chapter 11 trustee's compensation was based on the present value of $28 million in guaranteed contracts he had entered into. The trustee engineered what the court termed a "small miracle" by taking a non-operating debtor facing a $30 million environmental reclamation project and developing a business plan that paid creditors in full. Id. at 401. As the trustee had created new property that would result in future cash payments to creditors, the court determined that it would be unjust to deny compensation on the present value of these disbursements. Id. at 404-05. The trustee did not even request the maximum, instead seeking compensation at the rate of only $226 per hour. Id. at 403 n.3.

Two Texas bankruptcy courts have also liberally interpreted Section 326(a). In In re Guyana Dev. Corp., 201 B.R. 462 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 1996), a Chapter 11 trustee ran a multinational firm, disbursed almost $80 million in cash, and confirmed a plan that paid 88% to unsecured creditors. Id. at 472. Given the complexity of the case and the considerable benefit for unsecured creditors, the court held that a lodestar analysis would not result in reasonable compensation and included the value of encumbered property sold in the Section 326(a) calculation. In In re Stanley, 120 B.R. 409, 413-15 (Bankr. E.D. Tex. 1990), the court allowed lien assumptions to be included in the Section 326(a) calculation, but stated that it would have denied compensation had the sale been of fully encumbered property or property with nominal equity.

These cases contained facts absent from the instant case. The Trustee did not produce the results of the Greenley and Guyana trustees, and the Stanley court would have denied the Trustee's requested compensation as there was no equity in the Property. In addition, after the Fifth Circuit's Pritchard decision the Guyana and Stanley courts would now have to apply Section 326(a) strictly. Thus, these decisions are of little precedential value in Texas, much less anywhere else.

In sum, the overwhelming weight of Code authority supports the District Court's strict interpretation of Section 326(a). Although virtually no Code cases support his position, the Trustee nonetheless requests that this Court render the first Circuit Court Code decision to accept the constructive disbursement theory. As such a decision would represent a radical departure from the majority of decided cases, the District Court's decision should be affirmed.

B. The District Court's Strict Interpretation of Section 326(a) is Consistent With Basic Tenets of Statutory Construction

"It is axiomatic that statutory interpretation begins with the language of the statute itself." Government of Virgin Islands v. Knight, 989 F.2d 619, 633 (3d Cir. 1993). A statutory language analysis must precede any resort to prior law or legislative history as "[t]here is, of course, no more persuasive evidence of the purpose of a statute than the words by which the legislature undertook to give expression to its wishes." United States v. Amer. Trucking Ass'ns, Inc., 310 U.S.

534, 543 (1930). The statutory language is the best indicia of Congress' intent as "much less thought is spent on the future implications of committee reports and explanations on the floor than in choosing the words of a statute." Paskel v. Heckler, 768 F.2d 540, 543-44 (3d Cir. 1985).

If a statute is unambiguous courts need not resort to legislative history and pre-statute case law to divine Congressional intent. See, e.g., United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 241-42 (1989); Velis v. Kardanis, 949 F.2d 78, 81 (3d Cir. 1991). Once statutory language is found to be unambiguous, courts "must give effect to Congress' intent as Congress expressed it with that writing." United States Trustee v. Columbia Gas Sys., Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Sys., Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 300 (3d Cir. 1994). A finding of no ambiguity ends the search for alternative readings as "courts must presume that a legislature says in a statute what it means and means in a statute what it says there." Connecticut Nat'l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253-54 (1992).

In determining the ambiguity of statutory language, courts apply the "fundamental canon of statutory construction . . . that, unless otherwise defined, words will be interpreted as taking their ordinary, contemporary, common meaning." See, e.g., Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42 (1979). Congress used the common words "moneys" and "disbursed" in Section 326(a); as these words were not defined in the Code, they must be given their everyday meaning. “Moneys” is commonly defined as “sums of money” or “funds.” See Webster’s Third New Int’l Dictionary at 1458 (1981). “Money” is “something generally accepted as a medium of exchange,” such as currency, coin, negotiable paper, and any other asset readily convertible to cash. Id. “Disburse” means “to expend esp[ecially] from a public fund: pay out.” Id. at 644. The relevant definition of “turn over” is “to hand over: DELIVER, TRANSFER.” Id. at 2469.

Even if “moneys” is viewed as a term of art, the legal and commercial usage is virtually the same as the lay usage. For example, in legal usage “money” means “coins and paper currency used as circulating medium of exchange, and does not embrace notes, bonds, evidences of debt, or other personal or real estate.” Black’s Law Dictionary 1005 (6th ed. 1990). In addition, in the Uniform Commercial Code “money” is defined as “a medium of exchange authorized or adopted by a domestic or foreign government as a part of its currency.” N.J. Stat. Ann. tit. 12A § 1-201(24) (1996).

Thus, if Congress is taken at its word Section 326(a) bases maximum trustee compensation solely upon cash delivered to parties in interest by the trustee. Credit bids do not fall within the aegis of Section 326(a) unless its plain meaning is ignored and other words are read into the statute.

Even if “moneys” is ambiguous, legislative history and Act cases should not be consulted. The Third Circuit has directed courts to clarify perceived ambiguities regarding a word or phrase in the Code by considering how the word or phrase is used elsewhere in the Code. Velis, 949 F.2d at 81. “Money” as used elsewhere in the Code always refers to cash. For example, Section 345 addresses the investment of money of the estate. Congress’ intent in using the word “money” in this section is obvious — one cannot “deposit or invest” the encumbered portion of real estate or the value of claims extinguished. In addition, one of the fundamental trustee duties under Section 704(1) is to “collect and reduce to money the property of the estate” (emphasis added). Again, Congress’ intent that assets be turned into cash for ultimate distribution to creditors is evident. Thus, Congress’ use of “money” elsewhere in the Code evinces the word’s intended meaning without the need to resort to Act cases.

Another canon of statutory interpretation, expressio unius est exclusio alterius (“the expression of one thing excludes another”), indicates that Congress intended to limit maximum trustee compensation to a percentage of cash disbursed. That Congress did not include any word other than “moneys” is evidence that all non-“moneys” were intentionally excluded from the Section 326(a) calculus.

When drafting the Code, Congress separately listed items where separate consideration of each is appropriate. One example is Section 523(a)(2), regarding exceptions to discharge, which separately lists “money, property, services, or . . . credit.” Since it considers “money” to be distinct from “property” and “credit,” Congress would have included words other than “moneys” in Section 326(a) if it had intended to base trustee compensation on something other than cash disbursements. Despite its assumed knowledge of the hoary Act precedent for including non-“moneys” in calculating trustee compensation, Congress did not add such phrases as “value of assets administered,” “amount of claims paid or otherwise extinguished,” or even “moneys disbursed or turned over, whether in the form of cash or constructively.” See, e.g., In re Barnett, 133 B.R. 487, 489 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 1991) (Congress "could, but did not, choose the words 'property' or 'value' . . . . I cannot escape the feeling that were I to rule in the trustee's favor, I would be legislating a result different from that provided for by Congress."); New England Fish Co., 34 B.R. at 901 ("Had it so desired, Congress could readily have included properties turned over, assumed claims, and the value of compromised claims as well as monies as the basis on which commissions were to be computed. However, it did not do so."). Absent the mention of anything other than “moneys,” this Court must conclude that Section 326(a) does not include theoretical, “constructive," non-cash disbursements.

In the instant case, the Trustee conducted a "sale" whereby he transferred a $7.78 million asset for the following consideration: (i) a credit bid of $7.78 million of the Bank's $12.8 million claim; (ii) a waiver of the remainder of the claim; and (iii) $372,387 in cash collateral already in the Trustee's account. The only portion of that consideration that falls within the definition of "moneys" is the $372,387 in cash. The Credit Bid was not "disbursed," nor was the Bank's waiver of its deficiency claim. Despite the Trustee's assertion, the sale was not a cash transaction. As the Trustee only received $372,387 in cash, that is all he could have disbursed. Section 326(a) permits no other interpretation – credit bids and other consideration that is "like" money or "in lieu of" money cannot be included in the calculation.

In light of its application of the "plain meaning" doctrine as required by the Supreme Court and Third Circuit, the District Court's strict interpretation of Section 326(a) was correct. The Bankruptcy Court erroneously used legislative history and Act cases to circumvent the plain meaning of "moneys disbursed or turned over." As that phrase must be interpreted as "cash disbursed or turned over," other sources may not be consulted simply to avoid imposing a hardship on the Trustee. Since the statutory language evinces Congressional intent to limit trustee compensation to a percentage of cash disbursements, the District Court's decision must be affirmed.

C. The Legislative History Supports a Literal Reading of "Moneys Disbursed or Turned Over"

Courts may only disregard a statute's plain meaning if a literal application "will produce a result demonstrably at odds with the intentions of its drafters." Ron Pair Enters., 489 U.S. at 242. Such a situation is rare, and requires a result "so bizarre that Congress 'could not have intended' it." Demarest v. Manspeaker, 498 U.S. 184, 191 (1991) (quoting Griffin v. Oceanic Contractors, Inc., 458 U.S. 564, 575 (1982)). Indeed, "extraordinarily clear evidence of a contrary legislative intent . . . is required to override clear statutory language." Malloy v. Eichler, 860 F.2d 1179, 1183 (3d Cir. 1988). Thus, to reverse the District Court this Court must find "not whether a result inconsistent with the literal language of the statute is consistent with the legislative history, but rather whether it is compelled by that history." Smith v. Fidelity Consumer Discount Co., 898 F.2d 907, 912 (3d Cir. 1989) (emphasis added). Absent convincing evidence of contrary Congressional intent, the statute must be applied as written.

The sparse legislative history of Section 326(a) indicates that a strict application is consistent with Congress' concerns at the time the Code was enacted. The House Committee on the Judiciary's Report stated that Section 326(a) is to be applied to "the amounts of money distributed by the trustee," and further stated that:

> [T]he base on which the maximum fee is computed includes moneys turned over to secured creditors, to cover the situation where the trustee liquidates property subject to a lien and distributes the proceeds. It does not cover cases in which the trustee simply turns over the property to the secured creditor, nor where the trustee abandons the property and the secured creditor is permitted to foreclose.

H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 327 (1977) (emphasis added). The House Report further noted the legislators' displeasure that the Act's compensation provisions had become a floor rather than a ceiling. Id. In addition, Congress' overhaul of the nation's bankruptcy system was based in part on the concern that bankruptcy estates were being administered to benefit trustees and their professionals rather than creditors. Id. at 93-94, 327. The House Report contains no suggestion that Congress intended to blow the cap off trustee compensation by including non-cash items in the Section 326(a) calculation. Indeed, trustees are to "liquidate[ ] property . . . and distribute[ ] the proceeds," which is not what transpires in a credit bid transaction. Id. at 327.

Contrary to the Trustee's assertion, the House Report does not provide the evidence of contrary intent needed to circumvent clear statutory language. There is no suggestion that Congress intended an expansive interpretation of "moneys," or that it intended to codify the "constructive disbursement" theory. Indeed, courts have held that the House Report demonstrates the rejection of Act cases that allowed compensation on non-cash "constructive disbursements." See, e.g., In re Indoor-Outdoor Dining, Inc., 77 B.R. 952, 954 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1987) ("The statutory history [of Section 326(a)] suggests a deliberate rejection of some decisions under the former statutes which would equate the debtor's property with 'moneys' administered by the trustee."); New England Fish Co., 34 B.R. at 901.

Likewise, the Trustee incorrectly implies that the House Report's express exclusion of situations in which the trustee "simply turns over" or "abandons" property means that Congress intended to include every other conceivable situation under the rubric "moneys disbursed or turned over." The Report's drafters could have had a number of improper scenarios in mind, but they included only two as examples. Indeed, it would appear from the legislative history that Congress had grown weary of trustees receiving compensation for non-cash transactions generally. Regardless, "it is, of course, 'not the law that a statute can have no effects which are not explicitly mentioned in its legislative history' . . . be they good or ill." Fidelity Consumer Discount Co., 898 F.2d at 912 (quoting Pittson Coal Group v.

Sebben, 488 U.S. 105, 115 (1988)). As the Supreme Court has stated, "[i]n such a substantial overhaul of the system [as the Code], it is not appropriate or realistic to expect Congress to have explained with particularity each step it took. Rather, as long as the statutory scheme is coherent and consistent, there generally is no need for a court to inquire beyond the plain language of the statute." Ron Pair Enters., 489 U.S. at 242. Whether the House Report listed every exception from Section 326(a) is not dispositive – Congress could not be expected to explain in detail the intended interpretation of every provision.

If this Court adopts the Trustee's argument, then anything can be considered "moneys" provided property is not "simply" turned over or abandoned without consideration. Such a result would contradict Congress' express intent to circumscribe the trustee compensation base. Indeed, if "moneys" may be read as the Trustee argues, then credit bids will only be the first of many "constructive disbursements" allowable, and the language used by Congress will be rendered meaningless.

Perhaps the most telling aspect of Section 326(a)'s legislative history is what Congress chose not to carry over from the Act. Section 48 of the Act, which was codified at 11 U.S.C. § 76, provided that trustee compensation in bankruptcy proceedings superseded by reorganization proceedings "shall be computed upon all moneys disbursed or turned over . . . and where under the plan of reorganization any part of the consideration to be paid to unsecured creditors is other than money, upon the amount of the fair value of such consideration." 11 U.S.C. § 76(g) (1976) (quoted in District Court Opinion at 15) (emphasis added). Similar language applied to payments under an arrangement. Id. § 76(f). Although the Act did not expressly address the inclusion of credit bids or other "constructive disbursements" in calculating trustee compensation, the statutory language could arguably support such a result. The language also reveals, however, that under the Act Congress expressly differentiated between "moneys" and the "fair value of consideration other than money." Although both were used in calculating trustee compensation, they were deemed distinct enough to be separately listed. As a matter of statutory interpretation, this Court must assume Congress did not use redundant language and identified a difference between "moneys" and "fair value of consideration other than money."

Section 40 of the Act, which was codified at 11 U.S.C. § 68, contained similar language regarding referee compensation, and provided that the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts (with the approval of the Judicial Conference of the United States) "may make, and from time to time amend, rules and regulations prescribing methods for determining net proceeds realized in asset cases [and] fair values of considerations other than money . . . ." Id. § 68 (emphasis added). The following rule was subsequently established:

> "[N]et proceeds realized in asset cases" shall mean, in the case of sale or liquidation, the amount of money coming into the estate . . . as assets of such estate which shall include the entire sale price of encumbered property when sold free and clear of all liens or, if not sold or liquidated, the fair cash market value of all property coming into the estate as assets of such estate . . . provided, however, that where property is sold or transferred subject to a valid [lien], the amount of such [lien] not affected by such sale shall not be included in determining the amount of net proceeds realized.

Reports of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States 22 (1966) (quoted in In re Riverside Inv. Partnership, 674 F.2d 634, 636 (7th Cir. 1982)) (emphasis added).

The Act's compensation provisions were subsumed within Section 326(a) when the Code was enacted, but Congress left out any mention of "fair value of consideration other than money," as well as what effect the "sale free and clear" versus "sale subject to" dichotomy had on compensation. As the legislative history does not explain the omission of such language, the words used in the Code remain the only evidence of Congressional intent. Thus, the only logical reading of Congress' decision to exclude Act-era language from the Code is that trustee compensation is no longer based on both "moneys disbursed or turned over" and the "fair value of consideration other than money" conferred to creditors. See 2B Norman J. Singer*, Sutherland on Statutes and Statutory Construction* § 51.02 at 122 (5th ed. 1992) ("[I]f words used in a prior statute to express a certain meaning are omitted, it will be presumed that a change of meaning was intended."). Rather, trustee compensation under the Code is based solely on the disbursement of "moneys," which has always meant cash handled by the trustee. If Congress had intended trustee compensation to be based on anything other than cash disbursements it would have retained the Act language regarding the fair value of non-monetary consideration. It did not, and has not inserted such language in Section 326(a) despite several amendments in the last twenty years.

It is disingenuous to assume that in completely overhauling the nation's bankruptcy law Congress chose not to correct a perceived ambiguity. Obviously, Congress perceived no ambiguity in the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over"; otherwise, it would have incorporated words other than "moneys" in Section 326(a). The District Court's interpretation of "moneys disbursed or turned over," therefore, is not contrary to Congress' intent, nor is it so fanciful that Congress could not have intended it. Indeed, the House Report indicates that Congress expects trustees to be paid for disbursing cash to general creditors, not engineering noncash "sales" of overencumbered property to secured creditors. As the District Court's holding is consistent with the legislative history, it should be affirmed.

D. Pre-Code Third Circuit Cases Do Not Support the "Constructive Disbursement" Theory

Although the Third Circuit has never squarely addressed the validity of the constructive disbursement theory, several Act decisions indicate an unwillingness to compensate trustees for noncash transactions. For example, in In re Vulcan Foundry & Machine Co., 180 F. 671, 673-74 (3d Cir. 1910), the second mortgagees bought encumbered property by credit bid. The Third Circuit held that as the asset's "virtual owners," the second mortgagees could not be charged with commissions "upon the whole amount of their bid, as if it had all been paid in cash." Id. at 675.

Similarly, in American Surety Co. v. Freed, 224 F. 333, 337 (3d Cir. 1915), the Third Circuit held that a trustee could only receive compensation on cash disbursed when he had sold an asset's equity to bondholders who essentially already owned the rest of the asset. Id. at 336. Although the Third Circuit cited cases that had addressed the issue of constructive disbursements, it expressly distinguished those cases factually and did not state, even in dicta, that it acknowledged the viability of constructive disbursements. The Trustee's and NABT's assertions notwithstanding, the Third Circuit only stated that "courts have held . . .

" and provided the reasoning behind constructive disbursement cases without editorializing. When it came to actually resolving the matter before it, however, the Third Circuit only allowed compensation on cash disbursed, not the value of liens extinguished. Id.

In addition, in In re Prindible, 115 F.2d 21 (3d Cir. 1940), the trustee's final account reflected an entry for "Amount of Distribution of Real Estate" of $29,200. Id. at 23. The encumbered real estate "was sold in bankruptcy to the mortgagees thereof for the discharge of the mortgage debt, the mortgagees contributing, under agreement with the trustee, $1,800 toward the general administration expenses. No part of the consideration, except for the $1,800, ever came into the trustee's hands." Id. The trustee received cash totalling $3,556.50 during the case, which was consumed by administrative expenses. Id. The Third Circuit found that "[t]he fees and commissions appear to bear no relation to the extent of services or to the quantum of the estate actually administered," stating:

> Trustees in bankruptcy . . . are public officers and officers of the court, and compensation is owing to them only on clear warrant of law. Before trustees in bankruptcy are entitled to compensation upon moneys disbursed or turned over by them to lienholders, it is necessary that the trustees show some act of administration with respect to encumbered property, such as preserving an equity of the bankrupt in the property. And, even then, compensation has been held to be due only upon > the value of the equity of redemption.

Id. at 24 (emphasis added).

The Third Circuit directed the referee to recover from “those who participated in the division of the bankrupt’s estate in excess of reasonable fees, commissions and expenses or surcharge the trustee for the improvident payments.” Id. After these amounts were recovered, “the fund representing the value of the encumbered property actually sold by the trustee and for which he received payment of the consideration” was to be set aside for distribution to lienholders and, if any residue was left, to the general estate. Id. at 24-25 (emphasis added). Thus, in Prindible the Third Circuit found that trustees may only take compensation on the cash received from a sale of encumbered property and not the value of mortgages extinguished.

Similarly, in another Act case where a trustee sought compensation for returning property to the debtor, the Third Circuit stated that "it is clear that the word 'moneys' in the clause '. . . upon all moneys disbursed or turned over by him to any persons, including lienholders, . . . ' is not the equivalent of property." In re Brigantine Beach Hotel Corp., 197 F.2d 296, 299 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 344 U.S. 832 (1952).

In light of these decisions, the U.S. Trustee respectfully submits that the District Court properly interpreted the Third Circuit's past holdings as not indicating the acceptance of the "constructive disbursement" theory. This Court's past decisions do not support the Trustee's request that the Third Circuit become the first Circuit under the Code to allow compensation to be based on whatever noncash transactions a trustee may attempt to fit into the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over."

E. The Arguments Raised by the Trustee and the NABT do not Support Reversal of the District Court's Decision

1. The Literal Interpretation of Section 326(a) Does not Improperly Elevate Form Over Function

The main thrust of the Trustee's brief is that the District Court's decision was based on a "hypertechnical" reading of Section 326(a). This Court should read the word "literal" in place of "hypertechnical" – there is not a wide spectrum of possible interpretations of "moneys disbursed or turned over." The statute is either read literally or it is not. It cannot be read "extra"-literally or "kind of" literally. The majority of cases apply Section 326(a) literally, and the minority simply disregard the statutory language and render a decision on some other basis.

The U.S. Trustee respectfully submits that, in light of the Supreme Court and Third Circuit jurisprudence regarding statutory interpretation, there is no authority for a non-literal reading of Section 326(a). Indeed, the Trustee places form over substance as the Property was "sold" in form only. The Trustee refers to the "economic reality" of the transaction as a cash sale whereby the Trustee received and disbursed cash to the Bank. Of course, this is merely a hypothetical economic theory; in economic reality this was not a $7.78 million cash transaction. The Trustee transferred property for $372,387 cash and a $12.8 million bundle consisting of a credit bid and a deficiency waiver. This was a purely paper-shuffling transaction where no cash ever changed hands, the Trustee already possessed the $372,387 cash collateral, and the Bank for all intents and purposes owned the Property. Nevertheless, the Trustee believes he is entitled to over $200,000 for engineering the sale.

The "economic" reality of the transaction, therefore, is far different from that portrayed by the Trustee. The Bank was motivated to obtain the Property, and possessed a $12.8 million claim, the entirety of which could be bid. The logical extension of the Trustee's argument is that this could easily have been a $12.8 million sale, with the Trustee "entitled" to a "commission" on the entire $12.8 million. Of course, the sale price could also have been $9 million, or $5 million, or $500,000, or $100. At a foreclosure sale, another bidder would have had to produce $12,865,435 in cash before the Bank would have had to reach into its proverbial pocket. In economic reality, if the Property had been abandoned, the Bank would have obtained the Property as the lone bidder at a foreclosure sale for a nominal price. See Carteret Sav. & Loan Ass'n, F.A. v. Davis, 105 N.J. 344, 351, 521 A.2d 831 (1987) (study showed that in only 3% of foreclosure sales did secured creditor pay over nominal amount, and in only 3% did outside bidder purchase for an amount equaling mortgages, interest, costs, and sheriff's fees). It is only in the theoretical realm that the same transaction could be a nominal transaction worth $0 to the Trustee or a $12.8 million transaction potentially providing compensation of over $360,000, depending on whether it is called a "sale free and clear."

Had the Trustee structured the sale so that the Bank paid $7.78 million cash and he handed it right back, the question would arise: Why? The only reason to set up such a sale would be to generate compensation for the Trustee – a violation of the Trustee's fiduciary duty that could result in the reduction or denial of compensation. Indeed, such a transaction has been deemed "farcical." In re Music Merchandisers, Inc., 131 B.R. at 379-80 (denying compensation on moneys "deemed" disbursed); cf. In re H.E. Graf, Inc., 125 B.R. 604, 606 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1991) (denying "preposterous" request for compensation on sale proceeds paid to secured creditor that had purchased its overencumbered collateral). An award of maximum compensation for such a "sale" would not pass a proper Section 330 reasonableness determination.

Despite the Trustee's suggestion that no court in America would "deny" the Trustee's "commission" if this were a cash transaction, trustees often receive less than the maximum. See, e.g., In re Kusler, 224 B.R. 180, 192 (Bankr. N.D. Okla. 1998) (denying maximum where trustee sold fully encumbered asset and received minimal funds for unsecured creditors); In re Lehal Realty Assocs., 112 B.R. 590, 593 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990) (maximum not awarded where "the Trustee would have been required to perform the same services if the property had sold for $710,000 rather than over $7 million"). Indeed, courts have criticized trustees who administer overencumbered assets to increase their compensation. See, e.g., Carey v. Pauline (In re Pauline), 119 B.R. 727, 728 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1990) ("the Trustee has apparently engaged in a course of conduct designed to enhance the size of his bank account rather than the size of the funds available for the Debtor's unsecured creditors"); In re Preston Lumber Corp., 199 B.R. 415, 416 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 1996) ("The trustee's powers under the Bankruptcy Code are not supposed to be money-making assets which the trustee can make available to the highest bidder."); In re Crawford Hardware, Inc., 82 B.R. 885, 889 (Bankr. S.D. Ohio 1987) ("[W]hen [turnovers of money to secured creditors] leave minimal assets for unsecured creditors, that fact limits the percentage this Court will allow as compensation in connection with those turnovers.”).

Although the Trustee urges that there is no policy reason why the instant transaction should be treated differently than a cash payment from a third party, the fact remains that Congress must be presumed to have considered all relevant policies in choosing the final statutory language. As these deliberations produced no mention of non-moneys in Section 326(a), this Court should respect Congress’ intent, and should not interject its own beliefs. Cf. Orr v. Yuhas, 104 F.3d 612, 615 (3d Cir. 1997) (“It is not for us to take sides in this policy debate.”).

In “substance,” the Trustee did not conduct a $7.78 million cash sale, and could never have sold the Property to anyone at any price – other than the Bank. Once the “form” of a “sale free and clear” is wiped away, the economic reality is clear: the Trustee returned the Property to the entity that would have obtained it regardless of whether it was “sold” or abandoned. In exchange for conducting the Bank’s foreclosure sale, the Trustee was allowed to keep $372,387 already in his account. This is not the kind of transaction on which Congress intended to base maximum trustee compensation. As the sale only brought $372,387 into the estate, that was all the Trustee could disburse. Applying the only allowable reading of Section 326(a), the credit bid was not “actually” disbursed, cannot be considered “constructively” disbursed, and should not be included in calculating maximum trustee compensation.

2. Cases Decided Under the Act do not Universally Support a Liberal Interpretation of Section 326(a)

The Trustee and the NABT rely heavily on Act cases to support their position. As addressed above, however, changes in the wording between the Act and Code render these cases of little use in interpreting Section 326(a). Even if Act cases have some value, they support the "plain meaning" theory adopted by the District Court at least as often as the liberal position espoused by the Trustee and the NABT.

For example, in Realty Assocs. Sec. Corp. v. O'Connor, 295 U.S. 295, 297-98 (1935), a referee sought compensation on the face value of bonds payable in ten years. The Supreme Court held that it was unreasonable to treat the bonds as the equivalent of cash. Id. Indeed, the Court stated that "[c]ommon sense revolts at the suggestion that creditors have been paid," and that "[e]xtravagent costs of administration in the winding up of estates in bankruptcy have been denounced as crying evils." Id. at 299. Similarly, in Callaghan v. Reconstruction Fin. Corp., 297 U.S. 464, 466 (1936), the Supreme Court affirmed a Second Circuit decision that had allowed compensation solely on cash disbursements. The Court noted that the Act's compensation sections were strictly construed "even when the compensation allowed was . . . materially less than that which otherwise might have been considered reasonable." Id. at 468.

Circuit courts under the Act also applied a strict reading of the compensation statutes. See, e.g., Gugel v. New Orleans Nat'l Bank, 239 F. 676, 679 (5th Cir. 1917) (allowing only the equivalent costs of state court foreclosure on sale of overencumbered property); In re New York Commercial Co., 231 F. 445, 447 (2d Cir. 1916) (basing commissions on profits from sale, not value of property sold); In re Meadows, 211 F. 948, 950 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 234 U.S. 763 (1914) (where trustee sold asset for small surplus, "creditors might be justified in thinking that the sale by the trustee was not for their interest, but was had for the purpose of enabling these officers to collect commissions on the entire value of the property, although the creditors had no interest except in the small equity"). Cf. In re Harralson, 179 F. 490, 492 (8th Cir. 1910) (denying trustee's request that mortgagee pay cash rather than credit bid, since trustee could not base commission on non-cash sale).

In addition, district court cases under the Act strictly interpreted the statutory language. See, e.g., In re Lehrenkrauss, 16 F. Supp. 792, 793 (E.D.N.Y. 1936) (mortgages could not be reduced to a dollar value for purposes of calculating trustee compensation); In re Morris Bros., 8 F.2d 629, 630 (D. Or. 1925) ("[T]he statute is plain and unambiguous . . . . it is the moneys disbursed or turned over, and not the property, that forms the basis for such allowance."); In re Old Oregon Mfg. Co., 236 F. 804, 805 (W.D. Wash. 1916) ("The estate administered by the trustee was the interest which the bankrupt had in the property at the time of adjudication. This interest was the value of the property over and above the mortgage indebtedness.").

The Act circuit court decisions cited by the Trustee and the NABT are not on point. Southwestern Media, Inc. v. Rau, 708 F.2d 419, 422 (9th Cir. 1983), for example, is not a constructive disbursement or credit bid case at all – creditors were paid in full, in cash. The Rau court's holding that cash paid to secured creditors may be included in trustee compensation is a mere truism, and any statement it made about the possible existence of non-cash constructive disbursements were mere dicta. In addition, the decision in Varney v. Harlow (In re Columbia Cotton Oil & Provision Corp.), 210 F. 824, 827 (4th Cir. 1913), was based purely on equity, not statutory application. The same goes for the District Court decisions cited by the Trustee and the NABT, none of which engages in any real statutory analysis. See, e.g., In re Lowell Textile Co., 288 F. 989, 990 (D. Mass. 1923) (trustee can base commission on money paid to secured creditors); In re Toole, 294 F. 975, 976-78 (S.D.N.Y. 1920) (broadly interpreting Act Section 48 to include stock distributed to creditors); In re Morse Iron Works & Dry Dock Co., 154 F. 214, 214 (E.D.N.Y. 1906) (allowing constructive disbursement so as not "to deprive the trustee of his meager compensation for his services"); In re Sanford Furniture Mfg. Co., 126 F. 888, 888-89 (E.D.N.C. 1903) (allowing referee commission on entire sale price of encumbered property, whether "subject to" or "free and clear").

Congress is assumed to take all equitable considerations into account during its deliberations; once Congress has spoken, courts must apply the statute as drafted, not legislate from the bench. If changes are to be made to the base for calculating the maximum trustee compensation calculation they must be made by Congress. The court-to-court, indeed case-by-case, interpretation of Section 326(a) suggested by the Trustee would nullify the Constitutional grant to Congress of the power "to establish . . . uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." U.S. Constitution art. I § 8. As a result, the Act cases cited by the Trustee should not be used as the basis for the judicial legislation urged by the Trustee.

3. U.S. Marshals Service Commissions are not Analogous to Maximum Chapter 7 Trustee Compensation

Without explanation, the Trustee analogizes commissions payable to the U.S.

Marshals Service under 28 U.S.C. § 1921(c) to compensation payable to private Chapter 7 trustees pursuant to Code Section 330 as limited by Section 326(a). The relevant portion of Section 1921(c) reads as follows:

> (c)(1) The United States Marshals Service shall collect a commission of 3 percent of the first $1,000 collected and 1½ percent on the excess of any sum over $1,000, for seizing or levying on property . . ., disposing of such property by sale, setoff, or otherwise, and receiving and paying over money, except that the amount of commission shall be within the range set by the Attorney General. . . . This subsection applies to any judicially ordered sale or execution sale. . . .

28 U.S.C. § 1921(c) (emphasis added).

Subsection (c) of Section 1921 was enacted by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub. L. 100-690,102 Stat. 4181 (1988), prior to which "[t]he U.S. Marshals Service costs for serving process far exceeded the fees charged private litigants, thus requiring the Service to use public funds to subsidize private litigation." 56 Fed. Reg. 2436 (1991). Although the Trustee implies that commissions constitute remuneration for individual U.S. Marshals, Section 1921 commissions are paid to the U.S. Marshals Service, a bureau of the U.S. Department of Justice, which deposits these funds into the U.S. Treasury. See 28 U.S.C. § 566.

Unlike trustee compensation, U.S. Marshals Service commissions are predicated upon assets recovered, not moneys disbursed. See State Mut. Life Assurance Co. of Am. v. North Hotel Assocs., 1991 WL 114600, at *3-5 (E.D. Pa. 1991). The U.S. Marshals Service must (i) seize or levy on property, (ii) dispose of property, and (iii) receive and pay out money – if any one step is missed, no commission may ensue. See, e.g., Federal Land Bank of St. Paul v. Hassler, 595 F.2d 356, 358 (6th Cir. 1979); Hill v. Whitlock Oil Servs., Inc., 450 F.2d 170, 173 (10th Cir. 1971). The cases cited by the Trustee generally pre-date the 1988 amendment to 28 U.S.C. § 1921, when courts held that once these three requirements were met they had no discretion to determine a "reasonable" commission but instead had to impose the mandatory Section 1921 commission. See, e.g., Odyssey Stevedoring Corp. v. Celtic Venture, 817 F.2d 709, 711 (11th Cir. 1987); Bank of Am. v. M/V Executive, 797 F.2d 772, 775 (9th Cir. 1986); Transamerica ICS, Inc. v. M/V Hellenic Sun, 778 F.2d 194, 195 (4th Cir. 1985).

In 1991 the Attorney General established a maximum commission of $50,000, regardless of the value of property seized, the price at which it is sold, and the amount of money disbursed. See 28 C.F.R. § 0.114(d). This regulation was passed to eliminate the excessive commissions that were the norm prior to the 1988 amendment to 28 U.S.C. § 1921. See 56 Fed. Reg. 2436 (1991). If the Trustee continues to pursue this analogy, a Section 1921(c) analysis would entitle him to only $50,000, requiring a disgorgement of over $180,000 – presumably not what he had in mind.

Likewise, the Trustee's suggestion that every case for the past 50 years supports his interpretation of "moneys" is misleading. Prior to the 1988 amendments most circuit courts addressing the issue held that, where the U.S. Marshals Service conducted a judicial sale such as a foreclosure sale, no commission could be paid as no property was "seized" or "levied." See, e.g., Hassler, 595 F.2d at 358; James T. Barnes & Co. v. United States, 593 F.2d 352, 353 (8th Cir. 1979); Travelers Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 509 F.2d 83, 90 (9th Cir. 1974). As a foreclosure sale is the closest non-bankruptcy comparison to the transaction in the instant case, the pre-1988 cases would have denied all compensation – again, presumably not the analogy the Trustee intended.

Indeed, prior to 1962 the U.S. Marshals Service was entitled to no commission at all, instead receiving the same small fee paid to local sheriffs for seizing and selling an asset. In 1962, Congress amended Section 1921, adding the commission to increase the amount payable to the U.S. Marshals Service, as the minuscule amounts received by local sheriffs no longer adequately reimbursed the federal government as they had in 1853, when the first U.S. Marshals Service fee statute was enacted.

Given the public policy behind Section 1921, courts have understandably read it expansively. Cf. United States v. Petty Motor Co., 767 F.2d 712, 715-16 (10th Cir. 1985) (requiring actual cash payments "frustrates the intent of Congress that private parties pay the cost of the services rendered to them by the government"). It is in the common weal for the U.S. Marshals Service to obtain as much compensation as is allowable, since the appropriations made by Congress from the public fisc are offset by such compensation. See 28 U.S.C. § 1921(e). Indeed, any reading of Section 1921 that restricts receipts would be contrary to Congressional intent.

Code Section 326(a), on the other hand, is not as inclusive. Its very title evinces Congress' intent: "Limitation on compensation of trustee." As a limiting statute, it must be strictly construed lest the intent of Congress be lost. See, e.g., Taylor v. Freeland & Kronz, 938 F.2d 420, 424 (3d Cir. 1991) ("Where [Congressional] intent is to provide leeway, a permissive construction is the right one; where it is to be strict, a permissive construction is wrong.").

Further, trustee compensation is capped by a percentage of moneys disbursed, not the value of assets "collected," "seized," "levied," and "disposed of" as well as moneys "received." In addition, whereas the U.S. Marshals Service is entitled to a "commission," trustees may request compensation – they are not "entitled" to a statutory percentage "commission." The U.S. Marshals Service may also receive commissions on dispositions of assets by setoff or otherwise, a phrase that could easily include credit bids. No such provision exists in Section 326(a). Thus, any case that advocates an expansive reading of 28 U.S.C. § 1921 is not instructive as to the interpretation of Section 326(a).

The tenets of statutory construction analyzed above explain why "money" in 28 U.S.C. § 1921(c) and "moneys" in Section 326(a) are construed differently. To determine the meaning of Section 326(a) this Court must look to the way "money" is used elsewhere in title 11; it is improper to search from one inapposite statute to another hoping to find a contrary use of the word. Cf. 2B Sutherland on Statutes and Statutory Construction, supra, § 51.03 at 138 ("[t]he adventitious occurrence of like or similar phrases in laws enacted for wholly different ends" does not justify interpreting the phrases similarly). The word "money" in Section 1921(c), if ambiguous, is made so by the company it keeps – most of the words surrounding it apply to asset recovery and disposal, not "disbursement" of cash. The austere "moneys disbursed or turned over" in Section 326(a) is straightforward by comparison.

For the foregoing reasons, the Trustee's attempted analogy to U.S. Marshals Service commissions is inapposite and actually undercuts the Trustee's position. Thus, it does not provide cause to overturn the District Court's decision.

