Anna:Thank you for your response.A point well taken about ensuring people know what is actually being opened and what is being closed. Although we have specifically stated in past mailings what is being opened and closed, we must reiterate that point constantly. Sometimes when one has been looking at something for too long, someone else with a "fresh eye" sees a weakness in the text, as you have here. I am forwarding your message to Eileen to remind us to explain more the next time, beyond the numbers.Thanks again.

I was struck with the way in which thenumbers seem to indicate that we are closing as much material as we areopening. Yet most of our closures are file numbers, crypts or names thatwe may release in the next year. I wonder how that can be handled. A lineof boiler plate? Some other manner of explanation? There may be no solution. The description of the Hersh book in the news story is interestingconsidering the fact that it is not quite what we have learned. Anna
