Oral History Interview

with

EDWARD G.
~~Dwight D.~~ Lansdale

July 11, 1970
Alexandria, Virginia

By Dennis J. O'Brien

For the John F. Kennedy Library

O'BRIEN: I think a logical place to begin in anything like this is just simply with the question, when did you first meet President Kennedy, or Senator Kennedy, if you met him before he was President?

LANSDALE: I don't recall meeting him before he was President. The first meeting ^{I believe} was ^{I believe} I believe, the first Saturday following the inauguration, whatever date that was. I was called into a meeting in the White House by [Robert S.] McNamara. It was a meeting, on, actually, on a report that I had written for [Dwight D.] Eisenhower. It was sort of a I'm not sure.

that it was, ^{an} NSC [National Security Council] meeting, but it was comparable to that with the personnel that were attending. There were several Secretaries: Defense, State, and his National Security people were there.

O'Brien: ^{Could I} Did we have much contact with McNamara and [Roswell L.] Gilpatric, members of the incoming administration, before they actually assumed office?

LANSDALE: Just before, that is, a day or so before. I'd been in Vietnam for a brief visit and got back just before the inaugural, maybe two or three days, and at that time both McNamara and Gilpatric were in Defense getting briefed for their new jobs. I met them at that time. The outgoing Deputy Secretary of Defense asked me to start working with Gilpatric, and so I got ^{to know} Gilpatric rather than McNamara [^] [James H.]

O'BRIEN: This is [^] Douglas.

LANSDALE: Douglas, Jim Douglas ~~(James H. Douglas)~~

O'BRIEN: How is Douglas to work with, while you're with him? Is he a pretty sympathetic person?

LANSDALE: Yes, very much so, very much so. He was the one, actually, who wrote the orders and back-

stopped my visit to Vietnam, and back-
stopped it principally so that I could take a look at some of the political factors as well as economic, military, and psychological and everything else. This, frankly, took a considerable ^{standing} on his part
that because my views weren't always
popular in other parts of the government.
I gathered that there was some opposition to
my going out, and he insisted on it.

O'BRIEN: I'd like to come back to that. I wonder if we could go on to talk about one of the major problems, which is Cuba. When is the first time that you hear about the Bay of Pigs
invasion, [?] not the Bay of Pigs, but the plans? ^g

LANSDALE: Sometime in the fall of ^{'60}sixty. I think that I heard of it about the first time that it
was brought up to the ^{inner}~~inter~~-policy group of the Eisenhower administration. I was the Deputy Assistant to the Secretary of Defense,
at the time, for Special Operations and used to accompany the Deputy Secretary, who was a member of the ^{inner}~~inter~~-policy group, to most of the meetings that they had. When Allen Dulles (Allen W. Dulles) first raised the notion to ^{this inner}

the Senate group. I was present at the meeting
as an Assistant.

O'BRIEN: What is the thinking about it at that time?

What kind of operation is it
basically a guerilla operation at this point?

LANSDALE: Initially, it was. Initially, it was very different ^{from} ~~than~~ the way it turned out. It was based on a premise that many people in Cuba were very unhappy with the ^[sic] Castro administration and the way it was turning away from the initial
revolutionary objectives and the capture of the revolutionary movement by the Communist Party,
which surprised many of the supporters of Castro as a guerilla and as a revolutionary action. So the thought was to back a number of ^{the} Cubans who either had been supporters of Castro or were very unhappy, were still resident
in Cuba, and to cause some overturn at the time.

Context

The change of plan towards the Bay of Pigs
thing evolved fairly ^{gradually,} ~~fragilely~~ and apparently
there was a planning group ⁱⁿ and CIA (Central Intelligence Agency] who were working on this initial plan who started thinking in military invasion terms. I suspect that they were doing that because some of the Cuban military and military types, that is, very militant, known as [^] ~~the~~ [^] ~~as~~ [^] were coming out of Cuba as refugees, and they suddenly saw a windfall of man [^] power and started thinking in other terms of use of them. But, ~~this change~~ [^] was [^] the changed plan towards the Bay of Pigs thing, ^{the way it was going,} was well under way in the inner circle ^{and} thinking of CIA by December of '60, very definitely so.

O'BRIEN: Who were some of the inner circle people at this point, ^{do you recall?} ~~(Pierre B.) Salinger, of course~~

LANSDALE: Let's see, ^{O'BRIEN: I imagine [Richard M.] Bissell was...} ^{LANSDALE:} Oh golly. [^] Dick Bissell

(Richard M. Bissell) was the overall chief of the group.

O'BRIEN: Tracy Barnes, was he in it at that time?

LANSDALE: Tracy was an assistant to him, ^{but} [^] How far [^] actually [^] detailed [^] or anything... [^] Tracy, [^] went in the [^] actual [^] planning, [^] I have my doubts that he was. . . .

O'BRIEN: How about Broe, William Broe?

(William V. Broe)

LANSDALE: He was one of a planning group who were planning the operation, but he wasn't ^{the} a chief, and I can't recall the guy's name offhand.

O'BRIEN: Oh well, maybe when you get the transcript back, ^{LANSDALE: Maybe soon} you can. ^{O'BRIEN:} How about ^{from some of the other} places ^{places in the days?} Mann, I

LANSDALE: Yes, but initially it was all CIA. They borrowed some military personnel to help with the planning ^{early on,} ~~earlier,~~ but they were people who had been attached to CIA for temporary duty on other matters, and they hadn't come in initially for this specific planning. In December, when the planning had obviously started coming in with a beach landing and so on, the way it turned out, I urged at that point to get military planning in on the thing. I was worrying about it. [¶] As a matter of fact, Allen Dulles brought his planners to a policy meeting, a policy group meeting, and they were explaining the concept, ^{and} my questioning was such that Allen Dulles pleaded with me not to spoil the plan at an early knowledgeable, and there was a planning group at CIA, but I don't think it went beyond that. I don't know how far it was known, but I thought it was rather closely held.

O'BRIEN: You don't know whether the presidential candidates were at all, do you?

LANSDALE: Yes they were. There was a very definite ^{no}, wait a minute, ^{the} candidates, no, I don't think they were. As a matter of fact, it was still in a rather nebulous stage ^{in this} ~~of~~ shifting over in ~~early~~ November. I think somebody told me, if I recall correctly, that the concept was in the form of a memo in CIA about August, so this would be well after the candidates had been nominated and so on. I imagine that it was ^{just} held ^{to} by two or three people ^{in side} in the CIA at the time. ~~At least~~, ^Q the rest of us certainly didn't know it. I forget exactly when I first heard it, but it would be possibly October, but it might have even been November by the time I heard about it. As I say, I heard about it when it was surfaced with the inner circle of our administration executives.

O'BRIEN: Well, I suppose you had some conversations with Dulles and with Bissell and some of these people about it.

LANSDALE: Yes.

O'BRIEN: What's their feeling? You already discussed Dulles asking you to sort of hold your criticism. . . .

LANSDALE: Well, Bissell definitely felt the same way. Bissell was a very hard-working, intense person, almost high-strung type of individual. He became rather impatient with my questioning of the ^{changed concept} when it took place. I thought initially ^{that} if they had the correct personnel and ^{if} they had a correct reading of dissent inside of Cuba, that was a fair chance to do something. My only concern at the time was ^{if} did the CIA have ~~the~~ Americans who could work with such a situation? I just didn't know ^{yes,} of any, but I was assured that ^{yes,} there were such Americans ^{but} I'm not certain that there were.

O'BRIEN: Did you question the kind of intelligence that was coming out about Cuba and the expected reaction of Cubans to an invasion ^{and} the reaction to Castro in general?

LANSDALE: Just in very general terms. I didn't have enough concrete and specific information myself that was separate from theirs. Most of the intelligence take at the time, available inside the U.S. government, was pretty colored with this dissatisfaction and statements of it. So I had no real way of determining the accuracy or inaccuracy of it. Some of the adjectives used in describing this in briefings to us alerted me a little bit. It just sounded ^{like} too much ^{of} ~~like~~ a sales job on a viewpoint. I'd question that, whether that was an accurate thing, so this is about as far as I went.

O'BRIEN: How ^{did} ~~does~~ a guy like Douglas react? Do you recall?

LANSDALE: Well, he approved of the plan, so he and the others at the policy level [^] approved of going ahead with it [^] and developing it. I was his advisor on this thing [^] (That was my staff job), and I told him to be certain to get the JCS [^] to give it a real hard scrutiny and to come up with details of whether it could succeed or not. That was my last advisory role with him. I was taken off advising on the project after that, actually by my own request because I was apparently causing too much trouble and was not making any progress.

O'BRIEN: What's the reaction of the Joint Chiefs, people like Lemnitzer, towards this? Is there an institutional rivalry or bureaucratic rivalry here in their minds?

LANSDALE: Somewhat, somewhat. It was a little bit as though, well, somebody's going to be playing Boy Scouts, so this isn't really rivalry. They had a difficult time taking this really seriously. Later, I know, when the JCS got in ^{and helped} on the actual planning of this, they became much more serious on it because they had a share of it.

O'BRIEN: Well, do you get involved in the informing of McNamara and Gilpatric about this? Do you get any way of sensing what their reactions are on first being informed?

LANSDALE: No. They had apparently known by the time I met them, ^{and} I didn't get in on that. The one person who ^{would have} has a view of their reactions ^[William P.] would probably be Bill Bundy, ~~(William P. Bundy)~~ who I know at the time was discussing this with them.

O'BRIEN: Did you have ... Bundy and his ... at that point?

LANSDALE: Yes. This was a little out of Bundy's field. He was always trying to figure out what the chances were, the percentages of win or loss. He was ^{a bit} low, and I hadn't known the final plan on this thing, and Bundy did, and he asked me what I thought. I told him, "well, if the JCS guarantees something, you can ^{maybe shade} take it 10 percent lower than that and go along with it. I'm not sure that they know a clandestine operation, but they'd sure know a military landing, whether it would succeed or not. Given some of the unknowns in this thing, ^{why, shade it} ~~I say that~~ by 10 percent and go along with the figure." Well, apparently they had given it a high chance of success, the JCS had, because Bundy said, "Well, you mean it's going to succeed then?" I said, "Well, I don't know." I gathered that he felt it would succeed.

O'BRIEN: Well, then, you are pretty much out of touch with it until it actually comes off. You didn't get into any of the changes in the plans there at all?
(From the point that you battle it)
LANSDALE: That's Right O'BRIEN:

LANSDALE: No. I left at around the first of December, '60. I really didn't follow it from then on.
September something -- it was Does

O'BRIEN: Did anyone come to you from the Agency or
from State or from the White House, as far
as that goes, and attempt to seek an independent judgement on your part, with your background and all, on success

LANSDALE: No.

O'BRIEN: How about the noise level on this? Obviously you're out of it, but is there much talk
about it that is sort of filtering down
in Defense away and the people that are around you
that really have no need to know and direct involvement?

LANSDALE: I wasn't aware of it. There might have been,
but I have no knowledge of that.

O'BRIEN: When ~~the thing~~ the operation actually begins
and the landing has taken place, do you come

into it again at that point at any time?

LANSDALE: No.

O'BRIEN: You do become involved in Cuban affairs at a later time.

LANSDALE: Later, yes.

O'BRIEN: When do you ^{do} you have anything to do with the (Maxwell) Taylor committee ^{which makes the inquiry about it?}

LANSDALE: I met with them once, and they weren't interested with the Bay of Pigs^o. They were interested in the decision-making process, ^{in the} of making ^g of policy, and asked me if I had any ideas on how better the President could be served in the policy decisions and arriving at them. The thing was, right at that moment, McNamara had previously asked me for the same thing, and I had come up with a proposal for him which he put to Kennedy. I just told them ^g Well, I had some ideas but I had given them to somebody else, and I was skeptical of the boss anyhow^o. ^g and [^] this was on putting together task forces. The Kennedy administration had eliminated a bureaucratic boondoggling thing

^{in --}
~~and~~ what the hell was that called? J

O'BRIEN: OCB? [Operations Coordinating Board]o

LANSDALE: Yes, the OCBo I pointed out that the one good thing about it was that the principals met for lunch, and I said the rest of it's for the birds, but to get men in government who are talking to ~~the~~ who are held responsible by him for managing men, money, and material and so on, who can understand the problem well enough around the lunch table to have one secretary or deputy secretary, or under secretary say, "well, we'll take care of that, ^{and so on, was} ~~is~~ a good way of doing business, ^{Then} and ^{with the} president's own national security man sitting in on it, going back and telling him this is going to happen for these reasons, why, it was a good control mechanism. [¶] So essentially all I told the Taylor people and told McNamara in my paper was that this function had been eliminated, along with cutting out a lot of dead wood, and there was some live wood, ^{in it, and} ^{How} about restoring the live wood? This essentially was what my proposition was with the task force, of getting the people most concerned with something, who could operate for the president, and having them get together and help form the policy, get the president's approval, and they were the same ones who could ^{then} start it immediately.