4. Other Code Provisions do not Support an "Elastic" Interpretation of Section 326(a)

The NABT argues that Code Sections 330 and 363(j) support an "elastic" interpretation of Section 326(a). This is clearly incorrect. Section 331 merely enables professionals to request compensation periodically rather than wait until the end of the case. Section 330 remains the source of all compensation, and Section 326(a) still limits the amount of compensation allowable to trustees. Although some courts have allowed interim compensation when no disbursements have been made, they base the award on the fact that the trustee has the funds in hand and is expected to make disbursements. Section 331 is not a source for unearned compensation; if interim compensation awarded prior to disbursements turns out to be excessive, it is subject to disgorgement. In any event, Section 331 supports neither a strict nor a liberal interpretation of Section 326(a), which merely caps trustee compensation.

Similarly, Section 363(j) has nothing to do with limiting trustee compensation from estate funds. This section provides that a non-debtor co-owner's interest must also be sold if the trustee wants to sell an estate asset – but the co-owner's interest is not an asset of the estate. Trustees are unable to base compensation on the turnover of non-estate assets to their rightful owners, who are not "parties in interest” for purposes of Section 326(a). Under Section 363(j), the trustee’s job in relation to co-owners is simply to return their assets to them. A trustee may then charge the costs of the sale to the co-owner’s portion, but he cannot take a hearty chunk for himself from these non-estate funds. Section 363(j) imposes no limits on Section 326(a); it merely ensures that the trustee, as fiduciary to an estate, does not stray afield and attach non-estate assets in order to increase his compensation.

Neither Section 331 nor Section 363(j) has even a tangential relation to the issues raised in the instant appeal. Thus, they provide no support for the reversal of the District Court’s decision.

II. THE DISTRICT COURT PROPERLY HELD THAT TRUSTEE COMPENSATION IS SUBJECT TO A CODE SECTION 330(a) REASONABLENESS DETERMINATION

Like all professional compensation, trustee compensation is determined pursuant to Code Section 330(a), which in the version applicable to this case provides in part:

> subject to section[] 326 . . . the court may award to a trustee . . .(1) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by such trustee . . . based on the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, the time spent on such services, and the cost of comparable services [in nonbankruptcy cases].

Like all fee applicants, trustees bear the burden of proving that requested compensation is reasonable. See, e.g., Continental Ill. Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago v. Charles N. Wooten, Ltd. (Matter of Evangeline Ref. Co.), 890 F.2d 1312, 1326 (5th Cir. 1989).

Congress intended the Section 326(a) maximum to be just that – a cap on the "reasonable compensation under section 330" that the court "may allow," not an entitlement to a percentage "commission." See H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 327; see, e.g., In re Draina, 191 B.R. 646, 648 (Bankr. D. Md. 1995); In re C & A Enters., Inc., 132 B.R. 303, 310 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 1991); In re Volador Equity/Income Fund '86-'87, 131 B.R. 739, 740 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. 1991). Congress' displeasure with the practice of automatically awarding the maximum was undoubtedly the reason behind the replacement of the Act term "commission" with the Code term "compensation."

Again, the House Report answers any lingering questions about the intent behind Section 326(a), "emphasiz[ing] that this section does not authorize compensation of trustees. This section merely fixes the maximum compensation of a trustee. Proposed 11 U.S.C. 330 authorizes and fixes the standard of compensation." H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 327 (emphasis added).

In the instant case, the Bankruptcy Court determined that Congress intended Section 326(a) to establish an incentive scheme distinguishable from compensation available to other professionals. Bankruptcy Court Decision at 30-31. The Court expressly stated that "[t]he compensation scheme for trustees incorporates both percentage-based compensation and a reasonable analysis." Id. at 31 (emphasis added). The NABT advances the same argument in its amicus brief.

The District Court's decision, however, is supported by the statutory language, the legislative history, and the majority of cases. The "trustee compensation scheme" established by Congress does not "incorporate percentage based compensation." Reasonable trustee compensation is determined under Section 330 – the percentage-based Section 326(a) cap is irrelevant to the reasonableness of a trustee's compensation. If reasonable compensation is less than the cap the trustee receives the reasonable amount; if it exceeds the cap, the trustee may only receive the cap.

The District Court was unable to determine the extent to which the Bankruptcy Court was influenced by the Section 326(a) calculation in making its reasonableness determination. District Court Decision at 25. As a result, the District Court properly directed that "on remand the bankruptcy court will be required to perform the reasonableness analysis based solely on the criteria set forth in § 330." Id.

It is unclear why the Trustee selected this as an issue to be decided on appeal. The Trustee's brief apparently acknowledges that reasonable trustee compensation is calculated pursuant to Section 330, and that Section 326(a) merely sets an upper limit and is not a factor in the reasonableness determination. The District Court merely restated the law with which the Trustee now appears to concur, and directed that on remand the Bankruptcy Court may not include the cap as a factor in the reasonableness determination. To the extent the Bankruptcy Court did not do so, as the Trustee asserts, it will not do so again. If the Bankruptcy Court's reasonableness determination was tainted by a "percentage commission" theory, it will not be in the future.

The NABT, on the other hand, asserts that the Section 326(a) cap cannot be determined without considering the Section 330 reasonable compensation, and vice versa. The only support the NABT provides is the Guyana case, which would presumably have to be decided differently in light of the Fifth Circuit's strict interpretation of Section 326(a) as espoused in its Pritchard decision, as was addressed previously in this brief.

As the Trustee does not seek a finding that the Section 326(a) cap should be factored into the Section 330 reasonableness determination, he does not seek reversal of the District Court's decision on this point. The District Court did not even make a finding that the Bankruptcy Court improperly analyzed the Trustee's request, so there is no "erroneous" finding to reverse. As a result, the District Court's decision should be affirmed in its entirety.

III. THE DISTRICT COURT PROPERLY DIRECTED THAT THE BANKRUPTCY COURT SHOULD NOT INCLUDE EXTRANEOUS FACTORS IN ITS REASONABLENESS DETERMINATION

The District Court determined that the Bankruptcy Court may have been influenced by irrelevant factors in determining the reasonableness of the Trustee's interim compensation. For example, although the Bankruptcy Court rejected every argument for preclusion raised by the Trustee, it inexplicably went on to state that its reasonableness determination was based in part upon the fact that the U.S. Trustee objected at the Final Report stage after not objecting to either the sale of the Property or the Trustee's interim compensation request. Bankruptcy Court Decision at 22-28.

If the Bankruptcy Court's reasonableness determination was indeed clouded by the timing of the U.S. Trustee's objection, it was clearly in error. The order approving the sale made no mention of the amount of trustee compensation to be awarded, so there were no grounds on which to appeal it even if the U.S. Trustee did not approve of the sale. In any event, the sale turned an asset with no value to the estate into $372,387 in cash; that Trustee had expressed the belief that he was entitled to much of that recovery was no reason to object to the sale.

Once the $372,387 in cash was received pursuant to Code Section 506(c), it became an estate asset that had to be disbursed according to the Code, not agreements between the parties. See, e.g., Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Reynolds & Reynolds Co. (In re JKJ Chevrolet, Inc.), 26 F.3d 481, 484 (4th Cir. 1994). In addition, Section 506(c) cannot be used to recover all administrative expenses incurred during the life of the case; it is only used to recover the direct costs attendant to selling the property. See, e.g., United Jersey Bank v. Miller (In re C.S. Assocs.), 29 F.3d 903, 906 (3d Cir. 1994). As a result, regardless of the Trustee's intentions there was no reason to assume that almost two-thirds of the Section 506(c) recovery would be in the Trustee's hands, and not unsecured creditors' hands, at the end of the case. The only valid assumption at the time of the sale was that the Bank allowed the estate to retain $372,387 because it considered that amount to be the benefit it incurred from the sale.

Nevertheless, the Trustee has continued to beat the "You never objected to the sale" drum throughout these proceedings. The U.S. Trustee's non-objection is only relevant to the Trustee's final compensation if the compensation provision was a "make or break" term of the sale, in which case the Trustee might argue that he would have withdrawn the sale and abandoned the property had the U.S. Trustee opposed the sale. If the compensation was a deal-breaker, however, the Trustee must admit that he structured the deal in order to get $204,522.76 for himself, not $62,500 for unsecured – and thus admit that he abdicated his fiduciary duty. If the Trustee administered the estate to benefit himself, his compensation is subject to being reduced or denied in full. Cf. In re Derryberry, 72 B.R. 874, 879 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1987) (directing disgorgement, removal, and disbarment where "it was obvious [the trustee's] primary concern was for his check").

Indeed, one of the primary reasons given by the Trustee for the Property sale was the possible action to be brought against the Debtor's principal. The Trustee actually certified that this action was so important that the sale should be approved even if the unsecured creditors would receive nothing.[3/] Of course, once the Trustee received his compensation he abandoned his action against Mr. Reale – but at the time the sale was proposed there was every reason for creditors and the U.S. Trustee to believe that the Trustee might be able obtain a significant recovery from Mr. Reale. Had additional funds been recovered for ultimate disbursement to creditors, the Trustee's interim compensation might have been brought in line with [3/] This assertion should be compared to the Trustee's brief at page 19, footnote 5, where the Trustee feigns shock that any court might allow a credit bid sale when unsecured creditors are to receive no distribution.

reality before the end of the case.

If the Court gives the Trustee the benefit of the doubt and assumes that he did not structure the transaction primarily for his own benefit, then the U.S. Trustee's non-objection to the sale is a non-issue. The sale simply brought $372,387 into the estate, and the Trustee had no rights to it other than the right to submit an application pursuant to Code Section 330(a), which he subsequently did.

As for the Trustee's 1994 interim compensation request, the Bankruptcy Court correctly noted that interim compensation is always subject to review and revision at a later stage if necessary. See Bankruptcy Court Decision at 22-23 and cases cited therein. Thus, the non-objection to the Trustee's interim compensation is also a non-issue, as the Trustee's interim award was not yet final and the U.S. Trustee was perfectly within her rights to object at the final hearing stage. Certainly unreasonable compensation cannot become reasonable simply because the U.S. Trustee did not object prior to the final hearing.

In any event, the Trustee never appealed the Bankruptcy Court's laches and estoppel determination, and he cannot attempt to resurrect these issues now. As the Bankruptcy Court acknowledged in rejecting the Trustee's preclusion arguments, the U.S. Trustee is simply not subject to laches and equitable estoppel as are other, non-governmental litigants. See, e.g., Heckler v. Community Health Servs. of Crawford Co., 467 U.S. 51, 60 (1984) ("it is well settled that the Government may not be estopped on the same terms as any other litigant"); United States v. Summerlin, 310 U.S. 414, 416 (1940) ("It is well established that the United States is not . . .subject to the defense of laches in enforcing its rights."); Dole v. Local 427, Int'l Union of Elec., Radio & Mach. Workers, AFL-CIO, 894 F.2d 607, 612 (3d Cir. 1990) ("The principle that the United States are not . . . barred by any laches of their officers, however gross . . . is established past all controversy or doubt.").

Congress created the U.S. Trustee to monitor cases and trustees and, by ensuring compliance with the Code, uphold the integrity of the bankruptcy system. Cf. 28 U.S.C. § 586. As creditors all too often do not take an active role in cases due in part to the assumption that recovery is unlikely, part of the U.S. Trustee's role is to speak for creditors who otherwise would have no voice. As a result, the U.S. Trustee is often only objector – but the lack of other objectors should not be used to justify the award of unreasonable compensation.

In order to perform her trustee supervision duties the U.S. Trustee receives all trustee final reports and compensation applications. In light of the huge quantities of documents received every year by the U.S. Trustee, it should come as no surprise that every interim application cannot be objected to. It should be even less surprising that the U.S. Trustee did not object to a sale that would turn a valueless asset into $372,387 in cash. The Trustee, however, effectively requests that this Court establish a rule that compensation awards, even those made pursuant to interlocutory orders, are carved in stone as soon as they are granted and may not be adjusted at the end of the case even if they were at variance with the applicable law. In addition, the Trustee effectively asks this Court to hold that the approval of a sale constitutes approval of every underlying assumption that led the parties to set the sale terms as they did – even when those assumptions are at variance with the law.

The Bankruptcy Court also based its decision in part on the irrelevant fact that the Trustee had already paid himself in full two years before the Objection was filed, thus rendering disgorgement a "hardship." This finding has no relation to the reasonableness of the requested compensation, and it ignores the fact that the Trustee unilaterally decided to pay himself in full almost one year before he filed his Final Report. The Trustee could have waited until the end of the case, included his previously-awarded compensation as an administrative expense, and proposed to pay himself along with other administrative claimants after estate administration was complete. If not reversed the Bankruptcy Court's decision would have transferred the hardship of losing over $142,000 from the Trustee to the creditors of this estate merely because the Trustee had already paid it to himself. To the extent any “equities” impact on this case, it is the interests of the estate’s intended beneficiaries, not those of the Trustee, that should prevail. To the extent that the Bankruptcy Court's decision was based on the "hardship" that the Trustee would endure if improperly paid interim compensation had to be disgorged, the decision was an abuse of the Bankruptcy Court's discretion that was properly reversed by the District Court.

The U.S. Trustee respectfully submits that the determination of reasonable compensation in December 1994 and the determination of reasonable final compensation in December 1996 (when the Objection was heard) were independent of one another. Compensation that may have looked reasonable in 1994 should be adjusted at the end of a case if it becomes clear that the interim award exceeded the statutory limits.

The Trustee’s arguments are equitable in nature. The Third Circuit has held, however, that equitable considerations cannot be used to circumvent the plain language of a statute. See, e.g., Columbia Gas Sys., 33 F.3d at 302; United States Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 141 (3d Cir. 1994). As Sections 326(a) and 330 are not ambiguous, no equitable considerations may be invoked. Cf. Norwest Bank Worthington v. Ahlers, 485 U.S. 197, 206 (1988) (“[W]hatever equitable powers remain in the bankruptcy courts must and can only be exercised within the confines of the Bankruptcy Code.”). Any changes to the way trustee compensation is determined must be made by Congress, not the Third Circuit.

Once the "failure to object" and "hardship" arguments are stripped away, the Bankruptcy Court’s decision rests solely on the reasonableness of compensation at approximately $400 per hour, in light of the services rendered and benefits conferred by the Trustee. The reasonableness of the Trustee’s compensation must be determined by his actions, not the actions or inactions of other parties. To properly determine reasonable compensation on remand the Bankruptcy Court will have to apply the criteria contained in Section 330; no extraneous factors may called upon to avoid scrutiny of the Trustee’s compensation.

Indeed, even in the absence of a U.S. Trustee objection the Bankruptcy Court had the obligation to review the Trustee’s compensation request and deny it if it exceeded the maximum allowable. Cf. In re Busy Beaver Bldg. Ctrs., Inc., 19 F.3d 833, 844 (3d Cir. 1994) (bankruptcy courts must review compensation applications to “protect the estate, lest overreaching attorneys or other professionals drain it of wealth which by right should inure to the benefit of unsecured creditors”). The Bankruptcy Court obviously did not conduct the market analysis contemplated by Busy Beaver – if it had it would have discovered that, while maximum compensation might be awarded in most cases, such compensation is not generally paid at a rate in excess of $400 per hour. On remand, the Bankruptcy Court will have to undergo the proper market analysis. Of course, without the Credit Bid factored into the Section 326(a) base the Trustee's maximum compensation would amount to an eminently reasonable $122.29 per hour based on the 742 hours expended during the case.

In addition, the U.S. Trustee respectfully submits that the District Court's remand should be affirmed even if the Credit Bid may be factored into the Section 326(a) cap, as the interim compensation awarded to the Trustee was nevertheless unreasonable in light of the nature of the services rendered and the concomitant benefit to the estate.

CONCLUSION

In light of the foregoing, the U.S. Trustee respectfully requests that the decision of the District Court be affirmed in its entirety.

Respectfully submitted,

STATEMENT OF BASIS FOR APPELLATE JURISDICTION

Patricia A. Staiano, the United States Trustee for Region 3 (the "United States Trustee") appeals from a final order of the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of New Jersey. The bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over this Chapter 7 proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(a). On November 13, 1996, the United States Trustee transmitted for filing the Trustee's Final Report and Final Application for Trustee Compensation (the "Final Report") of Chapter 7 trustee James J. Cain (the "Trustee") together with the United States Trustee's Objection thereto. The Final Report and its attendant Objection constituted a core proceeding under 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A) as it was a matter concerning the administration of the estate. On March 16, 1998, the Bankruptcy Court issued a written decision that overruled the Objection. The Court's decision was subsequently memorialized in an order dated April 6, 1998, which was a final order. The United States Trustee timely noticed this appeal on March 25, 1998.[1] Accordingly, the jurisdiction of this Court is properly invoked pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

The instant appeal presents three issues:

1. Whether the court below erred as a matter of law in deviating from the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a), pursuant to which maximum allowable trustee compensation is determined, and allowing the Trustee to base his compensation calculation upon the credit bid portion of a 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) sale.

2. Whether the court below erred as a matter of law in holding that trustee compensation is not limited to a reasonableness determination as required by 11 U.S.C. § 330(a).

3. Whether the court below erred in finding that the compensation received by the

[1] Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8002(a) states that "[a] notice of appeal filed after the announcement of a decision or order but before entry of the judgment, order, or decree shall be treated as filed after such entry and on the day thereof." Thus, the United States Trustee's appeal, filed after announcement of the decision but before an order was entered, was timely filed.

Trustee was reasonable in light of the Trustee's efforts.

STATEMENT OF APPLICABLE STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

On appeal to this Court, questions of law are reviewed de novo. General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Jones, 999 F.2d 63, 66 (3d Cir. 1993); First Jersey Nat'l Bank v. Brown (In re Brown), 951 F.2d 564, 567 (3d Cir. 1991). A bankruptcy court's findings of fact should be set aside on appeal if they are clearly erroneous. Stendardo v. Federal Nat'l Mortgage Ass'n (In re Stendardo), 991 F.2d 1089, 1094 (3d Cir. 1993); see also Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013.

Compensation orders present matters committed to the bankruptcy court's discretion. Abuse of discretion by a bankruptcy court may be found where "(1) the decision was based on an erroneous conclusion of law; (2) where the record contains no evidence on which the judge could have based his decision; or (3) where the supposed facts found are clearly erroneous as found." Integrated Resources, Inc. v. Ameritrust Co. Nat'l Ass'n (In re Integrated Resources, Inc.), 157 B.R. 66, 72 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (citation omitted).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Congress based maximum trustee compensation on cash actually disbursed by a trustee. See 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). Nonetheless, in the instant case the Appellee received compensation of $204,522.76, at a rate of over $400 per hour, based not only upon actual cash disbursements but also upon a credit bid of approximately $7.78 million made pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) by the secured creditor in purchasing the principal asset of this estate. Although the Appellee obtained a return of $62,500, or 19%, to unsecured creditors, this return pales in comparison to the benefit received by the Appellee as a result of the sale.

As a fiduciary for the estate the Appellee was expected to administer estate assets to benefit the creditors of the estate, not himself. The Appellee, however, included his anticipated “commission” in determining the terms of the sale, making him the primary beneficiary of the sale from the time the sale was proposed. The Appellee’s actions resulted in the overpayment of $142,449.40 in excess of the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum. As these funds should have been paid to the unsecured creditors, the Appellee must be directed to disgorge the overpayment.

The bankruptcy court in this case committed reversible error when it found that 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) was ambiguous enough to allow trustee compensation on the credit bid portion of the sale. The bankruptcy court also erred in its analysis of the proper standard to apply to trustee compensation requests by treating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum as a factor to be considered in making a “reasonableness” determination pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), and not merely as a cap to be applied after the reasonable fee has been determined. Moreover, the bankruptcy court erred in finding that the compensation received by the Appellee was reasonable in light of the Appellee’s services in this case.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On July 6, 1992, a voluntary petition was filed under Chapter 11 of title 11, United States Code (the “Bankruptcy Code” or "Code") by LAN Associates XI, L.P. (the “Debtor”). See Voluntary Chapter 11 petition of LAN Associates XI, L.P., Docket No. 1. On August 24, 1992, the Honorable Judith H. Wizmur, United States Bankruptcy Judge, (the “Bankruptcy Court”) entered an Order directing the United States Trustee to appoint a trustee pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 1104(a), and on August 31, 1992, the Trustee was appointed to serve as Chapter 11 trustee. Thereafter, pursuant to the Trustee's motion, on May 21, 1993, the Bankruptcy Court entered an Order converting this case to one under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code and allowing the trustee to operate the Debtor pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 721. See Docket No. 157. On or about June 2, 1993, the United States Trustee appointed the Trustee to serve as the Chapter 7 trustee.

The principal asset in this estate was a parcel of real property known as the Marlton Executive Park, Route 73 and Executive Drive, Evesham Township, New Jersey. Id. This asset consisted of two office buildings and was originally valued at $9,000,000 on the Debtor's schedule of real property. See Debtor's Schedule A, Docket No. 15. This property was encumbered by a mortgage held by First Fidelity Bank, N.A. (the "Bank") originally scheduled by the Debtor as being essentially equivalent to the value of the property, but the Bank subsequently filed a proof of claim in the amount of $12,865,434.55. See Certification of Trustee James J. Cain in Support of Motion to Sell Real Property, Docket No. 264. The Trustee's appraiser appraised the property at a fair market value of $9,727,000 and a liquidation value of $7,781,200. Id.

The Trustee was awarded compensation in the amount of $28,665.51 by Order dated April 8, 1993. See Docket No. 141. This compensation was based upon 163.5 hours of services rendered as Chapter 11 trustee, for a rate of $175.26 per hour. See Trustee's Application for Interim Allowance, Docket No. 121. The bulk of these services had involved the Trustee's acting as the landlord of the Marlton Executive Park for approximately nine months during the Chapter 11 portion of the case.

In January 1994 the Trustee filed a Certification in support of his motion to approve the sale of the Marlton Executive Park. See Docket No. 264. In this Certification the Trustee stated that the Bank had proposed a sale whereby it would "credit bid" $7,781,200 of its claim, an amount equal to the liquidation price. Id. In addition, the Bank agreed to waive its deficiency claim of approximately $5 million and also agreed to allow the Trustee to retain the $372,387 in cash collateral that the Trustee had on hand. Id. The Trustee also stated that notice of the sale motion would provide an opportunity for other bidders to submit higher and better offers. Id.

The Trustee further certified that he “ha[d] the ability” to pursue the Debtor’s general partner, Antonio Reale, “for any deficiency of property of the estate to pay all claims of the estate.” Id. To this end the Trustee asserted that, if he were to abandon the property, “waiting for a foreclosure to be completed in order for the deficiency to be determined would significantly delay the commencement of my cause of action” against Mr. Reale. Id.

The Trustee also estimated that he expected to make a claim for $70,000 as a “commission” on the rent received during his operation of the Marlton Executive Park and $233,616 as a “commission” on the sale. Id. The Trustee further certified that, in order to pay the remaining administrative claims and to provide a “meaningful distribution” estimated at 25% to unsecured creditors, he had “agreed to contribute $83,346.00 of the commission that I would have been authorized to receive if the property sold for at least $7,781,200.00.” Id. Finally, the Trustee asserted that, although he believed the 25% distribution to unsecured creditors would be meaningful, he also believed that the Bankruptcy Court should authorize the sale even without such distribution in order to facilitate any action against Mr. Reale. Id.

The Bankruptcy Court authorized the proposed sale pursuant to an Order dated February 14, 1994 (the “Sale Order”). See Docket No. 277. The Sale Order made no mention of compensation to be awarded to the Trustee as a result of the sale. Id. The Trustee thereafter "sold" the Marlton Executive Park on April 18, 1994, to the Bank’s subsidiary, Marlton/Fidoreo LS, Inc. See Report of Private Sale, attached as Exhibit B to Trustee’s Legal Brief in Response to Objection of United States Trustee to Trustee’s Final Report, Docket No. 351.

In October 1994, the Trustee submitted an application for interim compensation (the “Interim Application”) in the amount of $204,522.76 and reimbursement of $999.40 in expenses. See Docket No. 293. The compensation requested was for 578.50 hours, some of which was performed during his approximately nine months as Chapter 11 trustee and some of which was performed during the approximately nine months the Trustee operated it as Chapter 7 trustee. The requested compensation amounted to an hourly rate of $403.09. Id.

In calculating his compensation request, the Trustee included the $7.78 million credit bid portion of the sale with the cash he actually disbursed during the case, making a total base of $10,545,142.42. Id. From this amount the trustee calculated an “allowable commission” of $316,534.27. Id. From this amount the Trustee subtracted the $28,665.51 interim compensation previously received as well as a “voluntary reduction” of $83,346 from which a “meaningful distribution” of $62,500 to unsecured creditors was anticipated. Id.

In the Interim Application the Trustee referred to "operating revenues" of $2,763,942.42 from September 1992 through August 1994. Id. Based on this information, during the Chapter 11 portion of this case the Trustee received cash totaling $1,333,503.14. As a result, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) the maximum compensation to which the Trustee is allowed as Chapter 11 trustee is $40,185.94, of which $28,665.51 was paid pursuant to his first interim application.

Following a hearing on December 1, 1994, Trustee’s counsel submitted a letter to the Bankruptcy Court in which it was reiterated that the Trustee had taken a “voluntary reduction” from his “commission” so that a 25% distribution could be paid to all creditors. See letter dated December 2, 1994, from Joseph A. McCormick, Jr. Esq. to the Honorable Judith H. Wizmur, attached as Exhibit D to Docket No. 351. In support of the Trustee’s requested compensation, Trustee’s counsel stated that the Trustee was entitled to compensation in excess of that generally charged by attorneys because of the potential liability attendant to administering an asset worth over $7 million. Id. Finally, Trustee’s counsel urged the Bankruptcy Court to consider the results of the case and the fact that the Trustee had taken a “voluntary reduction.” Id.

Apparently satisfied with this information, without further hearing the Bankruptcy Court entered an order authorizing the compensation as requested. See Docket No. 305. This Order provided that the interim allowance was "to be paid from funds allocated by the secured creditor pursuant to the provisions of 11 USC 506c." Id. On December 6, 1994, the Trustee paid himself interim compensation of $204,522.76.

In March 1995 the Trustee filed a motion requesting permission to make an “interim” disbursement of $62,500 to unsecured creditors. See Docket Nos. 313-15. Following a hearing on April 17, 1995, the Bankruptcy Court entered an order an April 24, 1995 authorizing the “interim” distribution. See Docket No. 318. The Trustee thereafter made these disbursements, which amounted to 19% of the $328,538.03 total allowed unsecured claims rather than the 25% that had been represented in support of the Sale Motion and Interim Application.

On October 6, 1995, the Trustee’s proposed abandonment of his cause of action against Mr. Reale was noticed to all creditors. See Docket No. 331. This notice asserted that, as Mr. Reale’s liabilities apparently far outweighed his assets, it would not have been cost effective to pursue the cause of action. Id.

On November 20, 1995, the Office of the United States Trustee received the Trustee's Final Report. See Docket No. 346. In addition, an Estate Cash Receipt and Disbursement Record, which the Trustee is required to maintain pursuant to Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 2015(a), was submitted with the Final Report. Id. As of the Final Report filing date, the Trustee had funds on hand totaling $19,086.88, with which he proposed to make a 73% pro rata distribution on the remaining amounts requested by the Clerk of the Bankruptcy Court, the Trustee's accountant, and counsel to the Trustee. Id.

The Trustee's Final Report reflects "Gross Estate Proceeds" of $1,679,097.80 during the Chapter 7 portion of this case. Id. The maximum allowable compensation on this amount pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) is $50,552.93. Combined with the $40,185.94 maximum allowable as Chapter 11 trustee, the maximum compensation to which the Trustee is entitled for case disbursements during this case is, $90,738.87, of which he has already received $28,665.51.

As the United States Trustee determined that the Trustee is only entitled to compensation on actual cash disbursements and not on the credit portion of the sale, the United States Trustee objected to the Final Report on the grounds that Trustee’s total $233,188.27 compensation exceeded the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap by $142,449.40. See Docket Nos. 347-48, 352, 357.

The Trustee responded that the United States Trustee had been noticed regarding the sale of overencumbered property as well as the interim compensation request, and as a result should be precluded from objecting to the Trustee’s compensation at the final hearing stage. See Docket Nos. 351, 356. The Trustee also asserted that the inclusion of the credit bid in his compensation calculation was a “constructive disbursement,” which had been recognized as includable in trustee compensation calculations in cases decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898. Id.

At a hearing held on December 12, 1996, the Bankruptcy Court heard the arguments of counsel and reserved her decision. See Transcript of December 12, 1996 hearing, Docket No. 355. On March 16, 1998 a written decision was rendered. See Docket No. 364. In its decision, the Bankruptcy Court agreed with the United States Trustee that the objection was not precluded by the doctrines of res judicata, collateral estoppel, law of the case, laches, equitable estoppel, or trustee immunity. Id. at 22-28. The Bankruptcy Court disagreed with the United States Trustee, however, regarding the substantive issue of whether or not the credit bid could be included in the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) calculation. Id. at 17-21. Noting that pre-Code cases had acknowledged the possibility of "constructive disbursements" includable as "moneys disbursed or turned over," the Bankruptcy Court determined that 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) was ambiguous, and could not be strictly applied as written. Id. at 17. As a result, the Court held that the Trustee had properly included the $7.78 million credit bid in calculating his compensation request. Id. at 17-21.

The Bankruptcy Court then turned to whether or not the amount of compensation received by the Trustee was proper. The Court rejected the United States Trustee's assertion that trustee compensation is subject to a reasonableness determination under 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) to which the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) amount should be strictly imposed as a cap. Id. at 31. Instead, the Court held that Congress intended trustee compensation to be different from compensation payable to other professionals. Id. The Court found that 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) serves as an incentive compensation system that allows trustees to be paid a percentage of assets brought into the estate. Id. Noting that in its experience trustees generally receive the maximum, and further stating that the Trustee had, after all, received less than the maximum by virtue of his "voluntary reduction," the Court held that the compensation received by the Trustee was not excessive. Id. 32-34.

The Bankruptcy Court did direct the Trustee to disgorge some funds, however. As the Trustee had always asserted that he would be setting aside from his "commission" enough funds to make a 25% distribution to unsecured creditors, the Court directed him to disgorge $19,634.51. Id. This amount, when added to the 19% distribution already received by unsecured creditors, would bring to 25% the total distribution that the Trustee had represented would be paid to unsecured creditors.

The United States Trustee filed a notice of appeal on March 25, 1998. Upon the Bankruptcy Court's entry of an order embodying its decision on April 6, 1998, the United States Trustee's notice of appeal was deemed timely filed by operation of Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 8002(a). See Order Regarding Objection to the Final Report by the United States Trustee, Docket No. 367.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED AS A MATTER OF LAW BY DEVIATING FROM THE PLAIN MEANING OF 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) AND ALLOWING THE TRUSTEE TO INCLUDE THE CREDIT BID PORTION OF A 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) SALE IN CALCULATING HIS MAXIMUM COMPENSATION

A. Pursuant to the Plain Meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a), Only Cash Disbursements are to be Included in Calculating Maximum Trustee Compensation

The maximum compensation allowable to a trustee is governed by 11 U.S.C. § 326. This provision, entitled "Limitation on compensation of trustee," provides that "the court may allow reasonable compensation under [11 U.S.C. § 330] . . . for the trustee's services . . . not to exceed [a percentage based] upon all moneys disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee to parties in interest, excluding the debtor, but including holders of secured claims." In the instant appeal, the determination of the meaning of "moneys disbursed or turned over" is of paramount importance. The United States Trustee respectfully submits that the Bankruptcy Court's holding that the Trustee could include the credit bid in calculating his maximum compensation must be reversed as it was clearly erroneous as a matter law.

According to Supreme Court precedent, courts faced with questions of statutory interpretation must look to the words used by the legislature in drafting the statute and ascribe to these words their normal, everyday meaning. See, e.g., Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42, 100 S.Ct. 311, 314, 62 L.Ed.2d 199 (1979). When the language of a statute is clear and unambiguous it is unnecessary to resort to legislative history and pre-statute case law to divine Congressional intent. See, e.g., United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. 235, 241-42, 109 S.Ct. 1026, 103 L.Ed.2d 290 (1989). Indeed, "[t]here is, of course, no more persuasive evidence of the purpose of a statute than the words by which the legislature undertook to give expression to its wishes." United States v. Amer. Trucking Ass'ns, Inc., 310 U.S. 534, 543, 60 S.Ct. 1059, 1063, 84 L.Ed. 1345 (1930).

The Third Circuit has likewise stated that "[i]t is axiomatic that statutory interpretation properly begins with the language of the statute itself, including all of its parts. There is no need to resort to legislative history unless the statutory language is ambiguous." Velis v. Kardanis, 949 F.2d 78, 81 (3d Cir. 1991); see, e.g., United States Trustee v. Columbia Gas Systems, Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Systems, Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 300 (3d Cir. 1994) ("When a statute is clear and unambiguous, the courts must give effect to Congress' intent as Congress explained it with that writing."). Thus, a statute's ambiguity cannot arise from the legislative history or prior case law, as these sources are not even consulted until after a determination of ambiguity is made.

On page 12 of the decision below, the Bankruptcy Court made the following statement regarding the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a):

> At first blush, the plain meaning of the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over in the case by the trustee" appears to preclude the opportunity of a Chapter 7 trustee to include a credit bid as the basis for the calculation of his/her commission. The satisfaction of the secured claim of the purchaser/lienholder does not appear to constitute "moneys," and the trustee does not literally disburse or turn over the amount of the lien to parties in interest. However, there has been substantial debate in the cases, dating back to the early days of [sic] Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as to whether, on the basis of a constructive disbursement theory, a Chapter 7 trustee may calculate a commission based on the total value of property sold to a secured creditor.

Although the Bankruptcy Court "readily acknowledge[d] that the definitional analysis of 'moneys' does not support" its decision, nevertheless the Court held that the statute was ambiguous "in light of the substantial case law that has highlighted the ambiguity of the phrase." As it was based upon factors other than the language used by Congress the Bankruptcy Court's finding of "ambiguity" is contrary to basic tenets of statutory construction and must be reversed.

In enacting 11 U.S.C. § 326(a), Congress used simple words such as “moneys” and “disbursed.” The word “moneys” is defined as “sums of money” or “funds.” See 2 Webster’s Third New International Dictionary at 1458 (1981). “Money” is something generally accepted as a medium of exchange, such as “currency, coin, negotiable paper,” and any other asset readily convertible to cash. Id.; see also IX Oxford English Dictionary at 992-95 (2nd ed. 1989) (in modern parlance, “money” is “applied indifferently to coin and to such promissory documents representing coin (especially government and bank notes) as are currently accepted as a medium of exchange”). “Disburse” means “to pay out or expend (money),” and a “disbursement” is defined as “that which has been disbursed; money paid out.” See IV Oxford English Dictionary at 726.

Even if the word “moneys” is viewed as a term of art, the relevant definitional sources clearly show that the common legal and commercial usage is virtually the same as the lay usage described above. For example, in legal usage the term “money” means “coins and paper currency used as circulating medium of exchange, and does not embrace notes, bonds, evidences of debt, or other personal or real estate.” Black’s Law Dictionary at 1005 (6th ed. 1990). In addition, in the Uniform Commercial Code the term “money” is defined as “a medium of exchange authorized or adopted by a domestic or foreign government[.]” N.J. Stat.Ann. tit. 12A § 1-201 (1997).

As the words used by Congress to constitute the phrase “moneys disbursed or turned over” are clear and unambiguous, the phrase itself is also clear and unambiguous. Even if it is deemed ambiguous, however, the Bankruptcy Court's analysis was erroneous. The Third Circuit has directed that courts should clarify perceived ambiguities regarding a word or phrase in the Bankruptcy Code by considering how the word or phrase is used elsewhere in the Code. Velis v. Kardanis, 949 F.2d at 81. The word “money” as used elsewhere in the Bankruptcy Code always refers to cash or cash equivalents. For example, 11 U.S.C. § 345 addresses the investment of “money of the estate.” Congress’ intent in using the word “money” in this Code section is obvious — one cannot “deposit or invest” the encumbered portion of a parcel of real estate, nor can one “deposit or invest” the value of creditor claims extinguished. In addition, one of the fundamental trustee duties under the Bankruptcy Code is to “collect and reduce to money the property of the estate.” 11 U.S.C. § 704(1) (emphasis added). Again, Congress’ intent that assets be turned into cash for ultimate distribution to creditors is evident. Thus, an examination of Congress’ use of “money” elsewhere in the Bankruptcy Code eliminates any lingering doubts about the intended meaning of the word without the need to resort to pre-Code cases.

In light of the “plain meaning” doctrine as applied by the Supreme Court and Third Circuit, the Bankruptcy Court’s ruling on the ambiguity of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) is reversible error. Once the Bankruptcy Court determined "at first blush" that the word “moneys” was unambiguous, its inquiry into the meaning of “moneys disbursed or turned over” should have ended — there is no "second blush." As “moneys” means “sums of money,” “disburse” means “pay out money,” and “money” means “cash or other instruments generally accepted as a medium of exchange and easily convertible to cash,” under Supreme Court and Third Circuit precedent the Bankruptcy Court had little choice but to find that the phrase “moneys disbursed or turned over” means “cash or cash equivalents disbursed or turned over.” Thus, the Court’s strained finding of “ambiguity” based not on the language of the statute but on pre-Code case law was erroneous, and must be reversed.

