Here's my earlier report to Kevin. Additional update will be forwarded to you, Kevin and Laura shortly. Thanks for your interest!

We spent an hour w/this mildly bizarre couple who breed Newfies. One of their Newfoundlands (female) is about to go into season and they are expecting to breed her with a male (not living w/them at present) from another of their own lines. We talked about getting a male companion (as opposed to "show quality") puppy from that litter, which would be born in April and available to take home in June. They want a deposit of $200, which we haven't given them yet, as we intend to check their (the breeders') references with other folks who have purchased puppies with them. Their total asking price seems extremely high to us, also, so we're going to check with out-of-state Newfie breeders to make sure these folks are at least in the general ballpark. I'll be doing that over the next several days, and assuming everything checks out, we'll probably put the deposit down by the end of this week. As of last Saturday, anyway, we would be the first to put any money down on a puppy from this upcoming litter. We also saw and spent a little time w/two adult Newfies and four puppies from the couple's current litter (all spoken for except for a "show-quality" female who they were willing to sell to us -- at a reduced rate -- on a co-ownership basis, meaning they would occasionally take her to shows and breed her 3 or 4 times over the next five years, but we don't want to do that): they're beautiful, friendly, lovable dogs.
There's the scoop -- I'll keep you posted!
Any general input on the issue of males vs. females as companion dogs? Advantages/disadvantages to each? We're thinking of a male, but for no particular reason, and maybe we should be considering a female?