... NOT to create another big bureaucratic thing. ¶ And of course, after they first tried this, it rapidly started becoming a big bureaucratic thing. The task forces that were later set up were just big staffs sitting in different buildings. It was almost like OCB again, not quite, but it got out of hand. Anytime you ^{go} try to change the government around, it seems to come right back in form again and close ranks on it. ^{you} But that ^{photo} was all ^{that} I did with the Taylor group. Incidentally, in that inquiry into the Cuban bit was the first time that I met [Robert F.] Bobby Kennedy. For some reason or other, I didn't connect him personally with the ^{and whatnot,} pictures of him and so on, on TV, and I wondered what the youngster was doing sitting in the meeting

you? BRIEN: Yes, we have a tendency of doing that LANSDA

talking so much.

O'BRIEN: Was he pretty tough?

LANSDALE: Well, he wasn't tough. He was the most interested of anyone in the room there of what I would say on things and plague me with many questions.

O'BRIEN: How were his questions? Was he fairly naive about the problems?

LANSDALE: Now, this was on ~~problems~~ questions of how the government would operate at a decision level, and they weren't naive at all. He had a very good understanding. He was very much concerned about his brother's getting good service in the way of information and full details ^{and} of alternatives and so on, on a policy decision.

O'BRIEN: Well, if you, you knew, in that period right after the Bay of Pigs--of course you had a lot of contacts and friendships in other places

LANSDALE: Yes. O'BRIEN: outside the Pentagon. What kind of an impact ^{does} ~~did~~ the Bay of Pigs have, let's say over in the Agency, and State Department, and in Defense, and in the White House?

LANSDALE: It was a traumatic experience at top levels ^{throughout} ~~of~~ the government. I think it affected President Kennedy more ^{than} any other single thing. It was almost a taboo subject ^{if} you were going in to do business and to get an approval on something we never even hinted ^{of} that Cuba or Cuban affair. It was ^{such} an intensely ^{of} sore subject among all of these people. I felt that almost all of the key executives in the administration must have dreamt about it at night or something, and during the daytime working hours they just didn't ^{even} want to ^{even} contemplate it. And yet they were honest enough people that they knew they had to face up and look at it and would do so, but it was an extremely emotional subject with them, very much so.

O'BRIEN: Well, in terms of the Agency, there's a number of programs and ^{of} course, ^{of} involvements in operations that they have. Do you see any shift in these, any attempt on the part of the Defense Department to move into some of these areas which they felt were traditionally theirs rather than the Agency. I guess what I'm trying to say is, can you see any decline in the Agency influence ^{of} in the Agency ^{on} in decisions?

LANSDALE: Yes, I think so. I'm not certain that it was the military as such. It might ^{well} have been the ^{and} like McNamara personally ^{and} this encouragement of some of the military who were somewhat interested but wouldn't really have expressed the interest unless they were directly asked ^{and} and there always had been some feeling of ^{unease} I think would be the best word to describe it ^{type of} among the military about any clandestine ^{operations}. They felt that once it got over into guerrilla type of operations or anything that would involve a military subject, ^{that} it would be far better to let the military establishment of the U.S. handle it. ^{But} that would be sort of a dinner-cocktail ^{party} type of a gambit on their part, rather than sitting and planning and so on of "We must grab some of ^{that} this," Even though among themselves they talked that way. They didn't express it in terms of their attendance ^{at} at policy councils or even in talks with people like the Secretary of Defense or the civilian, executive side of Defense. On this, I think that McNamara himself probably started thinking initially that ^{well,} this was a military operation and just to be more efficient and effective, the military should take over such things. I imagine that he talked that way to some of the military people ^{who} ~~that~~ were seeing him from the JCS, ~~and~~ the Chiefs, and from the intelligence community, the military intelligence community. I know that DIA [Defense Intelligence Agency] got its great start under McNamara, and I feel almost certain, I've got a strong hunch, that the Bay of Pigs and the misreading of the temper of the people in Cuba gave McNamara great impetus in setting that up initially.

9 So ^{it} ~~it~~ actually, ^{it} wasn't a military ambition to set up a rival intelligence agency to ~~have~~ CIA, though there had been tremendous rivalry between the military service intelligence agencies and ^{the} CIA and had been right along from the initiation of CIA originally. But this was sort of a business rivalry, and it wasn't sort of dealing with them, of categories of work, and where the boundary lines of who did what on the thing, ^c and this is where their jealousies and emotions and everything would come up over almost nitpicking of boundary lines of who would do what. It wasn't a thing of "we'll do it all, and you go out of business," [^] that feeling hadn't come up, ^g -- but ~~after~~ after the Bay of Pigs, the DIA and its creation, a lot of the people in that who were civilian employees, Defense Department employees, had an idea, "We can do a better job than CIA," and in a much wider field than the service intelligence agencies ^{had} have done.

O'BRIEN: Are there enough skilled and competent people around, in the universities and the military, to staff all the intelligence agencies: the NSA [National Security Agency], DIA, CIA, and organizations? Are there enough people, or are these operations just simply too big, ^{at this point?}

LANSDALE: ~~They~~ They might be too big. ^g The need to know things is a very elastic bit. I'm certain that the chief executive of the United States, in whose name these works are accomplished, would have no idea that he would ever desire to know some of the things that they're working on very hard. ^gyou discover whole buildings and all sorts of equipment busily ^gaccumulating facts ^gand figures. ^gHe would say, "I can't see ^gthe States ever needing to know some of that." ^gand yet he would hesitate, given the world today and the technological advances and everything, it's very hard to say what you need to know and what you don't. Given this sort of a gray shading of the end objectives on this thing, it's very difficult to say whether you've ^ggot too big an establishment or not.

O'BRIEN: Do you ever take this question up, or is this question ever raised in the administration by ^{the} civilian people in DOD [Department of Defense] or the White House, with you?

LANSDALE: Not with me. No. My theme on overseas operations was reiterated enough so that it was known by a number of people, and I ^galways ^gfelt that it was ^galways ^gmore efficient and effective to have a very small group working and to choose them with very great selectivity and go for a handful of highly qualified people rather than a large group of Americans charging overseas someplace. This went for intelligence as well as diplomatic and other economic work, and so on. I used to point out the embassies--for example, behind the Iron Curtain--that would get ^{dis}seminated by being TNT'd and so on, in Eastern Europe, for example, it would happen ^{It} that would wind up with an ambassador and two or three people left in an embassy, and their work would increase in quality, and their representing U.S. interests would seem to improve tremendously when that would happen.

O'BRIEN: Does the fact that you get this reputation, mainly out ^{of} the writings of guys like [Eugene] Burdick and Graham Greene, does this affect you in any way in your relations with the bureaucracy?

LANSDALE: Yes. It made life rather difficult. With much of the work ^{that} I had to do in Washington, I came back from a lot of operations abroad and went up into policy-forming levels in Washington almost immediately, and into facing people who were very sensitive on my presence abroad initially. Since I didn't just stick in a regular military category but would get over into their own subject matter, this made them very uncomfortable, and I can understand it while it happened, but it was carried to too great an emotional length. ¶ At times I would suggest certain individuals be sent to look into a situation in a given country and would arrange their transportation and so on, and I would get backing throughout the U.S. government for this thing, and have an individual approved by the Secretary of State as well as Defense and up at the White House and so on, but would set up a means of communicating back so that we would get reports back. There would be times when these individuals would show up in a country, and the first time they sent a message to me, the ambassador would ask them kindly to leave the country, to get out of there, just because of my name. I was apparently ^{was} the enemy to some of these people. ¶ One of my assistants was traveling between Thailand and Saigon, and there was a coup going on in Saigon at the time, and his plane, which was Air France, put down--commercial flight--in Phnom Penh, in Cambodia, and the military attaché very kindly picked up this guy and several other Americans from the plane and found a place for them to stay until they could get another flight out of Phnom Penh. He asked this lad of mine where he'd worked, and he said, "In the Pentagon"-- he was a civilian employee--and he mentioned that he worked for me, and the attaché got all excited, called the ambassador, and he was given two hours to come out of the country.

[Laughter] All he was doing was looking for a place to sleep at night, so it became very emotional and very silly, and detrimental to the U.S. ¶ For example, once in Indonesia, in meeting our folks around the embassy in Djakarta, I had spotted an assistant army attaché, who was the one American, along with one of the economic mission guys--there were two Americans[^] who were not only best known by the Indonesians but were respected, and there was an affection there^o and I have[^] told the ambassador at the time, afterwards, "make real use of these people^o," the Indonesians believe them, and there's some antipathy towards the U.S., but they make an exception^o to these two^o and they're just invaluable^o but the army man was extremely close to the general staff of the Indonesian army. I went on some visits to members at their homes of the Indonesian General staff, and this lad who was tall and blond-- a Nordic type, if you will--would go in, and the small brown Indonesians (~~would~~^o) and their families^o would welcome him like a long lost uncle^o or brother or something. The children would run up and jump in his arms and climb all over him, and he was Uncle "something" to them.

P So later, when the Soviets start moving in SAMs [surface-to-air missile] missile sites into Indonesia and the U.S. needed to know what sort of antiaircraft armaments were going in, our embassy couldn't get the answers to it.

I suggested that we get the State Defense sponsorship and send this one fellow who ^{was} ~~is~~ a lieutenant-colonel over and just let him stay a week or so. He'd go right in and talk to his old friends, and they'd probably tell him what the Soviets were up to. He arrived there, the Indonesian general staff took him out and showed him these ^{sites} ~~sights~~ and asked him what he thought of them and so on the first day he was there. That night he got back, and ^{he} wrote out a radio message and asked the ambassador to send it to me, at which point our ambassador told him to leave the country.

[Howard P.]

O'BRIEN: Now, this was Jones?

LANSDALE: That was Jones, yes. And he said, "Well, let me put that in the message" so I just asked the Department of State, "please let Jones know that you're sponsoring this guy, too, and there might be some more things that he finds out that you need to know as much as we do." So they told Jones just to sit back and let him do that.

We have some wonderful Americans, and this was what I was trying to do, [^] ~~was~~ [^] to find out which Americans have not only our interests at heart but were enough interested in foreign countries to be able to understand and have ~~space~~ really would be serving the best interests of other countries in things. I'd far rather see one man get in on something like that than send a whole team in with all sorts of things, [^] and sort of aggravate a situation, ^{rather} than do something rather simple.

O'BRIEN: Almost sensitivity training . . . @

LANSDALE: ~~LANSDALE~~ [^]; Incidentally, along these lines, I've got a good story for your account.

O'BRIEN: Great.

LANSDALE: About the time of the Cuban Missile Crisis, McNamara came back from a meeting at the White House one day and asked me to provide the means for President Kennedy to talk to the Cuban people on T₂V₂. How the hell did I know how to do that? He told me ~~that~~ he wanted to do it within the next twenty-four hours. Well, it didn't happen. I suspected that it would take longer than that; I don't know how you intrude on a T.V. stations' broadcasting and get the people in the country to go immediately to their T.V. sets and watch a program. I called scientists in from all over the U.S., who were electronic whizzes on this type of a subject, and our intelligence people and everybody else I could think of to get some information together in a real crash basis. CIA couldn't give me details, or technical details, on any of the T.V. stations in Havana and elsewhere.

One of the Defense civilian scientists--and I can't think of his name offhand; ^{it was an} East European name--left the room and came back ten minutes later and provided all the technical information, to the great amazement of everybody there. And I said, "Where the hell did you get that?" and he said, "Well, I went out to the corridor in the Pentagon (where we were having the meeting), went in one of the phone booths there, and I called a friend of mine down in Havana who operates a T/V station and asked him. He gave me all ^{this} the dope, and I just wrote it down." So this is the way we got the information for it. [¶] The intrusion of the T/V space never took place, but we got the means together and some airborne T/V transmitters. It was developed finally by the Navy, and the project--I ^{had} ^{that it be} asked ~~it to~~ put on a sort of sled so that it could be picked up and changed over from one aircraft to another, or used elsewhere ^{later} when we started the T/V broadcasts in Vietnam, this Navy equipment that was initially intended to let President Kennedy talk to the Cubans ^{in '62, I guess that was,} was the broadcast equipment that was used from the air--flying in the aircraft--in Saigon, ^{done} ~~down~~ to initiate T/V broadcasts ⁱⁿ in Saigon in 1965. } ?

O'BRIEN: Why didn't it come off?

LANSDALE: It took us too long to figure ^{out} ways of getting in on the theme and finding a channel and finding a way of getting people ^{to} that ^{do} do that.

It took us ⁹then, twelve days to do it, and the time for them to do it had passed over, and the Russians stood down in the interim, so the need had passed.

O'BRIEN: Well how do you come back into. . . well, maybe, perhaps we ought to pursue this whole business of counterinsurgency first. It sort of becomes the thing with the Kennedy administration, doesn't it?

LANSDALE: Yes.

O'BRIEN: How do you see that? I was in the Marine Corps in the late ^{fifties} 50's, and there was a good deal of guerrilla and counter guerrilla training that was going on, and it becomes a part of the new administration. Who are the ^{principal} proponents of this, outside of yourself? ↑Do you have any conversations, say, with Bobby-- well, you don't really see Bobby until after April. But do you have any conversations with the president, let's say, meeting with him . . .