B. The Legislative History of 11 U.S.C. § 326 Does Not Support the Bankruptcy Court's Decision

Pursuant to Supreme Court precedent, the only time courts are to disregard a statute's plain meaning is when a strict application "will produce a result demonstrably at odds with the intentions of its drafters." United States v. Ron Pair Enters., Inc., 489 U.S. at 242. When the legislative history of 11 U.S.C. § 326 is examined, however, it becomes evident that the strict application espoused by the United States Trustee is entirely consistent with Congress' concerns at the time the Bankruptcy Code was enacted. The House Report stated that 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) is to be applied to “the amounts of money distributed by the trustee” and not to cases in which a trustee takes compensation for simply turning over property to a secured creditor. H.R. Rep No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 327 (1977) (emphasis added).

Courts have held that the House Report language demonstrates that the drafters of the Code specifically rejected those cases under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 which allowed compensation to trustees based on "constructive disbursements" of something other than cash. See, e.g., In re Indoor-Outdoor Dining, Inc., 77 B.R. 952, 954 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 1987) ("The statutory history [of Section 326(a)] suggests a deliberate rejection of some decisions under the former statutes which would equate the debtor's property with 'moneys' administered by the trustee."); In re New England Fish Co., 34 B.R. 899, 901 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1983). It is disingenuous to believe that, in completely overhauling the bankruptcy laws of this country, Congress chose not to correct a perceived ambiguity. Obviously, Congress perceived no ambiguity in the phrase “moneys disbursed or turned over.”

Congress had the opportunity to add phrases such as the following to 11 U.S.C. § 326(a): “value of assets administered”; “amount of claims paid or otherwise extinguished”; or, as the Trustee proposed and the court below accepted, "the extent of potential liability undertaken by the trustee." Despite its assumed knowledge of the hoary precedent for including non-“moneys” in calculating trustee compensation, Congress chose not to base trustee compensation on anything other than “moneys disbursed or turned over.” See, e.g., In re Barnett, 133 B.R. 487, 489 (Bankr. N.D. Iowa 1991) (Congress "could, but did not, choose the words 'property' or 'value' . . . . I cannot escape the feeling that were I to rule in the trustee's favor, I would be legislating a result different from that provided for by Congress."); In re New England Fish Co., 34 B.R. at 901 ("Had it so desired, Congress could readily have included properties turned over, assumed claims, and the value of compromised claims as well as monies as the basis on which commissions were to be computed. However, it did not do so.").

In the decision below, the Bankruptcy Court stated that Congress' failure to change the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over" provides no evidence as to its position regarding whether "moneys" may include a constructive disbursement. Another tenet of statutory interpretation supports the United States Trustee's argument regarding this issue, however: expressio unius est exclusio alterius — in essence, "The expression of one thing excludes another." Although Congress was presumably aware of the disagreement in pre-Code cases as to whether "moneys" may include anything other than actual cash disbursed, it nevertheless based maximum trustee compensation upon moneys disbursed or turned over, and nothing else. As a result, it must be assumed that everything that is not "moneys" was intentionally excluded from the calculation.

In light of the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully submits that the legislative history makes it clear that Congress expected trustees to be paid for disbursing cash to creditors, not engineering "sales" of overencumbered property to the secured creditor. As a result, the legislative history does not support the Bankruptcy Court's decision in the instant case.

C. Case Law Decided Under the Bankruptcy Code Does Not Support the Bankruptcy Court's Decision

The overwhelming majority of cases interpreting the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over" under the Bankruptcy Code have held that "the trustee's compensation must be based on actual monies disbursed . . . and not on assets or settlements which can be construed as a constructive disbursement." In re New England Fish Co., 34 B.R. at 901-02; see, e.g., Havis v. Rhea (In re Rhea), 143 B.R. 690, 691 (S.D. Tex. 1992); Kandel v. Alexander Leasing Corp., 107 B.R. 548, 551 (N.D. Ohio 1988) (trustee compensation can only be based on "monies [that] actually passed through [the trustee's] hands"); In re Landing, Inc., 142 B.R. 169, 172 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 1992) (trustee compensation may be based only on cash actually disbursed, and not value of liens assumed by buyers); In re Music Merchandisers, Inc., 131 B.R. 377, 380 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1991) ("[t]hat the trustee did not disburse or turn over cash money has compelled courts on various facts to resist inclusion of 'constructive disbursements' in the compensation base for purposes of § 326"); In re North Am. Oil & Gas, Inc., 130 B.R. 473, 480-81 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. 1990) ("[u]nliquidated assets simply 'turned over' to the liquidating agent are not includable" in determining trustee compensation).

The few courts under the Bankruptcy Code that have strayed from a strict application of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) are easily distinguishable. In In re Greenley Energy Holdings of Pa., Inc., 102 B.R. 400 (E.D. Pa. 1989), the trustee was allowed compensation based on the present value of $28,000,000 in guaranteed contracts entered into by the trustee. In that case, however, the trustee was a Chapter 11 trustee who had engineered what the court termed a "small miracle" by taking a non-operating debtor confronted with a $30 million environmental reclamation project and developing a business plan that paid all secured and unsecured creditors in full. Id. at 401. As the trustee had created new property and had not merely turned property over to a party in interest, the court determined that it would be unjust to deny the trustee compensation based on the guaranteed contract funds to be received by the creditors. Id. at 404-05. Indeed, the trustee did not even request the maximum, and he sought compensation at the rate of only $226 per hour. Id. at 403 n.3; cf. In re Stanley, 120 B.R. 409 (Bankr. E.D. Tex. 1990) (although court held that lien assumptions could be included in calculating the trustee's maximum compensation, it stated that it would have denied compensation if the sale had been of fully encumbered property or property with nominal equity).

Similarly, in In re Guyana Dev. Corp., 201 B.R. 462 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 1996), the case relied upon most heavily in the Bankruptcy Court's decision, involved a Chapter 11 trustee who ran a multinational firm and confirmed a liquidating plan that paid 88% to unsecured creditors. Total cash disbursements in the case were $79,938,954.41. Id. At 472. Given the complexity of the case and the magnificent benefit for unsecured creditors, it is no surprise that the Guyana court held that a lodestar analysis would not result in reasonable compensation.

Other courts recently faced with the same issue as the court below have properly applied the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) in holding that maximum trustee compensation is calculated upon actual cash disbursements, and not on the "credit bid" portion of a 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) sale. For example, in United States Trustee v. Messer (In re Pink Cadillac Assocs.), 96 Civ. 4571 (S.D.N.Y. April 7, 1997), the Honorable Louis L. Stanton of the Southern District of New York vacated a bankruptcy court order which had allowed the trustee to include the amount of a credit bid in calculating his compensation request. In Pink Cadillac, the trustee sold an asset encumbered by a lien of over $2.7 million to the mortgagee for a credit bid of $1.5 million. Id. slip op. at 2-3. The trustee then requested $20,000 in compensation, despite the fact that he had made no actual cash disbursements during the case. Id. The basis for the compensation requested was an agreement between the trustee and the mortgagee, and the trustee argued that $20,000 was well below the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum if the $1.5 million credit bid was included in the calculation. Id. Based upon the "constructive disbursement" of the $1.5 million credit bid, the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum would have been $68,250. Thus, the trustee in Pink Cadillac was purportedly taking a "voluntary reduction" of 71% of the "commission" to which he thought he was "entitled" upon the credit bid portion of the sale. Indeed, the bankruptcy judge in Pink Cadillac based his decision in part upon the assumption that the trustee was "entitled" to a $68,000 “commission.” Id., slip op. at 4.

The District Court in Pink Cadillac found that the emphasis on "moneys" rather than value or property was consistent with Congress' position regarding the trustee's principal duty to "reduce to money" property of the estate. Id., slip at 5-6. In addition, the Pink Cadillac court noted that many cases decided under the Bankruptcy Code have interpreted "moneys" literally. Id., slip op. at 6. The court rejected the trustee's argument that a strict application raises form over function, as the money did not actually pass through the trustee's hands and it was not "clear how he would have done so." Id., slip op. at 9. As the credit bid covered the entire purchase price of the property, the transaction did not give rise to "moneys" that could be used to calculate maximum trustee compensation. Id.

The United States Trustee respectfully submits that the Pink Cadillac analysis of the "plain meaning" and legislative intent behind 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) is far more sound and grounded in precedent than the Bankruptcy Court's analysis in the instant case. The Trustee "sold" property with a liquidation value of $7.78 million for a credit bid of $7.78 million plus $372,387 in cash. As in Pink Cadillac, the total amount of the mortgage far exceeded the value of the property, making it questionable how the Trustee could have structured a pure cash transaction with a secured creditor that could win any "bidding war" without having to pay a cent merely by bidding the entire amount of its claim pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 363(k). In addition, the trustee in Pink Cadillac argued that he had taken a "voluntary" reduction of 71%, but the District Court was not taken in by this ruse as the trustee was actually entitled to 0% of the amount requested. In the instant case the Trustee argued, and the Bankruptcy Court accepted, that in order to carve out a distribution to administrative claimants and unsecured creditors the Trustee had generously taken a “voluntary reduction” of a mere 26% of his "commission." Although no cash changed hands in Pink Cadillac, it is obvious from the District Court's analysis that if cash had changed hands the trustee would only have been allowed to include the cash, and not the credit bid, in his 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) calculation.

In another recent case, a bankruptcy judge in the Southern District of New York followed the Pink Cadillac reasoning in holding that a trustee was not entitled to base his compensation upon the credit bid portion of a 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) sale, and that even if compensation could be based on the credit bid the compensation requested was unreasonable in light of the services rendered. See In re Colonial Southbury L.P., Case No. 94-22057 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. June 3, 1997). In Colonial Southbury L.P., the trustee obtained a court order authorizing the sale of assets subject to a lien of $16.5 million to the secured creditor for $3 million. Id., slip op. at 3-4. Pursuant to a stipulation order previously entered by the court, the secured creditor agreed to contribute an amount equal to 3% of the sale price for distribution to creditors, and the trustee would be “entitled to receive a commission of all disbursements made while operating” the debtor. Id., slip op. at 4.

The trustee subsequently requested “commissions” of $91,138.96 on the credit bid sale. Id., slip op at 5. The United States Trustee objected on the grounds that the trustee had not actually disbursed the $3 million credit bid, that the trustee could not use 11 U.S.C. § 506(c) to circumvent the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a), and that the requested compensation was not reasonable. Id. The trustee argued that the credit bid was a disbursement as contemplated in 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) and that the requested compensation had been authorized by previous orders of the court. Id.

The Colonial Southbury court agreed that the line of cases supporting the United States Trustee's position was "compelling, particularly in light of the legislative history of Section 326(a)." Id., slip op. at 8. The court stated that allowing the requested compensation "would equate to judicial legislation." Id. In addition, the court rejected the trustee's dependence on pre-Code cases as the legislative history makes it clear that Congress has determined that "moneys" is not the equivalent of "property." Id., slip op. at 9 n.7. As the United States Trustee had pointed out, the secured creditor could have bid its entire $16 million claim instead of the $3 million credit bid — in which case the trustee would have sought compensation on $16 million, which could not be what Congress intended. Id. Thus, the court only allowed the trustee to receive compensation on actual cash disbursements. Id., slip op. at 12.

In light of the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the reasoning of the Pink Cadillac and Colonial Southbury decisions be adopted as they are grounded in the proper application of the "plain meaning" doctrine to facts similar to those in the instant case. As the Bankruptcy Court's decision runs counter to the vast majority of cases interpreting 11 U.S.C. § 326(a), it should be reversed.

D. Pre-Code Third Circuit Cases Do Not Support the Bankruptcy Court's Decision

In order to support its decision, the Bankruptcy Court resorted to cases decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898. See, e.g., Southwestern Media, Inc. v. Rau, 708 F.2d 419 (9th Cir. 1983); In re Sanford Furniture Mfg. Co., 126 F. 888, 889 (E.D.N.C. 1903). Nevertheless, pre-Code decisions of the Third Circuit, even those cited by the Bankruptcy Court, do not support its decision. For example, the Third Circuit in American Surety Co. v. Freed, 224 F. 333, 337 (3d Cir. 1915), expressly stated that it was not faced with a constructive disbursement situation. The Third Circuit held that the trustee could only receive compensation on the cash received, as he had essentially sold the equity in the asset to the bondholders who, for all intents and purposes, already owned the rest of the property. Id. at 336. Although the Third Circuit cited cases that had addressed the issue of constructive disbursements, it did not state, even in dicta, that it acknowledged the viability of constructive disbursements in the calculation of maximum trustee compensation. Thus, the statement of the Bankruptcy Court in the instant case that the Third Circuit in American Surety "confirmed" the constructive disbursement analysis of earlier cases was incorrect.

Although the Third Circuit has apparently never squarely addressed the question of whether or not credit bids may be included in calculating trustee compensation, one pre-Code case in particular is illustrative. In In re Prindible, 115 F.2d 21 (1940), the Third Circuit was faced with a situation in which the trustee's final account reflected an entry for "Amount of Distribution of Real Estate" in the amount of $29,200. Id. at 23. The encumbered real estate in question "was sold in bankruptcy to the mortgagees thereof for the discharge of the mortgage debt, the mortgagees contributing, under agreement with the trustee, $1,800 toward the general administration expenses. No part of the consideration, except for the $1,800, ever came into the trustee's hands." Id. The total funds received by the trustee during the case was $3,556.50, all of which was consumed by administrative expenses. Id.

Finding that "[t]he fees and commissions appear to bear no relation to the extent of services or to the quantum of the estate actually administered," the Third Circuit reversed the District Court's order, which had dismissed the appeal of the referee's order approving the trustee's final account. Id. at 22, 25. The Third Circuit held as follows:

> Trustees in bankruptcy . . . are public officers and officers of the court, and compensation is owing to them only on clear warrant of law. Before trustees in bankruptcy are entitled to compensation upon moneys disbursed or turned over by them to lienholders, it is necessary that the trustees show some act of administration with respect to encumbered property, such as preserving an equity of the bankrupt in the property. And, even then, compensation has been held to be due only upon the value of the equity of redemption.

Id. at 24 (emphasis added).

The Third Circuit directed the referee to recover from "those who participated in the division of the bankrupt's estate in excess of reasonable fees, commissions and expenses or surcharge the trustee for the improvident payments." Id. After these amounts were recovered, "the fund representing the value of the encumbered property actually sold by the trustee and for which he received payment of the consideration" was to be set aside for distribution to lienholders and, if any residue was left, to the general estate. Id. at 24-25 (emphasis added).

Thus, in In re Prindible the Third Circuit found that trustees may only take compensation on the equity portion of a sale of encumbered property — i.e., the actual cash received and not the value of mortgages extinguished. Similarly, in another pre-Code case, the Third Circuit, faced with a trustee seeking compensation for returning the debtor's property to it, stated that "it is clear that the word 'moneys' in the clause '. . . upon all moneys disbursed or turned over by him to any persons, including lienholders, . . . ' is not the equivalent of property." In re Brigantine Beach Hotel Corp., 197 F.2d 296, 299 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 344 U.S. 832 (1952). It is reasonable to assume that, faced with the facts in the instant case, the Third Circuit would hold that the Trustee's compensation may be based on the cash disbursed by the Trustee, but not the credit bid.

In light of the foregoing, even the pre-Code cases upon which the Bankruptcy Court below relied are inapposite. The Third Circuit's pre-Code cases do not support a "constructive disbursement" argument. The pre-Code Third Circuit cases state that "moneys" does not mean the value of property administered, and that trustees may only receive compensation for the cash portions of transactions rather than the forgiveness of debts.

As the Bankruptcy Court's decision has no valid basis in statutory interpretation, legislative history, and case law under the Bankruptcy Code, and pre-Code Third Circuit cases, it is erroneous as a matter of law and should be reversed.

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ERRED AS A MATTER OF LAW IN HOLDING THAT TRUSTEE COMPENSATION IS NOT LIMITED TO A REASONABLENESS DETERMINATION AS REQUIRED BY 11 U.S.C. § 330(a)

Like all other professional compensation, trustee compensation is determined pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a), which in the pre-1994 Amendment version applicable to this case provides in pertinent part as follows:

> subject to section[] 326 . . . the court may award to a trustee . . . (1) reasonable compensation for actual, necessary services rendered by such trustee . . . based on the nature, the extent, and the value of such services, the time spent on such services, and the cost of comparable services [in nonbankruptcy cases].

As is the case with any other fee applicant, a trustee bears the burden of proving that his requested compensation is reasonable. See, e.g., Continental Ill. Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago v. Charles N. Wooten, Ltd. (Matter of Evangeline Ref. Co.), 890 F.2d 1312, 1326 (5th Cir. 1989). By the clear language of the statute the reasonableness of trustee compensation is based not solely upon a lodestar calculation dependent upon reasonable hours and a reasonable hourly rate; the trustee must prove that his services are reasonable in light of the benefit conferred to the estate.

The legislative history shows that Congress intended the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum to be just that — a cap on the "reasonable compensation under section 330" that the court "may allow," not an entitlement to a percentage "commission." See H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 327 (1977); see, e.g., In re Draina, 191 B.R. 646, 648 (Bankr. D. Md. 1995); In re C & A Enters., Inc., 132 B.R. 303, 310 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 1991); In re Volador Equity/Income Fund '86-'87, 131 B.R. 739, 740 (Bankr. W.D. Okla. 1991) (citing 2 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 326.01[1] at 326-6 (15th ed. 1991). Congress' displeasure with the pre-Code practice of automatically awarding the maximum was undoubtedly the reason behind the Bankruptcy Code's jettisoning of the misleading term "commission" in favor of "compensation."

Indeed, the legislative history could not be more clear — trustee compensation is subject to the same reasonableness determination as that of any other professional. Again, the House Report answers any lingering questions about the intent behind 11 U.S.C. § 326(a):

> It must be emphasized that this section does not authorize compensation of trustees. This section merely fixes the maximum compensation of a trustee. Proposed 11 U.S.C. 330 authorizes and fixes the standard of compensation. Under section 48c of current law, the maximum limits have tended to become minimums in many cases. This section is not intended to be so interpreted. The limits in this section, together with the limitations found in section 330, are to be applied as outer limits, and not as grants or entitlements to the maximum fees specified.

Id. at 327 (emphasis added).

The Bankruptcy Court below determined that in enacting 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) Congress intended to set up an incentive scheme distinguishable from compensation available to other professionals. In light of the foregoing discussion, the United States Trustee disagrees with the Guyana decision upon which the Bankruptcy Court's decision primarily relies. The Bankruptcy Court improperly incorporated the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum as a factor in the "reasonableness" decision, rather than determining reasonableness first and only then applying the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap.

The Bankruptcy Court stated that trustees generally receive the maximum compensation, as if that was what Congress had intended. Even if most trustees receive the maximum in most cases there would be no reason to assume that it is reasonable for this trustee in this case to receive the maximum without the proper 11 U.S.C. § 330 analysis. While the legislative history acknowledged the pre-Code practice of awarding trustees the maximum in virtually every case, it did so with disdain, not approval, stating that such practice "diverged from the original intent of [the] draftsmen [of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898's trustee compensation provisions.]" H.R. Rep. No. 95-595 at 93. Congress could not have intended to codify this practice in the new Code.

Congress did indeed hope to provide incentive for trustees to find and liquidate assets and distribute the proceeds to creditors. It did not do this, however, by enacting 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). The incentive was introduced by eliminating the Bankruptcy Act provision that allowed trustees in minimal asset cases to obtain a discretionary award of $150. Id. at 103-04, 109. Congress determined that this $150, which had become automatic with most courts, took away any incentive to pursue questionable assets. Id. Eliminating the discretionary fee was expected to "cause the system to operate more for the benefit of creditors than for the benefit of administration." Id. at 109. Thus the purpose of the "incentive" was to prod trustees to obtain greater returns for creditors, not to increase trustee compensation.

The only nod to increasing trustee compensation was the significant increase in the percentages to be applied in calculating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) maximum. While this was genuinely intended to increase trustee compensation and ensure that qualified people were willing to serve as trustees, the fact remains that Congress merely increased the percentages applied to the compensation base. The method of determining "reasonable" trustee compensation did not become a "commission" calculation.

Trustee compensation does have one salient feature that distinguishes it from all other professional compensation under the Bankruptcy Code — it is subject to a limit that is beyond the court's discretionary "reasonableness" determination. Every other professional but the trustee may obtain astronomical fees merely for working hard and providing beneficial services. The trustee, on the other hand, can put in more hours and provide more benefit than anyone else, but at the end of the case his compensation is still subject to a ceiling comprised of a percentage of disbursements made during the case. Thus, 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) is not to be used to enhance, or even to determine, trustee compensation. As its very title indicates, it imposes a "limitation on compensation to trustees."

In light of the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully submits that the Bankruptcy Court's interpretation of the Congressional intent behind 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) is erroneous. Not only does it contradict the clear meaning of the words used in the statute, the Bankruptcy Court's analysis also flies in the face of Congress' own expression of its intent. The United States Trustee respectfully submits that the Bankruptcy Court's holding regarding the standard applicable to trustee compensation requests must be reversed, and that the Trustee's compensation must be subject to a "reasonableness" determination pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) subject to the cap imposed by 11 U.S.C. § 326(a).

III. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT ABUSED ITS DISCRETION IN FINDING THAT THE COMPENSATION REQUESTED BY THE TRUSTEE IN THIS CASE WAS REASONABLE IN LIGHT OF THE SERVICES RENDERED BY THE TRUSTEE

Even if the credit bid may be included in the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) compensation base, the total award of $233,188.27 for the services rendered as Chapter 11 and Chapter 7 trustee in the instant case was not reasonable as required by 11 U.S.C. § 330(a). The Bankruptcy Court introduced irrelevant factors into the reasonableness determination, and otherwise inflated the actual value to the estate of the Trustee’s services. As a result, the Bankruptcy Court’s decision was an abuse of discretion and should be reversed.

One of the irrelevant factors considered by the Bankruptcy Court was the fact that the United States Trustee objected at the Final Report stage, but did not object to the 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) sale or the interim compensation request. Although the Bankruptcy Court flatly rejected every argument for preclusion raised by the Trustee, the Court inexplicably went on to state that its determination of the reasonableness of the Trustee's compensation was based in part upon the fact that the United States Trustee had not previously objected. This portion of the Bankruptcy Court's decision was clearly in error, as the reasonableness of the compensation received by the Trustee is based on the Trustee's actions alone, and is completely independent of the actions or inactions of any other party. The “failure to object” arguments raised by the Trustee were only relevant to a determination as to whether or not the United States Trustee’s objection could be considered. Once the Bankruptcy Court had properly rejected the "red herring" preclusion arguments thrown up by the Trustee, the Court's analysis should have been restricted to whether or not the Trustee's services and the concomitant benefit to the estate warranted the compensation received.

Similarly, the Bankruptcy Court based its decision in part on the irrelevant fact that the Trustee had already paid himself in full two years before the Objection was filed, thus rendering disgorgement a "hardship." This finding has no relation to the reasonableness of the requested compensation, and it ignores that fact that the Trustee made the decision to pay himself in full almost one year before he filed his Final Report. The Trustee clearly could have waited until the end of the case, included his previously awarded compensation as an administrative expense to be paid, and only paid himself after the administration of the case was complete. The Bankruptcy Court's decision means that the creditors of this estate should bear the hardship of not receiving an additional $140,000 merely because the Trustee had already paid it to himself. The United States Trustee respectfully submits that the determination of reasonable compensation in December 1994 and the determination of reasonable final compensation in December 1996 (when the Objection was heard) were independent of one another. To the extent that the Bankruptcy Court's decision was based on the "hardship" that the Trustee would endure if improperly paid interim compensation had to be disgorged, the decision was an abuse of the Court's discretion that must be reversed.

Once the "failure to object" and "hardship" arguments are stripped away, the decision below rests solely on the reasonableness of compensation totaling $233,188.27, or approximately $400 per hour based on 578.50 hours worked, in light of the services rendered and benefits conferred by the Trustee in this case. The United States Trustee respectfully submits that compensation received by the Trustee was unreasonable.

The Trustee’s services in this case, while presumably competent, were far from the Herculean feats achieved by the Greenley and Guyana trustees discussed above. The Trustee managed two office buildings for nine months in Chapter 11 and another nine months in Chapter 7. When he sold the asset, it was to a secured creditor with a claim almost $5 million in excess of the purchase price. Although the Trustee asserted that by noticing the "sale" he was allowing other bidders to come up with higher and better offers, in reality it was highly unlikely that the secured creditor would be outbid. The highest appraised value for the property was $9 million, and the secured creditor's mortgage exceeded that amount by $3 million. Any third-party bidder would have had to pay over $12 million before it could have outbid the secured creditor. As a result, the Trustee did not constructively disburse $7.78 million, as there was never really a chance of him actually disbursing $7.78 million. Indeed, even if the Trustee had structured the transaction so that the secured creditor handed him $7.78 million cash and he handed it right back, such a transaction would in no way warrant compensation at $400 per hour.

The Trustee did obtain a benefit for unsecured creditors — the $372,387 cash he received from the sale. His services in this case resulted in a total of $2,763,942.42 in cash receipts. For these services, the United States Trustee asserts that the Trustee is entitled to $90,738.87, not an insignificant sum in light of the fact that unsecured creditors received a mere $62,500 from the Trustee's services.

It is clear, however, that the transaction was not structured to benefit unsecured creditors, but to benefit the Trustee. They received a percentage of his dividend — which is exactly the opposite of Congress' intent and the fiduciary duty of a Chapter 7 trustee. The Trustee received over 50% of the cash brought in by the sale. His commission was not 3% of the amount disbursed to creditors, but three times as much as the supposed beneficiaries of his services as fiduciary during the case. Indeed, the Trustee could easily have structured the same transaction with the unsecured creditors receiving the lion's share and himself receiving a percentage "carve-out" from the unsecured creditors' recovery. In light of the fact that the Trustee structured the transaction to benefit himself above the creditors to whom he owes a fiduciary duty, the United States Trustee respectfully submits that the compensation received by the Trustee in this case is unreasonable.

Even if a higher amount than that calculated by the United States Trustee is reasonable, however, compensation of $400 per hour is out of touch with reality. In this case, the Trustee had an attorney, an accountant, and a real estate broker. One must assume that some of the services rendered in running and selling the Marlton Executive Park between September 1992 and February 1994 were performed by these other professionals. The Bankruptcy Court certainly made no findings to the contrary, either in support of the interim compensation request or at the December 1996 hearing.

The Third Circuit has held that bankruptcy courts have an affirmative duty to review all compensation requests for reasonableness under 11 U.S.C. § 330. See In re Busy Beaver Bldg. Centers, Inc., 19 F.3d 833 (3d Cir. 1994). To the extent that the Bankruptcy Court's decision of reasonableness was based on the Court's experience with compensation received by other trustees in similar cases, then the decision must be reversed as the Court did not conduct the kind of market rate analysis anticipated by the Third Circuit's Busy Beaver decision. Id. at 852-56. There has been no determination of the "hourly rates," if any, charged by other trustees in the Camden vicinage in cases of similar size and complexity. As a result, there is absolutely no basis upon which to determine whether or not the compensation awarded to the Trustee was reasonable.

Although the Bankruptcy Court did direct a small disgorgement to enable unsecured creditors to receive the 25% recovery that the Trustee had proposed, the Trustee has still been allowed to retain compensation far in excess of the reasonable value of his services. As the Bankruptcy Court's decision was not based upon a proper 11 U.S.C. § 330 determination, it was an abuse of discretion and should be reversed.

CONCLUSION

In light of the foregoing, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the decision of the Bankruptcy Court be reversed.

Respectfully submitted,

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court's Finding That Credit Bids May be Included in Calculating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) Cap on Trustee Compensation is a Finding of Law Subject to de novo Review, Not a Finding of Fact Subject to an "Abuse of Discretion" Review

As the briefs previously filed by the Trustee (the "Trustee's Brief") and United States Trustee (the "UST's Brief")[1] agree, the Bankruptcy Court's findings of law are reviewed de novo by the District Court, and are not subject to the deferential "abuse of discretion" standard applied to findings of fact. The United States Trustee ("UST") presented the Bankruptcy Court with a threshold legal question: may the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over" include the credit bid portion of a 11 U.S.C. § 363(k) sale? The answer to this question is a finding of law, based upon statutory interpretation, legislative history, and case law. As a result, on appeal this Court must make its own de novo determination as to whether the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over" applies only to cash and cash equivalents, as the UST argues, or if it may be read expansively to include credit bids, as argued by the Trustee and National Association of Bankruptcy Trustees ("NABT") as amicus curiae.

The Trustee's Brief and the NABT's amicus brief (collectively, the "Responding Briefs") assert that this issue is left to the Bankruptcy Court's discretion. The UST respectfully submits that, while the 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) determination of reasonable compensation in an amount between $0 and the cap is discretionary, the method for calculating the cap itself is not. See 2 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 330.03[1] at 330-13 (15th ed. 1998) ("The requirement of reasonableness in section 330 in no way affects the limitation imposed by section 326.”). Indeed, courts have no discretion to award an amount in excess of the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap. See, e.g., Matter of Rauch, 110 B.R. 467, 475 (Bankr. E.D. Cal. 1990) (“[T]here is no question as to the interpretation of § 326(a) in that it provides a cap on the discretionary authority to approve trustee’s fees based upon funds brought in and expended from the estate.”); see also Collier on Bankruptcy, ¶ 326.02[2][c] at 326-8.

If the Bankruptcy Court’s determination of the cap was fact-driven and not governed by the applicable statutory and case law establishing clear boundaries regarding maximum trustee compensation, then the wrong standard was applied and the decision should be reversed. The UST respectfully submits, however, that this was actually finding of law, not a finding of fact. Even though it stated that its inclusion of the credit bid in the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap was based on the circumstances of the case, the Bankruptcy Court’s holding was based on an analysis of the applicable statutes, legislative history, and case law. At page 22 of its decision, the Bankruptcy Court “conclude[s] that the statute on its face does not preclude the inclusion of the extent of the lien as a basis for calculation of the trustee’s commission in this case” — a finding clearly grounded in statutory analysis, not the facts of the case.

The only true finding of fact made by the Bankruptcy Court was the reasonableness of the Trustee’s compensation. Other than the reasonableness issue, the appeal raises no real factual disputes between the UST and the Trustee. This is so despite the attempt in the Trustee’s Brief’s Statement of Facts to make it seem as though the Trustee’s every action was in compliance with UST guidelines. The sections of the UST memoranda cited in the Trustee’s Brief at pages 7-8 deal solely with the propriety of selling encumbered property. They are silent as to the ability of a trustee to seek compensation on credit bids, which is the issue underlying this appeal. As a result, whether or not he complied with them is irrelevant to a determination of whether compensation may be based on a credit bid.

The UST respectfully submits that the interpretation of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cannot be fact sensitive if there is to be any consistency regarding what may or may not be included when calculating maximum trustee compensation. If the Court accepts the Trustee's argument regard the fact-based determination of the statutory maximum, Congress' intended cap on trustee compensation would be rendered a nullity as it would be subsumed within the 11 U.S.C. § 330(a) "reasonableness" determination. The determination of whether or not the credit bid in the instant case may be included in the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap, must turn on the meaning of "moneys disbursed or turned over," not the vagaries of the case. As a result, it is a legal issue that this Court must determine de novo

If this Court agrees with the UST that the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap may only be based on disbursements of cash or cash equivalents, then the Trustee will be entitled to no more than $90,738.87, even if a "reasonable" award would be higher. This Court need not review the Bankruptcy Court's use of discretion unless it makes a de novo finding that credit bids may be included in calculating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap.

II. The Trustee Has Provided No Statutory Analysis to Assist This Court in its de novo Determination of the Meaning of "Moneys Disbursed or Turned Over"

At pages 11 through 15 the UST's Brief provides considerable analysis of the "plain meaning" doctrine as applied to the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over" in 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). To summarize, statutes must be interpreted by looking first at the words used by Congress and ascribing to them their common meaning. If the words comprising the statute are unambiguous, then the statutory analysis ends there and the statute must be applied as written. If a court finds a particular word to be ambiguous, the meaning of the word as used elsewhere in the statute is dispositive. Legislative history and prior case law are only consulted after the statute is found to be ambiguous, and thus cannot be the source of such ambiguity.

In the instant case, the Responding Briefs provide no statutory analysis to refute that provided by the UST. Instead, they take the same leap in logic made by the Bankruptcy Court, bypassing the required first step of statutory language analysis and beginning with the assumption that the phrase "moneys disbursed or turned over" is ambiguous because pre-Code cases and legislative history make it so. The UST's Brief, on the other hand, attempts to assist this Court's de novo determination by logically proceeding through the steps involved in statutory analysis.

The UST respectfully requests that this Court adopt the uncontroverted statutory analysis in the UST's Brief. As the word "moneys" is used in common parlance and elsewhere in the Code to refer only to cash and cash equivalents, nothing else may be included in calculating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap. Subjective considerations such as "reasonableness" and "fairness" cannot be used to override the plain meaning of the statute. See, e.g., U.S. Trustee v. Columbia Gas Sys. Inc. (In re Columbia Gas Sys. Inc.), 33 F.3d 294, 302 (3d Cir. 1994); U.S. Trustee v. Price Waterhouse, 19 F.3d 138, 141 (3d Cir. 1994).

The UST respectfully submits that the application of basic tenets of statutory construction must inevitably result in the reversal of the Bankruptcy Court's erroneous legal finding regarding the inclusion of credit bids in calculating maximum allowable trustee compensation.

III. The Sources Cited in the Responding Briefs do Not Support the Finding That "Moneys Disbursed or Turned Over" May Include the Amount of Credit Bids

In support of the Trustee's position the Trustee's Brief at page 13 quotes at length a passage from Collier on Bankruptcy (which itself cites a case decided under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, although citations are omitted from the Trustee's Brief). On the very next page, however, that noted treatise makes the following statement in direct contradiction of the Trustee's position: "Compensation may be based on actual monies distributed to parties in interest, not constructive disbursements." 2 Lawrence P. King, Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 326.02[2][f][ii] at 326-10 (emphasis added). This portion of the treatise contains citations to cases decided under the Code — one of which, New England Fish Co., 34 B.R. 899, 901 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1983) (cited in both the UST's and Trustee's Briefs), expressly held that Congress rejected the theory of constructive disbursements when it passed 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). It would appear that the quote on which the Trustee relies is a vestige of past editions of Collier on Bankruptcy from earlier this century, and that the present editors adhere to the UST's position. In any event, the conflicting sections render this source useless to the Trustee.

In addition, the Trustee's reliance upon the Third Circuit's decision in American Surety Co. v. Freed, 224 F. 333, 337 (3d Cir. 1915), is misplaced. Both the Bankruptcy Court and the Trustee are incorrect when they state that the Third Circuit "cited with approval" cases that allowed constructive disbursements. Instead, the Third Circuit merely acknowledged the existence of the cases cited to it by the trustee and referee, and went directly on to state that "[t]he case under review does not require us to approve or follow that law." American Surety, 224 F. at 336-37. At no point in its entire opinion did the Third Circuit even suggest that it accepted the possibility that trustees might include constructive disbursements in calculating their maximum compensation. Indeed, the District Court in American Surety had relied on the constructive disbursement cases upon which the Trustee pins his hopes, and its decision was flatly reversed by the Third Circuit. See id.; In re Breakwater Co., 220 F. 26 (E.D. Pa. 1915). As a result, American Surety provides no support for the Trustee's position.

The Trustee's Brief is also inaccurate when it states at page 15 that the UST's Brief suggested that the trustee in In re Greenley Energy Holdings of Pa., Inc., 102 B.R. 400 (E.D. Pa. 1989), was "qualif[ied]" to receive compensation upon a constructive disbursement. The UST's Brief at page 17-18 merely discussed the facts of Greenley in order to show that they are distinguishable from the instant case. The UST's Brief did not opine as to whether the Greenley court had made the correct decision. In any event, the "constructive disbursement" in Greenley was of actual cash that would be generated over time by the $28,000,000 in guaranteed contracts entered into by the trustee. Id. at 18. Since the disbursements would be made over a number of years, the court allowed the trustee to be paid now rather than years from now, after the creditors had received their cash.

The Greenley case provides no support for the argument that credit bids may be included in calculating maximum trustee compensation, as it was a case in which actual cash ("moneys") would ultimately be received by creditors. The NABT's amicus brief at 4 is patently incorrect when it states that the UST "acknowledges" that the courts in Greenley and In re Stanley, 120 B.R. 409 (Bankr. E.D. Tex. 1990) "embraced the concept of including 'credit bids' in determining the compensation to trustees." These courts neither embraced nor rejected the concept of including credit bids in the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap, as neither case involved a credit bid situation.

Accordingly, the UST's Brief at 17 merely states that these cases are among the scant few "that have strayed from a strict application of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a)" — but even these cases did not stray into the realm of credit bids.

Similarly, the Trustee's reliance on In re Leedy Mortgage Co., Inc., 126 B.R. 907 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1991) is completely misplaced. The Trustee's Brief is misleading when it states that the UST approved of constructive disbursements in that case, since the Leedy case involved the payment of actual cash to creditors.[2] The "constructive" aspect of the disbursements was the fact that the cash was paid by the trustee's accountant rather than the trustee himself. Id. This case provides no support for the argument that credit bids may be included in calculating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap, as the judge expressly noted that cash was paid to the secured creditors. Id. at 916.

