Subject: General Comments on Draft Letter of Invitation

In whatever form the first substantive paragraph of the letter takes, do you think it makes it a little more intriguing for the invitees if we add a sentence that briefly explains: (a) how much we have done; and (b) how broadly the Board has interpreted its mandate? My thought is that possibly some of the invitees who are not familiar with the Board may react with, " what is this some who shot JFK thing?" So, I'm thinking additional lines such as the following: Since July 1995, the Review Board has released more than 30,000(?) documents from more 15(?) different federal agencies. The Board has interpreted its mandate broadly to include previously classified military records relating to U.S. foreign policy toward Cuba and Vietnam in the early 1960's. In addition, the Board has effectively dealt with some of the most sensitive intelligence issues of the day such as CIA stations and FBI informants. Just a thought to bring them into the fold.