LANSDALE: No, no, I didn't. I don't know who talked to him about this. When he came in office, this was already one of his themes. Where he picked that up originally, I don't know. I was rather surprised--he seemed to have seen copies of lectures and other things that I ^{had} ~~ve~~ given on the subject, ~~But~~, ^g who had passed those to him and who had talked to him about it; I just don't know.

O BRIEN: Let's say, let's take a person like Max Taylor. Do you have anything in the way of conversations with Max Taylor in the late fifties?

LANSDALE: No.

O BRIEN: How about the rest of the Joint Chiefs?

LANSDALE: No. Taylor was opposed to this type of thing. He did quite a considerable switch, see? He was about the last person I would have ever picked to have headed up something the way Kennedy asked him to do it.

O BRIEN: That's what I was wondering about, Taylor's role in this whole thing. He is opposed.

LANSDALE: Well, he was the one that ^g in the very early

formation of the Special Forces in the Army--
he was Chief of Staff of the Army at the time, ^J--
and took one look at these American troops in
green berets and said, "Take that God damn silly
headgear off," or "Take that--that's it." No green berets, and he ^{really got tough on} ~~ruled the~~ ^{out of} the thing. He wasn't too happy with a special unit of that nature. But at the time, it was
. . . . He went along with the concept that it was only a wartime outfit, ^J that somebody
would have to go and jump in and work with guerrillas. [¶] Again, this is a rivalry type of
a thing, so there wouldn't be another OSS [Office
of Strategic Services] [^] ~~there'd~~ ^{of} be a CIA or something doing it, but this, [^] after [^] all, is part of the modern military function, so let's make it military. So he went that far on the thing.
But that was a concept--[^] ~~you'd~~ ^{would} have a regular force fighting battle, and someplace back of the enemy lines, [^] you'd want to blow up bridges and gather information and so on to support your tactical force^{so} so well why not have somebody in working and fomenting trouble back there for the enemy, but connected with the forces. Now the concept of peoples' warfare ^{--- Mao [Tse-Tung]} is pushed; we've seen ^{it} them in Vietnam and elsewhere. Really wasn't something that he or others understood at all, that almost all of us ^{would be} ~~speak-see guerrilla-or~~ counter-guerrilla, and that people like special forces might well, having learned guerrilla operations, ~~would then~~ be qualified to start coping with them ^{and} would understand the importance of political basis for operations and political goals and behavior and the psychological part of the operations. This really wasn't in any of their thinking because, as witnessed in Korea, we went and sort of had a small World War II in Korea. And in Vietnam later, we went in ^{again} with Taylor as the ambassador, but

having quite a bit of an advisory role with
^{the} ~~our~~ military commanders out there, and influence
^{and were} with them, ^{was} fighting another Korea in Vietnam
more or less. There ^{were} some changes in tactics,
but ^{it} was more use of helicopters just for vertical envelopment ~~rather than just~~ instead of
moving guys along the ground to ^{start} with the thing.

O'BRIEN: Why don't they come to an understanding? [barking]

~~LANSDALE: I'm sure that's going to make a good broadcast
for you, a good tape.~~

~~O BRIEN: A diversion at least.~~

LANSDALE: I'm completely baffled by that. I just don't know.

O'BRIEN: Don't they read?

LANSDALE: They speak the words, and particularly when they were talking with President Kennedy, they picked up the words and enthusiasm and responded, but
would show by what they did that they didn't understand what they were saying. It's something that, of course, I have been trying to do something about all along. I've never understood what it was^g... .^g I've always felt that I was too inarticulate or hadn't found a way of doing things for myself, but there have been so many other exponents of this thing--not just Americans, but of many countries, who have written rather good books on the subject and on parts of it[^] that you'd surely think^{by now} that we Americans would produce top leaders[^] with some understanding of something that Mao [~~Tse-tung~~[^]] and[^] Giap and others have gotten^{g in} every page down^{to g} through the rank and file to understand.

[Vo Nguyen]
[Counterinsurgency]

O BRIEN: Well, in the formation of the CI[^] group--it was designed, as I understand it, primarily as a kind of educational group for top-level administration people--when do you first come into that group?

LANSDALE: I was never really part of that group. I was working with a smaller group of executives, of which Taylor was a part.

O'BRIEN: This is Mongoose, isn't it?

LANSDALE: Yes. This was a national security group of top executives close to the president, with the undersecretary of State, and the deputy secretary of Defense, and so on, and the national security advisor ^{and} Taylor sat in on those meetings after he got his CI group going. But ⁱⁿ forming the CI group initially, Taylor was starting to do some studies for Kennedy, and Kennedy had asked me to help him. So I put my staff in the Pentagon at Taylor's disposal. ^{Initially}, in Kennedy's presence, I offered to put together a study for Taylor on resources in the United States and among our allies ^{for} such things--not allies as much as friends of the United States in many countries--and this was done with ~~some~~ CIA and some of the military services and the intelligence part of State. They had a little working group, and we had several sessions in my office

and put together some rough first papers
for Taylor to start his thinking for the president. Then when Taylor ^{formed} ~~started~~ his group,
I wasn't invited in on it, and I didn't attend.

O'BRIEN: Sure. ~~What~~ ~~wonder~~ ~~if~~ ~~I~~ ~~got~~ ~~any~~ ~~insight~~ . . .

As ~~to~~ ~~stand~~ ~~it~~, right after the formation of that group, and early--it was in May or June--
they dispatched some teams to go around Latin America to survey the ability of various nations
to respond to Castro-type guerrilla activity.

LANSDALE: Yes, yes.

O'BRIEN: Did you get involved in the planning of that
at all or any of the fallout of that?

LANSDALE: Just peripherally on both. I forget the details
on that. I had been worrying about places like Columbia and several other Latin American countries close to the Panama Canal and had urged that this be looked into, on some of the specific things that were being done there. I ~~to~~ ^{had} encouraged ~~that~~ ^{to} the ^{to} ~~Columbians~~ start civic action in dealing with some of the dissident areas and so on. All I had done was, not planning as much as coming in with sort of a shopping list of what people might look for, and individuals in these countries they might talk to to get information on what was happening.

O'BRIEN: Well, are you in Colombia in the Kennedy administration at all as . . .

LANSDALE: No. No, the most I did was--I went to Venezuela ^{et} and during the Kennedy administration, and Bolivia.

No, by that time folks were highly sensitive about my showing up in foreign countries-- that is, Americans, not foreigners--and I really wasn't permitted, or I was stopped really at policy levels from going back into Vietnam or the Philippines or anyplace in Asia. I begged

to be permitted to go down and take a look in Latin America, and Gilpatric was the one that told me the decision had been made....

BEGIN SIDE II TAPE I

O BRIEN: ^{Outside of Venezuela,} Did you get to any other countries?

LANSDALE: Well, Bolivia. In Bolivia, I was interested in particularly the Bolivian Air Force's work of setting up a public school system over in the eastern slopes of the Andes-- down in the jungles and in the very sparse settlements. They were really the one governmental group that could get around places. They were very enthusiastically setting up one-room school houses down there, and flying in teachers and bringing some education in there, which I thought was a great project, and encouraging them. ^{Then,} While I was in Bolivia, I got involved with the resettlement of indians from the Altiplano over onto the eastern slopes into some new communities, in which the whole Bolivian government was involved, ^{and} the U.S. Economic Mission was working with them, and the Bolivian military was supporting it with trucks and with ^{some} people going in. But, this was a very exciting, agricultural-community-type of a project of moving people out where they'd have an economic chance at life, and also a chance to own land. It was changing the social structure considerably for the ^{very} lowest class in Bolivia, and with the armed forces doing it. This, again, was the very first visit.

In Venezuela, I had come up with some ways of safeguarding our own interests in Venezuela ^{of} (which are not only oil production, but we have steel mills down there and a number of things) ^{of} but I did this as much for the Venezuelan Defense Ministry as I did for the United States at the time. They were concerned.

O'BRIEN: What are your relations with the people involved in the school in Panama which spreads a lot of this ^{of} ~~civic~~ gospel of civic action among the military? Are your relations with those people pretty good?

LANSDALE: It was. They had picked up a lot of my material from earlier times, in the form of ~~news~~ ^{of} lectures ^{and memos that}, I had written on these subjects. ^{of} When they set up the school, I talked with them on the program of instruction that they were going to ~~give~~ ^{of} give. The first adoption of any of these principles was in Guatemala, and it worked very well there for a time. The Latin Americans became quite enthusiastic, though again jealousies come in. They thought the Guatemalans were boasting too much about it. So, when I was told that problem, I said, "Well, get them to emulate and try and beat them and get a healthy rivalry going," which is what happened actually.

O'BRIEN: I suspect [Fulton] Freeman is there as ambassador in Colombia when you're there--no, Freeman was in Colombia.

LANSDALE: Yes, he was in Colombia.

O'BRIEN: I can't think of the guy who was in Venezuela that was ambassador.

LANSDALE: Oh, he was from Arizona and was a journalist.

O'BRIEN: Not [Maurice M.] Bernbaum. LANSDALE: No.

O'BRIEN: Well, how is he to deal with, and do you get a chance to see [Romulo] Betancourt or any of the political leaders?

LANSDALE: Yes, I saw political leaders there. I had five days in Venezuela, and I think I got two hours' sleep all the time I was there. I found our ambassador there, [C. Allan Stewart] at the time very open-minded, and very good to work with. I wrote a report, coming back from Venezuela^e afterward, and submitted it^{me} by the time I got to Washington. It went up to President Kennedy as well as Dean Rusk, and some of Rusk's staff immediately wired the ambassador, and it was one of these, "You don't want to buy this, do you," and they said I'd come out with a report on Venezuela^e, and here were the main points of my recommendations and some findings. "He was just there five days. He couldn't possible have found out enough to come to these conclusions, isn't that right?" Bless his heart, the ambassador came back and said, in effect, "I'm amazed that he found out that much, and the recommendations are sound, and we'd discussed this before he left, and we're working with them already."

You don't have to be in a place long. For example, we had a ^{very} pretty large American community down there who themselves were practically government; U.S. Steel and all our big oil companies and so on. There was very little relationship between the American business community and the U.S. Embassy, and I had urged that they meet maybe once a week or once a month--the ^{key} American executives and the Ambassador and several members of his staff and have lunch together rather frequently and discuss mutual problems because the U.S. firms down there had very large security staffs. (They were very close to the police type of forces, the constabulary down there) and ~~that~~ the embassy would be very well informed from this, as well as passing some of ~~this~~ information back to these people, and everybody would gain by it. Well, this doesn't take very long to. . . . In talking to the vice president ^{in charge} of U.S. Steel operations down there, you'd ^{and} say, "One thing you would change if you had the power--what would it be?" and he'd tell you something like this, ~~you know~~, so ^{uh}, it was rather easy to come up with ~~this~~ that thing.

O'BRIEN: Did you find them fairly knowledgeable and enlightened about some of the things that you were very . . . ①

LANSDALE: Very much so, very much so^g

O'BRIEN: Like rural economic development^g and agricultural development^g

LANSDALE: Particularly the oil companies, and I was surprised. Standard [Oil Company][^] of ~~New Jersey~~^g showed me what it was doing because the rigs out in Lake Maracaibo were getting blown up^g and their pipelines were getting blown up^g by saboteurs coming in who were really expert. I found out later that they were affiliated with communists in Columbia^{or} and had come on over^g they were really experts at explosives, and they weren't the student type of revolutionaries and so on, who also were present in Venezuela. ⁷ But^g in seeing what they were doing, it went far beyond a company paternalism type of a thing for employees, ^g that ^{They} started credit systems with farm groups and housing projects for people living in the vicinity of their ^{plants--g} employees--not their^g employees so much, who also gained a great deal out of this. And then U.S. Steel, in pushing its developments way down to the south. . . . [^] ^[Interruption] He probably wouldn't do it; he'd chew the wire in two here.

O'BRIEN:— Oh my God. . . . It's a wonder he hasn't electrified himself. . . . [Laughter]

LANSDALE:— Yeah. . . . It's not yours, it's some of mine.

O'BRIEN:— Well, I'm not worried about that. . . . Wires, these sort of wires can be replaced. . . . I'm not sure about yours.

LANSDALE:— Worse than rats.

O'BRIEN:— Well, he's a spirited animal and ^{you} he can't help admiring that.

LANSDALE:— Yeah. [^] Well, one of the stories on Kennedy I'd like to put in was: [^] On my reports from Vietnam in the very early days of -- just before he was inaugurated, and he read it apparently right after the inaugural -- one of the reports was a little side piece that I did on a village in South Vietnam inhabited by some Chinese refugees that President ^{Ngo Dinh} [Nga-Dinh] Diem had located down in the midst of a communist-held territory, and I was very impressed by them, ^g and just as an example of what humans will do in such a situation, I'd written it up and turned in a separate report on it. ^g And about the ^g a. . . . It was still January, '61, about ten days after the inaugural, my telephone in the Pentagon rang, and this voice that sounded like ~~President~~ ^g Kennedy's told me it was President Kennedy talking, and he had read this report of mine and wanted me to have it published in the Saturday Evening Post. I was ^{at the time} wondering which joker in the Pentagon ^g ~~you know~~, was imitating this Harvard, Massachusetts accent and was putting me on, ^{so} ^g and I said, "Yes, yes, yes." I then had my secretary check over at the White House, and sure enough, it had been President Kennedy, so I had to then go ahead ^g I'd promised to do it, ^g and figuring out I didn't know how to get something in the Saturday Evening Post, but quickly found out how, and they published this thing afterwards as a report that the President wanted published in their magazine.