In addition, the Trustee's Brief is misleading when it implies at page 17 that the court in New England Fish Co., Inc., 34 B.R. 889 (Bankr. W.D. Wash. 1983), "acknowledged" the existence of authority in support of constructive disbursements. In fact, New England Fish Co., Inc. is actually one of the strongest cases in support of a strict reading of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). The Trustee's Brief did not include the entire quote, which reads: "Under the Bankruptcy Act, there is authority for the trustee's position." Id. at 900 (emphasis added). The court then went on to hold that Congress intentionally did not codify the "constructive disbursement" cases of which it was undoubtedly aware, and thus rejected the "constructive disbursement" theory. Id. at [2] The Trustee's Brief is also misleading in that it identifies the UST attorney referred to in Leedy as the "Assistant United States Trustee." Although he was so designated by the Leedy judge, this is a common misnomer often applied to UST attorneys. The attorney in Leedy has never held the high-level position of Assistant United States Trustee, a fact that the UST pointed out to the Trustee in the case below but which the Trustee has decided to shield from this Court.

---

901-02. The court applied a strict application of the plain meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a), and disallowed compensation upon several "constructive disbursements" including credit bids. Id.

Both of the Responding Briefs cite Southwestern Media, Inc. v. Rau, 708 F.2d 419 (9th Cir. 1983), suggesting that the New England Fish Co., Inc. court improperly ignored the earlier ruling of its Circuit court. This argument neglects the fact that the Southwestern Media case was filed prior to the effective date of the Bankruptcy Code. Id. at 421 n.1. As a result, it was a Bankruptcy Act case, and the New England Fish Co., Inc. court found that the "constructive disbursement" theory under the Act did not survive the enactment of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). Thus, the failure to cite Southwestern Media is understandable. In any event, Southwestern Media does not support the Trustee's position as in that case creditors were paid 100% in cash. Id. at 421-22. It was not a credit bid case, or even a constructive disbursement case — all discussion of constructive disbursement cases is mere dicta. The issue was whether the trustee could base his compensation on all of the $2,500,000 cash generated by his sale of an encumbered asset to a third party, or if he could only base it on an amount equal to the equity in the asset. Id. at 423.

The Trustee's reliance on recent cases to support his position is also misguided. The court in United States Trustee v. Messer (In re Pink Cadillac Assocs.), 96 CV 4571 (S.D.N.Y. April 7, 1997) did not base its finding regarding the compensability of credit bids upon the specific facts of the case, as the Trustee's Brief suggests at 18, but on the strict application of 11 U.S.C. § 326(a). Indeed, the court expressly stated that "[t]he bankruptcy court's determination that the $20,000 award did not exceed the maximum amount allowable under the Bankruptcy Code is a conclusion of law subject to de novo review in this court." Id., slip op. at 4 (emphasis added).

Similarly, in In re Colonial Southbury L.P., Case No. 94-22057 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. June 3, 1997), the court did not make the statement attributed to it by the Trustee's Brief at 18. Id., slip op. at 9. The quoted material comes instead from a case cited by the Colonial Southbury court. In addition, the Trustee's Brief feebly attempts at 18 to distinguish Colonial Southbury, in which the trustee received $50,404.85 on actual cash disbursements of $943,097.06 but wanted an additional $91,138.96 based on a credit bid of $3,000,000, from the instant case, in which the Trustee received $90,738.87 on actual cash disbursements of over $2 million but wants to keep an additional $142, 449.40 based on a credit bid of $7.78 million. Contrary to the Trustee's assertion, it is the similarities between the cases, not the differences, that are obvious — the only real difference is the size of the numbers. In virtually every aspect the Colonial Southbury case mirrors the instant case, and the Colonial Southbury court found in favor of the UST.

Both of the Responding Briefs cite and attach as an exhibit a recent case, In re Borrego Springs Dev. Corp., Case No. 94-10475-B7 (Bankr. S.D. Cal. Feb. 18, 1998), to support the Trustee's position. In the Borrego Springs case, the trustee requested compensation of $296,742.22 in addition to $100,000 previously received, and he was awarded $155,450 in addition to the $100,000 previously paid. Id., slip op. at 1, 3. The court gave no explanation as to why it reduced the trustee's award by over $141,000, a figure eerily reminiscent of the overpayment the UST seeks to have the Trustee disgorge in the instant case. Indeed, the Borrego Springs court did not specify either the amount of cash included in the transaction or the amount paid to unsecured creditors. For all this Court knows, unsecured creditors received a 100% distribution, and the mysteriously reduced compensation was allowed only upon actual cash disbursements. In any event, the issue before the Borrego Springs court was only the 11 U.S.C. § 330 reasonableness determination, not the calculation of the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap.

Finally, the Trustee Brief misreads the Third Circuit's decision in In re Marine Maintenance Corp., 181 F.2d 119, 121 (3d Cir. 1950). The Third Circuit was faced not only with the surcharge of a trustee, but also the trustee's appeal of his compensation award. Id. at 121. The Third Circuit addressed the compensation award first — and decided against the trustee, who thought he was entitled to greater compensation than had been awarded. Id. Indeed, he appealed the referees determination, the issue being "the correctness of the referee's calculation of the sum available for fees and disbursements." Id.

Whether intentional or not, the Trustee's Brief at 21 misleadingly implies that the Third Circuit found in favor of the trustee in Marine Maintenance. The entire quote, which the Trustee did not provide to this Court, reads as follows:

> The Trustee is an experienced lawyer. Generally speaking, he performed an excellent job of work in this tedious, exacting matter. He was instrumental in the good over-all results obtained. However, we cannot say that the sum awarded to him is so unreasonable as to warrant interference by this Court.

Id. (emphasis added).

The trustee's compensation was not disturbed, so the trustee lost this issue on appeal (although he did prevail with regard to surcharges due to "bad accounting practice"). Id. Since he had appealed his award, he undoubtedly thought he deserved more. The Third Circuit disagreed, despite the fact that the trustee had performed well. As a result, this case provides absolutely no support for the Trustee in the instant case.

In sum, when the sources cited in the Responding Briefs are read with a critical eye, it becomes clear that they have cited no authority under the Bankruptcy Code for allowing a trustee to base his compensation on the non-cash portion of a transaction. The UST respectfully requests that this Court reverse the Bankruptcy Court's erroneous legal finding that credit bids may be included as "constructive disbursements" in calculating the 11 U.S.C. § 326(a) cap.

IV. The Compensation Received by the Trustee Exceeds the Bounds of Reasonableness

The Responding Briefs are misleading in that they imply that the UST's concerns regarding reasonableness are based solely on the hourly rate represented by the compensation allowed to the trustee to date. In actuality, the UST Brief points out that the Trustee's services in this case were workmanlike, not spectacular. The Trustee will be paid handsomely, but not excessively, if the UST prevails on this appeal.

As the UST Brief points out, the compensation received by the Trustee is outrageous when compared to the benefit to the estate of his services. In this case unsecured creditors received $62,500. As his reward for making this distribution and serving as a landlord for 18 months, the Trustee actually argues that he is entitled to $233,188.27 — over three times the amount paid to unsecured creditors that are the intended beneficiaries of his services. Indeed, over one half of the cash brought in by the credit bid sale went directly into the Trustee's pocket. It is the extreme inequity of the Trustee's compensation in light of his services and the comparatively small payment to creditors, not just the hourly rate, that leads to the UST's assertion that the award was unreasonable.

In light of the foregoing, the UST respectfully requests that this Court reverse the factual finding that the Trustee's compensation was reasonable as it was an abuse of the Bankruptcy Court's discretion in light of the record before it regarding the Trustee's services.

CONCLUSION

For all of the reasons stated in this Reply and the UST's Brief, the UST respectfully requests that this Court reverse the Bankruptcy Court's decision.

Respectfully submitted,

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING AFFIRMANCE

Pursuant to Rule 29 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, the United States submits this brief as amicus curiae supporting affirmance of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel's order.

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Whether the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel correctly held that the starting point in computing a debtor's "projected disposable income" is the debtor's "disposable income," as defined in section 1325(b)(2), multiplied by the number of months in the chapter 13 plan, but that the amount is subject to adjustment if it fails to predict a debtor's actual ability to fund a plan.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The Attorney General appoints United States Trustees to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees in regions comprising the vast majority of the federal judicial districts. 28 U.S.C. 581-589a. United States Trustees "serve as bankruptcy watch-dogs to prevent fraud, dishonesty, and overreaching in the bankruptcy arena." H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88, reprinted in 1978 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5963, 6049. The United States Trustee Program thus acts in the public interest to promote the efficiency, and to protect and preserve the integrity, of the bankruptcy system. To this end, Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. 307. See In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929, 930 (9th Cir. 2000).

This case involves a dispute over confirmation of a plan under chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. The United States Trustee is authorized, among other things, to "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in chapter 13 cases, monitor chapter 13 plans, and file comments with the court regarding such chapter 13 plans in connection with a plan confirmation hearing under section of the Code. 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C).

In 2007, more than 310,000 persons filed bankruptcy petitions under chapter 13.[1] In chapter 13 cases, with so-called above-median debtors,[2] the question of statutory interpretation presented in this case has occurred frequently and is continuing to occur. In fact, there are already scores of bankruptcy court decisions that have faced this statutory issue.

As of the date on which this brief is filed, no court of appeals has yet issued a decision addressing the issue. This is only the second case in which the issue has been presented to a court of appeals. We filed an amicus brief in the first such case, Kagenveama v. Maney (In re Kagenveama), No. 06-17083 (9th Cir.), and presented oral argument in August 2007. The matter is awaiting decision.

Given the decision of the debtor in this case not to file a brief in this Court, our amicus brief will be the only one to defend the decisions below. In this brief, the

[2] An above-median debtor is the name often used in referring to a debtor whose current monthly income under 11 U.S.C. 101(10A), multiplied by 12, is above the annual median income in the state of a family of comparable size. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3).

United States respectfully offers this Court its views on the correct interpretation of section 1325(b). See 28 U.S.C. 517 (authorizing Department of Justice "to attend to the interests of the United States in a suit pending in a court of the United States").

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Statutory Background.

In 2005, Congress passed and the President signed into law the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (2005) (BAPCPA).

One of the innovations of the BAPCPA was means-testing. In section 707 of the Bankruptcy Code, which addresses dismissal of abusive chapter 7 petitions, Congress established special rules for debtors whose current monthly income, reduced by certain permitted expenses, exceeded a threshold for abuse under a specified formula. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2). This amendment changed the way these expenses were computed; some were no longer the debtor's actual and reasonable expenses but instead were standard expenses under the National Standards and Local Standards issued by the Internal Revenue Service for the debtor's area of residence. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)(A)(ii).

Congress also applied means-testing to chapter 13 cases, in which the debtor seeks not to liquidate his debts, as in chapter 7, but rather to establish a plan for repaying all or part of those debts. Before the BAPCPA amendments were enacted, section 1325, governing confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, required such a plan to provide that all of the debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period would be used to repay debts. Disposable income was calculated from the debtor's actual income and expenses set forth on Schedules I and J, which the debtor was required to file.

But the BAPCPA amended section 1325 to change the definition of "disposable income." The new section 1325(b)(2) defines "disposable income" to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2).[3] This definition incorporates two changes: first, it defines "disposable income" based on an average of past monthly income and expense figures; and second, for debtors with higher income levels, it requires the use of the same standard expenses mandated for certain debtors under section 707(b)(2). Specifically, section 1325(b)(3) now directs that reasonable expenses be determined "in accordance with subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 707(b)(2)" for those chapter 13 debtors whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is greater than the median family income for a family of the corresponding size. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3). Chapter 13 debtors in this class are typically referred to as "above-median" debtors. To be clear, an above-median debtor is not one whose income places him in the top half of all debtors; it is one whose income places him in the top half of families of his size in his state of residence.

Under current bankruptcy rules, such a debtor must file a Form 22C,[4] which sets forth the debtor's income and expenses in accordance with standard numbers issued by the IRS. Because a debtor must also file the traditional Schedules I and J setting forth actual income and expenses, it often becomes apparent that there is a significant difference between the above-median debtor's disposable income under Schedules I and J and his disposable income under Form 22C. In some cases, the use of Form 22C actually results in a lower amount of disposable income, but in other cases, like the present case, the use of Form 22C captures a temporary increase in the debtor's disposable income that does not continue into the plan period. In this and other cases, it may become clear that the historical circumstances that produced a particular income figure will change prospectively.

For the convenience of the Court, we have attached in an addendum to this brief the pre-BAPCPA text of section 1325, the current text of section 1325, and a redlined version showing the changes to section 1325 made by the BAPCPA.

[4] The form was previously known as "B22C." We will use the current form name "22C" throughout.

B. Facts.

1. The debtor, a single woman with no children, filed for bankruptcy under chapter 13 on October 26, 2006. Her annual income was $43,147 in 2004 and $56,516 in 2005, both of these figures being above the state median family income for a family of one. During the six-month period before filing under chapter 13, the debtor took a buyout from her employer. As a result of this buyout, her monthly gross income was $11,990.03 in April 2006 and $15,356.42 in May 2006. Because these two months were within the six-month window for computing "current monthly income," as defined in 11 U.S.C. 101(10A), her "current monthly income" was considerably higher than it otherwise would have been – $64,124 annually, or $5,343 a month. App. 114.

The "reality" of the buyout was that the debtor no longer had the job or the income she had had before filing her chapter 13 petition. App. 114. Her Schedule I (income) showed net income of $1,922 a month ($23,064 annually), which is below the state median. Her Schedule J (expenses) showed monthly expenses of $1,772.97, resulting in excess monthly income of about $149. The debtor's chapter 13 plan, accordingly, proposed to pay $144 a month for 36 months. App. 114-15.

Using the calculation on Form 22C, however, the debtor had monthly disposable income of $1,114 with which to repay unsecured creditors. According to the Chapter 13 Trustee, a payment of $756 a month for 60 months would repay the creditors in full. While recognizing that the debtor could afford to repay only what was proposed in her plan and did not have the ability to fund a plan at $1,114, the Chapter 13 Trustee argued that 11 U.S.C. 1325 required a strict mathematical computation based on the historical current monthly income figures, which included the buyout. App. 115-16.

2. The bankruptcy court adopted an interpretation of "projected disposable income" that allowed the debtor to fund a chapter 13 plan based on actual income available to her, and not based on the historical current monthly income. The court gave four reasons for its interpretation: First, language in section 1325(b)(1)(B) refers to projected disposable income "to be received" during the applicable commitment period, which suggests that projected disposable income is not based entirely on historical income. Second, the word "projected" suggests a look at the future. Third, the calculation is supposed to be made "as of the effective date of the plan," which indicates something other than historical income. Fourth, it would be "absurd" to ignore the effect that a significant drop in income has occurred since the months preceding the filing of the petition. Debtors who suffered such a significant drop in income would be unable to confirm a chapter 13 plan. Thus, the bankruptcy court stated that it would presume the historical income and expense figures on Form 22C to constitute the projected disposable income "unless the debtor can show that there has been a substantial change in circumstances such that the numbers contained in Form B22C are not commensurate with a fair projection of the debtor's budget in the future." App. 126 (quoting In re Jass, 340 B.R. 411, 418-19 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006)).

The bankruptcy court also held that the expenses to be deducted were those in the National and Local IRS Standards, even for cases in which the debtor could show a substantial change in circumstances. App. 127-28. Finally, the court held that the plan had to be for the full 60 months, not 36 months as proposed by the debtor, given that the debtor's plan was not going to be able to pay the creditors back completely. App. 128-31. The court agreed to confirm the debtor's plan, so long as it continued for 60 months, instead of 36. App. 131.

3. This Circuit's Bankruptcy Appellate Panel (BAP) affirmed. Relying heavily on decisions of the BAPs of two other circuits, In re Pak, 378 B.R. 257 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007); In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007), the BAP held that if "it is shown that Form B22C disposable income fails accurately to predict a debtor's actual ability to fund a plan, that figure may be subject to modification." App. 185. The BAP drew an analogy with section 707(b)(2)(B)(i). Under section 707(b)(2)(A), certain chapter 7 debtors are subject to a presumption that a discharge would be an abuse. Section 707(b)(2)(B)(i) gives those debtors the ability to rebut the presumption by showing "special circumstances" justifying their "additional expenses or adjustments of current monthly income for which there is no reasonable alternative." App. 185. The BAP looked to section 707(b)(2)(B) for guidance in the chapter 13 context presented here. It concluded that parties seeking to show the historical disposable income figure does not accurately project the debtor's ability to fund a plan must show documentation similar to that required by section 707(b)(2)(B)(ii). App. 186. The BAP "emphasize[d] that deviation from the Form B22C determination of disposable income will be the exception rather than the rule." App. 186.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The BAPCPA amendments to section 1325 have created important interpretive questions about the proper way to understand "projected disposable income." As the case law reflects, there are different ways that courts have interpreted and applied that statutory language in light of the amendments. The interpretation offered here by the Chapter 13 Trustee should be rejected, because it fails to take into account all the language in the statute.

The Chapter 13 Trustee interprets the term "projected disposable income" to require use of the historical "disposable income" figure throughout the chapter 13 plan period, regardless of the debtor's actual income and expenses during that period. In this case, the debtor's historical "disposable income" was inflated by a one-time buyout by her employer, and under the Chapter 13 Trustee's interpretation, the debtor's high disposable income figure would be "projected" over the entire plan period, with the result that she would be unable to fund her chapter 13 plan based on her actual income, having lost her job as part of the buyout. If this were what the statute actually required, that would be one thing. But the Chapter 13 Trustee's interpretation does not account for the usual meaning of "projected" income or for the statutory phrases "to be received" and "will be applied to make payments" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Mechanically extending into the future an historical monthly income calculation, which may bear no relationship to actual income that the debtor will receive in the future, would either attribute to the debtor future income that does not exist, as in this case, or (when the debtor has a financial change for the better) permit the debtor to avoid using income that does exist to repay creditors.

In contrast, the courts below correctly gave meaning to "disposable income" by requiring this historical income figure to be projected as an initial matter, subject to adjustment to account for any significant increases or decreases in the debtor's income that are likely in particular cases. Such adjustments may be necessary in individual cases to ensure that the income attributed to a debtor in his chapter 13 plan is actually income that is "projected" and "to be received" and that "will be applied to make payments" to unsecured creditors. While a simple multiplication of the initial disposable income number by the relevant number of months is a presumptive starting point, this correct approach allows adjustments to be made in appropriate cases. This interpretation is also consistent with the overall goals of chapter 13.

ARGUMENT

THE DEBTOR'S HISTORICAL "DISPOSABLE INCOME" IS THE STARTING POINT IN DETERMINING "PROJECTED DISPOSABLE INCOME" UNDER SECTION 1325, BUT COURTS MAY TAKE INTO ACCOUNT SIGNIFICANT CHANGES IN THE DEBTOR'S FINANCIAL CONDITION IF NECESSARY TO REFLECT THE DEBTOR'S ABILITY TO FUND A PLAN.

Congress's amendments to section 1325 three years ago have caused serious interpretive problems. The bankruptcy courts have taken three different approaches to analyzing what "projected disposable income" means in confirming a chapter 13 plan. We will discuss each of the three approaches and explain why the Chapter 13 Trustee's approach here is mistaken and why the bankruptcy court's and BAP's interpretation is most consistent with the statutory language and the policies of the Bankruptcy Code.

A. The Bankruptcy Courts Have Offered Three Different Interpretations Of Section 1325.

1. The BAPCPA amendments in 2005 to section 1325 created a significant change in the law. Before these amendments were enacted, section 1325(b)(1) provided that if the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objected to the confirmation of a chapter 13 plan, the court was not permitted to approve the plan unless it provided that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the three-year period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B) (2000 ed.). The term "disposable income" was defined as income received by the debtor that was "not reasonably necessary to be expended" for "maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent" or for necessary business expenses if the debtor was engaged in a business. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A) (2000 ed.). Under that former law, a debtor's projected disposable income was calculated simply by subtracting the debtor's expenses on Schedule J from the debtor's income on Schedule I, two forms that a chapter 13 debtor was required to file.

In contrast, under the BAPCPA amendments, section 1325(b)(1) now provides that:

> (b)(1) If the trustee or the holder of an allowed unsecured claim objects to the confirmation of the plan, then the court may not approve the plan unless, as of the effective date of the plan – * * * (B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1). And now, "disposable income" is defined expressly to mean "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for maintenance or support or necessary business expenses. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). "Current monthly income" is defined as the "average monthly income from all sources" that the debtor received during the six-month period ending the last calendar month before the debtor filed the chapter 13 petition. 11 U.S.C. 101(10A). It is, in other words, an historical figure representing the monthly average of the period shortly before the petition was filed. An above-median debtor – one whose current monthly income, multiplied by 12, is above the annual median income in the state of a family of comparable size – calculates these figures on Form 22C.

2. The minority position taken in a number of bankruptcy court decisions is that section 1325 requires "projected disposable income" to be computed by taking the historical "disposable income" figure, as defined in section 1325(b)(2), and simply multiplying it by the number of months in the debtor's chapter 13 plan. The Chapter 13 Trustee cites some of these decisions at pages 12 to 13 of his brief.

Their underlying rationale is that "disposable income" was defined for the first time in the 2005 amendments and is used nowhere else than in the phrase "projected disposable income" in section 1325(b)(1)(B). Thus, the argument goes, "projected disposable income," while still undefined in the Code, must mean nothing more than "disposable income" that is projected out through the plan period – in other words, that is multiplied by the number of months in the plan.

Some courts have found this strict mathematical approach to be difficult to rationalize in cases in which the debtor's income or expenses changed significantly from the pre-petition period on which the historical disposable income figure is based. A handful of those courts have determined projected disposable income based on the income and expense figures used in Schedules I and J. See, e.g., In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Riggs, 359 B.R. 649, 652-53 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2007).

But most courts dissatisfied with the strict mathematical approach, like the bankruptcy court and the BAP here, have not insisted on the use of Schedules I and J in every case. Rather, they have accepted that "projected disposable income" in section 1325 presumptively requires use of the historical disposable income figure but have allowed significant changes in the debtor's income or expenses to be considered when the strict historical figure paints an incorrect picture of the debtor's ability to fund a chapter 13 plan. See, e.g., In re Pak, 378 B.R. 257 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007); In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007); In re Jass, 340 B.R. 411, 418-19 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006).

B. The Chapter 13 Trustee's Mechanical Approach To Section 1325(b) Is Flawed.

The Chapter 13 Trustee argues in favor of the strict mathematical approach. He contends that section 1325 and Form 22C create "a mathematical formula" for determining what must be paid to the unsecured creditors, and that a court "is not free to stray from this rigid, mechanical test and consider other factors in making this determination." Br. 8; see Br. 14 (projection of disposable income is effected by "merely multiplying the net 'disposable income' figure as calculated on Form 22C by the applicable commitment period"). He recognizes that the Code fails to define "projected disposable income," Br. 11, but argues that it is simply "part and parcel of the same concept" as "disposable income." Br. 12.

That mechanical approach to section 1325 is flawed. First, it is founded upon a contextually incorrect interpretation of the term "projected." See Hibbs v. Winn, 542 U.S. 88, 101 (2004) (statutory words must be construed in context). The use of the term "projected" in the economic and financial context of this statute suggests a forecast or estimate of an expected future financial reality. See The Random House Dict. of the English Lang. 1546 (2d ed. 1987) (defining to "project" as, inter alia, "to set forth or calculate (some future thing); They projected the building costs for the next five years."); Webster's Third New Int'l Dict. 1813 (1993) (defining "projected" as, inter alia, "planned for future execution: contrived, proposed," as "[projected] outlays for new plant and equipment"). While the calculation of "projected" financial data may well begin with historical data, it does not necessarily (or even usually) end there, nor does it entail a rigid and inviolable assumption, made by the Chapter 13 Trustee, that projected income will be identical with past income even when the available facts demonstrate otherwise. The Chapter 13 Trustee's mechanical test ignores this context of the statutory language.

Second, the Chapter 13 Trustee's approach wholly fails to account for two other important phrases in section 1325(b)(1)(B). For one thing, the statute refers to the income "to be received by the debtor," but the mechanical test fails to address cases in which the historical income required to be used may have no relationship to the actual income "to be received." The Chapter 13 Trustee dismisses these cases as merely "harsh results." Br. 17. But when one is trying to understand statutory language and the results of an interpretation are unduly harsh, the proper course is to make absolutely certain that one's interpretation takes all the relevant language into account.[5] In this case, by ignoring the textual phrase "to be received" in section 1325(b)(1)(B), when historical income bears no relationship with actual income "to be received" by the debtor, the Chapter 13 Trustee's interpretation fails to adhere to the statutory language.

The mechanical test ignores another statutory phrase, as well: "will be applied to make payments." If projected disposable income is based strictly on an historical figure, minus expenses, there will be some cases in which income in the plan is only deemed, or hypothetical, and not actually received. In such cases, the deemed or hypothetical income cannot be applied to make payments for the simple reason that it does not exist. The present case is actually a fairly typical example, in which the debtor lost her job at about the time she filed a chapter 13 petition. Here, the debtor's

[5] It is unnecessary to decide whether the results of the mechanical test are "absurd" or merely "harsh." Br. 17-19. That test not only is not compelled by the statutory language but, as we show here, also fails to take into account other language in the same section.

current monthly income, an average of the past six months' income, reflects the income from that job, and the debtor's disposable income (the current monthly income less expenses) would not reflect the loss of that job. Projecting that figure forward would require the debtor to apply deemed or hypothetical income that was not actually "received" in the future "to make payments" under the plan. Or else it would deprive the debtor of recourse to chapter 13 simply because she had lost a job at about the time she filed.

These problems with the Chapter 13 Trustee's interpretation are more than mere policy issues; they are critical textual flaws. It is well established that courts "must, if possible, construe a statute to give every word some operative effect." Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Aviall Servs., Inc., 543 U.S. 157, 167 (2004) (citing United States v. Nordic Village, Inc., 503 U.S. 30, 35-36 (1992)). The Chapter 13 Trustee's interpretation would require the Court to ignore this statutory maxim.[6] [6] The Chapter 13 Trustee suggests that section 1129(a)(15)(B) requires courts to treat "projected disposable income" the same as "disposable income," Br. 15 – that is, as "nothing more than 'disposable income' annualized." In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 264 n.7. But the phrase "not less than the projected disposable income of the debtor (as defined in section 1325(b)(2))" in section 1129(a)(15)(B) suggests nothing of the sort. The "as defined in" parenthetical obviously refers to "disposable income," which is defined in section 1325(b)(2), and not to "projected disposable income," which is not. Thus, section 1129(a)(15)(B) provides no further help in understanding section 1325(b)(1)(B). See In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 264 n.7 ("none of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code incorporating the term 'projected disposable income' provides definitive guidance as to its interpretation").

C. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel's Interpretation Appropriately Gives Content To All Parts Of The Statute.

The correct interpretation of section 1325 is the one offered by both the bankruptcy court and the BAP.

1. As both courts recognized, "projected disposable income" in the current version of the statute will, as a general matter, be based on the newly defined "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2), which in turn will be based on an historical calculation of current monthly income, computed as the average of the six month before the petition was filed. But both courts also understood that there are circumstances in which the debtor's financial condition changes significantly from that pre-petition period and that, in such circumstances, it will not be appropriate to use the historical calculation. As the BAP expressed the point: "Where it is shown that Form B22C disposable income fails accurately to predict a debtor's actual ability to fund a plan, that figure may be subject to modification," App. 185, albeit in "exception[al]" cases. App. 186.

The courts' interpretation not only is faithful to the new definition of "disposable income" in section 1325(b)(2) as an historical number but also treats "projected" disposable income as a future-oriented concept, as required by the language of section 1325(b)(1). See In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 264-65; In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. at 307-08. The interpretation requires the use of the historical income figure called for in the definition of "disposable income" as a starting point, and it calls for a presumption that the historical figure should be carried forward throughout the term of the plan, absent evidence to the contrary. But in order to take into account the future-orientation of the remaining language of the statute, and to ensure that projected disposable income is, in fact, a projection, it allows that presumption to be rebutted whenever the debtor is likely to experience (or actually has experienced) either a significant increase or a significant decrease in income after the filing of the chapter 13 plan.

The reason for having a starting presumption that the historical disposable income figure should be applied mathematically to derive the projected disposable income is that, while "projected disposable income" is not the same as "disposable income," it is appropriate in construing the former phrase to give effect to the definition of the latter. Section 1325(b)(2) provides a definition "[f]or purposes of this subsection." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). The only time that "disposable income" is used in "this subsection," section 1325(b), other than in the definition itself, is in the term "projected disposable income." Thus, we accept that a court should begin by applying the historical "disposable income" figure as a starting point and by presumptively carrying that figure forward over the plan period.[7]

[7] Congress may well have expected that the historical figure, computed generally with standard rather than actual expenses, would result in a higher disposable-income total for "above-median" debtors and a greater amount designated for repay-

At the same time, however, this initial presumption that the historical current monthly income will be used must necessarily be rebuttable. As the BAP explained, "parties contending that a debtor's Form B22C disposable income figure does not accurately project the debtor's future ability to fund a plan must present documentation similar to that required by section 707(b)(2)(B)(ii) in support of their claim." App. 186. See also In re Pak, 378 B.R. at 267 ("It makes no sense to interpret 'projected disposable income,' governing debtors' future payments under their chapter 13 plans, as cast in stone by their pre-bankruptcy history, without any opportunity for the trustee, creditors or the debtor to offer rebutting evidence as to changed income circumstances before the effective date of the plan.").

Thus, contrary to the Chapter 13 Trustee's argument here, Br. 14, application of the historical income figure to the plan period is not the end of the matter in all cases. To the contrary, there are situations in which a debtor has or is likely to have significant changes in income after the period in which the historical "current monthly income" is computed, and in order to give full effect to the statutory text those ment to creditors under the debtor's chapter 13 plan. But the fact that this is often not the case does not authorize a court to ignore the statutory definition altogether. Thus, the decisions that ignore Form 22C in determining projected disposable income and base it instead on Schedules I and J in the ordinary case cannot find support in the statutory language. See, e.g., In re Demonica, 345 B.R. 895, 900 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2006); In re Riggs, 359 B.R. 649, 652-53 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2007).

changes must be taken into account in "project[ing]" the debtor's future disposable income.

There are two types of exceptional case that section 1325 must be able to address. First, a debtor may be unemployed during the six-month period in which "current monthly income" is calculated but may accept a high-paying job at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition. See In re Pak, supra (debtor was unemployed for three years but found a job paying over $100,000 two months before filing his petition). Such a debtor would have an artificially low "disposable income" but might well be able to fund a chapter 13 plan that would repay most or all of his unsecured debt.

Second, conversely, a debtor may suffer a significant loss of income – for example, by losing a job – at about the time he files his chapter 13 petition, as in this case. Such a debtor would have a relatively high "current monthly income," based on an average of the six months preceding the month in which the petition was filed. Yet if that historical income were simply extended forward for purposes of the chapter 13 plan, it would not reflect the actual income available to the debtor during that future period. That would be precisely the situation in this case if the mechanical test were used. To put it in statutory terms, the future disposable income thus computed would not be the debtor's "projected" disposable income (because it would demonstrably not be based on a reliable estimate of future income) nor would it be the disposable income "received" by the debtor during the applicable commitment period. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). Moreover, because the income amount determined by the Chapter 13 Trustee's approach is merely deemed or hypothetical and not actually received, the income could not be "applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." Id. In a case like this, therefore, the court must take into account the significant loss of income in order to apply section 1325(b) faithfully.[8]

2. The Chapter 13 Trustee argues that allowing any adjustment of the historical disposable income figure is at odds with the plain meaning of section 1325 and with congressional intent. Br. 19-21. That argument is unpersuasive.

We have already explained why the adjustment of the historical figure in some cases is actually compelled by the statutory language and why the statutory text does not support the Chapter 13 Trustee's notion of a "standardized formula" that is unrelated to any actual income to be received. Adjustment of the historical figure is sometimes necessary to ensure that the income is "to be received" and "applied to [8] We recognize that some of these concerns with the statutory text do not arise in the same manner in our first example, when the debtor finds himself with a significant increase in income at about the time he files his petition. With an increase in income, the lower historical figure would actually be received by the debtor and could be applied to pay unsecured creditors. But it would still not be an accurate "project[ion]" of the debtor's disposable income to be "received" during the plan period, and thus the bankruptcy court's interpretation is irreconcilable with the statutory text in these circumstances also. And in any event, section 1325(b) should be interpreted in one uniform way for all above-median debtors, so the rebuttable presumption approach should be applied across the board.

---

make payments." In the Chapter 13 Trustee's mechanical view of section 1325(b)(1)(B), those two critical phrases in the statute become surplusage.

Thus, the Chapter 13 Trustee's position that the statute prohibits any adjustment of the historical disposable income figures turns not on the language itself but rather on the pre-enactment history of the BAPCPA. The claim is that when Congress was considering the changes to section 1325, certain chapter 13 trustees warned Congress that its definition of "disposable income" might be unrelated to the debtor's actual income available to fund a chapter 13 plan; yet, "despite these warnings, no changes were made." Br. 21. From this pre-enactment history, the Chapter 13 Trustee seems to draw the conclusion that Congress must have specifically intended to enact the entire parade of horribles that a purely mechanical test creates. That conclusion is unwarranted. See Lamie v. U.S. Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 539 (2004) ("the history creates more confusion than clarity about the congressional intent"). For all anyone knows, Congress may have believed the chapter 13 trustees were mistaken and that section 1325 actually would allow bankruptcy courts to do precisely what the chapter 13 trustees thought it would not. Or Congress might simply not have gotten the message. Or perhaps the congressmen who did get the message realized the language was unclear but were reluctant to upset the compromises represented in the bill. "There are," after all, "many reasons for saying no." Reed Dickerson, The Interpretation and Application of Statutes 160 (1975). As Justice Holmes put it, "It is a delicate business to base speculations about the purposes or construction of a statute upon the vicissitudes of its passage." Pine Hill Coal Co. v. United States, 259 U.S. 191, 196 (1922).

All this Court has to work with is the language that Congress actually enacted. For the reasons we have given, that language does not support a purely mechanical test that is never subject to adjustment in light of significant changes in income or expenses after the filing of the petition.

3. We would be the first to admit that the language of section 1325 is not a model of clarity. But while our interpretation is necessarily based on certain inferences from context, it gives effect to all the statutory language far more faithfully than the Chapter 13 Trustee's interpretation. Almost as important, it better furthers the overall goal of chapter 13.

Chapter 13 focuses on having debtors devote future income to paying their creditors. Indeed, BAPCPA placed additional emphasis on this goal of paying future income to creditors when it added language to section 707(b) permitting a court, with the debtor's consent, to convert an abusive chapter 7 case to chapter 13, as an alternative to dismissal. 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(1). While the Chapter 13 Trustee's interpretation does require future income to be used to pay creditors, that future income is measured exclusively by reference to historical income, and in some cases, like this one, it is merely "deemed" income that bears no relation to the actual income available to the debtor. In contrast, our interpretation permits a court to consider the actual income that can "be applied to make payments" under the plan in those cases in which a different amount of actual income is available to a debtor because of changed circumstances. The use of actual income in such cases is an important measure of fairness, both to the debtor in cases like this one, in which the debtor's actual future income is below her historical income, and to creditors in cases like In re Pak, in which the debtor will earn significant additional income that is not reflected in the historical calculation.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel should be affirmed.

STATEMENT REGARDING ORAL ARGUMENT

The United States requests oral argument. Although the United States is technically an amicus in this appeal, it is the only party to defend the rationale of the decisions below, given that the debtor, as appellee, is not filing a brief. The statutory issue presented here is of great significance. It has produced many conflicting decisions in the bankruptcy courts, and, as of the date on which this brief is filed, no court of appeals has rendered a decision on the issue. Even if another circuit issues a decision in the next few months, the conflict will continue in bankruptcy courts within this Circuit. This Court should hear argument to resolve the matter for itself.

QUESTION PRESENTED

Under Section 1325(b)(1)(B) of Title 11 of the United States Code, when a trustee or unsecured creditor objects to the confirmation of a debtor's Chapter 13 plan, the bankruptcy court can confirm that plan if "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received" during the plan period "will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan." The debtor's "disposable income" is calculated by examining her monthly expenses when the Chapter 13 petition was filed and her average monthly income during the six-month period before the petition was filed. The question presented is as follows:

Whether, in calculating the debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period, the bankruptcy court may consider evidence suggesting that the debtor's income or expenses during that period are likely to be different from her income or expenses during the pre-filing period.

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE SUPPORTING RESPONDENT

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES

The United States has a direct interest in the proper construction of Section 1325(b)(1)(B) of the Bankruptcy Code because United States Trustees—who are Department of Justice officials appointed by the Attorney General—supervise the administration of Chapter 13 cases and trustees, monitor Chapter 13 plans, and file comments with bankruptcy courts regarding such plans in connection with confirmation hearings pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 1324. See 28 U.S.C. 586(a)(3)(C); H.R. Rep. No. 595, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. 88 (1977). Congress has provided that "[t]he United States trustee may raise and may appear and be heard on any issue in any case or proceeding." 11 U.S.C. 307. At the Court's invitation, the United States filed a brief as amicus curiae at the petition stage of this case.

STATEMENT

1. a. Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code provides for the adjustment of debts of an individual with regular income. 11 U.S.C. 1301 et seq. A debtor who files for bankruptcy under Chapter 13 retains possession of her assets, and she typically receives a discharge of her debts only after she pays her creditors under a plan confirmed by the bankruptcy court. 11 U.S.C. 1306(b), 1321 et seq.

