Subject: Re: Hometown citation, deer, vegetarianism, etc.

I am not sure what it is about this hunting season, but another newspaper did a huge story on hunting deer yesterday. In the Style section of the Washington Post, they profiled a bow hunter. They did not go into the moral questions of the "sport" at all, but focused more on the primal exhilaration enjoyed by these men and their families. One wife was described as a hunting widow, as she stayed home when her husband went out hunting, and she was the primary processor of the results of her husbands obsession. The story was punctuated with quotes from the Deerslayer. And it included a great quote from E.B. White who said that Hitler would never have invaded the Rheinland if he had ever spent late autumn in a small New England town.