O'BRIEN:

~~Well that.~~ You had taken^g of course,[^]
you'd had that interest in Vietnam and Laos. . . .
You talked to a lot of people, as I understand, about Laos and Vietnam ^{in g} and the incoming administration. Did you have any intent or purpose in mind outside of just explaining
the way that it was?

LANSDALE:

That was principally my intent. The first meeting I had with McNamara, all he wanted to do was^{to} have me tell him about Vietnam, and this was essentially what most of the incoming
administrative officials^g when they'd talk
to me^g would want me to^{do--} explain what was happening and what the situation was. This essentially was how and why I felt on these subjects, but my thesis right along on this
was to help the people in the countries to help themselves rather than^{to} go in and do things for them. It was mostly on the nuts
and bolts^{of g} on how you go about doing this, and
the individuals you'd pick to do it, and how you'd select them, and please let's have
highest quality and fewer people doing these things.

O'BRIEN: Well, you have some successes and failures in--I guess mostly failures in the last of the Eisenhower administration^g I'm thinking in terms of Laos. Laos is the immediate problem in 1961. How do you respond to some of these people who are in policy-making positions at that time? I'd like to get your feeling for them^g people like [Walters] Robertson^g in the State department^g people Robertson^g and [J. Graham] Parsons; John Irwin in the Defense; and on the Agency side, people like [Desmond] Fitzgerald. How do they see . . .

LANSDALE: You have named a group of people, all of whom are friends of mine, and we were very friendly, and I had worked with a number of them for enough years so that we more or less understood each other and could take shortcuts in conversations and so on. All of those you named ^{always in talks} ~~and talked~~ with me expressed similar beliefs to mine, so it was very easy in talking to them, and there were others in the

Eisenhower administration. Now this wasn't true throughout the administration at all, but there was a considerable group of people who were in various executive slots just down the second and third level who had been through the . . . [Interruption]

O'BRIEN: Well, Laos, as I understand it, is, with the ^{impact} of the aid that's ^{going} in there, ~~that~~ it really does in some ways tear up the economy of the country. Now, how do you look on the training of the Laotian army in late 1960--^{of} '59, '60--some of the activities of the Agency in Laos, as well as the army and through the PEO [Programs Evaluation Office] office and things like this? Is this the kind of thing ^{that} you envision in terms of--I hate to use the term "nation building"--helping a country to help itself, in helping people to help themselves?

LANSDALE: Yes, as long as in the modern world the leaders of the country will think in terms of as large a military establishment as they can afford in a country. And they do this without any advice from anybody. This is just a natural, self-preservation type of an impulse on their part. Then my thought is: They will be doing this. Then let's make the military establishment serve the country in a much bigger way than merely toting guns around and guarding borders. It's usually the organization that is nationwide, and there might not be any other organization that's nationwide in the country, such as agriculture, even the administrative structure that usually comes under ^{the} department or ministry of the Interior won't really have the manpower, the communications, and so forth, that the military forces do. ^{So} So, given that, why not then get the military to start doing constructive things around and making full use of the manpower that you have anyhow. Have them be good military men as the very first requisite of this, but, given that, ^{then} there's still energy and personnel ^{and so forth} involved in that who have a lot of man-hours left over that could do other things, and essentially, this is what I was trying to get the American advisory missions to do--not only the military advisory missions, but when other agencies would get in and be working on these things, to themselves become interested in the military doing such things, and aiding and abetting, including economic projects and educational work and so on.

O'BRIEN:

Well, in this Laotian deterioration that takes place, you know the competing people there-- Phoumi [Nosavan] and Souvannah Phouma and all--how do you read that in 1960 just prior to the administration coming in? Do you?

How do you see Phoumi; how do you see Souvannah Phouma, as people? First of all, have you met them at any time?

LANSDALE:

Yes, yes, yes, I didn't know them well at all. I'd met them at, usually at formal gatherings of one kind or another. The main thing that I saw in Laos in the way of political stability actually stemmed out of the king of Laos; this was the only unifying political force that existed there in the minds of all of the various Lao leaders whom I'd met. So when the others started splitting and opposing one another, I had ^{already} felt that our best bet was to turn to the king and force him ^{to}--or, not force, but to encourage him ^{to} taking the leadership role that would be the one thing acceptable to all these leaders. ^{It} Instead of that, we were starting to become ~~parts in~~ ^a partisan ourselves there and playing off one guy against another, and Americans aren't good at that game. We have many Americans who think they are, but this, I think, is a little too foreign to our nature and we fell in love with the factions and people ^{and so forth} almost unconscious of the fact that we were doing that. The paratroop leader there . . .

O'BRIEN: Kong Le?

LANSDALE: ^{Yes} ~~Yeah~~ ^C who kicked over a revolt, had spent the night before his coup with a group of American friends, and there wasn't a damn one of them that knew that he was going to have a coup in the morning. This type of a thing ^I just found inconceivable. People get nervous and sort of absent-minded about what's happening at the time when they're planning an action

like that the next morning, and somebody there
among the Americans should have been sensitive
enough to have said, "Well, aren't you feeling
well" ^g for something, you ~~know~~ ^g and had gotten some feeling on it. But ^g this sort of getting in bed with people socially and saying, "He's a good fellow," ^{and "he's all right,"} and "he's my friend," and excusing
everything is a common blindness, and this had worried me in Laos quite a bit. [^]

O'BRIEN:

Well, I get the impression from ^a reading of
this period ^g that there really is some lack
of coordination in the various efforts that are there; ^{in g} ~~another~~ words, the ambassador is not completely privy to what the Agency is doing, and the Agency is not completely privy
to what DOD is doing through the PEO office.
Do you get that feeling? Maybe in regard to the Parsons-Irwin-^[John F.] Reilly mission that goes out there, do you get any feeling over that
at all?

LANDSALE:

Yes, I'm trying to recall. . . . We hit a crisis at that point, and the group that went out--Parsons was on home leave, and we had a meeting in the Pentagon in the secretary of Defences' office, and there were a mob of people there. There were ^g -- I can't quite recall now what prompted the meeting,

but ^{it} there ^c was a crisis of some sort in Laos.
And the JCS gave a briefing, that's right, as part of the thing, and it was on the Pathet Lao
positioning, and they suddenly discovered that there were [^] passes over the mountains that
had some importance to the Ho Chi Minh trail,
and this great discovery was being lectured
on at this meeting. [^] And [^] at the time, the Secretary of Defense -- I [^] think, I wonder,
that might have been [Thomas] Gates [~~Jr.~~] at
the time, [^] might have been, but whoever it was --
asked if I had a comment to make, and I said,
"Take a look at that map that the JCS was showing us of Pathet Lao and the other situations on the thing," and I said, "it should tell everybody here just one thing. You've got an ambassador who [^] is on home leave here. [^]
he doesn't belong here; [^] he belongs out in Vientiane right this moment, [^] and [^] the rest of you who are asking questions ought to have people out there with him who would tell you immediately and take a first-hand look."

~~And the a~~ I remember Irwin was picked right on the spot to go immediately, and ^{he} said to me on the side, "You and your big mouth ^Q ~~you know~~" [Laughter]

O'BRIEN: Well, did you get involved in any of the meetings on Laos after the Kennedy administration comes in, and some of the jockeying that goes around?

LANSDALE: Some of them, yes. I can't quite recall which meetings they were at the time. I was in on some of the questions of the support of the ^{Meos, Q} ~~Maos~~ the guerrilla forces.

O'BRIEN: Well, ^{what} ~~how~~ did you see in terms of a strategy for the area? ~~There is a~~ ^Q as I read it, there seems to be some various strategies ^{that are} proposed; one is ~~a~~ ^Q ~~you know~~, going down the full road behind Phoumi and supporting Phoumi, and another is the panhandle strategy--I've never been able to quite understand what the panhandle strategy was--^{if} ~~that~~ ^Q ~~you know~~, rings

a bell.

LANSDALE: ~~Hum, yeah well, hum,~~ my memory isn't too good on this thing. There was some talk at the time, [^]there's high country across the Bolovens Plateau and so forth down in the south, and there was talk at the time [^]of that being the dominant area, and what we should do [^]was to make use of that and the high ground in Vietnam and so on, across into Thailand, and ensure that that ~~state~~ ^{state stayed} in noncommunist hands.

O'BRIEN: Well, there's also suggested in the Laotian crisis as early as 1961, the use of strategic bombing on supply routes, and even, as I understand it, to Hanoi, as early as that, [^]and interdicting [^]in ~~interdicting~~ some of the supply lines, as well as the suggestion [^]that subsequently in 1962 does become a reality [^]the dropping of the SEATO [Southeast Asia Treaty Organization] plan five, as I understand it, [^]^{was called} How did you feel about the Laotian crisis at that point, in terms of a strategy or a direction [^]at which should work?

LANSDALE:

Well, I had wanted the Laotians to defend their ^{own} country, and I was all for the work with the ^{Meos} ~~Maoists~~ and so on of doing it.

Once it left that and started involving ~~us~~ Vietnamese or us, on bombing or anything else, I felt that the cost of saving some real estate would be too high to ever engage in, ^{and other work} And on the bombing, I felt that as long as you had all of the ^{means of} communication with the people ^{means} in the hands of communist leaders such as in North Vietnam and then Hanoi where this was pushing, that anything overt such as aerial bombing that would then permit them to use that as a unifying force psychologically with the people would be dead wrong. ⁹ I used to remind them of what [Winston] Churchill had done with the German bombing of Britain, ² and just on radio with the people ^{and} and here were leaders with complete access to radio and working with the people, and it would have a reverse effect as far as trying to stop the ambitions and aims and so forth of the North Vietnamese, ^{were,} who after all, the guys organizing

the Pathet Lao and pushing on into the area.
¶ I felt that more could be done with the armed forces of Laos themselves in making
them more able to stand up for themselves
and defend their country. But if it couldn't,
I couldn't see an intervention of any sort
in there. Morally, we'd have been on a moral ground then to turn around and start using
some international moral pressure, through the press and so forth, to sort of shame the North Vietnamese out of their attempts. I'm a great believer in exposing things to bring
such pressure.

O'BRIEN: Well, how do you see the relationship of Vietnam
and Laos at that point, or do you?

LANSDALE: Oh, yes. The passes and the Ho Chi Minh trail
in bringing things down was one of the key things on this. But again, there was even talk at the time of taking Vietnamese troops
in there, ~~and~~ ^gsecretly, ^gand using them up
to try and stop that, and I was opposed to
that, ^gI didn't want to see intervention like
that from the outside.

O'BRIEN: Well, when does some of the covert activity, in terms of the use of some of the Montagnards ^{yards} in interdicting those supply lines in Laos, ~~you know~~ from Vietnam, start? Is that going on in the late Eisenhower administration, or does it begin in the Kennedy administration?

LANSDALE: I think it was the Kennedy administration, ^{there had been a little of it, or there had been talk of it, in the Eisenhower administration.} There had been thoughts along that line by the top Vietnamese leaders ⁱⁿ 1955, '56, and I remember President Diem's brother, ~~went to~~ his older brother, ⁱⁿ went into Laos ~~and~~ about '55 or maybe '56, and had come up with a scheme very similar to that at the time. He had talked about the mountain people of Laos being akin to the mountain people of Vietnam, and wouldn't it be good to get some of our mountain people in with them, and together they could be trained.

O'BRIEN: Yes, well, you're in Vietnam in the middle of the fifties, and then you go back in 1960 in the late Eisenhower administration. What's changed, or has anything?

LANSDALE: Oh, a great deal. Excuse me. [Interruption]

O'BRIEN: What changes do you find?

LANSDALE: Well, the main change was in a growing isolation from reality of the constituency of the President of Vietnam, a repression of, you might say, a loyal opposition or a noncommunist opposition to ^{him} them in political terms. ^{There were} professionally some among the military that ^{were} was taking the Vietnamese military apart from their people more than it had been when I had left, because I had gotten them working very closely with ^{the people on} a number of ~~operations~~ projects, and a growing isolation of the American embassy in particular, but including some of the American agencies, from the Vietnamese officialdom, and taking a very strange form of concentrating on gossip essentially--gossip as much as fact--about ^{oh,} ~~what the hell's~~ ~~the word-I'm-trying-to-think-of,~~ ~~of~~ misdeeds

and so forth by ^{Vietnamese} public officials or people connected with the regime in Vietnam ^o so that the information-gathering process of the United States there was devoting an exorbitant amount of time on sort of nitpicking on the people that were in power. ^{In} The relationships, such as the ambassador with the president of the country, the ambassador would go into details of malfeasance, in office and so forth, or mishandling of funds by the Vietnamese on an internal matter, and the president would have to correct him and say, "you don't have all the facts," and the ambassador would say, "yes, I do, too." This to me was very poor. I felt that we had some Americans ^{who} ~~that~~ were close enough to the top officials of the Vietnamese (who weren't present in the country always), who should be brought there and told, "Look, we understand these guys are doing something wrong."