If the trustee or an unsecured creditor objects to confirmation of a Chapter 13 debtor's plan, the court cannot confirm that plan > unless, as of the effective date of the plan—

>
> (A) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan on account of such claim is not less than the amount of such claim; or
>
> (B) the plan provides that all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period beginning on the date that the first payment is due under the plan will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan.

11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(A)-(B). Thus, the bankruptcy court may confirm a contested Chapter 13 plan only if the debtor commits either to pay her unsecured creditors in full or to apply all of her "projected disposable income" during the plan period to paying those creditors.

b. This case concerns the proper method for calculating a debtor's "projected disposable income" during the plan period. Neither Section 1325 nor any other provision of the Bankruptcy Code defines the term "projected disposable income." Section 1325 does, however, define the term "disposable income." That definition was recently amended as part of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA or Act), Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23. Because petitioner's arguments depend in large measure on that amendment, it is important to understand the statutory scheme both before and after BAPCPA's enactment.

i. Before BAPCPA became effective in October 2005, Section 1325 defined "disposable income" as "income which is received by the debtor and which is not reasonably necessary to be expended" for the debtor's "maintenance or support," "charitable contributions," or "business * * * expenditures." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A)-(B) (2000). Then as now, a debtor listed her monthly income on Schedule I and her monthly expenditures on Schedule J. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 6, Scheds. I-J (2000). Thus, to calculate a debtor's current disposable income, a bankruptcy court generally began with the monthly income listed on Schedule I and deducted any monthly expenditures listed on Schedule J that the court determined were reasonably necessary to support the debtor, to contribute to charity, or to operate the debtor's business.

Then, to calculate the debtor's projected disposable income, the court typically multiplied the debtor's current disposable income by the number of months in her plan. See, e.g., In re Killough, 900 F.2d 61, 64 (5th Cir. 1990). In projecting disposable income, however, courts considered any changes to the debtor's income or expenses that appeared likely to occur during the plan period. See, e.g., In re Petro, 395 B.R. 369, 377 (B.A.P.

6th Cir. 2008) ("Prior to BAPCPA the schedules were a starting point and courts gave meaning to the words 'projected' and 'to be received' by taking into account a debtor['s] anticipated future income."); In re Simms, No. 06-1206, 2008 WL 217174, at *9 (Bankr. N.D. W. Va. Jan. 23, 2008) ("Of course, under pre-BAPCPA law, bankruptcy courts sometimes deviated from the debtor's income and expenses listed on Schedules I & J based on known increases or decreases in either income or expenses.").

ii. In BAPCPA, Congress amended the definition of "disposable income." Section 1325 now defines that term as "current monthly income received by the debtor * * * less amounts reasonably necessary to be expended" for certain items. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2). "[C]urrent monthly income" is defined, in turn, as the debtor's "average monthly income from all sources" during the six months preceding the filing. 11 U.S.C. 101(10A)(A)(i). Although a debtor is still required to file Schedules I and J, now she must also file Official Form 22C, on which she calculates her current monthly income as defined in Section 101(10A)(A)(i). See Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 22C (2009); Pet. Supp. App. 1-8.[1] Thus, to calculate a debtor's monthly income under BAPCPA, a court no longer focuses on a single month's income at the time of filing; rather, it considers a historical average of the debtor's income during the six-month period before commencement of the case.

In addition to changing the method of calculating all debtors' monthly income, BAPCPA also changed the method of calculating some debtors' monthly expenses. If a debtor's current monthly income is below the median income of a comparably-sized household in her State, the debtor may claim the same types of general expenses—i.e., "maintenance or support" obligations, "charitable contributions," and "business * * * expenditures"—as she could before BAPCPA. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(2)(A)(i)-(ii) and (b)(2)(B). But if a debtor's current monthly income is above-median, she may claim only particular kinds of expenses in amounts specified under Section 707(b)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3)(A) (incorporating 11 U.S.C. 707(b)(2)).

Thus, BAPCPA amended the formulae for computing "disposable income" under Section 1325(b)(2) in two respects: it altered the manner in which a debtor's current income is determined, and it established a new method of calculating an above-median debtor's expenses. The Act did not, however, address the method a court should employ to calculate "projected disposable income" under Section 1325(b)(1)(B). See Pet. App. 50-51 ("BAPCPA linked 'disposable income' to Form B22C current monthly income, which is a historically based figure, but it left 'projected disposable income,' which had an established pre-BAPCPA treatment, alone."). Accordingly, the specific question presented in this case is whether, in projecting disposable income, courts should consider anticipated changes to the debtor's financial circumstances, just as they did before BAPCPA.

2. Respondent is a single woman with no children who resides in Kansas. On October 16, 2006, she filed a Chapter 13 petition to address $36,793.36 in unsecured debt. During the six-month period that preceded her filing, respondent received a one-time buyout from her former employer that increased her monthly gross income to $11,990.03 in April 2006 and $15,356.42 in May 2006. When respondent averaged her monthly income for April through September 2006 on Form 22C, her current monthly income amounted to $5,343.70. Because that figure placed her above the median income for a family of one in Kansas, she calculated her expenses in accordance with Section 707(b)(2) of the Bankruptcy Code. Respondent's monthly expenses totaled $4,228.71, leaving her with monthly disposable income of $1,114.98 on her Form 22C. Pet. App. 4-5.

As a result of the buyout payments respondent received, however, the "current monthly income" stated on her Form 22C was substantially greater than the monthly income that she could reasonably expect to earn during the plan period. On her Schedule I, she listed a monthly net income from new employment of $1,922, which placed her considerably below the state median income level. On her Schedule J, she listed actual monthly expenses of $1,772.97, leaving her with monthly disposable income of $149.03. Based on that figure, respondent proposed a repayment plan of $144 per month for 36 months, or a total of $5,184. Pet. App. 4, 57.

Petitioner, the bankruptcy trustee, objected to confirmation of the plan. He argued that, because respondent's monthly disposable income on her Form 22C was $1,114.98, the plan did not satisfy Section 1325(b)(1)(B)'s requirement that "all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received" in the plan period must "be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." Petitioner contended that respondent's "projected disposable income" during the plan period was simply her monthly "disposable income" ($1,114.98) derived from the pre-plan figures, multiplied by the number of months in her plan (36), for a total "projected disposable income" of $40,139.28. Petitioner therefore proposed that the plan provide for monthly payments of $756, which would have repaid respondent's unsecured creditors in full over the life of the plan. Petitioner acknowledged, however, that respondent did not have the means to fund such a plan. Pet. App. 5-7.

3. a. Over petitioner's objection, the bankruptcy court confirmed the plan essentially as proposed by respondent. Pet. App. 54-82.[2] The court reasoned that "Congress' reference in § 1325(b)(1)(B) to projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period would be superfluous if the historical average was the start and end of the equation." Id. at 69. The court further explained that Section 1325(b)(1)(B) requires a "determination whether the debtor is committing all of his or her projected disposable income 'as of the effective date of the plan,'" not as of the date of the petition. Id. at 70 (emphasis omitted). The court also concluded that petitioner's approach would "lead[] to absurd results that are at odds with both congressional purpose and common sense" because it would prevent debtors whose "incomes drop[] significantly from their pre-petition monthly average * * * from ever being able to file a feasible and confirmable Chapter 13 repayment plan." Id. at 70-71. The bankruptcy court therefore "agree[d] with the majority of courts, which have found that the term 'projected' is a forward-looking concept" that allows consideration of "any reasonably anticipated changes in [disposable] income during the life of the proposed Chapter 13 plan." Id. at 69.

[2] The bankruptcy court ordered that respondent's plan run for 60 months rather than the 36 months that respondent had proposed. Pet. App. 76-80. Respondent did not challenge that aspect of the bankruptcy court's decision, see id. at 11-12 & n.4, and it is not at issue in this Court.

b. The bankruptcy appellate panel affirmed. Pet. App. 33-53. After describing an existing split in authority on the question, id. at 44-50, the panel reasoned that, although "BAPCPA linked 'disposable income' to Form B22C current monthly income, which is a historically based figure, * * * it left 'projected disposable income,' which had an established pre-BAPCPA treatment, alone." Id. at 50-51. Before BAPCPA's enactment, the panel explained, if bankruptcy courts "had reason to believe that [a debtor's] schedules did not accurately predict a debtor's actual ability to pay, other evidence was also considered." Id. at 51. The panel therefore concluded that, although BAPCPA had modified the formulae for calculating a debtor's current disposable income, it had not "eliminate[d] the bankruptcy courts' discretion" to consider anticipated changes to a debtor's financial condition "where significant circumstances support doing so." Ibid.

c. The court of appeals affirmed. Pet. App. 1-32. After likewise surveying the split in authority on the question, id. at 16-23, the court concluded that petitioner's "mechanical approach"—multiplying a debtor's current monthly "disposable income" by the number of months in her plan—is not consistent with the statutory text. Id. at 24-25. The court relied in particular on Section 1325(b)(1)(B)'s directive that, "as of the effective date of the plan," all of the debtor's projected disposable income "to be received" during the plan period "will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." Id. at 25 (emphasis omitted). The court construed those three statutory phrases to "suggest[] consideration of the debtor's actual financial circumstances as of the effective date of the plan." Ibid. The court of appeals further concluded that the language of Form 22C and BAPCPA's legislative history confirmed Congress's intent that courts utilize a "forward-looking approach." Id. at 28-29. The court finally noted that the mechanical approach would foreclose bankruptcy relief for debtors like respondent whose post-filing income decreases, while allowing debtors whose post-filing income increases to avoid paying creditors all that they are able. Id. at 31.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

In crafting Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, Congress intended to create an orderly system that permits honest debtors to be released from crushing debt by repaying their creditors as much as they can afford over the life of the bankruptcy. That intent is apparent in Section 1325(b)(1)(B), which, upon objection by the trustee or a creditor, conditions the confirmation of a Chapter 13 plan on the bankruptcy court's determination that the debtor will either repay her unsecured creditors in full or devote all of her "projected disposable income" to such repayment for the duration of the plan. Although Congress defined the term "disposable income" in Section 1325, it did not define the word "projected" or the entire phrase "projected disposable income." The ordinary meaning of the word "projected," however, indicates that Congress intended bankruptcy courts to consider the debtor's actual financial circumstances and any changes to those circumstances that the court knows are likely to occur in the future, rather than relying only on financial data that may no longer reflect a debtor's income and expenses.

This approach is also faithful to the remainder of Section 1325, which requires courts to project the disposable income that "will be received" by the debtor and "will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). Under petitioner's mechanical view of the term "projected"—according to which a court must simply multiply a debtor's "disposable income" by the number of months in her plan—debtors such as respondent must commit to paying money they will never receive and never apply to repay creditors. That is not a natural reading of the term "projected disposable income," and it is inconsistent as well with the rest of Chapter 13, which evinces Congress's intent that the implementation of a Chapter 13 plan be grounded in a debtor's actual financial circumstances rather than tied to historical data that no longer reflect the debtor's real-life situation.

Before Congress amended the Bankruptcy Code in 2005, bankruptcy courts used the disposable income derived from the information reported on a debtor's Schedules I and J as the starting point for determining the debtor's projected disposable income. If that figure accurately reflected the debtor's financial situation at the time of confirmation and was likely to reflect the debtor's financial situation over the life of the plan, a court would merely multiply the disposable income by the number of months in the plan. But when the debtor's financial situation had changed between the time of filing and the time of confirmation, or when it was likely to change during the life of the plan, bankruptcy courts would take such changes into account in projecting the debtor's disposable income. Nothing in BAPCPA suggests that Congress intended to alter that approach. Courts therefore should continue to "project[]" a debtor's disposable income using the same method they did before BAPCPA.

Petitioner acknowledges that his reading of the statute produces unfair results for some debtors who will be shut out of the bankruptcy system, and that it produces unfair results for some creditors who will receive little or no repayment from debtors who can afford to satisfy their obligations. Under the approach employed by the court of appeals, by contrast, neither debtors nor creditors fall prey to unfair and illogical results. Petitioner suggests that a debtor may avoid the harsh effects of the mechanical approach by strategically delaying the filing of a petition, dismissing a petition and then refiling at a later date, ignoring the requirement that a debtor file a Schedule I, or attempting to file under Chapter 7 instead of under Chapter 13. This Court should not construe the term "projected disposable income" in a way that encourages gamesmanship, requires a debtor to risk his ability to enjoy the protections of bankruptcy, or otherwise undermines the intent of Congress.

ARGUMENT

IN PROJECTING A CHAPTER 13 DEBTOR'S DISPOSABLE INCOME UNDER SECTION 1325(b)(1)(B), COURTS SHOULD CONSIDER EVIDENCE INDICATING THAT THE DEBTOR'S FINANCIAL CIRCUMSTANCES HAVE CHANGED OR ARE LIKELY TO CHANGE DURING THE PLAN PERIOD

As this Court has long recognized, the twin goals at the core of the federal bankruptcy system are giving the honest but unfortunate debtor a fresh start and ensuring the maximum possible equitable distribution to creditors. See, e.g., Stellwagen v. Clum, 245 U.S. 605, 617 (1918); Williams v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co., 236 U.S. 549 (1915). Petitioner's reading of Section 1325(b)(1)(B) would frustrate both of those objectives. Some honest debtors in need of relief under Chapter 13 will be shut out of the system. And some creditors will be foreclosed from obtaining satisfaction of debts from debtors who can afford to repay them. The text of Section 1325(b)(1)(B), along with the structure, history, and purposes of that provision, indicates that a bankruptcy court's calculation of a debtor's "projected disposable income" should take into account evidence indicating that the debtor's income or expenses during the plan period are likely to be different from her pre-petition income or her expenses at the time of filing.

A. The Text Of Section 1325 Makes Clear That A Court Should Rely On A Debtor's Actual Financial Circumstances Rather Than Only On Historical Income Figures

1. Under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, a debtor is required to submit a plan for repaying her unsecured creditors that is consistent with the requirements of 11 U.S.C. 1322. When either a creditor or the Chapter 13 trustee objects to such a plan, the bankruptcy court may confirm it only if the debtor either will repay all of her unsecured creditors in full or will devote all of her "projected disposable income" toward repayment of her creditors over the life of the plan. 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). Although Section 1325 defines the term "disposable income," it does not define the term "projected disposable income" or specify a method for calculating how a debtor's current "disposable income" should be "projected" into the future. The Court must therefore look to the common and ordinary meaning of the term "projected." See Rousey v. Jacoway, 544 U.S. 320, 330 (2005). That adjective is derived from the verb "project," which ordinarily means "[t]o calculate, estimate, or predict (something in the future), based on present data or trends." In re Jass, 340 B.R. 411, 415 (Bankr. D. Utah 2006) (quoting American Heritage College Dictionary 1115 (4th ed. 2002)); see Merriam-Webster Collegiate Dictionary 993 (11th ed. 2005) (defining the verb "project" as "to plan, figure, or estimate for the future," and the noun "projection" as "an estimate of future possibilities based on a current trend"); The New Oxford American Dictionary 1355 (2d ed. 2005) (defining the verb "project" as "[to] estimate or forecast (something) on the basis of present trends").

Consistent with that usual understanding of the term "projected," bankruptcy courts should determine a debtor's "projected disposable income" by forecasting whether current trends are reasonably likely to continue—i.e., whether a debtor can reasonably expect to receive the same income and incur the same expenses during the plan period as prior to the filing of her bankruptcy petition. See In re Nowlin, 576 F.3d 258, 263 (5th Cir. 2009) ("[W]e interpret the phrase 'projected disposable income' to embrace a forward-looking view grounded in the present via the statutory definition of 'disposable income' premised on historical data."); 8 Collier on Bankruptcy ¶ 1325.08[5][a] at 1325-61 (Alan N. Resnick & Henry J. Sommer eds., 15th ed. rev. 2006) (Collier) ("To the extent that courts give any meaning to the word 'projected,' and courts are supposed to give meaning to every word in a statute, they may have to disregard the debtor's prior income if circumstances have changed."). Petitioner and his amicus contend (Pet. Br. 41; NACBA Am. Br. 17-18) that the bankruptcy court must calculate "projected disposable income" by simply multiplying the debtor's historically-based "disposable income" by the number of months in the plan.

But "[t]he word 'multiplied' is quite different from the word 'projected,'" In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. 302, 312 n.9 (B.A.P. 1st Cir. 2007), and other provisions of the Bankruptcy Code expressly require the mechanical calculation that petitioner advocates here. See, e.g., 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(3) (providing that debtor's current monthly income be "multiplied by 12" to determine whether debtor has above-median income).[3] Congress's decision to require projection rather than multiplication in Section 1325(b)(1)(B) indicates that it did not intend future disposable income to be mechanically derived from current disposable income.

Contrary to petitioner's assertion (Pet. Br. 41), the court of appeals' forward-looking approach does not leave Section 1325's definition of "disposable income" with "no apparent purpose." That definition continues to serve the same two important purposes that the prior definition of that term served before BAPCPA was enacted. First, it directs the bankruptcy court's calculation of disposable income, now by further specifying the types of revenue that the debtor must treat as income, and the types of expenses that an above-median debtor may claim as reasonable and necessary. See Pet. App. 27. Although the process by which a debtor's future income is "projected" may involve predictive judgments rather than simple multiplication, those predictive judgments must focus on the types of revenue and expenses that are included in Section 1325's definition of "disposable income." By contrast, if the term "disposable income" were undefined, bankruptcy courts would need to determine which types of revenue and expenses should be considered. The statutory definition thus constrains the bankruptcy courts' discretion in calculating "projected disposable income," even though it does not reduce that calculation to a mathematical formula.

[3] See also 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(4)(A)(ii) (providing that debtor's current monthly income be "multiplied by 12" to determine whether debtor has above-median income); 11 U.S.C. 704(b)(2) (same); see also 11 U.S.C 707(b)(2)(A)(i) (providing that debtor's current monthly income be "multiplied by 60" to determine in part whether presumption of abuse applies); 11 U.S.C. 1322(d)(1)-(2) (providing that debtor's current monthly income be "multiplied by 12" to determine length of plan); 11 U.S.C. 1326(b)(3)(B)(ii) (providing that certain payments be "multiplied by 5 percent" to determine trustee compensation).

Second, as a practical matter, Section 1325's definition of "disposable income" will often control what a debtor must contribute to a Chapter 13 plan in order to receive confirmation. In many cases, a court may reasonably expect that a debtor's monthly income will be the same during the plan period as it was during the six months before she filed her petition, and that her expenses will be the same during the plan period as at the time of filing. In those cases, projecting the debtor's disposable income will require nothing more than multiplying her current disposable income by the number of months in her plan. But when the evidence indicates that the debtor's current income or expenses are likely to change during the plan period—or that they have already changed during the interval between the filing of the petition and the time of plan confirmation—"a debtor's 'disposable income' calculation on Form 22C is a starting point for determining the debtor's 'projected disposable income,' " and "the final calculation can take into consideration changes that have occurred in the debtor's financial circumstances." In re Frederickson, 545 F.3d 652, 659 (8th Cir. 2008), cert. denied, 129 S. Ct. 1630 (2009).

2. Petitioner contends (Pet. Br. 40) that the Court should "adopt a reading [of Section 1325] that does not treat statutory terms as mere surplusage." Petitioner's own construction of the term "projected disposable income," however, would render much of Section 1325(b)(1)(B) meaningless. Section 1325(b)(1)(B) requires the bankruptcy court to ensure, upon objection by the trustee or a creditor, that all of a debtor's "projected disposable income to be received in the applicable commitment period * * * will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B) (emphases added). By referring to "projected disposable income" that will "be received" and "be applied to make payments" during the plan period, Section 1325(b)(1)(B) "links 'projected disposable income' with the debtor's income actually received during the plan, and indicates a forward-looking orientation of the phrase." In re Nowlin, 576 F.3d at 263. Under petitioner's mechanical interpretation of the term "projected," however, the bankruptcy court is precluded from considering either the amount of income a debtor is actually likely to receive over the duration of her plan or the amount of such income she will be able to apply in that period to make payments to her creditors.

Application of petitioner's interpretation to the facts of this case illustrates its inconsistency with the overall thrust of Section 1325(b)(1)(B). Under petitioner's mechanical view, respondent's "projected disposable income" is $1,114.98 per month, even though petitioner concedes that respondent's actual disposable income during the plan period will be only $149.03 per month. See Pet. App. 4-6. Petitioner would make confirmation of the plan contingent on respondent's commitment to pay $756 per month, even though nearly $607 of that amount will never "be received" and thus will never "be applied to make payments" during the plan period. In short, petitioner's proposed plan would require respondent to commit to repay creditors with income that she will never receive. That is not a natural reading of the statutory text.

Under Section 1325(b)(1)(B), a plan must also commit that, "as of the effective date of the plan," all of the debtor's projected disposable income will be applied to repayment of unsecured creditors. Because a Chapter 13 plan is not binding on the debtor and other parties until it is confirmed, 11 U.S.C. 1327(a), "the effective date of the plan" is the date on which the plan is confirmed by the bankruptcy court. The requirement that bankruptcy courts determine a debtor's projected disposable income at the time of confirmation, which often occurs months after the time of filing, further indicates that Congress intended to allow for "consideration of evidence at the time of the plan's confirmation that may alter the historical calculation of disposable income on Form 22C." In re Nowlin, 576 F.3d at 263; see Pet. App. 25. By contrast, petitioner's mechanical approach would preclude the bankruptcy court from considering not only changes in the debtor's financial circumstances that are demonstrably likely to occur during the plan period, but even changes that have already occurred between the pre-filing period and the date the confirmation decision is made.

Section 1325 also provides that, as a condition of confirmation, a court must determine that "the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(a)(6); see pp. 26-28, infra. To make that determination, the court necessarily must assess the debtor's likely future financial circumstances. There is no reason that Congress would require such a forward-looking inquiry in one subsection of Section 1325 and prohibit it in another.

3. Petitioner and his amicus observe (Pet. Br. 45-56; NACBA Am. Br. 19-20) that Section 1325(b)(3) (through the incorporation of Section 707(b)(2)(A)) expressly allows courts to adjust an above-median debtor's expenses upon a showing of special circumstances. They argue that Congress's failure expressly to authorize similar adjustments on the income side of the ledger reflects an intent to limit the courts' discretion in this regard, and that the court of appeals' decision disserves that congressional intent. That argument is misconceived.

Under Sections 1325(b)(3) and 707(b)(2)(A), a court's adjustment of an above-median-income debtor's expenses due to special circumstances takes place in the calculation of the debtor's "disposable income." The absence of any similar "special circumstances" exception to the statutory definition of "current monthly income," see 11 U.S.C. 101(10A)(A)(i), means that the court must use historical income data to calculate a debtor's "disposable income" under Section 1325(b)(2). The question in this case, however, is how a court should "project[]" a debtor's disposable income over the life of her bankruptcy plan so as to ensure that all of the income "to be received" in that time "will be applied to make payments to unsecured creditors under the plan." 11 U.S.C. 1325(b)(1)(B). Sections 1325(b)(3) and 707(b)(2)(A) have no bearing on the proper resolution of that issue.

B. Other Provisions In Chapter 13 Of The Bankruptcy Code Confirm That Section 1325 Mandates A Forward-Looking Approach That Reflects A Debtor's Actual Financial Circumstances

The proper interpretation of particular statutory provisions turns not only on "the language itself [and] the specific context in which that language is used," but also on "the broader context of the statute as a whole." Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 341 (1997). The broader statutory context confirms that Congress intended a Chapter 13 debtor's plan to reflect the reality of her circumstances, even when those circumstances change over time. To that end, Congress included two provisions expressly permitting the modification of a debtor's initial plan.

The first, 11 U.S.C. 1323, allows a debtor to modify her plan "at any time before confirmation." A debtor may modify her proposed plan for many reasons, including to cure an objection that the trustee or a creditor has raised, to cure a post-petition arrearage in mortgage payments, or to accommodate "a change in circumstances making it impossible for the debtor to carry out the terms of the original, or prior, plan." 8 Collier ¶ 1323.02, at 1323-2 to 1323-3. To be sure, a debtor's pre-confirmation modification of her plan does not exempt her from complying with the requirements of Section 1325. But the flexibility built into the development of a confirmable Chapter 13 plan is evidence of Congress's intent that such plans reflect a debtor's actual ability to repay her creditors.

The second provision, 11 U.S.C. 1329, permits the debtor, trustee, or any unsecured creditor to seek modification of a Chapter 13 plan "[a]t any time after confirmation of the plan." This provision, too, reflects Congress's recognition that a debtor's financial circumstances may change in ways that will alter her ability to repay her creditors. Congress's decision to allow a debtor, creditor, or trustee to seek post-confirmation modification reflects Congress's understanding that changes in circumstances can either hamper a debtor's ability to comply with her plan or enhance her ability to satisfy her unsecured debts. Although Section 1329 does not govern the standards a bankruptcy court must employ in deciding whether to confirm a plan under Section 1325(b)(1)(B), it is further evidence that Congress expected the Chapter 13 system to operate in a realistic manner that takes account of a debtor's actual financial circumstances. If the bankruptcy court may modify a Chapter 13 plan after confirmation to take account of changes in a debtor's income or expenses, it would make little sense to preclude the court, in determining whether that plan should be confirmed, from taking account of changes in the debtor's financial circumstances that have occurred between the pre-filing period and the time of plan confirmation.[4]

---

[4] Under Section 1327 of the Bankruptcy Code, "[t]he provisions of a confirmed plan bind the debtor and each creditor." 11 U.S.C. 1327(a). Some courts of appeals have held that, under Section 1327, the confirmation of a plan has a res judicata effect such that parties may not seek post-confirmation alteration of a plan to take into account circumstances known or reasonably foreseeable at the time of confirmation. See In re Dorsey, 505 F.3d 395, 398-399 (5th Cir. 2007); In re Murphy, 474 F.3d 143, 149-150 (4th Cir. 2007); but see Barbosa v. Solomon, 235 F.3d 31, 38-41 (1st Cir. 2000); In re Witkowski, 16 F.3d 739, 743-746 (7th Cir. 1994). Under that view of Section 1327, adoption of petitioner's rule would mean that parties affected by a Chapter 13 bankruptcy are never permitted to take into account changes in a debtor's financial circumstances that occur prior to confirmation but are not reflected in the six-

C. BAPCPA's History And Purposes Confirm That Section 1325 Mandates A Forward-Looking Approach To The Calculation Of "Projected Disposable Income"

1. The legislative history that accompanied BAPCPA is not extensive, but the House Judiciary Report explains that BAPCPA "[was] intended to ensure that debtors repay creditors the maximum they can afford." H.R. Rep. No. 31, 109th Cong., 1st Sess. Pt. 1, at 2 (2005) (2005 House Report). Although in this case petitioner's mechanical approach would have required respondent to commit to make payments well in excess of the funds that would actually be available to her, in other cases that same approach would allow debtors to pay less than they could afford. See In re Kagenveama, 541 F.3d 868, 871 (9th Cir. 2008) (affirming confirmation of plan pursuant to which debtor would pay less than her actual future disposable income); see also In re Turner, 574 F.3d 349, 355-356 (7th Cir. 2009) (reversing plan that would allow debtor to deduct amount for expense he would not actually incur during plan). When a debtor's pre-filing disposable income understates the resources that are likely to be available to her during the plan period (e.g., because of a temporary decrease in income during the pre-filing period or an increase in expenses at the time of filing), mechanically extrapolating that net income figure into the future would deprive creditors of payments that the debtor would be able to make during the plan period. That result is inconsistent with Congress's intent "that debtors pay the greatest amount within their capabilities. Nothing more; nothing less." In re Kibbe, 361 B.R. at 314.

month look-back period utilized in the calculation of a debtor's "disposable income."

2. Before BAPCPA's enactment, bankruptcy courts "usually" multiplied a debtor's disposable income by the number of months in the plan to determine his projected disposable income, e.g., Anderson v. Satterlee, 21 F.3d 355, 357 (9th Cir. 1994), but they departed from that mathematical calculation when necessary to take into account anticipated changes to a debtor's financial circumstances, see, e.g., In re Petro, 395 B.R. 369, 377 (B.A.P. 6th Cir. 2008) ("Prior to BAPCPA the schedules were a starting point and courts gave meaning to the words 'projected' and 'to be received' by taking into account a debtor['s] anticipated future income.").[5] Indeed, Schedules I and J, which courts used as the starting point for determining a debtor's disposable income, required (and continue to require) debtors to note when "any increase or decrease" in income or expense is "reasonably anticipated within the year following the filing" of the relevant schedule. Fed. R. Bankr. P. Official Form 6, Scheds. I-J (2000).

Congress is presumed to be familiar with the backdrop against which it acts. See, e.g., Goodyear Atomic Corp. v. Miller, 486 U.S. 174, 184-185 (1988); Cannon v.

D. Kan. 2002) ("Before a plan is confirmed, the debtor, the trustee, and the court must look to see what the plan offers in payments from projected disposable income that will predictably flow to the debtor. If income is foreseeable at confirmation, it is included within projected disposable income."); Thomas J. Izzo, Projecting the Past: How the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act Has Befuddled § 1325(b) and "Projected Disposable Income," 25 Emory Bankr. Devs. J. 521, 552 (2009).

University of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 696-697 (1979). For that reason, this Court "will not read the Bankruptcy Code to erode past bankruptcy practice absent a clear indication that Congress intended such a departure." Cohen v. de la Cruz, 523 U.S. 213, 221 (1998) (quoting Pennsylvania Dep't of Pub. Welfare v. Davenport, 495 U.S. 552, 563 (1990)). Although BAPCPA modified the formulae used to calculate a debtor's "disposable income," it did not address the manner in which the debtor's income is "projected" into the future. See pp. 4-6, supra. Accordingly, bankruptcy courts should employ the same approach they employed prior to 2005 by starting with the disposable income figure from Form 22C and multiplying that by the number of months in a debtor's plan—unless there is reason to believe that the debtor's financial circumstances have changed or will change, in which case the court should project the debtor's likely disposable income over the life of the plan. If Congress had intended to preclude bankruptcy courts from continuing to consider debtors' likely future financial circumstances when determining projected disposable income, "one would expect Congress to have made unmistakably clear its intent." Cohen, 523 U.S. at 222.

3. Petitioner contends that adopting his interpretation of the term "projected disposable income" will further Congress's efforts to reduce bankruptcy courts' discretion in determining debtors' ability to repay their creditors. Petitioner bases his argument on statements from one member of Congress related to a bankruptcy reform bill that was introduced, but never enacted, five years before Congress passed BAPCPA. See Pet. Br. 28-29 (relying on statements of Senator Grassley, 146 Cong. Rec. S11,700 and S11,703 (daily ed. Dec. 7, 2000)).

Although the statement of one Senator about a bill that was never enacted is of dubious value in interpreting a federal statute, it is apparent from the 2005 amendments that Congress did intend to curtail the discretion of bankruptcy judges in certain respects. Prior to BAPCPA, individual judges had greater latitude to determine which sources of revenue to count as income and which expenses to consider reasonably necessary. In exercising that discretion, different judges sometimes employed different criteria, so that two debtors with identical financial circumstances might be required to pay different amounts to their creditors. For example, courts differed as to whether to treat property that is exempt under Section 522(c) of the Bankruptcy Code as income under the former version of Section 1325, see In re Hunton, 253 B.R. 580, 581-582 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2000) (collecting cases), and about whether to allow school tuition to be deducted as a reasonable expense, In re Burgos, 248 B.R. 446, 450 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2000) (collecting cases).

When Congress amended the Code in 2005, it curtailed that type of discretion by delineating the types of revenue that should be counted as "income" and the types of expenses that may be counted as reasonably necessary for above-median debtors. But Congress did not require courts to rely on a debtor's historical financial data when that information does not accurately reflect the debtor's likely resources during the period covered by her bankruptcy plan.[6] Rather, Congress left unchanged the term "projected disposable income," which had previously been understood to allow consideration of a debtor's likely financial circumstances during the plan period. Congress also left intact other features of the statutory scheme (e.g., Section 1325(b)(1)(B)'s reference to income "to be received" during the plan period) that direct the bankruptcy court to consider the debtor's actual ability to pay. See pp. 16-18, supra. Congress's decision to preclude bankruptcy courts from exercising one form of discretion does not mean Congress wanted to preclude bankruptcy courts from exercising other forms of discretion, provided in separate, unamended statutory language.

[6] E.g., In re Turner, 574 F.3d at 355 ("Since the object of a Chapter 13 bankruptcy is to balance the need of the debtor to cover his living expenses against the interest of the unsecured creditors in recovering as much of what the debtor owes them as possible, we cannot see the merit in throwing out undisputed information, bearing on how much the debt-

For essentially the same reason, petitioner's argument is not advanced by his assertion (Br. 34) that Chapter 13 trustees "warned" Congress that "strict use of the Form 22C formula would lead to anomalous results in some cases, namely that above median income debtors might pay less than they would prior to BAPCPA." Here too, the change in the law to which petitioner refers has nothing to do with the manner in which disposable income is "projected." Rather, petitioner again refers to BAPCPA's establishment of new and more determinate formulae for calculating current disposable income (i.e., disposable income during the six-month pre-filing period). Some Chapter 13 trustees appear to have expressed concern prior to BAPCPA's enactment that the new formulae would often produce lower disposable-income figures for above-median debtors (and thus require such debtors to pay less to their creditors) than the prior, more discretionary regime.

or can afford to pay, that comes to light between the submission and approval of a plan of reorganization.").

See In re Alexander, 344 B.R. 742, 746-747 (Bankr. E.D.N.C. 2006). Petitioner argues that Congress was aware of such concerns and nonetheless precluded judges from exercising discretion in calculating current disposable income. But once again, petitioner cites no evidence suggesting that Congress intended to preclude (or that Chapter 13 trustees generally understood BAPCPA to preclude) bankruptcy courts from considering likely changes in a debtor's financial circumstances in calculating projected disposable income.

D. Petitioner's Mechanical Approach To Determining A Debtor's Projected Disposable Income Would Undermine The Purposes Of The Chapter 13 Bankruptcy System

Petitioner's mechanical approach to projecting a debtor's disposable income would preclude some honest debtors from filing at all and would permit other debtors with relatively abundant resources to avoid repaying their creditors what they can afford. That is not what Congress intended in creating the Chapter 13 system or in amending it in 2005.

1. Under petitioner's approach, respondent would be required to commit to make payments of $756 per month, leaving her with $1166 per month for living expenses. Pet. App. 6, 44 & n.11. That amount is $408 less than the standard deductions for housing, utilities, food, clothing, and household and personal care supplies—without even considering transportation, taxes, health care, and telecommunication expenses. Pet. App. 44 n.11. Because that approach would require respondent to commit to making payments that she cannot possibly afford, petitioner's plan is not confirmable. See 11 U.S.C. 1325(a)(6) (requiring as a condition of confirmation that "the debtor will be able to make all payments under the plan and to comply with the plan").

Petitioner acknowledges (Br. 48) that his reading of Section 1325(b)(1)(B) "may effectively deny [respondent] Chapter 13 bankruptcy relief" because she cannot propose a confirmable plan. That consequence will not be unusual among Chapter 13 debtors, many of whom are in respondent's situation. In fact, petitioner's interpretation of Section 1325(b)(1)(B) often will deny bankruptcy protection to those who need it most: debtors whose financial situation has significantly deteriorated over the six months prior to filing. Pet. App. 71-72.

Many people seek bankruptcy protection after losing a source of income or incurring an unusual and onerous expense. Such events cause financial distress precisely because they are unexpected. Section 1325(b)(1)(B) does not require bankruptcy courts to treat such events either as if they did not happen (as in the case of a recently lost job) or as if they can be expected to recur in the future (as in the case of an exceptional expense of limited duration). Instead, Section 1325(b)(1)(B) requires judges to approve a repayment plan that reflects a debtor's actual circumstances. As bankruptcy courts have recognized, "[b]ecause people are frequently forced to file for bankruptcy relief as a result of sudden life-altering events," there are "numerous debtors who would be foreclosed from seeking bankruptcy protection" if their current net incomes were mechanically projected into the future, without any consideration of their actual financial circumstances. In re Jass, 340 B.R. at 417; see Thomas J. Izzo, Projecting the Past: How the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act Has Befuddled § 1325(b) and "Projected Disposable Income," 25 Emory Bankr. Devs. J. 521, 546

(2009); cf. In re Grady, 343 B.R. 747, 752 (Bankr. N.D. Ga. 2006) ("Certainly the proponents of BAPCPA did not intend to close the bankruptcy court doors to debtors who voluntarily, and in good faith, seek to repay creditors with the funds they actually have on hand each month."). That is not what Congress intended when it enacted BAPCPA.

In other Chapter 13 cases, adoption of petitioner's mechanical approach would work unfairness to creditors. On petitioner's reading of Section 1325(b)(1)(B), a debtor who had been unemployed for six months could file a Chapter 13 petition on the eve of obtaining a new job, commit to repaying little or nothing to unsecured creditors, and still obtain an eventual discharge of his pre-petition debts. See, e.g., In re Arsenault, 370 B.R. 845, 847 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 2007) (debtor filed his Chapter 13 petition in October and did not include his yearly bonuses in the calculation of his current monthly income). Similarly, a debtor could claim a significant expense that he will not incur during the plan period. See, e.g., In re Turner, 574 F.3d at 355-356. That result is squarely at odds with one of BAPCPA's core purposes: to deter abuse of the bankruptcy system by debtors with an actual ability to repay some or all of their debts.

