Reporter Fined Over JFK NamesNEW ORLEANS (AP) -- A TV reporter was held in contempt and fined $100 Thursday for airing the names of witnesses who testified three decades ago in Jim Garrison's grand jury investigation of President Kennedy's assassination. In sentencing Richard Angelico of WDSU, state District Judge Frank Marullo said he was acting to protect grand jury secrecy. Last week, Gary Raymond, a former investigator for Garrison, was held in contempt by Marullo for handing the grand jury transcripts to Angelico. Raymond is appealing his six-month jail sentence. Raymond kept the records for more than 20 years after District Attorney Harry Connick -- Garrison's successor -- ordered their destruction in 1974. Connick had asked the judge to find both men in contempt, saying that the state's grand jury secrecy law was broken when Raymond handed over the records and when Angelico aired the names of some witnesses in July. Angelico's lawyer had argued that the secrecy law applied only to court officials and that Angelico had a constitutional right as a reporter to publish any information he was given. Garrison's investigation was dramatized in the Oliver Stone movie "JFK."