Can you go in and get them to start doing things right, as a friend of theirs?" rather than going ⁱⁿ and ^c trying to scold them and something and getting the backs up of people, and they'd figure, "Well, these damn nosey Americans only got half the facts, and since they don't understand us that well, the hell with them. We aren't going to do what they want." I just felt that we weren't playing a very wise ballgame there at the time, on the American side. I also felt that Diem was paying too much attention to similar types of his own people, his intelligence people, who ^{in turn,} were ~~in turn~~ telling him what the Americans were doing too damn much, or were bringing in alarming news about his own subjects--and particularly political oppositionists--and, I suspect, manufacturing cases against them so that they could take actions, and he, in turn, was getting too much secondhand from people, and this tended to isolate him more, [^] Since his main intelligence officer was his brother, [Ngo Dinh] Nhu, [^] who was an ambitious person, too. I felt that it was a poor arrangement on the Vietnamese side. ⁹ I personally urged Diem at the time to get in touch with some of his opposition, [^] and ² at which point he asked me where I had been at certain times of the day during my visit there, ^o and I said, "I was talking to your opposition, and I'm not going to tell you who it was or where I was, but just the mere fact that you know that shows that you were having me trailed around, ^o and ⁹ you know I'm a friend of your country's, and I'm [^] trying to help all of you succeed here, and you happen to be the elected leader, and you jolly well better start reflecting what your people desire, ^o and ⁹ if you ⁹ spend your time and money and efforts and so forth watching

a guy like me, I'm sure you're doing a lot more for someone else you really suspect^o and^g

O BRIEN: How would he react to something like this?

LANSDALE: Listen, I was told by a number of people that I was about the only one that really ever talked to him in this manner, and he would listen^o and^g at the time, one of the people most critical of him was his vice-president, and I went over and saw the vice-president, whose name was [Nguyen Ngoc] Tho, and Tho immediately started telling me that the president had spies all over his office and in his staff^o and^g as he was telling me this, one of the clerks was serving us tea, and I said, "Is this guy one of the president's spies?" and he said, "Probably, I think so." [Laughter] Maybe he'll go back and report this one. I said^g ^{to him,} "When was the last time you two talked to each other?" Well, it had^g

secondhand from people, and this tended to isolate him more, [^] Since his main intelligence officer was his brother, [Ngo Dinh] Nhu, [^] who was an ambitious person, too. I felt that it was a poor arrangement on the Vietnamese side. ⁹ I personally urged Diem at the time to get in touch with some of his opposition, [^] and ² at which point he asked me where I had been at certain times of the day during my visit there, ^o and I said, "I was talking to your opposition, and I'm not going to tell you who it was or where I was, but just the mere fact that you know that shows that you were having me trailed around, ^o and ⁹ you know I'm a friend of your country's, [^] and I'm trying to help all of you succeed here, and you happen to be the elected leader, [^] and you jolly well better start reflecting what your people desire, ^o and ⁹ if you ⁹ spend your time and money and efforts and so forth watching

[Laughter] Maybe he'll go back and report this one. I said^{to him,} "When was the last time you two talked to each other?" Well, it had[^] been months⁹ so I ^{went} back to Diem, and I jumped

him⁹ I said, "You've got a vice-president
who you've made responsible for all the economic development of the country, and I know that you consider that very important⁹.
You haven't talked to him for a long time,"
and I forced him to tell me when ^{he'd} you'd done
it last⁹ so I said, "Well, pick up the telephone
and call him over here your first free time,
and you sit down and have a long talk with him." So he did it⁹. He picked up the phone,
and I got the two of them together again⁹.
He was really out of touch⁹. He promised me at the time to get in touch with some of the ^{his}
political opposition⁹ he swore up and down
he wasn't oppressing anyone⁹ ^{"well,} and I said, "You
don't know what your own police are doing,
then," and I gave him the list of names of
people who were in prison⁹, who had been arrested
at midnight and pulled out of their homes and so on, and he promised to look into their cases immediately and do something about it. And I said, "I've gotten this from people who ^{are} in the opposition to you, but I don't know ^{whether} ~~if~~ ^{ever} you've [^] gotten any reports." He said he'd never heard of these cases, and I think he was telling the truth. He had no reason to dissemble with me at all on these things.

O'BRIEN:

Well, why is this? Is it the development of an independent bureaucracy, or is ^{it the} ~~there a~~ degree of U.S. influence on, let's say, the intelligence, ^{Nhu} ~~knew~~ . . .

LANSDALE:

There was probably some. . . . I think by that time the Vietnamese intelligence was way beyond any control by U.S. intelligence, who initially had been helping it, and Diem's ^f ~~bother~~ Nhu was really--really had the bit in his teeth and was his own man. And I suspect, initially, he was really trying to serve his brother, and he was doing it by trying to get the goods on everybody working for his

brother throughout the government and anybody
opposed to his brother, and the intelligence
people, picking it up, discovered that if they brought in bad news about some guy that
the brother didn't like, he'd pay them and believe it. So I'm sure that there was a lot of manufactured evidence in the intelligence take that was coming in, and I don't think the Americans were screening
any of that type of information because it went right into the palace, and there was a big room behind the president's office that
had many files and was the main personnel
dossier type of file place.

O'BRIEN: Well, you're critical of the MAAG [Military Assistance Advisory Group] operation there.

What's wrong with it, in the late ^{fifties?} ~~50's~~

LANSDALE: Well, I felt that MAAG under "hanging" Sam [[Samuel T.] Williams in the late ^{fifties} ~~50's~~ was an unusually well-run American military operation. There were some unusual things being done that made it so. One of them was one of the best ideas I've ever bumped into. General Williams brought over the chief of staff of the Vietnamese army whenever the American advisors who at that time were out in the countryside, but ~~were~~ at fairly high levels, and were running training camps more than advising on operations or anything. But when they would come in once a month for a weekend in Saigon, Williams would get the Vietnamese Chief of Staff to come in and talk to them. The Vietnamese Chief of Staff at that time was General [Tran Van] Don. Don was quite diplomatic, but had a way of being candid in his remarks and not having them hurt too much when they were told. He would leave out so ^{names and} on, but he would tell these Americans what their Vietnamese counterparts in the Vietnamese army and so forth thought of them, and their work, and their advice, and the reactions throughout the armed forces to them. This was the one part of the monthly gatherings with Americans around that everybody would stop dozing off or thinking of something else and would sit up and pay attention because they were the subject of the talk, of course. This was a very healthy thing. . .

O'BRIEN:

Yes, I can ^{see where} feel it I would be.

LANSDALE:

: . . ^g because even though it was tough diplomatically, the most sordid truth, ~~would~~ ^g the hardest facts, ^g would come out in ^{photo} ~~the~~.

And then Williams himself had been in Vietnam a long enough time by then--I forget how long; it may be three years at the time, four years--so that when he moved around the Vietnamese army, it wasn't only just the top staff officers and commanders who would be with him, but I noticed in a visit ^{I made} there--I think it was '59--that sergeants and junior lieutenants and so on would come up and talk to him^g and I'd moved in close enough to eavesdrop on some of the conversations, and these were personal problems, family problems, and financial problems and so forth that individuals had^g and this was a very unusual relationship for an American to have. ^g And since the American was also running our advisory effort ^{throughout} too, I just figured that this constant feeding and contact with the echelons of Vietnamese military that were down below the big wheels was again a very healthy influence that was constantly at work with him. So that he would know very well what was going on in places. ^g Some of these problems--personal problems--would actually involve the military work that was going forward, people griping that something was wrong and so on^g and they were doing this out of a friendship, ^g and he ^gwas not to tell on their bosses or anything, but usually personal worries and concern that wastage or something going wrong would ^{ag}effect them. Later they moved in an educator--a military educator--[Paul D.] Harkins, and. . . @

O'BRIEN: Well, [Lt. Gen. Lionel C.] McGarr comes in there before that, doesn't he?

LANSDALE: McGarr. It was McGarr, yes, you're right. It was before Harkins. McGarr. And McGarr built up a staff to work on counter-insurgency and probably put together the best staff studies on counter-insurgency ^{that} than any American military men have ever done.

O'BRIEN: Is that right?

LANSDALE: He got American military men who had been guerrilla leaders in the Philippines, for example, in World War II, and in Burma and so on, and in Europe, and switched most of his work over into compiling "How to Do it" manuals, but I've never seen the finished products. I saw them working on it at the time, and all I know is they had tremendous stacks of papers with the results of their typed-out work and were putting it together.

¶ And the interpretation of this ~~was~~ ^g apparently ^{was} to start increasing staff and American military personnel to handle whatever ~~whatever~~ ^g was coming up out of this whole process. The feeling was ~~was~~ ^g that there should be closer American supervision of what was happening out in ^{units,} ~~Burice~~ ^g which meant ~~well~~ ^g you'd put down your Americans at lower echelons and then get a separate reporting system on back, feeding in the research process of the Americans initially more than anything else. ¶ It wasn't for control; it was just for information that would go into fields of study, ^g and this ~~led~~ ^g led to a proliferation of ^{American} ~~an~~ military presence that was intended sort of for the education of Americans, I think, more than anything else, but of course didn't work out that way. You

put some red-blooded American boys in uniform
out someplace, and they're going to start doing
other things as well. In collecting information,
they couldn't help but tell a guy, "Well, ^{look,} if you didn't do it this way and did it the other way, it would work better," and so on. It ^{was} a very human thing that started working, and
as this happened, ^{then} we started building up our
advisory effort more and more.

O'BRIEN: Well, in the meantime, while this is going on,
the insurgency's building up, isn't it?

LANSDALE: Yes.

O'BRIEN: Just what is the condition of the countryside that's different from when you're there
in the middle fifties ^{50s} and when you go back in ^{1960?}

LANSDALE: Oh, there were guerrilla ^{operations} by an enemy, which
there hadn't been in the period from Geneva
on up to the time I left in the end of '56.
You could drive roads at night and so forth

and not be worrying about guerrillas. There were isolated incidents of violence, but they were very minor--it would be about what you'd expect in any country ^{with the} crime rate going ^{of} the fact that former Vietnam ^{with} guerrillas were the guys pulling the trigger didn't matter too much as far as the overall crime rate went. It was in a nature of minor terrorism ^{that} was going on. ¶ By my next visits later in the ^{fifties} ~~50s~~ there were areas of guerrilla bands at work, with roads that were unsafe and so on, ⁱⁿ ^{and} areas that were unsafe, with great problems of police posts being attacked and with their families being wiped out in small massacre type of things, though the type and degree of violence had increased a great deal. ¶ By the end of '60--when I got there ^{at} in Christmas of '60--there were fair-size enemy, Vietcong units operating and dominating areas ^{of} it had escalated considerably by then.

O'BRIEN: Is this terrorism campaign on the local officials as serious as some of the people have written, ^g about ~~it~~?

LANSDALE: Oh, yes.

O'BRIEN: Do you ever get any ^g feeling about the number of people? I've heard all kinds of estimates.

LANSDALE: No, I've got [Stephen T.] Hosmer's study there on that, and I haven't read it yet.

I just got that from him. I imagine he's got a figure in there. The last figure

I remember on it was ^{around} in about '66 ~~was about~~ [^] ~~^~~ ^{forty thousand} 40,000 or something . . .

O'BRIEN: Forty thousand. That many?

LANSDALE: Yes. These were officials, ^g not their families or anything. But these were village officials, ^g and district officials, ^g and sort of federal government officials.

O BRIEN: Well, what do you see happening as a result of this [^] in terms of ^{the ability of} Diem to just simply govern in those years? Is ^{his ability} ~~the value~~ ^g to govern deteriorating?

LANSDALE: Yes. In some ways it was. Initially, he was unwilling to delegate any authority
at all ^{in the things} and he had the tendency to try and do everything himself. If the problem
came up in agriculture, he would be the
guy to do all the paper work and the deciding rather than his Minister of Agriculture and so on. He had gotten over that to a very large extent later, ^{so} he had learned to be
more the administrator and executive later
on, as far as putting some authority in the hands of others. ^{But} But at the same time, he also seemed to have lost some of his critical
faculty, ^{of} ^{of} some of the things that were going wrong, of not being able to see it. He was getting around the country and visiting, but
not as much anymore because of the security
problems. He had been shot at several times,
so that he had a larger and larger security
guard around him all the time, which meant
that when he went in and talked to people,

they were very much aware of plain clothes
policemen, secret service types, all around
him, and others, that were screening out
people, so that the dialogue between the president and the people became thinner and thinner, and less and less meaningful. So while he was on paper becoming a better
executive, he was, in terms of being the
national leader, ~~was~~ being less effective all
the time because he had no means of measuring
what was true and what wasn't, what was
worth doing and wasn't, and what ^{would} work
and what ^{wouldn't} ~~wasn't~~. It was a considerable impairment of his critical faculty. This was one of the reasons I was urging him to
start dialogues with his political opposition,
even if it started at opposite poles and ^{just} led
to tremendous emotional clashes, that there would be some means for dialogue to take
place that would have been useful to him,
particularly if he had invited them into a

meal or something, and had some way of ^{dampening}
fattening the most emotional irritations
that would take place, just ^{out of} ~~how the~~ people ^{being} ~~seemed~~ polite at the time, so the content
of what they ^{would have} had to say would be something
that he wasn't getting ^{at} ~~elsewise~~.