Petitioner observes (Br. 50) that "the results of the mechanical approach are neither consistently harsh nor weighted for or against debtors," noting that in some cases reliance on historical figures will produce "a more 'debtor-friendly' result." But it is equally true that, under the court of appeals' approach, consideration of likely changes in financial circumstances will require debtors to make higher payments in some cases and allow them to make lower payments in others. That the mechanical approach does not systematically advantage or disadvantage debtors therefore provides no basis for preferring it to the court of appeals' analysis, which also does not systematically advantage or disadvantage debtors. Unlike petitioner's mechanical approach, however, the court of appeals' interpretation of the term "projected disposable income" furthers Congress' intent that every Chapter 13 debtor be required as a condition of plan confirmation to make payments at (i.e., neither above nor below) the maximum level she can afford.

2. Petitioner observes (Pet. Br. 51) that "[t]he debtor * * * always has control over the date of the filing of the petition," and he suggests various means by which a debtor may evade the result that the mechanical approach would otherwise produce. See also NACBA Am. Br. 9. Petitioner further suggests (Pet. Br. 53) that a debtor in respondent's position may simply dismiss her case and re-file a new petition in order to avoid an unfavorable six-month look-back period. But the potential for debtors to manipulate the bankruptcy system through strategic filing is a further disadvantage of petitioner's approach, not a reason to adopt it. See 2005 House Report 5 (explaining that one of Congress's goals in enacting BAPCPA was to prevent the continued use of "loopholes and incentives that allow and—sometimes —even encourage opportunistic personal filings and abuse"). The various stratagems that petitioner suggests also run counter to the longstanding requirement that Chapter 13 plans be proposed "in good faith." 11 U.S.C. 1325(a)(7).[7]

[7] Petitioner further suggests (Br. 53-54) that respondent could have filed a Chapter 7 liquidation rather than a Chapter 13 repayment plan. In enacting BAPCPA, however, Congress sought to increase the amount of money unsecured creditors will receive from the bankruptcy

In any event, petitioner is incorrect in suggesting that debtors whose actual income is less than the "current monthly income" calculated with reference to the pre-petition six-month period generally will be able to manipulate the system so that their "projected disposable income" reflects their current or anticipated reality. Experience has shown that the principal motivation for many Chapter 13 filers is protection from mortgage foreclosure. See, e.g., In re Monson, No. 09-20487, 2009 WL 4663864, at *2 (Bankr. D. Wyo. Dec. 7, 2009); In re Snipes, 314 B.R. 898, 902 (Bankr. S.D. Ga. 2004); In re Boomgarden, 780 F.2d 657, 658-659 (7th Cir. 1985); Pamela Smith Holleman & Lesley M. Varghese, Bankruptcy and Mechanics' Lien in Foreclosure: An Overview, 91 Mass. L. Rev. 116, 117 (2008).[8] A debtor facing the threat of foreclosure usually files a bankruptcy petition not only to cure the arrearages on her mortgage, but also to take advantage of the protection offered by the automatic stay provision in 11 U.S.C. 362. Such a debtor cannot wait several weeks or months before filing a petition without risking the loss of her home. Petitioner's further suggestion that a debtor could simply dismiss and re-file her petition in order to change the court's calculation of her "current monthly income" similarly ignores the circumstances confronted by debtors who are facing foreclosure. When a debtor behaves as petitioner suggests, she may forfeit protection of the system by shifting more debtors from Chapter 7 into Chapter 13. 2005 House Report 2; id. at 12 .

automatic stay, again risking the loss of her home. See 11 U.S.C. 362(c)(3)(A).[9]

Finally, both petitioner and his amicus suggest (Pet. Br. 21-22, 51-52; NACBA Am. Br. 10, 20, 26) that a Chapter 13 debtor can evade the result mandated by the mechanical approach by deliberately failing to file a Schedule I statement of income and subsequently asking the court to set a different six-month look-back period for calculating the debtor's "current monthly income." See 11 U.S.C. 101(10A)(A)(ii) (providing that current monthly income may be calculated with reference to a six-month period ending on "the date on which current income is determined by the court * * * if the debtor does not file the schedule of current income required by 521(a)(1)(B)(ii)"). But the filing of a Schedule I is mandatory unless excused by the court, see 11 U.S.C. 521(a)(1)(B)(ii); In re Shelor, No. 08-80738C-13D, 2008 WL 4344894, at *2 (Bankr. M.D.N.C. Sept. 23, 2008), and a debtor's breach of that requirement may lead to dismissal of his petition, see 11 U.S.C. 521(i)(1); In re Dunford, 408 B.R. 489, 493 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 2009); Fed. R. Bankr. P. 1007(c). The approach that petitioner and his amicus propose therefore would encourage debtors to disregard the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code, and to place their eligibility for bankruptcy relief at risk, simply to ensure that their repayment plans reflect their actual ability to pay. Congress cannot reasonably be thought to have intended that result.

---

[9] In addition, Section 109(g) prohibits the filing of any type of bankruptcy by a debtor who has had a case pending within the preceding 180 days if the case was dismissed "for willful failure of the debtor to abide by orders of the court, or to appear before the court in proper prosecution of the case," or if the debtor had the prior case voluntarily dismissed "following the filing of a request for relief from the automatic stay."

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the court of appeals should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted.

STATEMENT OF BASIS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

This is an appeal from a judgment, dated April 27, 2009 and entered by the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of California in an adversary proceeding within the chapter 7 bankruptcy case of Betsey Warren Lebbos ("Ms. Lebbos"). The judgment denied entry of a discharge for Ms. Lebbos, pursuant to Bankruptcy Code Section 727(a)(6)(A), for willfully failing to obey two orders of the bankruptcy court, and pursuant to Section 727(a)(4)(D) for knowingly and fraudulently failing to provide properly requested documents to the trustee. [A-1, B-2].[1] The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b), and 1334(a) to enter the judgement denying Ms. Lebbos' discharge.

Ms. Lebbos filed a Notice of Appeal on May 1, 2009, which is timely under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a) and (c)(2). This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) to hear appeals from "final judgements, orders and decrees of bankruptcy judges" entered in bankruptcy cases. The judgment denying Ms. Lebbos' discharge is a "final judgment" for the purposes of this appeal.

STATEMENT OF ISSUES

The Acting United States Trustee for Region 17, Sara L. Kistler ("United States Trustee"), submits that the following three issues are presently before the Court for consideration:

---

[1] Documents in the record transmitted to the district court by the parties are identified by the designation used by Appellant in her Designation of Record on Appeal, consisting of a letter or letters followed by a number, or by the designation "UST- number" for records designated by the Appellee.

1. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by denying Ms. Lebbos' discharge, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(6)(A), based on Ms. Lebbos' failure to obey two (2) lawful orders of the court;

2. Whether the bankruptcy court abused its discretion by denying Ms. Lebbos' discharge, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D), because Ms. Lebbos knowingly and fraudulently withheld records and documents from an officer of the estate in her bankruptcy case; and

3. Whether the bankruptcy court denied Ms. Lebbos a fair trial.

APPLICABLE STANDARD OF REVIEW

On appeal from a decision of the bankruptcy court, the appellate court applies a clearly erroneous standard to the bankruptcy court's findings of fact and conducts a de novo review of conclusions of law. See Fed. R. Bankr. P. 8013; Resyn Corp. v. United States, 851 F.2d 660, 664 (3d Cir. 1988); In re Jersey City Medical Center, 817 F.2d 1055, 1059 (3d Cir. 1987); In re Winthrop Nurseries, Inc., 50 F.3d 72, 73 (1st Cir. 1995).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Factual Basis for Denial of Discharge

Ms. Lebbos moved to Redding, California on or about May 14, 2006, in connection with the sale of her business "Lawyer Defend Yourself" to a Redding businessman. Part of the sale agreement was that Ms. Lebbos would assist in running the business for the following two years, and she would be paid approximately $6,000 per month from the business proceeds. On June 26, 2006, Ms. Lebbos filed a chapter 7 bankruptcy case in the Eastern District of California, and the case was assigned Number 06-22225–D-7. (B-2)

Attorney Darryl Alvey ("Attorney Alvey") was Ms. Lebbos' attorney of record in her bankruptcy case. Prior to commencing the case, Ms. Lebbos reviewed her bankruptcy documents and signed a statement of correctness regarding the accuracy of the information that she had provided. She then signed the petition, schedules and statement of financial affairs in front of Attorney Alvey. (B-2,3)

Linda Schuette ("Trustee Schuette") was appointed as the chapter 7 trustee in the case. The first meeting of creditors for the bankruptcy case was scheduled for July 19, 2006, in Redding, California ("Creditors' Meeting"). In connection with her responsibilities in administering Ms. Lebbos' case, Trustee Schuette faxed a letter to Attorney Alvey on July 5, 2006 ("July 5th Letter"), which requested the production of specific documents by July 12, 2006, in advance of the Creditors' Meeting. The documents requested by Trustee Schuette were:

1) Tax returns for 2000-2005 for ''Lawyer Defend Yourself";
2) Ms. Lebbos' personal tax returns for 2003-2005;
3) Tax returns for 1996 through 2005 for all trust entities for which Ms. Lebbos was a beneficiary, trustee or administrator;[2]
4) Purchase documents for the sale of the business "'Lawyer Defend Yourself";
5) Cancelled checks for all accounts on which Ms. Lebbos had signing authority;
6) Copies of all trust documents for trusts Ms. Lebbos had signed on from

---

[2] Among the information requested by Trustee Schuette was documentation to verify Ms. Lebbos' interest in a condominium located in Long Beach, California. Trustee Schuette had been provided with information suggesting that Ms. Lebbos transferred her interest in the condominium to a trust prior to filing her bankruptcy case. During the pendency of her case, Ms. Lebbos alleged that she was never "really" the owner of the condominium, but she has never provided the documents to support this claim.

1996; and

7) Copies of all documents regarding any real property transactions Ms. Lebbos participated in from 1996.

In the event that Ms. Lebbos did not have any of the requested documents, the July 5th Letter requested an explanation of why they were not in her possession, together with and the names of contact people who would have them. (B-3)

Ms. Lebbos failed to provide any of the requested documents, or her tax return and payment advices, to Trustee Schuette a week before the Creditors' Meeting, as required by 11 U.S.C. § 521. Ms. Lebbos appeared at the Creditors' Meeting on July 19, 2006, with Attorney Alvey, but she did not bring any of the documents previously requested by Trustee Schuette. According to Ms. Lebbos, certain of the requested documents were located in either San Jose or Long Beach, California, and she would have to travel to retrieve them. The Creditors' Meeting was continued on the record to October 18, 2006, in Redding, California, in order to allow Ms. Lebbos to travel to San Jose or Long Beach to recover the documents. (B-3) Ms. Lebbos did not appear at the continued Creditors' Meeting on October 18, 2006. In fact, the Creditors' Meeting was continued at least nine times in order to afford Ms. Lebbos an adequate opportunity to comply with the statutory requirements imposed on her as a chapter 7 debtor. She never appeared again after the first Creditors' Meeting. (DD-204-209, 213)

On August 4, 2006, Ms. Lebbos sent Trustee Schuette two of the documents requested in the July 5th Letter, but nothing more.[3] On or about August 14, 2006, Ms. Lebbos moved from Redding to Saratoga, California. On December 1, 2006, Ms. Lebbos moved to San Jose, California. Each time she moved, Ms. Lebbos traveled by car. (B-4).

Based on Ms. Lebbos' failure to voluntarily satisfy the statutory requirements imposed on her, Trustee Schuette filed a motion to compel Ms. Lebbos to produce the documents requested in the July 5th Letter and to appear at the continued Creditors' Meeting. A hearing on the motion to compel was conducted on January 3, 2007. The court permitted Ms. Lebbos to appear and participate in the hearing by telephone. (B-4)

Following the hearing, the bankruptcy court entered an order, dated January 19, 2007 ("January 19th Order"), which directed Ms. Lebbos to appear at the continued Creditors' Meeting on February 21, 2007 in Redding, California. The January 19th Order also required her to produce at the Creditors' Meeting all documents requested by Trustee Schuette in the July 5th Letter, that were in her possession, custody or control. The bankruptcy court clerk served a copy of the January 19th Order on Ms. Lebbos at the address provided by her to the court. (DD-236) Ms. Lebbos did not appeal this order.

Ms. Lebbos did not appear at the continued Creditors' Meeting on February 21, 2007. (B-4) She alleged that she was not able to appear because she was serving a sentence of house arrest in San Jose, California, which resulted from Ms. Lebbos having practiced law without a license.[4] Therefore, according to Ms. Lebbos, she was not able to travel to Redding for the Creditors' Meeting. In response to Ms. Lebbos' allegations regarding her house arrest sentence, Trustee Schuette directed her attorney, Michael Dacquisto ("Daquisto"), to contact Ms. Lebbos' probation officer. Contrary to Ms. Lebbos' assertions, her probation officer advised Dacquisto that Ms. Lebbos could, in fact, leave the jurisdiction to attend to court matters. (DD-212)

On March 14, 2007, Trustee Schuette filed a motion, pursuant to Rule 2005 of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure ("Fed. R. Bankr. P."), seeking to have Ms. Lebbos taken into custody by the United States Marshall and brought for examination in Redding, California. The bankruptcy court held a hearing on this motion on April 25, 2007. Ms. Lebbos participated in the hearing by telephone. (B-4)

Throughout the pendency of her bankruptcy case, Ms. Lebbos has alleged that she suffers from heart and lung disabilities which restrict her ability to travel. However, she has not consented to the United States Trustee and Trustee Schuette verifying her medical condition by refusing to allow access to her medical providers for examination. (FF-304) Nonetheless, as a result of Ms. Lebbos' alleged infirmities, the bankruptcy court decided not to enter an order under Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2005, during the hearing on April 25, 2007. Rather, to accommodate Ms. Lebbos, the court ordered Trustee Schuette and her counsel travel to San Jose, California, where Ms. Lebbos was residing at the time. The court allowed Trustee Schuette to conduct an examination of Ms. Lebbos at the United States Trustee's office in the San Jose courthouse, pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 2004 ("Rule 2004 Examination"). (B-4) The parties discussed the possibility of scheduling the Rule 2004 Examination in late May 2007. During this discussion, Ms. Lebbos never informed the court or the parties that she would not be able to appear on May 31, 2007, nor did she mention any plans to move before May 31, 2007. (DD-214) Following the hearing, the bankruptcy court entered an order on May 10, 2007, which directed Ms. Lebbos to appear for the Rule 2004 Examination at 280 South First Street, Room 130, San Jose, California, on May 31, 2007 ("May 10th Order"). The May 10th Order further required Ms. Lebbos to produce all remaining documents requested by the Trustee in the July 5th Letter. The bankruptcy court clerk served a copy of the May 10th Order on Ms. Lebbos at the address provided by her to the court. Ms. Lebbos did not appeal this order. (B-4)

On May 26, 2007, Ms. Lebbos moved once again. This time, she relocated to southern California, and, again, she traveled by car. She also sent a letter to Trustee Schuette, by regular mail, stating that she would no longer be in San Jose, California, and would not be available for the Rule 2004 Examination on May 31, 2007. On May 31, 2007, Ms. Lebbos moved again, this time to Long Beach, California. Ms. Lebbos failed to appear for the Rule 2004 Examination on May 31, 2007, and she failed to provide the documents requested by Trustee Schuette, as directed by the May 10th Order. (B-5)

On November 14, 2007, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Ninth Circuit ("Bankruptcy Appellate Panel") entered a decision resolving Ms. Lebbos' appeals from three orders entered in her bankruptcy case. This decision affirmed the bankruptcy court's denial of Ms. Lebbos' requests for (1) the transfer of venue of her bankruptcy case, (2) the disqualification of Bankruptcy Judge Robert Bardwil ("Judge Bardwil"), and (3) the dismissal of Ms. Lebbos' bankruptcy case.[5] (UST-2, pg 3)

Procedural Facts

Based on her conclusion that Ms. Lebbos had repeatedly failed to comply with the minimum requirements imposed on her as a chapter 7 debtor, the United States Trustee commenced an adversary proceeding against Ms. Lebbos on February 7, 2008. The United States Trustee's complaint in the adversary proceeding sought a denial of Ms. Lebbos' discharge, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(4)(D) and (a)(6)(A), based on her failure to comply with two bankruptcy court orders and her refusal to turn over the documents requested in the July 5th Letter. The United States Trustee timely served the summons and complaint on Ms. Lebbos on February 8, 2008. Pursuant to Fed. R. Bankr. P. 7012(a), Ms. Lebbos was required to answer the complaint within thirty (30) days of the summons issue date, or by March 8, 2008. (C-9, C-10)

On February 25, 2008, Ms. Lebbos filed a motion requesting a stay of the adversary proceeding, pending the resolution of appeals that she had filed in the main bankruptcy case. The bankruptcy court denied Ms. Lebbos' request for a stay by memorandum decision, entered on February 28, 2008. (UST-3, pg 21, docket # 7, 10)

On March 10, 2008, Ms. Lebbos filed a motion seeking to dismiss the adversary proceeding. The motion to dismiss also requested sanctions against the United States Trustee based on the alleged filing of a frivolous lawsuit and intentional discrimination against the disabled. The United States Trustee objected to the motion, and the bankruptcy court denied the relief requested in the motion in an order entered on April 23, 2008. (UST-3, pg 23, docket #27)

On June 4, 2008, the United States Trustee filed a request for entry of default in the adversary proceeding based on Ms. Lebbos' failure to file an answer to the complaint. In response to the United States Trustee's request, the court clerk entered a default on June 5, 2008. (UST-3, pg 22, docket # 20, 23)

The following day, June 6, 2008, Ms. Lebbos filed an answer to the complaint and an affidavit seeking disqualification of Judge Bardwil. (UST-3, pg 23, docket #27) On June 16, 2008, Ms. Lebbos filed a motion requesting that the court set aside her default. In an effort to extend to Ms. Lebbos every opportunity to defend herself, the United States Trustee did not oppose the motion to set aside the default. Consequently, the bankruptcy court entered an order on August 15, 2008, which set aside Ms. Lebbos' default in the adversary proceeding. (UST-3, pg 24, docket # 48)

In the interim, the bankruptcy court entered an order on June 18, 2008, denying Ms. Lebbos' request for the disqualification of Judge Bardwil. (UST-3, pg 23, docket #30, 31) Ms. Lebbos appealed this decision to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel.[6] On August 12, 2008, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel entered an order which denied Ms. Lebbos' request for leave to appeal, finding that the bankruptcy court order was interlocutory. The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel dismissed the appeal. (Appendix I)

On August 14, 2008, the bankruptcy court entered a scheduling order in the adversary proceeding and set a pretrial conference for February 19, 2009. The order required that both parties file and serve a pre-trial statement on the other side, no later than 7 days before the pre-trial conference. (UST-3, pg 24, docket # 47) The United States Trustee filed a pre-trial statement and served it on Ms. Lebbos on February 12, 2009. (AA-188)

On February 19, 2009, the United States Trustee's counsel appeared at the pre-trial conference. Ms. Lebbos did not appear. However, attorney John Read made a "special appearance" on her behalf. That same day, the bankruptcy court entered a "Notice and Order for Trial," which scheduled the trial in the adversary proceeding for April 23, 2009. The Notice and Order for Trial also directed Ms. Lebbos to file and serve on the United States Trustee, no later than March 6, 2009, a list of all exhibits for trial (each identified and numbered) and a list of all witnesses to be called at trial. The Notice and Order for Trial further stated "[a]ny individual that is not named on the list of witnesses, will not be allowed to testify at trial, and any document that is not indicated on the list of exhibits, will not be allowed into evidence at trial." (UST-1, pg 1,2)

On February 23, 2009, four days after the pre-trial conference, Ms. Lebbos filed a document entitled "Pre-Trial Statement." This statement did not set forth a list of witnesses or trial exhibits. Ms. Lebbos did not file any other document which contained a list of witnesses or exhibits to support her defense at the trial. (BB-193)

On March 20, 2009, Ms. Lebbos filed a motion to (1) change the venue of the adversary proceeding, (2) disqualify Judge Bardwil, and (3) continue the trial in the adversary proceeding. She set the motion for hearing on April 22, 2009, the day before the trial date. (W-167) The United States Trustee opposed the motion, asserting that Ms. Lebbos had failed to provide any evidence to support a continuance or change of venue, and that the request for disqualification had been previously asserted and denied. (X-177, Y-184) The bankruptcy court held a hearing to address the motion on April 22, 2009, and Ms. Lebbos participated in the hearing by telephone. (FF-296) After consideration of the motion, reply and argument, the bankruptcy court denied Ms. Lebbos' motion orally, and very clearly informed Ms. Lebbos that the trial would proceed the next day. (Z-187)

On April 23, 2009, Ms. Lebbos did not appear, in person, by telephone or through counsel at the trial. Counsel for the United States Trustee introduced witnesses and presented evidence in support of the relief requested in the complaint. The court asked some additional questions of the witnesses and admitted the exhibits into evidence, as there were no objections. (GG-308) At the conclusion of the trial, the court found for the United States Trustee, and directed that a Findings of a Fact and Conclusion be prepared and submitted. (A-1) On April 27, 2009, the bankruptcy court entered a Judgment in favor of the United States Trustee on its causes of action pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(4)(D) and (a)(6)(A). (B-2) Ms. Lebbos' appeal from that judgment is the matter now pending before this Court.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in entering a judgment in favor of the United States Trustee on her causes of action under 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(4)(D) and (a)(6)(A). Despite having been given every opportunity to participate in her trial, Ms. Lebbos failed to comply with the Notice and Order for Trial and she failed to appear for the trial. By her own actions, she prevented the bankruptcy court from considering any evidence she may have had in defense of the United States Trustee's complaint.

With regard to the cause of action under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(6)(A), the court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the United States Trustee satisfied the burden of demonstrating that Ms. Lebbos knowingly refused to obey the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order. The bankruptcy court also did not abuse its discretion in finding no merit in Ms. Lebbos' explanation of her failure to comply with the orders. With regard to the cause of action under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D), the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion in deciding that Ms. Lebbos knowingly and fraudulently withheld from Trustee Schuette the documents requested in the July 5th Letter. As a result, the decision to deny Ms. Lebbos' discharge, pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 727(a)(6)(A) and (a)(4)(D), was not an abuse of discretion.

Ms. Lebbos has argued that she did not receive a fair trial because the bankruptcy judge refused to disqualify himself from presiding over the case, he refused to transfer the venue of the case and he declined to dismiss the case. These arguments are without merit because they were previously raised and decided in a November 14, 2007 decision of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Ninth Circuit. Nor would these arguments have any merit even if this Court were to review them. Ms. Lebbos' further arguments that she did not receive a fair trial also lack merit. For these reasons, the bankruptcy court judgment should be affirmed.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION BY DENYING MS. LEBBOS' DISCHARGE PURSUANT TO 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(6)(A)

Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(6)(A), a chapter 7 debtor may be denied a discharge if she has "refused," in her bankruptcy case, "to obey any lawful order of the court, other than an order to respond to a material question or to testify."

> The term used in § 727(a)(6)(A) is "refused" not "failed." Accordingly, the Court must find that the [debtor's] lack of compliance with the relevant court order was willful and intentional. The party objecting to discharge satisfies this burden by demonstrating the debtor received the order in question and failed to comply with its terms. Such a showing then imposes upon the debtor an obligation to explain his non-compliance.

Smith v. Jordan (In re Jordan), 521 F.3d 430, 433 (4th Cir. 2008) (citations omitted).

The plaintiff seeking the denial of a discharge for a debtor's refusal to obey a lawful court order must show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the court issued an order directed at the debtor, that the order was lawful, that the order was not one requiring a response to a material question or to testify, and that the debtor refused to obey the order. In re Green, 335 B.R. 181, 183 (Bankr. D. Utah 2005); see Magar v. United States Trustee (In re Magar), No. 7:07CV00111, 2007 WL 2220517, *2 (D. W. Va. July 31, 2007) (stating that "[t]he United States Trustee may meet [her] burden by demonstrating that the debtor received the order in question and failed to comply with its terms").

A. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Concluding that the United States Trustee Satisfied her Burden of Demonstrating Ms. Lebbos' Refusal to Comply with Two Orders

The bankruptcy court entered two (2) orders, which Ms. Lebbos willfully refused to obey. Both the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order directed Ms. Lebbos to appear for her continued Creditors' Meeting and produce the documents requested in the July 5th Letter from Trustee Schuette. Both of the orders were issued following noticed hearings, in which Ms. Lebbos participated. She had every opportunity to contest the orders, both before and after they were issued. Both orders were served on Ms. Lebbos by the bankruptcy court clerk's office at the address provided by her to the court. The orders were also docketed on the official case docket. Ms. Lebbos did not appeal, or otherwise challenge, either of the orders. Consequently, they are lawful orders of the court, which she was bound to obey.

Additionally, both the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order are specifically directed to Ms. Lebbos, the debtor in the underlying case. Both orders required Ms. Lebbos to produce documentation and appear at a specific location, on a specific date and time, for an examination by Trustee Schuette. However, neither order directs Ms. Lebbos to answer any specific questions, nor does it impinge on Ms. Lebbos' ability to claim her privileges under the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution nor any other right or privilege. The January 19th Order and the May 10th Order merely require that Ms. Lebbos appear for examination and produce certain documentation.

Significantly, the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order imposed no further requirements on Ms. Lebbos than those which are already expressly set forth in the Bankruptcy Code. Section 343 of the Bankruptcy Code states that "the debtor shall appear and submit to examination under oath at the meeting of creditors under section 341(a) of this title. . . ." Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 521(a)(3), a chapter 7 debtor shall "cooperate with the trustee as necessary to enable the trustee to perform the trustee's duties under this title." Section 521(a)(4) requires each debtor to "surrender to the trustee all property of the estate and any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, relating to property of the estate . . . ." Additionally, 11 U.S.C. § 521(e)(2)(A) requires a debtor to provide to the chapter 7 trustee, not later than seven days before the first date set for the meeting of creditors, a copy of her tax return for the most recent year ending before the year in which she filed her petition.

The documents requested by the July 5th Letter relate directly to Ms. Lebbos' interest in property of her bankruptcy estate. Therefore, as set forth above, the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order directed Ms. Lebbos to do nothing that is not already required of her by the express language of the Bankruptcy Code.

In defiance of the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order, Ms. Lebbos refused to produce all but two of the documents requested by Trustee Schuette, and she failed to appear for the continued Creditors' Meetings. Both the bankruptcy court and Trustee Schuette made every effort in this case to accommodate Ms. Lebbos. The Creditors' Meeting was continued at least nine (9) times in order to afford Ms. Lebbos adequate time and opportunity to recover the requested documents and appear for her examination. Some of the Creditors' Meetings were scheduled with several months between them to provide Ms. Lebbos with enough time to collect the requested documentation. Despite the fact that Ms. Lebbos voluntarily chose to file her case in the Eastern District of California, the court repeatedly permitted Ms. Lebbos to appear by telephone to participate in court matters because she claimed that her compromised health prohibited her from traveling. In a further effort to prevent Ms. Lebbos from having to travel, the May 10th Order directed Trustee Schuette and her counsel to travel to San Jose, California to conduct the Rule 2004 Examination. Five days before the scheduled date for the Rule 2004 Examination, however, Ms. Lebbos moved, without notice, from San Jose to southern California. Despite the repeated attempts by the court and Trustee Schuette to facilitate the administration of her case, Ms. Lebbos simply refused to satisfy, and even actively evaded, the basic requirements imposed on her as a chapter 7 debtor. Consequently, the bankruptcy court properly concluded that the United States Trustee satisfied the burden of demonstrating that Ms. Lebbos willfully and intentionally failed to comply with the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Concluding that Ms. Lebbos Did Not Satisfy her Burden of Explaining her Failure to Comply with the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order

Ms. Lebbos failed to appear at her trial. Consequently, she introduced no evidence, produced no witnesses, and made no objections. Further, even if she had appeared, she would not have been allowed to introduce any evidence or present witness testimony, as she had not complied with the bankruptcy court's Notice and Order for Trial. While she has made many assertions, the simple fact is that the record is completely devoid of any evidence to support her claims.

Even if Ms. Lebbos had participated in her trial and been allowed to present evidence, her defense is without merit because she has not adequately explained her failure to comply with the bankruptcy court's orders. First, she claimed that her house arrest prohibited her from appearing at the Creditors' Meeting scheduled by the January 19th Order. However, Ms. Lebbos' probation officer confirmed that the terms of her sentence permitted her to leave the jurisdiction for court matters. Second, Ms. Lebbos contends that her production of two (2) of the documents requested by Trustee Schuette satisfied her obligations under the January 19th Order and the May 10th Order. However, the orders directed the production of all remaining documents, and Ms. Lebbos' selective compliance with those directives is not adequate. Finally, Ms. Lebbos has repeatedly argued that she suffers from medical conditions which prohibited her from traveling to recover the documents requested by Trustee Schuette and to appear at her Creditors' Meeting. The bankruptcy court correctly found this to be an inadequate defense.

Ms. Lebbos has moved four (4) times since she commenced her bankruptcy case. Each time she moved, she traveled by car. Significantly, because Ms. Lebbos was living in San Jose, California when the bankruptcy court entered the May 10th Order, the order required Trustee Schuette to travel to San Jose to conduct the Rule 2004 Examination. The May 10th Order scheduled the Rule 2004 Examination for May 31, 2009. Despite the accommodations made by the court and Trustee Schuette, Ms. Lebbos moved away from San Jose to southern California just five days before the Rule 2004 Examination was to take place, perhaps in an effort to avoid it. Moreover, although she argued that she was unable to travel for the Rule 2004 Examination, she traveled on May 31, 2009, the scheduled date for the examination, when she moved again to Long Beach, California.

Additionally, Ms. Lebbos has argued that she has not been able to retrieve some of the documents requested in the July 5th Letter because they are located in San Jose and Long Beach California, and it would be too difficult for her to travel to obtain the documents. However, since the commencement of this case, Ms. Lebbos has lived for extended periods in both San Jose and Long Beach.

Quite evidently, Ms. Lebbos' inability to travel is selective. The history of this case reveals that she is certainly able to travel when she feels that doing so will serve her interests. While she claims to suffer from certain medical conditions, her actions suggest otherwise, and she refuses to waive her doctor-patient privilege and allow access to her medical providers for examination. Ms. Lebbos' conclusory and self-serving allegations are not an adequate defense to a claim under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(6)(A). Coleman v. Simpson (In re Coleman), No. L-04-786, 2005 WL 3877408 (D. Md. March 23, 2005) (denying debtor's discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(6)(A) based on debtor's failure to appear at creditors' meeting when her explanation of why she did not appear was based on conclusory, unsupported allegations of misconduct by appellee).

The production of documents relating to estate assets and the appearance at a Creditors' Meeting are among the most basic and fundamental requirements imposed on chapter 7 bankruptcy debtors. The January 19th Order and the May 10th Order required no more of Ms. Lebbos than that which is expressly required by the Bankruptcy Code. Ms. Lebbos has not provided a reasonable explanation for her refusal to comply with these lawful orders. Consequently, the bankruptcy court correctly concluded that Ms. Lebbos had not satisfied her burden under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(6)(A) and properly denied her discharge on this basis. See In re Onubah, 375 B.R. 549, 557 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2007) ("The integrity of [the bankruptcy] process requires, among other things, that a debtor fully disclose all assets and liabilities when the petition is filed, provide the trustee with financial records, surrender all property of the estate to the trustee, cooperate with the trustee's administration of the estate, comply with the Bankruptcy Code's exemption scheme, and obey the bankruptcy court's lawful orders.").

II. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION BY DENYING MS. LEBBOS' DISCHARGE PURSUANT TO 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D)

Section 727(a)(4)(D) of the Bankruptcy Code provides for the denial of a debtor's discharge when the debtor "knowingly and fraudulently, in or in connection with the case[,] withheld from an officer of the estate entitled to possession under this title, any recorded information, including books, documents, records, and papers, relating to the debtor's property or financial affairs." "The focus of § 727(a)(4)(D) is on the debtor's duty to maintain and turn over recorded information which bears upon the debtor's financial condition and business affairs." Mitan v. Taunt (In re Mitan), No. 06-15114, 2007 WL 1424225 (E.D. Mich. May 10, 2007) (affirming bankruptcy decision to deny discharge under § 727(a)(4)(D) because debtor "refused to turn over documents, alleged that they were confiscated after the Meeting of Creditors, and then demanded formal discovery proceedings rather than comply with his obligations").

In Soliman v. Smith (In re Soliman), No. 2:07-cv-469-GEB, 2008 WL

802484, *2 (E.D. Cal. March 24, 2008), the chapter 7 trustee requested copies of all agreements relating to real property owned by the debtor that was rented or leased. Although the debtor leased certain property, he failed to provide the requested lease agreement. Id. As a result, the bankruptcy court denied the debtor's discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D). Id. On appeal, the debtor argued that the bankruptcy court's findings were clearly erroneous because there was insufficient evidence that the debtor knowingly and fraudulently withheld the lease agreement, the debtor's withholding of the lease agreement was not material, and that the trustee never specifically asked for the lease agreement. Id. The District Court for the Eastern District of California affirmed the bankruptcy court's decision because, on appeal, the debtor did not show that the bankruptcy court's findings were not "plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Id. (quoting Bradley v. Ingalls (In re Bradley), 501 F.3d 421, 434 (5th Cir. 2007) ("when the bankruptcy court's weighing of the evidence is plausible in light of the record taken as a whole, a finding of clear error is precluded, even if we would have weighed the evidence differently.").

A. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Concluding that the United States Trustee Satisfied Her Burden Under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D)

As the bankruptcy court concluded, Ms. Lebbos was given more than a reasonable opportunity to obtain the documents requested by Trustee Schuette in the July 5th Letter, and she simply refused to do so. As is demonstrated by Ms. Lebbos' numerous appeals, evasive conduct and refusal to cooperate, the failure to produce the requested documents was a deliberate, knowing and fraudulent attempt to evade her statutory obligations.[7]

---

[7] Attached is a list of many, but not all, of Ms' Lebbos' appeals. (Appendix I)

Pursuant to 11 U.S.C. §§ 521(a)(3), (a)(4) and (e)(2)(A), Ms. Lebbos was required to cooperate with Trustee Schuette by turning over the requested documents. The obligations imposed by these provisions are basic requirements which apply equally in every chapter 7 case. All of the documents requested in the July 5th Letter are expressly required by the Bankruptcy Code. For this reason, no justification exists for a failure to provide them when they are properly requested and more than adequate time is given to obtain them. Nonetheless, Ms. Lebbos simply failed to turn over all but two (2) of the documents requested in the July 5th Letter.

Ms. Lebbos' conduct in connection with the document production request more closely resembles that of an individual trying to evade applicable bankruptcy requirements than a debtor who is honestly seeking bankruptcy relief and a fresh start. She claimed that many of the documents requested by Trustee Schuette were located in San Jose and Long Beach, California and she could not recover them because traveling to these locations would be too difficult. Since the commencement of the case, however, Ms. Lebbos has actually lived in San Jose and Long Beach for extended periods of time without obtaining the requested documents and forwarding them to Trustee Schuette. The apparent access Ms. Lebbos had to the requested documents reveals that her refusal to turn them over was a knowing and fraudulent attempt to keep them from Trustee Schuette.

B. The Bankruptcy Court Did Not Abuse its Discretion in Concluding that Ms. Lebbos' Defense to the Cause of Action Under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D) Lacked Merit

Ms. Lebbos was aware of the trial in this case and the requirements imposed upon her in connection with the trial. Nonetheless, she failed to comply with the Notice and Order for Trial and she did not appear and participate in the trial. In Ms. Lebbos' absence, the United States Trustee presented evidence and witness testimony. The bankruptcy court weighed the evidence and correctly concluded that a denial of discharge was appropriate under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D).

In addition to the fact that Ms. Lebbos deliberately and knowing failed to participate in her trial, the decision to deny her discharge was correct because Ms. Lebbos' defense lacks merit. Throughout the pendency of her case, Ms. Lebbos has never challenged the request for documents by Trustee Schuette on the basis that those documents do not exist, that they are privileged, or that they are otherwise not appropriate for turnover. Rather, Ms. Lebbos only argues that the task of obtaining them for turnover is too onerous, given her medical condition.

As set forth in detail above, the medical conditions which allegedly preclude Ms. Lebbos from traveling appear only to affect her when the obligation to travel is imposed by the court or Trustee Schuette. Considering this fact with Ms. Lebbos' unsubstantiated assertions of improprieties against the court, the United States Trustee and Trustee Schuette, as well as Ms. Lebbos' numerous and duplicative appeals of decisions in her case, it appears that Ms. Lebbos' refusal to turnover the requested documents is driven by her desire to delay the administration of her case, rather than by her health conditions.

For these reasons, the bankruptcy court properly concluded that Ms. Lebbos' defense to the cause of action under 11 U.S.C. § 727(a)(4)(D) lacked merit and denied Ms. Lebbos' discharge on that basis. Because this conclusion is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, this Court should affirm the bankruptcy court's decision. In re Soliman, 2008 WL 802484, at *2.

III. THE BANKRUPTCY COURT DID NOT DENY MS. LEBBOS A FAIR TRIAL

Ms. Lebbos argues that she was denied a fair trial for three reasons. Each of these arguments is without merit.

A. The Bankruptcy Court did not Abuse its Discretion by Denying Ms. Lebbos' Motions for Disqualification of Judge Bardwil, Transfer of Venue and Dismissal of her Case

Ms. Lebbos argues that her bankruptcy case should have been dismissed because she never reviewed and signed her bankruptcy petition before it was filed. She further argues that Judge Bardwil should have been disqualified from presiding over her case. Finally, she contends that the venue of her case should be transferred, as she is no longer living within the jurisdiction of the Eastern District of California.

Ms. Lebbos raised all of these arguments before the court in her bankruptcy case, and the bankruptcy court denied her requests for relief on each of these matters. Ms. Lebbos appealed these decisions to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel. Pursuant to this appeal, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Ninth Circuit entered a decision on November 14, 2007.[8] This decision by the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel analyzed each of the arguments asserted by Ms. Lebbos and affirmed the bankruptcy court's denial of each of her requests. Consequently, Ms. Lebbos' arguments in this regard have already been conclusively decided on appeal, and under the principles of res judicata, there is no reason to revisit them.

B. Ms. Lebbos Misunderstands Judicial Notice of her Bankruptcy

---

[8] As set forth above, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel decision, dated November 14, 2007, was entered in the following Bankruptcy Appellate Panel appeals: EC-07-1163; EC-07-1174; and EC-07-1203. A copy of the decision is contained in the Appellee's Excerpts of Record, UST -2.

Docket to be Judicial Notice of Arguments and Disputed Facts Set Forth in the Documents Contained in the Record

Ms. Lebbos asserts that the bankruptcy court took judicial notice of the record in the entire case, including both adversary proceedings. She further asserts that, because the Judge Bardwil failed to consider the contents of every document she filed as true, he treated her unfairly. These assertions have no legal or factual support.

Judicial notice of the filing of a document does not equate to a finding that everything contained in the document is true or persuasive. There is a difference between taking judicial notice of the existence of certain documents, and the finding that the contents are true. In re Earl, 140 B.R. 728, 731 n.2 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 1992). The documents contained in the bankruptcy docket are public documents and, therefore, the court may take judicial notice of them. See U.S. v. Southern California Edison Co., 300 F. Supp.2d 964, 974 (E.D. Cal. 2004). While a court may take judicial notice of a public document, it may not take judicial notice of the veracity of the arguments and disputed facts contained therein. Id. (citing U.S. ex rel Robinson Rancheria Citizens Council v. Borneo, Inc., 971 F.2d 244, 248 (9th Cir. 1992)). Likewise, the court may not take judicial notice of one party's opinion of how a matter of public record should be interpreted. Id. However, the statements contained within documents filed by a party may be treated as party admissions under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2). In re Moore, 269 B.R. 864 (Bankr. D. Idaho 2001).

Based on this authority, Ms. Lebbos' argument regarding judicial notice appears to be a confusion of the difference between judicial notice of the bankruptcy docket and judicial notice of arguments and disputed facts contained in those documents. While taking judicial notice of the docket, the weight of the disputed facts and arguments in those documents was left to the bankruptcy court's discretion. The bankruptcy court's decisions in that regard are not clearly erroneous.

C. Ms. Lebbos Incorrectly Asserts that there is No Party Plaintiff in this Case

Ms. Lebbos asserts that there is no real plaintiff in the complaint. Ms. Lebbos' belief appears to result from the bankruptcy court clerk's naming of the party plaintiff on the summons as the "United States Trustee." However, the complaint clearly names the plaintiff in this case as "Sara L. Kistler, Acting United States Trustee." See 28 U.S.C. § 581(a)(17) (creating district); 11 U.S.C. § 727(c)(1) (stating that United States Trustee may object to discharge). This argument is entirely without merit. Additionally, Ms. Lebbos failed to raise this argument before the bankruptcy court. Consequently, it should be disregarded.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the United States Trustee respectfully requests that the Court affirm the judgment entered by the bankruptcy court on July 27, 2009.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Pursuant to this Court's order of October 21, 2003, the United States Trustee files this response to a petition for a writ of mandamus that seeks to compel the bankruptcy court to authorize a chapter 11 debtor in possession, Lincoln Hospital, to employ Weinstein, Eisen, Weiss & Rothschild LLP as "disinterested" bankruptcy counsel under 11 U.S.C. 327(a).

Also pending is a direct appeal requesting similar relief, In re Lincoln Hospital, No. 03-56260. On November 3, 2003, the Court ordered appellants in that case to show cause why the appeal should not be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. On November 24, 2003, the United States Trustee filed a response arguing that In re SS Retail Stores Corp., 162 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 1998), requires dismissal of that appeal. On November 26, 2003, appellants filed a reply and petition for en banc hearing. Under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 35(e), the United States Trustee will not respond to that petition unless directed by the Court to do so.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. Under 11 U.S.C. 327(a), a debtor-in-possession, "with the court's approval, may employ one or more attorneys * * * that do not hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate, and that are disinterested persons" (emphasis added).

The Bankruptcy Code defines “disinterested person” as someone who “does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate * * * by reason of any _direct or indirect_ relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor * * * _or for any other reason_.” 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E) (emphasis added).

This mandamus proceeding challenges a bankruptcy court’s decision denying the application of a chapter 11 debtor in possession, Lincoln Hospital, to employ Weinstein, Eisen, Weiss & Rothschild LLP (WEWR) as counsel. On November 18, 2002, Lincoln Hospital filed for chapter 11 bankruptcy under 11 U.S.C. 1101, _et seq._, and applied for authorization to employ WEWR under 11 U.S.C. 327(a).[1] The bankruptcy court denied that application, and held that WEWR could not represent Lincoln Hospital because it possessed a conflict of interest.

[1] Under 11 U.S.C. 1107, a debtor in possession has all relevant rights of a trustee under 11 U.S.C. 1106, including the right under 11 U.S.C. 327(a) to request bankruptcy court authorization to employ counsel. Like a trustee, the fiduciary duties of a debtor in possession differ from those of a normal corporation because they run first to the estate’s creditors. _See_ _CFTC v. Weintraub_, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985) (“[I]f a debtor remains in possession * * * the debtor’s directors bear * * * [a] fiduciary obligation to [the] creditors and shareholders.”); _In re McConville_, 110 F.3d 47, 49 (9th Cir. 1997) (describing debtors in possession as fiduciaries “owing a duty of care and loyalty to the estate’s creditors”).

The bankruptcy court relied on the fact that WEWR’s principal partner, David Weinstein, was scheduled to testify in an ongoing adversary proceeding against Lincoln’s chief financial officer and treasurer, Bryan Weiss, and against Lincoln’s president, John Carvelli. Carvelli, in addition to managing Lincoln Hospital, indirectly owned one-third of its stock. The adversary proceeding was brought against Weiss and Carvelli by the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors in a separate chapter 11 case, wherein California Psychiatric Management Services (CPMS) was the debtor in possession.[2]

In the adversary proceeding, the CPMS Creditors Committee alleged that Weiss and Carvelli misappropriated $1.5 million from CPMS when they served on CPMS’s management committee. Under 11 U.S.C. 541(a)(1), the claims against Weiss and Carvelli were property of the CPMS bankruptcy estate, and CPMS, as the debtor in possession, held both the claims and the original right to sue on them. A stipulation between CPMS and the CPMS Creditors Committee, which the bankruptcy court approved, authorized the CPMS Creditors Committee to sue Weiss

[2] See 11 U.S.C. 1102, 1103 (providing for the creation and powers of creditors committees). According to petitioners, on April 4, 2003, after all the here-relevant events occurred, CPMS’s case converted to chapter 7 liquidation. Mand. Pet. 5.

and Carvelli on CPMS's behalf.[3] That stipulation granted the CPMS Creditors Committee authority to prosecute such litigation "for the benefit of the Estate." Stip. ¶ 1 (emphasis added). It also required the CPMS Creditors Committee to "consult with and consider the opinions of [the debtor, CPMS]." Id. at ¶ 2.

The stipulation between CPMS and the CPMS Creditors Committee further prescribed that CPMS, as the owner of the estate's claims, must "cooperate with the Committee, to the extent necessary and appropriate in the prosecution" of claims like those against Weiss and Carvelli. Ibid. Under the stipulation, CPMS retained title to any damages that might be recovered from Weiss and Carvelli.

Independent of the stipulation, because WEWR was judicially appointed as CPMS's counsel under 11 U.S.C. 327(a), WEWR had a legal duty to assist in the prosecution of CPMS's claims against Weiss and Carvelli. CPMS's fiduciary duties as a debtor in possession ran to its creditors, and those duties

---

[3] The Third Circuit has held that creditors committees may obtain judicial permission to litigate legal claims held by debtors in possession, like CPMS's claim against Weiss and Carvelli. Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of Cybergenics Corp. ex rel. Cybergenics Corp. v. Chinery, 330 F.3d 548 (3d Cir. 2003) (en banc). The correctness of that ruling is not presented by this mandamus proceeding.

required CPMS to aid in pursuing claims like those brought against adverse parties such as Weiss and Carvelli.

At a hearing concerning the application to employ WEWR — an application filed by Weiss and Carvelli as Lincoln Hospital's management — the CPMS Creditors Committee objected. The CPMS Creditors Committee argued that WEWR should not be allowed to work for Lincoln Hospital when one of WEWR's clients stood in adverse litigation against Lincoln Hospital's management and major shareholder. The CPMS Creditors Committee told the bankruptcy court that "[w]e don't understand how [WEWR] can on the one hand represent Lincoln Hospital, whose principals are responsible for stealing money from CPMS, while at the same time agreeing to cooperate with us in the prosecution of claims against these self-same individuals." 11/20/03 Bankr. Hr'g 20. "[WEWR] will be serving two masters here — with opposing interests." 11/21/03 Bankr. Hr'g 9. The United States Trustee agreed that WEWR could not be employed under 11 U.S.C. 327(a).[4]

---

[4] United States Trustees are officials of the Department of Justice appointed by the Attorney General to supervise the administration of bankruptcy cases and trustees. See 28 U.S.C. 581-589; In re Columbia Gas Sys., Inc., 33 F.3d 294, 296 (3d Cir. 1994) (United States Trustees oversee the bankruptcy process, protect the public interest, and ensure that bankruptcy cases are conducted according to law) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, 109 (1977)). "The United States Trustee is the 'watchdog' of the bankruptcy system * * * charged with

Upon hearing both sides' arguments, the bankruptcy court exercised its discretion under 11 U.S.C. 327(a) to disapprove WEWR's employment. The bankruptcy court concluded that WEWR's relationship to the lawsuit against Weiss and Carvelli "is putting [WEWR] in an obvious conflict * * * , and so I'm not going to approve. It's pretty rare that I do this, but in this situation * * * I think I'm doing you a favor. You don't believe it at the moment, but it is — I think it is putting you in a serious conflict position. And without any question about your integrity, * * * it's putting you in * * * that position of conflict." 11/21/03 Bankr. Hr'g 24-25. On December 12, 2002, the bankruptcy court issued a written order memorializing the denial of Lincoln Hospital's application to employ WEWR.

On December 2, 2002, debtor in possession Lincoln Hospital filed an application under 11 U.S.C. 327(a) seeking authorization to retain as counsel Levene, Neale, Bender, preventing fraud and abuse and with 'fill[ing] the vacuum' caused by possible creditor inactivity." In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002). Section 307 of the Bankruptcy Code authorizes the United States Trustee to appear and be heard on the propriety of retaining WEWR in this case. See 11 U.S.C. 307; In re Donovan Corp., 215 F.3d 929 (9th Cir. 2000) ("The United States trustee may * * * intervene and appear at any level of the proceedings from the bankruptcy court on, * * * as either a party or an amicus.") (internal quotation marks omitted).

Rankin & Brill, LLP. On December 27, 2002, the bankruptcy court approved Levene’s employment. Levene has served since that date as Lincoln Hospital’s counsel, and Lincoln Hospital has not expressed any dissatisfaction with that representation.

B. On June 18, 2003, the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Ninth Circuit unanimously affirmed the bankruptcy court’s decision, though it disagreed with the bankruptcy court’s “choice of nomenclature.” BAP Op. 10. The BAP held that “[a]ppellants are technically correct that the facts here present no actual conflict,” because WEWR never represented Weiss or Carvelli individually “and owed no duty of loyalty to them.” Id. at 8. Nevertheless, “as the bankruptcy court recognized,” the BAP noted that “a law firm’s relationship with a corporation is necessarily conducted through its officers.” Ibid. In this case, the BAP found that “WEWR’s representation of Lincoln would be controlled by Carvelli and Weiss, the very individuals against whom [WEWR’s principal partner] might have to testify” — and the very individuals in whose prosecution CPMS agreed to cooperate, with resultant “possibilit[ies] of sharing legal theories and other sensitive information.” Ibid.

The BAP noted that "[t]he decision whether to approve an employment application is fundamentally discretionary, and is based on the facts of each case." BAP Op. 9. The BAP held that the bankruptcy court did not abuse its discretion here because, according to statutory text, "being disinterested requires more than the absence of an actual or a potential conflict." Ibid. It requires the absence of any materially adverse interest, due to "direct or indirect relationship to * * * the debtor," or "for any other reason." Ibid. (quoting 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E)). Noting bankruptcy courts' authority "to further the integrity (and perceived integrity) of the bankruptcy process," the BAP concluded that the bankruptcy court "did not exceed the broad scope of 101(14)(E)" in disqualifying WEWR as counsel.

C. On July 18, 2003, WEWR filed a notice of appeal from the BAP's ruling. See In re Lincoln Hospital, No. 03-56260. On August 5, 2003, Lincoln Hospital and WEWR filed this petition for mandamus.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The bankruptcy judge and the BAP panel properly held that WEWR's links to CPMS disqualified it from representing Lincoln Hospital. Petitioners' request for mandamus addresses only the fact that WEWR's principal partner was to testify against Weiss and Carvelli. But that is only a small part of the justification for denying WEWR’s employment under 11 U.S.C. 327(a). Most importantly, WEWR was legal counsel to CPMS. CPMS held a contractual and fiduciary responsibility to help pursue — and win — its claim against Weiss and Carvelli. And WEWR, as CPMS’s court-approved counsel under 11 U.S.C. 327(a), was bound to assist its client in doing just that. Indeed, CPMS had pledged to “cooperate” with the CPMS Creditors Committee in prosecuting actions like that against Weiss and Carvelli. The Bankruptcy Code does not allow WEWR to pursue claims against individuals in one bankruptcy case, yet take orders from those same individuals in another case. The undeniably intimate links between WEWR, CPMS, and two high-ranking Lincoln Hospital executives create a serious actual conflict, potential for conflict, and appearance of conflict, each of which bankruptcy courts have broad authority to prevent.

Also critical is the fact that Carvelli is a one-third beneficial owner of Lincoln Hospital. This means that WEWR lacked the “disinterestedness” required by the Bankruptcy Code under 11 U.S.C. 327(a) and 101(14)(E). As the BAP properly noted, “being disinterested requires more than the absence of an actual or potential conflict.” BAP Op. 9. Because Carvelli beneficially owns 33% of Lincoln Hospital, WEWR's paid professional allegiance to CPMS, including the latter's duty to pursue claims against Carvelli, constitutes an interest adverse to an "equity security holder[]" of Lincoln Hospital, in violation of 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E).

Even if the bankruptcy court's judgment were mistaken, the decision to disqualify WEWR is not the sort of extraordinarily clear legal error that warrants a writ of mandamus. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that "the remedy of mandamus is a drastic one * * * . Only exceptional circumstances, amounting to a judicial usurpation of power, will justify the invocation of this extraordinary remedy." Allied Chem. Corp. v. Daiflon, Inc., 449 U.S. 33, 34-35 (1980) (per curiam) (internal quotation marks omitted). Nothing in this case approaches that standard. Circumstances required a quick decision by the bankruptcy court regarding WEWR's employment. The bankruptcy court's decision was based on facts (most importantly WEWR's commitment to CPMS) that reasonably support a finding of inadequate disinterestedness, actual adversity, potential adversity, and apparent adversity with respect to Lincoln Hospital's equitable owner (Carvelli), and Lincoln Hospital itself through its individual officers. The BAP, composed of three bankruptcy judges, properly reviewed the initial bankruptcy court’s conclusion and unanimously affirmed the discretionary judgment that WEWR should not be counsel in the Lincoln Hospital case.

Petitioners are correct that, under this Circuit’s cases, direct appellate review is not available to correct a legal error in disqualifying or approving bankruptcy counsel. See In re SS Retail Stores Corp., 162 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 1998). Any quarrel regarding this Court’s finality jurisprudence, however, would require en banc consideration in the context of petitioners’ direct appeal. To apply mandamus jurisdiction in this case would constitute an inappropriate end run around this Court’s prior decisions, and would present an improper mechanism for resolving any unfairness that might arise under this Court’s cases. Certainly, the absence of appellate jurisdiction due solely to application of this Court’s finality jurisprudence is not enough to justify a writ of mandamus, especially when the decision to be reviewed is highly discretionary and substantively reasonable. “[T]he party seeking mandamus has the burden of showing that its right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable.” Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 485 U.S. 271, 289 (1988) (internal quotation marks omitted). WEWR and Lincoln Hospital never acknowledge the existence of that significant burden, and they do not succeed in carrying it.

ARGUMENT

I. The Bankruptcy Court Properly Exercised Its Discretion In Declining To Authorize WEWR's Employment

1. Under 11 U.S.C. 327(a), bankruptcy courts may approve attorneys' employment only if two conditions are satisfied: the attorneys do not "hold or represent an interest adverse to the estate," and are "disinterested persons." Although the term "interest adverse to the estate" is not explicitly defined by the Bankruptcy Code, "disinterested person" is a person who, inter alia, "does not have an interest materially adverse to the interest of the estate or of any class of * * * equity security holders, by reason of any direct or indirect relationship to, connection with, or interest in, the debtor." 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E).

This Circuit has not had occasion to analyze 11 U.S.C. 327(a) in detail, but other circuits have, and there is consensus that bankruptcy courts exercise substantial discretion and judgment in deciding whether to approve a professional's employment.[5] The Seventh Circuit has explained

[5] See, e.g., In re Interwest Bus. Equip., Inc., 23 F.3d 311, 315 (10th Cir. 1994) (applying an abuse of discretion standard on direct appeal); In re Harold & Williams Dev. Co., 977 F.2d 906, 909-10 & n.2 (4th Cir. 1992) (same); In re BH & that "[t]ogether, the statutory requirements of disinterestedness and no adverse interest to the estate serve the important policy of ensuring that all professionals appointed * * * tender undivided loyalty and provide untainted advice and assistance." In re Crivello, 134 F.3d 813, 836 (7th Cir. 1998). The Tenth Circuit also has noted that high standards of undivided loyalty are indispensable given counsel's duty "to survey the landscape in search of property of the estate, defenses to claims, preferential transfers, fraudulent conveyances and other causes of action that may yield a recovery to the estate." In re Interwest Bus. Equip., Inc., 23 F.3d 311, 316 (10th Cir. 1994) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also, e.g., In re AroChem Corp., 173 F.3d 610, 621 (2d Cir. 1999) (noting that, under 11 U.S.C. 327(a), "the attorney must not represent an adverse interest relating to the services which are to be performed").

As the Tenth Circuit also noted, "[t]he jaundiced eye and scowling mien that counsel for the debtor is required to cast upon everyone * * * will likely not fall upon the party with whom he has a potential conflict." Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added); see also In re Prince, 40

P, 949 F.2d 1300, 1312-13 (3d Cir. 1991) (same); In re Martin, 817 F.2d 175, 181-83 (1st Cir. 1987) (same).

F.3d 356, 361 (11th Cir. 1994) (disqualifying attorneys whose clients possess "either an economic interest that would tend to lessen the value of the bankruptcy estate or that would create either an actual or potential dispute in which the estate is a rival claimant * * * or * * * a predisposition under the circumstances that render such a bias against the estate") (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added).

That view coheres with 11 U.S.C. 327(a)'s textual provision that debtors "may" employ attorneys, but only "with the court's approval." Chapter 11 debtors in possession differ substantially from non-debtor corporations because a bankrupt's fiduciary duties run to its creditors' benefit, not the debtor's. See CFTC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985); In re McConville, 110 F.3d 47, 49 (9th Cir. 1997). For that reason, bankruptcy courts, not debtors, exercise ultimate discretion and gatekeeping authority over who "may" be employed as bankruptcy counsel under 11 U.S.C. 327(a).

2. Here, Lincoln Hospital and WEWR focus exclusively on the fact that WEWR's principal partner was scheduled to testify against Weiss and Carvelli. As troubling as that fact may be, more important is WEWR's professional duty to represent CPMS and to assist the CPMS Creditors Committee in recovering damages against Weiss and Carvelli. Although WEWR and Lincoln Hospital claim that WEWR’s partner was never called as a witness against Weiss and Carvelli and that the CPMS Committee “misrepresented its intentions to the bankruptcy court and the United States Trustee,” those claims are not accompanied by record citations. See Mand. Pet. 22. And even if true, such arguments do not support any inference that the bankruptcy court’s decision was improper given the information available to the court at the time the bankruptcy court entered its order denying employment.

In contrast, all facts necessary to support the bankruptcy court’s judgment are undisputed. During the relevant period, WEWR was CPMS’s general bankruptcy counsel under 11 U.S.C. 327(a) with a fiduciary duty to pursue legal claims for CPMS’s creditors (Weintraub, 471 U.S. at 355; Mand. Pet. 5), CPMS agreed to cooperate with the CPMS Creditor Committee in litigating against Weiss and Carvelli (Mand. Pet. 6), such litigation was undertaken for the financial benefit of the CPMS estate (ibid.), and Carvelli was a one-third indirect shareholder of Lincoln Hospital (id. 7 n.5). Although petitioners note that WEWR would not, even if approved, have formally represented Weiss and Carvelli (id. at 16, 24), that does not support petitioners’ broader claim that “WEWR and its clients have no interest in the outcome” of the litigation against Weiss and Carvelli, nor their claim that such litigation "has nothing to do with Debtor whatsoever" (id. at 21).

On the contrary, at the time of the bankruptcy proceeding, CPMS had an economic stake in, and a contractual and fiduciary duty to pursue, significant monetary litigation against Weiss and Carvelli. Indeed, the adversary proceeding pursued by the CPMS Creditors Committee, brought on CPMS's behalf and with CPMS's cooperation, was undertaken for the sole benefit of the CPMS estate. It blinks reality for petitioners to suggest that a $1.5 million lawsuit against two of Lincoln Hospital's high-ranking executives "has nothing to do" with that company's financial interests. Mand. Pet. 21. The conflict at issue was only magnified by the fact that, in this case, "WEWR's representation [of Lincoln] would be controlled by Carvelli and Weiss" personally. BAP Op. 8.

As the bankruptcy court understood, and the BAP unanimously affirmed, those circumstances would have saddled Lincoln Hospital's creditors with counsel that, in making day-to-day decisions about Lincoln's bankruptcy case, would have simultaneously "serv[ed] two masters * * * with opposing interests." 11/21/03 Bankr. Hr'g 9 (statement of CPMS Creditors Committee). Such facts created an actual conflict between the interest of WEWR’s ongoing client, CPMS, in maximizing recovery against Weiss and Carvelli, and the interests of WEWR’s proposed client, Lincoln Hospital, whose management was being sued.

3. The potential for conflict also was present. See, e.g., In re Interwest Business Equip., Inc., 23 F.3d at 316. The possible testimony of WEWR’s partner only illustrates the kind of litigative support that CPMS, in “cooperating” with the CPMS Creditors Committee, may well have desired, and that Weiss and Carvelli, through their management of Lincoln Hospital, might well have opposed. WEWR could not be authorized to provide professional services in light of such probable cross-purposes.

Petitioners’ insistence that WEWR might not have any information adverse to the CPMS Creditors Committee misses the point. Mand. Pet. 22. The necessary confidence between attorney and client is sufficiently damaged when there is potential for adverse interests on either side. See In re Prince, 40 F.3d at 361; In re Interwest Bus. Equip., Inc., 23 F.2d at 315. It might be that WEWR, in the course of representing Lincoln Hospital, would need to learn sensitive information about Weiss and Carvelli. Or it might be that WEWR already had information regarding the CPMS Creditors Committee that Lincoln Hospital and its managers would like to know. It is irrelevant how WEWR might address those sorts of potential conflicts. Whether WEWR would share information with the adverse party, would keep existing confidences, or would avoid obtaining useful (but delicate) information in the first place, it is highly realistic to believe that the relationship between WEWR and Lincoln Hospital could be put at risk. To avoid such realistic potential for conflict, 11 U.S.C. 327(a) allows bankruptcy courts to deny authorization of employment.

4. Finally, there was, at a minimum, an appearance of conflict here. The courts of appeals have divided on whether the mere appearance of conflict (as opposed to more serious potential and actual conflicts) is enough to support a professional's disqualification. Compare In re Vouzianas, 259 F.3d 103 (2d Cir. 2001) (yes) with In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d 463, 476 (3d Cir. 1998) (no). Here, this Court need not decide that question because the abundant appearance of conflict only corroborates the existence of potential and actual conflicts, and negates the propriety of mandamus jurisdiction, see infra Part II (requiring petitioners to demonstrate a "clear and indisputable" entitlement to relief). The CPMS Creditors Committee objected to WEWR’s employment by Lincoln Hospital on the ground that WEWR’s proposed association with Weiss’s and Carvelli’s employer might affect WEWR’s willingness or ability to counsel CPMS to cooperate in suing those two high-level managers.

Similarly, if WEWR’s employment had been approved, Lincoln Hospital’s creditors might have feared that Weiss and Carvelli could be in a position to use WEWR’s employment for personal benefit rather than the benefit of Lincoln’s creditors. Regardless of whether such events would actually have occurred, Lincoln Hospital’s creditors had a right to prophylactic assurance that the attorneys charged with representing their interests would do so fairly and impartially. Bankruptcy courts have no obligation, under such circumstances, to ignore damage to a bankruptcy proceeding’s apparent integrity.

5. Independent of conflicting interests, the BAP was also correct that the bankruptcy court’s decision is justified on grounds of “disinterestedness.” Although conflicts of interest may tend to indicate a lack of disinterestedness, see Mand. Pet. 28 (collecting cases), no court has ever held that the two standards are coterminous. On the contrary, Congress in enacting 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E) made clear its intent to expand the available bases for disqualification beyond simply interests adverse to the estate. See TRW, Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19, 31 (2001) ("It is a cardinal principle of statutory construction that a statute ought, upon the whole, to be so construed that * * * no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant."). Specifically, subsection (14)(E) provides that counsel is not "disinterested" when it, like WEWR, holds an interest adverse to a major "equity security holder," like Carvelli — who indirectly owns one-third of Lincoln Hospital. See 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E) (providing that, to be disinterested, counsel may not be adverse to equity security holders). Here, WEWR is adverse to Lincoln Hospital's principal security holder. That constitutes a text-book lack of disinterestedness under 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E); consequently, WEWR was properly denied employment under 11 U.S.C. 327(a).

Conflicts with high-level management personnel raise similar concerns, in that WEWR would again be in a situation where the interests of its clients would point in contradictory directions. See generally In re Marvel Entertainment Group, Inc., 140 F.3d at 476 ("A plain reading of this section suggests that one is a 'disinterested person' only if he has no interest that is materially adverse either for one of the specific reasons delineated in the statute or 'for any other reason.'") (emphasis added).

In response, Lincoln Hospital and WEWR rely only on general assertions that debtors in possession should have the privilege of selecting their own counsel. Mand. Pet. 12, 16. As the BAP correctly noted, however, it is wholly impermissible for a debtor to choose any counsel, unless that counsel is disinterested and holds no interest adverse to the estate. See 11 U.S.C. 327(a). Moreover, when a debtor enters bankruptcy, the Code interposes 11 U.S.C. 327(a) in order to erect procedural and substantive protections, each of which specifically limits ordinary flexibility to select one's own preferred counsel. The important interest that petitioners overlook is the Bankruptcy Code's goal of obtaining impartial counsel who can be trusted to deal responsibly with the estate's assets and with the myriad fiduciary tasks that arise in the course of doing so. See, e.g., In re Crivello, 134 F.3d at 836; In re Interwest Bus. Equip., Inc., 23 F.3d at 316; see also CTFC v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 355 (1985) (noting that debtors in possession have fiduciary obligations to creditors and shareholders).

WEWR's appointment was not necessarily in the best interests of Lincoln Hospital's creditors, and those creditors have not appeared in support of this mandamus petition. Lincoln Hospital was managed for the benefit of its creditors by two men, Weiss and Carvelli, whose own significant legal problems demanded considerable time and attention. In that circumstance, Lincoln Hospital’s creditors particularly needed the debtor to be represented by indisputably disinterested counsel. At best, WEWR’s duty to help litigate claims against Lincoln Hospital’s management in an unrelated case would have caused tension between those managers and the attorneys litigating against them. At worst, Lincoln Hospital’s creditors might have feared that Weiss and Carvelli could use Lincoln Hospital’s retention of WEWR to improve their individual chances of avoiding a $1.5 million personal judgment. In either instance, there was no legitimate basis for burdening Lincoln Hospital’s creditors with WEWR’s professional baggage, particularly when competent and conflict-free counsel was readily available, and quickly approved. The bankruptcy court’s refusal to authorize WEWR’s employment was arguably commendable, based both on actual and potential risks to the estate and the proceedings’ integrity. That decision certainly did not constitute clear error in the context of the bankruptcy court’s substantial gatekeeping authority and discretion to authorize professional employment under 11 U.S.C. 327(a).

II. Even If The Bankruptcy Court Erred, Mandamus Is Not Appropriate

Lincoln Hospital and WEWR seriously misconstrue the circumstances under which mandamus is available. Although petitioners correctly cite the five standards articulated by this Court’s decision In re Canter, 299 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2002), petitioners overlook the long-established principle that “[m]andamus is a drastic remedy that should be invoked only in extraordinary circumstances.” Calderon v. United States Dist. Court, 107 F.3d 756 (9th Cir. 1997) (quoting Armster v. United States Dist. Court, 792 F.2d 1423, 1431 (9th Cir. 1986)). Mandamus is “an extraordinary remedy that may be obtained only in order to confine an inferior court to a lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction or to compel it to exercise its authority when it is its duty to do so.” Cordoza v. Pacific States Steel Corp., 320 F.3d 989, 998 (9th Cir. 2003) (internal quotation marks omitted). “A judicial readiness to issue the writ of mandamus in anything less than an extraordinary situation would run the real risk of defeating the very policies sought to be furthered” by Congress’s decision to authorize appellate review at the end of a trial or not at all. Kerr v. United States Dist. Court, 426 U.S. 394, 403 (1976); see also Bankers Life & Cas. Co v. Holland, 346 U.S. 379, 383-84 (1953) (same). “In short, our cases have answered the question as to the availability of mandamus in situations such as this with the refrain: ‘What never? Well hardly ever!’” Allied Chem. Corp. v. Daiflon, Inc., 449 U.S. 33, 36. “We have held that the party seeking mandamus has the burden of showing that its right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable.” Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 485 U.S. 271, 289 (1988). Such reluctance to apply the extraordinary writ is at its zenith in cases like this one, where the decision under review is highly discretionary. Indeed, Allied Chemical Corp., 449 U.S. at 36, held that almost always, “[w]here a matter is committed to discretion, it cannot be said that a litigant’s right to a particular result is ‘clear and indisputable.’”

Under Canter, the five applicable factors to be applied in determining whether an extraordinary case warrants mandamus relief are whether: (i) there exist other adequate means of relief, (ii) the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in an uncorrectable way, (iii) the district court’s order is clearly erroneous, (iv) the error often repeats, and (v) the error raises new and important problems. Canter, 299 F.3d at 1153.

With respect to the first of those factors, the availability of other modes of relief, it is quite true that this Circuit’s case law denies the possibility of review on appeal. The controlling precedent is In re SS Retail Stores Corp., 162 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 1998). In SS Retail, this Court held that where a bankruptcy court authorizes appointment of counsel under 11 U.S.C. 327(a), that order is interlocutory and is not an appealable “final order,” even under bankruptcy’s flexible standards of finality. Id. at 1232. There is no principled distinction for finality purposes between judicial orders authorizing appointment of counsel and those that refuse such authorization.

Lincoln Hospital and WEWR correctly note that this Court’s decision in SS Retail conflicts with rulings issued by other circuits, which have held that orders regarding professional employment are appealable final orders. See, e.g., In re Pillowtex, Inc., 304 F.3d 246, 250 (3d Cir. 2002); In re Arochem Corp., 176 F.3d 610, 619-20 (2d Cir. 1999). In SS Retail, the United States Trustee argued that decisions by a bankruptcy court to authorize or deny employment often evade any form of appellate review if they are not reviewed immediately. See In re SS Retail Stores Corp. 216 F.3d 882, 885 (9th Cir. 2000) (denying appellate review after final judgment). This Court, however, adopted a different approach. Under SS Retail, if a bankruptcy court errs in such bankruptcy employment decisions, it is possible that counsel who are disinterested might be denied work unfairly or — far more importantly — that counsel who are not disinterested might be allowed to continue in place, with corresponding damage to the actual and perceived impartiality of the bankruptcy proceeding as a whole.

The oddity of petitioners' position is that they interpret SS Retail's denial of appellate review as a bare invitation to seek mandamus review. That end run is inapt. Interlocutory decisions regarding bankruptcy counsel are not in any sense "extraordinary." Indeed, petitioners' interpretation of mandamus could cause the full gamut of employment challenges — i.e., those alleging erroneous authorizations and those claiming wrongful denials of professional employment — to be filed as mandamus petitions. Petitioners cite no court of appeals that has chosen such a path. To create such a broad new category of mandamus review would lie in serious tension with the writ's traditionally narrow limits. Moreover, because mandamus is an inherently equitable remedy, Independence Min. Co., Inc. v. Babbitt, 105 F.3d 502, 505 (9th Cir. 1997), expanding its prevalence as a means of obtaining review would risk providing less certain access to appellate courts.

One category of disparity that this Court should especially avoid, even if mandamus is granted in this case, is applying unduly lenient review of bankruptcy court orders that deny professional employment and unduly restrictive review to orders granting such authorization. As cases like this one and SS Retail illustrate, creditors and the United States Trustee sometimes object that professional employment is improper under 11 U.S.C. 327(a) and 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E). After this Court's decision in SS Retail, however, whenever bankruptcy courts deny those objections, it has seemed evident that such denials are not immediately reviewable by direct review or by mandamus. If, however, the Court in this case decides that mandamus is an appropriate means of obtaining relief, it may be important to clarify that mandamus is available in both circumstances.

The equitable factors at stake, if anything, weigh more in favor of appellate review for erroneous approvals of employment like SS Retail, rather than erroneous denials, like this one. In most denials, the debtor quickly proposes a substitute, and, as here, that substitute is competent and indisputably disinterested. Thus, in case of error, the only party with mentionable harm from a denial is often the professional herself. In the case of an erroneous grant, in contrast, a not-disinterested professional, or one with an material adverse interest, might continue representation and thereby heap upon the estate significant risks of loss and irrevocable abuse. The United States Trustee does not believe that mandamus is a proper vehicle for reviewing employment orders in either circumstance. If this Court disagrees, however, the Bankruptcy Code's basic fairness commends strongly in favor of a rule that would expressly allow at least as much opportunity for appellate review by opponents of a bankruptcy court's retention order as exists for those who argue in favor of such orders.

The second Canter factor, prejudice, also does not weigh strongly in favor of mandamus, because the primary harm cognizable under the Bankruptcy Code is damage to the estate or the parties. No such prejudice pertains here, as is evident from Lincoln Hospital's quickly retaining substitute counsel, which is undeniably disinterested and serving ably. To the contrary, this Court's exercise of discretionary mandamus review must take into account the fact that replacing present counsel at this late date could be fundamentally unfair to creditors because Levene's knowledgeable, engaged, and indisputably proper service would be displaced by WEWR, which has been out of this case for twelve months.

The prejudice primarily relied upon by Lincoln Hospital and WEWR is the right to appoint one’s own counsel. As discussed infra, that “right” does not exist in bankruptcy except within the established boundaries 11 U.S.C. 327(a), applied as an exercise of the bankruptcy court’s discretion. Contrary to petitioners’ characterization, the bankruptcy court’s order in this case did not assume, and the BAP did not affirm, a “free form veto over a debtor’s selection of counsel,” based on what the bankruptcy court simply “felt.” Mand. Pet. 20, 23. On the contrary, both courts looked to WEWR’s troubling relationship with Weiss, Carvelli, Lincoln Hospital, and CPMS, and to CPMS’s adverse interests regarding two high-ranking officers and one large equity holder in Lincoln Hospital. Such factors are well within the range of considerations that courts should use in applying 11 U.S.C. 327(a) and 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E). Although petitioners suggest that Lincoln Hospital “has already been prejudiced by being deprived of experienced counsel of its choosing, who was immersed in the facts, circumstances and crises of the case,” Mand. Pet. 14, there is no suggestion that any prejudice of that sort — if it existed at all — would be alleviated by reinserting WEWR into a bankruptcy case that is now handled by a law firm that indisputably satisfies 11 U.S.C. 327(a).

The third Canter factor, clear error, has been addressed supra in Part I. The arguments of WEWR and Lincoln Hospital on this point have three basic flaws. First, petitioners entirely fail to address the interrelationship between WEWR and CPMS, and focus only on the potential duties of WEWR partner’s as a witness. E.g., Mand. App. 14-16. Second, they misconstrue the term “disinterested” under 11 U.S.C. 101(14)(E) as meaning “actual conflict.” Compare Mand. App. 18 (“[W]hat logically must follow is that is one does not bear a conflict of interest * * * then one * * * is ‘disinterested’ under 327(a), upon a showing that the remaining factors set forth in 101(14 [other than 101(14)(E)] are met.”), with supra at I.5. Third, they assume that Lincoln Hospital lacks any interest in the private litigation of Weiss and Carvelli, even though Lincoln Hospital is personally managed by Weiss and Carvelli. And petitioners assume that WEWR lacks any interest in that same litigation, even though WEWR’s client CPMS owns the claim, must help prosecute it, and would receive any damages recovered. See Mand. Pet. 16, 21. Because the bankruptcy court did not err, much less commit plain error (a standard much more lenient than even abuse of discretion), mandamus relief is inappropriate.