O'BRIEN: Yes, well, as I understand it, the VC's [Viet Cong] make a great deal of headway in those years on the basis of the land system.

LANSDALE: That was one of them.

O'BRIEN: Well, what. . . . As I understand it, there's some rub between the U.S. in this regard
and Diem about putting through some land
reform which would cure some of the rural
cultural problems that the French had sort of created, as I understand, from ^{you} ~~you know~~
the Vietnamese moving into the country. . . .

LANSDALE: Yes, yes.

O'BRIEN: Well, how do you see that? Are you pushing ^{him}
for this sort of thing ^{at} ~~at~~ that point?

LANSDALE: Yes. Actually, ^{he had} ~~we have~~ some very sound land reform measures on the books and had issued decrees on them that were good. As usual, the difficulty ^{is} when you get a piece of legislation or something, ^{is} then implementing it correctly, and I was pushing him mostly on implementing his measures. ¶ Now the land reform worked ^{so} that Diem approved and used as the basis for his decrees came from Wolf Ladejinsky and Wolf, ^{was} when he left U.S. employment, was actually employed by Diem as his advisor on ^{that} the subject, and Wolf was getting over and having breakfast with Diem quite a bit.

Wolf is a very articulate, personable type of a guy, and there was a great deal of affectionate ^{friendship} between the two men, so that Wolf, who is a champion of reforms and of helping the man on the land, had full access to this guy and had a way of doing things. ¶ And I felt that the main thing that needed doing was demonstrating to President Diem, who was sympathetic towards this, of where things weren't going right and changing some of the inner workings of ^{this} ~~the~~ thing, instead of just ^v falting him on intent. And his intent was very sound, very good. I think he was ignorant of some of these things going wrong. ¶ I felt that we should have borne down on the matters in which he was ignorant and tried to get some changes there and make these things work, because certainly [^] landlords and others were circumventing the law of the land that Diem thought was operating o r when he circumvented it, he was doing it for good reasons of his own, [^] which was again open to education by somebody of him [¶] but he was moving in people whom he could trust--who were refugees--into farm communities and distributing land to them for security reasons and political reasons and so on, and then dictating what they would grow and so on [^] because he'd just figure, Well, in the national economy, we need this [^] type of fiber grown or this type of crop or something, and the land will produce it up there, and so they should do that. So he was only circumventing the law ^{sort of} for the greater good, in his own mind, ^g in his own extent.

O'BRIEN: This centralization brings about a reaction, though, doesn't it?

LANSDALE: Yes.

TAPE II SIDE I

LANSDALE: You asked about the falling out between ^a Ladejinsky and Diem. I know there was something of that nature, but ^{just} what it consisted of, or why, I don't know. I remember that the American ambassador . . .

O'BRIEN: ^{This} ~~It~~ would have been [Elbridge] Durbrow?

LANSDALE: . . . Durbrow was mindful of the fact that ^a Ladejinsky was having breakfast with Diem and was close to him, and, in a rather general way, ^{had asked Ladejinsky} to bring up thoughts of corruptions ^g in the government and subjects beyond anything like land reform. And I suspect that ²Ludejinsky had started getting very political in his talk, as a result of this, with Diem, and that Diem had resented it. But beyond this, there was a very deep affection between the two. When I was there in '59 or '60, ²Ludejinsky had wanted to go someplace, and I forget where it was. . . . I know one of the places was Indonesia, but there was another country he wanted to go to, and Diem hadn't wanted him to go, and ^{had} suggested that he attend a conference--I think in Latin America, finally, they had agreed between the two of them, and ²Ludejinsky had gone on to do these other things, that ^{he had} taken sort of a sabbatical leave to do that. But this was a very personal thing between two men, and it was two friends, rather than a president and his consultant working. I know ²Ludejinsky is very sentimental about

Diem as a man, and I know that Diem reciprocated this very much. There was a point where the rational thought would end, and the feelings of affection and so forth would come over, and say, "Well, even if that is true and everything, I still like the guy, and ^I want to help him," and so on, and this existed between the two. So ^g they might have differed on some things and perhaps on carrying out land reform exactly the way ^{that} Wolf wanted, but the two men kept seeing each other all the time, and he had ample opportunity to work on that.

O'BRIEN:

~~Well,~~ ^{that's} the suggestion ^{is} made sometimes is that the Vietnamese military has ^d not been trained for the kind of war and the kind of insurgency that they did encounter in 1960-61, ^g they had not been properly trained for that before. Is there any validity in this at all?

LANSDALE: Oh yes, ^{sure} They were being trained actually to meet the challenge that the Vietnamese and American top officials foresaw, and they were thinking ~~that this~~ ^{and}--and incidentally, the French General [Paul] Ely before he left was thinking the same way--just in terms of contingency planning, ⁿ they saw a lot of artillery and armor being given the North Vietnamese army. So, ^g being given that information, they saw any attack or military trouble in Vietnam as consisting of divisions of North Vietnamese with a lot of artillery and armor coming across the border. So they built up an army to meet the foreseeable thing that was happening ^g, that they thought might happen. ^g Instead of this, of course, it was more of the same old story again ^g and ^g there were many of the officers in the Vietnamese armed forces who had formerly been guerrillas themselves, who had formerly had been Viet ^{Minh} men in the old days of fighting the French, who had broken with the Communists and wanted no part of the Communists and were very sincere, patriotic Nationalists. But since they had had ⁹ this former affiliation and had taken their basic military training with the enemy, so to speak, they never quite had the same stature among their fellow officers in the Vietnamese army, for example, as graduates of the Vietnamese Military Academy and the others coming right out of high school and so on. ¹¹ So as a result, the officers corps who were knowledgeable ^{about} of how to counter what was happening were kept at fairly junior grades, and in the late ^{fifties} ~~1950s~~ the highest any of them got that I ever knew about was ^{the} rank of Major ^{and} they had to take orders from Colonels and so forth who had served under the French in very much the same type of a conventional military organization as the Americans had put up and were advocating. And these junior types who wanted to do different things were simply too junior to do it and were unable to convince anyone of the need. ¹¹ The initial meeting of the ^{threat} was thought ^{more} to be a police problem than an army problem, and there was a lot of work on trying to equip and train the national police to cope with it, ^{and} we Americans did that through our economic mission and through ^{Michigan State University} Michigan State University had a group helping on administration there. They recruited some very good police officials from the U.S. who were quite used to dealing with urban crime problems in the U.S. ^{Well,} you can't take a man who is very good at precinct work in Detroit, Michigan, or ⁱⁿ Birmingham, Alabama, or something, and move him out to an Asian country where his problem is. ^{What do you do} What do you do when a company of guerrillas comes in and ambushes your police station? A completely foreign type of a thing, ^{so} so that we had police advisors ^{who} ~~that~~ were insisting on all policemen being armed with nothing more than, say, a 38-caliber revolver, with the policemen saying, "Yes, ^{but} but people are shooting at us with rifles, and we need rifles or something like that to shoot back at them, or how about sub-machine guns or some--we need more fire power." Well, it was foreign to them. ^A So there was a mixup on a number of things on this coping with the insurgency that was growing, ^g not only the conventional formation of the ^A Vietnamese army but of a conventional urban police formation of the police. And yet, throughout the systems ^g there, ^A there were many individuals who knew better, and who knew how to cope with it, and who were continually begging, "Give us a chance to do it some other way."

O'BRIEN: Well, in terms of these people we were talking about a little earlier--the late Eisenhower people, like Fitzgerald, ^g and Irwin, ^g and Parsons--
Do they conceive of the kind of insurgency that's developing in South Vietnam, ^{at that point,} or are they . . . @

LANSDALE: Fairly well. Fairly well. They were more aware of, or had more understanding of, ^A the needs than did some of the folks that were coming in sort of brand new to the problem or who had been steeped in a far more conventional approach to the problem, ^A as were some of our military leaders at the time. But, as I remarked earlier, these were personal friends of mine, and when I'd talk to them and tell them my views, there was always sympathy for them, so I might have mistaken that for understanding and so on, and even that was rare enough so that I felt that. [Interruption]

~~MAN~~

O'BRIEN: How long is the manuscript?

LANSDALE: Ho ho. I went through first, the publishers wanted me to tell all; ^{another words,} just write as much as I could for later editing, and ^{they} said this is the way people do it. So I wound up with really three ^{very} ~~of really~~ long books, and since I was writing one not too long book, why I wound up with a tremendously long manuscript. ^I And ^{of them} urged ^{then} that I could cut it down to two books, ^{we could} and publish it as two different things, and the subject matter would have permitted me. They still want just one book, so I am now going back with editor's notes and with my own notes and trying to. . . . I ^{had} started off initially with a cut-and-paste job, but I discovered I couldn't do that and retain the proper narrative and ^{interest} ~~entries~~ on the thing, ^{but} I wound up having to rewrite almost of all of it, and recast it, and retell it in a somewhat different form.

I'm about half-way through ^{with} that, but it'll be a fair-size book even so.

O'BRIEN: Well ^g that's good ^g mainly on the Philippines and the early period in Vietnam?

LANSDALE: Umhmm.

O'BRIEN: Good, you know that's really . . . @

LANSDALE: Well, there's ~~really~~ ^g one big period in Vietnam that isn't known too well, and most historians have passed over it, and the ones who haven't have been championing a cause, and their work is quite suspect. Some of the French were sort of agents ~~and~~ ^g provocateurs at the time, and they are more or less justifying what they did ^g and leaving out important parts of it.

O'BRIEN: How about the French journalist [Jean] Lacouture? What do you think of his work? Is it Lacouture that's done the thing on Ho [Chi Minh]?

LANSDALE: ^{Yes,} ~~Yeah,~~ I'm trying to remember. I think that's who it was. Well, most of the French writings about Ho and some of the explanations in official documents of the French, trying to explain him and so on, by friends, I found very interesting ^g and I had no way of judging ^g really on it ^g there was a tremendous sympathy and so forth being expressed, and then a very strong attempt to work out an accomodation ^m with him afterwards, ~~with him~~ ^g by the French. And again, a highly emotional sensitivity to any interference ^{with g} ~~was~~ what they were trying to do, and they saw almost anything as interference.

9 So ^g what is written by them, I read mindful of their sensitivities at the time and what they're trying to prevent anybody ever believing that would be opposite at all, or something different at least ^g and ^g it was just amazing. The French press was screaming that I was starting World War III in Vietnam in '55 . . .

O'BRIEN: Mind if I get this on tape--well, it is on tape, I'm sorry ^g I didn't realize it was going.

LANSDALE: . . . simply because I think there was a feeling by the French colonialists in Indochina ^g of not wanting to give up the French presence there ^g.

and it's a human, understandable type of a thing. They had been there and associated there, and some of them had spent their entire lives there, and here they were having to give up something, ^{and} a Swiss journalist once explained it to me: It was like a man giving up his mistress and seeing some ~~big~~ guy in a big car driving by in the street, and even though he'd given ^{her} ~~him~~ up, he'd just say, well, he hates that guy ^{because} he got the mistress allegedly with material means such as an automobile and maybe a fur coat and so on, and he isn't the man that the former guy was. ⁹ So some of this feeling was very prevalent there and for some reason or other, I happened to suddenly become the focal point of it, through my name or something, or other so that they went to great lengths of charging me with all sorts of things that I was doing: I was out buying up the loyalties of ^{sect forces &} ~~set~~ courses with millions of dollars, and things that would be hard to prove that I wasn't, mind you, except ~~that~~ to say, "Look, I didn't have a million dollars to buy anything with." And they'd say, "Well, the U.S. government did, and you were a secret agent for them, and so on. It was very hard to disprove some of their talk and say, "Well, that just isn't so. Except once in a while they'd get really wild and claim I was down--I walked in on a briefing, for example, with French officers telling some American visitors from Washington, ^{about how} ~~that~~ at that very moment I was ^{down} trying to buy off a sect leader, and very naively, with a suitcase full of money, ^g ~~and~~ I didn't know but the guy was going to ambush me and take all the money and not do whatever I was going to plan to do. And at that moment, I just asked him, I said, "Well, please keep on with your briefing, ^g I want to know whether the ^g guy killed me or not. "It was ^g Crazy. Now these ^{that way} were very responsible French officials ^{talking} and the fact that I'd be miles away from the scene of some of these things never stopped the ^{damn} circulation of these stories. I don't know how you ever stop that stuff.