The fourth factor, whether the error is "oft-repeated" does not weigh strongly in favor of mandamus relief, both because (as petitioners concede, Mand. Pet. 22) there is no record of repetition in this case, and because treating employment orders as interlocutory and unreviewable on appeal is the direct result of a Ninth Circuit case prescribing that result. Again, it is hard to square why eminently ordinary bankruptcy employment cases such as this one should be deemed insufficiently final to warrant appellate review, but should qualify for the "extraordinary" relief of mandamus jurisdiction.

Under the fifth Canter factor, legal novelty, the issue of whether disqualification under 11 U.S.C. 327(a) requires an actual conflict of interest is not especially novel (or difficult). Indeed, the most novel aspect of this petition is the jurisdictional argument.

In conclusion, although some of the Canter factors could be read to support mandamus jurisdiction, none of them does so with appreciable weight. Moreover, the Supreme Court has repeatedly explained that "the party seeking mandamus has the burden of showing that its right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable." Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 485 U.S. 271, 289 (1988). Petitioners have not carried that burden; thus, under the extremely high standards for a writ of mandamus, the absence of any "clear and indisputable" error by the bankruptcy court is dispositive.

As has been discussed supra, the bankruptcy court identified serious problems arising from the fact that WEWR was actively representing another client, CPMS, in litigation against a Lincoln Hospital equity holder and high-ranking officers of Lincoln Hospital. Under such circumstances, WEWR was not "disinterested," and had actual, potential, and apparent conflicts of interest. Accordingly, the bankruptcy court did not err, much less did it commit the sort of "judicial usurpation of power" for which mandamus is typically reserved.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, appellant's petition for mandamus should be denied.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 157(a) and (b) over 1) the underlying case, a voluntary bankruptcy filed by David B. Lorenz under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code[1] and 2) the motion by Mr. Lorenz for an award of attorney's fees against the United States Trustee pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2412 [the Equal Access to Justice Act ("EAJA")]. The bankruptcy court denied the motion for EAJA fees by order entered on November 30, 2007. Excerpt of Record ("ER") 311-13. On December 10, 2007, Mr. Lorenz filed a timely notice of appeal of this final order, ER 314, and an election to have the appeal heard by this court, ER 319. This court has jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

STATEMENT OF THE ISSUE

Did the bankruptcy court abuse its discretion when it ordered that EAJA fees should be denied because the United States Trustee's actions in Mr. Lorenz's case were substantially justified?

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

I. Nature of the Case

This appeal challenges a bankruptcy court's order that denied an EAJA award to Mr. Lorenz. The United States Trustee filed a motion to dismiss Mr. Lorenz's bankruptcy case for abuse pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). The bankruptcy court denied the motion after an evidentiary hearing. Mr. Lorenz then filed a timely motion for an award of attorney's fees under EAJA. The bankruptcy court sua sponte denied the motion for EAJA fees, finding that the United States Trustee's motion was substantially justified. This appeal followed.

---

[1] The Bankruptcy Code is codified in 11 U.S.C. § 101 et seq.

II. Statement of Facts

A. Statutory Background

An individual who seeks to discharge his past debts may file a petition under chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C.§ 701, et seq. By filing such a petition, the individual "commences" a bankruptcy case and becomes a "debtor." See 11 U.S.C. §§ 301(a), 101(13). Congress enacted sweeping changes to the Bankruptcy Code in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (the "BAPCPA"). Most of the provisions of the BAPCPA were effective for cases filed on and after October 17, 2005.

Congress enacted new section 707(b)(3) in the BAPCPA. Prior to that amendment, section 707(b) authorized courts to dismiss cases when granting debtors chapter 7 relief would constitute a "substantial abuse." 11 U.S.C. § 707(b) (superceded). In evaluating whether substantial abuse existed under old section 707(b), courts considered both the debtor's conduct and the debtor's ability to repay debts outside bankruptcy or through a chapter 13 repayment plan. See, e.g., In re Kelly, 841 F.2d 908, 914-15 (9th Cir. 1988); In re Stewart, 175 F.3d 796 (10th Cir. 1999); In re Lamanna, 153 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998); In re Krohn, 886 F.2d 123 (6th Cir. 1989). Most courts, including the Ninth Circuit, recognized that a debtor's ability to repay a portion of his debts was the predominant factor. Id.

Congress substantially rewrote section 707(b) in the BAPCPA. Among other things,

> 1. Congress lowered the standard for dismissal under all subsections of new section 707(b) from "substantial abuse" to mere "abuse."
>
> 2. Congress eliminated a statutory presumption in favor of granting the relief requested by the debtor.
>
> 3. Congress enacted new section 707(b)(2) which creates a presumption of abuse against certain debtors when a mathematical formula, known as the "Means Test," yields monthly disposable income that exceeds a statutory trigger.[2]
>
> 4. Congress enacted new section 707(b)(3) which allows courts to dismiss cases based upon either a debtor's bad faith conduct, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A), or the totality of the debtor's financial circumstances, 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B).

Compare 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(superceded) to 11 U.S.C. §§ 707(b)(1), (2) and (3).

Section 707(b)(3)(A) allows dismissal for "bad faith" misconduct. Alternatively, section 707(b)(3)(B) of the BAPCPA codifies that aspect of pre-2005 case law that mandated dismissal of chapter 7 cases when debtors had the ability to repay a portion of their debt. See, e.g., Hebbring v. United States Trustee, 463 F.3d 902 (9th Cir. 2006) (affirming dismissal under old section 707(b) because the debtor had $615 available each month to pay creditors).

Sections 707(b)(3)(A) and (B) of the BAPCPA clarify that cases can be dismissed either solely for misconduct or solely based upon a debtor's ability to repay his or her debts. See, e.g., In re Henebury, 361 B.R. 595, 607 (Bankr. S.D. Fla. 2007). Thus, under section 707(b)(3)(B), debtors' cases should be dismissed whenever the evidence establishes that they can make a meaningful effort to pay their debt - either (a) outside bankruptcy, or (b) through a chapter 11 or chapter 13 repayment plan. See 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(1) (allowing a court to dismiss a case for abuse, or allowing the court and the debtor to agree that the case should be converted to chapter 11 or chapter 13 instead). See also H.R. Rep. 109-31 at 5 & n.18 (2005), reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 88, 92 (Congress enacted section 707(b) to issue a "clear mandate requiring these debtors to repay their debts.").

[2] Individual Chapter 7 debtors with primarily consumer debts are required to file Official Form B22A, titled "Statement of Current Monthly Income and Means Test Calculation" (the "Means Test Form"). 11 U.S.C. § 521 and 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(C). The Means Test Form provides financial information for use in evaluating whether or not the presumption of abuse arises.

In commenting upon an identical version of section 707(b)(3)(B) proposed by a prior Congress but not enacted into law, Senator Grassley, the sponsor, explained that section 707(b)(3) allows dismissal based upon the ability to repay factors described in "such" pre-reform cases as In re Lamanna. 146 Cong. Rec. S11683, 11700 (Dec. 7, 2000) (Statement of Sen. Grassley). Under In re Lamanna and similar "such" cases, courts could consider a number of financial factors, including factors that evaluated a debtor's ability to repay debts both outside bankruptcy and through chapter 13:

> Among the factors to be considered in deciding whether a debtor is needy is his ability to repay his debts out of future earnings. That factor alone may be sufficient to warrant dismissal. For example, a court would not be justified in concluding that a debtor is needy and worthy of discharge, where his disposable income permits liquidation of his consumer debts with relative ease. Other factors relevant to need include whether the debtor enjoys a stable source of future income, whether he is eligible for adjustments of his debts through Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, whether there are state remedies with the potential to ease his financial predicament, the degree of relief obtainable through private negotiations, and whether his expenses can be reduced significantly without depriving him of adequate food, clothing, shelter and other necessities.

Lamanna, 153 F.3d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 1998)(emphasis supplied).

Ability to repay is not restricted to a narrow mechanical test. Moreover, pre-BAPCA cases from the Ninth Circuit and Oregon noted that there is no threshold repayment percentage for a finding of abuse under an "ability to pay" standard. In re Gomes, 220 BR 84 (9th Cir. BAP 1998); see also In re Meler, 295 B.R. 625, 633 (D. Ariz. 2003)(summarizing cases and noting that the percentage of debt repayment is not necessarily determinative). In the Oregon case of In re Davenport, ER 105-115, the bankruptcy court held that it was the debtor's ability to make a substantial effort to pay, rather than the ability to pay a particular percentage of claims, that precluded relief under Chapter 7. In that case, the debtor had disposable income of $532 per month. ER 112.

Congress, in the BAPCPA, gave United States Trustees[3] a central role in curbing abuse by Chapter 7 debtors. The United States Trustee reviews individual Chapter 7 cases to determine whether or not the "Means Test" presumption of abuse arises and files statements with the court regarding the same. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2) and 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(1). If the presumption of abuse arises, the United States Trustee is charged with filing either a motion to dismiss or a statement as to why the United States Trustee believes that a motion to dismiss is not appropriate. 11 U.S.C. § 704(b)(2). Congress granted only the United States Trustee and the court standing to file motions to dismiss in certain situations. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(6).

[3] United States Trustees are senior officials of the Department of Justice who "supervise the administration of cases and trustees" in all bankruptcy cases within their geographic regions through the exercise of a range of oversight responsibilities. 28 U.S.C. § 586(a)(3). See generally In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 950 (9th Cir. 2002)(explaining that the United States Trustee is the "watchdog" of the bankruptcy system).

B. Factual Background and Proceedings Below

David B. Lorenz filed a voluntary chapter 7 bankruptcy petition on February 26, 2007. ER 1. Mr. Lorenz was married at the time that he filed for bankruptcy but his wife did not file with him. See, e.g., ER 59. Throughout the pendency of his case, Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz lived together in a home that Mr. Lorenz purchased in February 2006 for $800,000. ER 98. The home is approximately 3,685 square feet and includes approximately 14 acres of real property, including a barn.[4] ER 98, 259. Mr. Lorenz has custody of his two minor children from a previous marriage for ten days a month. ER 97. Other than the time that the children spend with them, Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz live alone. Id.

On the day he filed bankruptcy, Mr. Lorenz also filed schedules and statements that he had signed under penalty of perjury. These documents reflected that Mr. Lorenz had secured debts in the amount of $1,025,816; priority debts in the amount of $3,200; and unsecured non-priority debts in the amount of $234,861. ER 18. Mr. Lorenz operated a trucking business which he closed in 2006 because it was not profitable. ER 97. Many of the debts on Mr. Lorenz's Schedule F (Creditors Holding Unsecured Nonpriority Claims) arose from personal guarantees or debts associated with the trucking business. ER 97.

[4] At the time of the evidentiary hearing in October 2007, Mr. Lorenz had one horse and Mrs. Lorenz had 9 horses. ER 98.

Mr. Lorenz's Schedule D (Creditors Holding Secured Claims) included the following secured debts:

> $845,662 secured by a single family residence[5];
> $41,187 secured by a 2005[sic][6] Chevrolet Silverado 3500 Pickup;
> $29,000 secured by a 2005[sic] Chevy Silvarado [sic] 3500 4wd PU;
> $29,000 secured by a Chevy 3500 Flatbed Pick up;
> $31,817 secured by a horse trailer with live in compartment;
> $18,438 secured by a 2004 John Deere Tractor;
> $6,775 secured by a 2005 Harley Davidson 880 Sportster;
> $6,627 secured by a 2005 Harley Davidson 880 Sportster; and > $4,500 secured by a Quad Runner

ER 26-29.

Mr. Lorenz filed a Means Test Form on Official Form B22A on which he reported average monthly income for himself and his wife during the six month period covered by the means test analysis (August 2006 through January 2007). Mr. Lorenz reported "Current Monthly Income" of $13,401 per month ($4,425 for him and $8,976[7] for his wife). ER 74. This resulted in annualized income of $160,812 - well above $63,946, the median income for a household of four in Oregon at the time Mr. Lorenz's case was filed. Id.

While the Means Test Form examines historical income, Schedule I (Current Income of Individual Debtor(s)) reflects current and anticipated income. Mr. Lorenz reported on his

Mr. Lorenz disclosed that his wife was a general contractor. Under the category of "Other monthly income," Mr. Lorenz disclosed receipt of $8,000 per month from his wife described as follows: "Houshold [sic] contribution by spouse as necessary." ER 59.

Mr. Lorenz deducted certain expenses on his Means Test Form[8]. After deducting these expenses, the Means Test Form showed monthly income of -(negative) $4,897.73. ER 78. The deductions for secured debt payments alone totaled $8,542.40. These expenses were:

> $3,600 to Americas Servicing Co. secured by the residence
> $1,398.80 to Hsbc/MS secured by the residence
> $616.67 to CJ Construction Inc. secured by the residence
> $130 to Multnomah Co. Property tax secured by the residence

ER 77.

Schedule J (Current Expenditures of Individual Debtor(s)) requires debtors to estimate the average or projected monthly expenses of the debtor and the debtor's family at the time the case is filed. See ER 60. Mr. Lorenz reported monthly expenses of $12,301.00 on his Schedule J.

---

[8] The Means Test allows certain uniform national and local deductions specified in the IRS Financial Collections Standards and other deductions for certain additional actual expenses, including expenses related to secured debt.

Id. He had a number of high expenses in addition to the large monthly expenses arising from secured debt, discussed above. For example, Mr. Lorenz listed internet expenses of $115 per month, cell phone expenses of $150 per month, and direct TV expenses of $89/month. ER 61. His net monthly income on Schedule J was -(negative) $4,301. ER 60.

Individual debtors are required to file a statement of intention disclosing what they intend to do with property secured by liens. 11 U.S.C. § 521(a)(2)(A). Mr. Lorenz's statement of intention disclosed that he intended to surrender the Freightliner Truck and the two Harley Davidson motorcycles, but did not express any intent with respect to the remainder of the property secured by liens. ER 15. At the time of the trial on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss, Mr. Lorenz had determined to keep most of the remaining property including his home; the two 2006 Chevy Silverados; the quad; and the John Deere tractor. ER 98.

Mr. Lorenz testified under oath at a meeting of creditors on March 29, 2007. Mr. Lorenz there testified that he had obtained employment since the filing of his case and would be making about $40,000 per year working for a joint venture in which his wife was involved. ER 97.

The United States Trustee filed her[9] motion to dismiss pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A)[10] and 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B) on May 8, 2007. The United States Trustee asserted that Mr. Lorenz was not the type of debtor that Congress meant to protect with [10] Although the United States Trustee's arguments in his case focused on ability to repay under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(B), the case also presented elements of bad faith under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3)(A) such as a lavish lifestyle that continued even after it because apparent that the Lorenzes could not afford it. See, e.g., In re Oot, 368 B.R. 662 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007).

the bankruptcy laws and that he and his wife could pay creditors a substantial amount if they curtailed their lavish lifestyle. ER 80-82.

By the time of trial in October 2007, both Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz had changed jobs. Mr. Lorenz was making $4,000 per month. Instead of operating her own business where she contributed $8,000 per month to household expenses as needed, Mrs. Lorenz was making wages of $5,416. ER 98, 209. Together, Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz made $9,416 per month ($112,992 per year) at the time of trial and believed that their jobs were stable. Id.

Prior to trial, Mr. Lorenz agreed that Exhibits 5 and 6 accurately reflected current expenses for him and his wife under the column titled "Updated Budget." ER 98. Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz reported expenses of $11,090 compared to income after taxes of $7,530, resulting in a monthly deficit of $3,560. ER 209.

C. The Bankruptcy Court's Decision

The bankruptcy court held an evidentiary hearing on the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss on October 29, 2007. The United States Trustee argued that Mr. Lorenz was not the needy type of debtor for whom Congress intended bankruptcy relief and that he could pay a significant amount to his creditors if he curtailed his lifestyle. ER 238. The court admitted into evidence United States Trustee exhibits 1 through 7. Exhibits 5 and 6 showed household income and expenses for Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz on the date the case was filed (in the "As Filed" column) and at the time of the hearing (in the "Updated Budget" column). The latter column was then compared to pertinent IRS Financial Collection Standards (the "IRS Standards"). ER 209, 220. These exhibits reflected that if Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz's living expenses were reduced to IRS

Standards, they would have an excess of $2,656 per month (Exhibit 5) or $2,523 per month (Exhibit 6)[11] from which payments to creditors could be made.[12]

The United States Trustee included both Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz's income and expenses in Exhibits 5 and 6 because they shared a common household and devoted the majority of their income to pay common household items. ER 249. The United States Trustee also introduced Exhibit 7, an analysis of Mr. Lorenz's income and expenses alone compared to pertinent IRS standards. This exhibit reflected that if Mr. Lorenz's expenses were reduced to IRS standards, he would have an excess of $596 per month that could be used to pay creditors. ER 233.

Some of the deductions that the United States Trustee included in Exhibits 5, 6, and 7 were overstated in a manner that favored Mr. Lorenz. For example, the United States Trustee included deductions for a household size of four even though Mr. Lorenz only had custody of his two children ten days a month. See ER 98, 206, 220, 233, 247. Similarly, because Mr. Lorenz had not yet filed his 2006 tax returns, and his tax status for 2007 was uncertain, the amount of income tax withholdings for Mr. Lorenz was shown as an amount that might be appropriate if Mr. Lorenz had no loss carry forwards. The testimony reflected that the actual amount of the taxes owed by Mr. Lorenz could be zero for a significant period of time regardless of his [11] Exhibit 6 was produced because counsel for Mr. Lorenz previously advised United States Trustee counsel of his position that the IRS Standards scheduled to go in effect on January 1, 2008 should be used rather than the Standards that were in effect when the case was filed. Both Exhibit 5 and Exhibit 6 were introduced to show that it didn't make a significant difference which Standards were used.

---

[12] Contrary to Mr. Lorenz's contention in his Appellant's Opening Brief, the United States Trustee did not assert that all of this amount had to be paid to Mr. Lorenz's creditors or that all of Mrs. Lorenz's disposable income had to be used to pay Mr. Lorenz's creditors. Rather, the United States Trustee consistently maintained that Mr. Lorenz could pay his creditors a significant amount if he lived more modestly. See, e.g., ER 100, 238, 284.

ongoing earnings. See ER 276-278.

The bankruptcy court denied the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss. The court acknowledged that Mr. Lorenz's expenses were "ridiculous ," ER 295, but found that even if his expenses were curtailed to what the court believed to be a reasonable amount, Mr. Lorenz could not make payments to his creditors. Two major factors leading to the court's conclusion were 1) the court's determination to look at Mr. Lorenz's income and expenses separately from those of his wife and 2) the court's conclusion that Mr. Lorenz was entitled to deduct expenses associated with a median priced home in the local area rather than expenses consistent with the IRS Standards for housing in the local area. Use of the median price housing numbers was an approach developed by the judge herself; it had not been argued by Mr. Lorenz's attorney.

The court's order denying dismissal of the debtor's case was entered on November 1, 2007. Thereafter, on November 28, 2007, Mr. Lorenz filed an application for attorney's fees under EAJA. Two days later, on November 30, 2007, the bankruptcy court issued an order denying Mr. Lorenz's motion for EAJA fees without setting a hearing, requiring a briefing, or considering evidence beyond what already was on record in the case.[13] [13] The record does not contain the additional information that might have been elicited in such a briefing or hearing. While this information might have assisted the bankruptcy court and this court in rendering a decision, the bankruptcy court had ample evidence from which to conclude that the government's position was substantially justified. If this court does not affirm, the case should be remanded. Matters that could be considered on remand include additional evidence demonstrating the reasonableness of the United States Trustee's position; whether or not the EAJA even applies in the context of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b), an issue that the bankruptcy court did not decide, ER 312, see also 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(5); and, if EAJA fees were deemed applicable and warranted, the appropriate amount of the fees, particularly in light of the numerous unsuccessful theories advanced by Mr. Lorenz.

---

STANDARD OF REVIEW

An order denying attorney's fees under EAJA is reviewed on appeal for abuse of discretion. United States v. Marolf, 277 F.3d 1156, 1161 (9th Cir. 2002).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This court should affirm the bankruptcy court's order denying Mr. Lorenz's attorney fees under EAJA. The bankruptcy court correctly held that the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss Mr. Lorenz's chapter 7 case was substantially justified. The facts of Mr. Lorenz's case demonstrate that he was not the type of needy debtor for whom Congress intended Chapter 7 bankruptcy relief. The United States Trustee's position that Mr. Lorenz had an ability to repay creditors if he lived more modestly was more than substantially justified.[14] Other courts have upheld similar arguments by the United States Trustee.

ARGUMENT

I. Mr. Lorenz Fails to Demonstrate an Abuse of Discretion

Mr. Lorenz must demonstrate that the bankruptcy judge abused her discretion when denying his request for an EAJA award. This is a difficult standard to meet. Mr. Lorenz correctly points out in his opening brief that the standard requires an erroneous conclusion of law or no evidence in the record on which the judge could have based her decision. In re Petition of Hill, 775 F.2d 1037, 1040 (9th Cir. 1985) quoting Premium Service Corp. V. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 511 F.2d 225, 229 (9th Cir. 1975)(emphasis supplied). Mr. Lorenz fails to [14] The United States Trustee believes that the position was not only justified but correct. However, the United States Trustee exercised her discretion not to appeal the bankruptcy court's order denying the motion to dismiss Mr. Lorenz's case.

---

satisfy either of these standards. First, he does not argue that the bankruptcy court made an erroneous conclusion of law.[15] Second, the record contained ample evidence on which the court based its decision.

The bankruptcy court did not deem it necessary to consider any response to Mr. Lorenz's EAJA motion to reach the conclusion that the United States Trustee's position was substantially justified. The court identified some of the evidence on which its judgment was based in the order denying the motion:

> This debtor had an $800,000 house, at least four vehicles on which he owed substantial amounts, and a wife who contributes a substantial amount to the household but who did not join in the bankruptcy petition. Although the court ultimately decided that, even given reasonable expenses, this debtor could not afford to make a meaningful payment to creditors, the UST was justified in challenging this debtor's use of the bankruptcy system, given the lifestyle he leads.

ER 313.

II. The United States Trustee's Position was Substantially Justified

A. A "Substantially Justified" Position Under the EAJA is a Reasonable Position

The EAJA provides that "a court shall award to a prevailing party other than the United States" reasonable attorney fees and expenses "incurred by that party in any civil action ... brought by or against the United States in any court having jurisdiction of that action, unless the court finds that the position of the United States was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust." 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d)(1)(A).

[15] The bankruptcy court assumed, without deciding, that the legal standard was as represented by Mr. Lorenz. ER 312.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that in the context of the EAJA, the term "substantially justified" does not mean "justified to a high degree." Rather it means:

> [J]ustified in substance or in the main–that is, justified to a degree that could satisfy a reasonable person. That is no different from the 'reasonable basis both in law and fact' formulation adopted by the Ninth Circuit and the vast majority of other Courts of Appeals that have addressed this issue.

Pierce v. Underwood, 487 U.S. 552, 565, 108 S.Ct. 2541 (1988).

B. Substantial Justification Does Not Require a "Win"

Mr. Lorenz appears to believe that because the United States Trustee's motion to dismiss was denied, the United States Trustee's position was not substantially justified. His opening brief states: "The UST took a position that was unsupported in law and fact in attempting to dismiss Mr. Lorenz's chapter 7 bankruptcy case. Their position was not substantially justified. They lost."

The mere fact that the United States Trustee failed to prevail on her motion to dismiss does not mean that her position was not substantially justified. The Ninth Circuit has repeatedly held that the fact the government "lost does not raise a presumption that its position was not substantially justified..." See, e.g., In re Petition of Hill, 775 F.2d 1037, 1042 (9th Cir. 1985). "To be substantially justified the government's position need not be 'correct'...." See Kiareldeen v. Ashcroft, 273 F.3d 542, 554 (3d Cir. 2001) (citing Pierce v. Underwood, 487 U.S. 552, 565, 566 n.2 (1988)). Nor does the government even "need [to] show that it had a substantial likelihood of prevailing." In re Petititon of Hill, 775 F.2d at 1042 (9th Cir. 1985).

C. The Unclear State of the Law and Complex Facts Weigh in the Government's Favor

The Ninth Circuit noted in Gutierrez v. Barnhart, 274 F.3d 1255, 1261-62 (9th Cir. 2001) that it has repeatedly held that the government's litigation position was substantially justified when the rules under which it operated were ambiguous and the government pursued a reasonable interpretation on which the Ninth Circuit had not previously ruled. Although there is no per se rule that EAJA fees cannot be awarded in a case of first impression, this factor is "an appropriate component of the inquiry into substantial justification." Kali v. Bowen, 854 F.2d 329, 332 n. 2 (9th Cir. 1988). See also TKB Int'l, Inc. v. United States, 995 F.2d 1460, 1468 (9th Cir 1993)(affirming denial of attorney's fees under 26 U.S.C. § 7430 where the "government's arguments both at trial and on appeal are based on supportable interpretations of federal tax statutes and case law").

This case involved sections of the BAPCPA which had only become effective on October 17, 2005. There were few local or appellate decisions under the new 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). Moreover, the primary underlying issue in the case, the amount of expenses that are reasonable, is one as to which the trial court is given substantial discretion. The Ninth Circuit, in a case applying pre-BAPCPA law to the "substantial" abuse standard, described this discretion as follows with respect to allowable expenses:

> Requiring a fact-specific analysis to determine whether an expense is reasonably necessary is sound policy because it comports with the Code's approach to identifying substantial abuse of the Chapter 7 relief provisions. We have consistently held that § 707(b) does not include a "bright line test" for substantial abuse, but rather "commit[s] the question of what constitutes substantial abuse to the discretion of bankruptcy judges within the context of > the Code." Price, 353 F.3d at 1140; see also Kelly, 841 F.2d at 916. 'Congress chose neither to define 'substantial abuse' in the 1984 Act nor to leave specific guidance in legislative history. Congress thus left a flexible standard enabling courts to address each petition on its own merit." In re Lamanna, 153 F.3d 1,3 (1st Cir 1998)(footnote omitted). That Congress granted courts the discretion to identify substantial abuse necessarily suggests it intended courts to have the discretion to answer the subsidiary question of whether particular expenses are reasonably necessary.

Hebbring v. U.S. Trustee, 463 F.3d 902, 907 (9th Cir. 2006).

In his opening brief, Mr. Lorenz attempts to characterize the case law as clear[16] and asserts that the UST was attempting to "push the envelope." Mr. Lorenz did not find the case law so clear at the time of trial. In fact, he then had a quite different perspective. He described aspects of the 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) totality of circumstances test other than the ability to repay as follows: "Given the variety of facts in the tests imposed by other decisions it is clear that a trier of fact can look to any circumstances." ER 122. Mr. Lorenz also accurately described the 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3) ability to pay standard: "There is no bright line abuse test." ER 118. In discussing allowable expenses, the crux of this case, Mr. Lorenz stated in his trial brief: "Under a § 707(b)(3) motion to dismiss under totality of the circumstances the fact finder is given some leeway in deciding whether an expense is reasonable. It is clear from the case law that the standard is arbitrary and dependent upon the individual fact finder making the assessment." ER 119 (emphasis supplied). Mr. Lorenz obviously recognized at the time of trial, if he does not now, that the ruling of a particular judge on what constitutes a reasonable expense is a matter of considerable uncertainty.

This case also presented factual complexities. The bankruptcy court noted that the case had "various layers of complication to it." ER 286. An analysis of the debtor's ability to repay was rendered more difficult by the fact that the debtor and his wife did not file a bankruptcy case together. This led to uncertainty as to what extent to include Mrs. Lorenz's income and deduct or include her expenses in an ability to repay analysis. Other factual complexities included substantial and ongoing changes in Mr. and Mrs. Lorenz's employment; changes in claimed expenses;[17] and uncertainty regarding Mr. Lorenz's ongoing tax liabilities (or lack thereof). See, e.g. ER 276-278.

D. The United States Trustee's Position on Consideration of Mrs. Lorenz's Income was Substantially Justified

Mr. Lorenz argues in his opening brief that the United States Trustee unjustifiably took the position that Mrs. Lorenz should contribute all of her income to pay off Mr. Lorenz's debts. Mr. Lorenz misstates the United States Trustee's position. See footnote 12, supra. The consideration of Mrs. Lorenz's income in the ability to repay analysis was supported by both the case law and the facts of the case. Moreover, the United States

[17] For example, Exhibit 4, sent by Mr. Lorenz in late August 2007, represents that Mr. Lorenz's withholding tax obligation was $640 per month. ER 207. Mr. Lorenz agreed in the Joint Statement of Agreed Facts that this was his withholding tax obligation. ER 98, 209, 220. However, shortly before trial, Mr. Lorenz provided information that his monthly tax withholdings were $814. This figure, which was incorporated into Exhibit 7, caused an almost $200 per month decrease in Mr. Lorenz's disposable income.

Trustee's position was substantially justified even without the inclusion of Mrs. Lorenz's income, an analysis that the United States Trustee also presented.

1. It was Appropriate for the United States Trustee to Consider Mrs. Lorenz's Income in the Ability to Pay Analysis

It is appropriate for courts to consider the income of a non-filing spouse in an ability to repay analysis. In In re Haney, 2006 WL 3020961 (Bankr. W.D. Ky. 2006), for example, the court noted that the debtor and her husband operated as a single financial unit and concluded: "Spouses may not incur debts which overwhelmingly benefit both spouses and then have the spouse with the smallest income file for bankruptcy to discharge the debts." The court dismissed the debtor's case for bad faith under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). See also In re Adams, 2007 WL 3091583 (Bankr D. Md. 2007)(Court found that when debtor's husband's income was taken into account, debtor would be able to repay her debts if she had a reasonable budget); cf. In re Travis, 353 BR 520, 530 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. 2006)(non-filing spouse's income and expenses are relevant under a § 707(b) motion; non-filing spouse's income should be considered if it is substantial enough to raise the debtor's standard of living and generate total household income in excess of the reasonable costs of food, clothing, shelter, and other necessities).

Oregon precedent under the "substantial abuse" standard also discussed the necessity of considering a non-filing spouse's income in an ability to repay analysis. In re Falke, 284 B.R. 133 (Bankr D. Or. 2002). The bankruptcy court in Falke noted that most courts, at a minimum, required consideration of the non-debtor spouse's income. Under the facts of Falke, where the spouses earned substantially the same income, the court held that the parties should share equally in the household expenses.

In this case, although much of Mr. Lorenz's general unsecured debt arose from the failure of his businesses, most of his total debt relates to consumer items titled and financed in his name alone, although both he and Mrs. Lorenz benefitted from its use.[18] Unlike cases in which spouses kept their income and expenses separate or the non-filing spouse did not contribute to joint household expenses, in this case, the Lorenzes pooled their income and expenses. Mr. Lorenz's own sworn document reflected that Mrs. Lorenz "contributed" $8,000 per month to the household as necessary. ER 59. The Joint Statement of Facts reflect joint expenses as did Exhibit 4, Mr. Lorenz's earlier communication regarding income and expenses. ER 98, 207.

2. The United States Trustee Introduced Evidence of Mr. Lorenz's Separate Income and Expenses

Although it was difficult divide the Lorenz's income and expenses given their method of handling finances, the United States Trustee attempted to do so in Exhibit 7. ER 233. This exhibit, which was admitted into evidence, also reflected a significant excess of income over expenses when Mr. Lorenz's separate situation was compared to IRS Standards. Although the court ultimately did not agree with the United States Trustee's numbers, the United States Trustee was substantially justified in asserting that Mr. Lorenz alone could make an effort to repay creditors.

[18] For example, of all of the $1,025,816 of secured debt referenced in Mr. Lorenz's Schedule D, including the house loans, the three Silverado loans, the two Harley loans, and the John Deere loan, Mrs. Lorenz appears to be obligated only on the debt to United Finance ($4,500) for the Quad Runner. See ER 29, 58.

E. The United States Trustee's Use of the IRS Financial Collection Standards was Reasonable

The United States Trustee argued that Mr. Lorenz could pay a significant amount to his unsecured creditors if he reduced his expenses to a reasonable amount. The largest expenses in Mr. Lorenz's budget related to his home. At the time of trial, Mr. Lorenz's mortgages, property taxes, and homeowner's insurance expenses alone totaled $5,756 per month. ER 233.

Historically, excessive housing expenses formed the basis for dismissal of cases for substantial abuse under § 707(b). See, e.g., In re Cox, 315 B.R. 850 (8th Cir. BAP 2004)(housing expense of $3,400 per month was not reasonable); In re Cook, 110 B.R. 544 (Bankr. N.D. Ok 1990)(housing expenses of $2,006 per month were excessive).

Excessive housing expenses continue to be an important factor in an ability to repay analysis under the BAPCPA.

> The U.S. Trustee also correctly notes that the 2005 bankruptcy amendments lowered the threshold in § 707(b) from "substantial abuse" to mere "abuse." Thus, courts have continued to look at the reasonableness of housing expenses when determining whether a case should be dismissed under the new provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). See In re O'Brien, 2007 WL 1847390 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio June 25, 2007)(granting U.S.Trustee's motion to dismiss under § 707(b)(3) where debtors had a mortgage expense of $2,400 per month); In re Zayas, 2007 WL 987240 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio Apr. 2, 2007)(where debtors' mortgage payment of approximately $3,000.00 per month was twice the Local Standard, the court concluded that debtors could significantly reduce their expenses to fund a Chapter 13 plan by moving to a > more affordable home. In particular, the court noted that the debtors do not have the right to live in a house of their choosing at the expense of their unsecured creditors).

In re Nissen, 2007 WL 2915648, 3 (Bankr. D. Neb. 2007).

The United States Trustee's use of the IRS Standards in a post-BAPCPA case[19] was reasonable given the extensive use of those standards in the BAPCPA and the decisional law from other jurisdictions that reference the Standards.

1. Congress and Courts Reference the Standards

Congress made extensive use of the Standards in the BAPCPA Means Test. 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2). In that context, at least one court has limited a debtor's housing expense to that established by the IRS Standards rather than allowing the amount of the debtor's actual rent. In In re Shinkle, ___ B.R. ____, 2008 WL 435183 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2008), the debtors argued that they should be able to deduct $658 in addition to the IRS housing allowance to accommodate the $1,500 that they actually paid for rent. The court held that the debtors had not demonstrated special circumstances pursuant to [19] The Ninth Circuit Bankruptcy Appellate Panel questioned the evidentiary value of the Standards in the case of In re Harris, 279 B.R. 254 (9th Cir. BAP 2002). In that case, the bankruptcy judge rejected the use of the standards as a basis for determining whether the debtors' expenses were reasonable. The judge nevertheless found that the case should be dismissed as a substantial abuse. The BAP reversed, finding that there was no evidence presented to support the court's finding. The In re Harris case is inapplicable to the case at bar. First, in this case, unlike In re Harris, the bankruptcy court allowed the United States Trustee's evidence incorporating the IRS Standards, overruling a directed verdict motion by Mr. Lorenz. ER 251-52. Second, the Standards' likely evidentiary weight increased markedly after Congress incorporated the Standards extensively in the BAPCPA.

---

11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(2)(B)[20] and that the case would dismissed unless the debtors voluntarily converted their case to one under another chapter.

Courts also consider the IRS Standards for housing when determining whether or not cases should be dismissed under 11 U.S.C. § 707(b)(3). For example, the bankruptcy court in the case of In re Edighoffer, 375 B.R. 789 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007), decided that the debtor's case should be dismissed if the debtor did not convert to Chapter 13. The debtor intended to surrender her house and buy another one. She included a mortgage expense of $1,113 per month. The court recited that the applicable IRS standard for a family two was $531 and concluded that the debtor has or should have a mortgage expense significantly less than she claimed. The court found that the debtor "can allocate a reasonable amount toward housing expenses and still have disposable income to pay her unsecured creditors." 376 B.R. at 796. Similarly, the court in In re Gonzalez, 378 BR 168 (Bankr. N.D. Ohio 2007), questioned the accuracy and wisdom of the debtors allocating almost $2,200 toward their housing expenses compared to the applicable IRS Standard of $1,292. The court referenced the Means Test standards as a "pole for guidance" that "can be helpful when determining the reasonableness of a debtor's expenses under § 707(b)(3)." 378 B.R. at 175.

[20] When the presumption of abuse arises under the Means Test, debtors must demonstrate special circumstances in order to rebut the presumption and obtain Chapter 7 relief.

2. Congress Intended that Debtors Have Adequate Housing, Not an Entitlement to a Median Priced Home

The bankruptcy court rejected the United States Trustee's argument that there were other, less expensive alternatives available to the debtors than a median priced home. See ER 293. Although the United States Trustee did not appeal, the United States Trustee believes that this determination was in error. As discussed supra, Congress meant to allow debtors who file Chapter 7 cases adequate expenses for reasonable costs of living. This is a different standard than allowing the level of expenses associated with the median priced home in a population comprised solely of only homeowners.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, the United States Trustee respectfully asks that this court affirm the bankruptcy court's decision denying EAJA attorney fees to Mr. Lorenz.