O'BRIEN: ^{Yes,} ~~Yeah,~~ well how about people like Bernard Fall, ^g and Patty ~~Honey~~ ^g and their writings? Are they . . . ©
[P.J.] Honey

LANSDALE: Well, they're very sound, very sound. Fall's background, as was Honey's, was out of intelligence or information collection units ^g and ^{g in} their different countries. Fall's initial writings were all out of a French army historical section ^g and I had to tell him one time I ^{had} read some of his work originally by the original author. But ^g it was a detailed military history of operations that he'd delved into ^g and I don't know, I doubt that it was intentional plagiarism on his part. He was probably rushing through, getting a book published for academic credits and so on. And Honey ^g the same way with British intelligence, who were quite active in Indochina during the French days. But it was ^g some of the stories and happenings ^{and everything} were just almost incredible. ~~The~~ ^g Some of the French journalists were politically partisan. They had connections ^{either} with the Communist Party or sympathies with them of some sort. And Ho had been one of the founders of the French Communist Party, so ^{that} there was always a cultural or comradeship feeling of some sort there ^g and when the Americans started showing up on the scene, there was ^{this} very paternalistic feeling of ^{it} "Well, these are our people, ^g these Vietnamese, ^g or ^g Khmer ^g or Lao, ^g and you keep your cotton-picking fingers off of them" type of a thing that went to very great lengths ^g -- Volatile emotions erupting on this type of a thing. ^g I remember one of the journalists, John Beret, published a newspaper in Saigon and wrote a lot of the early propaganda for individuals in the French army ^{They} and had sort of adventurer types among them. He then went to Pnohm Penh, where he started a weekly newspaper and started also writing speeches for [Noro dom] Sihanouk ^g and the next thing I knew, Sihanouk was accusing me of plotting to murder him or assassinate him ^g and I hadn't ^{even} been near Cambodia, and I hadn't ^{even} thought of Sihanouk when this happened. The governor of Siem Reap, who had been very close to Sihanouk before-- and Siem Reap is where Angkor Wak and the historical ruins are--suddenly died, and the story started seeping out a little bit with Sihanouk charging that this governor, whose name was ^{Dap Chhun}, and I were in a conspiracy to murder him and take over the government of Cambodia. And it didn't do any good that I had never met ^{Chhun} and never had any dealings with him, and Cambodia was way outside my bailiwick, but this is the story that's gone on and on and on.

O'BRIEN: Well, there was a little bit of truth to that,

wasn't there? . . .

LANSDALE: ^{Dap Chhun? Yes} ^{Yeah} Well, he was a national leader and actually had formed the political groupings initially that supported Sihanouk and gave him his political power he was the organizer; he was the chief political lieutenant of Sihanouk. And then apparently, he felt that Sihanouk was going sour, and he wanted to get the government back into reflecting more the will of the people. . How far he got, I don't know, but this was really something that was foreign to me at the time. ⁹ I got sent back into Cambodia afterwards, from Washington, with ^{of} various military assistance groups ^g or economic groups ^{of g} of presidential commissions ^g and so on, and each time they'd have Pnohm Penh on the thing, I'd say, "Well, you had better check the embassy there." Back would come word that, No, Sihanouk was afraid that if I were a member of the party, I would be going in to murder him. I actually went in one time, and the chief of police of Pnohm Penh met our party--along with the foreign minister and so on--at plane when we came down, and the Chief of Police walked right next to me, and he said, "I'm your liaison man from now on." and I said, "You're keeping an eye on me, I know, it's all right. I'm not going to murder your boss; I have no idea of doing that." [Laughter] That is strange. And then Sihanouk made a movie--about '65, '66--in which he played the Commander of Royal Naval Intelligence foiling a great American spy, who happened to have my name, and was a role played by some prince Frenchman who was visiting there, and I was out to overthrow the kingdom, but, of course, our boy hero thwarted the ugly American and won the girl, who was the daughter of the Brazilian ambassador or something. Some French gal played the role. I've been trying to get a print of that or some way of seeing that movie. ^gI'd love to see it, you know. It sounds great and. . . . [Laughter]

O'BRIEN: ^{Yes,} Yeah, I hadn't heard about that. Well, that does hit on something, though, in regard to Southeast Asia. As I understand, [redacted]

[redacted] ^gthat there was an Agency involvement [redacted]

[redacted] and the Agency does seem to have a kind of free hand in some of these Southeast ^{Asian} nations. [redacted]

[redacted] Can you

see any ^{brakes} breaks put on them as a result of the change of administrations? ^gHow do you react to this sort of activity?

LANSDALE: Well, most of the things that they did that had political consequences of any major size at all. [redacted]

[redacted] ^{under}are only taken by the Agency after approval up at topside. ^gso as far

as brakes are concerned, they've had them from the beginning. However, the objectives and the intent are approved, and not, ^{again,} the means of doing it--the nuts and bolts--which are supposedly overseen by an ambassador. ^A And

when we get down to the level of a country
where these things are happening, then I think much depends on the individuals: ^g the ambassador, ^g and the station chief, and how
they get along, and again, mostly on the. . . .

Well, no, it isn't either; it's a fifty-fifty proposition. We have ambassadors who don't want to know or ^{who} are opposed ^{to} all such things,

and if an order comes down to do it, they very
unwillingly tell the guy to go ahead, but
watch it now, not too far. ^A A station chief,

then, with orders to do some things, will have
told the ambassador he ^{is} ^{going} to ^{do} this, ^{but} he starts ^{getting} in things, and he figures, ^{that} if he goes back and tells the ambassador what's happening, ^{that} he's not going to get any

understanding and will probably get an order
prohibiting him ^{from} ^{for} doing something, ^{and} ^{he} won't be able to explain, "Well, if I stop doing this, then this other thing won't work, and Washington wants us to have this happen." The ambassador will ^{just} say, "No, I don't see it that way. Don't do it." So I'm sure there are things ~~that are~~ ^o happening that aren't told for this--for operational reasons, ^o and again, it's a judgement of an individual on that thing. It's not a policy type of a thing from the Agency.

O'BRIEN: ^{Yes.} Yeah. Do you find any--in the time that you're there in the middle fifties as well as when you go back in '60, '61, and later involvement in Vietnam--do you find differences between the embassies, ^o between the U.S. embassy in, particularly, ^o Pnohm Penh and Saigon?

LANSDALE: I didn't notice that. It might have existed, and I wouldn't have even known that.

O'BRIEN: Well, there's some feeling among people involved with Cambodian relations ^{during} ~~at~~ that time, as I understand it, that somehow there's an involvement on the part of the South Vietnamese in some of the groups like the . . . o

LANSDALE: Oh, ^{yes, c. I remember} yeah. Both the South Vietnamese and the ^hTai were playing around with groups inside Cambodia, ^g or with exile groups that wanted to go back in Cambodia, and so on, [^] and I'm not certain that the Americans from either Thailand or South Vietnam were fully aware of what all was going on. And I'm not certain that the Americans or the Cambodian government people inside Cambodia knew what was going on, and were tending to exaggerate some of this. Things get blown up out of all proportion in this. But, ^g just the fact that there was antipathy and it would take this form of expression, among others that were going on. . . . [^] I don't know which people would rather go in and take over and run Cambodia, ^g the Thai^s or the South Vietnamese, ^g it's about a toss up which one, ^{looked} was down more on the Khmers than the other. [^] And Diem used to follow the predictions of the royal fortune-teller in P^hnom Penh to Sihanouk. Apparently, [^] they were spending a lot of intelligence money to find out, you know, what's happened in each other's sessions and what he was telling the guy. Then how useful this was, mind you, I don't know.

O'BRIEN: Well, do you find [^] again, in passing on to the task force [^] and the formation of that Vietnam task force in the early part of the Kennedy administration--do you find [^] the ^a sensitivity on the part of the people, the political appointees, to what's going on in South Vietnam? Are you able to explain what you're telling me right now about South Vietnam to these people?

LANSDALE: [^] Uh, only partially. They were as bemused by the mechanics of getting decisions in Washington as they were with the problem that they were employing the mechanics to solve. It was all sort of new to them, and they wanted to do a good job, but in order to do it, they were suddenly working with these instruments, ^{you see} that were foreign to them here. I think that the principles ^{also} in the administration were not entirely aware of these [^] people they were dealing with in Washington. I recall, at the time, some [^] surprises. Rusk was violently opposed in the department over where he was by some people, and I noticed at times that he wasn't aware that he was turning around and asking a guy who minutes before Rusk had come in to him, was among his comrades, ^{in the Department called him,} just, "This stupid jerk," and so on, which I felt was disloyal ^{behind} the guy's back, you know. I was always urging them to speak up in front of people and so on, and they wouldn't do it. And the same damn thing was true ^{of} against some of the military against McNamara, for example.

91 Well, the McNamara^s and the Rusk^s and their unders^s and deputy^s ^{and so on,} types of people, and assistant secretaries, were trying to cope with people that they ^{instinctively} felt were ~~instinctively~~ opposing and foot-dragging and so on, and trying to get that working ^{so} so that to get them working on a given problem was really the thing that they were concerned with ^{and}

92 you'd suddenly say, "Well, we're going to talk about Laos," or Vietnam, or Israel or something. ^{Yes, Yes, Yes.} What have you got in ^{this} the paper? you know? And they were watching ^{to} see ^u: "Well, it's ~~just~~ ^{he this guy} ~~I've~~ really done ^q this homework," ^{and} ^{Is he going to} and is it gonna come up with something or not?" rather than what is the real problem here, and how would I solve it if I weren't sitting in this room in this particular group, and so on. So there was a . . .

TP So then, working on this type of a thing which I saw very much in the task force on Vietnam ^c -- Gilpatric, I know, was shocked at the reactions of some of the foreign service people that came in at ^a rank of ambassador and so on, that were sort of the staff assistants on the assistant secretary and undersecretary level. They would start a meeting ^{at night} ~~in fact~~, I was asked to be sort of ^q -- I forget what the title was ^q -- executive officer or something of it, and they asked me to chair the meetings. Well, I'd no sooner open it ² than these guys would be passionately explaining why I ^h shouldn't be sitting in the chair of the meeting, see?

O'BRIEN: ^o ~~Yeah~~ ^o Yes

LANSDALE: I think it shocked some of the Kennedy administration people. It suddenly revealed a feud and so on, and I hadn't said it, and I personally didn't care that much, you know. I'd say, "Have you got all the hate out of your system now? Let's go on with the meeting," see. This, of course, would activate it more, but I would say, "Well look, we really do have some problems here we've got to get to, and if you want, I'll meet you afterwards and we can have lunch or something, and you can spoil my lunch by telling me what a heel I am or something. But we've got work to do." So then, Gilpatric or somebody would tell me afterwards, "Do you think we better take you off?" "Well, yeah. If it's going to effect, the work done, it's better to take me off. It's no fun for me to sit up and chair something under conditions like this," so . . . 0

O'BRIEN: ~~Yeah.~~ ^{Yeah.} Were you ever approached with the job as ambassador to Vietnam?

LANSDALE: ~~Yeah.~~ ^{Yes, Yes.} ~~Yeah.~~ ^{Yeah.}

O'BRIEN: Who was pushing that?

LANSDALE: I don't know. I heard about it ^{the} ~~this~~ first Saturday after the inaugural--I think that's it. It was very early in the administration. McNamara asked me to come down to the White House and meet him there, and I thought it was to brief him on something. And I was working on a number of intelligence matters in Defense at the time, ^{and} I showed up, and he asked me to just wait outside, and they were meeting in the Cabinet room, ^{and} as I said, it was essentially an NSC group. ^{And} after a bit, they asked me to come on, ^{and} they had me sit opposite the president. And he looked at me, and he said, "Did Dean [Rusk] tell you, ^I I want you to be ambassador to Vietnam?" I said, "No, he didn't mention that." Well, he hadn't at all, ^{and} ~~and~~ there was a long, painful silence, and I figured, "Well, ^{maybe} maybe he's asking me if I want to be, or would I accept the job." So I finally said, "Well, it would be a great honor," and that was the ^{last} last I ever heard of it. But, ^I I heard all sorts of rumors that ^{are usual} ~~they use~~ for Washington, ^{It} ~~and things~~ afterwards that Dean Rusk was very much opposed to it, and opposed on the ground that I was a military man and they didn't want military people in on the situation.

O'BRIEN: Yeah. Yes.

LANSDALE: And then later I had met one of Rusk's staff officers at the time, and he was telling me that Rusk was figuring, ^{you know, if} he could get me a job some other place or a promotion or something to get me out of the way at the time.

I apparently had become ^{sort of} a target for a lot of gossip and rumors ^{and so on} at the time. But after that, then, they asked me--Kennedy asked me pretty point blank--about ^{Ambassador} Durbrow, and I said, "Well, after what you just asked me and so forth, I'm a little hesitant, but you're the President and you need the truth so I'll just tell you right now, I think he's a very ill man his judgment's impaired by his physical condition he's a fine professional foreign service officer and could be used some place, but don't keep him on in Vietnam anymore. He's sick he's on his back a lot of the time, and you need someone very alert, whoever it is and pull him out." And they got--Rusk and everything, you know. "You're off your subject, boy." But I said, "Well, Durby's an old friend of mine, and I like the guy, and I saw a lot of him when I was in Vietnam on this brief visit, and I think it's a shame that the guy's kept on there because he was quite ill, in bad shape."

¶ And Durby never forgave me for it, it got right back to him that I had sacked him and so on because he was withdrawn after that, but this certainly didn't hurt his career at all, in any way, and even though State put him on a make-work job after that, but he held the rank of ambassador which is as high as you can get in the foreign service. And he was ill, he really was.

O'BRIEN: Well, how does [Frederick E.] Nolting come into this . . .

LANSDALE: Well, Nolting came in, as ~~the~~ ^c apparently, as the foreign services rebuttal to my going on out ^{of there} of there. I remember both McNamara and Gilpatric asked me about him, and I didn't know him. I said, "Well, I'd just go on what I have heard from other foreign service officers who respect him very much." So finally, Nolting was-- a meeting was arranged with Nolting, and I liked him very much when I talked [^] ^{to} with him. He asked me if I would give him some briefings on Vietnam, which I did do. And when I wound up the end of that, I was asked again by McNamara, who said he was going to tell Kennedy, and I said, "Well, this looks like a very good man, and I think it's a sound appointment." [^] I didn't want to be ambassador. Jesus. During the Eisenhower administration, they wanted to make me ambassador ^{to} ^a of the Philippines, and I begged them not to. I think that's one of the world's worst jobs. You're stuck where you can't do what your job is supposed to be, and I knew they were going to put me in places where I'd be up against Communist political leaders of some sort, working the other side. And of course, you aren't in that position, but allegedly you are, ^a and you're ^d going to have people running circles around you, ^a if you ^a know it and couldn't lift a little finger to stop them. ^a And this isn't my idea of a good spot to be in. You just get belabored over that.

O'BRIEN
LANSDALE:

Well, did Nolting ever try to get you back to Vietnam^g in an advisory position?

LANSDALE: I think so. There were a number of attempts by the Vietnamese themselves, and unfortunately, some of them were^g couched in terms of wanting me to come out as ambassador, by the Vietnamese^g but Nolting and I had very friendly relations, and I think he had proposed that I come on out several times. But these things would usually only come to me sort of second or third hand^g and ^gone time apparently President Kennedy had said something to the JCS because suddenly my relations with the Chiefs went down to less than zero and sub-zero^g and I finally asked General [Curtis E.] Lemay of the Air Force, because I'm an Air Force officer, what the trouble was. And he said, "You and your ambitions to have four stars." I said, "What's this again?" Apparently Kennedy had said something to the Chiefs of, what would they think of my being given four stars and being put in charge of operations in Vietnam?

And I didn't know about it, and they took it that I was pushing myself for it. I said again, "that isn't ^{something} I'd want to do." So this was about the time that--no, maybe ^{G. rail} [William Westmoreland] Westy was coming in about then ^g it was around that time.

O'BRIEN: Well, the task force really forms up the instructions for Nolting, doesn't it ^g...

LANSDALE: Yes.

O'BRIEN: . . . for the next few years. Just what kind of recommendations come out of that task force?

LANSDALE: Well, I was only in on the very original one, which was to undertake some things such as changing the specific types of things to meet a situation in ^g there. One of them was ^g we would get a political section that would work out better relations with the Vietnamese government, a political section in our embassy, and that the foreign service would go and search through their own personnel for people with some real political savvy to get ^g into guide ^g rather than control or belabor or have confrontations with the Vietnamese government to carry out essentially political reforms, and getting some of the just criticism of the opposition considered in the governing body. ¶ Another thing was on the police, of getting police training done so that they could cope with meeting enemy units, rather than doing urban police work. In this, I was begging them to at least get to a state constabulary^{level} as far as American advisors were concerned, and I wasn't certain that the U.S. Army's military police could cope with it, but maybe they could get a team of them in, and then I was pointing out that there were constabulary officers and officers from other countries, including South America and the old Philippine constabulary, who knew the law-and-order conditions--quite similar to Vietnam--and bring them in if they wanted to go international. I was trying to get them to get very realisticⁱⁿ and solving problems by changing the quality and the approach that we had. ¶ We drew up an original draft that went to the President, out of meetings that lasted about ten days, at which point, at Rusk's insistence, the task force went over to State and became a general, regular body there. They then proceeded to rewrite our original ~~and~~^{ed} instructions and drafts and everything, and both McNamara and Gilpatric said, coming back from the White House, "Ed, you had better not get in there." I said, "If I can help in any way, I will." They said, "Well, right for the time being, you'd better not go near that group, see?" ^{CA} [^] [^] I actually didn't get in to some of their policy formation, again in a fairly early period, on the thrust of things in Vietnam, except for some of the Defense people who were over there. I would talk to them on what was being proposed and going on, but this was sort of second and third echelon type of a thing, pulling back out of it. ⁹ But initially, I was actually trying to get a quality U.S. representation in Vietnam, and actually smaller again than it was at the time, and to pick a few key things, and to concentrate on that, and really

? did or didn't

to get the Vietnamese coping with their own problems more effectively than they were doing.

O'BRIEN: ~~Yes~~ Well, between this time and the time of the Taylor-Rostow mission, are you involved in Vietnam on a kind of regular basis or . . .

LANSDALE: Uh, no. Off and on I was, but again with second- and third-echelon type of problems. I was seeing Gilpatric everyday and working very closely with him, so that a lot of times, as things would come up, he would discuss them with me. But again, I was trying to explain who certain people were that were named, their backgrounds, and their qualities, and certain events and places, and going to maps with him and describing terrain, and so on, what the situation really meant that was making the problem. So I was fairly well out of it.

As a matter of fact, I was working with some visiting Burmese on their concepts of defense of a country, and ~~they~~ they brought me in with the Israeli who had had a mission helping them with their defense problems in Burma. And the Israeli had ~~then~~ turned around to their defense minister and some of the others, and invited me to ^{take a} look at their defense system in Israel.

I I was quite enthusiastic about going and had everything arranged and was to leave on a Saturday, when about on a Wednesday or Thursday, I was asked to go to Vietnam with the other mission and stuff, ^{and} unfortunately, ^I had to cancel out everything and never got into see what Id wanted to see there.

O'BRIEN: Well, you end up working on border -- actually, the ^{sealing} sealing of the border, then, don't you, ^g on ^{that} the Taylor-Rostow thing?

LANSDALE: Yes. Yes.

O'BRIEN: What about that preoccupation? Where does that idea come from? ^g is that Rostow's?

LANSDALE: Well, Taylor was the one that charged me with it. Taylor said, "Well, ^g you folks ^c" -- this is ^{the} a flight which started ^g -- "Will each of you write down some of the things, ^{that} you think we should look into and what you might like to look into." So I gave him a list of about twenty things, ^{that} I'd like to look into, ^g none of them being this, of course. ^g is

I suggested some other subjects for other people on the thing and gave it to ^{him} ~~them~~ ^{and} he called me back ^{and} said that it was a very interesting ^{list} ~~that~~ I had given him, and would I please work on building a defense on the border. And I said, "Well ^c what sort of a defense?" He said, "Well, a system of fortifications or a wire like the Iron Curtain in Europe." I said, "Good God, you aren't going to do that, are you?" And he said, "Well, look into it." So that ^{supposedly} was ^a all I was ^c supposed to do, and of course, I got called in on other things immediately.

¶ But I wasn't even invited along to go in and see Diem with him. I said, "Look, these are old friends of mine. If you'd like, why I'll do anything I can ^q you can hit them high, and I'll hit them low if you want. We can get some things done that way." He said, "Well, you aren't on our protocol list, so you don't attend any of these calls on the President."

¶ We landed in Saigon, and the people from the presidency ^{were there and} met us ^{and} Taylor and Rostow were over talking with reporters who were interviewing

them plane side, and these people from the presidency said, "President Diem wants you
to come to dinner tonight" and I said, "Well,
I better check ^{with} on my boss on this ^{thing}." Taylor was busy, but I grabbed Rostow who wasn't talking
at the moment and told him, and he said, "Go ahead." So I said, "Well, I wasn't even on the protocol, and everything. I don't care about going up to these protocol meetings
anyhow, ^{but} I went in and saw Diem, whose
question was, "What's this mission doing here?
What are you all up to?" I said, "Why don't you wait, and they'll be in here to have a meeting with you tomorrow, and you'll find out." And then it became very personal. We just started talking over ^{his} two old friends ~~with him~~, and I had dinner with him. And he brought his nephew in to join us--Nhu's boy,
oldest boy--who had a new toy missile, like a rocket with a launcher, and I was trying to explain to this youngster who was squatting
on the floor next to his uncle, ^{the} President, ^{who} who was busily eating dinner--^{I said,} "you don't point ^{this}
at him." I didn't know how big a spring this thing had on it, whether it would take his head off or not. [~~Laughter~~] I ^{taught} told him to shoot it up into the ventilating fan in the ceiling. We spent dinner, actually, taking parachutes and things out of the ventilating fans, and the kid and I were climbing up a ladder to get these things out of the thing in the palace. This was very different from an official protocol meeting.

O'BRIEN: ^{Yes.} Yeah. How is Diem at that point?

LANSDALE: He was a very changed man. It was the first time in our talks with each other.
When I met him at the palace that night, his brother Nhu came in for the first time and sat next to him, and when I ^{asked} Diem a question, his brother would answer it, and I'd have to tell him I wasn't asking him the question; I was asking his brother. A very strange relationship at the time, and I found that he was a talker--Diem was--and he was very clear and concise in his statements and had too big a grasp of details, ^{of} in whatever subject he was talking about. It'd go on for hours--details on it, which fascinated me but used to bore other people. But he did know his country, and its history, which he would give at the drop of a hat. This evening in '61, seeing him, he was very hesitant in his talk and hadn't--it was something physical as well as ^a mental hazard or something, I felt.

O'BRIEN:

^{Any evidence of ^}
~~Did he go into~~ that later?

LANSDALE:

No. There was ^a -mentally, people were telling me that his brother had taken over in the year following ^{I just} ~~this~~ ^{the} a dominance on ^a thing. But this was a man that wasn't as sure of himself as he had been when I had seen him less than a year before. And there had been one assassination attempt only, but the big one had taken place before I saw him in January or December of '60--the attack on the palace and so on. So it hadn't been an outside, physical happening like that that had caused the change.

O'BRIEN:

Was he a spiritualist at all?

LANSDALE:

No, no. He wasn't superstitious. ^o He was a very rational sort of a person--pragmatic.

O'BRIEN: Well, when you get back, you talk to President Kennedy and Robert Kennedy, and John McCone, as I understand, in a rather private meeting. What happened here?

LANSDALE: Well, this was when I came back, I met the President. I went in with Taylor and Rostow-- all of us did who were out on the mission--and he thanked us all very much, and as we were leaving he asked me to stay behind and talk to him, and that was when he asked me to perform this other service for him, which was initially to think about it, and if I came up with some ideas, why to put them down, briefly, on paper and give them to him. And I said, "Well, do you want me to forget about Vietnam for the time being, because I haven't written my report yet about Vietnam." He said, "Yes, this other takes priority over it," so I didn't even finish writing my reports on what I had seen in Vietnam at the time. I went immediately into this other work.

O'BRIEN: Well, about that time, there's at least some thinking in terms of memos that are going to the President about the only way to save Vietnam is with a rather substantial ^gcommitment of U.S. troops. Is that . . . ⑥

LANSDALE: Yes, there was some. Now where. . . . Hmm, there was some, and I can't remember just where it was coming from. This was one of the things ^{new} that Diem asked me when I saw him. He asked me if he should ask for U.S. troops, and I said, "Do you need them?" He said, "I asked you a question," and I said, "Well, I'm asking you a very legitimate question on this thing," ^gand I said, "Are you ready to admit that you have so lost control of your situation that you can't cope with it here?" And I said, "You'd have to do that before you ever turn around and ask for American troops in here." And he said, "No, we can still handle things, and you've answered my question," so apparently ^{||} he didn't ask. ^{I'm sure,} There ^{g had} have been some conversations, ^Cgoing on ~~in~~ ^{I'm sure,} sure with some of the Americans before that ^{that} would be my guess on this thing because he didn't say, "What do you think of ^{of} ~~it~~ ^gIs there anything, or ^{of} should I ask?" which was sort of like somebody had recommended this at some point, and I don't think it would have been completely in

the ^{of a} Vietnamese context.

O'BRIEN: Yeah, do you get any of this thinking when you get back? Any contingency planning or thinking about the building ^{up} of troop levels to a more substantial level, ^{and} maybe linked with the
settling of the Laotian question first?

LANSDALE: There might have been, and I might have known some of it. I can't recall now of any ^{it's} it's someplace in the back of my head ^{that} there were some things like that going on. I turned around, just took time off completely from
other things and concentrated on this other problem for a time afterwards. Actually, through December of that year, I was sort of holed up
and working on some things. ^{My} My staff would get
in and out of some of these other things, and I used to shove them in to take my place in meetings and so on ^{and I could} and I can only then just get very quick briefings on them, but they were essentially supporting whatever McNamara and Gilpatric were doing so I'd just have them
go in and report directly and work with them directly.

O'BRIEN: ^{Yes.} Yeah. Who were the people ^{who were} on your staff at that point?

LANSDALE: Well, let's see? One of them was Sam Wilson, whose ^{now} is now a brigadier general in the Army. ^{at the time} Jack ^{Bowell} Bowles was a Navy Captain who went down to serve with the JCS afterwards and is now with Standard Oil and working out of Singapore. And I had five or six people like that, but those were my two principle ^{ones} ones.

O'BRIEN: Well, this is about ready to run out, and we've covered ~~a~~ ^{quite} quite a bit.
